

Gender Equality & Sexual Reproductive Health

Having access to quality sexual and reproductive right can be the difference between a life spent in poverty and an empowering life; especially when it concerns young girls and teen pregnancy Social change, like any other kind of change is driven by the desire of the human population and how they navigate their lives while fulfilling their basic needs on Maslow's hierarchy of needs as best as they can in the time that they are given to adapt and evolve. Having over 50 per cent of the population being under the age of 24, the future of Cambodia looks bright and full of possibilities. "Only in societies where men and women have equal rights and responsibilities will reproductive rights be equally shared by all." (UNFPA, 2014).

Envisioned Outcomes

- 1 The Cambodian education system will provide adequate sexual reproductive health and rights classes to young people, with aims to address gender-based violence and pregnancy-associated school dropouts, through the promotion of family-planning.
- 2 There will be nationwide accessibility and availability of contraception.
- 3 Cambodian males will share male equal responsibility and participation for achieving a world where women have full body autonomy.
