Demystifying Russian security engagement in the Sahel: Can Europe fill the emerging security vacuum?

Background

Currently, Russia is exploiting anti-French and anti-Western sentiments to promote a false narrative of positive intervention in the Sahel region. Moscow is deploying hundreds of Wagner mercenaries and military personnel to Mali, who have worsened the security situation in the region– as the Russian paramilitary group Wagner are frequently accused of committing atrocities against civilians. These developments are fueling jihadist movements and increasing the security vacuum, especially in the tri-border region of Mali, Niger and Burkina Faso.

In its messaging, Russia uses an army of trolls and allied “influencers” to claim that Moscow is aiding African countries with development projects as well as military assistance. Contrary to its messaging, Russia has no development program for the region, and is focusing on short-sighted goals and on countering European/ Western influence. This is a risk for the European Union, as increased instability in the region may lead to increased migrations flows, fuel extremist violence and foster criminal activities such as drug smuggling.

Europe must thus step up its game to counter Russian engagement in the region, at the same time demystifying a vision of the region that is too focused on Russian and Wagner’s presence. In other words, the EU should design a package for citizens in the region that supports democratic governance models, and which cannot be exploited by Russia. The EU should see the stability of the Sahel region as a major challenge that needs to be tackled through a comprehensive approach, combining military engagement with development programs.

In this event, co-organized by the EU Special Representative (EUSR) for the Sahel Ms Emanuela Claudia Del Re, MEP Željana Zovko (EPP, CR), Vice-Chair of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Multinational Development Policy Dialogue (KAS MDPD), we will discuss what the EU’s comprehensive security engagement in the region should look like.
