The Future of International Cooperation in Public Health

Seeing the spillover effect from the inequality of capacity in responding to the health emergency between countries in the world, both Germany and Indonesia know the importance of promoting international health cooperation in pandemic management. But as proponents of multilateralism, they together face the challenge in restoring confidence and exuberance towards multilateral forums and international institutions like the World Health Organization. This panel explores the future of international cooperation in public health. (Apprx. 15 Minutes speaking time for each speaker)

International Cooperation in Economic Recoveries

While there have been discussions over how crucial international cooperation will be to ensure there will be no long-lasting damage to supply chain, international cooperation can also contribute in preparing or informing countries through sharing of experience and strategies in fiscal planning. As members of G20, Germany and Indonesia may have the incentive to promote initiatives that could lessen the financial burden on recovering countries. This panel explores the possible areas of cooperation between Indonesia and Germany to support their economic recovery efforts.

Panel Session

Technological Cooperation in Disaster Management: The Use of Technology in Handling the COVID-19 Outbreak

The arrival of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 has increased the awareness of utilizing technology to anticipate or mitigate the risk of disasters. Traces done by AI and data-driven technologies have enabled responsible governments to track the infected, contact them promptly, and quarantine them early and helped medics to diagnose patients of COVID-19. In the future, technologies like AI will likely continue to take more crucial role in humans' efforts to reduce their helplessness amidst disasters and produce timely responses. This panel explores the potential of technological application in anticipating or responding to disasters.
