5. Yet there are limits to this freedom. The freedom incorporated in Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, like all basic rights, is rooted in the Constitution's conception of man as a responsible person free to develop within society. The absolute nature of the guarantee of artistic freedom means that its limits are to be found only within the Constitution itself. The freedom of art is not subject to mere statute, it cannot be qualified by the general legal system or be at the mercy of any vague clause about essential interests of state and society which lacks constitutional basis and is uncontained by the rule of law. If the guarantee of artistic freedom gives rise to any conflict, it must be resolved by construction in terms of the order of values enshrined in the Basic Law and in line with the unitary system of values which underlies it. As part of this system of basic rights the freedom of art is coordinate with the dignity of man as guaranteed by Article 1 of the Basic Law, the supreme and controlling value of the whole system of basic rights (BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]; 27, 1 [6]). Given the effect which a work of art may have on the social plane, the guarantee of artistic freedom may come into conflict with the area of human personality, equally protected by the Constitution.

A person's claim to respect and value may be affected by an artist's use of details of character and career of actual people as in addition to being an aesthetic reality, such a work also has existence in the realm of social facts and the social effects are not dissipated by being artistically transmuted. Such social effects while taking place beside the artistic effects must nevertheless be appraised with regard to the scope of the guarantee of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, since in the work of art the 'real' and 'aesthetic' worlds are unified.

6. The courts below were right in this connection to invoke Article 1.1 of the Basic Law in their appraisal of its protective effect on the area of personality of the late actor Gustaf Gründgens. It would be inconsistent with the constitutional mandate of the inviolability of human dignity, which underlies all basic rights, if a person could be belittled and denigrated after his death. Accordingly, an individual's death does not put an end to the state's duty under Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to protect him from assaults on his human dignity.

In addition, the Bundesgerichtshof and Oberlandesgericht held that Article 2.1 of the Basic Law also had radiant protective effects in private law for Gründgens, though to a degree diminished by his death. However, only a living person is so entitled: the right of personality cannot survive death. An essential precondition of the basic right under Article 2.1 of the Basic Law is the existence of at least a potential or a future person. It is irrelevant that a person may be affected during his lifetime by what the legal situation will be after his death, though this weighed with the Bundesgerichtshof. It is no derogation from the freedom of action and selfdetermination guaranteed by Article 2.1 of the Basic Law to hold that the protection of the personality expires on death.

7. The resolution of the tension between the protection of the personality and the right to the artistic freedom cannot turn solely on the 'social' effects of a work of art but must also take account of specifically aesthetic considerations. The conception of man which underlies Article 1.1 of the Basic Law is as much infused with the guarantee of freedom in Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law as the latter is influenced by the value implicit in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. The individual's claim to social respect and value is not superior to artistic freedom, but neither can art simply ignore the individual's claim to proper respect.

Only by weighing all the circumstances of the given case can one decide whether the publication of a work which artistically deploys true details about an actual person poses a serious threat of encroachment on the protected area of his personality. One consideration must be whether and how far the artistic treatment of the material and its incorporation into the work as an organic whole have made the 'copy' independent of the 'original' by rendering objective, symbolical, and figurative what was individualized, personal, and intimate. If such an aesthetic appraisal reveals that the artist has indeed produced, or even intended to produce, a 'portrait' of the 'original', the outcome will depend on the extent of the artistic alienation and how seriously the 'falsification' damages the reputation or memory of the subject.

IV.

This Court must therefore decide whether in balancing the protection afforded by Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to the personality of the late Gustaf Gründgens and his adopted son against the guarantee of artistic freedom under Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law the courts below have upheld the principles just stated. However, in this Court the opinions on that matter are equally divided, so it cannot hold that the decisions under attack infringed the Constitution (s. 15.2 sentence 4 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act).

3. This Court has always held that a Verfassungsbeschwerde empowers it to review judicial decisions only within narrow limits, and that in particular it cannot review the facts as found and evaluated, the construction of mere law or its application in the individual case, which are matters for the regular courts. These principles apply equally when review is sought of the balancing of the protection afforded to the parties to a civil suit by Article 1.1 of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

This Court is not, like a court of appeal, empowered to substitute its own opinion of the case for that of the proper judge. In cases like these it can only hold that the basic right of the losing party has been infringed if the judge has either failed to recognize that it is a case of balancing conflicting basic rights or has based his judgment on a fundamentally false view of the importance, and especially the scope, of either of those rights.

When the judgments under attack are so tested, it emerges that the Oberlandesgericht and the Bundesgerichtshof recognized that a balancing act was required in order to resolve the tension between the rights emanating from Article 1.1 of the Basic Law and Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, and that the judgments as a whole do not seem to be based on a fundamentally erroneous view of the importance or scope of the two basic rights.

b) Anachronistic Procession, BVerfGE 67, 213

Explanatory Annotation

Article 5.1 of the Basic Law protects the freedom of speech, press, movies and broadcasting and the freedom of information. Article 5.3 of the Basic Law protects the freedom of the arts and sciences and hence the freedom of artistic expression. The difference between the two provisions is the norm between them, Article 5.2 of the Basic Law. Article 5.2 contains language pertaining to possible limitations of the freedom of communications. It only applies to Article 5.1 and not to Article 5.3, which is one of the few guarantees for which the Basic Law does not contain specific limitation language. That does not mean that these rights are absolute rights. Instead, they belong to the group of fundamental rights, which can only be restricted in the defence of other constitutionally protected rights and interests.[80] What that means in detail is controversial but the prevailing view is that these "unconditional" rights should be harder to restrict than those rights of the Basic Law whose scope can be reduced under the limitation language provided and that the "unconditional" rights should not in essence be subject to the same scope of limitations that are available in Article 2.1 or 5.2 of the Basic Law. The result is that it can be legally relevant whether something is qualified as regular communication or as art. However, it should be kept in mind that the Constitutional Court's approach since the famous Lüth-decision has been to emphasize the "constitutive significance" of free speech for a democratic society and to restrictively interpret the limitation language in Article 5.2 of the Basic law in the light of this constitutive significance. Whether the application of Article 5.3 really increases the level of protection in the light of the construction of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law is therefore highly unlikely.

In any case, the political street theatre, which formed the backdrop of this case, with links all the way back to Percy Bysshe Shelley's poem "The Masque of Anarchy written on the Occasion of the Massacre in Manchester" in 1819/1820 and a Berthold Brecht poem based on Shelley's work, took place as a protest against the - ultimately unsuccessful - candidature of the late Bavarian politician Franz-Josef Strauss for the chancellorship in 1980. Strauss was a polarizing figure in German politics and the protests were fierce. The Street Theatre depicted him in the context of Nazi symbols, potraying images of World War III, corruption and other unfavourable allegations. Strauss reacted by instituting criminal proceedings under the insult-provision of s. 185 of the German Criminal Code and the organizers were sentenced to fines.

The Constitutional Court did not agree with the regular courts. In its view the interpretation of individual elements of the street theatre as insulting was a wrong approach. Works of art must be looked at in their entirety and - in the context of evaluating any insulting content - must then be interpreted from various angles. The Constitutional Court concluded that this approach leaves open other ways of interpretation that are not altogether insulting.

Whereas this decision of 1984 came to the right conclusion it is lamentable that the Constitutional Court did not place the street theatre into the broader context of political controversy and political campaign. The Court's general approach has always been that the closer the incriminated speech is to the political discourse in the broadest sense, the more protected it is. Conversely, the more the incriminated speech is removed from this discourse and largely communicated to defame or injure a private individual, the less protection is warranted. In this case the issue was political campaigning and protest against a candidate for high office. Free speech must prevail and rather technical explanations of how certain artistic expressions can or cannot be understood are really beside the point.

Translation of the Anachronistic Procession Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 67, 213*

Headnote:

Judgment concerning the scope of the guarantee of artistic freedom (Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG)) for the purposes of assessment under criminal law of a political street theatre.

Order of the First Senate of 17 June 1984 - 1 BvR 816/82 -

Facts:

During the campaign for the 1980 Bundestag elections, political opponents of the CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship, Bavarian Minister-President Franz Josef Strauss, staged a political street theater in different cities and communities in the Federal Republic in the form of a procession consisting of vehicles and pedestrians. This street theater took its inspiration from a poem by Bertold Brecht: "The Anachronistic Procession or Freedom and Democracy;" one of the figures in the piece appeared wearing, among other things, a mask of Franz Josef Strauss in a wagon with various "Nazi big-shots."

After a criminal complaint was filed by the Bavarian Minister-President, the complainant, an actor in the street theater, was sentenced to a fine by the Local Court (Amtsgericht); the Local Court considered the very formation in preparation for the procession a defamation of the Bavarian Minister-President. The appeal on points of law to the Bavarian Higher Regional Court (Bayerisches Oberstes Landesgericht) was unsuccessful.

The Federal Constitutional Court reversed the criminal convictions in response to the constitutional complaint of the complainant.

Extract from the Grounds:

C.

The constitutional complaint is founded. The challenged decisions violate the fundamental right of the complainant under Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

I.

The constitutional complaint is directed against criminal convictions, which are in principle not amenable to review by the Federal Constitutional Court for the purposes of the establishment of facts or the interpretation and application of criminal law. The Court must, however, ensure that the ordinary courts respect fundamental rights and apply the corresponding standards. In this regard, the limits to its possibilities for intervention depend in particular upon the severity of the alleged interference with fundamental rights: The threshold for a violation of objective constitutional law requiring correction by the Federal Constitutional Court is reached when a decision of the criminal courts reveals errors in the establishment of facts or interpretation that are based on a fundamentally erroneous assessment of the importance of a fundamental right and in particular of the scope of its area of protection and which are also of a certain substantive importance in the concrete legal case (see BVerfGE 66, 116 [131] - Springer/Wallraff -; see also in connection with the guarantee of artistic freedom even earlier BVerfGE 30, 173 [188, 196-197]).

Furthermore, the more permanent the ultimate effect of a conviction on the sphere of the fundamental rights of the convicted party, the more stringent the requirements become that must be met in terms of justification of this encroachment and the more extensive the possibilities for review available to the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 42, 143 [148-149] - DGB).

Conviction for a criminal offence is as a sanction itself already more severe than conviction for a civil offence, which may involve a cease and desist order, a retraction or payment of damages (BVerfGE 43, 130 [136] - political flier). In the case of a sanction under criminal law for an act that may fall under the guarantee of artistic freedom, there is also the danger that the negative effects as regards the exercise of this freedom, which is guaranteed without a reservation of legislative powers because of its especial importance, may extend beyond the concrete case. Given this situation, the Federal Constitutional Court cannot limit its review to the question as to whether the challenged decisions are based on a fundamentally erroneous assessment of the importance of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law and in particular the scope of its area of protection. Nor may individual errors of interpretation be disregarded (see BVerfGE 42, 163 [169]; 43, 130 [136-137]; 54, 129 [136]; 66, 116 [131]).

II.

The "Anachronistic Procession" event falls into the area protected by the fundamental right of artistic freedom (Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law), against which the decisions under challenge must be measured as described below.

1. This guarantee of freedom contains first of all by virtue of its wording and meaning a basic objective standard that governs the relationship between the area of life subsumed under "art" and the state. At the same time, the provision guarantees everyone who is active in this area a right to personal freedom. It applies in equal measure to both the "creative phase" of artistic activity and the "effective phase" consisting of the presentation and dissemination of works of art, which is the phase that gives the public access to works of art (BVerfGE 30, 173 [188-189]).

This guarantee was included in the Basic Law under the impression of the grievous experiences that artists were compelled to tolerate under the rule of force imposed by the National Socialist regime. This is also of importance for the purposes of interpretation of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law: The guarantee of artistic freedom may not be restricted either by narrowing the definition of art by the application of quality standards or by an expansive interpretation or analogy on the basis of restrictions that apply to other provisions of the Basic Law (BVerfGE, loc. cit., [191]).

2. The area of life referred to as "art" must be defined in terms of the structural characteristics that are determined by the nature of art and unique to art alone. It is not possible to describe by a term that is equally valid for all forms of expression of artistic activity and for all classes of artistic Endeavour how far this extends the scope of the guarantee of artistic freedom under the Basic Law and what it entails in detail (see BVerfGE op. cit. [183-184]).

a) One cannot infer an adequate definition from previous attempts undertaken in the area of the theory of art (including the reflections of practicing artists on their activities) to achieve clarity as to the nature of art so that it is not possible to proceed from an established definition of art in the extrajudicial area. The fact that there is a lack of any consensus as regards objective standards in the theory of art also has to do with a special characteristic of artistic life: the specific objective of the "avant-garde" is to expand the boundaries of art. This and widespread mistrust on the part of artists and art theoreticians of rigid forms and strict conventions are characteristics of the area of life referred to as art that must be respected and indicate in themselves that only a broad definition of art can lead to appropriate solutions.

b) The impossibility of defining art in general does not imply a release from the constitutional duty to protect the freedom of the area of life consisting of art, which is to say, to decide for the purposes of concrete legal application whether the prerequisites of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law are in place.

To the extent that formulas and criteria for delimitation have been developed in scholarly literature and case law for dealing in practice with laws that involve "art" as a constituent element, this does not suffice for interpretation of the constitutional guarantee since interpretation under ordinary law is oriented towards the various purposes of the provisions of law.

As far as can be determined, further-reaching attempts to arrive at a definition for the purposes of constitutional law concern only individual aspects; they can claim validity only for individual areas of artistic activity (see from the exhaustive literature, for example, Ropertz, Die Freiheit der Kunst nach dem Grundgesetz, Diss. Heidelberg 1963; Erbel, Inhalt und Auswirkungen der verfassungsrechtlichen Kunstfreiheitsgarantie, 1966; Knies, Schranken der Kunstfreiheit als verfassungsrechtliches Problem, 1967; von Noorden, The Freiheit der Kunst nach dem Grundgesetz [Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law] und die Strafbarkeit der Verbreitung unzüchtiger Darstellungen [s. 184.1 no. 1 of the Criminal Code], Diss. Cologne 1969; Müller, Freiheit der Kunst als Problem der Grundrechtsdogmatik, 1969; Vogt, Die Freiheit der Kunst im Verfassungsrecht der Bundesrepublik Deutschland und der Schweiz, Diss. Zurich 1975; each of which with many further references).

Nevertheless, these efforts include viable aspects that in their entirety make it possible to decide in the concrete individual case whether the subject matter falls into the area protected by Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

3. a) The Federal Constitutional Court has emphasized that "free creative expression" is essential for artistic activity, "in which the impressions, perceptions and experiences of the artist are manifested directly through the medium of a specific visual language." All artistic activity, the Court stated, consists of intertwined conscious and unconscious processes that defy rational resolution. The Court went on to add that intuition, fantasy and artistic understanding work together in the process of artistic creativity; it is not primary communication, but expression, and to be sure the most direct expression of the unique personality of the artist (BVerfGE 30, 173 [189]). Similar attempts at substantive, value based description in the scholarly literature also emphasize the characteristics of creativity, expression of personal experience, visualization and communicative transmission of meaning (see Scholz in Maunz/Dürig/Herzog/ Scholz, GG, Article 5.3, marginal notes 24 and 29; Scheuner, Die Bundesrepublik als Kulturstaat, in Bitburger Gespräche, Jahrbuch 1977-1978, p. 113 [126]; Würtenberger, Vom strafrechtlichen Kunstbegriff, in Festschrift für Eduard Dreher, 1977, p. 79 [89]; Geiger, Zur Diskussion über die Freiheit der Kunst, in Festschrift für Gerhard Leibholz, 1966, p. 187 [191]).

The visual manifestation of the "Anachronistic Procession" satisfies the requirements so described. Creative elements can be seen not only in Brecht's poem, but also in the way it was visually transposed. The poem and its presentation can be considered sufficiently "formed." The intention is to express and make immediately visible general and personal historical experiences - against the backdrop of the current political situation.

b) Even if one sees the essence of a work of art in the fulfilment of the requirements of the genre of a specific type of work from a formal, typological perspective, that is, if one adopts as a basis a more formal definition of art that derives only from the activity and results of, for example, painting, sculpting or literature (see Müller, op. cit., in particular pp. 41-42; Knies, op. cit., p. 219), it is still not possible to deny the "Anachronistic Procession" the quality of a work of art. The poem that serves as the basis for performance is just as much a classic form of artistic expression as the rendition in the form of theatre staged by actors (with masks and properties) on the basis of a concrete script. The fact that the performance involved the specific form of "street theatre" also does not change this in any way; permanently installed stages do not enjoy priority over traveling theatre, a form of theatre with a long tradition.

c) Even if one considers the characteristic criterion for artistic expression to lie in the fact that it is possible due to the variety of its substantive content to repeatedly derive further-reaching meanings from the presentation through further interpretation such that a virtually inexhaustible transmission of information results (see von Noorden, op. cit., pp. 82 et seq., the "Anachronistic Procession") fulfils this criterion. The very special form of street theatre described above results in the creation of distance from viewers such that they are aware as they watch that a "play" is being performed. The thrust of the poem, which is already amenable to manifold interpretation, does to be sure more become more explicit when the poem is updated and makes reference to contemporary persons and events, but the statement it makes is nonetheless still ambiguous, especially since this statement is not composed directly, but rather indirectly of various elements (for example, thought provoking texts, puppets, persons in costume, groups of persons).

d) Since the performance of the "Anachronistic Procession" does therefore fall within the area of protection of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, this is not changed by the superficial and clearly political motives of the producers. Binding rules and values for artistic activity also cannot be imposed when artists deal with current events; the area of "committed art" is not excepted from the guarantee of freedom (BVerfGE 30, 173 [190-191]).

III.

1. Art is as regards its independence and its own laws guaranteed without reservation by Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law; neither the "threefold bar" in the second half of the sentence contained in Article 2.1 of the Basic Law nor the constraints of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law apply directly or by analogy (BVerfGE 30, 173 [191-192]). On the other hand, the limits contained in other provisions of the Basic Law that serve to protect other significant legal interests embodied in the constitutional order under the Basic Law may also be directly imposed on artistic freedom. This applies in particular in the case of the right of personality, which is protected by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. However, artistic freedom in turn imposes limits on the right of personality. When defining these limits in a concrete case, it does therefore not suffice to establish through judicial proceedings the existence of an impairment of the right of personality - in the form of defamation in this case - without taking into account artistic freedom: it is necessary to establish whether this impairment is so serious as to require subordination of artistic freedom; a slight impairment or the mere possibility of a serious impairment do not suffice for this purpose in view of the considerable importance of artistic freedom. If of course a serious impairment of the right of personality can be established beyond a doubt, it cannot be justified on the grounds of artistic freedom.

2. The Local Court failed to recognize the resultant requirements under constitutional law:

a) Artistic statements are subject to and require interpretation; an overall view of the work constitutes an indispensable element of such interpretation. It is therefore not permissible to remove individual parts of a work of art from its context and subject them to independent examination for the purposes of establishing whether they are to be considered a criminal offence. Constitutional grounds for objection therefore exist if the Local Court assumes that the incriminating actions took place outside the actual performance and concludes from this that Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is not applicable. At the same time, even the purely practical necessity of making visible preparations (formation of the procession) or regrouping (event in Kassel) was not recognized. It is also necessary to take into account here that it is thoroughly possible for visible preparations to constitute part of the overall artistic concept in modern theatre.

Symbolic representation with the use of puppets and banners may to be sure also have a declaratory value outside the performance. However, the producers in fact avoided this by covering the procession when traveling across the country. The fact that the performance of the procession in Sonthofen could not begin immediately also does not in any way change this assessment. Neither the complainant nor the producers were responsible for this; this was caused by orders from regulatory authorities. They can also not be held responsible for the photographs taken by the police "as evidence." Photographs taken by journalists fall into the category of promotional advertising and are comparable to the preview photos that are commonly used in the case of permanently installed theatres.

Likewise, as follows from the above, it is inconsistent with constitutional law to want to establish a case of defamation not - as is required by Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law - on the basis of an overall perspective, but exclusively on the basis of the plague wagon.

b) The Local Court also failed to recognize that such an overall perspective, which would have been appropriate, would have yielded several possible interpretations.

A definitive decision as to the standard to be applied when artistic statements are to be assessed under criminal law is not necessary here, especially since this is hardly possible either in general or for all art forms. A person who is completely unfamiliar with the forms in which art manifests itself can certainly not set the standards when it comes to understanding art; on the other hand, however, it is also not possible to take as a reference a person with a comprehensive education in art, in any case not if - as here - the manifestation is directed at a random audience on a public street. In this case, it suffices to ask how a passer-by who was prepared to take into account the entire procession and the performance of the poem as well could perceive the "plague wagon."

Even then it would be possible to think that the joint plaintiff is sitting in the same wagon as the Nazi big-shots, can be equated with them and that he supports their political goals. Taking into account the specific content of the poem, it would be just as possible to get the impression that the intention is to be sure to show a struggle against these Nazi big-shots that is, however, just as hypocritical and mendacious as the divorce from the Nazi past portrayed in the Brecht poem.

Another observer could come to the conclusion that the joint plaintiff is combating, albeit unsuccessfully, manifestations of National Socialism. A spectator who indirectly or directly puts the intentions of the script in the foreground of his thoughts would similarly see such a struggle, but accompanied by the additional thought that as an influential politician described as leaning to the right the joint plaintiff would especially require such distance and that the old National Socialist ideas were again prevailing.

It is not in any case proper to decide with the help of the figure of the "reflective passer-by" exclusively in favour of that of the possible interpretations suggested by the description of the facts in the judgment of the Local Court (further possibilities would by no means seem excluded) that is relevant under criminal law and to postulate only a casual, naive observer who ignores the "fight" with the puppets. This also constitutes a violation of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

3. The decisions under challenge are based on these errors. The possibility cannot be excluded that the courts would have decided otherwise in view of the requirements of constitutional law presented above. The decisions therefore had to be overruled; the matter was referred back to the Local Court. The court must respect the principles presented above in respect of the relationship between artistic freedom and the general right of personality in the new proceedings and decision.

VII. Article 6 of the Basic Law

Marriage, Family, and Children

1. Life Partnership, BVerfG, 17.7.2002, 1 BvF 1/01, http://www.bverfg.de/e/fs20020717_1bvf000101en.html (BVerfGE 105, 313)

Explanatory Annotation

The - often quite controversial - debate over the legal recognition of homosexual partnerships (same-sex unions, same-sex marriage or civil unions) has been raging in several countries for quite some time now. The United States Supreme Court famously ruled in 2015 that the various states must license the marriage between two people of the same-sex and recognize such marriages performed out-of-state.[81] In Ireland, the people spoke in favor of same-sex marriage in a referendum with a margin of over 60%,[82] leading to an amendment of the Irish Constitution allowing for the marriage of same-sex couples.[84] In Australia, the question was put to the people in a plebiscite conducted by the Australian Bureau of Statistics as a postal vote, again with more than 60% voting in favor.[84] Taiwan is the latest jurisdiction, and the first one in Asia, to provide for same-sex marriage by way of legislation[85], implementing a decision of its Constitutional Court from 2017[86] and overcoming significant opposition in society. Overall around 30 states and jurisdictions are now allowing for same-sex marriage, and more recognize same-sex partnerships as an institution distinct from marriage.[87] Same-sex relationship law and practice has been and continues to be an area where sweeping change has happened in comparatively short periods. At the same time, it is an area where the planet remains in stark division not only between continents. In essence, same-sex marriage has so far gained traction only in North- and in significant parts of South America, Western Europe, Australia, and New Zealand.[88] Conversely, all of Asia and Africa (with the notable exceptions of South Africa and Taiwan) and all of Eastern Europe have not amended their legal frameworks in this respect. Russia, for example, is looking at this issue more like a "culture war" than as a human rights issue and in 2013 passed legislation banning "propaganda for non-traditional sexual relationships".[89]

Selected Fundamental Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court

It is perhaps surprising that in Germany the same-sex marriage issue has so far not advanced to the Constitutional Court. It has remained in the realm of legislation. In June 2017 Parliament, passed the Act for the Introduction of the Right to Marriage for Persons of the Same-Sex, which came into effect on 1 October 2018.[90] This Act replaced the Act on Registered Life Partnerships which had created the opportunity for same-sex couples to enter into a civil union, which was largely but not entirely a kind of marriage under a different name.[91]

The Life Partnership Act was challenged before the Constitutional Court.[92] The constitutional backdrop to this legislation is Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, which affords to marriage and family the special protection of the law. The Constitutional Court made it quite clear that, whereas the Basic Law does not explain what a marriage is, it is inherently a union between a man and a woman. It is for this very reason that the Court had no difficulty fending off arguments that the same-sex civil union might infringe on the protection to be afforded to the traditional marriage. The traditional marriage was still open to anyone who wished to engage in this traditional instrument and homosexual couples were excluded from marriage. The Court construed traditional marriage and same-sex unions as mutually exclusive, making it impossible for a married person to engage in a parallel civil union and vice-versa. In essence, the Court followed a "separate-but-equal" doctrine concerning the two institutions. They were regarded as different institutions, to be treated differently, and mutually exclusive. It follows that same-sex couples cannot engage in "marriage" (Ehe) and that heterosexual couples cannot engage in a civil union. With regard to other partnerships of mutual support that do not have a sexual context, such as between siblings, the Court saw the distinguishing criterion in the fact that such partnerships are not exclusive; therefore, it did not constitute discrimination to bar such partnerships from the civil union.

The decision is relevant for another constitutional issue that arose in the context of the federal nature of the German state. When the legislation was passed it was evident that it would not gain a majority in the federal chamber of states, the Bundesrat. As a result, the legislation was split into two pieces, one dealing with the substance matter of the civil union and the other dealing with the procedural implementation, for example, the determination of the relevant Länder authorities for conducting the civil union. Only the latter invoked the necessity for the federal chamber, the Bundesrat, to assent to the legislation. The Court saw no fault in splitting up the legislation in this manner thereby reducing the scope of power of the Länder in the federal legislative process and preceding a trend of rebalancing the allocation of powers and finances between the Länder and the center that became a theme of the constitutional federalism reform amendments of the Basic Law in 2006 and 2009.[93]

The new 2017 act providing for full marriage equality has not been challenged. The Land Bavaria considered such a challenge but decided not to proceed for lack of sufficient chances of success before the Constitutional Court. The argument run by opponents mainly centered around the question whether a statutory amendment was sufficient to introduce same-sex marriage or whether this would have required an amendment of Article 6 of the Basic Law with a redefinition of marriage. Article 6 simply uses the term marriage without any explanation or definition and demands that the institute of marriage be afforded protection. One can safely assume that the drafters of Article 6 did not even think of same-sex marriage when they wrote the Basic Law. Whereas the method of historical interpretation is part of the standard program of constitutional interpretation in Germany, what in the USA is referred to as "originalism" in constitutional interpretation[94] is not a persuasive tool. It is not the Constitutional Court's main task to determine what the dead wanted for the living. It is therefore quite conceivable that the Constitutional Court would look at the concept of marriage ("Ehe") and dynamically interpret this concept in the light of present-day conditions. But even if it did not want to do this: The protection of the traditional heterosexual marriage does not require the prohibition of same-sex marriage.

It should also be noted that the life-partnership and subsequent same-sex marriage legislation also had an impact on various other areas where marriage (and previously life partnerships) provide privileges that non-married (or previously partnered) did not enjoy. For example, the Court found it unconstitutional that a civil partner was denied the right to adopt the adopted child of the other civil partner (successive adoption) while it permitted the adoption of an adopted child of a spouse and the adoption of a biological child of a civil partner (stepchild adoption).[95] On taxation, the Court found unconstitutional that same-sex life partners did not enjoy the same level of thresholds for inheritance tax exemptions.[96] The Court lamented similar discrimination concerning survivors' pensions for civil service employees.[97]

1. Where a statute has been passed and is to be corrected, which is admissible in exceptional cases, it is necessary for the statute to be plainly incorrect. The incorrectness may be shown not only by the text of the statute, but in particular also by taking into account its meaning in context and the parliamentary background materials of the statute.

2. If the Federal Government or the Bundestag (lower house of the German parliament) divides a subject-matter between a number of statutes in order to prevent the Bundesrat (upper house of the German parliament) from preventing provisions that in themselves are not subject to its consent, this is constitutionally unobjectionable.

3. The introduction of the legal institution of the registered civil partnership for same-sex couples does not infringe Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. The particular protection of marriage in Article 6.1 of the Basic Law does not prevent the legislature from providing rights and duties for the same-sex civil partnership that are equal or similar to those of marriage. The institution of marriage is not threatened by any risk from an institution that is directed at persons who cannot be married to each other.

4. It does not infringe Article 3.1 of the Basic Law that persons of different sex cohabiting with each other and groups of people related to each other and living together have no possibility of becoming registered civil partnerships.

Extract from Grounds:

A.

The applications for judicial review relate to the compatibility of the Act on the Termination of the Discrimination of Same-Sex Couples: Civil Partnerships of 16 February 2001 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 266; hereinafter: Civil Partnerships Act, LPartDisBG), which entered into force on 1 August 2001, with the Basic Law. [1]

I.

The aim of the Act is to reduce discrimination against same-sex couples and to give them the opportunity to give their partnerships a legal framework. For this purpose, the registered civil partnership has been created as a family-law institution for a long-term same-sex partnership, with a large number of legal consequences. [2]

1. In the year 2000, at least 47,000 same-sex couples were cohabiting in the Federal Republic of Germany (see Eggen, Gleichgeschlechtliche Lebensgemeinschaften, 2nd part, in: Baden-Württemberg in Wort und Zahl 12/2001, pp. 579 ff.). According to a study commissioned by the German Federal Ministry of Justice and carried out by Buba and Vaskovics in the year 2000, same-sex couples do not essentially differ from different-sex couples in their expectations of the partnership, its permanence, their mutual readiness to support each other and assumption of responsibility for each other. More than half of the interviewees living in same-sex partnerships expressed the desire to live in a legally binding partnership (Buba/Vaskovics, Benachteiligung gleichgeschlechtlich orientierter Personen und Paare, study commissioned by the German Federal Ministry of Justice, 2000, pp. 75 ff., 117 ff.). Same-sex couples are prohibited from marrying. [3]

2. The first parliamentary initiatives for legislation for homosexual partnerships in the Federal Republic of Germany date back to the 11th parliamentary term of the German Bundestag (the lower house of the German parliament; cf. the resolution proposal of the parliamentary party of the Green Party of 18 May 1990, Bundestag document, Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks 11/7197). In 1994, in a resolution, the European Parliament called on the member states of the European Union to avoid unequal treatment of persons of same-sex orientation in their individual legal and administrative provisions, and appealed to the Commission to grant homosexuals access to marriage or to corresponding legal institutions (cf. Official Journal of the European Communities C 61 of 28 February 1994, 40-41; Bundestag document 12/7069, p. 4). There now exist provisions on same-sex partnerships in several European countries (cf. the study of the Max-Planck-Institut für ausländisches und internationales Privatrecht, ed. von Basedow et al. Die Rechtsstellung gleichgeschlechtlicher Lebensgemeinschaften, 2000). They extend from partnerships in the Scandinavian countries that are treated as equal to marriage in their effects to the pacte civil de solidarité (PACS) in France with its possibility of the registration of same-sex and different-sex partnerships, which has fewer legal effects than marriage and can be dissolved more easily. In the Netherlands, same-sex couples may now be married. [4]

In July 2000, the parliamentary parties of the SPD (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands) and BÜNDNIS 90/DIE GRÜNEN introduced a bill for an Act on the Termination of the Discrimination of Same-Sex Couples: Civil Partnerships to the legislative procedure (Bundestag document 14/3751). The FDP (Freie Demokratische Partei) parliamentary party also tabled a bill (Bundestag document 14/1259). After the first readings of both bills, referral to the committee stage and the examination of expert witnesses, the Committee on Legal Affairs of the Bundestag, which had overall responsibility, on 8 November 2000 recommended that the FDP bill should be rejected and the bill of the governing parliamentary parties should be accepted, but in a version divided into two statutes: firstly, as the Act on the Termination of the Discrimination of Same-Sex Couples: Civil Partnerships with the provisions on registered civil partnerships and on the essential legal consequences associated with them (Civil Partnerships Act, LPartDisBG), and secondly as the Act to Supplement the Civil Partnerships Act and other Acts (Gesetz zur Ergänzung des Lebenspartnerschaftsgesetzes und anderer Gesetze, Lebenspartnerschaftsgesetzergänzungsgesetz, Civil Partnerships Act Supplementary Act, LPartGErgG) with in particular procedural-law implementing regulations (Bundestag document 14/4545 with annexes). The reason for this was the intention of the governing parliamentary parties to divide the original bill into a bill not requiring the approval of the Bundesrat (the upper house of the German parliament) and a bill requiring the approval of the Bundesrat. Consequently, the bill of the Civil Partnerships Act was not to name an authority responsible for registering the civil partnership (Committee document (Ausschuss-Drucksache) 14/508 [Committee on Family Affairs, Senior Citizens, Women and Youth (Ausschuss für Familie, Senioren, Frauen und Jugend)] and 14/944 [Committee on Labour and Social Affairs (Ausschuss für Arbeit und Sozialordnung)]). This was approved by the majorities in the consulting committees and was also expressed in the report of the Committee on Legal Affairs of 9 November 2000 (Bundestag document 14/4550). However, in the text attached to the resolution recommended by the Committee on Legal Affairs of the draft of a Civil Partnerships Act, not all the provisions had been amended in line with this. The Civil Partnerships Act was accepted by the Bundestag in this wording (Minutes of plenary proceedings (Plenarprotokoll) 14/131, p. 12629 D) and was passed by the Bundesrat unaltered; the Bundesrat did not make an application to the Mediation Committee (Vermittlungsausschuss) and did not establish that this statute was subject to approval (Bundesrat, Minutes of plenary proceedings, 757th session, p. 551 C, D). [5]

When the Federal Ministry of Justice pointed out two obvious errors, in its opinion, in subsections 3 and 4 of Article 1 § 3 of the Civil Partnerships Act, the Presidents of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat agreed to a correction of the provisions objected to as incorrect. The signing and promulgation of the Act on 16 February 2001 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 266) then followed in the corrected version. The applications for an interim injunction against the entry into force of the Act, made by the Land governments of the Land (Freistaat) Bavaria and the Land (Freistaat) Saxony were unsuccessful before the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht; cf. judgment of 18 July 2001 - 1 BvQ 23/01 and 1 BvQ 26/01 -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2001, 2457). [6]

Now there are implementation regulations for the Civil Partnerships Act in all Länder (states), establishing jurisdiction in civil partnership matters and associated procedural rules. [7]

The Civil Partnerships Act Supplementary Act, on the other hand, was approved by the Bundestag but has not yet been approved by the Bundesrat (Bundestag document 14/4875). The Mediation Committee applied to by the Bundestag (Bundestag document 14/4878) has as yet made no resolution thereon. [8]

3. The Act challenged in the applications for judicial review governs the creation and dissolution of a registered civil partnership for same-sex couples. The civil partnership is created by a contract between two persons of the same sex; the statements necessary for this purpose must be made before the competent authority (Article 1 § 1.1). A further requirement for entering into a civil partnership is that both partners make a declaration as to their property status (Article 1 § 1.1 sentence 4). On the application of one or both partners, the civil partnership is terminated by a decree of annulment (Article 1 § 15). [9]

The partners are bound to each other in care and support and committed to plan their lives together. They are responsible for each other (Article 1 § 2). The statute does not require sexual intercourse. The legal consequences of the registered partnership are in part based on the legal consequences of marriage, but they also diverge from the latter. Thus, the partners owe each other support. This applies to a modified extent also to persons living apart and after the termination of the partnership (Article 1 §§ 5, 12 and 16). The partners must make a statement on their financial status; they may choose between a property regime of equalisation of surplus and a contract governing their financial relations (Article 1 §§ 6 und 7). They may choose a joint name (Article 1 § 3). The civil partner or former partner of a parent who has lived for a long period in a domestic community with the child has a right of access (Article 2 number 12, § 1685.2 of the German Civil Code). A partner is deemed to be a member of the other's family (Article 1 § 11). A right of intestate succession of the civil partner corresponding to that of the spouse has been introduced (Article 1 § 10). In social security law too, entering into the civil partnership has legal consequences (Article 3 §§ 52, 54 und 56). Thus, for example, in the statutory health insurance scheme civil partners are covered by the family insurance (Article 3 § 52 number 4). In the law concerning foreign nationals, the provisions relating to the right of entry of foreign families that apply to marital relationships are correspondingly extended to same-sex partnerships (Article 3 § 11). In addition the Civil Partnerships Act grants the partner of a parent with sole custody, with the consent of the latter, the authority to make joint decisions in matters of the child's everyday life, known as "limited custody" (Article 1 § 9). [10]

The statute challenged and the supplementary statute that has not yet come into existence provide no adjustment of old-age pension rights between the civil partners if their partnership is annulled, and no rules on pensions in case of death. Similarly, joint adoption of minors is excluded. The supplementary statute contains provisions on tax law and state welfare law, but the Civil Partnerships Act does not. [11]

B.

The applications are unfounded. The Civil Partnerships Act is compatible with the Basic Law. [45]

I.

The Civil Partnerships Act was passed in conformity with the Basic Law. It was not subject to the approval of the Bundesrat. [46]

1. The Act contains no provisions that require approval under Article 84.1 of the Basic Law. [47]

a) The requirement of approval in Article 84.1 of the Basic Law is intended to protect the Constitution's fundamental decision, with regard to the jurisdiction of the Länder in administrative matters, to protect the federal structure of the state and prevent alterations to the federal structure being introduced by way of legislation below the constitutional level bypassing the objections of the Bundesrat (cf. BVerfGE 37, 363, (379 ff.); 55, 274 (319); 75, 108 (150)). On the basis of this purpose of Article 84.1 of the Basic Law, a statute does not require approval merely because it affects the jurisdiction of the Länder to implement it by causing the Länder to act or cease to act administratively in a particular sphere. Instead, the requirement of approval by the Bundesrat follows from a provision of federal law establishing Land authorities or governing their procedure (cf. BVerfGE 75, 108 (150)). A provision establishing new Land authorities does not refer solely to a federal statute providing for new Land authorities, but also to a federal statute laying down the duties of a Land authority in detail. In contrast, the statute governs the procedure of the Land authorities if it bindingly determines the manner and form in which a federal statute is implemented. This includes the case where substantive legal provisions of the statute not merely require the administrative authorities to act, but at the same time prescribe a specific procedural manner of acting in administrative matters (cf. BVerfGE 55, 274 (321); 75, (152)). [48]

b) Measured against this, the provisions of the Civil Partnerships Act cited by the applicants contain no rules of administrative procedure in the meaning of Article 84.1 of the Basic Law. [49]

aa) Article 1 § 1.1 of the Civil Partnerships Act governs only the substantive-law requirements for the creation of a registered civil partnership. The Act does not contain a federal-law provision governing the administrative procedure when civil partnerships are registered. It does require that the declarations necessary to create a civil partnership must be made to an authority, but it leaves open which authority is competent to receive the declarations. Nor does it make provisions for the procedure when the parties make mutual declarations. It neither specifies a particular registration procedure nor lays down what form the cooperation of the competent authority is to take when a civil partnership is created. Formal requirements on private individuals making declarations of intention such as are contained, for example, in Article 1 § 1.1 sentence 1 of the Civil Partnerships Act, are not provisions governing administrative procedure in the meaning of Article 84.1 of the Basic Law. The Länder used the scope they were given and in the implementation provisions passed by them have now created varying jurisdictions of Land authorities who have to exercise their administrative activity in registering civil partnerships under the relevant Land-law rules. [50]

bb) Article 3 § 25 of the Civil Partnerships Act does not create the jurisdiction of a Land authority. Admittedly, Article 17a of the Introductory Act to the German Civil Code (now Article 17b of the Introductory Act to the German Civil Code), which was newly introduced by this statute and which determines the application of the relevant law for registered civil partnerships, in Article 17a.2 sentence 1, provides that the rule in Article 10.2 of the Introductory Act to the German Civil Code applies with the necessary changes. Under sentence 1 thereof, on or after marriage spouses may choose their future name by declaration to the registrar of births, deaths and marriages. However, this reference does not mean that the registrar has mandatory jurisdiction to receive civil partners' declarations as to their name too. Against the background that the Civil Partnerships Act itself has left it open which authority is to have jurisdiction over the creation of registered civil partnerships, the provision that Article 10.2 of the Introductory Act to the German Civil Code is to apply merely with the necessary changes is to be understood to mean that the reference is to the substantive-law content of Article 10.2 sentence 1 of the Introductory Act to the German Civil Code, but not that a provision as to jurisdiction was made in this way. [51]

cc) Equally, Article 3 § 6 of the Civil Partnerships Act does not give new jurisdiction to the registry offices, but applies their existing jurisdiction to another group of persons when, supplementing § 2 sentence 1 of the Minorities Name Alteration Act (Minderheiten-Namensänderungsgesetz), it extends the alteration of the birth name of a person subject to the conditions of § 1 of the Act, that is, by declaration to the registrar of births, deaths and marriages, not only, in the case of a declaration of the spouse to this effect, to the family name, but also to the partnership name, provided the civil partner agrees to the change of name by declaration to the registrar. This does not entail a change of the content of the registrar's duties (cf. BVerfGE 75, 108 (151)). [52]

dd) The fact that the aliens' authorities under Article 3 § 11 of the Civil Partnerships Act, which relates to §§ 27a, 29.4 and 31.1 of the Aliens Act (Ausländergesetz), may now also issue a basic residence permit (Aufenthaltserlaubnis), residence permit for specific purposes (Aufenthaltsbewilligung) or residence permit for exceptional purposes (Aufenthaltsbefugnis) to foreign civil partners of a foreigner in order to establish and maintain the civil partnership merely extends the factual circumstances subject to which a residence status may be established. As a result of this, the duty of the aliens' authorities is quantitatively increased, but its content is not changed. A requirement for approval can certainly not be derived from the fact that the aliens' authorities are now obliged to base their considerations when exercising their discretion in the case of civil partnerships on Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, not, as in the case of marriages, on Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. In exercising the discretion granted them, authorities must always taken into account the fundamental rights of those affected, no matter on what fundamental right they may rely. [53]

ee) Finally, Article 3 § 16 number 10 of the Civil Partnerships Act also does not make the Act subject to approval under Article 84.1 of the Basic Law. As a result of the revision of § 661.3 number 1 letter b of the Code of Civil Procedure (Zivilprozessordnung), the international jurisdiction of German courts under § 606a of the Code of Civil Procedure now includes the case where a civil partnership is created before a German registrar of births, deaths and marriages. This provision does not impose a duty on the registrar, but by its wording links the jurisdiction of German courts in civil partnership matters to the requirement that a German registrar of births, deaths and marriages was involved when the civil partnership was created. It governs the judicial proceedings, for which Article 84.1 of the Basic Law is not applicable (cf. BVerfGE 14, 197 (219)). It is conceivable that there could be an objectively unjustified unequal treatment of civil partners whose partnership, by reason of the differing jurisdiction provisions of the Länder, was created not before a registrar of births, deaths and marriages but before another competent authority; but this result could be avoided by interpreting § 661.3 number 1 letter b of the Code of Civil Procedure in conformity with the Basic Law. [54]

2. Nor does the fact that in Article 1 § 3.3 and § 3.4 competencies of the registrar of births, deaths and marriages were named before the Civil Partnerships Act was finally consented to and pronounced lead to the statute being subject to approval. This version of the statute was corrected in a manner that is constitutionally unobjectionable. [55]

a) Even if the Basic Law contains no provisions on the correction of adopted bills, the requirements of a functioning legislature, justify, following the traditional government practice, being able to correct printer's errors and other evident errors in the bill without again involving the legislative bodies, as is provided in § 61 of the Joint Rules of Procedure of the federal Ministries (Gemeinsame Geschäftsordnung der Bundesministerien, GGO) and in § 122.3 of the Rules of Procedure of the Bundestag (Geschäftsordnung des Bundestages; cf. BVerfGE 48, 1 (18)). [56]

Admittedly, the correction of adopted bills is admissible only within very narrow limits outside the resolution procedure in Article 76 ff. of the Basic Law, because of the right of the legislative bodies to respect and to the preservation of their exclusive competence to decide the content of legislation. The criterion for defining such limits in detail and for the admission, in exceptional circumstances of the correction of an adopted bill, is that it is obviously incorrect. An obvious incorrectness may be shown not only in the text of the statute, but in particular also by taking into account its meaning in context and the parliamentary background materials of the statute. The decisive factor is that the correction does not affect the legally significant substantive content of the statute and with it the identity of the statute (cf. BVerfGE 48, 1 (18-19)). [57]

b) On the basis of these criteria, the correction carried out of Article 1 § 3.3 and 3.4 of the Civil Partnerships Act did not exceed the limits of what is constitutionally admissible. [58]

aa) The obvious incorrectness of the version of Article 1 § 3.3 and 3.4 of the Civil Partnerships Act passed by the legislative bodies consists in the clear contradiction between on the one hand the text of the statute, which by reason of the recommendation as a resolution by the Committee on Legal Affairs of 8 November 2000 (Bundestag document 14/4545) was before the Bundestag when it passed resolutions on the second and third reading of the bill and on which the proceedings in the Bundesrat were based, and on the other hand the reasons for justification of this statute given by the Committee on Legal Affairs in its report of 9 November 2000 (Bundestag document 14/4550), which both equally constitute the basis for the consultation and enactment of the legislative bodies. [59]

At the beginning of November 2000, the SPD and BÜNDNIS 90/DIE GRÜNEN parliamentary parties introduced in the Committee on Legal Affairs responsible and in the committees on Family Affairs, Senior Citizens, Women and Youth, (Committee document, AusschussDrucks 14/508) and on Labour and Social Affairs (Committee document 14/944), which were co-consulting, a motion for alteration of the bill, which, just as for other provisions, in particular Article 1 § 1 of the bill, for all paragraphs of Article 1 § 3 also provided that the registrar of births, death and marriages should be deleted as the authority competent to receive declarations and the effectiveness of declarations on the partnership name should be made subject to making the declarations before the authority responsible. This motion was the basis of the resolution of the committees and received a majority in favour there. The recommendation for a resolution forwarded to the Bundestag by the Committee on Legal Affairs then, however, contained alterations to this effect only of paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 1 § 3 of the bill, while it was recommended for paragraphs 3 and 4 that the unchanged previous versions should be accepted, still containing the reference to the registrar of births, deaths and marriages. In the report of the Committee on Legal Affairs, which was also forwarded to the Bundestag, to which the recommended resolution referred, in contrast, it was stated with regard to the whole of Article 1 § 3 that the changes recommended here were provisions consequent on the alteration of Article 1 § 1.1 of the Civil Partnerships Act. There was express reference to its reasoning. This included the statement that the bill did not name an authority that is to be responsible for registering the civil partnership. [60]

This reasoning of Article 1 § 3 of the Civil Partnerships Act contradicts the text version of its paragraphs 3 and 4, and when taken into account together with the account of how it originated it shows that the wording of these paragraphs was incorrect. The contradiction between the text and the reasoning also entered the bills approved by the Bundestag and the Bundesrat. Both of them, on the basis of the resolution recommended by the Committee on Legal Affairs of the Bundestag, based their resolutions on the unchanged text of Article 1 § 3.3 and 3.4 of the Civil Partnerships Act. But the resolution was passed subject to the premise that had resulted in the amendment of Article 1 § 1 of the bill; it was intended that there should be no naming whatsoever of a competent authority in the bill. [61]

bb) The version of Article 1 § 3.3 and 3.4 of the Civil Partnerships Act corrected in the proceedings under § 61.2 of the Joint Rules of Procedure of the Federal Ministries and pronounced in this form conforms with the intention of the legislature expressed in the statute. [62]

If Article 1 § 1 of the Civil Partnerships Act, which creates the institution of the registered civil partnership and governs the essential requirements for the creation of this community of persons, in its wording and reasoning does not lay down the authority that is to be responsible for registering the registered civil partnership, and if this failure to mention the authority is consistently repeated not only in the further following statutory provisions but also in the two first paragraphs of Article 1 § 3 of the Civil Partnerships Act, in that references are only to the authority responsible, then this makes it clear that the legislature wishes to leave it to the Länder to decide which authority they will determine as responsible for civil partnership matters. It is consistent with this if in the corrected and pronounced version of Article 1 § 3.3 and 3.4 of the Civil Partnerships Act now, taking over the text on which the resolution adopted by the Committee on Legal Affairs was based, there is no attempt whatsoever to make a statement as to the authority to which the civil partners' declarations on names law are to be made. [63]

cc) Furthermore, this is confirmed by the opinions on the correction proceedings. These opinions unanimously state that the statute was not intended to make a decision on the jurisdiction of a particular authority in civil partnership matters. The suggestion of correcting Article 1 § 3.3 and 3.4 of the Civil Partnerships Act came from the office of the Committee on Legal Affairs, with reference to a copying error to this effect made when the recommended resolution was drafted. Thereupon, the Federal Ministry of Justice informed both the President of the Bundestag and the President of the Bundesrat on the error in copying the resolutions drafted in the Committee on Legal Affairs to the recommended resolution, defined this as an obvious error and commenced the correction procedure under § 61.2 of the Joint Rules of Procedure of the Federal Ministries. In the course of this procedure, the representatives of the parliamentary parties in the Committee on Legal Affairs were involved in the matter. In the oral hearing, the Bundestag member Beck (BÜNDNIS 90/DIE GRÜNEN), without contradiction from the members present von Renesse (SPD), Geis (CDU/CSU) and Braun (FDP), submitted that the representatives of all parliamentary parties had agreed to the correction. In letters of 7 and 12 December 2000, the Presidents of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat approved the correction. [64]

3. The government parliamentary parties first introduced a Bill to End the Discrimination of Same-Sex Partnerships: Civil Partnerships (Gesetzentwurf zur Beendigung der Diskriminierung gleichgeschlechtlicher Gemeinschaften: Lebenspartnerschaften, Bundestag document 14/3751); in the course of the legislative procedure, at the recommendation of the Bundestag Committee on Legal Affairs, this bill was divided into the Act of the same name that is to be reviewed in the present proceedings, with its substantive provisions on the registered civil partnership, and a bill with predominantly procedural implementation regulations (Bundestag documents 14/4545 and 14/4550 with annexes); this division does not violate the Constitution. Above all, the division that was carried out does not make the Civil Partnerships Act subject to approval. [65]

a) The Bundestag is not constitutionally prevented from dealing with a legislative project in several statutes, in the exercise of its legislative freedom. In doing this, as in the present case, even in the course of the legislative procedure, it may collect the substantive provisions it intends in one statute against which the Bundesrat has only a right of objection, and for the provisions intended to govern the administrative procedure of the Länder it may design another statute, which requires approval; in practice, this happens quite frequently (cf. BVerfGE 34, 9 (28); 37, 363 (382)). [66]

The Bundestag's possibility, by dividing the contents of a statute into two or more statutes, of restricting the Bundesrat's right of approval to one part of the intended legislation follows from the Bundestag's right to legislate. Such a division does not inadmissibly restrict the right of the Länder to cooperate in the legislation of the Federal Government, nor is there a shift of the constitutionally allocated weights of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat in legislation (cf. BVerfGE 37, 363 (379-80); 55, 274 (319); 75, 108 (150)). [67]

aa) In the area of concurrent legislative powers, which under Article 74.1 number 2 of the Basic Law also includes matters of civil status and thus the introduction of the registered civil partnership as a new civil status, the Länder, under Article 72.1 of the Basic Law, have power to legislate as long as and to the extent that the Federal Government has not made use of its legislative power by statute. This guarantees the original legislative power of the Länder to legislate quantitatively and qualitatively wherever the federal legislature has not yet passed legislation. But if the federal legislature, under the conditions of Article 72.2 of the Basic Law, makes use of its legislative power, the Bundesrat merely cooperates in federal legislation under Article 50 of the Basic Law. Here, the requirement that the Bundesrat approves a statute under the Basic Law is the exception to the rule (cf. BVerfGE 37, 363 (381)). Inter alia, this requirement exists under Article 84.1 of the Basic Law if the statute exclusively or together with other legislation contains provisions on the establishment of authorities or on administrative procedures and thus encroaches on the competence of the Länder under Article 83 of the Basic Law to implement federal statutes as matters of their own concern their own and to pass the necessary Land law provisions for this purpose. The Bundesrat's approval of such a statute is intended to ensure that the Länder are not deprived of their legislative competence in the administrative procedure by a federal statute below the constitutional level against the will of the majority of the Bundesrat. This blocking effect guarantees that they have influence on the contents of the federal statute as a whole. For the requirement of the approval of the Bundesrat, by the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court, extends to the whole statute as a legislative unit, that is, also to the provisions that in themselves do not require approval (cf. BVerfGE 8, 274 (294); 37, 363 (381); 55, 274 (319)). In the present case it is not necessary to decide whether, in view of the criticism in the literature (cf., for example, Lücke in: Sachs, Grundgesetz, Kommentar, 2nd ed. 1999, Article 77 marginal number 15; Maurer, Staatsrecht I, 2nd ed. 2001, § 17 marginal numbers 74 ff.) this case-law should continue to be followed, for in the present case the legislature did not choose this approach. [68]

If the federal legislature, in contrast, omits provisions relating to administrative procedure in a statute, this corresponds to the model of the constitutional allocation of competence between the Federal Government and the Länder under Article 83 and Article 84 of the Basic Law. The Bundesrat, under Article 77.3 of the Basic Law, has merely a right of objection to such a statute; under Article 77.4 of the Basic Law, an objection may be rejected by the Bundestag. [69]

bb) The same applies to the case where the federal legislature does intend to pass not only legislation under substantive law but also regulations for its implementation in the administrative procedure of the Länder, and instead of including both sets of provisions in one statute, it puts each in a separate statute. If, as a result, the requirement of the Bundesrat's approval relates only to the statute that contains the procedural part, this does not constitute a shift detrimental to the Länder of the competencies laid down in the Basic Law. For the Bundesrat has a right of approval of substantive-law federal legislation - except in the special cases laid down in the Basic Law - only where the federal legislature encroaches upon the area of competence of the Länder under Article 83 et. seq. of the Basic Law. But such an encroachment is effected only by the procedural statute, which is separated from the substantive-law content of the legislation. [70]

The division prevents the Bundesrat acquiring a right of approval with regard to the substantive-law provisions too, as a result of dealing with substantive-law and procedural-law provision together. At the same time it ensures that the Bundestag can legislate on the matters allocated to it that do not require approval without being dependent on the approval of the Bundesrat. If the Bundestag chooses to proceed in this way, it bases the structure of its legislation precisely on the constitutional division of competence between the Federal Government and the Land governments. The Länder, as the present case shows, suffer no loss of competence as a result of this. They have now themselves on their own responsibility passed the necessary procedural regulations for the implementation of the Civil Partnerships Act. [71]

b) Whether the Bundestag's right of disposal with regard to the division of legal material into several statutes is subject to constitutional limits in the individual case, and when such limits, if they exist, are overstepped, need not be decided here either (cf. BVerfGE 24, 184 (199-200); 77, 84 (103)). The decision of the federal legislature to collect the provisions not requiring approval on the new institution of the registered civil partnership in one statute and to make the provisions thereof that are subject to approval the content of a separate state is free of arbitrariness. [72]

aa) If the Bundestag is presumed to have had a motive in dividing the material of the statute between two statutes only in order in this way to deprive the Bundesrat of the possibility of preventing the intended substantive-law provisions together with the procedural provisions by refusing its approval, this manner of proceeding does not appear to be arbitrary. Under the assumption made till now until now that a whole statute becomes subject to approval if it contains only one provision that is subject to approval (cf. BVerfGE 8, 274 (294); 55, 274 (319)), such a division is a legitimate way to prevent a process of extension of the requirement of approval of statutes and to make it possible for parliament to realise its enactment. To conclude from such a motive on the part of the legislature that its procedure was abusive would in the last instance lead to imposing a duty on the Bundestag always to pass procedural regulations itself and together with the substantive law. On the one hand this would make it possible for the Bundesrat to exercise its influence more strongly on substantive law too, but on the other side it would gradually deprive the Länder of legislative competencies where they have original jurisdiction under the Constitution. Such an approach might lead to a general shift of constitutional competencies, which is precisely what Article 84.1 of the Basic Law is intended to prevent, but in contrast, dividing the legal material into two statutes could not have this result. [73]

bb) Nor are the substantive-law provisions contained in the Civil Partnerships Act, contrary to the applicants' opinion, a "torso of a statute". They are comprehensible in themselves and sufficiently definite. They structure the legal position in such a way that the persons affected can allow their conduct to be guided by them. There was in particular no necessity for the legislature to legislate on the right of maintenance for civil partners and the tax treatment of maintenance payments based on this in one and the same statute. The maintenance rights of spouses have also always been defined separately from their tax treatment by the legislature in the taxation statutes. [74]

Finally, the Act is also enforceable. This is unequivocally confirmed by the various implementation regulations of the Länder. [75]

II.

The Civil Partnerships Act is also constitutional from a substantive point of view. [76]

1. It is compatible with Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. The introduction of the new institution of the registered civil partnership for same-sex couples and its legal structure infringe neither the freedom of marriage guaranteed in Article 6.1 of the Basic Law nor the institutional guarantee laid down there. The registered civil partnership is also compatible with Article 6.1 of the Basic Law in its character as a fundamental principle on which values are based. [77]

a) As a fundamental right, Article 6.1 of the Basic Law protects the freedom to enter into a marriage with a partner one has chosen oneself (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 (67); 76, 1 (42)). This right to unhindered access to marriage is not affected by the Civil Partnerships Act. [78]

aa) Even after the introduction of the registered civil partnership by the Civil Partnerships Act, the path to marriage is still open to every person who has the capacity to marry. However, marriage is only possible to a partner of the other sex, since the fact that the spouses are of different sexes is an inherent characteristic of marriage (cf. BVerfGE 10, 59 (66)) and the right of freedom to marry relates only to this. Even after the Civil Partnerships Act, same-sex couples are still unable to marry. The only legal institution open to them for a long-term commitment is the registered civil partnership. [79]

Similarly, the Act neither directly nor indirectly affects the freedom of heterosexual couples to marry. Since they cannot enter into a registered civil partnership, this institution cannot prevent them from marrying. [80]

bb) Access to marriage is not restricted by the Civil Partnerships Act. Under the statute, a civil partnership that has already been entered into does not prevent marriage. The Civil Partnerships Act does not create an express impediment to marriage in this case. However, in the case of such a constellation, the registrar of births, deaths and marriages must examine whether, as a requirement of marriage, the partners have a serious intention to be married, and the registrar must refuse to participate in the wedding if such an intention is missing (§1310.1 sentence 2 in conjunction with § 1314.2 number 5 of the German Civil Code). [81]

However, the legislature left it open whether a marriage entered into when a registered civil partnership already existed has legal consequences for the continuing existence of the civil partnership and if so, what these would be. The answer to these questions is thus in the last instance left to case-law. [82]

This gap in the statute can be closed constitutionally only if consideration is paid to the protection owed to marriage under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. Here it is important to take into account that marriage as the form of a close two-person relationship between a man and a woman is characterised by personal exclusivity. Marriage might lose this characteristic if one or both of the spouses remained permitted to keep their civil partnership with another partner, which is also intended to be permanent. The protection of marriage under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law requires that alongside marriage no other legally binding partnership of a spouse should be permitted, and in Article 1 § 1.2 of the Civil Partnerships Act the legislature itself proceeded on this assumption. [83]

For this reason, it is suggested in the literature of legal scholarship that the possibility that the Civil Partnerships Act does not exclude, of entering into a marriage when a civil partnership exists, is linked to the legal consequence that the marriage dissolves the civil partnership by operation of law, so that it no longer legally exists (cf. Schwab, Zeitschrift für das gesamte Familienrecht 2001, p. 385 (389)). This would be a way to close the existing statutory gap in a way that did justice to Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. Admittedly, this solution has a more unfavourable effect on the other partner than an annulment under Article 1 § 15 of the Civil Partnerships Act, but in view of the guarantee in Article 6.1 of the Basic Law it is acceptable. [84]

The requirement of protecting marriage as a way of life between a man and a woman, however, could also be done justice to if entering into a marriage were made subject to the requirements that there is no civil partnership or is no longer a civil partnership. Such an impediment to marriage could not inadmissibly restrict the guarantee of freedom in Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, because its factual reason would lie precisely in the nature and in the form of marriage (cf. BVerfGE 36, 146 (163)). Just as an existing marriage prevents a new marriage from being entered into (§1306 of the Civil Code), in order not to endanger the two-person relationship of marriage, it conforms to the protection of marriage to open it only to those who have not already bound themselves legally in another partnership. This possibility of giving marriage the required protection would, in addition, offer the protection of confidence to those who, in the registered civil partnership, have chosen a way of life that the legislature has now made available to them as a legally binding community of responsibility of a permanent nature. It would be guaranteed for them that their partnership could not be dissolved merely by the unilateral decision to marry of the other partner. It is true that a prohibition on entering into marriage while the civil partnership existed would as a general rule be objectively justified. However, it would restrict the freedom to marry. It need not be decided here whether the present statute also makes it possible for the gap to be filled by case-law in this respect. If one takes into account the far-reaching consequences of the termination or dissolution of a registered civil partnership for the personal life and the financial situation of the individual persons affected, which, depending on what legal construction is chosen in order to exclude marriage and civil partnership existing side-by-side, may be very different in nature, it would seem appropriate for the legislature itself to determine whether an existing civil partnership prevents a marriage taking place or a marriage leads to the dissolution of an existing civil partnership. [85]

b) When the legislature introduced the registered civil partnership in the Civil Partnerships Act, it did not violate the constitutional requirement of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law to offer and protect marriage as a way of life (institutional guarantee, cf. BVerfGE 10, 59 (66-67); 31, 58 (69-70); 80, 81 (92)). The object of legislation of the Act is not marriage. [86]

aa) The Basic Law itself contains no definition of marriage, but presupposes it as a special form of human cohabitation. The realisation of the constitutional protection of marriage therefore needs a legal provision that structures and restricts what form of partnership enjoys the protection of the Constitution. Here, the legislature has considerable freedom of drafting in determining the form and content of marriage (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 (70); 36, 146 (162); 81, 1 (6-7)). The Basic Law guarantees the institution of marriage not in the abstract, but in the form that corresponds to current prevailing opinions, which are expressed definitively in the statutory provisions (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 (82-83). However, in shaping marriage, the legislature must take into account the essential structural principles that follow from the application of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law to marriage as it is actually encountered in connection with the nature of the fundamental right guaranteed as a freedom and in connection with other constitutional norms (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 (69)). Part of the content of marriage, as it has stood the test of time despite social change and the concomitant changes of its legal structure and been shaped by the Basic Law, is that it is the union of one man with one woman to form a permanent partnership, based on a free decision and with the support of the state (cf. BVerfGE 10, 59 (66); 29, 166 (176); 62, 323 (330)), in which man and woman are in an equal partnership with one another (cf. BVerfGE 37, 217 (249 ff.); 103, 89 (101)) and may decide freely on the organisation of their cohabitation (cf. BVerfGE 39, 169 (183); 48, 327 (338); 66, 84 (94)). [87]

bb) This protection does not cover the institution of the registered civil partnership. The fact that the partners are of the same sex distinguishes it from marriage and at the same time constitutes it. The registered civil partnership is not marriage within the meaning of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. It grants rights to same-sex couples. In this way, the legislature takes account of Article 2.1 and Article 3.1 and 3.3 of the Basic Law, by helping these persons to better develop their personalities and by reducing discrimination. [88]

cc) Marriage as an institution is not affected by the Civil Partnerships Act itself in its constitutional structural principles and its organisation by the legislature. There has been no change to its legal foundation. All the provisions that give marriage a legal framework and furnish the institution with legal consequences continue to exist (cf. Federal Constitutional Court, judgment of 18 July 2001 - 1 BvQ 23/01 and 1 BvQ 26/ 01 -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2001, 2457-2458). No prohibition on giving same-sex partners the possibility of a legally similarly structured partnership can be derived from the institutional guarantee, precisely because it relates only to marriage. [89]

c) Article 6.1 of the Basic Law does not merely guarantee marriage in its essential structure, but also, as a binding value decision, requires special protection by the state order for the whole area of private and public law relating to marriage and the family (cf. BVerfGE 6, 55 (72); 55, 114 (126)). In order to satisfy the requirement of protection, it is in particular the duty of the state on the one hand to refrain from everything that damages or otherwise adversely affects marriage, and on the other hand to promote marriage by suitable measures (cf. BVerfGE 6, 55 (76); 28, 104 (113); 53, 224 (248); 76, 1 (41); 80, 81 (92-93); 99, 216 (231-232)). The legislature did not violate this in the Civil Partnerships Act. [90]

aa) Marriage is neither damaged nor adversely affected in another way by the Civil Partnerships Act. [91]

The particular protection accorded to marriage under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law prohibits treating it less favourably than other ways of life (cf. BVerfGE 6, 55 (76); 13, 290 (298-299); 28, 324 (356); 67, 186 (195-196); 87, 234 (256 ff.); 99, 216 (232-233)). [92]

(1) There is no such unfavourable treatment if the Civil Partnerships Act gives same sex couples the possibility of entering into a registered civil partnership with rights and duties that are close to those of marriage. [93]

It is true that in large areas the legislature has modelled the legal consequences of the new institution of the registered civil partnership on provisions of marriage law. But in this way, marriage or spouses are not treated less favourably that previously and not disadvantaged in relation to the civil partnership or civil partners. The institution of marriage is not threatened by any risk from an institution that is directed at persons who cannot be married to each other. [94]

(2) Nor does the Civil Partnerships Act violate the prohibition of discrimination in that the legislature refrained in this Act from at the same time adding to the Federal State Welfare Act (Bundessozialhilfegesetz) provisions that the income and property of both partners should be taken into account in the case of civil partners too in the means test that is a requirement for the grant of state welfare benefits. [95]

As a result, at present, in state welfare law, married couples are treated as a financial unit, but civil partners are not expressly also so treated. In the case of spouses, because of the aggregation of income that has to be made, this may lead to the reduction or elimination of the right to state welfare benefits, whereas civil partners without aggregation of income might receive unreduced state welfare benefits. However, any unfavourable treatment of married persons in this procedure was the result not of the Civil Partnerships Act, but of a lack of provisions to remedy this in the Federal State Welfare Act. The Civil Partnerships Act specifically does not privilege civil partners as against spouses with regard to the obligation to maintain each other. If the proper legal conclusions are not drawn from this in state welfare law, there may be a violation there of the prohibition on discrimination under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, but not as a result of the provisions of the Civil Partnerships Act, which alone are the subject of these proceedings for the abstract review of a statute. [96]

bb) In introducing the new institution of the registered civil partnership, the legislature also did not violate the requirement of promoting marriage as a way of life. The Act does not divest marriage of any promotion that it previously enjoyed. It merely gives legal protection to another partnership and gives it rights and duties. [97]

cc) On account of the constitutional protection of marriage under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, the legislature is not barred from treating marriage more favourably than other ways of life (cf. BVerfGE 6, 55 (76)). But the admissibility of giving favourable treatment to marriage over other ways of life in fulfilling and structuring the requirement to promote it does not give rise to a requirement contained in Article 6.1 of the Basic Law to disadvantage other ways of life in comparison to marriage. Judge Haas in her dissenting opinion fails to realise this when she understands the requirement to promote marriage in Article 6.1 of the Basic Law as a requirement to disadvantage ways of life other than marriage. Article 6.1 of the Basic Law gives favourable treatment to marriage in a constitutional protection granted only to marriage and imposes on the legislature a duty to promote it with the means appropriate to it. But a requirement to treat other ways of life unfavourably cannot be derived from this. The extent of the legal protection and promotion of marriage is in no way decreased if the legal system also recognises other ways of life that cannot enter into competition with marriage as a community of heterosexual partners. Nor can it be justified constitutionally to derive from the special protection of marriage a rule that such partnerships are to be structured in a way distant from marriage and to be given lesser rights. However, the legislature's duty to protect and promote marriage does require it to ensure that marriage can fulfil the function accorded it by the Constitution. [98]

(1) If Article 6.1 of the Basic Law subjects marriage to special protection, the special element is the fact that marriage alone, in addition to the family, enjoys this constitutional protection as an institution, but no other way of life enjoys it. Marriage cannot be abolished nor can its essential structural principles be altered without an amendment of the Constitution (this has already been stated by von Mangoldt in the Committee for Fundamental Questions of the Parliamentary Council, Ausschuss für Grundsatzfragen des Parlamentarischen Rates, in: Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, Akten und Protokolle, vol. 5/II, 1993, edited by Pikart/Werner, p. 826). A constitutional duty of promotion exists for marriage alone. To attach to the special nature of the protection a meaning above and beyond this to the effect that marriage must always be protected more than other partnerships, even in its extent (this is the result reached by Badura, in: Maunz/Dürig, Grundgesetz, Article 6.1 marginal number 56 (date: August 2000); Burgi, in: Der Staat, vol. 39, 2000, pp. 487 ff.; Krings, Zeitschrift für Rechtspolitik 2000, pp. 409 ff.; Pauly, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 1997, pp. 1955-1956; Scholz/Uhle, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2001, pp. 393-394; Tettinger, in: Essener Gespräche zum Thema Staat und Kirche, vol. 35, 2001, p. 140) has no basis either in the wording of the fundamental right or in its genesis. [99]

In the course of the deliberations in the Parliamentary Council, Article 6.1 of the Basic Law underwent a large number of amendments to the text, and here, the wording often alternated between a protection of marriage and a special protection of marriage (cf. Parlamentarischer Rat, Hauptausschuss, 21. Sitzung, Protokoll, p. 239; Protokoll der 32. Sitzung des Grundsatzausschusses, in: Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, loc. cit., vol. 5/II, 1993, p. 910 (935); Protokoll der 43. Sitzung des Hauptausschusses, p. 545 (554-555); Stellungnahme des Allgemeinen Redaktionsausschusses zur Fassung der 2. Lesung des Hauptausschusses, p. 121; Parlamentarischer Rat, Hauptausschuss, Protokoll der 57. Sitzung, pp. 743-744). It cannot be inferred from these debates that these changes to the wording were made because marriage and the family were to have greater or lesser protection. Instead, there are clear indications that these changes arose solely from the feeling for language of the persons in question. For example, when the Deutscher Sprachverein suggested deleting the word "special" ("besonderen") and choosing the wording "Marriage and the family ... are under the protection of the Constitution" ("Ehe und Familie ... stehen unter dem Schutze der Verfassung"), von Mangoldt said that this was exactly the same in content, but worded better (Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, vol. 5/II, loc. cit.). [100]

In the debates on Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, the question of the protection of new ways of life also played a substantial role (on this, cf. the contributions of Helene Weber, in: Protokoll der 21. Sitzung des Hauptausschusses, p. 240, and Elisabeth Selbert, in: Protokoll der 43. Sitzung des Hauptausschusses, pp. 552-553). Here, in particular the argument that the special protection of the family excluded the equal treatment of illegitimate children in Article. 6.5 of the Basic Law (cf. Weber and Süsterhenn in: Protokoll der 21. Sitzung des Hauptausschusses, 242-243) was unsuccessful. If Mangoldt, as rapporteur, in his Written Report on Article 6.1 of the Basic Law finally noted that this fundamental right was scarcely more than a declaration in the case of which it was not really evident what effect it had as directly applicable law (Anlage zum stenographischen Bericht der 9. Sitzung des Parlamentarischen Rates, p. 6), then this reflects that although there was agreement on subjecting marriage and the family to constitutional protection, there was no clarification as to what this means in detail for its relationship to other ways of life. At all events, a requirement of distance cannot be based on this. [101]

(2) Article 6.1 of the Basic Law protects marriage as it is structured by the legislature from time to time, preserving its essential fundamental principles (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 (82-83)). As a partnership lived by human beings it is both a sphere of freedom and at the same time part of society, from whose changes it is not excluded. The legislature can react to these and adapt the structure of marriage to changed needs. In this way, the relationship of marriage to other forms of human cohabitation also changes. The same applies if the legislature does not restructure marriage by statute but provides for other partnerships. Therefore ways of life do not stand at a fixed distance from each other, but in a relative relation. At the same time, they may differ from or resemble each other by reason of their given structure not only in the rights and duties allocated to them, but also in their function and with regard to the group of persons who find access to them. Thus the protection of marriage as an institution cannot be separated from the persons who are addressed by the provision, for whom marriage it to be made available as a protected way of life. [102]

(3) The duty of the state to promote marriage must orient itself towards the protective purpose of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. If the legislature itself, in creating norms, contributed to marriage losing its function, it would violate the requirement of promotion under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. Such a danger might exist if the legislature created another institution in competition with marriage, with the same function, and, for example, gave it the same rights and lesser duties, so that the two institutions were interchangeable. Such an interchangeability, however, is not associated with the registered civil partnership. It cannot enter into competition with marriage, if for no other reason that that the group of persons for whom the institution is intended does not overlap with the group of married persons. The registered civil partnership, because of this difference, is also not marriage with a wrong label, as is assumed in the two minority votes, but something different from marriage. Its different nature does not result from its name, but from the circumstance that not man and woman, but two persons of the same sex can create a union in the registered civil partnership. In their totality, the structural principles that characterise marriage give it the form and exclusivity in which it enjoys constitutional protection as an institution. Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, however, does not reserve individual structural elements of this group for marriage alone. It does not prohibit the legislature from offering legal forms for a permanent cohabitation to other constellations of persons than the union of man and woman. The characteristic of permanence does not make such legal relationships marriage. Nor is it discernible in any other way that they could harm the structure of this institution. [103]

2. The Civil Partnerships Act violates neither the special prohibition of discrimination of Article 3.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law nor the general principle of equality in Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. [104]

a) The fact that the statute opens the registered civil partnership only to same-sex couples (Article 1 § 1.1 of the Civil Partnerships Act) embodies no unfavourable treatment of heterosexual couples on account of their sex under Article 3.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. [105]

The Act does not associate rights and duties not with the sex of a person, but takes as its starting point the combination of sexes of a community of persons, and to this community of persons it offers access to the registered partnership. It then allocates rights and duties to the persons in this community. Just as marriage, with its restriction to a two-person relationship between man and woman, does not discrimination against same-sex couples on account of their gender, the civil partnership does not discriminate against heterosexual couples on account of their gender. Men and women are always treated equally. They may enter into marriage with a person of the opposite sex, but not with one of their own sex. They may enter into a civil partnership with a person of their own sex, but not with one of the other sex. [106]

b) It does not infringe Article 3.1 of the Basic Law that persons of different sex cohabiting with each other and groups of people related to each other and living together have no possibility of becoming registered civil partnerships. [107]

Article 3.1 of the Basic Law prohibits treating a group of persons who are addressed by a statute differently from other persons addressed by the statute although there are no differences between the two groups of such a nature and such weight that they could justify the unequal treatment (cf. BVerfGE 55, 72 (88); 84, 348 (359); 101, 239 (269); established case-law). However, such differences do exist between same-sex couples and the other social communities of persons. [108]

aa) The registered civil partnership makes it possible for same-sex couples to put their partnership on a legally recognised basis and to bind themselves permanently and responsibly together, which has previously been impossible for them because they may not marry. In contrast, the desire of heterosexual couples to join themselves bindingly and permanently is, in the estimation of those concerned, just as important to them as that of same-sex couples is to them, and essentially also similar (cf. Buba/ Vaskovics, loc. cit., 16, 245 ff.). But in contrast to same-sex couples, they have access to the institution of marriage for this purpose. The difference, that children of both spouses can be born to a permanent two-person relationship between man and woman, but not to a same-sex partnership, justifies directing heterosexual couples to marriage if they wish to give their relationship a permanent legally binding form. They are not disadvantaged by this. [109]

bb) There are also differences in the relation of the same-sex partnerships to the communities of mutual support between siblings or other relatives, and these differences justify different treatment. This relates even to the exclusivity of the registered civil partnership, which admits no further relationship of the same kind beside itself, whereas communities of mutual support between siblings and other relations are often part of further comparable relationships and also exist side-by-side with another relationship by marriage or partnership. Communities of mutual support between relations, in addition, are given a certain support even under existing law, a support that was first granted to same-sex couples in the form of the civil partnership. Thus, in connection with relations, there are rights to refuse to give evidence, rights of succession and in part also rights to a compulsory portion and for it to be given favourable tax treatment. [110]

cc) Admittedly, the legislature is not generally prevented from opening new possibilities for heterosexual couples or for other communities of mutual support to put their relationship in a legal form if this can be done without the given legal structure being interchangeable with marriage. However, there is no constitutional requirement to create such possibilities. [111]

3. Nor are the provisions in the statute on the rights to custody and succession of civil partners and on maintenance law objectionable from a constitutional point of view. [112]

a) aa) Under Article 1 § 9 of the Civil Partnerships Act, the civil partner of a parent with sole custody, with the agreement of the latter, has been given the power to share in decisions on matters relating to the child's everyday life if he or she lives together with the parent. At the same time, he or she has been given emergency custody for the situation where there is imminent danger and it is necessary to act for the wellbeing of the child. The same now applies to the spouse of a parent with custody who himself or herself is not a parent (Article 2 number 13 of the Civil Partnerships Act: § 1687 b of the German Civil Code). In creating this "limited custody" for the civil partner, the legislature does not encroach on the parental rights of the parent without custody under Article 6.2 of the Basic Law. [113]

Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law protects the care and upbringing of the children as a natural right of the parents and a duty incumbent in the first instance on them. The scope of protection of the parental right here fundamentally also includes the decision as to who has contact with the child and who is permitted to influence the child's education as a result of the transfer of the power to take decisions. Admittedly, the parental right needs to be further refined by the legislature (cf. BVerfGE 84, 168 (180)). It is incumbent on the legislature to allocate to each parent particular rights and duties if the conditions for a joint exercise of parental responsibility are lacking (cf. BVerfGE 92, 158 (178-179)), or to refer to the courts the decision as to the parent to whom parent parental custody is to be transferred to in the individual case. [114]

Article 1 § 9 of the Civil Partnerships Act takes up such a constellation where one parent has sole custody. It is not the "limited custody", which is based on the sole custody of the parent living in a civil partnership, that deprives the parent without custody of that custody, but the family-law provisions that give the parent no custody, or the family-court decisions that award sole custody not to this parent, but to the other parent. A parent's rights cannot be affected, if he or she has no custody in any case, if third parties who live together with the child, in agreement with the parent with sole custody, have some joint parental responsibility. [115]

bb) In "limited custody", the legislature has created a new power of custody for spouses and civil partners of a parent with custody who themselves are not parents of the child as part of a permanent legally binding partnership such as marriage or registered civil partnership; this does not constitute a violation of the principle of equality before the law of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. The provision does not unfairly disadvantage parents without custody who do not live together with the parent with custody in a legally confirmed community. They are granted other legal possibilities of obtaining custody for their child alone or together with the other parent. Whether parents without custody should be given "limited custody" for other reasons need not be decided here. [116]

b) aa) Article 1 § 10.6 of the Civil Partnerships Act, which awards the surviving partner a compulsory portion, does not violate the testamentary freedom protected by Article 14.1 of the Basic Law. [117]

Testamentary freedom is the testator's right in his or her lifetime to provide for his or her property to pass in a different way than it would under the rules of intestate succession (cf. BVerfGE 58, 377 (398); 99, 341 (350-351). Here the legislature is at liberty to determine the contents and limits of the right of succession. In drafting this statute in detail, the legislature must safeguard the basic content of the constitutional guarantee of Article 14.1 of the Basic Law, act in harmony with all other constitutional norms and in particular the principle of proportionality and the principle of equality before the law (cf. BVerfGE 67, 329 (340)). It is not evident that the statutory provision on the surviving partner's right to a compulsory share oversteps this limit, notwithstanding a general clarification as to which constitutional barriers the right to a compulsory share is subject to. [118]

The civil partner's right to succeed and right to a compulsory portion are part of the legal institution of the registered civil partnership, which gives the partners mutual rights and duties in a lifelong commitment. In their declaration that they intend to enter into the civil partnership the civil partners commit themselves to mutual care and support and to giving maintenance. This obligation to comprehensive mutual care justifies, just as in the case of spouses, providing a financial basis for the partner even after death by the right to a compulsory portion from the property of the deceased partner. [119]

bb) Nor is Article 14.1 of the Basic Law violated because the inheritance of other persons entitled to inherit is reduced by the partner's statutory right of succession and right to a compulsory portion. Even if Article 6.1 of the Basic Law contained a constitutional prohibition on granting the next of kin a reasonable financial minimum share of the estate, and if in this respect the family member favoured in this way were constitutionally protected as an heir under Article 14.1 of the Basic Law, which may be left open here (cf. BVerfGE 91, 346 (359-360)), this indicates nothing about the amount or the share owed to the heir from the estate. This is determined solely by the statutory allocation provision, which, in order to be in harmony with the guarantee of a right of succession, must be appropriately structured (cf. BVerfGE 91, 346 (360, 362)). [120]

The surviving civil partner's right of succession and right to a compulsory portion do not deprive that other relations of the deceased civil partner, who were already entitled to succeed. Another person entitled to inherit merely joins the group of persons entitled to inherit that are to be taken into account when the estate is distributed. In this way, the situation for the relations of the deceased who have rights of succession is no different than it would be if the testator were survived by a spouse or husband and not a civil partner. This structure does not constitute inappropriate treatment of the other persons entitled to inherit. [121]

c) It was intended that the maintenance burdens for civil partners created by Article 1 §§ 5, 12 and 16 of the Civil Partnerships Act should be taken into account in income tax law, but because this provision is part of the draft of the Civil Partnerships Act Supplementary Act, which has not yet been passed, this cannot be done; this does not makes the maintenance provisions of the Civil Partnerships Act unconstitutional. [122]

Admittedly, the financial burden resulting from maintenance duties is a special and unavoidable burden for the taxpayer, and it is a circumstance that reduces the taxpayer's financial capacity and the failure to take it into account may infringe Article 3.1 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 68, 143 (152-153); 82, 60 (86-87)). But the introduction of the maintenance duties for civil partners did not create a legal situation that ignores this burden from an income-tax point of view. Under § 33a of the Income Tax Act (Einkommensteuergesetz), on application income tax is reduced by the deduction from a taxpayer's total income of expenses incurred by that taxpayer for the maintenance of a person with a statutory right to support from the taxpayer, in the amount of a sum assessed for the calendar year in question. Since a civil partner's right to maintenance is laid down by statute, it is to be taken into account under § 33a of the Income Tax Act as an extraordinary expense. Whether this form of consideration is adequate in comparison to the tax treatment of spouses is not a question that relates to the Civil Partnerships Act. It would have to be clarified by a constitutional review of the income-tax provisions; the applications for judicial review do not comprise these. [123]

C.

With regard to the compatibility of the Civil Partnerships Act with Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, this decision was passed by five votes to three; with regard to its compatibility with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law, it was passed by seven votes to one; in other respects it was passed unanimously. [124]

2. Parental Duty of Contact, BVerfGE 121, 69

Explanatory Annotation

This decision[98] illustrates the relationship between constitutional provisions and those of regular statutory law and it touches upon an aspect of the law where it is questionable whether legal resolution, necessary as it was because of the existing dispute, was really the right avenue. A married father of two and father of an extramarital illegitimate child has been sued by the mother of the illegitimate child, who wanted to force the father to engage in contact with his child, which the father refused because of the negative effect this would have on his family. Section 1684.1 of the German Civil Code (family law section) entitles the child to contact with his or her parents and obligates the parents to engage in such contact. The lower court, while acknowledging the difficulty of forcing a parent to contact with his child, had, on the basis of a psychological expertise decided that this obligation of the father could be enforced and ordered the father to engage in such contact every three months and threatened a considerable fine if the father did not obey the order.

98 For the official press release in English see https://www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de/SharedDocs/Pressemitteilungen/EN/2008/bvg08-044.html (last accessed on 21.10.2019).

The Constitutional Court regarded the regular court's order as unconstitutional. It did so under the subsidiary personality rights guarantee of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. However, there is a strong link to Article 6.2 of the Basic Law.[99] The reason for this approach lies in the procedural constellation: The father was invoking a right against the duty spelled out in Article 6.2 of the Basic Law and that "counter-right" could only flow from Article 2.1. The Constitutional Court saw no principal problem with s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code and its potential to force contact if that is deemed to serve the welfare of the child. However, as such enforcement of contact will invariably interfere with the right protected in Article 2.1 of the Basic Law to do or not to do as one pleases, the only question here is the welfare of the child as the third person involved. The test then, must not be whether such contact could perhaps benefit the child, but whether such contact could cause damage to the child. If a plausible risk is established, enforcement of the contact obligation is unconstitutional. As the psychologists in this case had determined that such contact could benefit the child they had also submitted that there is a plausible risk of damage should the father not open up.

The case illustrates that the law cannot choose what disputes are brought before it. This is also true for the German Constitutional Court in the light of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, which has the propensity to turn any situation into a dispute on constitutional rights and thus elevate it to the constitutional level. In combination with the constitutional complaints procedure, which grants an individual right to bring such complaints to the Constitutional Courts, the Court must deal with such questions, which, for example in the United States, would in all likelihood fall victim to the certiorari procedure and would not be accepted by the Supreme Court and hence left to the regular courts.

Translation of the Parental Duty of Contact Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 121, 69*

Headnotes:

1. The duty to care for and bring up their child which is imposed on parents by Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) is not owed exclusively to the state but also to the child. The child's right to parental care and upbringing in Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law corresponds with this parental duty. It is for the legislature to elaborate the right and duty.

2. The encroachment on the fundamental right to protection of personality contained in Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, which is associated with the imposition of an obligation on a parent to have contact with his or her child, is justified by the responsibility for his or her child imposed on the parent by Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law and the child's right to parental care and upbringing. It is reasonable to oblige a parent to have contact with his or her child if this is in the child's best interests.

99 Article 6.2 of the Basic Law: "The care and upbringing of children is the natural right of parents and a duty primarily incumbent upon them. The state shall watch over them in the performance of this duty."

3. If coercive measures are necessary to force an unwilling parent to have contact with a child, this contact is not usually in the best interests of the child. The encroachment on the parent's fundamental right to protection of his or her right of personality which results from the threat to apply coercive measures is not justified in this context unless there are sufficient indications which suggest that enforced contact will be in the child's best interests in an individual case.

Order of the First Senate of 1 April 2008 - 1 BvR 1620/04 -

Facts:

The constitutional complaint relates to the question of whether a parental duty of contact, which is enforceable by execution pursuant to s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch - BGB) against a parent who refuses to have contact with his or her child, can be enforced with the aid of coercive measures that may be threatened and imposed by s. 33.1 and s. 33.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction (Gesetz über die Angelegenheiten der freiwilligen Gerichtsbarkeit - FGG).

The complainant has two children, who are both minors, from his current marriage. The complainant also has a son from an extramarital relationship, who was born in February 1999. The complainant has recognized his paternity and pays child maintenance for his child. The complainant refuses, however, to have contact with his illegitimate son.

The Higher Regional Court (Oberlandesgericht) ordered that the complainant should have contact with the child in the presence of a social worker for two hours every three months. It threatened to impose a fine on him of up to to €25,000 if he did not comply.

The complainant's constitutional complaint alleges a violation of his fundamental rights under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law and of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law; it is directed against the threat of a fine ordered by the Higher Regional Court on 21 January 2004 and indirectly against s. 33.1 sentence 1 and s. 33.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction which authorizes the Court to make such order.

Extract from the Grounds:

C.

The constitutional complaint is founded.

The order of the Higher Regional Court encroaches on the complainant's fundamental right to protection of his personality under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to the extent that it contained the threat of a fine should the complainant refuse to have contact with his child (I.). The statutory duty of a parent to have contact with his or her child in s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code concretizes parental responsibility under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law in a manner which is not constitutionally objectionable. Under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, a child has a right to parental care and upbringing which corresponds with the parental responsibility and which has also been concreticized by the legislature in the right of a child to have contact with its parent in s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code. The legislature pursues a legitimate purpose in providing for the possibility of the threat of an imposition of a fine where a parent is unwilling to have contact with his or her child (II.). However, the threat of a fine to enforce the duty of contact of a parent who refuses to have contact with his or her child is not usually in the child's best interests and thus does not justify the encroachment on the parent's right of personality (III.). s. 33.1 sentence 1 and s. 33.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction are thus to be interpreted in accordance with the constitution as meaning that compulsory enforcement of the duty of contact of a parent who refuses to have contact with his or her child must be avoided unless there are sufficient indications in a specific case that enforcement would be in the child's best interests (IV.). The Higher Regional Court failed to take this sufficiently into account in its decision (V.).

I.

The threat of a fine based on s. 33.1 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 33.3 sentence 1 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction to enforce the complainant's duty to cultivate contact with his child against his will encroaches on his fundamental right to protection of his right of personality.

1. This fundamental right protects the narrower personal sphere and the prerequisites for it. It extends to the right of respect for one's privacy. This includes the family sphere and personal relationships with other family members (see BVerfGE 96, 56 [61]).The same applies to the relationship between a parent and his or her child. What form their relationship takes will be determined by their respective personal feelings, attitudes and experiences which influence each other. The decision to have or to refuse contact with one's child expresses the parent's personal understanding of parenthood and his or her emotional relationship with the child. Nonetheless, it is not included in the inviolable core area of private conduct of life since it has a significant social connection with the child concerned whose interests and personal sphere are affected by this decision (see BVerfGE 96, 56 [61]).

2. If coercive measures are threatened to force a person to have contact with his child against his will, this constitutes an encroachment on his right to have his private sphere respected. He is compelled to meet with his child and cultivate personal contact with it contrary to his own wishes. This influences his personal relationship with the child and puts him under pressure to behave in a manner towards the child that he does not wish to behave in.

3. The fundamental right to the protection of privacy is not, however, guaranteed without restriction outside the inviolable core area of private conduct of life. It is restricted pursuant to Article 2.1 of the Basic Law through the constitutional order and the rights of others (see BVerfGE 99, 185 [195]).

A statutory basis is necessary for such restrictions from which their prerequisites and scope can be determined. Individuals are required to accept the restrictions which are undertaken in the overriding general interest or are undertaken in view of the constitutionally protected interests of third parties subject to the principle of proportionality (see BVerfGE 96, 56 [61]).

S. 33.1 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 33.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction is the statutory basis upon which the Higher Regional Court relied in its decision to threaten to fine the complainant if he did not fulfil his duty of contact and with which it encroached on the complainant's fundamental right to protection of his personality. However, this provision itself only provides a general description of a duty to act which is imposed by the court and which depends on the will of the person concerned as the prerequisite for the threat of a fine; furthermore, it states that the purpose of the threat of a fine is to make the person concerned comply with the duty to act ordered by the court. Thus s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code must also be included in the examination of whether the purpose pursued by s. 33.1 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 3.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction is justified. The court ordered the complainant to have contact with his child on the basis of the provision in the Civil Code which obliges a parent to have contact with his or her child; this provision justifies the duty to act referred to in s. 33.1 sentence 1 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction. Whether the encroachment on a fundamental right resulting from the threat of a fine can be justified must be measured against this duty of contact.

II.

The legislature pursues a legitimate purpose in providing the courts in s. 33.1 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 33.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction with the possibility of threatening to fine a parent to enforce a court-imposed obligation to have contact with his or her child.

1. The statutory duty of a parent to have contact with his or her child as laid down in s. 1684 of the Civil Code is a permissible concretization of the responsibility allocated to parents by the Basic Law.

a) Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law guarantees parents the right to care for and bring up their child, but at the same time also makes this task a primary duty imposed on them. In this connection, parents may in principle decide to be free of state influence and may wish to live up to their responsibility as parents, according to their own ideas (see BVerfGE 107, 104 [117]). Nevertheless, their actions must be guided by what is in the best interests of the child since the parental right is a right to be exercised in the interests of the child (see BVerfGE 103, 89 [107]). They are guaranteed it for the sake of the child. The duty of parents to care for and bring up their child is not owed exclusively to the state which must guard the exercise of parental authority and which is obliged to intervene to protect the child if the parents do not live up to this responsibility (see BVerfGE 60, 79 [88]; 107, 104 [117]). Parents also directly owe their child a duty of care and upbringing.

The child has its own dignity and rights. As a subject of fundamental rights it is entitled to the protection of the state and the guarantee of its constitutionally anchored rights. When regulating interpersonal relationships, a constitution which places human dignity at the centre of its value system may not in principle grant anyone rights to the person of another who does not have duties attached to them and who does not respect the human dignity of the other person. The same applies to the relationship between a parent and his or her child. The parental right vis-à-vis the child is justified by the fact that the child requires protection and help so that it can develop into a responsible member of society in keeping with the Basic Law's image of man (see BVerfGE 24, 119 [144]).

Thus this right cannot be separated from the duty of parents to offer this protection and help to the child for its well-being. In this context, the duty does not merely relate to the child, it is also owed to the child since the child is not the subject of the parental exercise of rights; it is a legal person and a subject of fundamental rights in whose best interest parents are obliged to act.

b) The child's right to parental care and upbringing under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law corresponds with the parental duty to care for and bring up the child which is imposed by Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. If a duty is imposed on one person which relates to another person and which is at the same time connected with a right to influence the other person, a right to make decisions for the other person, a right to represent the other person's interests and a right to have a significant and dominant influence on the development of the other person's personality, this will affect the core of such a person's life development and restrict his exercise of free will. The only justification for granting parents such far-reaching influence over the life of their child is the fact that the child cannot bear responsibility for itself and would come to harm if it were not given any help. If the child needs such support from its parents and if as a result its parents have a responsibility to act only in the child's best interests, then the child also has a right to expect its parents to care first and foremost for it and a right to also have its parents fulfil the duty which cannot be separated from their parental right. Thus the right of the child is based on parental responsibility and it is therefore protected by Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. It is closely connected to the fundamental right of the child to protection of its personality under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law since it guarantees the child family ties which are significant for the development of its personality. The personal relationship with its parents, their care, help and warmth and affection contribute significantly to the child being able to develop into a person who knows that he or she is respected and who learns to respect himself or herself as well as to respect others.

c) Nevertheless, the parental right with its concurrent duty requires statutory regulation as does the right of the child to the care and upbringing by its parents under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. This applies to the parental right in particular because parents are jointly entitled to it. If parents are unable to agree on how to exercise their parental responsibility, then rules must be made which allocate them rights and duties vis-à-vis their child (see BVerfGE 92, 158 [61]).

In addition, statutory rules are necessary because legal authority in relation to the child is a prerequisite for the care and upbringing of a child also vis-à-vis third parties (see BVerfGE 84, 168 [180]) and, because of the watchdog position established for it by Article 6.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the state has to ensure that the exercise of the parental right is guided by the best interests of the child and that the child's rights are respected. It must therefore regulate, on the one hand, how the child's right to the care and upbringing by its parents in accordance with its best interests can be safeguarded and, on the other hand, when and under what circumstances it will limit the free exercise of the parental right for the child's sake.

d) Contact between parent and child is not merely a possible expression of parental upbringing, but a fundamental basis for the parent-child relationship and thus an essential part of Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Especially in the case of a parent who does not live with his or her child, access to it is a significant prerequisite for personal contact with the child that would allow the parent to establish or maintain a closer relationship with it. Contact ensures that he or she can devote himself or herself to the child and can be involved in its development; it ensures that payment of maintenance is not the only way that the parent can exercise his or her parental responsibility. This is in keeping with the legislature's decision in s.1684.1 of the Civil Code, which grants a right of contact to parents irrespective of whether they have custody rights. Particularly in the case of a non-custodial parent, a right of contact is the main basis for exercising his or her parental right under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

On the other hand, the parental right to bring up a child which is protected by Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, is intended as a right in the interests of the child (see BVerfGE 75, 201 [218]; 103, 89 [107]) and has as its aim the child's well-being. However, it is in principle in the child's best interests if through contact with its parents it gains the opportunity to get to know its father and mother, to become close with them and with the help of the contact is able to continue a personal relationship with them. Through communication with its parents, the child can experience affection, can learn and can receive inspiration and advice that give it direction, help it to form opinions and aid it in developing into an independent and responsible person. As far as the child and its development are concerned, refusal to have contact with it and thus the severance of personal ties with it represent a significant withdrawal of parental authority; at the same time, it constitutes neglect of one of the significant parts of the duty of upbringing imposed on parents by Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Article 6.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law allocates the state a duty to monitor the exercise of parental responsibility in the best interests of the child, and parental contact is an important prerequisite for this; in exercise of this duty, the legislature has therefore obligated parents in s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code to have contact with their child and urged them to fulfil their responsibility to their child. In this connection, it has at the same time granted the child a right to have contact with its parents and thus concretisized the right of the child under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law to care and upbringing by its parents.

2. It is of course true that - through its regulation of their right to maintain their privacy and their personal relationships - the obligation of parents to have contact with their child does encroach on their fundamental right to protection of their right of personality since it obliges them to enter into a personal relationship with their child even if they do not wish to start or continue such a relationship. This encroachment is, however, justified in particular due to the responsibility for their child guaranteed as well as imposed on parents by Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law and due to the child's right to parental care and upbringing, which is also protected by this fundamental right.

The parental duty of contact serves the purpose pursued by the legislature in s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code of reinforcing the legally recognized right of the child to parental contact by imposing a corresponding duty on parents in order to enable the child to have the opportunity to meet with its parents. Such contact is of outstanding significance for the development of the child. The assumption of the legislature, when it imposed this duty on parents, that ongoing personal contact between a parent and a child would have a positive influence on the child's development and be in principle in the child's best interests is supported by scientific findings and therefore no objection can be raised in this connection. The duty of contact is also a suitable means of promoting the relationship between a child and its parents. The possibility cannot be ruled out that a parent subject to a duty of contact could be influenced by the duty to have contact with his or her child in s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code or a judicial order concretizing such duty, and that the parent could allow himself or herself to be persuaded to fulfil this duty in the interests of the child and thus allow the child to establish or continue a relationship with him or her, even where the parent was initially not interested in regular meetings with the child and did not of his or her own initiative seek personal contact with the child. Since no more lenient means of reinforcing the child's right of contact in its own interests and assisting in the enforcement of same are evident, a parental duty to have contact is also necessary.

After all, it is also reasonable to urge a parent to cultivate contact with his or her child. There is to be sure an encroachment on the parent's fundamental right to protection of his or her right of personality associated with the duty of contact and this encroachment is not slight. As a rule, the parent is not just expected to endure a meeting with his or her child. Instead, the parent is expected to give the child warmth and affection, to communicate with it and to establish or continue a personal relationship with it. This can lead to not insignificant psychological pressure for a parent who is not prepared to do this. However, one has to take into account that under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law parents do not merely have a right, but also a duty to care for and bring up their child. It is true that parents can fulfil this duty by committing their child to the care of another. However, parents do not release themselves from the responsibility that they bear for their child by delegating its upbringing to another. Without contact with a child, it is scarcely possible for a parent to exert the influence that is necessary for its best interests and instrumental for its personal development. Contact with the child is in this respect a significant prerequisite and the basis for the exercise of the parental right in the interests of the child.

If the legislature concretizes the duty of upbringing imposed on parents in Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law by raising contact with the child to a parental duty, it makes clear the importance to be attached to contact between a parent and child in the upbringing of a child. Seen in this light the encroachment on the parent's right of personality following from the imposition of a duty of contact does not appear particularly serious. In addition, the parental duty of contact corresponds with the child's right to have contact with its parents that the legislature granted the child in s. 1684.1 of the Civil Code. The legislature took into account the child's right to care and upbringing by its parents based on Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic

Law by concretizing and securing one significant point in an ordinary law which makes exertion of an influence on the child's upbringing possible. If one weighs the child's interest in having steady contact with both parents against a parent's interest in not wanting or no longer wanting to have personal contact with it, then one should accord the child's desire considerably more weight than the parent's wishes. This is because as a significant basis for the development and maintenance of a family relationship and for the receipt of parental support and upbringing, the contact of a child with its parents is of considerable importance for the development of its personality and is something that contributes in principle to its well-being.

It is thus reasonable to oblige a parent to have contact with his or her child - even if this entails an encroachment on the parent's personal sphere if this is in the best interests of the child. Thus the legislature followed a legitimate purpose that is supported by the Basic Law by making it possible through s. 33.1 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 33.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction to threaten parents with a fine for failure to comply with their legal duty to have contact with their own child and with an order from the court instructing them to do so.

III.

However, as a rule, the threat of a fine to enforce the duty of contact of a parent against his or her express will is not suitable for achieving the sought purpose, i.e. to make it possible for the child to have contact with its parent in a way that would benefit the development of its personality and to assist in the enforcement of the child's right to have the parent exercise his or her responsibility in the child's best interests. If coercive measures are necessary to force an unwilling parent to have contact with a child, this contact is not usually in the best interests of the child. Where this is the case, the threat by the court to apply coercive measures constitutes an unjustified encroachment on the parent's fundamental right to the protection of his or her personality.

1. The effect of the threat of a fine may well be to motivate a parent who is actually not willing to have contact with his or her child, to have a meeting with the child, even against his or her will. The psychological and financial pressure exerted through the threat of a fine may bend the will of the parent and prompt him or her to exercise his or her right of contact.

Unlike in the case of a judicial duty of contact, which initially only urges the parent concerned to fulfil his or her parental responsibility and which clarifies his or her legal duty with concrete orders and thus gives him or her the option of reconsidering and following the order to have contact with the child without incurring a fine, the threat of a fine pressures him or her to meet the child and be confronted by it against his or her will. However, that which it is intended to compel the parent to do by the use of pressure does not just conflict with the parent's will. The compulsory enforcement of the duty of contact, which requires not just his or her presence, but his or her emotional warmth towards the child, conflicts with the feelings the parent harbours towards the child. Where a parent's rejection of any contact with the child has been declared and demonstrated in this manner, any contact with the child that eventuates cannot fail to affect the child; the pressure exerted on the parent alone would suffice to have an impact on the child. If the parent does not change his or her hostile attitude towards the child at a forced meeting with it, the child is faced with a situation in which it does not experience the parental warmth and affection which is the purpose of the contact, but instead experiences personal rejection, and this not from just anyone but from, of all people, a parent. This poses a big risk that the child's self-esteem could be damaged. For it can scarcely understand why its parent does not want to know it and why he or she acts in such an unfriendly way and it could therefore blame itself. This usually does not benefit the child's well-being, but instead damages it.

Nevertheless, the possibility that a forced meeting with the child could lead to the parent opening himself or herself to the child and that this would not result in any mentionable damage to the child's well-being cannot be ruled out. However, if a parent does not show cooperation and if he or she still stubbornly refuses to meet the child inspite of a court order stating that he or she has a duty to do so, it is doubtful whether enforced contact can lead him or her to develop a positive attitude to the child. Thus there is much that would suggest that the child's best interests could at least be significantly impaired through contact enforced by applying coercive measures. It is, however, very difficult to predict with certainty whether this will occur in an individual case and whether the child will be damaged since it depends on the feelings of the parent and his or her reactions at the time which are scarcely foreseeable.

2. a) What counts in deciding if it would be suitable to use coercive measures to force a parent to have contact with his or her child in cases where he or she does not want such contact is not whether the contact could endanger the best interests of the child, but whether such contact is in the child's best interests. The legislature imposed a duty on parents to have contact with their child in order to strengthen the child's right of contact with its parents. This right was granted the child as being in its well-understood best interests. The legislature assumed that a child's contact with its parents was of outstanding significance for its development. This is an expression of its view that contact can establish or maintain an emotional relationship between a child and its parents and that the parent's warmth and affection during the contact is beneficial for the child's development so that contact is in the child's best interests. This benefit in relation to the child's best interests justifies the imposition on the parents of a duty to have contact with their child even though this encroaches on their fundamental right to protection of their rights of personality. However, this is only true to the extent that and for as long as contact with its parent actually serves the best interests of the child. If this is not achieved through the statutory means intended for this purpose, then this purpose cannot justify the encroachment on the parent's right of personality. This applies to not only the duty of contact imposed on parents, but in particular to the possibility offered by the law of enforcing the duty of contact against the parent's declared will through the threat of coercive measures. The proper metric for determining the suitability of contact achieved through coercion is whether the contact is in the child's best interests.

   The fact that s. 1684.4 of the Civil Code only permits restrictions on and the exclusion of the right of contact if the best interests of the child would otherwise be endangered does not hinder the aforegoing. This provision deals with the limits on the parental right of contact and not with the enforcement of the duty to have contact. Therefore, it does not apply to the relationship between a parent with a duty of contact and his or her child with a right to have contact.

If a parent wishes to exercise his or her right of contact, he or she may only be restricted from doing this over an extended period or permanently pursuant to s. 1684.4 of the Civil Code if the child's best interests would otherwise be endangered. By making the existence of a danger to the child's well-being the standard, the legislature has taken the parental right into account and sought to give it as much room as possible for development. Thus a limit on the parental right of contact is set at the point where the exercise of the right of contact threatens to conflict significantly with the best interests of the child.

The situation is different, however, in relation to the compulsory enforcement of a duty of contact against the will of a parent subject to this duty. In this case the function of enforcement is not the realization of the parent's right of contact; it instead represents an encroachment on the parent's right of personality. This kind of encroachment can, however, only be justified if the right of the child to contact with its parent, which is intended to be realized in this way, also achieves its objective of serving the child's best interests. If there is a risk that instead of the effect which the child's right to contact was intended to achieve the opposite will arise, then the exercise of the right is of no use to the child but can instead harm it. In such case the reason for limiting the right of a parent to conduct the relationship with his or her child according to his or her own wishes and needs disappears. Thus in the case of the compulsory enforcement of contact against the will of the parent obliged to have contact, the standard can only be whether this contact serves the child's well-being.

c) In view of the emotional and psychological strain to which a child can be exposed at a meeting with a parent who rejects it and who only attends the meeting under duress, one cannot, as a rule, start by assuming that contact under such circumstances is in the child's best interests. To be sure, there are - as far as can be seen - no social science studies on the reactions and attitudes adopted in relation to his or her child by a parent compelled by coercive measures to have contact with the child or on the effects on the child of a forced meeting with a parent who refuses contact with it which one could use as a basis for assessing whether, and if so, under what circumstances contact of such kind could be in the child's best interests in spite of the unfavourable conditions under which it takes place. The reason for this is presumably that until now only very few cases have occurred or have become known in which contact was brought about by means of coercive measures. For most of the contact disputes brought before the courts relate to cases in which, contrary to the will of the other parent, one parent complains about his or her right of contact with the child. On the other hand, the reason might be that the course such meetings take and how they can affect a child's psyche depend on the psychological state of the relevant persons at the time so that it is difficult to make generalizations on the basis of the results in an individual case. However, even if there are no valid scientific findings on the effects of enforced contact on a child to fall back on, it would seem evident that a parent who obviously does not want to have contact with his or her child and who does not allow a court order clarifying his or her duty to affect or change his or her hostile attitude towards the child will exhibit his or her unwillingness and hostility towards the child at a forced meeting. This is confirmed by the German Institute for Youth Research (Deutsches Jugendinstitut) which assumes on the basis of its findings that the hostile attitude of a parent is a prognosis factor for difficult or damaging contact for the child. For if the child's own parent really does demonstrate his or her rejection, then this is likely to leave its mark on the child's psyche; especially since the first meeting or a meeting that occurs after a longer period with its parent will be a particularly emotional event which will trigger feelings of fear and expectation in the child. If the child is not only disappointed, but also feels that it is not accepted as a person, then it seems probable that the child will suffer emotional damage. Contact with its parent, during which such detriment to the child is likely, is not in the best interests of the child.

Nevertheless, one cannot rule out the possibility that there are cases in which there is a realistic chance that through its uninhibitedness towards strangers and its psychological stability a child might be able to overcome the resistance of the parent who wants to avoid it thanks to its open and friendly behaviour so that what was initially enforced contact can be in the child's best interests after all. There may also be cases in which forced contact between the child and its parent can be in the child's interests, even if the parent expresses his or her resistance to the meeting. As was stated by the German Institute for Youth Assistance and Family Law (Deutsches Institut für Jugendhilfe und Familienrecht) and the German Institute for Youth Research in their opinions, an interest in meeting an unknown parent arises in the course of a child's development, usually in adolescence or early adulthood. If a child or adolescent has developed this strong interest and if he or she is primarily concerned with meeting the parent to make his or her acquaintance - even if it is only a one-time meeting - then the fulfilment of this need can be more important for the child than the possibly associated experience of finding out that the parent wants to have nothing to do with it. This is to be clarified, if necessary, with the help of an expert. In such a case, even an enforced meeting with the parent can be in the best interests of the child. The older a child is and the more developed its own personality is, the more it can be assumed that even the compulsory enforcement of its own express and emphatic wish to have contact with its parent will be in its best interests. In such cases, the encroachment on the right of privacy of the parent concerned which is associated with enforced contact is not only suitable for achieving the sought purpose of allowing the child to have contact which would be in its best interests, but also justified. More weight should be attached to ensuring the child's best interests are met than to the interest of the parent in being spared from having to have contact with his or her child. In such a case, it is reasonable to expect a parent to have contact with his or her child and, if necessary, to use coercive measures to force him or her to do so.

In the case of children who have not yet developed stable personalities, on the other hand, one can usually begin by assuming that forced contact with the reluctant parent will not serve the child's best interests unless there are enough indications to the contrary in a concrete case. Where a parent unwilling to have contact with his or her child is threatened with coercive measures in order to enforce contact and these measures fail to achieve their purpose, then the encroachment on the fundamental right to protection of personality of the parent refusing contact is not justified unless such coercive measures are suitable for achieving contact which is in the best interests of the child (see BVerfGE 99, 145 [164]).

IV.

The fact that pursuant to s. 33.1 sentence 1 and s. 33.3 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction, a parent who is unwilling to have contact with his or her child may be threatened with a fine even though this violates the parent's fundamental right to protection of his or her personality does not lead to a violation of the Basic Law by these provisions. This provision is thus to be interpreted in accordance with the constitution as meaning that compulsory enforcement of the duty of contact of a parent who refuses to have contact with his or her child must be avoided unless there are sufficient indications in a specific case that enforced contact would be in the child's best interests.

S. 33 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction is a general provision on enforcement in non-contentious matters that covers a multitude of court imposed obligations relating to acts that depend on the will of the person obliged; the provision allows the courts to reinforce such obligations through the threat and imposition of a fine. This also applies, for example, to the duty of the parent with whom the child lives to hand over the child to the other parent who has a right of contact so as to allow contact at the times set down by the court. The provision is discretionary. It leaves the decision as to whether non-compliance with an imposed obligation should result in enforcement to the due discretion of the court. It thus allows the court to refrain from compulsory enforcement of the obligation. Thus the provision can also be interpreted in conformity with the Basic Law in the case of a duty of contact which the court has imposed on one parent. It leads to a finding that the use of coercive measures against a parent who stubbornly refuses contact should be avoided unless there are enough indications in a concrete case that forced contact will serve the child's best interests because as a rule such contact is not in the best interests of the child. In this respect the discretion granted to the courts by s. 33.1 sentence 1 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction is restricted by the Basic Law.

V.

The challenged decision of the Higher Regional Court does not satisfy the constitutional requirements and violates the complainant's fundamental right to the protection of his right of personality under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, insofar as it threatened him with a fine.

When exercising the discretion to use coercive measures to compel a parent to have contact that s. 33.1 sentence 1 of the Act on Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction grants the courts, the Court failed to take into account that that it should have examined whether forced contact against the complainant's will would be in the child's best interests. Instead the standard it used for its examination was whether forced contact could endanger the child's best interests and answered this question in the negative. The Court assumed on the basis of the expert opinion it obtained that there was no risk of serious long-term damage to the child if the child had contact with the complainant in the company of a social worker. To this extent it did not exclude the possibility of detrimental effects on the child, but considered them acceptable for the purposes of encouraging the complainant through the threat of coercive measures to comply with his duty of contact and to thus bring about contact between him and his child. However, this is not sufficient to justify an encroachment on the complainant's right of personality. For the Court did not give adequate consideration to the best interests of the child or the complainant's right to protection of its personality. It failed to recognize that contact may only be enforced against a parent who is obliged to have contact when this contact achieves its objective of serving the child's best interests.

3. Fundamental Rights Protection under the Basic Law and the European Convention of Human Rights - The Görgülü Decision, BVerfGE 111, 307

Explanatory Annotation

The right place for the Görgülü judgment to be explained in the context of a norm of the German Basic Law is not easy to find. The German Federal Constitutional Court referred to Article 6 because a father's right was at stake. Hence this decision is reported here as a matter of Article 6 of the Basic Law. Yet, the Görgülü judgment has another dimension which is of utmost importance under German constitutional law. The judgment deals with the question of the relationship between fundamental rights of the Basic Law and their protection by the Constitutional Court and fundamental rights of the European Convention of Human Rights and their interpretation and protection by the European Court of Human Rights.

This relationship between the Basic Law and the European Convention of Human Rights must be distinguished from the relationship between German law in general and the Basic Law in particular and the law of the European Union (EU). The EU is a supranational body to which the member states have transferred enumerated powers and the law of the European Union precedes the law of its member states, in principle even their constitutional law.

The European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) and the subsequent protocols[101] are treaties under international law within the framework of the Council of Europe[101]. Under Article 59.2 of the Basic Law, certain international treaties require "the consent or participation, in the form of a federal law […]" of Parliament. The ECHR therefore has the status of a federal law within the legal system of Germany. It follows that the provisions of the Convention do not have the status of constitutional norms, they are inferior in hierarchy. This notwithstanding, ECHR norms differ significantly from domestic statutory norms. Conflicts between domestic statutory norms are usually resolved by the application of conflict rules such as the principle expressed in "lex posterior derogat legi priori", i.e. the later norm prevails over the earlier one. In the case of the European Convention, however, this conflict rule does not apply. The Constitutional Court has always maintained, and confirmed in the decision reproduced here, that all courts must apply and interpret domestic law in conformity with Convention law. In an earlier decision the Court had stated even more clearly that this also applies to domestic norms that entered into force after the Convention and its protocols[102]: in other words, the lex posterior rule does not apply when a post Convention norm of domestic German law stands in conflict with a norm of the European Convention of Human Rights.

The case at issue concerns a dispute between the applicant and the foster parents of the applicant's son. The applicant claimed the right to bring up his son to whom he had no had contact with because the mother had given up the child for adoption directly after birth and he had found out about the birth only later. The applicant's legal battle in Germany remained without success but the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) interfered and saw a violation of Article 8 of the ECHR[103]. The matter went back to the German courts and the lower court reacted in accordance with the ECtHR. However, the appellate court rejected this finding arguing that the ECtHR's decisions are binding only on the Federal Republic of Germany but not its courts and other organs. The Constitutional Court flatly rejected this truly absurd argument of the Court of Appeal. However the Constitutional Court also took the opportunity to explain its view of the relationship between the law of the ECHR and domestic constitutional law. The Court mainly confirmed what was already clear. Domestic statutory law must be applied in the light of the Convention and its guarantees and in the light of the concrete content of these guarantees as developed in the case law of the ECtHR. The ECHR is part of the domestic law of Germany and partakes in the rule of law. All other norms must therefore be interpreted in the light of the requirements of the norms of ECHR and, as shown above, this is also true for post ECHR domestic norms. In this decision the Court addressed the hypothetical constellation where a ECHR norm stands in conflict with a domestic constitutional norm. The Court held that if such a conflict cannot be resolved by interpretation of the constitutional norm, the provision of the Basic Law must prevail and the conflict between the two sets of norms can then only be resolved by an amendment of the Basic Law.

This finding is not surprising at all and legally absolutely correct. What surprises is the length with which this "non-question" was treated by the Court in the light of the fact that in the context of norms as abstract as the fundamental rights of the Basic Law and those protected by the ECHR it is hardly conceivable if not downright impossible to envisage a norm conflict that could not be resolved by interpretation.

Translation of the Görgülü Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 111, 307*

Headnotes:

1. The principle that the judge is bound by statute and law (Article 20.3 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG)) includes taking into account the guarantee of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) as part of a methodologically justifiable interpretation of the law. Both a failure to consider a decision of the ECHR and the "enforcement" of such a decision in a schematic way, in violation of prior-ranking law, may violate fundamental rights in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law.

2. In taking into account decisions of the ECHR, the state bodies must include the effects on the national legal system in their application of the law. This applies in particular when the relevant national law is a balanced partial system of domestic law that is intended to achieve an equilibrium between differing fundamental rights.

Order of the Second Senate of 14 October 2004 - 2 BvR 1481/04 -

Facts:

In his constitutional complaint, the complainant challenges inter alia what he regards as the unsatisfactory enforcement of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) of 26 February 2004 pronounced in his case and the disregard of international law by the Naumburg Higher Regional Court.

The complainant is the father of the child, Christofer, who was born illegitimate on 25 August 1999. The mother of the child, who at first did not name the complainant to the authorities as the father of the child, gave the boy up for adoption one day after his birth and first declared her prior consent to the adoption by the foster parents in a notarial deed of 1 November 1999; she repeated her consent on 24 September 2002. The boy has been living with the foster parents since 29 August 1999.

The complainant learned in October 1999 of the child's birth and released for adoption; his contact with the mother of the child had broken off in July 1999. Thereupon he proceeded with the adoption his son; he encountered difficulties at first, since his paternity was not recognised. Finally, his paternity was established by a judgment of the Wittenberg Local Court (Amtsgericht) of 20 June 2000.

In an order of 9 March 2001, the Wittenberg Local Court transferred the sole parental custody of Christofer to the complainant in accordance with his application. Upon the appeal of the foster parents and the Wittenberg Youth Welfare Office (Jugendamt), which was appointed official guardian after the birth, the Local Court's custody decision was reversed by order of 20 June 2001 of the Naumburg Higher Regional Court, and the complainant's application for transfer of custody was dismissed on the merits. At the same time, the Higher Regional Court, of its own motion, excluded rights of access between the complainant and the boy until 30 June 2002 on the grounds of the best interest of the child.

The Third Chamber of the First Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court, by an order not stating grounds of 31 July 2001 - 1 BvR 1174/01 - refused to admit for decision the complainant's constitutional complaint against the order of the Higher Regional Court.

In September 2001, the complainant filed an individual application under Article 34 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (the Convention) at the European Court of Human Rights.

In a judgment of 26 February 2004, a chamber of the Third Section of the ECHR declared unanimously that the decision on custody and the exclusion of the right of access violated Article 8 of the Convention. On the basis of Article 41 of the Convention, the ECHR awarded the complainant EUR 15,000.00 in damages and EUR 1,500.00 to reimburse costs and expenses (see ECHR, No. 74969/01, Judgment of 26 February 2004 - Görgülü).

Thereupon, in the parallel proceedings on custody, the Wittenberg Local Court transferred sole parental custody to the complainant by an order of 19 March 2004 in accordance with his application. In addition, the Local Court, of its own motion by an order of the same date and with reference to this custody decision, issued a temporary injunction on the access rights of the complainant to his son. He was given the right, from April 3 2004, to have access to his son for two hours every Saturday, until there was a final and non-appealable decision in the custody proceedings.

b) The official guardian and the children's guardian appealed against the decision of the Local Court on access rights. The Naumburg Higher Regional Court first, by order of 30 March 2004, suspended the execution of the temporary injunction, and by a further order of 30 June 2004 cancelled the temporary injunction.

   In his constitutional complaint, the complainant challenges a violation of his fundamental rights under Article 1, Article 3 and Article 6 of the Basic Law, and of the right to fair trial. At the same time he applies for a temporary injunction on access to his son to be issued.

C.

The constitutional complaint is well-founded. In its order of 30 June 2004, the Higher Regional Court violated Article 6 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law.

The authorities and courts of the Federal Republic of Germany are obliged, under certain conditions, to take account of the European Convention on Human Rights as interpreted by the ECHR in making their decisions (I.). The challenged decision of the Higher Regional Court does not do justice to this obligation, since the court does not pay sufficient attention to the judgment of the ECHR of 26 February 2004 in the case of the complainant (II.).

Selected Fundamental Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court

I.

In the German legal system, the European Convention on Human Rights has the status of a federal statute, and it must be taken into account in the interpretation of domestic law, including fundamental rights and constitutional guarantees (1). The binding effect of a decision of the ECHR extends to all state bodies and in principle imposes on these an obligation, within their jurisdiction and without violating the binding effect of statute and law (Article 20.3 of the Basic Law), to end a continuing violation of the Convention and to create a situation that complies with the Convention (2). The nature of the binding effect depends on the sphere of responsibility of the state bodies and on the latitude given by prior-ranking law. Courts are at all events under a duty to take into account a judgment that relates to a case already decided by them if they preside over a retrial of the matter in a procedurally admissible manner and are able to take the judgment into account without a violation of substantive law (3). A complainant may challenge the disregard of this duty of consideration as a violation of the fundamental right whose area of protection is affected in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law (4).

1. a) The European Convention on Human Rights and its protocols are agreements under public international law. The Convention leaves it to the States parties to decide in what way they comply with their duty to observe the provisions of the Convention (ECHR, Judgment of 6 February 1976, Series A20, no. 50 - Swedish Engine Drivers Union; ECHR, Judgment of 21 February 1986, Series A98, no. 84 - James and Others; see Geiger, Grundgesetz und Völkerrecht, 3rd ed. 2002, 405; Ehlers, in: idem (ed.), Europäische Grundrechte und Grundfreiheiten, 2003, s. 2 marginal nos. 2-3). The federal legislature consented to the above treaty in each case by a formal statute under Article 59.2 of the Basic Law (Act on the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Gesetz über die Konvention zum Schutze der Menschenrechte und Grundfreiheiten of 7 August 1952, Federal Law Gazette (Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl) II, p. 685; by the proclamation of 15 December 1953, Federal Law Gazette 1954 II p. 14, the Convention entered into force for the Federal Republic of Germany on 3 September 1953; there was a new proclamation of the Convention as amended by the 11th protocol in Federal Law Gazette 2002 II p. 1054). In doing this, the federal legislature transformed the Convention into German law and made an order on the application of the law to this effect. Within the German legal system, the European Convention on Human Rights and its protocols, to the extent that they have come into force for the Federal Republic of Germany, have the status of a federal statute (see BVerfGE 74, 358 [370]; 82, 106 [120]).

   This classification means that German courts must observe and apply the Convention within the limits of methodically justifiable interpretation like other statute law of the Federal Government. But the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights and its protocol, by reason of this status in the hierarchy of norms, are not a direct constitutional standard of review in the German legal system (see Article 93.1 no. 4.a of the Basic Law, s. 90.1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act). A complainant can therefore not directly challenge the violation of a human right contained in the European Convention on Human Rights by a constitutional complaint before the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 74, 102 [128] with further references; Order of the First Chamber of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court of 1 March 2004 - 2 BvR 1570/03 -, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift - EuGRZ 2004, p. 317 [318]). However, the guarantee of the Convention influences the interpretation of the fundamental rights and constitutional principles of the Basic Law. The text of the Convention and the case law of the European Court of Human Rights serve, on the level of constitutional law, as guides to interpretation in determining the content and scope of fundamental rights and constitutional principles of the Basic Law, provided that this does not lead to a restriction or reduction of protection of the individual's fundamental rights under the Basic Law - and this the Convention itself does not desire (see Article 53 of the Convention; see BVerfGE 74, 358 [370]; 83, 119 [128]; Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court of 20 December 2000 - 2 BvR 591/00 -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift - NJW 2001, pp. 2245 et seq.).

b) This constitutional significance of an agreement under international law, aiming at the regional protection of human rights, is the expression of the Basic Law's commitment to international law (Völkerrechtsfreundlichkeit); the Basic Law encourages both the exercise of state sovereignty through the law of international agreements and international cooperation, and the incorporation of the general rules of public international law, and therefore is, if possible, to be interpreted in such a way that no conflict arises with duties of the Federal Republic of Germany under public international law. The Basic Law has laid down in its programme that German public authority is committed to international cooperation (Article 24 of the Basic Law) and to European integration (Article 23 of the Basic Law). The Basic Law has granted the general rules of public international law priority over ordinary statute law (Article 25 sentence 2 of the Basic Law) and has integrated the law of international agreements, by Article 59.2 of the Basic Law, into the system of the separation of powers. In addition, it has opened the possibility of joining systems of mutual collective security (Article 24.2 of the Basic Law), created the duty to ensure the peaceful settlement of international disputes by way of arbitration (Article 24.3 of the Basic Law) and declared that the disturbance of the peace, and in particular preparing a war of aggression, is unconstitutional (Article 26 of the Basic Law). In this complex of norms, the German constitution, as is also shown by its preamble, aims to incorporate the Federal Republic of Germany into the community of states as a peaceful member having equal rights in a system of public international law serving peace (see also BVerfGE 63, 343 [370]).

However, the Basic Law did not take the greatest possible steps in opening itself to international law connections. On the domestic level, the law of international agreements is not to be treated directly as applicable law, that is, without an Act subject to the consent of the German parliament under Article 59.2 of the Basic Law, and - like customary international law (see Article 25 of the Basic Law) - not endowed with the status of constitutional law. The Basic Law is clearly based on the classic idea that the relationship of public international law and domestic law is a relationship between two different legal spheres and that the nature of this relationship can be determined from the viewpoint of domestic law only by domestic law itself; this is shown by the existence and the wording of Article 25 and Article 59.2 of the Basic Law. The commitment to international law takes effect only within the democratic and constitutional system of the Basic Law.

The Basic Law aims to integrate Germany into the legal community of peaceful and free states, but does not waive the sovereignty contained in the last instance in the German constitution. There is therefore no contradiction with the aim of commitment to international law if the legislature, exceptionally, does not comply with the law of international agreements, provided this is the only way in which a violation of fundamental principles of the constitution can be averted.

The Basic Law is intended to achieve comprehensive commitment to international law, cross-border cooperation and political integration in a gradually developing international community of democratic states under the rule of law. However, it does not seek a submission to non-German acts of sovereignty that is removed from every constitutional limit and control. Even the far-reaching supranational integration of Europe, which accepts the order to apply a norm, when this order originates from Community law and has direct domestic effect, is subject to a reservation of sovereignty, albeit one that is greatly reduced (see Article 23.1 of the Basic Law). The law of international agreements applies on the domestic level only when it has been incorporated into the domestic legal system in the proper form and in conformity with substantive constitutional law.

c) On this basis, the legal effect of the decisions of an international court that was brought into existence under an international agreement is determined according to the content of the incorporated international agreement and the relevant provisions of the Basic Law as to its applicability. If the Convention law of the European Convention on Human Rights, and with it the federal legislature on the basis of Article 59.2 of the Basic Law, has provided that the legal decisions are directly applicable, then they have this effect below the level of constitutional law. Under domestic law, it is first the duty of the competent non-constitutional courts to establish this legal effect.

2. a) The decisions of the ECHR have particular importance for Convention law as the law of international agreements, because they reflect the current state of development of the Convention and its protocols. Convention law itself accords varying legal effects to the ECHR's decisions on the merits. Under Article 42 and Article 44 of the Convention, the judgments of the ECHR become final and thus formally non-appealable. In Article 46 of the Convention, the States parties have agreed that in all legal matters to which they are party they will abide by the final judgment of the ECHR. It follows from this provision that the judgments of the ECHR are binding on the parties to the proceedings and thus have limited substantive res judicata (see H.-J. Cremer, in: Grote/Marauhn (eds.), Konkordanzkommentar, 2004, Entscheidung und Entscheidungswirkung, marginal nos. 56-57 with further references).

The substantive res judicata in individual application proceedings under Article 34 of the Convention is restricted by the personal, material and temporal limits of the matter in dispute (see Order of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court (preliminary examination committee) of 11 October 1985 - 2 BvR 336/85 - Pakelli, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1985, p. 654 [656]; see also E. Klein, Binding effect of ECHR judgments, Festschrift für Ryssdal, 2000, p. 705 [pp. 706 et seq.]). The decisions of the ECHR in proceedings against other States parties merely give the states that are not involved an occasion to examine their domestic legal systems and, if it appears that an amendment may be necessary, to orient themselves to the relevant case law of the ECHR (see Ress, Wirkung und Beachtung der Urteile und Entscheidungen der Straßburger Konventionsorgane, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1996, p. 350). In this respect, Convention law has no provision comparable to s. 31.1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act, under which all the federal and Land constitutional bodies and all courts and authorities are bound by the decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court. Article 46.1 of the Convention provides only that the State party involved is bound by the final judgment with regard to a specific matter in dispute (res judicata).

b) In the question of fact, the ECHR pronounces a declaratory judgment; the decision establishes that the State party in question - with regard to the specific matter in dispute, - complied with the Convention or acted in contradiction to it; however, there is no judgment of cassation that would directly quash the challenged measure of the State party (see Ehlers, loc. cit., s. 2 marginal no. 52; Polakiewicz, Die Verpflichtungen der Staaten aus den Urteilen des Europäischen Gerichtshofs für Menschenrechte, 1993, pp. 217 et seq.; Steinberger, Human Rights Law Journal 1985, p. 402 [407]).

   If it is declared that there has been a violation of the Convention, the first consequence is that the State party may no longer hold the view that its acts were in compliance with the Convention (see Frowein, in: Isensee/Kirchhof (eds.), Handbuch des Staatsrechts, vol. VII, 1992, s. 180 marginal no. 14). In principle, the decision also obliges the State party affected with regard to the matter in dispute to restore, if possible, the state of affairs without the declared violation of the Convention (see Polakiewicz, loc. cit, pp. 97 et seq.; on the possibility of attaining the goal of restitutio in integrum, see the Recommendation of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe No. R (2000) 2 of 19 January 2000). If the violation that has been found is still continuing, for example in the case of continued arrest in violation of Article 5 of the Convention or an encroachment upon private and family life in violation of Article 8 of the Convention, the State party is under an obligation to end this state (see most recently ECHR, No. 71503/01, Judgment of 8 April 2004, no. 198 - Assanidze, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 2004, p. 268 (275); see also Breuer, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 2004, p. 257 [259]; Grabenwarter, European Convention on Human Rights, 2003, s. 16 marginal no. 3; Polakiewicz, loc. cit., pp. 63 et seq.; Villiger, Handbuch der Europäischen Menschenrechtskonvention, 1999, s. 13 marginal no. 233). The State party would therefore commit a new violation of the European Convention on Human Rights if it failed to terminate or repeated its conduct that has been established to be contrary to the Convention (see E. Klein, Binding effect of ECHR judgments, Festschrift für Ryssdal, 2000, p. 705 [708]). However, it should be taken into account that the effect of the decision relates only to the res judicata and that the factual and legal position may change before new domestic proceedings to which the complainant is a party.

c) The fact that the ECHR may award the complainant a "just compensation" in the form of money if the domestic law of the State party involved permits only inadequate compensation (see Article 41 of the Convention) shows that the Convention allows the State party involved some latitude with regard to the correction of decisions that have already been made and that are non-appealable.

However, in its more recent case law relating to Article 41 of the Convention, the ECHR points out that the States parties, in ratifying the Convention, agreed to ensure that their domestic legal systems are in accordance with the Convention (Article 1 of the Convention). It is therefore, according to the ECHR, for the defendant state to remove every obstacle in domestic law that prevents a redress of the complainant's situation (see ECHR, loc. cit., Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 2004, p. 268 [275] with reference to ECHR, No. 39748/98, Judgment of 17 February 2004, no. 47 - Maestri).

If the State party affected is ordered to pay compensation to the successful complainant under Article 41 of the Convention, this judgment of the ECHR creates an obligation to perform (see Stöcker, Wirkungen der Urteile des Europäischen Gerichtshofs für Menschenrechte in der Bundesrepublik, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 1982, p. 1905 (1908)). The granting of compensation is not necessarily part of the decision in the principal proceedings, but may be made at a later date, in order to give the parties the opportunity to reach an amicable agreement. In this way, Convention law recognises that in general only the State party affected can assess what legal possibilities of action exist in the national legal system for the enforcement of the decision.

d) The legal effect of a decision of the ECHR, under the principles of public international law, is directed in the first instance to the State party as such. In principle, the Convention takes a neutral attitude towards the domestic legal system, and, unlike the law of a supranational organisation, it is not intended to intervene directly in the domestic legal system. On the domestic level, appropriate Convention provisions in conjunction with the consent Act and constitutional requirements (Article 20.3, Article 59.2 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 19.4 of the Basic Law) bind all organisations responsible for German public authority in principle to the decisions of the ECHR.

This legal position corresponds to the conception of the European Convention on Human Rights as an instrument for protection and for the enforcement of particular human rights. The obligation of the States parties, integrated into federal law by the consent Act, to create a domestic instance at which the person affected can have an "effective remedy" against particular conduct by the state (Article 13 of the Convention) already extends into the domestic structure of the state system and is not restricted to the executive branch, which is competent to act externally. In addition, the States parties must guarantee the "effective implementation of any of the provisions" of the European Convention on Human Rights in their domestic law (see Article 52 of the Convention), which is possible in a state under the rule of law governed by the principle of the separation of powers only if all the organisations responsible for sovereign power are bound by the guarantees of the Convention (on this, see Order of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court (preliminary examination committee) of 11 October 1985 - 2 BvR 336/85 - Pakelli, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1985, p. 654 [656]). In this view, the German courts too are under a duty to take the decisions of the ECHR into account.

3. The binding effect of decisions of the ECHR depends on the area of competence of the state bodies and the relevant law. Administrative bodies and courts may not free themselves from the constitutional system of competencies and the binding effect of statute and law (Article 20.3 of the Basic Law) by relying on a decision of the ECHR. But the binding effect of statute and law also includes a duty to take into account the guarantees of the Convention and the decisions of the ECHR as part of a methodologically justifiable interpretation of the law. Both a failure to consider a decision of the ECHR and the "enforcement" of such a decision in a schematic way, in violation of prior ranking law, may therefore violate fundamental rights in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law.

a) The obligation created by the consent Act to take into account the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights and the decisions of the ECHR at least demands that notice is taken of the relevant texts and case law and that they are part of the process of developing an informed opinion of the court appointed to make a decision, of the competent authority or of the legislature. Domestic law must if possible be interpreted in harmony with public international law, regardless of the date when it comes into force (see BVerfGE 74, 358 [370]).

   If there are decisions of the ECHR that are relevant to the assessment of a set of facts, then in principle the aspects taken into account by the ECHR when it considered the case must also be taken into account when the matter is considered from the point of view of constitutional law, in particular when proportionality is examined, and there must be a consideration of the findings made by the ECHR after weighing the rights of the parties (see Order of the First Chamber of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court of 1 March 2004 - 2 BvR 1570/03 -, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 2004 p. 317 [319]).

   If, in concrete application proceedings in which the Federal Republic of Germany in involved, the ECHR establishes that there has been a violation of the Convention, and if this is a continuing violation, the decision of the ECHR must be taken into account in the domestic sphere, that is, the responsible authorities or courts must discernibly consider the decision and, if necessary, justify understandably why they nevertheless do not follow the international law interpretation of the law. Precisely in cases in which national courts, as in private law, have to structure multipolar fundamental rights situations, it is always important that various subjective legal positions are sensitively weighed against each other, and if there is a change in the persons involved in the dispute or a change in the actual or legal circumstances, this weighing up may lead to a different result. There may therefore be constitutional problems if one of the subjects of fundamental rights in conflict with another obtains an ECHR judgment in his or her favour against the Federal Republic of Germany and German courts schematically apply this decision to the private law relationship, with the result that the holder of fundamental rights who has "lost" in this case and was possibly not involved in the proceedings at the ECHR would no longer be able to take an effective part in the proceedings as a party.

b) aa) If the ECHR has declared a domestic provision to be contrary to the Convention, either this provision may be interpreted in conformity with public international law when applied in practice, or the legislature has the possibility of altering this domestic provision that is incompatible with the Convention. If the violation of the Convention consists in effecting a specific administrative act, the authority responsible has the possibility of cancelling this act under the provisions of the law of administrative procedure (s. 48 of the Administrative Procedure Act (Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz - VwVfG)). Administrative practice that is in violation of the Convention can be amended, and courts may establish the duty to do this.

bb) If judicial decisions violate the Convention, neither the European Convention on Human Rights nor the Basic Law imposes an obligation to accord to a judgment of the ECHR that establishes that a decision of a German court was made in violation of the European Convention on Human Rights the effect of removing the non-appealability of this decision (see Federal Constitutional Court, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1985, p. 654). Admittedly, it cannot be concluded from this that decisions of the ECHR need not be taken into account by German courts.

Under Article 20.3 of the Basic Law, judicial decisions are bound by statute and law. The constitutionally guaranteed independence of the judge, who is subject to the law, is not affected by this commitment, which is derived from the principle of the rule of law (Article 97.1 of the Basic Law; see BVerfGE 18, 52 [59]; 19, 17 [31-32]). Both the commitment to law and the commitment to statute put into concrete terms the judicial power that is entrusted to the judges (Article 92 of the Basic Law). Since the European Convention on Human Rights - as interpreted by the ECHR - has the status of a formal federal statute, it shares the primacy of statute law and must therefore be complied with by the judiciary.

With regard to the principle of legal certainty, it must be noted that the federal legislature in the year 1998, in s. 359 no. 6 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung - StPO), introduced into the law of criminal procedure a new ground for reopening criminal proceedings (Act on the Reform of the Reopening of Proceedings under Criminal Law; Gesetz zur Reform des strafrechtlichen Wiederaufnahmerechts of 9 July 1998, Federal Law Gazette I p. 1802). This provides that it is admissible to reopen proceedings that ended in a non-appealable judgment if the ECHR has established that there was a violation of the European Convention on Human Rights or its protocols and the German judgment is based on this violation. This amendment of the law is based on the idea that a violation of the Convention whose effect continues in a specific individual case should be terminated, at all events in the area of criminal law, which is a particularly sensitive one for human rights, even if it is already non-appealable (see s. 79.1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act), if the judgment of the ECHR is relevant to the national proceedings. In this way, the competent court is given the opportunity to deal again, on application, with the case which has actually been closed, and to include the new legal facts in its development of an informed opinion. In this connection, the statute expresses the fundamental expectation that the court will change its original decision - which was contrary to the Convention - to the extent that this is based on the violation.

In other rules of procedure, there is no conclusive answer to the question as to how the Federal Republic of Germany, if the ECHR rules against it, is to react, if national court proceedings have been completed and are non-appealable. There may be facts and circumstances in which German courts may make a new decision, not about the res judicata, but about the matter on which the ECHR has established that there has been a violation of the Convention on the part of the Federal Republic of Germany. This may be the case, for example, when the court is intended to consider the matter again on the basis of a new application or changed circumstances, or the court in another constellation is still dealing with the matter. In the last instance, it is decisive whether a court, within the scope of the applicable law of procedure, has the possibility of making a new decision in which it can take account of the relevant decision of the ECHR.

In such case constellations, it would not be acceptable merely to refer the complainant to money damages, although restoration would fail neither for factual nor for legal reasons.

c) In taking into account decisions of the ECHR, the state bodies must include the effects on the national legal system in their application of the law. This applies in particular with regard to a partial system of domestic law whose legal consequences are balanced and that is intended to achieve an equilibrium between differing fundamental rights.

Individual application proceedings under Article 34 of the Convention before the ECHR are intended to decide specific individual cases in the two-party relationship between the complainant and the State party, by the measure of the European Convention on Human Rights and its protocols. The decisions of the ECHR may encounter national partial systems of law shaped by a complex system of case law. In the German legal system, this may happen in particular in family law and the law concerning aliens, and also in the law on the protection of personality (on this, see, recently, ECHR, No. 59320/00, Judgment of 24 June 2004 - von Hannover v. Germany, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 2004, pp. 404 ff.), in which conflicting fundamental rights are balanced by the creation of groups of cases and graduated legal consequences. It is the task of the domestic courts to integrate a decision of the ECHR into the relevant partial legal area of the national legal system, because it cannot be the desired result of the international law basis can it nor express the will of the ECHR, for the ECHR through its decisions itself to undertake directly any necessary adjustments within a domestic partial legal system.

In this respect, it is necessary for the national courts to evaluate the decision when taking it into account; in this process, account may also be taken of the fact that the individual application proceedings before the ECHR, in particular where the original > proceedings were in civil law, possibly does not give a complete picture of the legal positions and interests involved. The only party to the proceedings before the ECHR apart from the complainant is the State party affected; the possibility for third parties to take part in the application proceedings (see Article 36.2 of the European Convention on Human Rights) is not an institutional equivalent to the rights and duties as a party to proceedings or another person involved in the original national proceedings.

4. The constitutional review of the interpretation and application of agreements under international law that have been given by statute the power of domestic German law is governed by the same principles that elsewhere too define the authority of the Federal Constitutional Court to review judicial decisions. The interpretation and application of agreements under international law by the ordinary courts can in principle be examined only to assess whether they are arbitrary or are based on a fundamentally incorrect view of the significance of a fundamental right or are incompatible with other constitutional provisions (see BVerfGE 18, 441 [450]; 94, 315 [328]).

Admittedly, as part of its competence the Federal Constitutional Court is also competent to prevent and remove, if possible, violations of public international law that consist in the incorrect application or non-observance by German courts of international law obligations and may give rise to an international law responsibility on the part of Germany (see BVerfGE 58, 1 [34]; 59, 63 [89]; 109, 13 [23]). In this, the Federal Constitutional Court is indirectly in the service of enforcing international law and in this way reduces the risk of failing to comply with international law. For this reason it may be necessary, deviating from the customary standard, to review the application and interpretation of international law treaties by the ordinary courts.

Against this background, it must at all events be possible, on the basis of the relevant fundamental right, to raise the objection in proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court that state bodies disregarded or failed to take into account a decision of the ECHR. In this process, the fundamental right is closely connected to the priority of statute embodied in the principle of the rule of law, under which all state bodies are bound by statute and law within their competence (see BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]).

II.

The challenged decision of the Naumburg Higher Regional Court of 30 June 2004 violates Article 6 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law. The Higher Regional Court did not take sufficient account of the judgment of the ECHR of 26 February 2004 when making its decision, although it was under an obligation to do so.

1. The challenged decision does not reveal whether and to what extent the Higher Regional Court considered the fact that the right of access asserted by the complainant is in principle protected by Article 6 of the Basic Law. This constitutional protection is to be seen against the background of the court's remarks on the complementary guarantee in Article 8 of the Convention. The Higher Regional Court should have considered in an understandable way how Article 6 of the Basic Law could have been interpreted in a manner that complied with the obligations under international law of the Federal Republic of Germany.

2. The Higher Regional Court in particular assumes in a manner that is not acceptable under constitutional law that a judgment of the European Court of Human Rights binds only the Federal Republic of Germany as a subject of public international law, but does not bind German courts. All the state bodies of the Federal Republic of Germany are - to the extent set out here under C. I. above - bound by operation of law within their jurisdiction by the Convention and the protocols that have entered into force in Germany. They must take into account the guarantees of the Convention and the case law of the ECHR when interpreting fundamental rights and constitutional guarantees.

In the present case, the Higher Regional Court, by reason of the judgment of the ECHR of 26 February 2004, had particular cause to consider the grounds of that judgment, because the judgment, which established a violation of the Convention by the Federal Republic of Germany, dealt with the matter with which the Higher Regional Court was again concerned. Neither does the duty to take the decision into account adversely affects the Higher Regional Court's constitutionally guaranteed independence, nor does it force the court to enforce the ECHR decision without reflection. However, the Higher Regional Court is bound by statute and law, which includes not only civil law and the relevant procedural law, but also the European Convention on Human Rights, which has the status of an ordinary federal statute.

In the legal analysis in particular of new facts, in weighing conflicting fundamental rights such as those of the foster family and in integrating the individual case in the overall context of family law cases relating to the right of access, the Higher Regional Court is not bound in its particular conclusion. The order challenged, however, lacks a discussion of the connections set out above.

3. It is not necessary to decide whether the Higher Regional Court, in a way that is constitutionally unacceptable, proceeded on the assumption that a temporary injunction can be issued only on application and not - as in the present case - also of the court's own motion, and thus that the complaint was admissible (see for example Saarbrücken Higher Regional Court, OLG-Report 2001, p. 269 on the one hand, Brandenburg Higher Regional Court, OLG-Rechtsprechung Neue Länder - OLG-NL 1994, 159 and Naumburg Higher Regional Court, OLG Naumburg, Justiz-Ministerialblatt für Sachsen-Anhalt 2003, p. 346 on the other hand). At all events, the Higher Regional Court made its procedural remarks too without taking correct account of the judgment of the ECHR of 26 February 2004. However, this was of importance for the question as to whether the Local Court was obliged or entitled of its own motion to examine the granting of a right of access and if the factual requirements were satisfied - as was the case - to make contact by access possible by way of a temporary injunction.

With the decision on the constitutional complaint in the principal proceedings, the application for a temporary injunction is also disposed of.

VIII. Freedom of Assembly - Article 8 of the Basic Law

1. Right of Assembly, BVerfGE 87, 399

Explanatory Annotation

Article 8 of the Basic Law guarantees the right to peacefully assemble and demonstrate. The details are regulated in a federal statute specifying under what conditions the police can interfere with the demonstration. The most severe interference is the dissolution of a demonstration, i.e. its break-up in case the demonstration turns violent or when other breaches of public security occur. Public security is a standing legal term defined as any breach of the law, especially of criminal law norms. If such a dissolution order is issued, the statute requires all participants to leave the venue of the demonstration immediately. Failure to do so constitutes a criminal offence usually punishable by monetary fines.

In this case the applicants had been sentenced to a fine of roughly 80 and 60 German Marks (now roughly 40 and 30 Euros) for taking part in a sit-in blockade of a military installation in Germany as part of a peace movement protest. Sit-in blockades interfere with the rights of others who can no longer enter or leave the installation blocked in this way. They can therefore in principle constitute a criminal offence. On these grounds the police issued a dissolution order, which the applicants had disobeyed.

The Constitutional Court, however, quashed the fines. It found that the regular courts could not just rely on the fact that the dissolution had been disobeyed but also needed to determine whether that dissolution order was in fact in compliance with the assembly statute. There were strong indications that this was not the case as the demonstrators had announced their intention to use a blockade as a means of demonstration and the relevant authorities had, in correct application of the principle of proportionality, only set some conditional requirements which had all been met. For example, the demonstrators had only blocked one of three entry points to the military barracks.

The case raises the issue of the difficulty that lies in having to make administrative decisions on the spot, with no time for legal analysis. It is clear that police orders have to be followed and that those affected by them at the time cannot be free to make their own individual assessment on the legality of the order and behave accordingly. Hence, if there is good cause for a police order issued "in action" the standard for its legality is usually determined on the basis available to the persons acting at the scene and in consideration of the circumstances under which the administrative decision had to be reached. Hence the legality of a dissolution order for a demonstration based on a credible bomb threat cannot depend on whether a bomb is actually found and the dissolution must be immediately enforceable as well, regardless of the personal views of those affected by the order on the scope of the risk. At the same time, the freedom of demonstration is one of the core communication freedoms and to levy a fine on someone because they disobeyed an order which later turns out to have been issued illegally would threaten this freedom. The risk of illegality must be borne by the governmental authorities at least when it comes to interference with fundamental rights.

Translation of the Right of Assembly Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 87, 399*

Headnote:

A conviction by the criminal courts for refusal to immediately leave the site of an assembly that has been dispersed pursuant to s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act (Versammlungsgesetz - VersG) is incompatible with Article 8 of the Basic Law, if it fails to take into account the legality of the order to disperse.

Order of the First Senate of 1 December 1992 - 1 BvR 88, 576/91 -

Facts:

S. 15.2 of the Assembly Act permits dispersal of an outdoor assembly, in particular in the case of deviation from information provided upon registration or violation of conditions imposed for holding such assembly or if recognizable circumstances indicate that holding the assembly poses an immediate threat to public safety or order. Pursuant to s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act, it is a regulatory offence not to leave a public assembly or procession immediately despite an order to disperse from the responsible authority.

The complainants took part in sit-in blockades in front of a Federal Armed Forces (Bundeswehr) base on 7 and 9 May 1989. The authority responsible for the assembly had previously restricted the blockade action by imposing certain conditions. After the police enforcement officers present on site dispersed the respective blockades, the complainants did not leave the site and were carried from the street by police officers. The Local Courts (Amtsgerichte) then sentenced them to low fines for violation of s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act. The Local Courts failed to examine the legality of the underlying order to disperse more closely in making their decision. The appeals of the complainants to the Higher Regional Court (Oberlandesgericht) were without success. In response to the constitutional complaints of the complainants, the Federal Constitutional Court reversed the judgments of the Local Courts, declared the orders of the Higher Regional Court invalid and referred the matters back to the Local Courts.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

The constitutional complaints are founded. The challenged decisions violate the fundamental rights of the complainants under Article 8.1 and Article 103 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG).

Selected Fundamental Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court

I.

1. Imposition of a fine by the criminal courts under s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act without taking into account the legality of the dispersal of the assembly constitutes a violation of Article 8 of the Basic Law.

a) Article 8.1 of the Basic Law guarantees all Germans the right to assemble peacefully and unarmed. This right also covers the choice of the place, time, nature and subject of the event. Protection is afforded not only at events where opinions are made known or exchanged in verbal form, but also those at which participants give voice to their opinions in other ways (see BVerfGE 69, 315 [343]).

Sit-in blockades also enjoy the protection of the freedom of assembly. Apart from whether or not they are to be considered to constitute the use of force within the meaning of s. 240 of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch), they do not contain the elements of an offence of unpeaceable conduct within the meaning of Article 8.1 of the Basic Law that would deprive them of the protection of this fundamental right. Indeed, an assembly is not unpeaceable unless acts occur that constitute a certain danger such as, for example, violence or aggressive excesses against persons or property, but not simply because of inconvenience to third parties, even if such inconvenience is intended and not merely tolerated (see BVerfGE 73, 206 [248]).

The freedom of assembly is not, however, absolutely guaranteed. In the case of outdoor assemblies, interferences with fundamental rights are permissible by or pursuant to a law under Article 8.2 of the Basic Law. The Basic Law thus takes into account the fact that such assemblies necessitate precautionary measures to put in place the conditions for the exercise of the fundamental right on the one hand and protect colliding interests of third parties on the other hand (see BVerfGE 69, 315 [348]). Laws that restrict the freedom of assembly must, however, be compatible with the Basic Law and applied in complete compliance with it. Governmental bodies must construct laws that restrict fundamental rights in the light of the fundamental importance of Article 8.1 of the Basic Law and limit measures taken to that which is necessary for the protection of other legal interests of equivalent importance (see BVerfGE 69, 315 [349]).

b) The provision contained in s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act is compatible with Article 8 of the Basic Law if construed in conformity therewith.

aa) Just as the dispersal of an assembly can occasion no misgivings as regards the principle of proportionality if the conditions pursuant to s. 15.2 of the Assembly Act exist (see BVerfGE 69, 315 [352]), it is also not possible to object to the refusal to leave the site of an assembly that has been ordered dispersed under s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act being prosecuted as a regulatory offence. There are also no constitutional grounds for objection to the reference to the provisions of administrative law contained in s. 15.2 of the Assembly Act. The legislature may make provision for penalties or fines for violation of duties under provisions of administrative law and administrative orders in order to encourage compliance.

Whether this is done in the respective special legislation, i.e., in separate penal statutes, or in the Criminal Code itself is for the legislature to decide (see BVerfGE 75, 329 [343]).

Blanket offences, which become completely defined only through administrative provisions, are also compatible with the Basic Law if sufficiently specific (see BVerfGE 14, 245 [252]); established case law.

However, this type of regulatory method necessarily results in interaction between administrative law and laws governing criminal and regulatory offences. This can bind criminal court judges to administrative decisions on the one hand, but can on the other hand serve to establish adjudicatory authority as regards such decisions without thereby entailing any violation of the principles of separation of powers (see BVerfGE 75, 329 [346]; 80, 244 [256]).

No general statement on the reach of these constraints and this adjudicatory authority can be inferred from the Basic Law. It is primarily the affair of the legislature to decide whether punishability or prosecutability in connection with violations of administrative orders is to depend on whether such orders are legal or not. The legislature is, of course, bound to the requirements of the Basic Law, in particular those of the restricted fundamental right.

bb) It is uncertain whether s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act implies protection of legal interests and therefore makes provision for fines only in the case of legal dispersals of assemblies or whether it even sanctions disregard for orders to disperse regardless of their legality. Different answers to this question are found in the case law and legal literature (see on the one hand, for example, Dusseldorf Higher Regional Court, NStZ 1984, p. 513, and Ott, Gesetz über Versammlungen and Aufzüge, 5th ed., 1987, s. 29 marginal note 9; Dietel/Gintzel/Kniesel, Demonstrations und Versammlungsfreiheit, 10th ed., 1991, s. 29 marginal note 7; Offczors, in: Ridder inter alia, Versammlungsrecht, 1992, s. 29 marginal notes 24 et seq., in particular 28; on the other hand, for example, Stuttgart Higher Regional Court, NJW 1989, p. 1870, and Meyer/Köhler, Das neue Demonstrations und Versammlungsrecht, 3rd ed., 1990, s. 29 note 4b).

Neither the text of the law nor the legislative materials permits an unambiguous conclusion.

The absence of any mention of enforcement in s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act (in contrast to ss. 23, 26 no. 1, 29.1 nos. 1 and 3 of the Assembly Act) also permits no reliable conclusion since the materials show that this was included in the Assembly Act for other reasons (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] VII/550, p. 375).

Moreover, contradictions would result if prosecutability were to be dependent upon whether the elements of enforceability were explicitly mentioned. For example, persons taking part in an assembly who violate an illegal, but enforceable condition pursuant to s. 29.1 no. 3 of the Assembly Act would be committing a regulatory offence because the elements of the fineable offence include the subjoinder "enforceable" in 1978, whereas the organizer of the assembly would escape punishment in the same case because s. 25 of the Assembly Act lacks this sub-joinder.

cc) Under these circumstances, according to the construction of s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act that follows from Article 8.1 of the Basic Law, violations of orders to disperse may not be prosecuted without taking into account their legality.

Like freedom of expression, freedom of assembly is of fundamental importance for the development of a person's personality and the democratic order (see BVerfGE 69, 315 [343 to 347]). Prohibition and dispersal of an assembly represent the most extreme interferences with fundamental rights. They are therefore subject to stringent conditions and may be invoked only if necessary to protect legal interests of equivalent importance and if an immediate danger to public safety and order must be averted (see BVerfGE 69, 315 [353]).

Such decisions may be based only on actual circumstances; suspicion and presumption alone do not suffice (see BVerfGE op. cit. p. 353-354).

Dispersal of an assembly that does not satisfy these requirements is in violation of Article 8 of the Basic Law. Persons taking part in assemblies must nevertheless initially accept such orders. The duty to leave the site of an assembly that has been ordered dispersed cannot be made dependent upon the illegality of the order to disperse. Since it is always possible to determine this with certainty only in retrospect, dispersal of any assembly would become impossible as soon as one of the participants invokes the legality of the dispersal. When persons taking part in an assembly disobey a police order, the use of forcible means by the governmental is in principle permissible (s. 80.2 no. 2 of the Code of Administrative Court Procedure (Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung - VwGO)). The persons taking part in the assembly are left with only the possibility of having the illegality and, if appropriate, the violation of the Basic Law by the actions of the police established retrospectively by the courts. The violation of fundamental rights that occur through the illegal dispersal of an assembly can, of course, no longer be cured in this manner. The resultant impairment of the fundamental right to the freedom of assembly is, however, unavoidable without subordination of the protection of the other legal interests to be served by the restriction of the freedom of assembly.

What pertains to the enforcement of orders to disperse under administrative law does not, however, apply in the same manner to prosecution for disobedience under criminal law or laws governing regulatory offences. It is necessary to distinguish between the two. The reason why legality is not the critical aspect in the case of the execution of an order to disperse has to do with the situational dependence of the decision, the enforcement of which cannot be postponed until the legal issue is definitively or even tentatively resolved. This reason is lacking when it comes to the imposition of a sanction for failure to obey the order. This always takes place only after the occurrence and therefore permits definitive clarification of the legal issue. If the legality of the order to disperse were nonetheless of no regard, the unavoidable impairment of the freedom of assembly that is inherent in an illegal order to disperse would without any commensurate necessity remain in effect against those persons who - as is subsequently found - legitimately invoked the right to freedom of assembly.

The question as to whether the legislature should nevertheless have been allowed to prosecute disobedience can remain open here. Such an intention cannot be inferred from the law. There is therefore also no occasion to examine the issue as to whether there is any reason that could be construed to legitimate such far-reaching interference under the Basic Law. Under these circumstances, it is possible to accommodate the right to freedom of assembly only if the sanction provided for by s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act is restricted to cases involving legal dispersal of assemblies. Legality must therefore be established before a criminal court judge can impose a fine.

The dispute as to whether criminal court judges must await clarification of legality under administrative law, if such is requested, and whether they are bound by the results need also not be decided here. Since prior recourse to the administrative courts to contest dispersals of assemblies pursuant to s. 15.2 of the Assembly Act is not possible and a subsequent action as regards only the possibility of subsequent regulatory proceedings cannot be reasonably expected of the parties affected, criminal court judges must in any case when the legality of the dispersal of an assembly has not been clarified by the administrative courts themselves establish whether this is the case since it would otherwise not be possible to satisfy the requirements of Article 8 of the Basic Law.

2. A construction that permits prosecution for violation of an order to disperse pursuant to s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act without taking into account its legality also violates Article 103.2 of the Basic Law.

According to this provision, an act may be punished only if punishability was provided for by law before the act was committed. This protection also extends to the prosecution of regulatory offences (see BVerfGE 81, 132 [135]; established case law).

This provision is intended on the one hand to ensure that the public addressed by a provision can anticipate what conduct is subject to a penalty or a fine and on the other hand to guarantee that the legislature makes decisions as regards punishability or prosecutability so that this is not left up to the courts. Article 103.2 of the Basic Law therefore excludes the application of any law that goes beyond the substantive content of a legal sanction (see BVerfGE 47, 109 [120]; 82, 236 [269]).

The legislature is certainly not prevented from the outset from imposing a penalty or fine on disobedience of an order without requiring that the legality of the order be prerequisite to such imposition (see BVerfGE 80, 244 [256]). A legislative decision to prosecute failure to obey orders to disperse without taking into account their legality cannot, however, as has been shown, be unambiguously inferred from the law even if the legislative materials are taken into account. Under these circumstances, prosecution may not be construed to extend to include cases of illegal dispersal of assemblies, but must be restricted to violations of legal orders to disperse.

II.

The challenged judgments do not withstand review against these standards.

1. The Local Court should have taken Article 8 of the Basic Law into account for the purposes of construction and application of s. 29.1 no. 2 in conjunction with s. 15.2 of the Assembly Act. The sit-in demonstrations in which the complainant took part are included in the area of protection of Article 8.1 of the Basic Law. The imposition of fines for failure to leave protected assemblies represents an interference with the fundamental right. On the basis of the principles set forth, this is compatible with Article 8 of the Basic Law only if the dispersal of the assembly was legal. The Local Court neglected to examine this aspect.

In the proceedings involving the second complainant, it was not established that the dispersal of the assembly was legal. In the proceedings involving the first complainant, the Local Court did to be sure state that there was no indication to the effect that the dispersal of the assembly was illegal. The grounds do, however, suggest that the Court had considered only the correctness of the form of the announcement of the order to disperse. This is supported by the verbal announcement of the order and limitation to the finding that it was made twice and also taken note of. The Court did not, however, address the question as to whether the dispersal was ordered by the responsible authority as required by s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act. The judgment in the proceedings involving the second complainant does not even specify who ordered the dispersal. It is only established that the police enforcement officers announced the dispersal.

The judgment in the proceedings involving the first complainant does certainly establish that the officer in charge of the police enforcement officers ordered the dispersal pursuant to s. 46.2 no. 2 of the Baden-Württemberg Police Act (Polizeigesetz) because the authority responsible for assemblies could not be reached. However, actual findings as to what sequence of events represented an imminent danger, which according to this provision is a prerequisite for intervention by police enforcement officers, are absent. The decisions do not contain any findings whatsoever as to the concrete events that posed an immediate danger to public safety. In that regard, the findings are limited to repetition of the pronouncement of the dispersal order, according to which there was an immediate danger of coercion. The factual basis for this assessment - whether, for example, vehicles were approaching the gate and other possibilities for entering or leaving the grounds of the base did not exist - cannot be inferred from the decisions under challenge.

It would, however, have been appropriate to review the legality of the dispersal. The authority responsible for assemblies did not prohibit the sit-in demonstrations, but only imposed conditions on the organizers with explicit reference to the principle of proportionality. The first complainant has submitted that the conditions were complied with and that only one of the three gates to the base was blocked. Under these circumstances, concrete findings would have been necessary to show why the means chosen by the authority responsible for assemblies, i.e., avoidance of danger, was inadequate and the police enforcement officers had to proceed to disperse the assembly.

The conviction of the complainant is based on a misapprehension of Article 8 of the Basic Law. It is not possible to exclude the possibility that the Local Court would have come to a different conclusion if it had adequately considered the fundamental right of freedom of assembly.

2. Apart from the issue of the legality of the order to disperse, since the complainants were sentenced to fines although it is not obvious that this is provided for in s. 29.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act, the decisions under challenge are also in violation of Article 103.2 of the Basic Law.

2. Brokdorf, BVerfGE 69, 315

Explanatory Annotation

Brokdorf is a small town on the Elbe river just north of Hamburg. It is also the site of a nuclear power plant which during its planning and construction stages became the focus point of wide spread opposition and resistance by all kinds of groups ranging from citizen initiatives to political groups, environmentalists, anti-nuclear power activists and other more militant groups. The case concerned the prohibition of a mass demonstration of an expected 50,000 demonstrators for fears that the violence ensuing from it could not be contained. The Constitutional Court held this to be unconstitutional in the light of the freedom of demonstration as guaranteed by Article 8.1 of the Basic Law.

The decision is significant for several reasons. It clarified the relationship between Article 8 of the Basic Law and the federal statute on assemblies and demonstrations. Article 8.1 clearly stipulates that assemblies[104] can take place without official authorization or even notification to the relevant authorities. The assembly statute however requires such notification, at least 48 hours before the event. The Constitutional Court held that this regular statutory provision could escape unconstitutionality only if interpreted very restrictively. Notification can only be required where such notification does not interfere with the purpose of the demonstration and where the notification only serves the purpose to facilitate the demonstration or assembly itself and reduce the impact it has on the third parties. Its purpose is therefore restricted to giving the authorities the possibility to prepare, for example by informing the public of possible traffic jams etc. and to provide the necessary security and protection for the assembly and demonstration. If the notification is impossible because the assembly is an ad-hoc assembly it must not be required.

The second significance lies in the use of procedure to safeguard fundamental rights. The Court held that the administrative authorities and the organizers of such mass demonstrations must cooperate to ensure the safe conduct of the event. The more cooperation on the side of the organizers the higher the threshold will be for the necessary risk prognosis to justify the prohibition of the demonstration.

104 The term is applicable to stationary assemblies and moving demonstrations.

Finally the Court also stated that a demonstration or assembly cannot be prohibited or dissolved just because of a - real - risk of or actual occurrence of violent behaviour by some. If that were so any mass assembly or demonstration would be in danger of being prohibited because it is almost inherent that at least some will use the occasion for other than peaceful purposes. The right to assemble for the peaceful majority remains in place and a preventive prohibition of the whole assembly could only be justified as a ultima ratio measure if all else - preparation, cooperation with organizers, joint steps to secure the peaceful part of the event, deployment of riot police etc. - has failed and the exercise of this fundamental right for the peaceful majority cannot be secured because of the verified risk level.

Translation of the Brokdorf Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 69, 315*

Headnotes:

1. The citizen's right to actively participate in the process of the formation of political opinion and will by exercising the freedom of assembly ranks among the indispensable functional elements of a democratic society. The fundamental importance of this freedom must be taken into account by the legislature when enacting provisions of law that restrict fundamental rights and by the authorities and courts when interpreting and applying such provisions.

2. The provision of the Assembly Act (Versammlungsgesetz - VersammlG) that governs registration of events held outdoors and the conditions for the dispersal or prohibition of such events (s.s. 14 and 15) satisfies the constitutional requirements if it is interpreted and applied in such a manner

   a) that compulsory registration does not apply in the case of spontaneous demonstrations and non-compliance does not justify systematic dispersal or prohibition; and

   b) that dispersal and prohibition are possible only to protect equivalent legal interests and if in strict compliance with the principle of proportionality and only if an immediate threat to these legal interests can be inferred from discernible circumstances.

3. Governmental authorities are constrained to act in a manner favourable to demonstrations by taking as their model peaceful mass demonstrations and may not without adequate reason ignore positive experience. The more the organizers are for their part willing to take confidence building measures on their own or provide demonstration-friendly cooperation, the higher the bar becomes for governmental intervention on the grounds of a threat to public safety.

4. Unless it is to be feared that a demonstration will on the whole turn non-peaceful, or that the organizer and the organizer's supporters will strive for or at least tolerate such a turn of events, the protection of the freedom of assembly of peaceful participants that the Basic Law guarantees every citizen is preserved, even if excesses are to be expected from individuals or a minority of the participants. In such cases, preventive prohibition of an entire event requires as antecedent conditions stringent standards in respect of the assessment of dangers and previous exhaustion of all reasonably applicable means that would make it possible for peaceful demonstrators to exercise their fundamental rights.

5. The administrative courts must already at the level of injunctive relief proceedings take into account through more intensive examination the circumstance that immediate enforcement of a ban on a demonstration results as a rule in irreversible impairment of the exercise of fundamental rights.

Order of the First Senate of 14 May 1985 - 1 BvR 233, 341/81 -

Facts:

In early 1981, numerous civic action groups called for a mass demonstration against the construction of the nuclear power plant in Brokdorf on 28 February 1981. Before the assembly was even registered, the responsible county commissioner issued in the form of a blanket order a general ban on the assembly on the construction site covering an area of about 210 square kilometres and ordered that it be immediately enforced. This order was based on knowledge acquired by the police to the effect that there was a significant number of persons with violent intentions among the approximately 50,000 expected demonstrators who intended to forcibly occupy and disturb the construction site and commit other acts of violence. When the organizers subsequently applied for registration, the county commissioner referred to the ban on the demonstration which had already been ordered. A few of the organizers, the subsequent complainants before the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht), appealed this decision and the general order and petitioned the court to restore the suspensory effect of the appeal. This petition was denied by the Lüneburg Higher Administrative Court (Oberverwaltungsgericht) in the second instance. The Higher Administrative Court gave as its grounds the late registration of the demonstration and the expected disturbances. The appropriate balancing of interests resulted therefore in the denial of the petition of the complainant for injunctive relief.

The constitutional complaints challenging immediate enforcement of the general order and the decision of the Higher Administrative Court were successful in part.

B.

The constitutional complaints are admissible.

Immediate enforcement of the ban on the demonstration and confirmation thereof by the court prevented the complainants from conducting an authorized demonstration at locations indicated to the authority at the planned times. The complainants view these acts on the part of the public authorities as an encroachment upon legal positions that are protected by the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG). Since these acts were contested in court and since all legal remedies have therefore been exhausted, the legally prescribed conditions for admissibility have been met for their constitutional complaints, which were submitted on a timely basis (Article 93.1 no. 4a and Article 94.2 of the Basic Law, ss. 90 et seq. of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerGG). According to established case law, the admissibility of their constitutional complaints cannot be objected to on the grounds that all legal remedies have not been exhausted in the main proceedings since the injunctive proceedings are pursuant to s. 80.5 of the Code of Administrative Court Procedure (Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung - VwGO) legally independent of the former proceedings (BVerfGE 53, 30 [52]; 59, 63 [82] with further references.)

2. The constitutional complaints also do not lack the required legal interest. This interest is in particular not extinguished because the date of the demonstration has been exceeded and immediate enforcement of the ban has therefore become irrelevant. According to established case law, a legal interest remains intact even after the relief sought through the constitutional complaint becomes irrelevant, in any case if clarification of a constitutional issue of fundamental importance would otherwise be omitted and the interference involves an especially important fundamental right (BVerfGE 53, 30 [52]; 59, 63 [82] with further references.

That these conditions have been met follows from the preceding considerations.

The existence of this legitimate interest can also be affirmed in the case of the first complainants although they did not initiate an action in respect of the main issue after their appeal was dismissed. There were originally no reservations of any sort as regards the admissibility of their constitutional complaint, which was already lodged in the night prior to the planned demonstration (see the order on the temporary order applied for, BVerfGE 56, 244 [246]).

Their interest in judicial relief could therefore have been extinguished only due to subsequent circumstances. It is, however, in any case necessary to decide on the relief sought with their constitutional complaint in the proceedings of the second complainants; there is therefore no reason to apply stringent requirements as a prerequisite for admissibility in respect of the continued existence of the interest in judicial relief of the first complainants (see BVerfGE 50, 290 [320]; 62, 117 [144]).

Since, as was mentioned, the proceedings pursuant to s. 80.5 of the Code of Administrative Court Procedure must be considered legally independent for the purposes of constitutional review and since the first complainants have an interest in clarification of the conditions under which immediate enforcement of the ban on the demonstration would have been allowed under constitutional law, the mere circumstance that they did not lodge a constitutional complaint in respect of the main issue after the date of the demonstration elapsed, does not compel the assumption that the interest in judicial relief that originally existed was subsequently extinguished.

C.

The constitutional complaints are justified insofar as they are directed against the fact that the Higher Administrative Court confirmed in response to the appeal of the joined parties, immediate enforcement of the ban on the demonstration to an extent that exceeded that approved by the Administrative Court. The provisions of the Assembly Act contested indirectly that are relevant to the decisions under challenge ultimately withstand constitutional review.

I.

The fundamental right to freedom of assembly (Article 8 of the Basic Law) is the standard of constitutional review.

1. The measures under challenge in the initial proceedings and the underlying statutory provisions restricted the freedom of the complainants to conduct the planned demonstrations. This freedom is guaranteed in Article 8 of the Basic Law, which protects assemblies and processions - in contrast to mere gatherings or popular entertainment - as an expression of collective development of personality for the purposes of communication. This protection is not limited to events that involve argumentation and disputes, but covers multiple forms of collective activity, including non-verbal forms of expression. This also includes activities of the nature of demonstrations, where the freedom of assembly is used for the purposes of conspicuous or sensational expression of opinion. Since there was no evidence in the initial proceedings to the effect that the expression of certain opinions - for example, in speeches and songs or on banners - was to be prevented, it is not necessary to determine how the fundamental right to freedom of expression might also be applied as a standard of review in conjunction with Article 8 of the Basic Law for measures taken against demonstrations.

2. As a defensive right that also and primarily benefits minorities with differing opinions, Article 8 of the Basic Law guarantees holders of fundamental rights freedom of self-determination as regards the place, time, nature and content of an event and at the same time prohibits governmental compulsion to take part in or stay away from a public assembly. For this reason alone, fundamental rights enjoy a special status under a free system of government; the right to assemble freely with others without any special permission has always been a sign of the freedom, independence and empowerment of self-confident citizens. However, as applied to political events, the guarantee of freedom embodies at the same time a basic decision whose importance extends beyond protection against governmental encroachment upon the unhindered development of personality. In Anglo-American legal circles, the freedom of assembly rooted in the concept of natural law was recognized very early as an expression of popular sovereignty and accordingly as the democratic right of citizens to participate actively in the political process (see Quilisch, Die demokratische Versammlung, 1970, pp. 36 et seq.; Schwäble, Das Grundrecht der Versammlungsfreiheit, 1975, pp.17 et seq.).

The importance of this freedom is also emphasized in the statements made by the Federal Minister of the Interior, the Trade Union of the Police (Gewerkschaft der Polizei) and the Federal Association of Citizens' Initiatives for Environmental Protection (Bundesverband Bürgerinitiativen Umweltschutz - BBU) and is now consistently acknowledged in the scholarly literature.

a) Freedom of expression has long been considered one of the indispensable and fundamental functional elements of a democratic society in the constitutional case law, which has up to now not dealt with the freedom of assembly. It is considered to be the most direct expression of human personality and as one of the very foremost human rights constitutive for a free democratic governmental order; for it is what makes the continuous intellectual debate and the confrontation of opinions that constitute a vital aspect of this form of government possible in the first place (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208]; 12, 113 [125]; 20, 56 [97]; 42, 163 [169]).If the freedom of assembly is construed as the freedom of collective expression of opinion, it cannot in principle be treated differently. This is not opposed by the fact that the aspect of argumentation, which is as a rule characteristic of the exercise of freedom of expression, is less pronounced in the particular case of demonstrations. By expressing their opinions through their physical presence in full view of the public and without the intervention of media, demonstrators also develop their personalities in a direct manner. In their ideally typical form, demonstrations constitute the collective physical manifestation of convictions; on the one hand, the participants can experience confirmation of these convictions in community with others and, on the other hand, if only through their mere presence, the nature of their appearance and the way they interact with one another or the choice of the location, take a position - literally - and bear outward testimony to their standpoint. The danger that such manifestations of opinion will be abused for demagogic ends and emotionalized in a questionable manner, must be considered just as irrelevant for the purposes of basic assessment in the area of freedom of assembly as in the areas of freedom of expression and freedom of the press.

b) The fundamental importance of the freedom of assembly becomes especially discernible when the unique nature of the process of forming opinions in a democratic society is considered. As regards the free democratic order, the Communist Party of Germany (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands - KPD) judgment states that it is predicated on the assumption that the existing governmental and social conditions that have developed over time are capable and in need of improvement; this presents a never-ending challenge that must be resolved through constant renewal of decisions of will (BVerfGE 5, 85 [197]). The path to formation of these decisions of will is described as a process of "trial and error" that through constant intellectual debate, reciprocal controls and criticism provides the best guarantee for a (relatively) correct political line as a resultant and a balance between the political forces at work within the state (Op. cit. [135]; see also BVerfGE 12, 113 [125]).The subsequent judgment on party finance builds on these considerations and stresses that the process of formation of will in a democracy must flow from the people to the bodies of government and not the other way around, and the right of the citizenry to participate in the process of formation of political will is manifested not only by voting in elections, but also in the exercise of influence on the constant process of formation of political opinion, which in a democratic state must take place freely, openly, without regulation and be in principle "state-free." (BVerfGE 20, 56 [98-99]).

Citizens are involved in this process to varying degrees. Large associations, financially strong contributors of funds or mass media can exert considerable influence whereas the citizens tend to feel rather powerless. In a society in which direct access to the media and the opportunity to express opinions through the media is limited to a few, the individual is generally left, apart from organized participation in parties and associations, with only the possibility of collective influence by taking advantage of the freedom of assembly to hold demonstrations. The unhindered exercise of this freedom not only counteracts the feeling of political powerlessness and dangerous tendencies toward indifference to government. It is therefore ultimately in the well-considered public interest since the parallelogram of forces involved in the formation of political will cannot generally produce a relatively correct resultant unless all vectors are fairly strongly developed.

Moreover, assemblies are correctly identified in the scholarly literature as an essential element of democratic openness: "They offer ... the possibility of public influence on the political process, development of pluralistic initiatives and alternatives or also criticism and protest ...; they embody a certain primordial, unrestrained direct democracy that is suitable for protecting the political enterprise against stagnation in routine business" (Hesse, op. cit., p. 157; in agreement Blumenwitz, op. cit. [132-133]).

For in democracies with representative parliamentary systems and few rights to cast direct votes, the freedom of assembly assumes the importance of a fundamental and indispensable functional element. In this case - even when decisions are involved that have serious consequences for everyone and cannot be reversed following a change in power - the doctrine of majority rule applies in principle. On the other hand, even the influence of the electoral majority is quite limited between elections; governmental power is exercised by special agencies and administered by a dominating bureaucratic apparatus. Quite generally, the more effective the protection of minorities, the more legitimate become the decisions made by these agencies on the basis of the principle of majority rule; the acceptance of these decisions being influenced by whether the minority was able to exert adequate influence on the formation of opinion and will beforehand (see BVerfGE 5, 85 [198-199]).Demonstrative protest can become necessary in particular if the representative bodies fail to recognize possible abuses and undesirable developments or fail to recognize them on a timely basis or tolerate them out of consideration for other interests (see also BVerfGE 28, 191 [202]).The stabilizing function of the freedom of assembly within the representative system is correctly described in the scholarly literature as allowing those who are dissatisfied to openly voice and vent their discontent and criticism and functions as a necessary prerequisite for a political early-warning system that indicates potential disruption, reveals shortcomings as regards integration and therefore also makes possible changes in the direction of official policy (Blanke/Sterzel, op. cit. [69]).

II.

The provisions of the Assembly Act that were relevant in the initial proceedings satisfy constitutional requirements if the fundamental importance of the freedom of assembly is taken into account when they are interpreted and applied.

1. Despite its elevated status, the freedom of assembly is not guaranteed without reservation. Article 8 of the Basic Law guarantees only the "right to assemble peacefully and unarmed" (see on this III 3.a below; pages 359-360 of the Official Collection [Amtliche Sammlung]) and also stipulates that this right to hold such events outdoors may be restricted by enactment of a specific law. As a result, the Basic Law takes into account the fact that a special need for regulation exists for the exercise of the freedom of assembly outdoors because of the contact with the outside world, namely, organizational and procedural regulation, in order to create the physical conditions for the exercise of the right on the one hand and to adequately protect conflicting interests on the other hand.

Whereas the Weimar Constitution specifically stipulated in Article 123 that outdoor assemblies could "be made subject to registration by Reich law and prohibited in the case of an immediate threat to public safety," the Basic Law makes do with a simple provision for restriction by enactment of a specific law that is apparently unlimited. This does not, however, mean that the force of this guarantee of the fundamental right is limited to the area to which the legislature assigns it on the basis of its substantive content. In fact, as the Federal Minister of the Interior also correctly stated, the same applies as in the case of the freedom of expression, which according to the wording of the Basic Law is subject to restriction within limits imposed by general laws, but its reach may not be arbitrarily relativized by ordinary laws (of fundamental importance on this BVerfGE 7, 198 [207-208]; see also BVerfGE 7, 377 [404]).

The legislature must in the case of all restrictive provisions respect the fundamental constitutional decision embodied in Article 8 of the Basic Law addressed above; the legislature may limit the exercise of the freedom of assembly only to protect other legal interests of equal weight and must strictly observe the principle of proportionality.

When the public authorities and courts interpret and apply laws formulated by the legislature that restrict the fundamental rights, the same also applies as in the case of the interpretation of provisions that restrict the freedom of expression (BVerfGE 7, 198 [208]; 60, 234 [240]; on the Law of Assembly - Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court [Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE] 26, 135 [137]).

Intervention that restricts such freedom may prove necessary in the area of the freedom of assembly when the exercise of the fundamental right by a demonstrator interferes with the legal positions of others. In the case of such intervention, governmental bodies must also consistently interpret laws that restrict fundamental rights in the light of fundamental importance of this fundamental right in a free democratic state and restrict their measures to that which is necessary to protect equivalent legal interests. Governmental measures that go beyond the application of laws that restrict fundamental rights and, for example, make access to a demonstration unreasonably difficult by obstructing access routes and carrying out tedious preventive controls or modifying the state-free, unregulated character of the demonstration through excessive observation and registration would be even more incompatible with these requirements (see on this BVerfGE 65, 1 [43]).

2. Of the provisions of the Assembly Act that the legislature enacted by virtue of the reservation of legislative power contained in Article 8.2 of the Basic Law, only compulsory registration, which is regulated in s. 14.1, and the constituent elements required for dispersal and prohibition contained in s. 15 were relevant for the purposes of reaching a decision in the initial proceedings. The provisions of law-governing assemblies that relate to prior registration and the submission of the name of a responsible leader do not require review; neither the administrative authority nor the courts have based their decisions on these provisions.

a) Compulsory registration pursuant to s. 14.1 of the Assembly Act was explicitly provided for under the Weimar Constitution as a permissible restriction on the freedom of assembly. According to the opinion of the Federal Administrative Court, registration as a rule restricts the fundamental right only insignificantly (BVerwGE 26, 135 [137-138]).

   The Federal Court of Justice (see "Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Criminal Cases" [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen - BGHSt 23], 46 [58-59]) considers the provision compatible with the Basic Law as do the majority of legal scholars. This is to be agreed with if it is taken into account that compulsory registration is not required without exception and that violation of this requirement does not automatically justify prohibition or dispersal of an event.

   Compulsory registration applies only to assemblies held outdoors because they often necessitate special measures due to the way they affect their surroundings. The particulars to be provided upon registration are intended to give the public authorities the information they need to be able to envision what traffic control and other measures have to be taken to ensure that the event is held with as little disturbance as possible on the one hand, and what is required in the interest of others and the community on the other hand, and how the two can be reconciled (see Bundestag document 8/1845, p. 10). According to the very prevalent view, timely registration is not mandatory in the case of spontaneous demonstrations that are held suddenly for reasons of the moment (see, for example, BVerwGE 26, 135 [138]; Supreme Court of the State of Bavaria [Bayerisches Oberstes Landesgericht - BayObLG], NJW 1970, p. 479; Dietel/Gintzel, op. cit., marginal notes 23 on s. 1 and marginal note 18 et seq. on s. 14 of the Assembly Act; Herzog, op. cit., marginal notes 48, 82 and 95 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; v. Münch, op. cit., marginal note 10 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; Hoffmann-Riem, op. cit., marginal note 47 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; Frowein, op. cit. [1085-1086]; Ossenbühl, op. cit. [65 et seq.]; P. Schneider, op. cit. [264-265]).

These are covered by the guarantee contained in Article 8 of the Basic Law; provisions of law-governing assembly do not apply to them if compliance with such provisions would make it impossible to achieve the end pursued through a spontaneous event. Recognition of such demonstrations despite the failure to comply with such provisions can be justified by the fact that Article 8 of the Basic Law in principle guarantees the freedom of assembly "without prior notification or permission" in its paragraph 1, that this freedom may certainly restricted by statute in the case of assemblies held outdoors under paragraph 2, that such restrictions do not, however, completely set aside the guarantee contained in paragraph 1 for certain types of events and that this guarantee provides exception from compulsory registration under the conditions mentioned above.

This appraisal of spontaneous demonstrations is based on the fact that regulatory requirements pertaining to assemblies must be applied in the light of the fundamental right of freedom of assembly and if appropriate yield to that right. The fundamental right and not the Assembly Act guarantees the admissibility of assemblies and processions; the Assembly Act only provides for restrictions if any are necessary. It is therefore consistent with this that failure to comply with the compulsory registration requirement does not in itself automatically result in prohibition or dispersal of an event. To be sure, anyone who acts as an organizer or leader and "conducts" an assembly that is not registered is liable to prosecution (s. 26 of the Assembly Act). s. 15.2 of the Assembly Act otherwise stipulates only that the responsible authority "may" disperse outdoor assemblies and processions if they are not registered. The Federal Minister of the Interior also considers preventive prohibition a possible sanction if and to the extent that this represents a more lenient means than dispersal, which is explicitly mentioned in the law. Dispersal and prohibition are, however, in any case not legal duties of the responsible authority, but rather permissible courses of action that the authority may in view of the considerable importance of the freedom of assembly in general properly avail itself of only in the presence of further prerequisites for intervention; failure to register and the concomitant deficiency of information merely facilitate such intervention.

Since compulsory registration is not required without exception and non-compliance does not peremptorily result in dispersal and prohibition, then is it is not possible to discern any reason why the obligation to register, which is based on important considerations of public interest, could be considered disproportionate under normal conditions. Whether and to what extent special considerations exist in the case of mass demonstrations that would, much as in the case of spontaneous demonstrations, justify a different assessment, is discussed in another context (see III.2 below; pages 357 et seq. of the Official Collection [Amtliche Sammlung]).

b) The provision contained in s. 15 of the Assembly Act, according to which the responsible authority may require that certain conditions be satisfied to hold an assembly or ban or disperse an assembly "if at the time of issuance of the order circumstances indicate that the public safety or order is immediately threatened by holding the assembly or procession", also withstands constitutional review when interpreted in conformity with the constitution.

The complainants and the Federal Association of Citizens' Initiatives for Environmental Protection raise doubts as regards the imprecision of the prerequisites for intervention, i.e., "threat to public safety or order," which for them becomes all the more problematic since the decision in respect of intervention is left to the discretion of lower administrative authorities and the police responsible for enforcement. The content of the above terms has in the meantime, as the Federal Minister of the Interior correctly submits, been made sufficiently clear by police law (see, for example, Drews/Wacke/Vogel/Martens, Gefahrenabwehr, 8th ed, 1977, vol 2, pp. 117-118 and 130-131).

According to this law, the term "public safety" encompasses the protection of central legal interests such as the life, health, freedom, honour, property and assets of the individual and the integrity of the legal order and governmental institutions, the existence of a danger to public safety generally being assumed in the case of a threat of a punishable violation of these protected interests. "Public order" is construed as the entire body of unwritten rules that must be observed because in accordance with the respective prevailing social and ethical views they are considered to represent an indispensable prerequisite for orderly human coexistence within a specific area.

These definitions do not alone, however, guarantee application of the law in conformity with the Basic Law. For the purposes of assessment under constitutional law, two restrictions are important that are contained in the law itself and have for effect that bans and dispersal essentially may be considered only to protect fundamental legal interests, whereas mere danger to the public order will generally not suffice.

Prohibition or dispersal is a last resort that presupposes on the one hand that the more lenient means of requiring that certain conditions be met has been exhausted (also according to BVerwGE 64, 55). This is based on the principle of proportionality. However, it limits not only the discretionary choice of means, but also the decision making discretion of the responsible authorities. The freedom of assembly protected by the fundamental right is subordinate only when it follows from a balance of interests that takes into account the importance of this freedom that it is necessary to protect other equivalent legal interests. Accordingly, in no case can simply any given interest justify restriction of this freedom; others must generally tolerate the inconveniences that necessarily result from the mass of people involved in the exercise of this fundamental right and cannot be avoided without detriment to the purpose of the event. Bans on demonstrations merely for reasons having to do with traffic issues can be excluded all the more since it is as a rule possible to achieve simultaneous use of roads by demonstrators and flowing traffic by imposing conditions.

The powers of the authorities to intervene are also limited by the fact that demonstrations may be banned and dispersed only in the case of an "immediate threat" to public safety or public order. The immediacy requirement represents a stronger restriction as regards the prerequisites for intervention than those provided under general police law. In any given case, it is necessary to assess the dangers. To be sure, this always involves an estimate of probability, but the bases for the estimate can and must be revealed. Accordingly, the law stipulates that this must be based on "discernible circumstances," which means it must be based on circumstances, facts and other details; mere suspicion or conjecture cannot suffice. Taking into account the fundamental importance of the freedom of assembly, the authority may in particular if it issues a preventive ban not set the requirements for the assessment of danger too low, especially since the possibility of subsequent dispersal always remains available if the assessment should prove to be incorrect. It is otherwise left to the competent courts to initially determine what specific requirements are appropriate (see, for example, on the one hand Dietel/Gintzel, op. cit., marginal note 12 on s. 15 of the Assembly Act with reference to BVerwGE 45, 51 [61]; on the other hand Ott, op. cit., marginal note 5 on s. 15 of the Assembly Act and Werbke, NJW 1970, p. 1 [2]; similarly Bremen Higher Administrative Court (Oberverwaltungsgericht), DÖV 1972, p. 101 (102); Saarlouis Higher Administrative Court, DÖV 1973, p. 863 [864] and also the Report of the Committee on Legal Affairs on the Amendment [Bericht des Rechtsausschusses zur Gesetzesnovelle] 1978, Bundestag document 8/1845, p. 11).

They can hardly be prescribed by the Basic Law in isolation from concrete circumstances and may depend, for example, in the case of mass demonstrations upon the willingness of the organizers to cooperate during preparations and whether disruptions are feared only from outsiders or on the part of a small minority (see III.1. and 3.III below on this; pages 355 et seq. and 359-360 [of the Official Collection]).

All in all, s. 15 of the Assembly Act is in any case compatible with Article 8 of the Basic Law if it is interpreted and applied such that it can be guaranteed that bans and dispersal result only to protect equivalent legal interests in keeping with the principle of proportionality and only if an immediate threat to these legal interests can be inferred from the obvious circumstances.

III.

It is not possible to object on constitutional grounds if the provisions of law governing assembly discussed above are also applied to mass demonstrations. When they are applied, however, it is also necessary to take advantage of experience that has subsequently been gained and put to the proof in an effort to make it also possible to conduct such demonstrations peacefully.

1. On the basis of the reports on past experience obtained during the initial proceedings and the results of the Stuttgart Talks (see A.I.2. above; pages 319-320 [of the Official Collection]), various circumstances can contribute to the peaceful conduct of events such as the 1979 Gorleben Trek, the 1981 Bonn Peace Demonstration or the 1983 Southern German Human Chain. Apart from timely clarification of the legal situation, this also means that both sides must avoid provocations and incitement of aggression, that the organizers must exercise their influence on participants to encourage peaceful conduct and isolate perpetrators of violence, that the governmental authorities - if appropriate by making provision for areas with no police presence - remain discreetly in the background and avoid overreaction and in particular that the two sides establish contact on a timely basis so that they can get to know one another, exchange information and possibly even establish a basis for cooperation in a spirit of mutual trust that would also facilitate management of unforeseen conflict situations.

It is not necessary to determine whether an obligation to take this experience into account can already be inferred from the protective duty of the governmental authorities that in the opinion of the Trade Union of the Police derives from the basic constitutional decision embodied in Article 8 of the Basic Law, much as in the case of other fundamental rights of high standing guaranteed by the Basic Law and that it is intended to make it possible to conduct assemblies and processions and to protect the exercise of the fundamental right against disruption and disturbance by third parties. It is in any case necessary to draw upon recent constitutional case laws, according to which the fundamental rights not only influence the formulation of substantive law, but at the same time establish standards for the nature of the organizational and procedural means used to effect protection of fundamental rights as well as for application of existing procedural provisions in a manner conducive to protection of the fundamental rights (see the references BVerfGE 53, 30 [65-66 and 72-73]; from the period thereafter also BVerfGE 56, 216 [236] and 65, 76 [94]; 63, 131 [143]; 65, 1 [44, 49]).

There are also no objections to applying this case law to the freedom of assembly, especially since this fundamental right also contains significant implications in terms of law governing matters of a procedural and organizational nature; as a freedom, it embodies no statement as to the substantive form of assemblies and processions, but leaves this to the free self-determination of the organizers and is itself limited to organizational prerequisites for holding such assemblies and processions. The requirement that governmental authorities take as their model peaceful mass demonstrations held in the past and proceed in a manner favourable to demonstrations and not without adequate reason ignore positive experience reflects the effort to effect rights of freedom at the level of procedural law. A duty to not only consider such experience, but also to actually attempt to apply it can be justified on constitutional grounds by the fact that this is a more lenient means than intervention in the form of bans or dispersal. The more seriously governmental authorities support the peaceful conduct of mass demonstration in this manner, the more likely subsequent bans or dispersal are on the other hand to withstand review by the administrative courts if such efforts should fail.

The requirements may in the first place not be allowed to become so broad at the level of procedural law mentioned above as to fundamentally change the nature of the responsibility of the police for averting danger or, for example, make the use of flexible deployment strategies impossible. Likewise, and even more so, neither the organizers of mass demonstration nor the participants may be required to meet conditions that would detract from the character of demonstrations as contributions to the formation of political opinion and will that are in principle state-free, unregulated or dilute the organizers' right to freely determine the nature and content of demonstrations. This is not the case when organizers and participants are simply required to refrain from unruly conduct and keep the impairment of the interests of others to a minimum. This duty follows directly from the very guarantee of the fundamental right and harmonization of this right with the fundamental rights of others. Further reaching obligations in terms of procedural law could possibly be justified since the exercise of this fundamental right affects the greater community and the originators share responsibility for the consequences of mass demonstrations. It must remain the affair of the legislature to precisely define such obligations within the context and limits of its powers to restrict fundamental rights by enactment of a specific law, taking into account assessment of the above experience at the level of ordinary law. Even in the absence of such precise definition by the legislature, both the organizers of demonstrations and participants would do well to take into account at their own initiative the recommendations for mass demonstration that can be inferred from proven experience insofar as possible. As regards administrative practice and the rulings of the courts, such willingness must in any case be honoured for constitutional reasons; for the more the organizers are prepared to take confidence building measures on their own or even cooperate in a manner conducive to the demonstration when a mass demonstration is registered, the higher the bar becomes to governmental intervention on the grounds of a threat to public safety and order.

2. Despite the opinion to the contrary of the Federal Association of Citizens' Initiatives for Environmental Protection, the Basic Law does not require that mass demonstrations be exempted from compulsory registration pursuant to s. 14 of the Assembly Act in much the same way as spontaneous demonstrations are.

Due to the organizational stratification of sponsorship of large scale events, it would, however, seem that an interpretation of s. 14 in conjunction with s. 15.2 of the Assembly Act that allows for the eventuality that individual groups or individuals may not feel able to assume general responsibility for registration or organization would be compatible with the Basic Law. Even if responsibility for registration and organization has been assigned only to a limited extent and the willingness to exhibit a capacity for dialogue and accept responsibility is present only to a limited degree, this may not be ignored when assessing possible sanctions for failure to register. The only result of such absence of a registrant with overall responsibility is that the threshold for intervention by the responsible authorities is lower in the case of disruptions - much as in the case of spontaneous demonstrations - if the authority has itself done everything within its power to make it possible to conduct a peacefully organized demonstration by fulfilling its procedural duties, for example, by offering to cooperate in a spirit of fairness.

3. In particular in the case of mass demonstrations, the important question, which was also of importance in the initial proceedings, frequently arises as to whether and under what conditions public disturbances caused by individuals or a minority can justify a ban on a demonstration or its dispersal due to an immediate threat to public safety and order pursuant to s. 15 of the Assembly Act.

a) The Basic Law guarantees only the "right to assemble peacefully and unarmed." The requirement of peacefulness, which was already contained in the St. Paul's Church Constitution as well as in the Weimar Constitution, clarifies something that already follows from the legal nature of the freedom of assembly when it is understood as a means of conducting intellectual debate and exercising influence on the process of formation of political will (see also Federal Court of Justice [Bundesgerichtshof - BGH] NJW 1972, p. 1571 [1573]).

   The case involved in the initial proceedings, which did result in violence, provides no occasion for drawing a more precise line between acceptable forms of influence and unruly conduct. A participant is in any case unruly if that person commits an act of violence against persons or property. A legal order that follow the departure from medieval government by force has given the state a monopoly on the exercise of force, not least of all in the interest of weaker minorities, must strictly insist upon avoidance of such violence. That is also an essential prerequisite for the guarantee of the freedom of assembly as a means of active participation in the political process and - as the experience of the battles in the streets during the Weimar Republic showed - for a free democracy since the avoidance of violence involves measures that limit freedom. Peaceful conduct can be expected of demonstrators all the more so since they can only gain from this, whereas they will in the end inevitably be subdued in the case of violent confrontations with the forces of government and at the same time obscure the goals they are pursuing.

b) The issuance of an order prohibiting assembly also presents no special problems as regards constitutional issues in the case of mass demonstrations if it can be expected with a high degree of probability that the organizer and the organizer's followers are planning to commit violence or will at least tolerate such conduct on the part of others. Since they are not peaceful, such demonstrations are not even covered by the guarantee contained in Article 8 of the Basic Law in the first place; dispersal or a ban cannot therefore be construed as a violation of this fundamental right. The legal situation seems clear if, conversely, the organizer and the organizer's followers conduct themselves peaceably and disruptions are caused only by outsiders (counter demonstrations, disruptive groups). The scholarly literature correctly requires in such cases that measures taken by the authorities be directed primarily against those causing disturbances and that steps be taken against an assembly as a whole only under special circumstances that constitute a police emergency (Hoffmann-Riem, op. cit., marginal notes 23 and 53 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; Dietel/Gintzel, op. cit., marginal note 14 on s. 15 of the Assembly Act; see v. Münch, op. cit., marginal note 39 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; Drosdzol, Grundprobleme des Demonstrationsrechts, JuS 1983, p. 409 [414]; Frowein, op. cit. [1084]).

Unless collective disturbances are to be feared, i.e., if it is therefore not expected that a demonstration will as a whole turn violent or disruptive (see s. 13.1 no. 2 of the Assembly Act) or that the organizer and the organizer's followers will strive for (see s. 5 no. 3 of the Assembly Act) or at least tolerate such a turn of events, the protection of the freedom of assembly of peaceful participants that the Basic Law guarantees every citizen must then be preserved even if other individual demonstrators or a minority do commit disturbances (see v. Münch, op. cit., marginal note 18 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; Herzog, op. cit., marginal notes 59 and 60, 89 and 90 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; Hoffmann-Riem, op. cit., marginal note 23 on Article 8 of the Basic Law; Blanke/Sterzel, op. cit. [76]; Schwäble, op. cit., pp. 229 and 234; Schmidt-Bleibtreu/Klein, GG, 6th ed., 1983, marginal note 4 on Article 8).

Were the disruptive conduct of individuals be allowed to deprive the entire event and not only the perpetrators of the protection of fundamental rights, this would enable such individuals to "co-opt" demonstrations and make them illegal against the will of the other participants (also previously Saarlouis Higher Administrative Court, DÖV 1973, p. 863 [864-865]); in practice, any mass demonstration could then be banned since it is virtually always possible to produce "knowledge" of disruptive intentions on the part of some of the participants.

The fact that the protection offered by Article 8 of the Basic Law therefore remains in effect, must affect the provisions of law that restrict the fundamental rights (On measures involving criminal law and liability in the case of partially unpeaceful demonstrations see BGHSt 32, 165 [169]; Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen - BGHZ] 89, 383 [395]; see also the decision of the European Commission for Human Rights, EuGRZ 1981, p. 216 [217]).

The guarantee of fundamental rights, which may be restricted by enactment of a specific law, also does not prevent the authorities from ordering that measures, which may go so far as to include a ban, be taken against an entire demonstration on the basis of s. 15 of the Assembly Act to protect public safety. However, the preferred alternative is to consider dispersal at a later point in time, which does not from the outset deprive peaceful participants of an opportunity to exercise a fundamental right and leaves it primarily up to the organizer to isolate unruly participants. A preventive ban on an entire event due to fears of excesses by a violence prone minority is on the other hand - which is dictated by a duty to preserve optimal freedom of assembly with the appropriate resultant requirements of procedural law - permissible only under strict conditions and under application of s. 15 of the Assembly Act in compliance with the Basic Law. These include a high degree of probability of danger (see Saarlouis Higher Administrative Court, DÖV 1973, p. 863 [864]; Bavarian Administrative Court [Bayerischer Verwaltungsgerichtshof - BayVGH], DÖV 1979, p. 569 [570]; similarly Schwäble, op. cit., p. 229 and Drosdzol, op. cit. [415]) and previous exhaustion of all reasonably applicable means that would permit exercise of fundamental rights by peaceful demonstrators (e.g., through restriction of the ban to a specific physical area). In particular, a ban on an entire demonstration is a last resort that follows from the assumption that the more lenient expedient of cooperation with peaceful demonstrators to avoid any danger has failed or that such cooperation was impossible for reasons the demonstrators were responsible for. In the event a general preventive ban on a demonstration is being considered due to specific circumstances, it would seem appropriate in the case of mass demonstrations with participants who for the most part have peaceful intentions that such an unusual and severe measure be announced in advance as a rule, with a period set for the purposes of discussion of the feared dangers and appropriate counter measures.

IX. Article 9 of the Basic Law Freedom of Association/Collective Bargaining/Industrial Action

1. Short-Work Benefits (s. 116 of the Employment Protection Act), BVerfGE 92, 365

Explanatory Annotation

The freedom of association as protected in Article 9 of the Basic Law has two constitutive elements. The first is the general freedom of association protected in Article 9.1 for German citizens, i.e. the freedom to form and act through commercial and non-commercial associations. Article 9.2 of the Basic Law provides a constitutional basis to prohibit and dissolve such associations if they pursue criminal activities or aim at the abolition of the constitutional order.[105]

The second element is the special right spelled out in Article 9.3 of the Basic Law to form associations to safeguard and improve working and living conditions, namely trade unions and the complementing employers' associations. Not only does Article 9.3 of the Basic Law guarantee the right to form and act through trade unions and employers' associations, it also reserves to these associations the right to negotiate enterprise bargaining agreements. The government's role in setting the working conditions is only a reduced one and limited to working conditions applicable across all sectors of the economy. In principle, the government has no power to regulate matters typically contained in enterprise bargaining agreements. Legislation demanding a wage freeze or increase, for example, would be unconstitutional.[106]

In the case at issue the Constitutional Court upheld a legislative amendment, which made it harder for employees indirectly affected by a strike to be paid unemployment or so-called 'short-hour' benefits by the Federal Employment Agency. The issue had arisen in the wake of a new strike strategy by some German unions by which strikes were strategically targeted at certain vulnerable points in the supply chain thus crippling many businesses with relatively minimal strike action. Non-striking employees indirectly affected by this strategy by being laid-off or put on shorter hours for lack of supplies would then apply for unemployment benefits. The new legislation curtailed access to these benefits arguing that the Federal Employment Agency is bound by an obligation of neutrality in such employment disputes and must not indirectly finance the strike action of trade unions. The Court regarded the reasoning for the new legislation as within the margin of appreciation of the legislator because it could not be shown that the tougher access rules for social benefits could weaken the trade unions in their relationship with the employers' associations in such a way as to endanger the balance of power between these two sides and thus violate the guaranteed right of these associations to negotiate enterprise bargaining agreements.

105 Article 9.2 of the Basic Law does not apply to political parties for which Article 21.2 contains a special provision. Whether Article 9.2 applies to religious associations is controversial. The Statute on Associations (Vereinsgesetz) exempted religious associations from its scope until 2001. This privilege was legislated out of the statute in the wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. However, regular statutory law does not regulate the application of the constitutional norms to certain constellations. Much speaks for the view that Article 4, the freedom of religion, is a special clause for religious associations and whereas this does not mean that religious associations cannot be controlled when acting criminally, it could mean that such associations, if indeed religious, could not be prohibited for lack of a legal basis specifying the details for a prohibition.

Translation of the Short-Work Benefits Judgment, s. 116 of the Employment Promotion Act (Arbeitsförderungsgesetz - AFG) - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 92, 365*

Headnotes:

1. S. 116.3, sentence 1 of the Employment Promotion Act is compatible with the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG). If this provision of law results in a structural imbalance between parties to a collective bargaining agreement and such imbalance no longer permits equitable negotiation of employment and economic conditions and cannot be rectified on the basis of case law, the legislature must take measures to preserve collective bargaining autonomy.

2. The fundamental right to freedom of association must be regulated by the legal system insofar as relationships between parties with conflicting interests are involved. The legislature enjoys broad operating latitude in this context. In judging whether parity between the parties to a collective bargaining agreement has been impaired and what ramifications a provision of law has on the balance of forces, the legislature enjoys the prerogative of assessment.

Judgment of the First Senate of 4 July 1995 on the basis of the oral hearing of 4 April 1995 - 1 BvF 2/86 and 1, 2, 3 and 4/87 and 1 BvR 1421/86 -

Facts:

The petitions for judicial review and a constitutional complaint submit provisions of law for review by the Federal Constitutional Court that govern the conditions under which income replacement benefits (regularly short-work benefits) due to industrial actions in connection with a regionally limited labour dispute are paid to employees in the same industry in other collective bargaining regions who are temporarily unemployed.

S. 116.3 of the Employment Promotion Act stipulates that these benefits are to be suspended if demands of the same scope and nature are asserted for such employees and the outcome of the labour dispute will in all probability be adopted in their region ("principle of participatory involvement"). This version of s. 116 of the Employment Promotion Act together with complementary procedural rules, including the creation of a "neutrality committee", stem from the Act amending the Employment Promotion Act of 15 May 1986 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I, p. 740) - the Neutrality Act. The Neutrality Act was occasioned by the fact that the legislature felt that the previous legal situation, which allowed for uninterrupted payment of short-work benefits in regions not involved in disputes, represented a violation of the neutrality of the Federal Labour Office (Bundesanstalt für Arbeit - BfA) in the case of labour disputes.

In response to the abstract judicial review proceedings initiated by several Land governments and members of parliament belonging to the SPD fraction in the German Bundestag, the Federal Constitutional Court found that the provision under challenge was compatible with the Basic Law for the reasons set forth in its decision The Federal Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint filed by IG Metall [trade union] directly against s. 116 of the Employment Promotion Act.

C.

The petitions for judicial review and the constitutional complaint are unfounded. The provision submitted for review does not in any case at the present time violate the freedom of association of the complainant and is otherwise also compatible with the Basic Law; this applies, however, to a certain extent only in the case of its interpretation in conformity with the Basic Law.

I.

S. 116.3 sentence 1 no. 2 of the Employment Promotion Act as amended by the Neutrality Act is not in violation of Article 9.3 of the Basic Law. The provision does to be sure restrict the freedom of association of trade unions. However, it does respect the constitutional limits to the regulatory power of the legislature.

1. a) The fundamental right under Article 9.3 of the Basic Law is primarily a freedom. It guarantees individuals the freedom to form associations for the purposes of the improvement of working and economic conditions and for the collective pursuit of this end. The parties involved must in principle be able to do so in freedom from the influence of government, independently and as they see fit. However, the right of associations to pursue themselves the ends mentioned in Article 9.3 of the Basic Law, through activities that derive from the specific nature of such associations is also protected (see BVerfGE 50, 290 [367] with further references). In principle, Article 9.3 of the Basic Law leaves the choice of the means that associations consider appropriate for achieving these ends to the associations themselves. The fundamental rights also protect industrial actions taken for the purposes of concluding collective bargaining agreements as activities of such associations. They are subsumed under freedom of association as to the extent that they are necessary to ensure functional collective bargaining autonomy (see BVerfGE 84, 212 [224-225]).

   This also includes strikes (see BVerfGE 88, 103 [114]).

   b) The fundamental right to freedom of association must be regulated by the legal system insofar as relationships between parties with conflicting interests are involved. Both parties to a collective bargaining agreement enjoy equal protection under Article 9.3 of the Basic Law although they exercise this right in opposition to one another. They also enjoy protection against governmental influence if they employ confrontational means to resolve their conflicting differences that have a significant effect on their opponents and the general public. This protection necessitates rules for coordination to guarantee that their respective fundamental rights can coexist despite their opposition. The possible use of confrontational means presupposes a general legal framework to ensure that the intent and purpose of this freedom and its integration into the constitutional order are preserved[107].

The legislature enjoys broad operating latitude as regards the creation of this framework. The Basic Law does not stipulate how the legislature must define the opposing positions under the fundamental right in detail. It also does not require optimization of the conditions for confrontation. It is in principle left to the parties to a collective bargaining agreement themselves to adapt the confrontational means they use as circumstances change in order to maintain equality with the opposing side and achieve equitable collective bargaining agreements. The legislature is on the other hand also not prevented from modifying the overall framework for labour disputes either for reasons having to do with public interest or to restore parity (see BVerfGE 84, 212 [228-229]).

c) The limits to the operating latitude of the legislature are defined by the objective content of Article 9.3 of the Basic Law. Collective bargaining autonomy must be preserved as an area in which the parties to a collective bargaining agreement can in principle regulate their affairs on their own and without governmental influence (see BVerfGE 50, 290 [367]). Its functional viability may not be compromised. Associations must be able to achieve their constitutionally recognized purpose, which is to defend and improve the working and economic conditions of their members, in particular by concluding collective agreements. The system of collective bargaining agreements is designed to compensate for the structural disadvantage of individual employees in the context of concluding employment contracts through collective action, thereby permitting the negotiation of wages and working conditions to be fairly balanced. Collective bargaining autonomy is as a result functionally viable only as long as an approximate balance of forces - i.e., parity - exists between the parties to a collective bargaining agreement (see BVerfGE 84, 212 [229]).

A provision of law is therefore in any case incompatible with Article 9.3 of the Basic Law if the ability of one of the parties to a collective bargaining agreement to negotiate, which includes the ability to effectively conduct a labour dispute, is no longer given and its activities as an association are restricted to a greater extent than would be necessary to balance the opposing positions under the fundamental right (see BVerfGE 84, 212 [228-229]).

Concrete standards for assessing the balance of forces of the parties to a collective bargaining agreement cannot be inferred from Article 9.3 of the Basic Law. The details are the subject of strong disagreement in the scholarly literature on labour law. In its case law on labour disputes, the Federal Labour Court (Bundesarbeitsgericht - BAG) takes into account the effect the negotiating strength of the opposing parties can have in the context of the negotiation of collective bargaining agreements and how it can be influenced by confrontational means (Federal Labour Court [Bundesarbeitsgericht - BAG], Working Paper no. 64 on Article 9 of the Basic Law - labour disputes).

There are good reasons for this perspective. It gives the competent courts an appropriate standard for the review of disputed industrial actions against the principle of proportionality. There can be no reservations in this regard on constitutional grounds (BVerfGE 84, 212 [229 et seq.]).The legislature is, however, not bound to this perspective when regulating the freedom of association. It may also establish other rules to prevent one of the parties to a collective bargaining agreement from gaining a disproportionate advantage in collective bargaining negotiations. Its approach is not unconstitutional unless it is from the outset not suitable for achieving this end.

The legislature is, however, under no obligation to compensate for any disparity that is not of a structural nature, but based instead on the internal weaknesses of an association. The degree of organization of an association, its ability to attract and mobilize its members and similar factors lie outside the purview of responsibility of the legislature. The legislature is not bound to provide weak associations with the ability to assert their positions in the context of collective bargaining negotiations.

d) The answer to the question as to whether the provision deprives trade unions of the ability to carry out effective industrial actions is left to the discretionary judgment of the legislature. The adversarial strength of an association of employees in a dispute is dependent upon myriad factors that can scarcely be apprehended individually and have effects that are difficult to assess. The possibilities available to a trade union for adapting to changes in circumstances through the use of special means of conducting a dispute also cannot be readily discerned. In such a situation, the legislature bears the political responsibility for accurate recognition and assessment of the relevant factors. The Federal Constitutional Court may not apply its own assessment in place of that of the legislature. A statute does not become unconstitutional unless it becomes clearly evident that a false assessment has been made or the measure under challenge was from the outset such as to disturb an existing balance of forces or reinforce an imbalance.

e) An assessment of a provision of law pertaining to labour disputes that the legislature initially assumes to be unobjectionable may retrospectively prove to be inaccurate. Assumptions that are originally plausible may be refuted by subsequent developments; well-founded expectations as regards complex causal relationships may be disappointed. For example, protracted interference with the functional viability of collective bargaining autonomy may set in despite the fact that the original situation was in conformity with the constitution. Such developments must be corrected insofar as it becomes evident that structural imbalances have occurred that no longer permit equitable negotiation of working and economic conditions, and these cannot be compensated within the framework established by case law. The legislature then has a duty to take measures to protect freedom of association (see BVerfGE 25, 1 [13]; 49, 89 [130]; 50, 290 [335]).

2. Measured against these standards, the statute under challenge withstands constitutional scrutiny.

a) The regulatory principle chosen by the legislature is compatible with Article 9.3 of the Basic Law.

The legislature adopted the statute because it felt that payment of short-work benefits would represent interference in labour disputes to the advantage of the trade unions, thereby unjustifiably contributing to its position of strength; it was thought that payment of short-work benefits to employees outside the region affected by the dispute violated the neutrality of the Federal Labour Office if these employees were likely to benefit from the desired outcome of the labour dispute. The revised statute is based on the principle that those employees who are not themselves involved in a labour dispute should bear the risk of any loss of income in the case of such a dispute if they have (nearly) the same interest in a successful outcome as the striking employees themselves since they are also likely to benefit from that success. This cannot occasion any reservations on constitutional grounds. Participatory involvement is an obvious criterion for shifting the risk of lost income from the unemployment insurance system to employees whose interests coincide with those of their colleagues who are directly involved in a labour dispute. It is natural to take this coincidence of interests as the basis for the suspension of short-work benefits.

b) In actual fact, the legislature proceeded from the assumption that it would be easily possible for the complainant to cause considerable disruption of production in different regions through a strike in a single region due to the high level of integration of production in the metalworking industry. This assumption is not disputed by the complainant and is also confirmed by the labour dispute of the year 1984. When a dispute is conducted in this manner, strong pressure is exerted on the employer's side. The efforts made by the employers affected by the remote effects and their regional organizations to persuade the employers directly affected by the dispute and their regional organizations to make compromises will vary as a function of the economic burden they must bear due to production stoppages. The assumption to the effect that internal pressure from employees "locked out in the cold" upon the trade union is lessened by the payment of short-work benefits is also sufficiently plausible.

c) There can be no objection to the evaluative assessment of the legislature to the effect that a shift in parity resulted from the construction of the previous version of s. 116 of the Employment Promotion Act that stemmed from the case law of the social courts as based on the case law of the labour courts regarding the risk of lost income. The legislature makes such evaluations of complex issues as part of its political responsibility for safeguarding the interests of the public.

No sufficient indications exist to the effect that the functional viability of collective bargaining autonomy is impaired by the statute under review in such as way as to justify the constitutional reservations of the complainant and the petitioners.

aa) Such impairment would manifest itself most probably in its effect on the ability of the complainant to conduct a dispute, which as is generally acknowledged is most affected by the statute. The complainant has long been conducting collective bargaining disputes in various regions and is according to it submissions, which have not been contradicted in this regard, dependent upon being able to conduct disputes in such a manner. Due to the high degree of integration in the metalworking industry, disruption of production outside the region in which industrial actions are carried out is especially frequent.

It has become clear, however, that the complainant is able to avoid suspension of payment of short-work benefits in other regions by asserting principal demands in those regions that differ significantly from those at issue in the region involved in the labour dispute. The complainant's assertion to the effect that it is hardly possible to advance demands in the various collective bargaining regions that differ significantly as regards wages and working hours within an area that is on the whole as economically homogeneous as the Federal Republic of Germany is clearly documented by the catalogue of demands presented by the complainant.

Finally, it is also evident that the revised statute restricts the complainant's ability to employ confrontational means. This was illustrated in particular by the collective bargaining dispute in Bavaria in the year 1994/95. The complainant selectively struck enterprises that produce end-user products and are therefore integrated to a relatively limited extent with other enterprises at the technical level. Much was spoken in favour of the fact - and this is also not called into question by the employers - that the complainant was forced to adopt this tactic in order to avoid the consequences of the statute and the internal pressure that would otherwise have been expected from the other regions. It is obvious that employees cannot hold out without any support in the case of a lengthier labour dispute since their livelihood depends upon a regular income. It is also obvious that it would represent a significant burden for the complainant to have to provide strike benefits for all indirectly affected members throughout Germany.

Overall, it is therefore not possible to ignore the fact that the statute under challenge restricts the ability of the complainant to conduct disputes. The complainant is not only prevented from employing a coercive strategy that is intended to selectively provoke production stoppages in other regions in order to exert pressure on the employer side in those regions. Indeed, the opposite obtains and the complainant must see to it that the ramifications of a labour dispute are restricted to the region involved in the dispute since employees in other regions would bear the full brunt of the remote effects, as they could not survive very long without short-work benefits. In that regard, the effect of the statute goes beyond the declared goal, which is to prevent what are referred to as strikes by proxy: The trade union is also subject to significant restrictions as regards industrial actions if it attempts to limit the actions to the territory involved in the labour dispute. For practical purposes, it no longer can strike enterprises whose production is integrated with that of other enterprises in the same industry in other collective bargaining regions.

bb) Despite this restriction of the ability of the complainant to conduct disputes, it is not (yet) possible to ascertain unconstitutional interference with the functional viability of collective bargaining autonomy.

cc) On the other hand, this labour dispute has also revealed further risks as regards the functional viability of collective bargaining autonomy. Had it come to lock outs by the employer side, unemployment in other regions could have taken on a dimension that would have significantly weakened the complainant's coercive power. The complainant submits in that regard that this would have been virtually inevitable since a lockout would have been possible only in the case of those enterprises that were not struck by the complainant, which are to a great extent integrated with enterprises in the metalworking industry in other regions. In any case, the employers would themselves have had the possibility to deliberately provoke remote effects in other regions through lockouts by selected enterprises. Assuming that it would in this case also have resulted in suspension of short-work benefits for the respective employees, the statute could in fact have resulted in disruption of parity if employers had conducted the dispute in such a manner.

However, these risks also do not (yet) suffice to question the constitutionality of the statute under challenge. On the one hand, it is not at present possible to ascertain whether the employers can actually employ a lockout tactic to deliberately achieve remote effects in a labour dispute in such a manner as to result in structural imbalance between the parties to a collective bargaining agreement. They too expose themselves to internal pressure if they provoke production stoppages in other regions to any significant extent. This could overtax the solidarity among their members, which is already weak since they compete against one another. In addition, the legal issues raised by such conduct of a labour dispute have not been clarified. The representative of Gesamtmetall [umbrella association of regional employers' associations in the German metal and electrical industry] and the Federal Labour Minister (Bundesarbeitsminister) have referred in this regard to the case law on labour disputes of the Federal Labour Court with respect to proportionality in the case of defensive lockouts. The Federal Labour Court has up to now dealt exclusively with lockout orders in this context and in so doing not taken into account employees that are indirectly affected (see Federal Labour Court, Working Paper no. 64 and 84 on Article 9 of the Basic Law - labour disputes). However, this case law relates to labour disputes that were still carried out under the former version of s. 116 of the Employment Promotion Act. It is evident that the Federal Labour Court proceeded at the time on the basis of the assumption to the effect that short-work benefits would regularly be paid in those regions not involved in the dispute. Despite the Court's original assumptions to the effect that defensive lock outs may not result in disproportionate restriction of the adversarial strength of employees, lockouts may, however, result in effective limitation of the indirect effects of such industrial actions under the revised statute. In addition, the Federal Social Court also had no opportunity to deal with application of s. 116.3 of the Employment Promotion Act in the case of employees who were put out of work due to the remote effects of lockouts. The wording of the statute under challenge does not make any distinction between the indirect effects of strikes on the one hand and lockouts on the other hand, but a construction to the effect that such a distinction exists cannot be excluded. It could be required to preserve the functional viability of collective bargaining autonomy if a disproportionate structural advantage of employers would otherwise result in the case of labour disputes.

Accordingly, it is on the whole both factually and legally uncertain whether the statute under challenge will result in such an imbalance in the adversarial strength of the parties to collective bargaining agreements in future labour disputes, as to make negotiations on an approximately equal basis no longer possible. If this should occur, the legislature would be required to take appropriate measures to preserve collective bargaining autonomy. As long as this does not happen, it is the affair of the courts to construe and apply the applicable rules in the light of Article 9.3 of the Basic Law.

II.

Based on the reasoning that follows, s. 116.3 sentence 2 second alternative of the Employment Promotion Act, which stipulates that a demand is also considered to have been asserted if it can be viewed as having been adopted on the basis of the conduct of a party to a collective bargaining agreement in connection with the intended conclusion of a collective bargaining agreement, is also compatible with Article 9.3 of the Basic Law.

1. Freedom of association also protects self-determination of associations as regards their own organization, their decision making procedures and their conduct of affairs (BVerfGE 50, 290 [373-374]). The government must make available appropriate legal forms to associations that guarantee adequate possibilities for legal action in order to guarantee this protection. This applies as regards both their internal structures as well as their ability to act externally. In addition, the government may impose only such restrictions on the right of association to self-determination as may be required to protect other fundamental rights or constitutionally protected legal interests.

2. The statute does not encroach on the right to self-determination when its purpose is to prohibit abusive suppression of a demand within the meaning of s. 116.3 sentence 1 of the Employment Promotion Act. Abusive conduct does not merit protection.

A construction of s. 116.3 sentence 2 of the Employment Promotion Act that goes any further would on the other hand encroach on the right to self-determination of associations in a manner that would be unconstitutional.

III.

The revised provision contained in s. 116.3 sentence 1 of the Employment Promotion Act is not in violation of Article 14.1 of the Basic Law. Even if it did encroach on protected property rights, encroachment would be justified.

1. The right to property guaranteed under Article 14.1 of the Basic Law also includes rights to social security benefits that by virtue of their nature as exclusive rights inure to the holders for their private use; these rights enjoy the protection afforded to property if they derive from not insignificant contributions of the insured and serve to secure their livelihood (see BVerfGE 53, 257 [289 et seq.]; 72, 9 [18-19]; 74, 203 [213]).This includes rights to unemployment compensation in any case if the employee through payment of contributions during the legal vesting period has fully earned the benefits (BVerfGE 72, 9 [18-19]).

There is some question as to whether any further rights under unemployment insurance fall into the guaranteed area of protection of property and this has not yet been clarified in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court. It is in particular doubtful whether short-work benefits, which are primarily at issue as regards the area of application of s. 116.3 sentence 1 of the Employment Promotion Act, inure to the insured for their private use. They are also based on contributions of the insured and serve to secure their livelihood in the event of loss of wages due to short-work hours. Unlike in the case of unemployment compensation, however, it is not necessary to await the end of a vesting period. In addition, payment of short-work benefits is also intended primarily to enable enterprises affected by short-work hours to retain experienced employees. The right to short-work benefits does not therefore automatically apply in the case of foreseeable short-term unemployment. In fact, it is contingent upon announcement of suspension of work that cannot be made by the employee, but only by employers or representatives of employees (s. 72.1 of the Employment Promotion Act). Although financed by contributions, short-work benefits represent solidarity based compensation that benefits both employers and employees.

2. The question as to the extent to which rights to short-work benefits may nevertheless be considered protected property rights need not be conclusively decided here. Even if that is assumed to be the case, the statute under challenge does not encroach upon these rights in a manner that is unconstitutional.

Whether the Act worsens the previous legal situation at the expense of the insured and therefore possibly encroaches upon their protected interest in insurance benefits or only clarifies that which was already intended to be achieved by the version of the law from 1969 also need not be decided. For the reduction in insurance benefits asserted by the petitioners is justified by the end pursued by the legislature.

S. 116.3 sentence 1 of the Employment Promotion Act is intended to ensure the neutrality of the Federal Labour Office in labour disputes. This is a legitimate goal. There can be no objection on constitutional grounds to the actual assumptions underlying the concern of the legislature to the effect that this neutrality would no longer be guaranteed if short-work benefits were to be paid. Here too, reference may be had to the comments on Article 9.3 of the Basic Law.

The statute is also suitable for guaranteeing the neutrality of the Federal Office in the case of labour disputes with remote effects. The notion of participatory involvement permits categorization of recipients of benefits on the basis of criteria designed to achieve this purpose. No equally effective means can be ascertained that encroaches less extensively upon the rights of employees to insurance benefits.

The encroachment would also not be disproportionate in the narrower sense. On the one hand, the right that would be encroached upon is afforded the insured for their private use at most to a very limited extent. In addition, the effect of the statute is in practice to motivate trade unions - and possibly also employers - to proceed in such a manner as to avoid short-work hours in other regions in the case of labour disputes. Moreover, the rights of only those employees who can be expected to share in the benefits from the successful outcome of a labour dispute would be encroached upon.

On the other hand, the guarantee of the neutrality of the Federal Labour Office is an important consideration to which the legislature had the right to afford precedence over these rights.

IV.

The statute does not violate the general equality provision (Article 3.1 of the Basic Law). In the case of work stoppages due to strikes, it does to be sure result in unequal treatment of employees in the same industry in regions that are not involved in the dispute as compared with employees in other industries. However, this unequal treatment is objectively justified.

1. Depending on the area of regulation and the distinguishing characteristics involved, the constraints imposed upon the legislature by the general principle of equality vary, ranging from mere prohibition of arbitrariness to strict compliance with the requirements of proportionality. The variance in the scope of operating latitude of the legislature is reflected in the gradation of the intensity of control in the case of constitutional review (see BVerfGE 88, 87 [96 et seq.]). Accordingly, a relatively stringent standard applies here. The statute under challenge results in significant unequal treatment of classes of persons whose members cannot in fact avoid the unequal legal consequences.

2. The restriction of the suspension statute to employees of the same industry is accordingly appropriate.

"Prohibition of Associations"

Explanatory Annotation

Article 9.1 and 9.2 of the Basic Law deal with the freedom of association, i.e., the freedom of people to organize themselves to pursue self-defined purposes.[108] The freedom of association is also reflected in the Basic Law in two other, more special guises. Article 9.3 of the Basic Law deals with the freedom to form "coalitions", i.e., to engage in collective bargaining (see below in this chapter). Article 21 of the Basic Law deals specifically with political parties as associations that have a particular responsibility in the democratic process of the Federal Republic. One of the issues for both general associations and political parties is the question of whether the state can interfere with such associations and even prohibited and dissolve them if they are found to pursue objectives considered to be unconstitutional. Article 9.2 of the Basic Law and Article 21.2 affirm that this is possible, albeit with slightly different criteria. These criteria are strict in both cases but even stricter for political parties. The joined cases reproduced here concern the prohibition of three quite diverse associations. The first one concerned the prohibition of an organization operating as the "International Humanitarian Aid Organisation", the second one pertained to an "Organisation Supporting Domestic Political Prisoners and Their Families", the third one concerned the prohibition of a Frankfurt Chapter of the Hells Angels bikie club.

Article 9.1 is an example of a right guaranteed by the Basic Law only for German citizens. Non-citizens are not protected by this norm and could only take constitutional recourse to Article 2.1 as a subsidiary "catch-all" right. However, the freedom of association is also governed by the Statute Governing Public Associations[109], and this statute does not limit the freedom of association to just citizens. Non-citizens also enjoy the freedom of association but largely and primarily as a statutory right. Citizens have the additional protection of the Basic Law, which could defend against statutory amendments.

The language of Article 9.2 of the Basic Law is somewhat misleading as it implies that such unconstitutional associations are prohibited ipso jure, quasi automatically.[110] That is, however, not the case. Prohibition requires an administrative act which is governed by § 3 (and subsequent sections) of the Association Statute and which picks up on the reasons for prohibition specified in Article 9.2 of the Basic Law, which allows for the prohibition of associations if they

"contravene the criminal laws", or "are directed against the constitutional order" or "the concept of international understanding".[111] In contrast to the political parties, the prohibition of associations is not the prerogative of the Constitutional Court.[112] However, the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to hear constitutional complaints if the relevant authorities issue such a declaration and the case reproduced here triggered the supervising powers of the Court in this manner. The Constitutional Court takes great care in interpreting and explaining these criteria.[113]

Translation of the "Prohibition of Associations" Decision, BVerfG, 13.7.2018, 1 BvR 1474/12, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20180713_1bvr147412en.html

Headnotes:

1. Article 9(1) of the Basic Law protects the formation and the existence of associations. Article 9(2) of the Basic Law, as a manifestation of a pluralist and at the same time militant constitutional democracy, sets a limit to freedom of association.

2. Any interference with freedom of association must comply with the principle of proportionality. When the requirements for a prohibition under Article 9(2) of the Basic Law are met, the association must be prohibited; however, if there are measures available that are less restrictive but equally effective for protecting the legal interests specified in Article 9(2) of the Basic Law, these take precedence.

3. The power to prohibit an association under Article 9(2) of the Basic Law must be interpreted strictly.

    a. An association meets the requirements for a prohibition under Article 9(2) first alternative of the Basic Law when its apparent aim or its activity is, in essence, to provoke, encourage or enable its members or third parties to commit criminal offences or to facilitate them by supporting or by recognisably identifying with criminal actions.

    b. An association meets the requirements for a prohibition under Article 9(2) second alternative of the Basic Law when it opposes the constitutional order by openly taking an actively belligerent stance against the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

    c. An association meets the requirements for a prohibition under Article 9(2) third alternative of the Basic Law when it actively advocates and promotes violence or similarly serious actions violating international law, such as terrorism in international relations or among parts of the population. This may also be the case when an association supports third parties, where this support is objectively capable of significantly, severely, and deeply compromising international understanding, and where the association is aware of this fact and at least approves of it. However, in this respect, prohibitions of associations may not prevent every form of humanitarian aid in crisis areas merely because this might indirectly promote terrorism.

4. To the extent that the prohibition of an association pursuant to Article 9(2) of the Basic Law is founded in actions protected by fundamental rights or impairs other fundamental rights, these fundamental rights must be taken into account in the context of justifying the interference with Article 9(1) of the Basic Law. The prohibition of an association must not forbid what is otherwise protected by fundamental freedoms, and it must not be biased against particular political opinions.

Facts:

[Excerpt from Press Release No. 69/2018]

The three associations were prohibited on the basis of the Associations Act. The International Humanitarian Aid Organisation (Internationale Humanitäre Hilfsorganisation e.V. - IHH) is accused of having indirectly supported a terrorist organisation by channelling financial donations to it and thus actively contravening the concept of international understanding. The Organisation Supporting Domestic Political Prisoners and Their Families (Hilfsorganisation für nationale politische Gefangene und deren Angehörige e.V. - HNG) is accused of having encouraged imprisoned right-wing extremists, in its association magazine, in their attitude to combat the foundations of the constitutional order of the Federal Republic of Germany, thus actively and belligerently opposing the constitutional order and contravening criminal statutes. The association Hells Angels MC Charter Westend Frankfurt am Main is accused of having supported its members in committing criminal offences. The three associations unsuccessfully sought legal recourse before the administrative courts against the orders prohibiting them issued by the Federal Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of the Interior of the Land Hesse. Their constitutional complaints are directed against the orders and the judicial decisions, and indirectly against the provision that allows for their prohibition in the Associations Act.

I.

1. In [German] constitutional law, the right to "form associations or organisations" was first granted by the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung - WRV) under Art. 124(1) first sentence WRV. Art. 124 WRV guaranteed this right in respect of all Germans and for all purposes, Art. 130(2) WRV specifically guaranteed it in respect of civil servants, Art. 137(2) WRV for religious purposes and Art. 159 WRV in respect of coalitions. There was no specific provision on political parties in the Weimar Constitution, in contrast with today's Art. 21 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG). At the time, the legislature itself was authorised to determine the scope of freedom of association, given that the Constitution provided a limit to this freedom in the form of criminal statutes directed precisely against associations. In response to attacks on politicians of the Weimar Republic, in particular to the assassinations of Walther Rathenau and Matthias Erzberger, numerous associations were prohibited on the basis, up until 1929, of the Republic Protection Act (Republikschutzgesetz) of 21 July 1922 (Reich Law Gazette, Reichsgesetzblatt - RGBl p. 585), because they sought to undermine the republican form of government of the Reich or a Land. Yet the new State Court (Staatsgerichtshof), established in 1922 to protect the Republic, generally interpreted the provisions on prohibition restrictively; for instance, to justify a prohibition, it required planned and systematic efforts […]. Later, on numerous occasions, associations were prohibited or at least monitored under Art. 48(2) WRV, on the basis of emergency decrees issued by the President of the Reich. The fact that the Länder were primarily competent and had discretion to prohibit associations had a decisive impact on the Weimar Republic. Not only were associations prohibited in one Land able to move to another Land and continue to exist, but, in addition, decisions regarding the prohibition of associations were subject to particular political pressure, which ultimately prevented effective actions against precisely those associations that actively combatted democracy […]. [2]

2. The Constitution of the Free State of Bavaria (Verfassung des Freistaates Bayern - BayVerf) of 2 December 1946 (Law and Ordinance Gazette, Gesetz- und Verordnungsblatt - GVBl p. 333), which entered into force prior to the Basic Law, also left the prohibition of associations to the discretion of the respective authorities under Art. 114(2) BayVerf. The provision was interpreted to the effect that action against associations could only be taken by means of a prohibition. This was considered a problem because "according to this provision, only the most restrictive means can be used, even though less restrictive means could be successful - perhaps even more so." (cf. Nawiasky/Leusser, Die Verfassung des Freistaates Bayern, 1948, p. 129, original quote in German). [3]

3. In Art. 9(1) GG, in contrast with the Weimar Constitution, freedom of association was guaranteed for the first time regardless of statutory provisions. In addition, freedom of labour coalitions (Art. 9(3) GG), freedom of political parties (Art. 21 GG) and freedom of religious associations (Art. 140 GG in conjunction with Art. 137(2) WRV) are expressly laid down in the Basic Law. Art. 9(2) GG now provides a uniform legal framework for the prohibition of associations throughout Germany. [4]

The provision on prohibition, Art. 9(2) GG, was not the object of in-depth deliberations or substantive discussions by the Parliamentary Council (Parlamentarischer Rat). The Constitutional Convention at Herrenchiemsee adopted the proposal by Sub-Committee I of the Committee on Fundamental Policy Issues (Ausschuss für Grundsatzfragen), which designed the right to freedom of association "while at the same time prohibiting the pursuit of unlawful and immoral aims and the endangerment of democracy and international understanding" (Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, vol. 2, p. 222). The draft of Bergsträsser, an MP who was the rapporteur on this issue, was also part of the deliberations. According to this draft, associations were to be prohibited if they "pursued unlawful aims or combatted democracy or international understanding or did not reject the use of force to reach their goals" (Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, vol. 5/I, p. 25). In particular, the Committee on Fundamental Policy Issues advocated that a prohibition could also be justified on the basis of the aims and the activities of an association (Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, vol. 5/II, pp. 685, 703 and 704). The following version of Art. 9(2) GG, which is still applicable today, was adopted: "Associations whose aims or activities contravene the criminal laws, or that are directed against the constitutional order or the concept of international understanding, shall be prohibited." [5]

a) In the early years after the Basic Law entered into force, it was widely assumed that the prohibition of an association would directly come into effect once the requirements of a prohibition under Art. 9(2) GG were fulfilled (cf. Bundestag document, Bundestagsdrucksacke - BTDrucks 4/430, p. 12). At first, the courts set a low threshold for finding that there are reasons for a prohibition (cf. Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE 1, 184). However, in 1956, the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht) held that an association could only be prohibited if the authorities had established that the requirements of Art. 9(2) GG were met (BVerwGE 4, 188). The Associations Act (Vereinsgesetz - VereinsG), which entered into force in 1964, provided a statutory basis for prohibitions from then on. Its purpose was to set out the procedure for the authorities to prohibit associations (cf. BTDrucks 4/430, pp. 8 and 9) and thus align associations law with the requirements of the Basic Law, the case-law of the Federal Administrative Court and other developments that had taken place. [6]

b) In response to the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001, the First Act Amending the Associations Act of 4 December 2001 (Federal Law Gazette, Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl I p. 3319) was enacted. It extended the scope of application of the provisions on the prohibition of associations to encompass religious associations, by abolishing the so-called "religion privilege" (Religionsprivileg) (cf. BTDrucks 14/7026, p. 6). Since 2001, the number of prohibitions of associations has increased considerably, to more than 60 overall. This number is higher than all prohibitions imposed between 1964, when the Associations Act entered into force, and 11 September 2001. [7]

4. The Associations Act of 5 August 1964, in the version of 10 March 2017, now provides the statutory basis for the prohibition of associations. It is designed as an act implementing Art. 9(2) GG ([…]). Pursuant to the Act's § 1(1), its aim is to protect the freedom of association as well as to counteract its abuse so as to uphold public safety and order (§ 1(2) VereinsG). Pursuant to § 3 VereinsG, an association may "only be treated as a prohibited association (Article 9(2) of the Basic Law) if, by order of the authority competent for prohibitions, it has been established that its aims or activities contravene criminal statutes or that they are directed against the constitutional order or the concept of international understanding; it must order the dissolution of the association (prohibition)". [8]

a) An order prohibiting an association pursuant to § 3(1) first sentence first half-sentence VereinsG establishes that the requirements for a prohibition are met, and orders the dissolution of the association. Subsequently, the only act the association may undertake is to seek to revoke the prohibition order in court proceedings […]. [9]

C.

The constitutional complaints are unfounded. [96]

I.

1. The freedom of association in Art. 9(1) GG protects the right of individuals to unite and to exist as an association (cf. BVerfGE 13, 174 <175>; 84, 372 <378>). Art. 9(1) GG thus guarantees the principle of free establishment of social groups (cf. BVerfGE 38, 281 <302 and 303>; 80, 244 <252 and 253>) initiated by private individuals and independent of the state (cf. BVerfGE 146, 164 <193 and 194, para. 78>). For constitutional law purposes, the legal capacity of an association, which depends on certain characteristics set out by the legislature, is irrelevant (cf. BVerfGE 13, 174 <175>; 84, 372 <378>). However, special constitutional protection is granted to those associations to which the Basic Law accords a special status as political parties (cf. BVerfGE 107, 339 <358>; 144, 20 <194 para. 512>) and religious communities. [97]

Both for its members and for the association itself, the protection of the fundamental right under Art. 9(1) GG comprises the establishment of the association, selfdetermination regarding its organisation, its decision-making procedures and its management (cf. BVerfGE 50, 290 <354>), i.e. the right to be established and to exist in the chosen united form (cf. BVerfGE 13, 174 <175>; 80, 244 <253>). By contrast, activities that go beyond measures to establish an association and to ensure its continued existence are not covered by the guarantee of Art. 9(1) GG (cf. BVerfGE 70, 1 <25>). Rather, they are protected according to those fundamental rights and equivalent guarantees under whose scope of protection they fall. The establishment of an association does not expand the fundamental rights protection with regard to the individual actions of its members (cf. BVerfGE 54, 237 <251>), but acting within an association does not lower fundamental rights protection either. Where an association's activities fall within the scope of protection of other fundamental rights, interferences must in principle be measured against those fundamental rights; yet for the prohibition of associations, even if it affects other fundamental rights, the specific provision of Art. 9(2) GG is primarily applicable […]. [98]

2. Interferences with the freedom of association must be measured against the principle of proportionality. The constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber) expressly provided prohibition as the most restrictive means available in Art. 9(2) GG. [99]

a) In Art. 9(2) GG the constitutional legislature (cf. […] para. 5 above) did not restrict the scope of protection of freedom of association from the outset (still in this vein, BVerwGE 134, 275 <306 and 307>, para. 86), but rather added an express limit to the collective right to the continued existence of associations protected under Art. 9(1) GG (cf. BVerfGE 80, 244 <253>; see also BVerfGE 30, 227 <243>; 84, 372 <379>; […]). In this respect, the wording of the fundamental right differs from the wording of provisions in Land constitutional law, which only guarantee freedom of association for constitutionally protected aims (Art. 13(1) of the Constitution of the Land Rhineland-Palatinate, Verfassung für Rheinland-Pfalz, Ordinance Gazette, Verordnungsblatt - VOBl p. 209; formerly Art. 19(1) of the Constitution of the Land Baden, Verfassung des Landes Baden, of 18 May 1947). In contrast to these provisions, Art. 9(2) GG - in a distinct subsection of Art. 9, separate from the determination of the scope of protection - determines when an association is to be prohibited entirely, i.e. under which circumstances the most serious interference with an association's fundamental rights can be justified under constitutional law. [100]

Freedom of association is guaranteed even in light of the possibility of restricting it that arises from Art. 9(2) GG. The provision on prohibition must be seen in the historical context of the rise of a totalitarian system (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <138>; paras. 2 et seq. above); it is a mechanism of the "preventive protection of the constitutional order" (Stern, Staatsrecht, vol. 1, 2nd ed. 1984, p. 183, original quote in German). In this respect, Art. 9(2) GG, together with Art. 21(2) and Art. 18 GG, are manifestations of the Basic Law's commitment to a "militant democracy" (streitbare Demokratie) (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <139>; 25, 88 <100>; 80, 244 <253>). Therefore, the Basic Law does not provide any discretion with regard to the decision to prohibit an association […]. If it is established that an association meets one of the prohibition requirements pursuant to Art. 9(2) GG, it must be prohibited. The constitutional legislature did not provide for any possible gradation of the legal consequences. This is confirmed by the provision's legislative history. In this respect, it is different from the provisions applicable during the Weimar Republic (see para. 2 above), but similar to the provision on the prohibition of political parties in Art. 21(2) GG, notwithstanding the question whether prohibition proceedings are to be brought at all (cf. BVerfGE 144, 20 <231 and 232 paras. 600 and 601>, regarding differences <228 and 229 para. 595>). The Parliamentary Council decided not to make the prohibition of associations in Art. 9(2) GG discretionary, in contrast with Art. 114(2) of the Constitution of the Free State of Bavaria of 2 December 1946, which pre-dates the Basic Law. Compulsory prohibition in the Basic Law is also intended to counteract any politically one-sided exercise of the power to prohibit associations. As such, Art. 9(2) GG is the manifestation of a pluralist and at the same time militant constitutional democracy. [101]

b) Prohibitions of associations, just like any interference with the fundamental rights of an association, are subject to the principle of proportionality, derived from the rule of law, which restricts acts of public authority in favour of freedoms protected by fundamental rights. The principle of proportionality requires that the least restrictive yet equally effective means be used in respect of associations, in order to accommodate legitimate public interests (similarly BVerwGE 61, 218 <220 et seq.>; for exceptions since BVerwGE 134, 275 <306 et seq.>, paras. 86 and 87; cf. BVerwGE 153, 211 <232 and 233>, paras. 48 and 49 with further references). Art. 9(2) GG does not preclude interferences with the fundamental rights of associations that are less restrictive than its prohibition, such as the prohibition of certain activities of the association or measures directed at individual members. […] [102]

The prohibition of an association, as the most serious form of an interference, can only be imposed where such less restrictive and equally effective means are not sufficient for achieving the objectives of the prohibition requirements set out in Art. 9(2) GG. Thus, in particular, an association cannot be prohibited based solely on isolated actions taken by individual members; rather, these actions must define the association and be attributable to it. The less the prohibition requirements are met by the actions of the association's organs themselves, by the majority of its members, or by third parties controlled by it, the more it must be clearly ascertainable that the association is aware of them, approves of them and identifies with them (cf. BVerwG, Judgment of 3 December 2004 - 6 A 10.02 -, juris, paras. 62 et seq.), and that the objective of Art. 9(2) GG can thus be achieved only by prohibiting the association. In that sense, the prohibition provision of Art. 9(2) GG is a manifestation of, and not an exception to, the principle of proportionality. [103]

3. Art. 9(2) GG provides the prohibition of an association as a limit to freedom of association when the association is directed against or contravenes the following legal interests of paramount importance: criminal statutes, the constitutional order and the concept of international understanding. Only these expressly provided reasons justify prohibition as the most serious interference with the fundamental rights of an association; in accordance with the principle of proportionality, which requires that the prohibition must be necessary, they are to be interpreted strictly. Thus, an association cannot already be considered to be pursuing prohibited aims where actions related to the association and directed against the protected legal interests laid down in Art. 9(2) GG occurred only in the past and only in isolated cases. Rather, the prohibition of associations is designed to prevent future infringements of the protected legal interests, particularly those infringements arising from the organisational structures of the association as a group of many persons with a common purpose (cf. BVerfGE 80, 244 <253>). In this respect, the power to prohibit an association under Art. 9(2) GG must be interpreted strictly as well. [104]

a) According to the first alternative of Art. 9(2) GG, the prohibition of an association is justified if its aims or activities contravene criminal statutes. These criminal statutes only encompass punishable offences of general application. Criminal provisions that only specifically target associations as such are not to be taken into account, since otherwise freedom of association would ultimately be subject to legislative discretion [...]. Also, a prohibition cannot be based on regulatory offences (Ordnungswidrigkeiten). [105]

An association's aims or activities are contrary to criminal statutes if organs, members or even third parties contravene criminal statutes and this is attributable to the association, either because it is apparent that they represent the association and the association at least approves of this, or because the association deliberately provokes, encourages, enables or facilitates criminal offences. This may also be the case when an association approves of and promotes such actions after the fact, thus identifying with them, or when at first only certain activities contravene criminal statutes, yet these are then continued with the knowledge and support of the association. However, as an independent mechanism of preventive protection of the constitutional order, the prohibition of associations is not tied to the existence of a conviction under criminal law (cf. BVerwGE 80, 299 <305 and 306>; BVerwGE 134, 275 <280 and 281>, paras. 17 and 18). The prohibition of an association only satisfies the requirements of proportionality (see paras. 102 and 103 above) when taking action against individual criminal offences would not suffice given that punishable actions are planned or committed within the organisation itself […], i.e. that violating criminal statutes largely defines the organisation. This is not the case when individual members of an association direct their actions against the protected legal interests or when the association primarily pursues lawful aims. [106]

b) According to the second alternative of Art. 9(2) GG, the prohibition of an association is justified if the association is directed against the constitutional order. Similarly to the "free democratic basic order" of Art. 18 and Art. 21(2) GG (cf. BVerfGE 144, 20 <202 et seq. paras. 529 et seq.>), the protected legal interest of the "constitutional order" covers the fundamental principles of the Constitution (cf. BVerfGE 6, 32 <38>), which are human dignity pursuant to Art. 1(1) GG, the principle of democracy and the principle of the rule of law (cf. BVerwGE 134, 275 <292 and 293>, para. 44 with further references […]). [107]

According to Art. 9(2) GG, an association must be "directed" against these fundamental principles. Its prohibition is not justified merely on the basis of an association's criticism or rejection of these principles or its advocating a different order. Taking into account Art. 5 [freedom of expression] and Art. 3(3) first sentence GG [prohibition of discrimination], Art. 9(2) GG does not prohibit a certain ideology or world view, and it does not target specific attitudes or political beliefs (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <333>; regarding the prohibition of political parties BVerfGE 144, 20 <224 para. 585>). The dissemination of anti-constitutional ideas or of certain political views is, as such, still within the boundaries of free political debate (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <141>). Just as the Basic Law, relying on the power of free public debate, guarantees freedom of expression even for the enemies of freedom (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <330>), it relies on free organisation within society and the power of civic engagement in free and open political debate in principle when guaranteeing freedom of association (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <320 and 321>). Therefore, to justify the prohibition of an association, it is decisive whether the association takes an actively belligerent stance (kämpferisch aggressive Haltung), outwardly and against the fundamental principles of the Constitution (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <330>). This is confirmed by the provision's legislative history, given that the Parliamentary Council drew attention to the fact that the provision was intended to address associations that combat democracy or that do not reject violence (see para. 5 above). [108]

Conversely, a prohibition can also be considered prior to an association posing a specific threat to the free democratic basic order (regarding prohibitions of political parties BVerfGE 144, 20 <199 para. 522; 223 para. 581>) or prior to actually jeopardising the fundamental principles of the Constitution. Unlike Art. 21(2) GG, which requires that a political party "seek" to abolish the free democratic basic order, the wording of Art. 9(2) GG renders it sufficient that an association be "directed" against the constitutional order (cf. BVerfGE 144, 20 <228 para. 595>). The Parliamentary Council deliberately did not adopt the proposal to also include "jeopardising" in Art. 9(2) GG, which was put forward by the Constitutional Convention at Herrenchiemsee, based on the Constitution of the Free Hanseatic City of Bremen (Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, vol. 2, p. 581). Rather, by way of Art. 9(2), the constitutional legislature opted for preventive protection of the constitutional order as a manifestation of its commitment to a militant democracy (cf. BVerfGE 80, 244 <253>). Thus, the power to prohibit associations makes it possible to counter organisations before it is too late […]. Unlike in the case of political parties, the prohibition of associations neither depends on their potentiality, meaning specific and weighty indications that make it seem possible that their actions may succeed (cf. BVerfGE 144, 20 <224 and 225 para. 585>), nor on the territorial reach of their actions (cf. BVerfGE 144, 20 <340 et seq. paras. 933 et seq.>). The fact that an association takes an active and belligerent stance and aims to destroy essential elements of the constitutional order is sufficient to justify its prohibition. [109]

c) According to the third alternative of Art. 9(2) GG, the prohibition of an association is justified if it is directed against the concept of international understanding. [110]

The prohibition of the use of force under international law guides the reason that justifies the prohibition in Art. 9(2) GG. This is in line with Art. 26(1) GG and follows the spirit of the Constitution's openness to international law (cf. BVerfGE 141, 1 <26 and 27 paras. 65 and 66>). Art. 2(4) of the Charter of the United Nations obliges states in their international relations to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. This concept of international understanding concerns both conflicts between states and internal conflicts among different parts of the population and threats posed by terrorist organisations […]. This is presumably also the scope of application of Art. 9(2) GG. [111]

An association is directed against the concept of international understanding when it actively advocates and promotes violence or comparable serious actions violating international law in international relations […]. An association itself can do this directly; yet the requirements for prohibition can also be met if the association is directed against the concept of international understanding through its support of third parties. This includes financial support of terrorist actions and organisations, if this support is objectively likely to impair the concept of international understanding significantly, severely, and deeply, and if the association is aware of this fact and at least approves of it. Here, too, the principle of proportionality must be taken into account; prohibition is the most serious interference with constitutionally protected freedom of association and can only be justified if the association's stance carries great weight and defines the association. [112]

4. To the extent that the prohibition of an association pursuant to Art. 9(2) GG is based on actions protected by fundamental rights or otherwise impairs other fundamental rights, these fundamental rights must be taken into account in the context of justifying the interference with Art. 9(1) GG. Prohibitions of associations must not forbid what is otherwise protected by fundamental freedoms. Yet the collective exercise of fundamental rights also cannot result in more extensive fundamental rights protection (cf. BVerfGE 54, 237 <251>; […]). [113]

Therefore, prohibitions of associations can, in principle, neither be based solely on such statements of opinion as protected under constitutional law by Art. 5(1) GG (on the link with statements of opinion cf. BVerfGE 113, 63 <82>; […]), nor can they be based on other behaviour that is subject to effective constitutional protection. Thus, prohibitions of associations must not be directed one-sidedly against particular political opinions, even if they are imposed based on opposition to the constitutional order, because this would violate the prohibition of discrimination under Art. 3(3) first sentence GG […]. Art. 3(3) first sentence GG imposes the setting of strict requirements. Accordingly, prohibitions of associations cannot be based on political opposition to the constitutional order when such views are merely expressed; rather, such opposition must be pursued in an active and belligerent manner (see paras. 108 and 198 above; […]). A prohibition can only be based on opposition to international understanding when the use of force is actively advocated and promoted (see para. 112 above). [114]

5. The framework of international law that must be observed within the German legal order does not result in protection of freedom of association different from Art. 9(2) GG. In particular, this holds true with regard to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols, to the extent that they have entered into force in the Federal Republic of Germany (Act on the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 7 August 1952, BGBl II p. 685; official notice of 15 December 1953, BGBl II 1954 p. 14; new official notice of the Convention in the version of Protocol No. 11 in BGBl II 2002 p. 1054). Their texts, together with the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, serve as guidelines for interpretation in determining the content and scope of fundamental rights and rule-of-law principles under the Basic Law, to the extent that this - as the Convention itself makes clear (cf. Art. 53 European Convention on Human Rights - ECHR) - does not result in limiting or lowering the protection afforded by fundamental rights under the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <317>; 120, 180 <200 and 201>; 128, 326 <366 et seq.>; established case-law). [115]

Art. 11(1) first half-sentence ECHR guarantees freedom of association; it is deemed a yardstick for the state of a democratic society, since democracy, pluralism and freedom of association are directly interrelated (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Gorzelik and others v. Poland, Judgment of 17 February 2004, No. 44158/98, § 88; ECtHR, Fondation Zehra et autres c. Turquie, Judgment of 10 July 2018, No. 51595/07, § 50). Yet where an association jeopardises state institutions or the rights and freedoms of others, it can be prohibited under Art. 11(2) ECHR in order to protect these (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Gorzelik and others v. Poland, ibid. § 94). The interference must be prescribed by law and must be necessary in a democratic society; that is to say, just as in German constitutional law, it must be proportionate, and, in particular, it must correspond to a pressing social need (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Gorzelik and others v. Poland, ibid., § 96). This does not exceed the requirements arising from fundamental rights. [116]

II.

Thus, the constitutional complaints are unfounded. Both the provision regarding prohibitions in associations law as well as the challenged decisions issued by the authorities competent for prohibitions and by the regular courts that upheld them are compatible with the fundamental rights requirements. [117]

1. To the extent that the constitutional complaints indirectly challenge the statutory basis authorising the prohibition of associations in § 3(1) first sentence VereinsG, they are unsuccessful. The statutory provision does indeed lack an express requirement of proportionality, even though such a requirement must be observed also with regard to the prohibition clause in Art. 9(2) GG. However, the proportionality requirements arising from the rule of law can be satisfied by means of interpretation. The provision on prohibition of an association does not preclude the use of less restrictive means, if this renders the prohibition unnecessary, as a consequence of its aims, activities or stance. [118]

Substantively, the statutory basis for the prohibition of associations in § 3(1) first sentence VereinsG reflects the constitutional provision of Art. 9(2) GG and does not exceed it. With regard to the three limits to the freedom of association, the wording of § 3(1) VereinsG matches the wording of Art. 9(2) GG, apart from one linguistic nuance. This is within the legislature's leeway to design (cf. BVerfGE 80, 244 <254 and 255>). [119]

The statutory provision is also sufficiently specific. Such specificity is not lacking simply because a provision requires interpretation (cf. BVerfGE 45, 400 <420>; 117, 71 <111>; 128, 282 <317>; established case-law). Uncertainties must merely not go so far as to render the actions of the competent state agencies unpredictable or withdraw these from the scope of judicial decision-making (cf. BVerfGE 118, 168 <188>; 120, 274 <316>; established case-law). In the case at hand, there are no indications for this. [120]

2. The challenged decisions are compatible with the constitutional requirements; […] [regarding] the prohibition of complainant no. I, this at least applies with regard to its outcome. [121]

a) Unlike the prohibition of political parties, the prohibition of associations is not decided in proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court (cf. BVerfGE 13, 174 <176 and 177>). Therefore, in particular, it is not incumbent on the Federal Constitutional Court to establish the necessary facts; its review is in principle limited to examining whether the findings by the authorities and the courts are plausible. [122]

b) The constitutional complaint of complainant no. I - 1 BvR 1474/12 - is unsuccessful. The Judgment of the Federal Administrative Court […] ultimately satisfies the constitutional requirements. [123]

The Federal Administrative Court assumes that an association is directed against the concept of international understanding within the meaning of § 3(1) first sentence VereinsG in conjunction with Art. 9(2) GG if it provides considerable financial support, over a long period of time, to an organisation which forms part of another organisation promoting violence in the relations between peoples, if it does so knowingly and identifies with this organisation and the acts of violence it commits. This is compatible with the requirements arising from Art. 9(2) GG. According to it, an association meets the requirements for prohibition if it advocates and promotes violence or comparable serious actions violating international law (see paras. 111 and 112 above). The court sets out in detail that the organisation indirectly supported by complainant no. I is to be classified as a terrorist organisation and that its nature is incompatible with the concept of international understanding (see (aa) below). The stance justifying the prohibition can be attributed to complainant no. I (see (bb) below). Ultimately, the requirements of proportionality are met, given that complainant no. I is defined by its identification with prohibited actions; therefore, no less restrictive means were available to achieve the objective of the prohibition (see (cc) below). The prohibition is essentially based on the channelling of financial donations to a terrorist organisation. There are no indications to suggest that the donations were a form of humanitarian aid in crisis areas, which would be protected against prohibitions of the association under humanitarian international law (see (dd) below). [124]

aa) By channelling considerable financial donations to an organisation that, by its nature, is incompatible with the concept of international understanding, complainant no. I supported this organisation. The Federal Administrative Court sets out in detail that the supported organisation, Hamas, violates the concept of international understanding, because it ignores basic principles of international law, including, in particular, the prohibition of the use of force under international law and the rejection of terrorism (on this term BVerfGE 141, 220 <266 para. 96>; 143, 101 <138 and 139 paras. 124 and 125>). The European Union also currently qualifies the supported organisation as a group involved in terrorist acts (cf. II no. 8 of the list annexed to Council Decision <CFSP> 2017/1426 of 4 August 2017 updating the list of persons, groups and entities subject to Articles 2, 3 and 4 of Common Position 2001/931/CFSP on the application of specific measures to combat terrorism, and repealing Decision <CFSP> 2017/154). Furthermore, the Federal Administrative Court sets out that the supported organisation operates on the basis of an anti-Semitic charter and refuses to accept the prohibition of the use of force and local peace agreements. This is sufficient evidence that the nature of the supported organisation is contrary to international law. [125]

bb) Hamas's stance against the concept of international understanding, which is incompatible with Art. 9(2) GG, can be attributed to complainant no. I. A prohibition of an association can also come into play in cases where international understanding, protected under Art. 9(2) GG, is jeopardised indirectly, by means of financial donations supporting terrorism. However, not every form of humanitarian aid in crisis areas may be halted by means of prohibitions of associations pursuant to § 3(1) first sentence VereinsG on the grounds of their indirect effects promoting terrorism (see paras. 134 et seq. below). Attributing the actions of third parties to an association that merely channels financial donations is subject to strict requirements. In this respect, the court comprehensibly sets out that the donations were objectively capable of significantly, severely, and deeply compromising international understanding, and that complainant no. I was aware of this and at least approved of it. [126]

cc) The proportionality requirements also apply to the justification of the prohibition of an association pursuant to Art. 9(2) GG (see paras. 102 and 103 above), and, ultimately, are met here. The prohibition of an association, as the most serious interference with its fundamental rights, is only constitutional if no less restrictive means are available to remedy or prevent infringements of protected legal interests. [129]

(1) However, the Federal Administrative Court makes the general statement that there is nothing to suggest that it would be appropriate under the principle of proportionality to permit the continued existence of an association that meets one of the prohibition requirements merely because it also pursues activities that are not prohibited. This statement is not compatible with the constitutional requirements. It exceeds the constitutionally required objective of limiting any interference with fundamental freedoms to what is necessary. According to the court's statement, a prohibition of certain activities, which would be less restrictive than the overall prohibition of an association, would not be considered even if these activities only represented a minor share of the association's activities. It may well be true that, where such less restrictive means are available, associations may try to avoid a prohibition by diversifying their activities, as assumed by the Federal Administrative Court. Yet the limitation to proportionate actions under constitutional law cannot be ignored in order to counter such motives from the outset. Rather, it must be reviewed in each specific case whether an activity is so defining of the stance of an association that the mere prohibition of certain activities would not be as effective as the prohibition of the association. [130]

(2) In this case, though, it is not objectionable that the Federal Administrative Court takes into account the requirements of proportionality in the context of the prohibition requirements (see also BVerwGE 134, 275 <307 and 308> para. 87; BVerwGE 154, 22 <42>, para. 45). This leads to a strict interpretation of the reasons justifying the prohibition (see para. 104 above). According to the case-law of the regular courts, in order to justify a prohibition, associations must be defined by the prohibited aims (on the stance against the constitutional order cf. already BVerwGE 80, 299 <306 et seq.>, and on the stance against the concept of international understanding cf. meanwhile BVerwGE 154, 22 <39 and 40>, para. 41). By reviewing whether an association is defined by such aims, the courts take into account the fundamental rights requirement that an association may only be prohibited if no less restrictive means are available to protect the legal interests designated in Art. 9(2) GG (see paras 102 and 103 above). [131]

(3) It is true that the Federal Administrative Court does not expressly set out that no less restrictive means would be as effective as a prohibition of the association to protect the legal interests designated in Art. 9(2) GG. It does not expressly establish that complainant no. I is defined by its stance against the concept of international understanding to such an extent that less restrictive means could not be equally effective to avert a threat to international understanding. However, it follows from the detailed findings of the court that this is the case. […] [132]

dd) It is compatible with fundamental rights requirements, even when taking into account the Constitution's openness to international law (cf. BVerfGE 141, 1 <26 et seq. paras. 65 et seq.>), that the Federal Administrative Court assumes that an association's activities related to humanitarian aid also meet the prohibition requirement where the association directly supports an organisation whose activities promote actions of another organisation that violates the concept of international understanding. In this respect, the prohibition of an association pursuant to Art. 9(2) GG may not serve to prohibit humanitarian actions that are permissible under international law. [133]

(1) Not every financial donation made by an association to social organisations that provide primary care to the population in conflict zones justifies the prohibition of an association under Art. 9(2) GG on the grounds that it is directed against the concept of international understanding. By themselves, the general "benefits deriving from increased acceptance and financial relief", which might arise when charitable groups and associations with social aims are supported in areas that are controlled by terrorists, are not a sufficient basis for prohibiting an association that channels donations to such crisis areas. While humanitarian aid regularly contributes to easing the strain on the parties to a conflict, the rules of international humanitarian law and humanitarian aid apply, which ensure that humanitarian aid in such areas is not prevented at the expense of the suffering population. According to these rules, humanitarian aid provided by means of financial donations can only justify the prohibition of an association pursuant to Art. 9(2) GG where the aid itself violates the principle of neutrality. The rules on providing humanitarian aid in conflicts specify when this is the case. [134]

The aim of international humanitarian law is not simply to restrict the means of warfare, but also to protect civilians. Therefore, the provisions regarding humanitarian aid in armed conflicts set forth in the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of 12 August 1949 (GC IV; BGBl II 1954 p. 917) and the Additional Protocol I relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (AP I; BGBl II 1990 p. 1550) are intended to allow for sufficient supplies of food, medical supplies and shelter to the population. Under international humanitarian law, states that are not parties to an armed conflict are obliged to allow the free passage of goods and personnel for the purpose of aid, provided impartially and without any adverse distinction, in armed conflicts (Art. 23(1) and Art. 59(3) GC IV, Art. 70(2) AP I). Yet under Art. 23(2) GC IV, this only applies where no definite advantage accrues to military efforts. In addition, the aid provided must be necessary for the population, and the general principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality must be observed. As set out in detail by the German Red Cross in these proceedings, this is meant to ensure that the aim of humanitarian aid is solely to alleviate suffering […]. This applies to occupations (Art. 59(3) GC IV) and is also to be applied to situations that have not escalated into armed conflict or which do not formally constitute occupation. [135]

At the same time, states are obliged under international law to prevent the direct or indirect financing of terrorism. Art. 2(1) and Art. 4 of the International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism of the United Nations of 9 December 1999 (Terrorist Financing Convention, BGBl II 2003 p. 1923) define the cases in which funds are provided or collected directly or indirectly, unlawfully and wilfully with the intention that they should be used or in the knowledge that they are to be used, in full or in part, to commit criminal offences or acts of violence in armed conflicts.

Further, according to Art. 21 of the Terrorist Financing Convention, obligations under international humanitarian law remain unaffected; thus, it does not impede neutral humanitarian aid. [136]

These rules allow a distinction between permissible humanitarian aid from aid that violates the concept of international understanding within the meaning of Art. 9(2) GG. Even financial donations to areas controlled by terrorists are thus not directed against the concept of international understanding where these must be granted "free passage" as means of humanitarian aid within the meaning of Art. 23(1) and Art. 59(3) GC IV, Art. 70(2) AP I. When an association makes donations with the intention to alleviate suffering, and when it observes the general principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality, it does not meet the prohibition requirement under Art. 9(2) GG. [137]

(2) The Federal Administrative Court did not fail to recognise these standards. It does not base its affirmation of the prohibition of complainant no. I on financial support alone, but rather sets out in detail that the social associations and projects supported were not neutral and that complainant no. I itself did not intend to act neutrally. The challenged decisions are thus compatible with the requirements laid down in the Basic Law. [138]

c) The constitutional complaint of complainant no. II is unfounded. Its prohibition can be based on the prohibition requirements in Art. 9(2) GG, according to which an association must be prohibited if its aims and activities are directed against the constitutional order and contravene criminal statutes. [139]

aa) The authority competent for prohibitions and the Federal Administrative Court, which affirmed the authority's decision, found that complainant no. II opposes the constitutional order (see (1) below) actively and belligerently (see (2) below). This finding is not objectionable under constitutional law. For the rest, too, it is proportionate (see (3) below). [140]

(1) Complainant no. II calls into question fundamental principles of the "constitutional order" within the meaning of Art. 9(2) GG. The authority and the court base this finding on the fact that the association specifically rejects human rights, core elements of the rule of law and democratic principles, which are considered the cornerstones of society by the Basic Law. The authority and the court specify in a comprehensible manner that the association's statements, its regular publications and activities express its clear proximity and explicit commitment to the "agenda, ideas and overall design" of National Socialism and its commitment to the former NSDAP and its main functionaries. Complainant no. II calls the Federal Republic of Germany "corrupt", "degenerate", "forced upon the people" and "disgraceful", seeks democracy's downfall, and propagates anti-Semitism and quasi-religious conspiracy theories. In addition, it rejects democracy and calls on its members to defeat the constitutional order. It also disseminates a racist doctrine that is not only incompatible with Art. 3(3) first sentence GG but also with the respect of human dignity and human rights (Art. 1(1) and (2) GG). It is not objectionable under constitutional law that the authority and the court therefore consider that the constitutional order within the meaning of Art. 9(2) GG is affected. [141]

(2) It was compatible with constitutional requirements for the authorities and the Federal Administrative Court to assume that complainant no. II is "directed" against the constitutional order within the meaning of Art. 9(2) GG. [142]

(a) The statement by the Federal Administrative Court that no proof is needed for specific actions is not to be understood to mean that a particular attitude or opinion would already be sufficient. The court itself explicitly clarifies this. It highlights that the mere rejection of the constitutional order is not sufficient to justify a prohibition. Freedom in the constitutional order includes that this order may be called into question. The court's findings establish that the statements which underlie the prohibition are not merely "verbal radicalism". [143]

(b) The prohibition in question is based on the assumption that the association's attitude is actively belligerent and justifies a prohibition, given that the association not only rejects and disdains the foundations of constitutional democracy under the Basic Law, but also actively seeks to "undermine" them and calls upon its members to combat them. This is not objectionable under constitutional law. In its submission, the Centre for Criminology points out that prisoners with extremist backgrounds in particular are easily influenced and that, according to empirical studies, prisoners with a right-wing extremist background show a comparatively high affinity to violence. The preventive nature of Art. 9(2) GG, as an element of the militant democracy under the Basic Law (see paras. 101, 109 above), allows for the prohibition of an association even before violence is used. Further, it is not relevant how effective the association's active and belligerent actions are. Unlike the requirements for the prohibition of a political party under Art. 21(2) GG, activities of an association directed against fundamental elements of the constitutional order are sufficient to prohibit the association even at the municipal or local level in "delimited social spaces" (cf. BVerfGE 144, 20 <340 et seq. paras. 933 et seq.>). The decisive factor is whether the overall character of the association, including its formal and actual purpose, its apparent stance, its organisation and the activities of its organs and members, clearly meets the prohibition requirements. According to the Federal Administrative Court's findings, there is no doubt that this is the case here, given the statements of leading members of the association. [144]

According to these statements, one must create "liberated national space", "the rat system" must be combatted, one must never capitulate, which will not be possible without violence, and "what is needed is a bang that cripples everything". According to the court's findings, the association's communication with prisoners who are rightwing extremists is aimed at radicalising them so that they will again commit violent acts upon their release from prison. Furthermore, in its magazine, complainant no. II called upon its readers to name "public prosecutors, heads of police operations or judges" so that they could be "brought to justice" at a later date. Given that the objective of complainant no. II's magazine is to promote criminal offences with an extremist background and to make threats against state officials, its similarity in nature to National Socialism goes beyond a shared political attitude. The objective can therefore justify the prohibition of the association pursuant to Art. 9(2) GG. The prohibition of the association is thus comprehensibly based on the active and belligerent stance the association as such takes against the constitutional order. [145]

(c) A prohibition linked to such statements does not raise constitutional concerns, even with regard to Art. 5(1) GG (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <331 et seq., 335>). In particular, this prohibition of the association is not based on the "mere holding and stating" of opinions and attitudes deemed to be right-wing extremist, but on an actively belligerent stance. [146]

(d) It clearly follows from the findings of the Federal Administrative Court that no one-sided action was taken against complainant no. II on the basis of its political views - which would have been contrary to Art. 3(3) first sentence GG - but rather because it openly opposes the constitutional order in an active and belligerent manner. There is no general fundamental principle of anti-National Socialism in the Basic Law (BVerfGE 124, 300 <330>). Therefore, under Art. 9(2), Art. 18 and Art. 21(2) GG, free political discourse does not per se end where the dissemination of anti-constitutional ideas as such begins (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <330>). Rather, the Basic Law protects the core elements of constitutional democracy against attacks from within that go beyond political debate in that the attacks seek to destroy the very prerequisites of these core elements. In this case, the advocacy of Nazi rule is not linked merely to a particular political opinion. The prohibition of complainant no. II is, in that respect, also not directed generally against an approving attitude in respect of individual measures of the Nazi regime (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <337>). Rather, the association was prohibited because it identifies with the Nazi regime's violent means in particular, which reflects an active and belligerent stance against the free democratic basic order (see paras. 108 and 109 above; […]). [147]

(3) Furthermore, the prohibition of complainant no. II is also proportionate. It was necessary because complainant no. II is defined by its opposition to the constitutional order. Therefore, it was not an option to take less restrictive action solely against the statements upon which the prohibition of the association is essentially based and which can be attributed to the association. [148]

(a) The prohibition of an association can be based on statements of its board members. They are organs of the association that also represent it vis-à-vis the public. The same applies with regard to members whose actions have an apparent link to the association. [149]

It is also not objectionable under constitutional law that statements taken from prisoners' letters which are printed in the association's magazine are attributed to complainant no. II. As "letters to the editor", they are not necessarily written by members of the association, but rather by those prisoners who are supported by complainant no. II as "national prisoners" as well. However, according to the Federal Administrative Court, the magazine of complainant no. II does not contain a "free exchange of opinions": the "letters to the editor" are not letters from the outside containing reactions to the contents of the magazine, but rather they make up its essential content. Printing selected letters is a main focus of the association's activities; the Federal Administrative Court finds that it selects these letters to sustain those "offenders who have already acted, as combatants" against the democratic system. [150]

(b) Only taking action against these statements was ruled out, as complainant no. II is largely defined by its stance against the constitutional order, according to the findings of the authority competent for prohibitions and of the Federal Administrative Court. The authority and the court could thus assume that individual measures would not be equally effective in countering the association's stance against the protected legal interests of Art. 9(2) GG. [151]

bb) The decisions of the authority competent for prohibitions and the Federal Administrative Court to also impose a prohibition because complainant no. II's aims and activities contravene criminal statutes (Art. 9(2) first alternative GG) are also compatible with the constitutional requirements. [152]

(1) The prohibition is based on specific reasons that can justify it in a constitutionally sound manner. According to the factual findings, complainant no. II's aim is to uphold and reinforce prisoners' motives and also the attitude which subjectively serves to apologetically justify their actions. In particular, the association makes unequivocal statements regarding the future use of force, thus promoting the contravention of general criminal statutes. The court comprehensibly demonstrates that the association sought to consolidate the "fanatically aggressive attitude" of the prisoners, who could therefore be expected to commit further criminal offences; and that such offences had also been announced in the association magazine. The presumption that this promotes criminal offences is confirmed by findings from research submitted in these proceedings by the Centre for Criminology. As an independent mechanism of preventive protection of the constitutional order, the prohibition of associations is not tied to convictions under criminal law (see para. 106 above). The prohibition of complainant no. II is also not simply based on an ideology or attitude; rather, there is specific proof of activities contravening criminal statutes. [153]

(2) It is not objectionable to attribute activities by members and third parties to complainant no. II. [154]

The Federal Administrative Court has not failed to recognise the constitutional requirements where it attributes to complainant no. II, on the basis of its bylaws, not only the support of a selected group of criminal offenders, but also the efforts to uphold and strengthen their attitude and thus their willingness to commit criminal offences in future. Where actions are taken directly by an association's organs or the majority of its members, these actions can readily be attributed to the association, which is why the magazine, as central to its activities, is relevant here in respect of complainant no. II. [155]

In this respect, the behaviour of third parties who are supported like members by the association, as is the case here, may also be taken into account […]. While the prisoners are not third parties "controlled" by the association, in the sense of the prisoners being its tools, the association in fact recognisably supported their actions according to the Federal Administrative Court's findings. The Federal Administrative Court specifically substantiates how complainant no. II "glorifies" these offenders and their crimes and identifies with them in the magazine, which is central to the association. [156]

However, the prohibition of an association cannot be based on the fact that it supports prisoners in their social reintegration (Resozialisierung). The guarantee of inviolable human dignity under Art. 1(1) GG is specifically designed to prevent the legal system from abandoning persons, even if they have contravened the law. Prisoners, too, deserve a chance at reintegrating into society (cf. BVerfGE 33, 1 <10 f.>; 98, 169 <200 and 201>). Thus, it is an objective of detention to enable prisoners to, "in future, lead a life in social responsibility without committing criminal offences" (§ 2 of the Prison Act, Strafvollzugsgesetz - StVollzG). However, this was not the objective pursued by complainant no. II. [157]

(3) The prohibition satisfies the proportionality requirements also with regard to the contravention of criminal statutes. It is true that there is a failure to properly recognise the protection of the freedom of association in Art. 9(1) GG where, in the context of the prohibition of an association pursuant to Art. 9(2) GG, there is no review as to whether less restrictive means are available for preventing the contravention of criminal statutes (see para. 106 above). Even though the Federal Administrative Court did not expressly take this into account in the challenged decision, it still satisfies the fundamental rights requirements. According to the factual findings, it is constitutionally sound to assume that there was no scope for refraining from prohibiting the association. The prohibition of an association is only disproportionate where it is ascertainable that less restrictive means can be applied that would do away with the association's stance, without prohibiting the entire association. There were no indications of less restrictive means in the complainant's case. The prohibition is neither based on the behaviour of only some individual members, against whom individual action could be taken, nor is it linked only to one certain activity that might have been prevented without otherwise restricting the association. Moreover, the Federal Administrative Court was right to assume that complainant no. II's magazine was just as defining for the association as the crimes of the persons it deliberately and knowingly supported. [158]

cc) The fact that the authority competent for prohibitions tolerated the existence of the complainant for more than 30 years cannot be invoked against the prohibition. The time elapsed does not in any way reflect whether and when the requirements for prohibition were met. It was also not required under constitutional law to subject the prohibition of complainant no. II to a time limit. [159]

d) The constitutional complaint of complainant no. III is also unfounded. The decision by the Higher Administrative Court of the Land Hesse to apply § 3(1) first sentence VereinsG is compatible with Art. 9 GG. [160]

aa) Complainant no. III claims that a prohibition without a prior hearing of the association violates its rights, but this claim cannot be upheld. While it is a general requirement under the rule of law that decisions by public authorities that impose a burden be made only after the persons concerned are given the opportunity to be heard (foundational BVerfGE 9, 89 <95 and 96>), this is not required in every case. By way of exception, overriding public interests may justify that the persons concerned are not heard. The legislature laid this down, for instance, in § 28 of the Administrative Procedure Act (Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz - VwVfG). In the case of the prohibition of associations, it is not objectionable under constitutional law that the persons concerned are not heard where there are indications to suggest that they would otherwise hide evidence or assets. This was the case here. [161]

bb) The Higher Administrative Court, in line with the criteria of Art. 9(2) GG, assumes that complainant no. III's aims and activities contravene criminal statutes. It presumes that the criminal offences underlying the prohibition do not have to be the primary aim of the association, nor must they be committed on an ongoing basis. The Higher Administrative Court finds that the prohibition of complainant no. III is justified since the organisation poses a specific threat to public safety and order, and that no less restrictive means are available to eliminate this threat. This meets the constitutional requirements. In its interpretation of § 3(5) VereinsG, the court highlights that the criminal members of the association regularly presented a united front in representing the association; that the criminal offences were clearly recognisable as activities of the association; and that the association at least tolerated this. The court was also right to take into account the association's admission procedures, the clothing contributing to the members' sense of identity and the fact that the association expressly distanced itself from being bound by the law. An article of clothing with the slogan "You don't respect our life, we don't respect your laws" is, as such, protected by Art. 5(1) first sentence GG. However, a statement of opinion that is permissible in isolation can also be an indication for an organisational context that contravenes criminal statutes when the statement precisely expresses the association's defining self-image (see para. 106 above). [162]

The Higher Administrative Court was entitled to attribute to complainant no. III those actions which the association backed through its support of criminal members, and its conveying the impression that it sought or approved of their behaviour. The court bases its decision on the fact that it has become apparent that the criminal members always received the protection they expected. This meets the fundamental rights requirements. [163]

As such, visits to an association's members in prison do not provide a reason justifying a prohibition (see para. 157 above). However, in the case of complainant no. III, it is understandable that the court assumed that the manner in which these visits were organised revealed the infrastructure of the association, which did not seek the prisoners' social reintegration, but publicly approved of criminal offences, i.e. especially going "beyond the usual friendly favours" by expressly having leading figures of the association make the visits and by organising them in a professional system. As such, the prohibition of the association is a reaction to the organisation's "momentum", and in particular to the specific threat emanating from the actions of the association, against which Art. 9(2) GG is directed. [164]

cc) The prohibition is also proportionate. According to the court's analysis, no less restrictive means were available that could have reached the objective of Art. 9(2) GG just as effectively. It is not objectionable under constitutional law that the Higher Administrative Court of the Land Hesse specifically attributed several serious crimes to complainant no. III (regarding the standards, see paras. 105 and 106 above) and thus affirmed that the association violates criminal law, which ruled out less restrictive means. [165]

Unlike the authority competent for prohibition, the court did not classify the list called "MC Germany Rules" and the association's bylaws as defining. Based on specific facts, the court assesses in detail the recognisability of membership in the association in the course of the commission of criminal offences; the cooperation between members in committing criminal offences, and in particular the association's reaction to the criminal offences themselves through their organisation of visits to prisoners; the association's actions in respect of drug-related offences; its admission of new members who have committed a string of violent offences and making such persons its leaders; members' commission of criminal offences while wearing the association's clothing; and the storage of weapons and ammunition in the association's clubhouse. Given these circumstances, it is not objectionable under constitutional law to assume that the association as such is defined by actions contravening criminal statutes. Thus, isolated measures could not be as effective in reaching the objective of Art. 9(2) GG as would be the prohibition of the association. [166]

In the proportionality test, it must be taken into account when an association also performs and supports lawful activities, yet this does not rule out a prohibition. Here, no alternative conclusion is merited on the basis that complainant no. III had not been prohibited for a long time. Rather, the Higher Administrative Court emphasises that law enforcement authorities and courts have prosecuted criminal offences by the association's members since its establishment, and that the authorities competent for protection against threats have sought to uncover the structures that contravene criminal law. These findings in particular are compatible with the proportionality requirements that apply to the prohibition of an association (see paras. 102 and 103 above). [167]

3. Article 9.3 of the Basic Law: Collective Bargaining/Industrial Action

BVerfG, 12.6.2018, 2 BvR 1738/12, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20180612_2bvr173812en.html
"Civil Servants and the Right to Strike"

Explanatory Annotation

As already shown in the context of the previous decision, Article 9.3 of the Basic Law also guarantees the right to take collective action in industrial disputes. From the perspective of employees that includes the right to strike. However, the right to strike never applied to that part of the public service referred to in Article 33.5 of the Basic Law as the "professional civil service" who operate under "traditional principles" governing this special status as civil servants. Part of these "traditional principles" applicable to civil servants are such principles as, among other things, lifelong tenure, i.e. comprehensive job security, and an entitlement and subjective and justiciable right to adequate pay. However, these "traditional principles" also comprise a trade-off: that civil servants do not enjoy the right to strike. This very long-standing restriction for civil servants had become controversial in the light of decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in Strasbourg.[114]

The ECtHR is the judicial organ with the ultimate and final authority to interpret the European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR) of which Germany is a party (Articles 19, 46 ECHR). The ECHR, as an international (regional) human rights treaty, creates obligations of result. As the ECtHR has consistently stated, it is "primarily for the State concerned to choose, subject to supervision by the Committee of Ministers, the means to be used to discharge its obligations under Article 46 of the Convention, provided that such means are compatible with the conclusions set out in the Court's judgment."[115] In other words, the member states must create a legal reality in compliance with the guarantees of the ECHR. One such guarantee is Article 11 ECHR, which guarantees the freedom of assembly and association and thus covers in scope what the Basic Law covers in its Articles 8 and 9. The ECtHR had in its decisions regarding collective action in a public service setting found that the right to strike was, in principle, part of the protection of Article 11 ECHR. This notwithstanding, the ECtHR found that trade-union freedom could be compatible with the prohibition on the right to strike in respect of certain categories of public servants but that such restrictions not blanketly be extended to all public servants. In other words, any such prohibition must be justified by considerations that the ECtHR could accept as rendering the restriction necessary as a "pressing social need" recognition of which is necessary in a democratic society.

The German Supreme Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht) had to engage with this jurisprudence of the ECtHR in a case concerning disciplinary actions taken against teachers who possessed the status of professional civil servants and had actively supported collective action by colleagues who did not enjoy this special status but where part of the ranks of the general public service (and hence not prohibited from striking).[116] It concluded that the German prohibition of the right to strike for civil servants could not stand because of its broad scope that goes beyond restricting just those civil servants exercising core functions of the state such as the military, the police or civil servants involved with similar functions of state authority. The Supreme Administrative Court held that teaching at primary or secondary schools could not, in that sense, be considered functionally as the exercise of state authority in that narrower sense.[117] Consequently, the Court concluded that the broad exclusion of the right to strike for all staff with civil servant status violates Article 11 ECHR.

So, what does this mean for the striking civil servant? The issue shifts to the question of the relationship between the ECHR, an international human rights treaty, and domestic German law, in this case Article 33.5 of the Basic Law, which is the legal basis for the prohibition of civil servants to strike. According to Article 59.2 of the Basic Law, such treaties require the consent of Parliament in the form of a federal law. Domestically, the ECHR, therefore, possesses the status of federal law.[118] Any conflict with hierarchically higher constitutional law, in this case Article 33.5 of the Basic Law, could only be resolved by applying the standard rules of constitutional interpretation. In application of these rules, the Supreme Administrative Court found that standard legal interpretation could not resolve the conflict.[119] In other words, the courts cannot "override" standing domestic statutory or constitutional law by applying conflicting treaty provisions, here Article 11 ECHR. If interpretation cannot resolve the norm conflict, Parliament must act, either by amending the relevant legislation or by amending the Constitution.

The Supreme Administrative Court's judgment against the striking civil servants opened the pathway for the case to reach the German Constitutional Court and allowed the Constitutional Court to strengthen its views on the existing and long-standing restrictions for civil servants in Germany with regards to collective bargaining and industrial action. In particular, the Constitutional Court disagreed with the Supreme Administrative Court that the legal situation in Germany is incompatible with Germany's obligations under Article 11 ECHR and that differentiation between those civil servants who exercise core sovereign authority and those who do not (teachers) is required. The Constitutional Court regarded such distinctions as being practically unworkable because the determination of whether certain official acts fall under one or the other category is too difficult already and the same civil servant will often be involved in acts of both types.[120] But most importantly the Constitutional Court forcefully argued that holistically viewed the German legal framework of the civil service is compatible with the requirements of Article 11 ECHR as interpreted consistently by the Strasbourg Court. The Constitutional Court points to the fact that the system in Germany around the civil service, from the principle of life tenure to the fact that alimentati121[121] and working conditions of the civil service are regulated by parliamentary statute (and hence not susceptible to collective bargaining in the narrow sense).[122] The Court emphasized the fact that under the current system, civil servants have a subjective, justiciable and enforceable right under Article 33.5 of the Basic Law to adequate compensation for their work commensurate with their status and rank in the civil service. This right could not survive if the sector were participating in the general regime of collective bargaining. The Court explicitly pointed to the fact that there must not be "cherry-picking", i.e., having the right to industrial action and at the same time a justiciable subjective right to a certain status-adequate compensation.[123]

The Constitutional Court, who has indeed used its power to secure adequate compensation for certain classes of civil servants in several cases decided in the recent past[124], made a strong and rather convincing case for justifying the restrictions placed on civil servants concerning their collective bargaining or industrial action capabilities. One of the problems underlying the actual issue, in this case, is the fact that especially the profession of teachers is marked by severe inequality with varying numbers of teachers employed in state schools as civil servants working side by side with regular public servants. This inequality creates very different working conditions for teachers doing the same job but having one or the other status.

Headnotes:

1. The personal scope of protection of Art. 9(3) of the Basic Law also includes civil servants (Beamte) (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court 19, 303 <312, 322>). While the fundamental right of labour coalitions (Koalitionsfreiheit) is guaranteed without explicit reservation, it can, however, be restricted by conflicting fundamental rights of third parties and other rights of constitutional status.

2. a. The ban on strike action for civil servants is an independent and traditional principle of the career civil service system (Berufsbeamtentum) within the meaning of Art. 33(5) of the Basic Law. It meets both requirements necessary for being qualified as a traditional principle: traditionality and substantiality.

   b. The legislature must have regard to the ban on strike action for civil servants as an independent and traditional principle of the career civil service system. It is closely linked to the civil service principle of alimentation, the duty of loyalty, the principle of lifetime employment and the principle that the legal relationship under civil service law, including remuneration, must be regulated by the legislature.

3. a. The provisions of the Basic Law must be interpreted in a manner that is open to international law. At the level of constitutional law, the text of the European Convention on Human Rights and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights serve as guidelines for the interpretation of the content and scope of fundamental rights and rule of law principles of the Basic Law (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court 74, 358 <370>; 111, 307 <317>; 128, 326 <367 and 368>; established case-law).

   b. According to Art. 46 of the European Convention on Human Rights, the Contracting Parties have undertaken to abide by the final judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in any case to which they are parties (cf. also Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court 111, 307 <320>). Beyond the scope of application of Art. 46 of the European Convention on Human Rights, however, the specific circumstances of the case must particularly be considered to provide for contextualisation when using the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights as guidelines. The Contracting Parties must also identify statements regarding principal values enshrined in the Convention and address them. The direction and guidance have a particularly strong impact if parallel cases within the same legal order are at issue that means (other) proceedings in the state affected by the initial decision of the European Court of Human Rights are affected.

c. The limits to an interpretation that is open to international law follow from the Basic Law. The possibilities of interpretation in a manner open to the Convention end where such an interpretation no longer appears tenable according to the recognised methods of interpretation of statutes and of the Constitution (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court 111, 307 <329>; 128, 326 <371>). Furthermore, where the Basic Law is interpreted in a manner open to the Convention, the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights must be integrated as carefully as possible into the existing, dogmatically differentiated national legal system.

4. The ban on strike action for civil servants in Germany is in accordance with the principle of the Constitution's openness to international law; in particular, it is compatible with the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights. Also with respect to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, it cannot be established that German law conflicts with Art. 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Facts:

The constitutional complaints, which have been joined for a joint decision, concern the question whether German civil servants (Beamte) have the right to participate in strike actions. [...] [1]

[Excerpt from Press Release no. 46 of 12 June 2018]

The complainants are, or were, teachers with civil servant status at schools in three different federal states (Länder). In the past, they took part in protests and strikes organised by a trade union during working hours. In response to their participation, the competent disciplinary authorities imposed sanctions on the complainants. The authorities held that by participating in these events, the civil servants had breached fundamental duties under civil service law. In particular, civil servants were not allowed to be absent from work without permission. In the initial proceedings before the regular courts, the complainants challenged the respective disciplinary orders, ultimately without success.

The constitutional complaints are unfounded. The challenged decisions of the authorities and the courts do not violate the rights of the complainant no. I. and complainants no. II. to IV. [111]

I.

The standards of review under constitutional law applicable to the claimed violations of fundamental rights particularly follow from the freedom of labour coalitions (Koalitionsfreiheit) guaranteed by Art. 9(3) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) (1.), the traditional principles of the career civil service system (Berufsbeamtentum) within the meaning of Art. 33(5) GG (2.), and the principle of the Constitution's openness to international law (3.). [112]

1. a) [...] The freedom of labour coalitions protects all individuals in their capacity as professionals (employees and employers) and does not exclude specific professional fields. Thus, the personal scope of protection of Art. 9(3) GG also includes civil servants in addition to employees in the public sector (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE 19, 303 <312, 322>). [113]

   b) The material scope of protection of Art. 9(3) GG extends to the right to engage in activities that are typical of labour coalition (aa) including the right to strike action (bb). [114]

      aa) According to the Federal Constitutional Court's established case-law, the fundamental right under Art. 9(3) GG is primarily a right to freely engage in activities that are typical of labour coalition (cf. BVerfGE 17, 319 <333>; 19, 303 <312>; 28, 295 <304>; 50, 290 <367>; 58, 233 <246>; 93, 352 <358>; 146, 71 <114 para. 130>) which guarantees the individual freedom to establish associations that serve to promote economic and working conditions and to jointly pursue this aim. […] [115]

      bb) To the extent that the aims protected under Art. 9(3) GG can only be pursued by use of specific means, these means are also protected under the fundamental right (cf. BVerfGE 84, 212 <224 and 225>). The means protected under Art. 9(3) GG are for instance measures of industrial action that are aimed at the conclusion of collective agreements. At least to the extent that they are necessary to ensure effective free collective bargaining, they are subject to the freedom of labour coalitions (cf. BVerfGE 88, 103 <114>; 92, 365 <393 and 394>; 146, 71 <114 and 115 para. 131>). Art. 9(3) third sentence GG also indicates this (cf. BVerfGE 84, 212 <225>). [116]

2. While the fundamental right of labour coalitions is guaranteed without explicit reservation (cf. e.g. BVerfGE 92, 26 <41>), that does not mean that any restrictions are excluded from the outset. Even fundamental rights that are guaranteed without explicit reservation can be restricted by conflicting fundamental rights of third parties and other rights of constitutional status (cf. e.g. BVerfGE 28, 243 <261>; 84, 212 <228>; 92, 26 <41>; 146, 71 <118 para. 141>). The traditional principles of the career civil service system guaranteed by Art. 33(5) GG (cf. BverfGE 19, 303 <322>) can be considered such a limitation with constitutional status. [117]

   a) Art. 33(5) GG is directly applicable law and contains a regulatory duty of the legislature and a guarantee of the career civil service system as an institution (cf. BVerfGE 117, 330 <344>; 119, 247 <260>). The traditional principles of the career civil service system within the meaning of Art. 33(5) GG are the core of structural principles which were generally or at least predominantly recognised as binding and observed during a longer tradition-forming period, in particular in times of the Weimar Constitution (cf. BVerfGE 8, 332 <343>; 46, 97 <117>; 58, 68 <76 and 77>; 83, 89 <98>; 106, 225 <232>; 107, 218 <237>; 117, 330 <344 and 345>; 117, 372 <379>; 121, 205 <219>; without reference to the Weimar Constitution BVerfGE 145, 1 <8 para. 16>). Historically, the development of the career civil service system is closely linked to the development of the state under the rule of law [...]. As an institution, the career civil service system is based on expertise, professional performance and loyal exercise of duties. It is intended to ensure a stable administrative system that functions as an equalising factor vis-à-vis the political forces shaping the state (cf. BVerfGE 7, 155 <162>; 119, 247 <260 and 261>; established case-law). [118]

b) The point of reference in Art. 33(5) GG, which applies to all civil servants, is not the established civil service law, but the career civil service system (cf. BVerfGE 117, 330 <349>). Thus, only such provisions are protected that significantly shape the image of the career civil service system in its traditional form so that their removal would affect the career civil service system as such (cf. BVerfGE 43, 177 <185>; 114, 258 <286>). This requirement of substantiality already follows from the nature of an institutional guarantee which has the purpose of determining the core of structural principles [...] as a binding framework for the legislature when it drafts legal provisions. The Federal Constitutional Court made this clear by stating that not only must Art. 33(5) GG be taken into account, but also be observed in that respect (cf. BVerfGE 8, 1 <16 and 17>; 11, 203 <210>; 61, 43 <57 and 58>). Yet, Art. 33(5) GG does not preclude further developments of civil service law as long as the provisions essential to the image and function of the career civil service system are not subject to structural change (cf. BVerfGE 117, 330 <348 and 349>; 117, 372 <379>). The obligation to take Art. 33(5) GG into account entails an openness to developments that enables the legislature to adjust the provisions of public service law to the respective developments in statehood and thereby adapt the civil service law to current circumstances. Maintaining the general structure of the career civil service system as required by Art. 33(5) GG leaves sufficient room to fit the historically developed institution into the framework of our present statehood (cf. BVerfGE 3, 58 <137>; 7, 155 <162>; 70, 69 <79>) and adjust it to the functions which the Basic Law assigned to public service (öffentlicher Dienst) in the free democracy under the rule of law and the principle of the social state. [119]

c) The core of structural principles, which must be observed and is therefore excluded from profound structural changes by the general legislature, includes among others the civil servants' duty of loyalty (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 <346 and 347>; 119, 247 <264>), the principle of lifetime employment (cf. BVerfGE 71, 255 <268>; 121, 205 <220>), the principle of alimentation (cf. BVerfGE 8, 1 <16 et seq.>; 44, 249 <265>; 49, 260 <271>; 70, 251 <267>; 99, 300 <314>; 106, 225 <232>; 117, 372 <380>; 139, 64 <111 para. 92>; 140, 240 <277 para. 71>) and the corresponding principle that remuneration of civil servants must be determined unilaterally by law (cf. BVerfGE 44, 249 <264>; cf. also BVerfGE 8, 1 <15 et seq.>; 8, 28 <35>). These characteristic structural elements do not exist independently, but are related to each other (on the principle of lifetime employment and the principle of alimentation cf. BVerfGE 119, 247 <263>; 121, 205 <221>; on the duty of loyalty and the principle of alimentation cf. BVerfGE 21, 329 <345>; 44, 249 <264>; 130, 263 <298>; on the civil servants' duty of loyalty and on the employers' duty of care cf. BVerfGE 9, 268 <286>; cf. also BVerfGE 71, 39 <59>). [120]

aa) The civil servants' duty of loyalty is one of the traditional principles of the career civil service system and part of the core of the institutional guarantee under Art. 33(5) GG (cf. already BVerfGE 9, 268 <286>). This duty of loyalty bears special importance even in a modern administrative state whose professional and efficient exercise of functions depends upon an intact, loyal, dutiful staff of civil servants who are deeply committed to the state and its constitutional order (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 <347>). Civil servants are bound to serve the common good and thus to exercise their duty in a disinterested manner and they must set aside their own interests when carrying out the duties entrusted to them. Engaging in activities of industrial disputes and the use of economic pressure to assert one's own interests, in particular measures of collective industrial disputes within the meaning of Art. 9(3) GG like the right to strike are not compatible with the civil servants' duty of loyalty (cf. BVerfGE 119, 247 <264> with further references). The guarantee of positions that are legally and financially secured has the purpose of enabling civil servants to fulfil their duty of loyalty. [121]

bb) The purpose of the principle of lifetime employment is to ensure the civil servants' independence in the interest of an administration under the rule of law. It is the legal and financial security that provide a guarantee that the career civil service system can contribute to the fulfilment of its duty - assigned to it by the Basic Law - of ensuring a stable and lawful administration in the context of the political power play (cf. BVerfGE 121, 205 <221>). This also and above all includes the fact that civil servants cannot be removed from office arbitrarily and at the whim of political bodies. Lifetime employment guarantees that civil servants cannot be removed from the office they hold according to their legal status; this guarantee is of fundamental significance because it provides civil servants with the independence regarding the exercise of their duties, which is necessary in the interest of them being bound by law and justice (cf. BVerfGE 121, 205 <222>; 141, 56 <71 para. 38>). [122]

cc) The principle of alimentation obliges the employer to support civil servants and their families with an appropriate lifetime alimentation and to ensure an appropriate maintenance (Lebensunterhalt) according to the development of the general economic and financial conditions and the general standard of living. The level of this maintenance is also corresponding to the grade, the responsibilities related to their office, and the relevance of the career civil service system for the general public (cf. BVerfGE 8, 1 <14>; 117, 330 <351>; 119, 247 <269>; 130, 263 <292>; 139, 64 <111 and 112 para. 93>; 140, 240 <278 para. 72>). Remuneration of civil servants is not considered a compensation for certain specific services, but the employer pays civil servants in "return" for being available to the employer with their entire personality. It is the prerequisite that civil servants can completely commit themselves to public service as a lifetime profession and fulfil the function, assigned to them in the state system, of ensuring a stable administration, thereby constituting a balancing factor to the political forces that shape the state (cf. BVerfGE 7, 155 <162 and 163>; 21, 329 <345>; 39, 196 <201>; 44, 249 <265>; 117, 372 <380>; established case-law). This leads to the irrefutable conclusion that the securing of an appropriate maintenance must be regarded as a particularly significant traditional principle, which must be observed by the state (BVerfGE 8, 1 <16 and 17>; 117, 372 <380 and 381>). [123]

The direct objective guarantee of an appropriate maintenance under Art. 33(5) GG also establishes an individual right each civil servant holds vis-à-vis the state that is equivalent to a fundamental right (cf. BVerfGE 99, 300 <314>; 107, 218 <236 and 237>; 117, 330 <344>; 119, 247 <266>; 130, 263 <292>). […] [124]

d) […] [125]

3. The provisions of the Basic Law must be interpreted in a manner that is open to international law. While the European Convention on Human Rights ranks as statutory federal law and is therefore below constitutional rank (a), it must be taken into account when interpreting fundamental rights and the constitutional principles of the rule of law (b). This also applies to the interpretation of the European Convention on Human Rights by the European Court of Human Rights (c). This significance of the European Convention on Human Rights and thus also of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights is based on the Constitution's openness to international law and its substantive focus on human rights (d). Using them as guidelines for interpretation does not require that the statements of the Basic Law and those of the European Convention on Human Rights be schematically aligned or completely harmonised, but that the values be included (e). Beyond Art. 46 ECHR, special importance must be attached to the specific context of the decision by the European Court of Human Rights when interpreting the Basic Law. Where it is methodologically untenable or incompatible with the Basic Law to include values of the European Convention on Human Rights, the Constitution's openness to international law is limited (g). [126]

a) The European Convention on Human Rights and its protocols are international treaties. The Convention leaves it to the Contracting Parties to decide in what way to comply with their duty to observe the provisions of the Convention (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <316> with further references). The federal legislature approved of the indicated conventions by formal act in accordance with Art. 59(2) GG (Act on the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms - Gesetz über die Konvention zum Schutze der Menschenrechte und Grundfreiheiten of 7 August 1952, Federal Law Gazette, Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl II p. 685; according to the publication of 15 December 1953, BGBl II 1954 p. 14, the Convention entered into force for the Federal Republic of Germany on 3 September 1953; the Convention was newly published in the version of the 11th Protocol in BGBl II 2002 p. 1054). With this approval, the federal legislature issued the respective order giving effect to international law. Within the German legal system, the European Convention on Human Rights and its protocols - to the extent that they entered into force in Germany - have the rank of statutory federal law (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 111, 307 <316 and 317>). [127]

b) At the same time, the guarantees provided by the European Convention on Human Rights also have constitutional significance as they influence the interpretation of fundamental rights and the constitutional principles of the rule of law (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 83, 119 <128>; 111, 307 <316 and 317, 329>; 120, 180 <200 and 201>; 128, 326 <367 and 368>; Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGK 3, 4 <8>; 9, 174 <190>; 10, 66 <77>; 10, 234 <239>; 20, 234 <247>). According to established case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court, the text of the European Convention on Human Rights and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights serve, at the level of constitutional law, as guidelines for the interpretation of the content and scope of fundamental rights and constitutional principles of the rule of law provided that this does not lead to restricting or lowering the protection of fundamental rights under the Basic Law - which is also not the intent of the Convention (cf. Art. 53 ECHR) (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 111, 307 <317>; 120, 180 <200 and 201>). [128]

c) Pursuant to Art. 46 ECHR, the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights rendered in proceedings against Germany must be abided by. When using the European Convention on Human Rights as guideline for interpretation, the Federal Constitutional Court also takes into account decisions of the European Court of Human Rights even if they do not concern the same issue. This is based on the factual function of direction and guidance attached to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights with regard to interpreting the European Convention on Human Rights, also beyond the decision of a specific case (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <320>; 128, 326 <368>; BVerfGK10, 66 <77 and 78>; 10, 234 <239>). Since the Basic Law is intended to avoid conflicts between domestic law and Germany's obligations under international law, where possible and with regard to the at least factual precedent character of the decisions of international tribunals, the effects of decisions of the European Court of Human Rights on the domestic level are, in that respect, not restricted to the duty, derived from Art. 20(3) GG in conjunction with Art. 59(2) GG, to take account of these decisions regarding only the circumstances on which the specific decisions are based (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <328>; 112, 1 <25 and 26>; BVerfGK 9, 174 <190, 193>). The Constitution's openness to international law thus expresses an understanding of sovereignty that is not only in favour of an integration into international and supranational contexts and their further development, but requires and expects them. Against this background, even the "final say" of the German Constitution is not opposed to an international and European dialogue of courts, but provides its normative basis. [129]

d) Using the European Convention on Human Rights and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights as guidelines for interpretation at the level of constitutional law beyond individual cases serves to give effect to the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights as extensively as possible in Germany, and, in addition, it may contribute to avoid the Federal Republic of Germany being held in violation (BVerfGE 128, 326 <369>). The substantive orientation of the Basic Law to human rights is expressed in the German people's profession of inviolable and inalienable human rights in Article 1(2) GG in particular. In Article 1(2) GG, the Basic Law accords special protection to the core of human rights. In conjunction with Article 59(2) GG, it is the basis for the constitutional duty of using the European Convention on Human Rights in its specific manifestation as an interpretation guideline even when applying German fundamental rights. Article 1(2) of the Basic Law is therefore not a gateway to give the European Convention on Human Rights direct constitutional rank, but the provision is more than a non-binding programmatic statement in that it provides a principle for the interpretation of the Basic Law and spells out the fact that its fundamental rights must also be understood as a manifestation of general human rights and have incorporated the latter as a minimum standard (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 111, 307 <329>; 128, 326 <369> […]). [130]

e) Using the European Convention on Human Rights as a guideline for interpretation of the provisions of the Basic Law is focussed on the outcomes: It does not aim at schematically aligning individual constitutional concepts in parallel (BVerfGE 137, 273 <320 and 321 para. 128> with further references), but serves to avoid violations of international law. While it may often be easier to remove or avoid violations of international law if domestic law is harmonised with the Convention, this is not imperative under international law: The Convention leaves it to the Contracting Parties to decide how they comply with their duty to observe the provisions of the Convention (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <316>; 128, 326 <367>). In light of this, it must be stated that similarities of norm texts must not cover up the differences which follow from the context of the legal systems. This applies to the interpretation of concepts of the Basic Law in a manner that is open to international law and, in a similar way, to the interpretation based on comparative analyses of constitutions. The human rights content of the relevant international treaty must be "adapted" to the context of the receiving constitutional system in an active process (of acknowledgment) (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <370> […]). [131]

f) According to Art. 46 of the European Convention on Human Rights, the Contracting Parties have undertaken to abide by the final judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in any case to which they are parties (cf. also BVerfGE 111, 307 <320>). Beyond the scope of application of Art. 46 ECHR, however, the specific circumstances of the case must particularly be considered to provide for contextualisation when using the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights as guidelines. […]. In this context, it must first be considered that, unlike the law of the European Union (cf. BVerfGE 75, 223 <244 and 245>), the European Convention on Human Rights does not have precedence of application (Anwendungsvorrang) over domestic statutory law for lack of a respective national order giving effect to international law. In that regard, the rights under the Convention do not take precedence over the German constitutional order, but rather are an important principle for the interpretation of the Basic Law. Therefore, beyond its inter-partes effect taking account of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights primarily means to identify statements regarding principal values enshrined in the Convention and address them [...]. If possible, a conflict with principal values enshrined in the Convention must be avoided. Acknowledging the Convention's direction and guidance function therefore requires elements of comparability with national law. When the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights is taken into account, the specific facts of the decided case and its background (in terms of legal culture) must be included as well as possible specific particularities of the German legal order. They conflict with an indiscriminate transfer in terms of a mere "parallel alignment of concepts". The direction and guidance have a particularly strong impact if parallel cases within the same legal order are at issue that means (other) proceedings in the state affected by the initial decision of the European Court of Human Rights are affected. [132]

g) The limits of an interpretation that is open to international law follow from the Basic Law. The possibilities of interpretation in a manner open to the Convention end where such an interpretation no longer appears tenable according to the recognised methods of interpretation of statutes and of the Constitution (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <329>; 128, 326 <371>; cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <344 et seq.> on the absolute limit of the core of the constitutional identity of the Basic Law pursuant to Art. 79(3) GG). If German courts have latitude for interpreting and balancing within the scope of recognised methods of the interpretation of laws, they are obliged to give precedence to an interpretation that is in accordance with the Convention. The situation is different only if observing the decision of the European Court of Human Rights violates, for instance due to a changed factual basis, clearly opposing statutory law or German constitutional provisions, in particular fundamental rights of third parties (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <329>). It is therefore not contrary to the objective of openness to international law if the legislature does not observe international treaty law in exceptional cases, provided this is the only way to avert a violation of fundamental constitutional principles (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <319>). [133]

Moreover, an interpretation of fundamental rights in a manner that is open to international law may not result in a limitation of the protection of fundamental rights as afforded by the Basic Law; this is also excluded by the European Convention on Human Rights itself (cf. Art. 53 ECHR, on this cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <317>). Above all, this obstacle to acknowledging international law may become significant in multi-polar fundamental rights relationships in which the increase of liberty for one holder of fundamental rights means a decrease of liberty for the other at the same time (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <371> with further references). [134]

Furthermore, where the Basic Law is interpreted in a manner that is open to the Convention, the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights must be integrated as carefully as possible into the existing, dogmatically differentiated national legal system (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <327>; 128, 326 <371>). Therefore, international law concepts must not be adopted indiscriminately. Particularly where, with regard to guarantees that have a similar text, a concept of the European Court of Human Rights has developed autonomously and differs from the corresponding Basic Law concept, the principle of proportionality as a principle inherent in the Basic Law is available for taking account of assessments of the European Court of Human Rights from the perspective of the Basic Law: in light of this, "using them as interpretation guidelines" may mean that aspects considered by the European Court of Human Rights in its weighing of interests are also included in the constitutional review of proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <324>; 128, 326 <371 and 372>; BVerfGK 3, 4 <9>). [135]

II.

The acts of public authority challenged by the constitutional complaints are not objectionable under constitutional law. Partly based on different reasons, the authorities ultimately assumed that German civil servants are subject to a ban on strike action. In doing so, they did not disregard the relevant constitutional requirements. It is true that the complainant no I. and the complainants no. II. to IV. fall within the scope of protection of the freedom of labour coalitions (1) and that the measures challenged in the initial proceedings constitute an interference with the fundamental right under Art. 9(3) GG (2.). However, these interferences are justified under constitutional law (3.). A different assessment cannot be reached even with regard to the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights (4.). [136]

1. The freedom of labour coalitions has no direct constitutional limits due to the traditional principles of the career civil service system (Art. 33(5) GG) (a). The matter at hand falls within the material scope of protection of Art. 9(3) of the Basic Law (b). [137]

a) So far, the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court contains no specific statements with regard to the relation between Art. 9(3) GG and Art. 33(5) GG. [...] [138]

However, a systematic and teleological interpretation leads to the conclusion that the traditional principles of the career civil service system are conflicting constitutional law and may justify limiting Art. 9(3) GG; they are not direct constitutional limits to the freedom of labour coalitions [...]. Such an interpretation takes account of the prominent status of fundamental rights as core of the free democratic order (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 <73>) and avoids a premature and abstract balancing of interests with the consequence of realising one legal interest at the expense of another [...]. Rather, this approach takes full account of the principle of practical concordance by which two interests protected by the Constitution are reconciled in such a way as to find the most careful balance. Each of these interests must be realised to the largest extent possible so that it can reach its maximum effectiveness. This also holds true for the structural principles of Art. 33(5) GG which do not exclude a balancing with other interests from the outset [...]. [139]

b) [...] Repeatedly, and most previously in its decision on the Act on Uniformity of Collective Agreements (Tarifeinheitsgesetz), the Federal Constitutional Court held that measures of industrial action that are aimed at the conclusion of collective agreements, at least to the extent that they are necessary to ensure effective free collective bargaining, are protected under Art. 9(3) GG (cf. BVerfGE 84, 212 <225>; 88, 103 <114>; 92, 365 <393 and 394>; 146, 71 <114 and 115 para. 131>). A statement to the effect that a strike must always be held in connection with the conclusion of a collective agreement, can, however, not be found in the Court's previous decisions. In fact, for actions to be protected under Art. 9(3) GG it is decisive that they are initiated by trade unions and related to collective bargaining (cf. BVerfG, Order of the Third Chamber of the First Senate of 26 March 2014 - 1 BvR 3185/09 -, juris, para. 26 et seq.). The Federal Labour Court does not (no longer) exclude a strike called by a trade union in support of a strike aimed at the conclusion of a collective agreement from the scope of protection of Art. 9(3) GG [...]. In line with an interpretation that is in accordance with the Constitution's openness to international law, such a broad understanding of Art. 9(3) GG and the effort to guarantee a protection of fundamental rights as extensive as possible expressed therein, also draws on the assessments of the European Court of Human Rights regarding Art. 11 ECHR. According to these assessments, secondary strikes are at least an accessory aspect of the freedom of labour coalitions (cf. ECtHR, National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 8 April 2014, no. 31045/10, § 77). In the proceedings at hand, the alleged participation of the complainant no I. and the complainants no. II. to IV. in (token) strike actions called by the trade union Gewerkschaft Erziehung und Wissenschaft (GEW) took place in connection with collective bargaining for the public sector conducted at that time and is therefore not obviously unsuitable to contribute to reaching the aims pursued in the course of the main labour dispute. [140]

2. The challenged decisions of the authorities and the courts impair the fundamental right under Art. 9(3) GG. Any curtailing of the fundamental rights guarantees limits the freedom of labour coalitions. All regulations and measures complicating the exercise of fundamental rights at any stage are therefore considered impairments by the state. […] The disciplinary sanctioning of the complainant no. I. and the complainants no. II. to IV. for their actions by orders issued by their employers and the upholding of the challenged decisions by the disciplinary courts restrict the possibility to participate in labour disputes. [141]

3. However, the impairment of the freedom of labour coalitions is justified by sufficiently weighty interests that are protected under constitutional law. [142]

It is unobjectionable under constitutional law that the decisions challenged by the constitutional complaints consider the ban on strike action for civil servants to be a traditional principle with constitutional status (a), which the legislature must not only take into account but observe (b). A legal provision that expressly lays down the ban on strike action for civil servants is not required (c). Nor does the status-related ban on strike actions for civil servants disproportionately interfere with the guarantee under Art. 9(3) GG (d). [143]

a) The ban on strike action for civil servants is an independent and traditional principle of the career civil service system within the meaning of Art. 33(5) GG. It meets both requirements necessary for being qualified as a traditional principle: traditionality (aa) and substantiality (bb). [144]

The wording of Art. 33(5) GG does not specify what is considered a traditional principle under the Constitution. [...] [145]

[…] [146]

aa) The ban on strike action for civil servants fulfils the element of traditionality which is essential for being regarded as an independent and traditional principle of the career civil service system. [...] The ban on strike actions for civil servants […] traces back to a line of tradition established (at least) in the state practice of the Weimar Republic, and, on this basis, proves to be traditional within the meaning of Art. 33(5) GG. [147]

[…] [148]

bb) In substantive terms, the ban on strike action is closely linked to the foundations of the German career civil service system under constitutional law, in particular to the duty of loyalty under civil service law and to the principle of alimentation. In view of that, the requirement of substantiality is satisfied. [149]

[…] [150-151]

According to the present constitutional concept of the career civil service system, the ban on strike action is inseparably linked to the principle of alimentation and the duty of loyalty. A right to strike for civil servants is incompatible with these two principles which are essential elements of a civil servant's functions; rather, the ban on strike action for civil servants guarantees and justifies the present set-up of the described structural principles of the career civil service system. Against this background, the ban on strike action for civil servants under Art. 33(5) GG is an independent structural principle of the career civil service system that is necessary for the system and thus fundamental. […] Abandoning it would fundamentally challenge the order of the career civil service system as it exists in Germany [...]. [152]

b) The ban on strike action is part of the institutional guarantee under Art. 33(5) GG and must be observed by the legislature. A right to strike, even for some groups of civil servants only, would fundamentally reshape the understanding and regulations of the civil service. It would erode the principles of alimentation, of the duty of loyalty, of lifetime employment, and the principle that material rights and duties, including remuneration, must be regulated by the legislature. At the very least, it would require fundamental changes to these principles, which are essential to the functioning of the civil service. If a right to strike was granted, there would be no scope, for instance, for regulating remuneration by law. If civil servants' remuneration or parts of it could be negotiated by means of labour disputes, the existing possibility for civil servants to enforce alimentation, guaranteed by the Constitution, before the courts - and hence the guarantee of subjective rights under Art. 33(5) GG - could no longer be justified. Yet the alimentation principle, in combination with the principle of lifetime employment, serves to ensure the independent exercise of duty and guarantees civil servants the means necessary to fulfil their obligation to fully dedicate themselves to their office. In order to ensure that, the Federal Constitutional Court has identified the duty of the employer to remunerate civil servants commensurate with their office as an essential part of the principle of alimentation (cf. BVerfGE 130, 263 <292>; 139, 64 <111 and 112 para. 93>; 140, 240 <278 para. 72>; 141, 56 <70 para. 35>; 145, 249 <272 para. 48>; 145, 304 <324 and 325 para. 66>). A (partial) abandonment of these closely linked core principles would challenge the career civil service system as such and thus the matter regulated in Art. 33(5) GG […]. Therefore, a right to strike for civil servants would not merely mean to adapt the provisions of the public service law to the current developments of statehood and the civil service law to current circumstances. Rather, it would interfere with the core of structural principles guaranteed under Art. 33(5) GG. Hence, the obligation to observe the ban on strike action blocks the way to profound structural changes effected by the general legislature […] [153]

c) A legal provision that expressly lays down a ban on strike action for civil servants is not required under constitutional law. […]. [154]

The disciplinary orders challenged by the present constitutional complaints referred, among other legal bases, to the provisions on the absence from work included in the Land laws on civil servants. In addition, the orders partially also referred to the Law on the Status Rights of Civil Servants in the Länder (Gesetz zur Regelung des Statusrechts der Beamtinnen und Beamten in den Ländern - BeamtStG) regulating the fundamental duties of civil servants, which include the disinterested exercise of duty for the common good and the obligation to follow instructions (§§ 33-35 BeamtStG). [...] If the fundamental duties of civil servants specifically regulated by law include to fully dedicate themselves to their office and to exercise their duties in a disinterested manner and in good faith (cf. also § 61(1) of the Law on Federal Civil Servants, Bundesbeamtengesetz - BBG, § 34 BeamtStG) it is inferred that measures of collective industrial disputes to assert common (own) professional interests are prohibited (cf. also Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE 53, 330 <331>). It is not required under constitutional law to further regulate the ban on strike action beyond this. [155]

d) To the extent that it concerns the participation of civil servants in labour disputes, the restriction of the freedom of labour coalitions is not objectionable under constitutional law. The ban on strike action for civil servants has its basis in Art. 33(5) GG and accommodates the principle of practical concordance. [156]

aa) Like the remaining core of structural principles of the career civil service system within the meaning of Art. 33(5) GG, the ban on strike action for civil servants serves the purpose of maintaining a stable administration (cf. BVerfGE 56, 146 <162> with further references), of ensuring the fulfilment of state functions and thereby the functioning of the state and its institutions. This goal, which the Constitution also guarantees through other provisions of Art. 33 GG, is achieved inter alia by a staff of civil servants, whose working conditions are unilaterally determined by the state, whose labour can always be requested, in particular in times of crisis, and which refrains from participating in a power struggle with the employer or the democratically legitimated legislature. The conflict between Art. 9(3) GG and Art 33(5) GG must be resolved in accordance with the principle of practical concordance, which means that conflicting constitutional law positions must be assessed in terms of how they interact and they must be balanced in such a way that they are as effective as possible for all persons involved (cf. BVerfGE 28, 243 <260 and 261>; 41, 29 <50 and 51>; 93, 1 <21>; 134, 204 <223 para. 68>; established case-law). [157]

bb) The conflict between the freedom of labour coalitions and Art. 33(5) GG must be resolved in favour of the ban on strike action for civil servants. The weight of the interference with Art. 9(3) GG is not unreasonable for civil servants. On the one hand, the right to strike [...] is only one element of the freedom of labour coalitions. A ban on strike action does not result in the complete irrelevance of the freedom of labour coalitions and does not render it entirely ineffective. On the other hand, the legislature has created provisions designed to help compensate for the restriction of Art. 9(3) GG for civil servants. Although the mentioned provisions of § 118 BBG and § 53 BeamtStG as well as the civil service laws of the Länder do not accord any co-decision rights to the trade unions' umbrella organisations, they are granted participation rights when legal provisions for the civil service are drawn up. According to the explanatory memorandum to the law, this participation was created to compensate for the ban on strike action (cf. Bundestag document - BTDrucks 16/4027, p. 35). Another element of these compensating measures is the alimentation principle under civil service law. It grants civil servants the right, which is equivalent to fundamental rights, to subject the state's duty of alimentation to judicial review and, enforce it before the courts if necessary. In this reciprocal system of interrelated rights and duties, expansions or restrictions of one right or duty of the civil service generally also result in changes to the other rights or duties. The civil service status does not permit "cherry-picking" (cf. also BVerfGE 130, 263 <298>). [….] A right to strike (for certain groups of civil servants) would trigger a chain reaction with regard to the structuring of the civil service and would affect essential principles of civil service law and related institutions [...]. Granting the right to strike would raise the question of its effects on the introduction of a collective bargaining system and the commitment to collective agreements of civil servants and employers, on the continued validity or change of the alimentation principle and the principle of lifetime employment, on single aspects like health insurance benefits and the civil servants' exemption from payment of social security contributions and on the possibility to enforce the right to alimentation commensurate with the civil servants' office before the courts. [...] [158]

cc) Balancing the positions as carefully as possible in terms of practical concordance cannot be achieved by granting of a restricted right to strike that is subject to special requirements which must be developed by judicial decisions or provided for by statutes, as for example an obligation to notify of or obtain an approval for a planned strike action. [...] A (restricted) right to strike that is subject to such conditions would reduce the negative effects of the strike action on the realisation of fundamental rights by third persons, e.g. parents, students and the impairments on the functioning of the administration. Furthermore, an obligation of notifying or obtaining an approval would allow the administrative bodies to at least partly ensure that their duties are fulfilled. [...] However, this would only be possible - and this is an important objection because of the unpredictability - if a sufficient number of civil servants would decide not to participate in the strike action or could be excluded from participating in the strike by imposing a ban in individual cases. [159]

In case of longer lasting labour disputes and the participation of persons with operative functions in schools, the educational mandate of the state pursuant to Art. 7(1) GG (cf. on this BVerfGE 47, 46 <71>; 93, 1 <21>; 98, 218 <244>), i. e. a functioning school system (cf. BVerfGE 138, 1 <29 para. 80>) - which is also protected under constitutional law - can no longer be ensured on a continued basis. [...] [160]

A weighing of the freedom of labour coalitions against the traditional principles of the career civil service system in accordance with the principle of practical concordance does also not require that the ban on strike action be limited to a particular group of civil servants by taking into account their functions stipulated in Art. 33(4) GG [...]. This would mean that for civil servants whose main role is to exercise public authority within the meaning of this provision, a ban on strike action would continue to be in effect; all other civil servants would have to be granted a right to strike [...]. Dividing civil servants into groups that have or do not have the right to strike based on their different functions would entail difficulties of distinction that are connected to the concept of public authority. [...] To clearly determine whether a specific official act involves the exercise of public authority is already extremely difficult. It is also difficult to make a distinction in cases where the specific official act is not the determining factor, but where it must be clarified whether a particular civil servant who performs different functions (partly public authority functions, partly non-public authority functions) as a result of a delegation, reassignment or transfer is to be accorded the right to strike. Regardless of these considerations, the recognition of a right to strike for "civil servants in marginal areas" would mean forgoing the guarantee of a stable administration and the exercise of state functions other than those stipulated in Art. 33(4) GG. Besides, a right to strike based on functional criteria within the meaning of Art. 33(4) GG would create a special category of "civil servants with the right to strike" or "civil servants subject to collective agreements" [...]. This category would be added as a "third pillar" to the refined system of public service. While the alimentation principle would continue to apply for civil servants who exercise core functions of public authority, other civil servants would be given the possibility of enforcing demands regarding their working conditions through labour dispute measures where applicable, while keeping their civil servant status. In addition to the existing problem of proper distinction and of equal treatment with regard to employees in the public service, this would raise the question to what extent this category of personnel could still be regarded as having the legal status of civil servants [...]. [161]

4. The ban on strike action for civil servants in Germany is in accordance with the principle of the Constitution's openness to international law; in particular, it is compatible with the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights. The European Court of Human Rights has further developed its case-law with regard to Art. 11 ECHR in a number of proceedings (a). When taking into consideration the decisions' essential principal values, a conflict between German law and the European Convention on Human Rights can presently not be established (b). Regardless of this, and with regard to the particularities of the German system of career civil service, the Senate finds that the requirements to restrict the right to strike stipulated in Art. 11(2) ECHR would also be met (c). [163]

a) Art. 11(1) ECHR grants every person the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others; this also includes the right to form and join trade unions for the protection of his interests. In its recent case-law, the European Court of Human Rights has further specified the guarantees of Art. 11(1) ECHR and the conditions of interference under Art. 11(2) ECHR. [164]

aa) In the case Demir and Baykara v. Turkey (Judgment of 12 November 2008 no. 34503/97, § 145) the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights held that the freedom of association of Art. 11(1) ECHR includes the right to form and join a trade union, the prohibition of closed-shop agreements and the right for a trade union to seek to persuade the employer to hear what it has to say on behalf of its members. For its interpretation of the provision, the European Court of Human Rights has taken into account other international instruments (Convention No. 87 and No. 98 of the International Labour Organisation, European Social Charter) and their interpretation by the competent organs as well as the practice of the European states (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, § 85). In that specific case which concerned a collective agreement between the Turkish trade union Tüm Bel Sen and a Turkish municipality, the European Court of Human Rights held that members of the administration of the State cannot be excluded from the scope of Art. 11 ECHR. At most, restrictions can be imposed in accordance with the requirements of Article 11(2) ECHR. However, the groups of persons stated in the exceptions set out in Article 11(2) second sentence ECHR are to be construed strictly (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, §§ 107, 119). The Turkish Government omitted to show a pressing social need for the exclusion from the right to collective bargaining (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, §§ 163 et seq.). The explanation that civil servants enjoy a privileged position in relation to other workers is not sufficient in this context (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, §§ 168). [165]

The concurring opinion of Judge Spielmann concerning the aforementioned Judgment of 12 November 2008, joined by Judges Bratza, Casadevall and Villiger, emphasises the importance of the right to freedom of labour coalitions also for the public service (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, Separate Opinion of Judge Spielmann §§ 1 et sq.) According to the opinion, it must be taken into account that, in many legal systems, the statutory situation of civil servants is governed by laws or regulations, from which no derogation can be made by means of individual agreements. Referring to Nicolas Valticos (Droit International du Travail, Vol. 8 [Droit du Travail], 2nd Edition 1983, p. 264 et seq.), the separate opinion states that the concept of relation between the state and its civil servants varies depending on the country. In some countries civil servants and other public officials - or most of them - tend to be treated as workers in the private sector, as regards, for example, collective bargaining and even the right to strike. In other countries, however, the traditional notions are still recognised. It is further stated that another problem stems from the fact that the definition of civil servant varies in scope depending on the country, according to the extent of the public sector and to whether or not a distinction is made - and also to what degree - between civil servants as such and public-sector employees in a broader sense (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, Separate Opinion of Judge Spielmann § 6). Even though the right to bargain collectively has been finally recognised by the decision of the Grand Chamber of 12 November 2008, certain exceptions or limits must nevertheless always be possible in the public service, provided that the role of staff representatives in the drafting of the applicable employment conditions or regulations remains guaranteed (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, Separate Opinion of Judge Spielmann § 8). The authorising of public officials to make their voices heard certainly implies that they have a right to engage in social dialogue with their employer, but not necessarily the right to enter into collective agreements or that states have a corresponding obligation to enable the existence of such agreements. States must therefore be able to retain a certain freedom of choice in such matters (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, Separate Opinion of Judge Spielmann §§ 8 and 9). [166]

bb) In the case Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey in 2009, concerning the application of a civil servants trade union, the Chamber of the Third Section of the European Court of Human Rights held that a ban on strike action interferes with the guarantees of Art. 11(1) ECHR. It states that a strike enables a trade union to make its voice heard and that it is an important factor enabling the trade-union members to protect their interests (cf. ECtHR, Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, Judgment of 21 April 2009, no. 68959/01, § 24). However, the right to strike is not an absolute right and can be subject to conditions and restrictions. The Chamber also held that the principle of freedom of trade unions is in accordance with a ban on strike action for civil servants exercising public authority on behalf of the state. In the case Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, a circular placed a prohibition on the right to strike on all civil servants without considering the goals stipulated in Art. 11(2) ECHR. The Turkish government failed to demonstrate that the restriction it imposed was necessary in a democratic society (cf. ECtHR, Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, Judgment of 21 April 2009, no 68959/01, § 32). [167]

cc) Even before that, in its Judgment of 27 March 2007, the Chamber of the Second Section of the European Court of Human Rights decided on the scope of Art. 11 ECHR with regard to the legal situation in Turkey (cf. ECtHR, Karaçay v. Turkey, Judgment of 27 March 2007, no. 6615/03). First, the European Court of Human Rights set out that the personal scope of protection of Art. 11(1) ECHR was comprehensive and did not a priori exclude civil servants (cf. ECtHR, Karaçay v. Turkey, Judgment of 27 March 2007, no. 6615/03, § 22). The disciplinary warning imposed in case of the applicant, an electrician who participated in a strike held in connection with the remuneration of civil servants, would not have been necessary in a democratic society. (cf. ECtHR, Karaçay v. Turkey, Judgment of 27 March 2007, no. 6615/03, §§ 37 and 38). [168]

dd) On 17 July 2008, the Chamber of the Second Section of the European Court of Human Rights decided in the case Urcan and others v. Turkey on applications of a number of Turkish teachers on whom disciplinary sanctions had been imposed by Turkish courts for going on strike for one day. In this context, the European Court of Human Rights held that these sanctions constituted an interference with Art. 11 ECHR with regard to the freedom of assembly. It further stated that the measure was not justified within the meaning of Art. 11(2) ECHR, since the interference had not been necessary in a democratic society (cf. ECtHR, Urcan and others v. Turkey, Judgment of 17 July 2008, no. 23018/04 and others, §§ 26 et seq.). [169]

ee) After the decisions in the cases Demir and Baykara v. Turkey and Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, the European Court of Human Rights repeatedly dealt with the guarantees under Art. 11 ECHR in application proceedings brought against Turkey. In the case Kaya and Seyhan v. Turkey, the Chamber of the Second Section ruled on sanctions imposed on two teachers and trade-union members who participated in a day of action against a law concerning the organisation of the public service (cf. ECtHR, Kaya and Seyhan v. Turkey, Judgment of 15 September 2009, no. 30946/04, §§ 5 and 6). The European Court of Human Rights held that the disciplinary measures imposed on the applicants did not correspond to a compelling social need and thus were not necessary in a democratic society. These measures constituted a disproportionate impairment of the applicants' right to freedom of assembly (cf. ECtHR, Kaya and Seyhan v. Turkey, Judgment of 15 September 2009, no. 30946/04, § 31). [170]

ff) In the case Saime Özcan v.Turkey the Chamber of the Second Section, on 15 September 2009, again ruled on an application of a teacher who also was a tradeunion member and had participated in a national day of strike fighting for the improvement of working conditions of civil servants. Referring to the decisions on the cases Urcan and others v. Turkey and Karaçay v. Turkey, the Chamber concluded that the initial criminal conviction of the teacher was a violation of Art. 11 ECHR (cf. ECtHR, Saime Özcan v. Turkey, Judgment of 15 September 2009, no. 22943/04, §§ 22 et seq.). In its Judgment of 13 July 2010 in the case Çerikci v. Turkey that concerned a Turkish municipal civil servant's participation in a strike and the disciplinary measures subsequently imposed, the Chamber of the Second Section referred to its findings in the case Karaçay v. Turkey and again held that there was a violation of Art. 11 ECHR (cf. ECtHR, Çerikci v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 July 2010, no. 33322/07, §§ 14 and 15). [171]

b) When considering the findings of the European Court of Human Rights in the aforementioned cases, it can neither be established that the current legal situation in Germany is not in compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights, nor that domestic law conflicts with the Convention. If domestic law does not conflict with the Convention, questions concerning the limits of the Constitution's openness to international law, which have been raised in the constitutional complaint proceedings, are not essential for the decision in the present case. In particular, there is presently no need to clarify, whether the ban on strike action for civil servants, which is a traditional principle of the career civil service system and a traditional element of the German state structure (cf. paras. 144 et seq. above), also is a fundamental constitutional principle [...]. Nonetheless, many arguments would support this. [172]

[...] The Judgment pronounced against Turkey as well as the other decisions in the application proceedings Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Karaçay v. Turkey, Urcan and others v. Turkey, Kaya and Seyhan v. Turkey, Saime Özcan v. Turkey, Çerikci v. Turkey do not attain immediate legal validity for the Federal Republic of Germany […] (cf. also BVerfGE 111, 307 <320>). In this context, it must be taken into account that inter partes statements concerning a specific case are made before the background of the respective relevant legal system and that conceptual similarities must not cover up differences that arise from the context of legal orders (cf. also BVerfGE 128, 326 <370> […]). Decisions of the European Court of Human Rights also have a specific relevance for the interpretation of domestic law in compliance with the Convention that goes beyond Art. 46 ECHR and results from their direction and guidance function. The guidance function has a particularly strong impact if it applies to parallel cases within the same legal order, that means (other) proceedings in the contracting state affected by the initial decision of the European Court of Human Rights are affected [...]. Beyond this impact on parallel cases, the direction and guidance function must be taken into account by reviewing one's own legal order (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <320>) and by adopting the principal values formulated by the European Court of Human Rights in terms of abstract, general guidelines (cf. also BVerfGK 3, 4 <9>). [173]

Art. 9(3) GG and the related case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court specify that German civil servants are also subject to the personal scope of protection of the freedom of labour coalitions without exception (cf. BVerfGE 19, 303 <312, 322> […]), but cannot exercise the right to strike as one manifestation of Art. 9(3) GG due to conflicting constitutional law (Art. 33(5) GG); thus, they are in accordance with the principal values enshrined in the Convention. Regarding the scope of protection and restrictions of Art. 11 ECHR, the European Court of Human Rights has developed principal statements in terms of values that must be considered in the context of an interpretation that is open to the Convention. In the case Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, the Grand Chamber elaborated on the scope of protection when assessing the guarantees under Art. 11 ECHR (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, §§ 96 et seq.). Regarding the personal scope of protection, the Chamber concluded that members of the state administration cannot generally be excluded from the scope of Art. 11 ECHR, and that, at most, restrictions can be imposed on those members (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, § 107). Moreover, it held that these restrictions must not impair the very essence of the freedom of association (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, § 97 [...]). A similar assessment can be found in the Judgment in the case Karaçay v. Turkey, which states that the right to join trade unions guaranteed by Art. 11(1) ECHR is afforded to everyone and also civil servants are not automatically excluded from it (ECtHR, Karaçay v. Turkey, Judgment of 27 March 2007, no. 6615/03, § 22). [174]

Particularly with regard to the right to strike, the European Court of Human Rights, in the case Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, put forward the abstract principle of interpretation that a strike enables trade unions to make their voice heard and to protect their interests (cf. ECtHR, Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, Judgment of 21 April 2009, no. 68959/01, § 24). German law does not conflict with this assessment either. As far as the representation of civil servants in Germany is concerned, the umbrella organisations of the competent trade unions are not granted a right to strike, but the right to participate in the drafting of general provisions concerning the working conditions under civil service law (cf. § 118 BBG and § 53 BeamtStG and the provisions of civil service laws of the Länder). Even if this procedure does not and, due to the lack of any commitment to collective agreements, cannot create the atmosphere of pressure that is inherent in labour disputes, it enables trade unions to make their voice heard by means of a compensation and balancing measure. [175]

c) Regardless of the question whether the ban on strike action for civil servants constitutes an interference with Art. 11(1) ECHR, it is in any case justified under Art. 11(2) first sentence (aa) and Art. 11(2) second sentence ECHR (bb) based on the particularities of the German system of the career civil service. [176]

aa) (1) In Germany, the ban on strike action is prescribed by law within the meaning of Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR. This requires that a basis exists in domestic law (cf. ECtHR, Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, Judgment of 21 April 2009, no. 68959/01, § 26). Such a basis exists. The laws on civil service of the Federation and the Länder include specific provisions for all civil servants regarding their absence from work without permission and their obligation to follow instructions. Participating in strike action without permission is incompatible with these provisions. Moreover, the ban on strike action for civil servants is a manifestation of Art. 33(5) GG that has been recognised by the highest courts for decades […]. [177]

(2) Ensuring a functioning public administration, in the specific case of the complainants ensuring the fulfilment of the state's educational mandate and a functioning school system (Art. 7(1) GG), which was the argument used to justify the disciplinary measures, serves to maintain order and thus pursues a legitimate aim within the meaning of Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR. [178]

(3) Due to the particularities of the German system of career civil service, the ban on strike action is also necessary in a democratic society. As was stated by the European Court of Human Rights in its decision on the case Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, a justified interference with Art. 11(1) ECHR requires that there is a pressing social need; moreover, the restriction must be proportionate (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, § 119). According to the European Court of Human Rights, Turkey, however, failed to demonstrate that the absolute prohibition for civil servants to form trade unions stipulated in Turkish law fulfils such a pressing social need. The mere fact that the relevant laws do not provide for the possibility to form trade unions is not sufficient (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, § 120). The explanation that Turkish civil servants enjoy a privileged position is not sufficient in this context either (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, §§ 168). In the proceedings Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, the Turkish government also failed to demonstrate that there was a need for the impugned restriction of the right to strike action in a democratic society, by claiming that Art. 11 ECHR did not guarantee that trade unions could take certain actions (cf. ECtHR, Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, Judgment of 21 April 2009, no. 68959/01, §§ 29, 32). [179]

Moreover, in the case Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, the European Court of Human Rights held that the Contracting Parties only have a limited margin of appreciation when defining the general legal concept of a pressing social need (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, § 119). However, the case did not concern the guarantee of a right to strike action. It has not been particularly held to be an element of the core guarantees of Art. 11 ECHR by the European Court of Human Rights to this date (cf. ECtHR, Na- tional Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 8 April 2014, no. 31045/10, § 84). Rather, with regard to the margin of appreciation concerning restrictions of the freedom of trade unions, it made the following differentiation: If a legislative restriction strikes at the core of trade-union activity, the national legislature has a lesser margin of appreciation and more is required to justify the resulting interference, in the general interest, with the exercise of trade-union freedom. Conversely, if it is not the core but a secondary or accessory aspect of trade-union activity that is affected, the margin of appreciation is wider and the interference is more likely to be proportionate (cf. ECtHR, National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 8 April 2014, no. 31045/10, § 87). With regard to secondary strike action, the European Court of Human Rights held that it did not affect the core of the freedom of association, but merely constituted a secondary or accessory aspect and therefore a wider margin of appreciation concerning restrictions were to be recognised to the national authorities (cf. ECtHR, National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 8 April 2014, no. 31045/10, § 88). [180]

Against this background, a ban on strike action for German civil servants and specifically for teachers with civil servant status is justified under Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR. In the present constitutional complaint proceedings, teachers with civil servant status participated in strike action called by the German Education Union (Gewerkschaft Erziehung und Wissenschaft - GEW). This union represents both teachers with civil servant status and teachers with employee status. Based on the legal situation in Germany, the GEW negotiates collective agreements with the Employers' Association of the Länder (Tarifgemeinschaft der Länder) for teachers with employee status only. These collective agreements do not apply to civil servants; in their case, the federal legislature and the respective Land legislatures, which have exclusive competence for determining the working conditions of civil servants, decide whether and to what extent the outcomes of collective bargaining for employees in the public sector are transferred to civil servants. In part, the complainant no. I. and the complainants no. II. to IV. sought to bring about such a transfer of collective bargaining outcomes by means of their participation in strike action. This behaviour was (at least also) intended to support a strike action aimed at the conclusion of a collective agreement, and shows a certain similarity to a secondary strike; thus, this behaviour is not a core aspect of the guarantees of Art. 11(1) ECHR. The wide margin of appreciation that is generally granted to the Federal Republic of Germany in such cases has not been exceeded in the case at hand. The ban on strike action, which is applicable to parts of the public service and which is also a recognised constitutional tradition, is not a manifestation of the civil servants' privileged status (permanent employment status, entitlement to health insurance benefits, pensions) and is not justified merely based on their function to maintain the administration and the protection of third party rights. Rather, it is decisive that in the system of German civil service law, the civil servant status entails interrelated rights and duties; expansions or restrictions of one right or duty of the civil service generally also result in changes to the other rights or duties. [...] Granting a right to strike to civil servants would fundamentally change the system of German civil service law and thus call it into question. This system is a particular national tradition of the Federal Republic of Germany; it is due to the fact that there is a great diversity between the States of Europe in the sphere of cultural and historical development (cf. also ECtHR <GC>, Lautsi et al. v. Italy, Judgment of 18 March 2011, no. 30814/06, § 68 […]). [181]

The balancing of interests against the rights and freedoms of others to be undertaken under Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR also has to include the fact that in the case of the complainant no. I. and the complainants no. II. to IV., the ban on strike action serves to safeguard the right to education, and thus serves to protect a human right enshrined in Art. 2 of the First Protocol ECHR and in other international treaties [...]. [182]

As a compensation for the ban on strike action [...] Germany has established a participation of umbrella organisations of the trade unions in the drafting of statutory provisions concerning the civil service […]. To further compensate for the civil servants' lacking possibility to influence their employment conditions by measures of labour dispute, Art 33 (5) GG affords them the subjective public right to have the constitutionality of their alimentation reviewed in court (cf. BVerfGE 139, 64 et seq.; 140, 240 et seq. […]). This possibility of judicial review, traditionally granted only to the civil servants and not to public service employees, and the subjective rights granted under Art. 33(5) GG would be almost completely meaningless if civil servants had a right to strike. [183]

bb) In addition, as (former) teachers with civil servant status, the complainant no. I. and the complainants no. II. to IV. are members of the administration of the state within the meaning of Art. 11(2) second sentence ECHR. In the opinion of the European Court of Human Rights, this exception provision neither excludes a specific sector nor is it an independent reason to justify the restriction, but an addition to Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR, for which a review of proportionality is specifically required (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, §§ 97, 107, in derogation from the European Commission on Human Rights, Council of Civil Service Unions and others v. United Kingdom, Decision of 20 January 1987, no. 11603/85 […]). [184]

Pursuant to Art. 11(2) second sentence ECHR, the exercise of the guarantees under Art. 11(1) ECHR can be restricted for members of the armed forces, of the police or of the administration of the state. The restrictions that can be imposed on the above-mentioned groups of persons must be construed strictly (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 November 2008, no. 34503/97, § 97 [...]; in particular regarding members of the administration of the state cf. ECtHR <GC>, Vogt v. Germany, Judgment of 26 September 1995, no. 17851/91, § 67). Thus, one aspect to be assigned to the concept of administration of the state could be the exercise of public authority on behalf of the state (cf. ECtHR Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, Judgment of 21 April 2009, no. 68959/01, § 32 with reference to ECtHR <GC>, Pellegrin v. France, Judgment of 8 December 1999, no. 28541/95, §§ 64 et seq. […]). [185]

So far, the European Court of Human Rights has not answered the question, whether teachers employed at state schools in Germany are members of the administration of the state within the meaning of Art. 11(2) second sentence

ECHR. Rather, the Court left the question unanswered in two proceedings against the Federal Republic of Germany, because it was not essential for the decision of these cases (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Vogt v. Germany, Judgment of 26 September 1995, no. 17851/91, § 68; ECtHR, Volkmer v. Germany, Judgment of 22 November 2001, no. 39799/98). [186]

In the opinion of the Senate, teachers with civil servant status are members of the administration of the state within the meaning of Art. 11(2) second sentence ECHR. However, it would be excessive and no longer be compatible with the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights to consider all public service employees of a state - even employees of state-run commercial or industrial concerns (cf. ECtHR, Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v. Turkey, Judgment of 21 April 2009, no. 68959/01, § 32) - members of the administration of the state. As the legal facts already show, civil servants who, pursuant to Art. 33(4) GG, stand in a relationship of service and loyalty defined by public law, make up the smaller part of personnel in comparison to public service employees in the two-track German public service system. On 30 June 2016, only about 1.7 million persons of almost 4.7 million employees working in the public service held the status of civil servant or judge (cf. Statistisches Bundesamt [Destatis], public service personnel, at: https://www.destatis.de) [187]

Moreover, in case of teachers at state schools, which is the relevant group in these proceedings, the state has a special interest in the discharge of duties by civil servants. The school system and the state's educational mandate are of great significance under the Basic Law (Art. 7 GG) and the constitutions of the Länder. In some of the Länder, the employment of teachers with civil servant status is the rule (cf. Art. 133(2) of the Constitution of the Free State of Bavaria). It is true that teachers do not primarily fulfil government duties (cf. BVerfGE 119, 247 <267>). Thus, Art. 33(4) GG does not conflict with hiring teachers as employees in the public service, which is in fact practiced in Germany to a varying degree depending on the respective Land. The employment of teachers without civil servant status is not based on their function or the duties they perform, but generally on special factual reasons [...]. Some of the teachers employed without civil servant status do not fulfil the personal requirements necessary to become civil servants; in other cases the state based its decision to establish an employee relationship on practical administrative considerations. In the past, the hiring of teachers without civil servant status lead to more flexible types of employment; for instance, the Free State of Saxony reacted to the (then) necessary reduction of overemployment in the education sector that had been caused by demographic changes after the German reunification. Due to the factual separation of the employment relationships of teachers in Germany, it can hence not be denied that teachers with civil servant status are (to be treated as) members of the administration of the state within the meaning of Art. 11(2) second sentence ECHR. Teachers exercise such important duties that the decision on granting them the status of a civil servant must be reserved to the state. [188]

III.

The constitutional complaints are also unfounded with regard to the violation of Art. 9(3) GG in conjunction with Art. 20(3) GG claimed by the complainants in the proceedings 2 BvR 1738/12 and 2 BvR 1068/14. [189]

1. The binding effect of law and justice also includes a duty to take into account the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights and the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights as part of a methodologically tenable interpretation of the law. Both, failing to consider a decision of the ECtHR and "enforcing" such a decision in a schematic way, in violation of higher-ranking law, may therefore violate fundamental rights in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <323 and 324>). [...] If decisions by the European Court of Human Rights are relevant for the evaluation of the facts of a case, the aspects, which the European Court of Human Rights took into account in the course of its balancing must principally also be included in the constitutional assessment, i.e. in the review of proportionality, and the results of the balancing must be addressed (cf. also BVerfGK 3, 4 <9>). [190]

2. The challenged decisions fulfil these requirements. For the evaluation of the respective facts of the case, the courts took into account Art. 11 ECHR as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights and addressed it. [...] Thus, the courts neither failed to examine the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights nor to take into account the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. [191]

X. Article 21.2 of the Basic Law: The Prohibition of Political Parties

Application of the Federal Council (Bundesrat) of the Federal Republic of Germany to declare unconstitutional and to dissolve the National Democratic Party of Germany pursuant to Article 21.2 of the Basic Law, BVerfG, 17.1.2017, 2 BvB 1/13, http://www.bverfg.de/e/bs20170117_2bvb000113en.html (BVerfGE 144, 20–367) "Application to Prohibit the National Democratic Party"

Explanatory Annotation

Political parties are associations and as such they are in principle addressees of the freedom of association in Article 9 of the Basic Law, which is part of the catalog of fundamental rights protected by the Basic Law in Articles 1 to 19 of the Basic Law. However, Article 21 of the Basic Law is especially dedicated to political parties attributing to them a constitutional role in the "formation of the political will of the people and establishing a legal framework around their organization, especially the necessity of a party internal democratic structure, and their financial conduct. The details are governed by a special statute, the Political Parties Act.[125] The constitutional status afforded to political parties has legal consequences, not least with regard to the public funding of political parties[126] but also concerning entitlements for access to public spaces and public infrastructure, e.g., to conduct party conferences or political rallies. The Constitutional Court has played a massive role in shaping the law around political parties; its decisions concerning party and campaign financing have sometimes ventured into the grey area of law-making rather than merely interpreting the Basic Law. The Constitutional Court's views went from prescribing direct state contributions for political parties to limiting subsidies to a reimbursement scheme for campaign costs and then back again to a general contribution to the party finances.[127] In the light of the enormous role that political parties play in securing a functioning political system because they channel the various and many political opinions into packages that can be presented as electoral choices, and given that the constitutional status of political parties is connected to concrete entitlements ranging from monetary subsidies[128] to access to infrastructure, the question of the prohibition and dissolution of political parties becomes an issue that transcends the treatment of "ordinary" associations. It is for this reason that 128 § 18.2 of the Political Parties Act sets the absolute ceiling for state contributions to the political parties in 2019 at EUR 190 Million. The monies distributed from this amount are roughly calculated on the basis of votes received by the respective parties in federal, state and European Parliament elections and by a 45% co-contribution for every Euro paid by party members as membership dues or donations (up to EUR 3300) made to a party. For the complex details see § 18.3 of the Political Parties Statute.

Article 21.4 of the Basic Law attributes the power to declare a political party unconstitutional exclusively to the Constitutional Court. The Act on the Federal Constitutional Court[129] stipulates in § 43 that only the Federal Parliament (Bundestag), the Federal Council (Bundesrat), the Federal Government, and, for parties only operating in a constitutive state (Land), the respective state government[130], can apply to the Constitutional Court for such a declaration. The legal consequences of a declaration of unconstitutionality are stipulated in § 46.3 of the Act on the Federal Constitutional Court and consist of the dissolution of the party, a prohibition to create a replacement party, and the option to confiscate the assets of the unconstitutional party.

There have been only two successful declarations of unconstitutionality of political parties. Both go back to the beginning of the Federal Republic of Germany under the still relatively new Basic Law. The declarations concerned a successor organization of the Nazi party called "Sozialistische Reichspartei"[131] and the Communist Party of Germany (KPD)[132].

In those decisions, the Constitutional Court erected fairly steep thresholds for a party to be declared unconstitutional. Article 21.2 of the Basic Law makes such a declaration contingent on a party seeking "to seek to undermine or abolish the free democratic basic order or to endanger the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany."[133] The Court interprets these requirements restrictively. It is not sufficient to pursue political goals, which might as such not be compatible with the Basic Law. The Basic Law can be amended. It follows that such an amendment can be sought as part of a political platform. There are only some core elements which are beyond any constitutional reform (Article 79.3 of the Basic Law), but even some of those, e.g., the principles of the republic or federalism, do not qualify as being exempt from being politically pursued. Only the core principles down in Article 1 (human dignity) and Article 20 (democracy, the rule of law) are relevant in the context of declaring a party unconstitutional.[134] However, merely politically pursuing a revision of these core elements of a free society is also not sufficient. The party in question must systematically go out to fight these principles.[135] Violence or criminal activity is not necessarily required but, of course, a potent indicator for such a pursuit the defeat of these core principles beyond just the mere voicing of political opinion.[136]

The 2017 decision translated below concerns the National Democratic Party (NPD), also a Nazi party. An earlier attempt to have the party declared unconstitutional failed in 2003 for procedural reasons because it turned out during the proceedings, inter alia, that the party leadership both on the federal and state levels consisted of a number of persons who were clandestinely working for the various state and federal Offices for the Protection of the Constitution (Amt für Verfassungsschutz); it was thus unclear whether the incriminating material was attributable to the party or to the services watching the party.[137]

The renewed attempt to have the party declared unconstitutional failed again, even though the Constitutional Court acknowledged that the party "seeks, because of its aims and the behavior of its adherents, to abolish the free democratic basic order."[138] However, the Court concluded that the party is presently so weak that it is not conceivable that its "seeking" could succeed.[139] In doing so, the Court explicitly departed from its interpretation of the term "seeking" in its 1956 decision against the Communist Party, where it had specifically stated that the lack of any reasonable prospects of success for the party could not bar the prohibition of that party.[140]

It should also be noted that the Constitutional Court, despite not declaring the party unconstitutional, invested considerable effort in arguing that its approach is fully in line with the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights regarding the prohibition of political parties under Article 11 of the ECHR.[141] In other words, the Court indirectly expressed its view that it could have declared the party unconstitutional under application of the ECHR but it chose not to by construing Article 21.2 of the Basic Law even stricter. The reasons for emphasizing this otherwise moot point could lie in the fact that whereas the application against the party was unsuccessful, it nonetheless led to profound legal consequences. The Constitutional Court emphasized that Article 21 of the Basic Law as it stood at the time of the decision was a black-and-white, binary provision. If the criteria were fulfilled, there was only one outcome, namely the declaration of unconstitutionality. The Court, however, also stated that this could change if the Basic Law were amended accordingly to allow for counter-measures against extremist parties fulfilling some of these criteria below the threshold of the mandatory dissolution of the party.[142] The Federal Parliament (Bundestag) and the Federal Council (Bundesrat) reacted to this "signposting" rather quickly (in July 2017, barely 6 month after the decision) with an amendment of Article 21 of the Basic Law and the addition of a new subsection 3, which makes it possible declare a party unconstitutional without this necessarily leading to the dissolution of the party and to instead, as a lesser means, bar such a party from receiving any public funds, be it by way of public party and campaign financing or be it by way of tax benefits for such parties or contributions to such parties.

The right-wing extremist party at issue in this the decision may have won the day not only by avoiding dissolution but also by prompting the Constitutional Court to construe the already strict criteria for the declaration of unconstitutionality even stricter, i.e. for the Court now demanding that such a party must additionally meet a minimum threshold of a prospect of success for its attempt to remove the core principles of the Basic Law of human dignity, democracy and the rule of law. But that win came at considerable expense because of the subsequent amendment of the Basic Law and its Article 21 which was the result of a not particularly subtle hint by the Court that such an amendment is indeed conceivable.

Translation of the "Prohibition of Political Parties" Judgment, BVerfG, 17.1.2017, 2 BvB 1/13, http://www.bverfg.de/e/bs20170117_2bvb000113en.html (BVerfGE 144, 20–367)

Headnotes:

1. The prohibition of a political party under Art. 21(2) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) is the sharpest weapon, albeit a double-edged one, a democratic state under the rule of law has against an organised enemy. Its aim is to counter risks emanating from the existence of a political party with a fundamentally anti-constitutional tendency and from the typical ways in which it can exercise influence as an association.

2. The requirement that political parties be free from interference by the state (Gebot der Staatsfreiheit) and the principle of a fair trial are indispensable when it comes to carrying out proceedings for the prohibition of a political party.

    a) The use of police informants and undercover investigators at the executive level of a political party during ongoing proceedings to prohibit the political party is incompatible with the requirement that there be no informants at the party's executive level.

    b) The same applies to the extent that an application for the prohibition of a political party is essentially supported by materials and facts that informants or undercover investigators have played a crucial role in authoring.

    c) Under the principle of a fair trial, observation of a political party may not serve the objective of spying out the party's procedural strategy; thus obtained information relating to the party's procedural strategy may not be used during the proceedings in a way which is detrimental to the political party's defence.

    d) An obstacle resulting in discontinuation of proceedings is the ultima ratio of possible legal consequences of violations of the Constitution. In order to establish whether there is an irremediable procedural obstacle to proceedings for the prohibition of a political party, 'procedural requirements under the rule of law, on the one hand, need to be balanced against the preventive purpose of these proceedings, on the other hand.

3. The concept of the free democratic basic order within the meaning of Art. 21(2) GG only covers those central fundamental principles which are absolutely indispensable for the free constitutional state.

    a) The free democratic basic order is rooted primarily in human dignity (Art. 1(1) GG). The guarantee of human dignity covers in particular the safeguarding of personal individuality, identity and integrity and elementary equality before the law.

    b) Furthermore, the principle of democracy is a constitutive element of the free democratic basic order. The possibility of equal participation by all citizens in the process of forming the political will as well as accountability to the people for the exercise of state authority (Art. 20(1) and (2) GG) are indispensable for a democratic system.

    c) Finally, the concept of the free democratic basic order is further determined by the principle that organs of the state be bound by the law (Art. 20(3) GG) - a principle which is rooted in the principle of the rule of law, and by independent courts' oversight in that regard. At the same time, protection of the freedom of individuals requires that the use of physical force is reserved for the organs of the state which are bound by the law and subject to judicial oversight.

4. The concept of "abolishing" (beseitigen) the free democratic basic order describes the abolishment of at least one of the constituent elements of the free democratic basic order or its replacement with another constitutional order or another system of government. The criterion "undermining" can be assumed to be met once a political party, according to its political concept, noticeably threatens the free democratic basic order with sufficient intensity.

5. The fact that a political party is seeking to abolish or undermine the free democratic basic order must be clear from its aims or from the behaviour of its adherents.

    a) The aims of a political party are the embodiment of what a party intends to achieve politically.

    b) Adherents in this sense are all persons who support a party's cause and profess their commitment to the party, even if they are not members of the political party.

    c) Activities of a political party's organs, specifically the party's executive committee and its leading functionaries, can generally be attributed to the political party. Statements or actions by ordinary members can only be attributed to the political party if they are undertaken in a political context and the political party has approved or condoned them. In the case of adherents who are not members of the political party, influence or approval, in whatever form, of their behaviour by the political party is generally a necessary condition for attributing such behaviour to the party. There can be no blanket attribution of criminal offences and acts of violence if there is no specific link for such an attribution. No differing assessment may be inferred from the principle of indemnity.

6. In order to prohibit a political party, it is not sufficient that its aims are directed against the free democratic basic order. Instead, the party must "seek" to undermine or abolish the free democratic basic order.

    a) The notion of "seeking" requires active behaviour in that respect. The prohibition of a political party does not constitute a prohibition of views or ideology. In order to prohibit a political party, it is necessary that a party's actions amount to a fight against the free democratic basic order.

    b) It requires systematic action of the political party that amounts to a qualified preparation for undermining or abolishing the free democratic basic order or aims at endangering the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany.

    c) It is not necessary that this results in a specific risk to the goods protected under Art. 21(2) GG. Yet it requires specific and weighty indications which suggest that it is at least possible that the political party's actions directed against the free democratic basic order of the Federal Republic of Germany or against its existence could be successful.

    d) The use of force is in itself a weighty indication justifying the assumption that action against the goods protected under Art. 21(2) GG is successful. The same applies if a political party creates, in regionally restricted areas, an "atmosphere of fear" which is likely to undermine in the long term the free and equal participation of all in the process of forming the political will.

7. Art. 21(2) GG leaves no room for assuming that there are other (unwritten) criteria.

    a) A party's similarity in nature to National Socialism alone does not justify prohibiting it. A party's similarity in nature to National Socialism does, however, provide an indication that this political party is pursuing anti-constitutional aims.

    b) A separate application of the principle of proportionality is not required.

8. The mentioned requirements which need to be met to establish that a political party is unconstitutional are fully compatible with the requirements for a prohibition of political parties that the European Court of Human Rights has derived from the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

9. Measured against these standards, the application for prohibition is unfounded:

    a) The respondent seeks, by reason of its aims and the behaviour of its adherents, to abolish the free democratic basic order. The respondent intends to replace the existing constitutional system with an authoritarian national state that adheres to the idea of an ethnically defined "people's community" (Volksgemeinschaft). This political concept disregards the human dignity of all those who do not belong to its ethnically-defined Volksgemeinschaft and is thus incompatible with the principle of democracy as set out in the Basic Law.

b) The respondent advocates aims which are directed against the free democratic basic order and systematically acts towards achieving those aims in a qualified manner.

c) However, there are no specific and weighty indications suggesting even at least the possibility that these endeavours might be successful.

Facts:

The subject of the proceedings is the application by the Bundesrat to establish the unconstitutionality of the National Democratic Party of Germany (NPD) and to dissolve it pursuant to Art. 21(2) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG), Art. 93(1) no. 5 GG, § 13 no. 2 and §§ 43 et seq. of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG). [1]

[Excerpt from press release no. 4/2017 of 17 January 2017]

The National Democratic Party of Germany (NPD) advocates a concept aimed at abolishing the existing free democratic basic order. The NPD intends to replace the existing constitutional system with an authoritarian national state that adheres to the idea of an ethnically defined "people's community" (Volksgemeinschaft). Its political concept disrespects human dignity and is incompatible with the principle of democracy. Furthermore, the NPD acts in a systematic manner and with sufficient intensity towards achieving its aims that are directed against the free democratic basic order. However, (currently) there is a lack of specific and weighty indications suggesting that this endeavour will be successful; for that reason, the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court, in its judgment pronounced today, unanimously rejected as unfounded the Bundesrat's admissible application to establish the unconstitutionality of the NPD and its sub-organisations (Art. 21(2) of the Basic Law, Grundgesetz - GG).

I.

1. The respondent was founded on 28 November 1964 as a collective movement of national democratic forces. By as early as September 1965 its political party organisation covered almost the whole of the Federal Republic of Germany and, with election results of between 5.8% and 9.8% of the valid votes cast and a total of 61 members of parliament it gained seats in the federal state parliaments (Landtage) of Baden-Wuerttemberg, Bavaria, Bremen, Hesse, Lower Saxony, Rhineland-Palatinate and Schleswig-Holstein. In 1969, with a proportion of 4.3% of second votes, it failed to reach the five-percent hurdle in the Bundestag election. In the following 35 years, the respondent was unable to gain any seats in federal state parliament (Landtag) or Bundestag elections. [2]

It was not until 2004 that it was again able to gain representation in a federal state parliament; in the Landtag election in Saxony, it gained 9.2% of the valid votes cast. In 2006 it was also able to do so in Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania with 7.3% of the valid votes cast. Despite losing votes in the subsequent Landtag elections in these two federal states, it managed to retain a presence in both federal state parliaments (with election results in Saxony in 2009 of

5.6% of the valid votes cast and of 6.0% in Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania in 2011). Due to the abolished electoral threshold for European Parliament elections, the respondent gained representation in the European Parliament in 2014 with its MEP Udo Voigt with 1.0% of the valid votes cast. [3]

Currently, the respondent is not represented in any parliament at federal or Land level. It achieved a 1.3% share of second votes in the Bundestag election in 2013. With 4.9% of valid votes cast, it narrowly failed to retain its representation in the Landtag election in Saxony in 2014, and in the Landtag election in Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania in 2016 with a 3.0% share of second votes. In the most recent Landtag elections in the former West German federal states it achieved between 0.2% (Bremen) and 1.2% (Saarland), and between 1.9% (Saxony-Anhalt) and 4.9% (Saxony) in the former East German federal states. [4]

Since the 2014 local government elections (cf. regarding the election results para. 904 et seq.), the respondent has, according to the uncontested information provided by the applicant, 367 seats at municipal level, most of which are in the former East German federal states. [5]

2. The respondent's membership numbers reached a peak of 28,000 in 1969 and sank steadily in subsequent years; by its own information it had merely 3,240 members in 1996. Following the election of Udo Voigt as the party's chairman in 1996, its membership increased once more, reaching a (new) peak of 7,014 members in 2007, after which it declined again to 5,048 by 31 December 2013. At the party's national convention (Bundesparteitag) in Weinheim in November 2015, its chairman Frank Franz declared, however, that there had been a growth in membership numbers again for the first time in years. He provided specific details of this in the oral hearing, citing a rate of increase of 8% over the previous year. [6]

3. The respondent is organised into (sixteen) federal state associations as well as regional and district associations. Under § 6(1) first and second sentences of its party statute (in the latest version of 21/22 November 2015), the national convention is the "supreme organ of the NPD. It determines the setting of political objectives and convenes for an ordinary convention at least every other calendar year." Under § 7(1) first sentence of the NPD statute, the party's executive committee (Parteivorstand) is responsible for the "political and organisational leadership of the NPD". [7]

4. The respondent has its own youth organisation, the "Young National Democrats" (Junge Nationaldemokraten - JN), founded in 1969, which had roughly 350 members in 2012. The "National Democratic University Union" (Nationaldemokratischer Hochschulbund e.V. - NHB) was founded as a sub-organisation of the respondent as early as 1966, but no longer has a presence in university politics. In 2003, the "Municipal Political Union of the NPD" (Kommunalpolitische Vereinigung der NPD - KPV) was founded to represent the interests of municipal representatives nationally, and in 2006 the "National Women's Ring" (Ring Nationaler Frauen - RNF) was founded, which sees itself as the "mouthpiece and point of contact for all national women whether party member or not" and had around 100 members in 2012. Under § 7(3) first sentence of the NPD party statute (in the version of 21/22 November 2015), the (federal) chairpersons of these associations are members of the NPD executive committee by virtue of their office "if they are members of the NPD". [8]

5. The financial report for 2013 shows membership subscriptions for 2013 of EUR 488,859.96 (2014: EUR 459,157.77) and just under EUR 804,000 (2014: EUR 866,000) in donations; together these make up approximately 43.4% (2014: 43.6%) of the party's total income (cf. Bundestag document (Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks) 18/4301, p. 109; BTDrucks 18/8475, p. 109). [9]

6. The company Deutsche Stimme Verlags GmbH, founded by the respondent, publishes the party newspaper Deutsche Stimme (German Voice). According to the respondent, this had a circulation in mid-2012 of 25,000 copies. The company has its own video channel, DS-TV. Beyond this, the respondent is also responsible for various regional publications and makes intensive use of the Internet. It has a presence on Facebook, Twitter and, with video channels, on YouTube (cf. also paras. 852 and 853). [10]

II.

Proceedings instigated in 2001 by applications initiated by the Federal Government, the German Bundestag and the applicant in the present proceedings to establish the unconstitutionality of the respondent and to have it dissolved were discontinued by order of the Second Senate of 18 March 2003 (Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE 107, 339). [11]

III.

In a brief of 1 December 2013 the applicant applied, on the basis of its decision of 14 December 2012 (Bundesrat document, Bundesratsdrucksache BRDrucks 770/ 12), for the unconstitutionality of the respondent and its sub-organisations to be established and for its party organisation and that of its sub-organisations to be dissolved, for the prohibition of creating or continuing substitute organisations, and for its assets and those of its sub-organisations to be confiscated. It based this application on the first alternative in Art. 21(2) first sentence GG. [12]

C.

The standard for establishing the unconstitutionality of a political party in accordance with Art. 21(2) GG must take into account both the continuing claim to validity of the norm and its exceptional nature (I.). If these two factors are complied with by a determination of the constituent elements that need to be met to prohibit a political party (II.) such a determination is, pursuant to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), compatible with the stipulations of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) (III.). The law of the European Union is not decisive in respect of the conditions under which a political party […] may be prohibited (IV.). [510]

I.

[…] [511]

1. a) Art. 21 GG accorded political parties their own constitutional status for the first time. Unlike the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung - WRV), which refrained from giving political parties a constitutional classification, the Basic Law accords them a special status, which is elevated in comparison to that of associations within the meaning of Art. 9(1) GG (cf. BVerfGE 107, 339 <358>). They are elevated by Art. 21 GG to the rank of constitutional institutions (cf. BVerfGE 1, 208 <225>; 2, 1 <73>; 20, 56 <100>; 73, 40 <85>; 107, 339 <358>) and acknowledged as being necessary "factors of constitutional life" (BVerfGE 1, 208 <227>). The prerequisite for their carrying-out of the constitutional task assigned to them of participating in the formation of the political will of the people is their freedom of foundation and activities which is guaranteed in Art. 21(1) GG. [512]

   b) [...] [513]

   c) Establishing the framework for prohibiting political parties in Art. 21(2) GG was an expression of the aspiration of the constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber) to create the structural conditions for preventing a repetition of the catastrophe of National Socialism and of developments in the system of political parties such as occurred in the final phase of the Weimar Republic (cf. BVerfGE 107, 339 <362>). The aim of Art. 21(2) GG is to counter risks emanating from the existence of a political party with a fundamentally anti-constitutional tendency and from the typical ways in which it can exercise influence as an association (cf. BVerfGE 25, 44 <56>). In accordance with the claim "No absolute freedom for the enemies of freedom" (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <138>), such a political party should not be given the opportunity to abuse the freedom of political parties enjoyed under Art. 21(1) GG to fight against the free democratic basic order. [514]

2. This concept of protecting freedom by restricting freedom does not contradict the Constitution's fundamental decision in Art. 20(2) GG in favour of a process that is free from interference by the state of politically free and in favour of an open formation of opinion and will by the people in relation to the organs of the state (cf. BVerfGE 20, 56 <100>; 107, 339 <361>). In order to permanently establish a free democratic order, it is not the intention of the Basic Law to guarantee also the freedom to abolish the conditions for freedom and democracy and to abuse the guaranteed freedom for the purpose of abolishing that very order. Therefore, the aim of Art. 21(2) GG is to protect those underlying fundamental values which are indispensable for the peaceful and democratic co-existence of the citizens. [515]

Against this background, the Basic Law selects, from the pluralism of aims and values which have taken shape in the political parties, certain fundamental principles for structuring the state. These principles, once democratically approved, should be acknowledged as absolute values and therefore resolutely defended against any attack. The aim is to create a synthesis between the principle of tolerance towards all political opinions and the commitment to certain inviolable fundamental values of the state order. Accordingly, Art. 21(2) GG expresses the deliberate constitutional will for the solution of a problem of boundaries in the free democratic state order, enshrining the experience of a constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber) who in a certain historical situation no longer believed in being able to realise, in a pure form, the principle of the neutrality of the state vis-à-vis the political parties, and a commitment to a - in this sense - militant democracy (cf. with regard to the whole matter BVerfGE 5, 85 <139>). [516]

The respondent is therefore wrong to object that the prohibition of a political party which would result in the elimination of an entire political tendency violates the democratic principle of the sovereignty of the people ("The people are always right"). […] [517]

3. The possibility provided by Art. 146 GG for the creation of a genuinely new Constitution does not run counter to the applicability of Art. 21(2) GG. Irrespective of whether Art. 146 GG is applicable merely in the case of a complete constitutional novation, having regard to the principles of Art. 79(3) GG, or also covers a complete rewriting of the Basic Law […], the Basic Law remains fully in force until a new Constitution freely adopted by the German people enters into force (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <128>). Even if Art. 146 GG were to give the constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber) the opportunity to create a completely new Constitution, this would not legitimise actions by any political party actively aimed at undermining or abolishing the free democratic basic order while the Basic law is applicable. […] [518]

4. Nor can inapplicability of Art. 21(2) GG be substantiated by the assertion that the provision is merely of a transitional nature in that it aims for structuring the transition from National Socialism to the free democratic order and that the norm has now lost its claim to validity […]. [519]

The provision could at best be deemed to have lost its claim to validity if it had been designed as a mere transitional arrangement. There is nothing in the wording of the provision to suggest that this is the case. Moreover, the protective purpose of Art. 21(2) GG, which has the aim of averting threats to the free democratic basic order arising from strengthened anti-democratic political parties by prohibiting them, is not restricted to the phase during which the free democracy under the Basic Law is constituted. […] [520]

5. Finally, the respondent's opinion is incorrect […] that prohibition of a political party [can] only be regarded as legitimate if the political party is involved in violent subversive movements. [521]

[…] For a political party to be prohibited it is sufficient that the political party in question "seeks" (darauf ausgehen) to undermine or abolish the free democratic basic order or to endanger the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany. Accordingly, Art. 21(2) GG is not a provision that aims at averting specific threats. Rather, it aims to prevent, by way of preventive protection of the Constitution (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <142>; 9, 162 <165>; 107, 339 <386>; regarding Art. 9(2) GG: BVerfGE 80, 244 <253> […]), specific threats to the free democratic basic order from arising in the first place. Thus, a re-definition of the concept of the prohibition of political parties in Art. 21(2) GG following the Constitution's emergency regulations can be ruled out. […] [522]

6. In interpreting Art. 21(2) GG, due regard must be given to the fundamental constitutional decisions in favour of openness of the process of formation of political will, of freedom of expression (Art. 5(1) GG) and freedom of political parties from interference by the state (Art. 21(1) GG), as well as of the provision's exceptional nature as a consequence of the above. [523]

a) The Basic Law proceeds from the assumption that the only way to forming the will of the state is to have a constant intellectual exchange between social forces and interests and between political ideas and thus also between the political parties propagating them (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <135>). It relies on the power of this engagement as the most effective weapon against the spread of totalitarian and inhuman ideologies (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <320>). In Art. 21(1) GG it assigns a special role to the political parties as necessary instruments for the formation of the political will of the people (cf. BVerfGE 107, 339 <361>). Accordingly, prohibition of a political party is a serious interference with the freedom of formation of the political will and the freedom of political parties under Art. 21(1) GG, which can only be justified under particular conditions. Art. 21(2) GG, as an "exceptional norm which curtails democracy", must be applied with restraint (cf. Meier, loc. cit., p. 263). For this reason, a restrictive interpretation of the provision's individual constituent elements is required which takes account of the rule-and-exception relationship between the freedom of political parties enshrined in Art. 21(1) GG and the prohibition of political parties under Art. 21(2) GG. There is at the same time no scope for assuming the existence of unwritten constituent elements which would extend the provision's scope of application […]. [524]

b) The restrictive interpretation of the constituent elements under Art. 21(2) GG furthermore takes account of the fact that the peremptory legal consequence of the prohibition of a political party that follows from the establishment of its unconstitutionality is its dissolution. [525]

Any administrative intervention against the existence of a political party is ruled out until the Federal Constitutional Court has established its unconstitutionality, however hostile its behaviour may be towards the free democratic basic order (cf. BVerfGE 40, 287 <291>; 47, 198 <228>; 107, 339 <362>). […] In its present form, the Basic Law tolerates the threat linked to activities of a political party for the sake of political freedom, until its unconstitutionality has been established (cf. BVerfGE 12, 296 <306>; 47, 198 <228>; 107, 339 <362>). [526]

If, on the other hand, the Federal Constitutional Court's review results in the finding that the constituent elements of Art. 21(2) GG are met, the unconstitutionality of the political party must be established and it must be dissolved. The respondent is wrong in assuming that Art. 21(2) GG merely provides the possibility for establishing the unconstitutionality of a political party but leaves it to the "responsible citizen" to "execute" such a finding of constitutional law by not voting for a political party which has been found to be unconstitutional; therefore, in the respondent's opinion, the dissolution of a political party as envisaged in § 46(3) first sentence BVerfGG oversteps the boundary of what is constitutionally permissible. This opinion is not compatible with the concept of the provision of Art. 21GG. […] [527]

II.

The application for prohibition by the applicant concerns the legally protected good of the "free democratic basic order" (1.), which a political party must "seek" (4.) to "undermine or abolish" (2.) "by reason of its aims or the behaviour of its adherents" (3.). There are no other unwritten constituent elements for the prohibition of a political party (5.). [528]

1. The term "free democratic basic order" has been fleshed out in the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court (a). Its regulatory content cannot be defined by means of general recourse to Art. 79(3) GG but is limited to those principles which are absolutely indispensable for the free democratic constitutional state (b). In that respect, the principle of human dignity (Art. 1(1) GG), which is specified in greater detail by the principles of democracy (d) and the rule of law (e), is at the forefront (c). [529]

a) aa) [...] [530-534]

b) aa) The concept of the free democratic basic order within the meaning of Art. 21(2) GG requires concentration on a few central fundamental principles which are absolutely indispensable for the free constitutional state. This limited approach seems to be required not least because of the exceptional nature of the prohibition of political parties. The fundamental decision by the Constitution in favour of an open process of formation of political will means that it must also be possible to critically challenge individual elements of the Constitution without causing the prohibition of the political party. Exclusion from the process of forming the political will can only be considered when what is being questioned and rejected is what is absolutely indispensable for guaranteeing free democratic co-existence and is thus not negotiable. [535]

bb) Such a focus on the central fundamental principles which are indispensable for democracy cannot be achieved by having recourse to the inalterable core of the Constitution as defined in Art. 79(3) GG. Unlike Art. 108 of the Draft Constitution drawn up by the Herrenchiemsee Convention (Verfassungsentwurf des Verfassungskonvent auf Herrenchiemsee - HerrenChE), the version of Art. 79(3) GG as adopted by the Parliamentary Council (Parlamentarischer Rat) does not only prohibit amendments of the Basic Law which would result in abolishing the free and democratic basic order […]. [536]

The regulatory content of Art. 79(3) GG goes beyond the minimum content of what is indispensable for a free democratic constitutional state. In particular, the free democratic basic order does not include the principles of the republic and of federalism as covered by Art. 79(3) GG, since constitutional monarchies and centralised states can also be in accordance with the guiding principle of a free democracy […]. [537]

c) The free democratic basic order is rooted primarily in human dignity (Art. 1(1) GG). This is recognised in the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court as the highest value of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <204>; 12, 45 <53>; 27, 1 <6>; 35, 202 <225>; 45, 187 <227>; 87, 209 <228>; 96, 375 <399>). Human dignity is not subject to disposition. The state must respect and protect it in all its forms (cf. BVerfGE 45, 187 <227>). This deprives the state and its legal system of any absoluteness and any "natural" precedence. [538]

aa) The guarantee of human dignity covers in particular the safeguarding of personal individuality, identity and integrity and elementary equality before the law […]. This understanding is based on a conception of human beings as persons who can make free and self-determined decisions and shape their destiny independently (cf. BVerfGE 45, 187 <227>; 49, 286 <298>). The subjective quality of human beings is linked to an entitlement to social worthiness and to respect which forbids degrading people to "mere objects" of state action (cf. BVerfGE 122, 248 <271>). [539]

Even though it may be so that the effectiveness of this "object formula" is limited […], it is at any rate appropriate for identifying violations of human dignity wherever the quality of the human being as a subject and the resulting entitlement to respect is fundamentally called into question […]. This is especially the case if a perception supports a genuine and thus absolute precedence of a collective over the individual human being. Human dignity only remains inviolable if the individual is treated as fundamentally free, if albeit bound into society, and not the other way round as fundamentally unfree and subjugated to a superior instance. The absolute subjugation of a person to a collective, an ideology or a religion amounts to a violation of the value accorded to all human beings for their own sake simply by virtue of their being persons (BVerfGE 115, 118 <153>). It violates the individual's quality as a subject and constitutes an interference with the guarantee of human dignity which fundamentally violates the free democratic basic order. [540]

bb) Human dignity is egalitarian; it is founded exclusively in the fact that a person belongs to the human race, regardless of features such as origin, race, age or gender […]. Inherent in the individual's entitlement to respect as a person is the recognition of the individual as an equal member of the legally-constituted community […]. Thus, a legally devalued status or degrading inequality of treatment is incompatible with human dignity […]. This is in particular the case if such inequalities of treatment violate the prohibitions of discrimination under Art. 3(3) GG, which flesh out human dignity, regardless of the fundamental question of the human dignity content of the fundamental rights (cf. in this regard BVerfGE 107, 275 <284>). Anti-Semitic concepts or concepts aimed at racist discrimination are therefore incompatible with human dignity and violate the free democratic basic order. [541]

d) The principle of democracy is a constitutive element of the free democratic basic order. Democracy is the form of rule of the free and equal. It is based on the idea of free self-determination of all citizens (cf. BVerfGE 44, 125 <142>). Insofar the Basic Law is based on the assumption of the intrinsic value and dignity of the human being who is enabled to be free; at the same time it guarantees the human rights which are the core of the principle of democracy by means of the right of citizens to determine in freedom and equality, by means of elections and other votes, the public authority which affects them in personal and objective terms […]. [542]

aa) The possibility of equal participation by all citizens in the process of forming the political will as well as accountability to the people for the exercise of state authority (Art. 20(1) and (2) GG) are indispensable for a democratic system. How these requirements are complied with is not decisive for the question of compatibility of a political concept with the free democratic basic order. Thus, a rejection of parliamentarianism, if it is accompanied by the demand for replacing it with a plebiscite system, cannot justify the accusation that this violates the free democratic basic order. It is a different case, however, if the aim of disparaging parliament is to establish a one-party system. [543]

In democracy, the formation of the political will takes its way from the people to the organs of the state and not vice versa (cf. BVerfGE 44, 125 <140>; 69, 315 <346>; 107, 339 <361>). The democratic principles of freedom and equality require equal opportunities for participation for all citizens. Only then the requirement of an open process of formation of the political will is complied with. Concepts involving the permanent or temporary arbitrary exclusion of individuals from this process are therefore not compatible with this requirement. […]. [544]

bb) [...] [545]

cc) The Basic Law has opted for a representative parliamentary democracy, which is why the election of parliament is particularly significant when it comes to creating the necessary relationship of accountability between the people and the government (cf. BVerfGE 83, 60 <72>). Accordingly, anyone who disparages parliamentarianism without demonstrating in what other way due regard can be given to the principle of sovereignty of the people and how the openness of the process of forming the political will can be guaranteed, departs from the framework of the free democratic basic order. [546]

e) Finally, the principle of the rule of law is an indispensable part of the free democratic basic order within the meaning of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG. […].The principle that the public authority is bound by the law (Article 20(3) GG) and oversight in that respect by independent courts are determinative for the concept of the free democratic basic order. At the same time, the protection of the freedom of the individual requires that the use of physical force is reserved for the organs of the state which are bound by the law and subject to judicial oversight. Thus the state's monopoly on the use of force […] must likewise be regarded as part of the free democratic basic order within the meaning of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG. [547]

2. The second requirement for establishing the unconstitutionality of a political party in accordance with Art. 21(2) first sentence GG is that it should be seeking to "undermine" or "abolish" the free democratic basic order in the sense described above. [548]

a) [...] [549]

b) Considered in a differentiated way, the concept of "abolishing" (beseitigen) describes the abolishment of at least one of the constituent elements of the free democratic basic order or its replacement with another constitutional order or another system of government […]. [550]

c) The term "undermine" (beeinträchtigen) has, in contrast to the term "abolish", an independent regulatory content which extends the area of application of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG. [551]

aa) Contrary to the respondent's view, the constituent element of "undermining" is not merely an insignificant editorial error on the part of the constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber). [552]

(1) [...] [553-554]

(2) [...] [555]

bb) On this basis, the criterion "undermining" can be assumed to be met once a political party, according to its political concept, noticeably threatens the free democratic basic order. Such an "undermining" can therefore already be deemed to take place if a political party is working in a qualified manner to bring about the suspension of the existing constitutional order, even without being clear about what constitutional order is supposed to replace the existing one. It is sufficient for it to be attacking one of the constituent elements of the free democratic basic order (human dignity, democracy and the rule of law), since these are interlocked and mutually dependent […]. A political party which rejects and fights against one of the central principles of the free democratic basic order cannot avoid prohibition by professing allegiance to the other principles […]. The decisive factor is […] whether a political party deliberately attacks those fundamental principles which are indispensable for free and democratic co-existence […]. [556]

3. The fact that a political party is seeking to abolish or undermine the free democratic basic order must […] be clear from its "aims" or from the "behaviour of its adherents". Its "aims" and the "behaviour of its adherents" are accordingly the only sources of information for establishing the unconstitutionality of a political party. [557]

a) The aims of a political party are the embodiment of what a party intends to achieve politically, irrespective of whether these are intermediate or final aims, short-term or long-term aims or main or ancillary aims (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <143 et seq.> […]). They normally result from the party's programme and other official party statements, from the writings of authors recognised by the political party as authoritative about the political ideology of the party, from speeches given by its leading functionaries, from training and propaganda materials used in the party and from newspapers and magazines published or influenced by it (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <144>). [558]

It is the political party's real aims not its purported ones which are decisive. It is not required that a political party openly professes its anti-constitutional objectives. (cf. BVerfGE 2, 1 <20>; 5, 85 <144> […]. Thus it is not necessary to limit the determination of the aims pursued by a political party to its programme or official statements […], even though, as a rule, the programme is an essential source of information for establishing what the political party's objectives are. [559]

b) As well as in themes addressed in its programme, the intentions of the political party can be reflected in the behaviour of its adherents (cf. BVerfGE 2, 1 <22>). Adherents in this sense are all persons who support a party's cause and profess their commitment to the party, even if they are not members of the political party (cf. BVerfGE 2, 1 <22>; see also BVerfGE 47, 130 <139>). […] [560]

However, not all behaviour by adherents can be attributed to a political party. Attributing certain behaviour to a party may be problematic in particular if the political party has no possibility of influencing such behaviour. The determining factor is therefore whether the political will of the political party in question is recognisably being expressed in the respective adherent's behaviour. This will normally be taken to be the case if the behaviour reflects a fundamental tendency existing in the political party or if the political party explicitly espouses such behaviour. […] [561]

aa) Activities of a political party's organs, specifically the party's executive committee and its leading functionaries, can generally be attributed to the political party […]. Activities of the political party's publication organs and the behaviour of leading functionaries of sub-organisations are also automatically attributable to it. [562]

bb) Statements or actions by ordinary members can only be attributed to the political party if they are undertaken in a political context and the political party has approved or condoned them. Attribution appears likely if the statement or action has a direct link to a party event or other party activities, especially if the party does not distance itself from it. If an organisational link to party activities is lacking, the political party has to be aware of the political statement or action by the member at issue and nonetheless condone or even support the statement or action, even though counter-measures (exclusion from the party or disciplinary measures) would be possible and could reasonably have been expected. [563]

cc) In the case of adherents who are not members of the political party, influence or approval, in whatever form, of their behaviour by the political party is generally a necessary condition for attributing such behaviour to the party. As a rule, activities by the political party itself which influence or justify the behaviour of its adherents would be required. […] Specific facts must exist, however, which justify regarding the adherents' behaviour as an expression of the political party's will. Merely voicing approval in retrospect will only be sufficient for attributing the adherents' behaviour to the party […] if the political party thus recognisably espouses this as part of its own anti-constitutional endeavours. [564]

dd) If members of a political party commit criminal offences, this is only relevant in proceedings to prohibit the political party if such offences are connected with the legally protected goods set out in Art. 21(2) first sentence. [565]

ee) There can be no blanket attribution of criminal offences and acts of violence if there is no link for such an attribution. In particular, and contrary to the opinion stated by the applicant, the creation of or support for a certain political climate does not on its own permit attributing criminal actions committed in that political climate to a political party. It must rather be specifically determined whether the criminal action should be regarded as part of the anti-constitutional endeavours of the political party. Within the framework of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG, criminal acts committed by third parties, for example, may be attributed to a political party only if the political party has rendered material or organisational assistance, if personal links exist between the political party and the group committing the act or if members of the political party were involved in the act in question. [566]

ff) Parliamentary statements may be attributed to a political party in proceedings to prohibit that political party. Contrary to the view of the respondent, no differing assessment may be inferred here from the principle of indemnity […]. [567]

Under Art. 46(1) first sentence GG, a member of parliament may not be subjected to court proceedings or disciplinary action or otherwise called to account for any utterance made in the Bundestag. […] For this reason, the fact that the loss of a mandate, in the event of the prohibition of a political party based on parliamentary utterances, is merely an indirect consequence of parliamentary action does not generally rule out the applicability of Art. 46(1) first sentence GG. [568]

In interpreting Art. 46(1) first sentence GG, however […], the fundamental decision of the Constitution in favour of a "militant democracy" must be taken into consideration (cf. insofar with regard to Art. 10 GG: BVerfGE 30, 1 <19>) and a balance must be struck in accordance with the principle of practical concordance between protection of indemnity under Art. 46 GG and protection of the free democratic basic order under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG. […] Protection of indemnity may indeed be taken into consideration in any decision on the loss of mandate resulting from the prohibition of a political party. […] [569]

4. […] [570]

a) In interpreting the criterion of "seeking" (darauf ausgehen) account must be taken of the decision on values in the Constitution in favour of openness of the process of forming the political will (Art. 20(1) and (2) first sentence GG), freedom of political expression (Art. 5(1) GG) and the freedom of political parties (Art. 21(1) GG). An interference with these constitutional goods which a prohibition of a political party involves is only permitted to the extent required by the protective purpose of Art. 21(2) GG. It is therefore required that a political party actively espouses its aims and thus works towards undermining or abolishing the free democratic basic order or endangering the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany. [571]

[…] [572]

Art. 21(2) GG does not place sanctions on ideas or convictions. The provision does not involve the prohibition of views or ideology, but the prohibition of an organisation […]. Intervention under Art. 21(2) GG only comes into question once a political party takes its anti-constitutional aims into the public sphere and acts against the free democratic basic order or the existence of the state. Thus, beyond a mere "professing" of its own anti-constitutional aims, the political party must exceed the threshold of actually "combating" the free democratic basic order or the existence of the state […]. Only an understanding of "seeking" which takes the precondition of exceeding this threshold into account satisfies the requirement of interpreting Art. 21(2) GG restrictively. [573]

b) […] [574]

c) The criterion of "seeking" presumes systematic action in the sense of qualified preparation for undermining or abolishing the free democratic basic order or endangering the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany. [575]

aa) For the presumption of systematic action by the political party it is necessary for it to be continually working towards the realisation of a political concept that is contrary to the free democratic basic order. This can only be assumed if the individual action is an expression of a fundamental tendency that is attributable to the political party (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <143>). Efforts by individual party adherents cannot be taken to establish that the political party is unconstitutional if the attitude of the political party is otherwise loyal to the goods protected under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <143>). […] [576]

bb) Moreover, the systematic action of the political party must amount to a qualified preparation with regard to achieving its aims directed against the goods protected under Art. 21(2) GG. Insofar there must be a target-oriented connection between the political party's own actions and abolishing or undermining the free democratic basic order. [577]

Art. 21(2) GG does not, conversely, require action which is punishable under criminal law. […] [578]

Accordingly, if the prohibition of a political party does not require the use of illegal or criminally relevant means or methods, these can nonetheless provide important indications both that the aims of this political party violate the free democratic basic order and that the political party is seeking to realise these aims within the meaning of Art. 21(2) GG. If, for example, it can be established that adherents of a political party use force in a manner which can be attributed to the party for achieving its political aims, it may be inferred from this that the political party does not recognise the state's monopoly of the use of force which is rooted in the principle of the rule of law and that it is pursuing insofar aims directed at undermining the free democratic basic order. […] [580]

d) It is not required that the actions of the political party in themselves pose a specific threat to the goods protected under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG. This is clear from the wording, the provision's history and its purpose. [581]

aa) [...] [582]

bb) [...] [583]

cc) […] By their very nature, proceedings to prohibit a political party have the character of a preventive measure (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <142>; 9, 162 <165>; 107, 339 <386>; […]). They are not aimed at defending against already existing threats to the free democratic basic order but at preventing such threats from possibly emerging in the future. [584]

e) In accordance with the exceptional character of the prohibition of a political party as the preventive prohibition of an organisation and not a mere prohibition of views or of an ideology, there can, however, be a presumption that the criterion of "seeking" has been met only if there are specific weighty indications suggesting that it is at least possible that a political party's actions directed against the goods protected under Art. 21(2) GG may succeed (potentiality). [585]

Conversely, if it is entirely unlikely that a party's actions will successfully contribute to achieving the party's anti-constitutional aims, there is no need for preventive protection of the Constitution by using the instrument of the prohibition of the political party, which is the sharpest weapon, albeit a double-edged one, a democratic state under the rule of law has against its organised enemies (cf. BVerfGE 107, 339 <369>). On the contrary, the prohibition of a political party may be considered only if the political party has sufficient means to exert influence due to which it does not appear to be entirely unlikely that the party will succeed in achieving its anti-constitutional aims, and if it actually makes use of its means to exert influence. If this is not the case, then the requirement of "seeking" within the meaning of Art. 21(2) GG is not met. The Senate does not concur with the deviating opinion set out in the judgment in the case of the Communist Party of Germany (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands - KPD) which held that the lack of any prospect, as far as humanly measurable, that the political party will be able to realise its unconstitutional aims at any time in the foreseeable future does not bar a prohibition of the party (cf. BVerfGE 5, 85 <143>). [586]

Whether there exists a sufficient degree of potentiality in terms of whether a party will achieve its aims must be determined on the basis of an overall assessment. This would take into account the situation of the political party (membership numbers and whether they are rising or falling, organisational structure, degree of mobilisation, campaigning capability and financial situation), its impact in society (election results, publications, alliances and supporter structures), its representation in public offices and representative bodies, the means, strategies and measures it deploys and all other facts and circumstances from which it can be inferred whether it appears possible that the aims pursued by the political party will be realised. This requires that there are sufficient specific and weighty indications suggesting that the actions of the political party against the goods protected under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG may succeed. This must take account both of the prospects for the political party's success in merely participating in the struggle of political opinions and also of the possibility that the party's political aims will be successfully achieved by other means. [587]

As a rule, the criterion of "seeking" will be met if a political party tries to achieve its unconstitutional aims through the use of force or by committing crimes. Not only does the use of force imply disregard of the state's monopoly on the use of force, but it also involves a serious interference with the principle of free and equal participation in the formation of the political will. It also indicates a certain potentiality in terms of whether a party will achieve its aims. The use of force is in itself a weighty indication that action against the goods protected under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG may be successful. The same applies if a political party acts below the threshold of conduct punishable under criminal law in a manner which restricts the freedom of the process of forming the political will. This is the case, for example, if a political party creates an "atmosphere of fear" or threat which is likely to undermine in the long term the free and equal participation of all in the process of forming the political will. In that respect it is sufficient if such impairments are brought about in regionally restricted areas. It does, however, require that the party's actions are likely, seen objectively, to curtail the freedom of the formation of the political will. Insofar, purely subjective feelings of threat are not sufficient. [588]

Contrary to the applicant's view, it is not sufficient for meeting the criterion of "seeking" that the political party's statements are designed to be realised politically and that they can lead to actions; all statements made by political parties meet this requirement. On the contrary, specific weighty indications are required, suggesting that the call for action involved in the dissemination of the political party's unconstitutional ideology might be successful. [589]

5. Art. 21(2) GG leaves no room for assuming that there are other (unwritten) criteria besides the prerequisites for the prohibition of a political party that have been set out above. Neither can a party's similarity in nature to National Socialism provide a sub-stitute for the criteria set out in Art. 21(2) GG (a), nor can the principle of proportionality be applied in proceedings regarding the prohibition of political parties (b). [590]

[...] [591-597]

ee) A party's similarity in nature to National Socialism must, however, be taken into account in any examination of the individual criteria under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG. Conclusions may thus be drawn from the glorification of the NSDAP or the trivialisation of the crimes committed by the National Socialists as to the real aims being pursued by the political party, which may possibly not be completely clear from its programmatic materials. The central principles of National Socialism ("Führer" principle, ethnic definition of the "people" (Volk), racism and anti-Semitism) violate human dignity and at the same time violate the requirements of equal participation by all citizens in the process of forming the political will of the people and, due to the "Führer" principle, the principle of the sovereignty of the people. Thus a party's similarity in nature to National Socialism is an indication that this political party is pursuing aims which are detrimental to the free democratic basic order. […] [598]

b) [...] [599]

The fact, however, that the constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber) adopted an exhaustive provision in Art. 21(2) first sentence GG which leaves no room for a separate examination of proportionality bars the applicability of the principle of proportionality in proceedings for the prohibition of a political party. […] In Art. 21(2) first sentence GG, the constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber) has provided for the mandatory establishment of the unconstitutionality of the political party if the constituent elements are met. There is no scope for decision-making within which the principle of proportionality could be applied […]. [600]

[...] [601-606]

III.

The mentioned requirements that result from the standards set out above and which need to be met to establish that a political party is unconstitutional are fully compatible (2) with the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) on prohibitions of political parties, which it derived from the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) (1) and which the Federal Constitutional Court takes into consideration as an aid to interpretation (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <366 et seq.>). [607]

1. Since the ECHR does not specifically regulate the rights of political parties, the standard for conformity of prohibitions of political parties with the Convention is Art. 11 ECHR in particular (cf. ECtHR <Grand Chamber - GC>, United Communist Party of Turkey and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 30 January 1998, no. 133/1996/ 752/951, §§ 24 et seq.; ECtHR <GC>, Socialist Party and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 25 May 1998, no. 20/1997/804/ 1007, § 29; ECtHR, Yazar and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 9 April 2002, no. 2723/93 et al., §§ 30 et seq.; ECtHR, Parti de la Democratie <DEP> c. Turquie, Judgment of 10 December 2002, no. 25141/94, §§ 28 et seq.). At the level of justification, the ECtHR's examination additionally considers the question of inapplicability of rights under the Convention due to Art. 17 ECHR (cf. ECtHR <GC>, United Communist Party of Turkey and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 30 January 1998, no. 133/1996/752/951, § 60; ECtHR <GC>, Socialist Party and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 25 May 1998, no. 20/1997/804/1007, §§ 29 and 53; ECtHR <GC>, Freedom and Democracy Party <ÖZDEP> v. Turkey, Judgment of 8 December 1999, no. 23885/94, § 47). [608]

a) Here, the ECtHR explicitly recognises the possibility of prohibiting a political party in order to protect democracy. This must, however, satisfy the requirements of Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR, which means that it must be provided for by law and must be necessary in a democratic society (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 103; ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., § 82). [609]

b) According to the ECtHR the necessity of prohibiting a political party in a democratic society requires, firstly, that this pursues a legitimate aim. The legitimate aims in this regard are exhaustively set out in Art. 11(2) first sentence EHRC (cf. ECtHR <GC>, United Communist Party of Turkey and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 30 January 1998, no. 133/1996/752/951, §§ 40 and 41; ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 67; ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., § 64; ECtHR, HADEP and Demir v. Turkey, Judgment of 14 December 2010, no. 28003/03, § 44; ECtHR, Eusko Abertzale Ekintza - Acción Nacionalista Vasca <EAE-ANV> c. Espagne, Judgment of 15 January 2013, no. 40959/09, § 54). [610]

c) A prohibition of a political party further requires a "pressing social need" to that end (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Socialist Party and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 25 May 1998, no. 20/1997/804/1007, § 49; ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 104). [611]

aa) According to the ECtHR, whether such a need exists is a matter for decision in each individual case. In view of the far-reaching interference associated with prohibition for the political party and for democracy as such, prohibition only comes into question either if the political party is pursuing aims which are incompatible with the fundamental principles of democracy and the protection of human rights or if the means used by the political party are not lawful and democratic, in particular if it incites to violence or advocates the use of force […]. While it is true that a political party may promote a change in the law or the legal and constitutional structures of the state, it must use lawful and democratic means to do so and the proposed changes must for their part also be compatible with fundamental democratic principles (cf. ECtHR, Yazar and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 9 April 2002, no. 22723/93 et al., § 49; ECtHR < GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 98; ECtHR, Parti de la Democratie <DEP> c. Turquie, Judgment of 10 December 2002, no. 25141/94, § 46; ECtHR, Parti Socialiste de Turquie <STP> et autres c. Turquie, Judgment of 12 November 2003, no. 26482/95, § 38; ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., § 79; ECtHR, HADEP and Demir v. Turkey, Judgment of 14 December 2010, no. 28003/03, § 61). [612]

bb) With regard to the timing of an order to prohibit a political party, the ECtHR explicitly recognises the admissibility of preventive intervention. It is the opinion of the ECtHR that a state cannot be required to wait, before intervening, until a political party has seized power and begun to take concrete steps to implement a policy incompatible with democracy, even though the danger of that policy for democracy is sufficiently established and imminent. A state must reasonably be able to prevent the realisation of a political programme which contradicts the Convention (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., §§ 102 and 103; ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., §§ 81 and 82). This grants the Convention's contracting states at least a certain margin of appreciation in determining the right timing for prohibiting a political party […]. [613]

cc) Whether the prohibition of a political party corresponds to a pressing social need is determined by the ECtHR on the basis of an overall examination of the specific circumstances (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., §§ 104 and 105; ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., § 83). The ECtHR finds in this regard that the historical experiences and developments in the Convention's contracting state in question should also be taken into consideration (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 124; ECtHR, Partidul Comunistilor and Ungureanu v. Romania, Judgment of 3 February 2005, no. 46626/99, § 58; ECtHR, HADEP and Demir v. Turkey, Judgment of 14 December 2010, no. 28003/03, §§ 69 et seq.; ECtHR, Republican Party of Russia v. Russia, Judgment of 12 April 2011, no. 12976/07, § 127). [614]

d) Finally, in the opinion of the ECtHR the prohibition of a political party must be proportionate to the aims pursued with the prohibition. In this regard, however, the ECtHR limits the test of "proportionality" (Angemessenheit) to the legal implications side of the scales and determines whether the consequences of the prohibition of the political party arising from national law are out of proportion to the seriousness of the threat to democracy established with regard to a pressing social need. As a rule, if a pressing need exists it finds that the prohibition is proportionate (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., §§ 133 and 134 ; ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., § 93; ECtHR, Eusko Abertzale Ekintza - Acción Nacionalista Vasca <EAE-ANV> c. Espagne, Judgment of 15 January 2013, no. 40959/09, § 81). [615]

In just two cases where the use of force by individual party members was endorsed on a few occasions, the court found, irrespective of the existence of a pressing social need, that prohibition of the political party based on this conduct would be disproportionate (cf. ECtHR, Parti de la Democratie <DEP> c. Turquie, Judgment of 10 December 2002, no. 25141/94, §§ 61 et seq. and 64 et seq.; ECtHR, Parti pour une société démocratique <DTP> et autres c. Turquie, Judgment of 12 January 2016, no. 3840/10 et al., §§ 101 et seq.). In the case of the Turkish DTP, it explicitly drew attention to the fact that, in contrast to individual utterances by its members, the political party as a whole had stated its commitment to peaceful and democratic solutions and that it was not to be assumed that these individual statements could have any impact on national security or public safety (cf. ECtHR, Parti pour une société démocratique <DTP> et autres c. Turquie, Judgment of 12 January 2016, no. 3840/10 et al., §§ 85 et seq., § 98). [616]

2. The standard set out for establishing the unconstitutionality of a political party in accordance with Art. 21(2) GG is no less stringent than the requirements derived by the ECtHR from Art. 11(2) ECHR for the prohibition of a political party. [617]

a) Art. 21(2) first sentence GG plainly takes account of the requirement that the prohibition must be provided for by law. Furthermore, the protection of the free democratic basic order and of the existence of the state constitutes a legitimate aim within the meaning of Art. 11(2) ECHR. In this regard the ECtHR and the Federal Constitutional Court concur in proceeding from the assumption that a political party has to oppose not only individual provisions of the Constitution but also fundamental principles of the free constitutional state. [618]

b) If the criteria under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG are met, it can also be presumed that a pressing social need exists for prohibiting a political party. If a political party acts in a systematic manner in the sense of qualified preparation for undermining or abolishing the free democratic basic order and if there are specific and weighty indications suggesting the possibility that this action may succeed, this satisfies the requirements which the ECtHR has established in terms of the necessity for prohibiting the political party to protect democratic society in accordance with Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR. Nothing else may be inferred from the reference by the ECtHR to the need for a sufficiently established and imminent threat (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 102). Contrary to one opinion voiced in the literature […], this cannot be taken to mean that, from the point of view of the ECtHR, the prohibition of a political party is only in compliance with the Convention if a specific threat to the free democratic order has already emerged and the success of the anti-constitutional endeavours of the political party is immediately imminent. [619]

Such a presumption is already contradicted by the fact that the ECtHR has in individual cases regarded approval of acts of terrorism as being sufficient for the prohibition of a political party without basing this on the size or significance of the prohibited regional political parties and the threats posed by them to the constitutional order (cf. ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., §§ 85 et seq.; ECtHR, Eusko Abertzale Ekintza - Acción Nacionalista Vasca <EAE-ANV> c. Espagne, Judgment of 15 January 2013, no. 40959/ 09, §§ 67 et seq.). The ECtHR moreover explicitly acknowledges the preventive character of the prohibition of political parties and grants states a margin of appreciation in determining the timing of prohibitions. In cases where it has found that imposed prohibitions of political parties are not in compliance with the Convention, it has also (additionally) drawn attention to the fact that the political parties concerned in these cases had no real chance of bringing about political change (cf. ECtHR, Yazar and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 9 April 2002, no. 22723/93 et al., § 58; ECtHR, Parti de la Democratie <DEP> c. Turquie, Judgment of 10 December 2002, no. 25141/94, § 55; ECtHR, The United Macedonian Organisation Ilinden-Pirin and Others v. Bulgaria, Judgment of 20 October 2005, no. 59489/00, § 61). Accordingly, it cannot be inferred that the existence of a specific threat to the democratic constitutional state is a necessary criterion for the prohibition of a political party […]. [620]

Indeed, as the ECtHR explicitly states, the existence of a pressing social need to prohibit a political party must be established on the basis of an overall examination of the circumstances in the specific individual case and must take into account specific national features (cf. ECtHR <GC>, United Communist Party of Turkey and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 30 January 1998, no. 133/1996/752/951, § 59; ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 124; ECtHR, Partidul Comunistilor and Ungureanu v. Romania, Judgment of 3 February 2005, no. 46626/99, § 58; ECtHR, HADEP and Demir v. Turkey, Judgment of 14 December 2010, no. 28003/03, §§ 69 et seq.; ECtHR, Republican Party of Russia v. Russia, Judgment of 12 April 2011, no. 12976/07, § 127). Therefore, in relation to Art. 21(2) GG, it must be taken into account that the provision is, above all, based on the historical experience of the rise of the Nazi party in the Weimar Republic and efforts to prevent recurrence of such incidents by means of early intervention against totalitarian political parties. Against that background, the notion that the prohibition of a political party should only be considered when a political party has become so strong that, if events are allowed to take their course, undermining or abolition of the free democratic basic order does not merely seem possible but is in fact probable, is incompatible with such efforts. In that respect, the determination in Art. 21(2) first sentence GG of an early timing for the prohibition of a political party that does not require waiting for a specific threat to the free democratic basic order to emerge is the result of the specific historical experience of the establishment of the tyrannical and despotic rule of the National Socialists. Against this background, a pressing social need to prohibit a political party in accordance with the case-law of the ECtHR may be presumed to exist if the requirements under Art. 21(2) first sentence GG are met, namely if there are specific and weighty indications which suggest that it is at least possible that the political party's actions directed against the free democratic basic order could be successful. [621]

c) The considerations of the ECtHR regarding the requirement of proportionality of the prohibition of a political party do not raise any concerns about the standard applicable under Art. 21(2) GG and its conformity with the Convention either. [622] aa) The ECtHR generally considers the existence of a pressing social need to be sufficient to affirm the proportionality of the prohibition of a political party (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 133). Insofar as the court nevertheless exceptionally found that a prohibition would be disproportionate, this concerned two isolated cases of approval of acts of violence by individual functionaries of the political party in question (cf. ECtHR, Parti de la Democratie <DEP> c. Turquie, Judgment of 10 December 2002, no. 25141/94, §§ 61 et seq. and 64 et seq.; ECtHR, Parti pour une société démocratique <DTP> et autres c. Turquie, Judgment of 12 January 2016, no. 3840/10 et al., §§ 101 et seq.). Under circumstances like these, there would not have been room for establishing the unconstitutionality of a political party under the framework of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG either. There would be a lack of a fundamental tendency attributable to the political party to use force as a means of political debate (cf. para. 576). Moreover, mere utterances by individual party members against the free democratic basic order would probably not meet the requirement of being potentially suitable for achieving the pursued anti-constitutional aims, a requirement called for in the context of the criterion of "seeking". Accordingly, the ECtHR's recourse to the requirement of proportionality does not amount to a tightening in relation to the criteria which have to be met within the framework of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG for the prohibition of a political party. [623]

bb) Likewise, the conformity of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG with the Convention is not called into question to the extent that the ECtHR, in its decision concerning the prohibition of the DTP, refers, with regard to proportionality, to the possibility under Turkish law of cutting the funds paid to a political party by the state rather than prohibiting it (cf. ECtHR, Parti pour une société démocratique <DTP> et autres c. Turquie, Judgment of 12 January 2016, no. 3840/10 et al., §§ 101 et seq.). It is a matter for the respective national law, having due regard for the requirements of the ECHR, to prescribe whether and to what extent sanctions may be imposed on political parties which pursue anti-constitutional aims. In this regard, the national legislature is at liberty to waive sanctions altogether, to create possibilities for graduated sanctions or to restrict itself to the sanction of prohibition of the political party. [624]

Therefore, the legislative concept of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG, which dispenses with differentiated possibilities for applying sanctions, is compatible with the Convention. The only possible legal consequence prescribed by this provision if its criteria are met is the establishment of unconstitutionality. The constitutional situation as it currently applies excludes sanctions below the level of prohibition of the political party, which would include a reduction or cessation of state funding. Contrary to the respondent's view, there is thus no room within the framework of Art. 21(2) GG for the application of the principle of proportionality (cf. para. 599 et seq.), unless the legislature amends the Constitution and introduces a different approach. This raises no concerns in terms of the Convention as long as the order to prohibit a political party complies with the criteria for the proportionality of a prohibition which are derived from the case-law of the ECtHR with regard to Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR. This is the case if the criteria of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG are met. [625]

d) To the extent that the respondent derives from the 'Guidelines on Prohibition and Dissolution of Political Parties and Analogous Measures' of the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe of 10/11 December 1999 (CDL-INF<2000>001; cf. European Commission for Democracy through Law <Venice Commission>, Compilation of Venice Commission Opinions and Reports concerning Political Parties, CDL<2013>045, p. 38) the opinion that the prerequisite for a prohibition of a political party under the Convention is that the political party must be pursuing its political aims with the use of force and that this must be taken into consideration within the framework of Art. 21(2) GG, it is ignoring the fact that the Venice Commission's Guidelines are non-binding recommendations which the ECtHR has not adopted with regard to the requirements for a prohibition of a political party. Instead, it examines whether there is a pressing social need for prohibition both on the basis of the means employed by the political party and the aims it is pursuing (cf. ECtHR, Yazar and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 9 April 2002, no. 22723/93 et al., § 51 et seq.;

ECtHR <GC>, Refah Partisi and Others v. Turkey, Judgment of 13 February 2003, no. 41340/98 et al., § 98; ECtHR, Herri Batasuna and Batasuna v. Spain, Judgment of 30 June 2009, no. 25803/04 et al., § 79; ECtHR, HADEP and Demir v. Turkey, Judgment of 14 December 2010, no. 28003/03, § 61). It may, therefore, be the case that the use or endorsement of force is sufficient as a condition for prohibiting a political party according to the standards of the ECtHR. It is not, however, an indispensable prerequisite for prohibiting a political party in accordance with the requirements of Art. 11(2) first sentence ECHR. [626]

IV.

The proposal by the respondent to suspend the proceedings and refer the questions raised by it in this connection to the Court of Justice of the European Union in accordance with Art. 267(1)(a) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) for a preliminary ruling lacks any objective basis. [627]

1. [...] [628]

2. a) The Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court has already found, in its order of 22 November 2001 (BVerfGE 104, 214), that the European Union has no jurisdiction under the currently applicable treaties for ruling on the law relating to political parties. While it is the case that Art. 191 of the Treaty establishing the European Community (EC Treaty) acknowledged the function of political parties at European level in the process of European integration and was insofar the basis for the formation of joint parliamentary groups in the European Parliament, this does not mean that EU law contains any statement regarding whether and under what conditions a political party may be prohibited by a Member State of the European Union. Nor do general principles of EU law such as the rule of law, democracy and the protection of fundamental rights give rise to a question capable of being referred (cf. BVerfGE 104, 214 <218 and 219>). [629]

   b) This is also upheld following the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon. […] [630]

   c) No different conclusion can be drawn from Regulation (EC) No. 2004/2003 on the regulations governing political parties and rules regarding their funding at European level. This was issued on the basis of Art. 191 EC Treaty and does not establish any jurisdiction of the European Union beyond the regulatory content thereof. [631]

   Thus, the prohibition of national political parties remains an exclusive matter of national law. […] [632]

D.

Measured against these standards, the application for prohibition is unfounded. It is true that the respondent seeks, by reason of its aims and the behaviour of its adherents, to abolish the free democratic basic order (I.). Since, however, there are no specific and weighty indications suggesting that the achievement of the aims pursued by the respondent can possibly succeed, the criterion of "seeking" within the meaning of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG is not met (II.). [633]

I.

The respondent disrespects the fundamental principles which are indispensable for the free democratic constitutional state. Its aims and the behaviour of its adherents disrespect human dignity (1.) and the core of the principle of democracy (2.) and display elements that are similar in nature to the historical National Socialism (3.). The respondent's political concept advocates abolishing the free democratic basic order (4.). [634]

1. The respondent's political concept is incompatible with the guarantee of human dignity within the meaning of Art. 1(1) GG. […] The concept of the "Volk" it advocates is a negation of the personal right to respect deriving from the principle of human dignity and leads to the denial of fundamental equality before the law for all persons who do not belong to this ethnic Volksgemeinschaft. […] [635]

a) The respondent's party programme violates the right of the person to be valued and respected which derives from the intrinsic value of human life and the dignity of human beings […] (aa).[…] [637]

aa) [...] [638]

(1) In line with its concept of the primacy of the Volksgemeinschaft, the respondent demands that the highest aim of German politics should be the preservation of the German Volk, defined by descent, language, historical experience and values. It demands the endeavour for the "unity of Volk and state" and the prevention of "foreign infiltration (Überfremdung) of Germany with or without naturalisation" […]. As a matter of principle foreigners should not, it claims, have the right to stay in Germany, but only the duty to return to their home countries […]. [639]

(2) On this basis, the respondent has developed a political concept which is mainly aimed at a strict exclusion […] of all ethnic non-Germans. […] [640]

(a) According to the respondent, fundamental rights explicitly apply to all Germans and the application of the principle of solidarity is limited to the community of all Germans […]. Accordingly, the respondent claims, measures by the state to promote the family should only promote German families. Ownership of German land may only be acquired by Germans […]. [641]

(b) In Chapter 10 of its party programme [the respondent demands] legislation to repatriate foreigners living here […]. Integration, it claims, amounts to genocide. The building of foreign religious buildings should be stopped; the fundamental right to asylum under Art. 16a GG should be abolished […]. [642]

(c) In Chapter 16, 'Education and Culture', the respondent objects to German and foreign schoolchildren being taught together […]. [643]

(d) In Chapter 17, 'Reform of the Legal System', the respondent demands a referendum on the reintroduction of the death penalty and full enforcement of life sentences. […] Moreover, […] a category of 'naturalised foreigners' […] should be added to police statistics […]. [644]

(3) The very aims set out in the respondent's party programme are incompatible with the guarantee of human dignity. […] [645]

In particular, […] the party's programme advocates a devalued legal status practically amounting to full deprivation of rights of all those who do not belong […] to its ethnically-defined Volksgemeinschaft […]. [646]

bb) The respondent must accept this programme being held against it. […] [647]

(1) [...] [648-650]

(2) [...] [649]

(a) [...] [650]

(b) At any rate, attribution […] is established […] by virtue of the confirmation of the programme's content by the relevant persons in the respondent's leadership. […] In its written submissions in the present proceedings the respondent has repeatedly made reference to this programme and nowhere has it distanced itself from it. In the oral hearing, Mr Franz, the party chairman, explicitly confirmed the applicability of the programme and the fact that it coincides with the respondent's convictions. […] [651]

[...] [652]

b) The incompatibility of the aims pursued by the respondent with the guarantee of human dignity […] is proven by virtue of its attributable publications and confirmed by statements made by its leading functionaries. […] [653]

aa) (1) The concept of the "Volk" advocated […] by the respondent is described as follows in the brochure 'Wortgewandt […]' published in its 2nd edition by the party's executive committee in April 2012: [654]

> A German is anyone who is of German origin and was thus born into the ethnic and cultural community of the German people. [...] An African, an Asian or an Oriental can never become a German because the award of a piece of printed paper […] can in no way change biological heredity, […] and members of other races remain […] foreign bodies, however long they may have lived in Germany. […]

[...] [655-658]

(a) The regional association of the Land of Bavaria made the following comment on Facebook in February 2015 about the arrival of African refugees: [659]

> To be German means to belong to the German Volk, not because of a deed of naturalisation but by birth and descent. One is German by virtue of one's blood and nothing else!
>
> So be proud and thankful, German women and German men, that you were born with the blessing of a German birth. [...]

bb) The supremacy of the Volksgemeinschaft over the individual, and its racial foundation [...] are made especially clear in statements by the Young National Democrats (JN) (1) [...]. [660]

(1) (a) D., the federal training director of the JN puts it thus [...]: [661]

> The community is supreme here. […] Our ideology places the Volk at the heart of all being. [...]

(b) [...] [662]

(c) In its "Guidelines - Political Concepts" (Leitfaden - Politische Grundbegriffe) published [...] by the federal executive committee of the JN in January 2013 it is stated that: [663]

> Freedom is the pursuit of the meaning of life, which is the preservation of the species. [...]

>
> The intermixing of peoples leads, it claims, to the loss of the "best and noblest virtues" and to the destruction of the respective Volk: [666]
>
> [...] The intermixing of different cultures has never led to a multicultural society as is so often claimed to exist today. All that ever came out of it was a mish-mash that led to destruction. [...]
>
> [...] [667]
>
> These statements culminate in a discussion of the concept of race, which is regarded by the JN as a "law of nature" and a fundamental element of its view of the world [...]. [668]

(d) These statements by the JN can be attributed to the respondent. [...] [669]

[...] [670-680]

cc) The consequence of the ethic definition [...] of the "German Volksgemeinschaft is the devaluation of the legal status of all persons who do not belong to this community. […] [S]tatements and activities attributable to the respondent prove the fact that this also applies to naturalised German citizens with an immigration background […]. [681]

(1) In the Bundestag election campaign in 2009 the respondent's regional association for Berlin sent a letter purporting to be an "unofficial announcement" to 22 politicians with an immigration background. Under the heading "Information provided by your repatriation of foreigners officer", its addressees […] were told to make preparations for their "journey home" […]. [682]

In the 2013 Bundestag election campaign, the respondent's regional association for Berlin once again sent a similar circular to candidates with an immigration background [...]. [683]

(2) [This accords with] a television interview by a German journalist with an immigration background with the respondent's deputy chairman, Ronny Zasowk. Asked what he would do with people like her [...], he replied that they would be given a deportation order and would have to leave Germany. They would be able to take movable goods with them and would receive compensation for the rest. [684]

[...] [685]

(3) In the 2009 Landtag election campaign in Thuringia, W., the then Land managing director of the respondent, said, regarding the candidature of S., a local politician of colour, [686]

Thuringia must stay German. We thank S. for his help as a guest worker [...]. But he is no longer needed today [...].

c) [...] [688-696]

(3) Against this background, the conclusion drawn by the expert witness Prof. Kailitz and submitted in the oral hearing, namely that the respondent, on the basis of its world view, advocates the expulsion of millions of people from Germany, is understandable. At any rate, it denies those whom it defines as "non-Germans" the right to remain in Germany [...]. [697]

d) The disrespect for human dignity which can be inferred from [its] notion of an ethnically-defined Volksgemeinschaft is attested by numerous statements which are attributable to the respondent regarding attitudes towards foreigners (aa), immigrants (bb) and minorities (cc). [698]

aa) [...] [699]

(1) [...]

(2) Jürgen Rieger, as the respondent's deputy federal chairman, imputed [...] a lower level of intelligence to all dark-skinned people: [701]

Negroes have an intelligence quotient between that of a retarded German and that of a normal German.

(3) In a Facebook post in May 2015 the respondent's regional association for Bavaria warned German women against relationships with men of colour: [702]

[...] In the cities there is already the situation that you can't help meeting black Africans (Negroes) in the streets wherever you go. [...]

They have been brought here to finally destroy our Volk, our ethnic community! German women and girls, don't get involved with Negroes! Otherwise you will be committing a serious crime against your Volk!

The respondent's argument […] that the author of this post simply wished to draw attention to the exploding number of asylum seekers is contradicted by the objective declaratory content of the statement and glosses over the wording which deliberately parallels that of National Socialist slogans regarding dealings with Jews [...]. [703]

[...] [704-706]

bb) It is in particular asylum seekers and immigrants who are at the centre of inhuman statements [...]. [707]

(1) This is proven by the respondent's parliamentary activities. [708]

(a) (aa) In the Landtag of Saxony [...] Mr Apfel, the former leader of the NPD parliamentary group [...], said: [709]

[...] Give your consent, close the gateway for Moslem bombers, Gypsy criminal gangs and social parasites from all over the world.

(Plenary proceeding reports (Plenarprotokoll) 5/27 of 17 December 2010, p. 2657)

(bb) A brief enquiry by Member of Parliament Apfel of 4 February 2013 [...] included the question as to how many children were born with disabilities in Saxony in marriages between relatives […] entered into by immigrants. [710]

(cc) In the Landtag of Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, Udo Pastörs used the term "degenerated people" [...] in relation to asylum seekers. In the same debate, Member of Parliament Tino Müller had previously spoken of "nine-headed gang of Negroes" […]. [711]

(b) [...] [712]

(2) Asylum seekers and immigrants [...] have also been regularly disparaged [...] in extra-parliamentary activities. [713]

(a) (aa) For example, Jürgen Gansel advocated on his Facebook page on 21 April 2015 the rapid deportation of "asylum fraudsters, Moslem extremists and criminal foreigners". [714]

(bb) [...] [715]

(cc) The respondent's regional association of the Land of Bavaria warns in a Facebook post [...]: "Take care! Don't get too close to the 'refugees'! You'll be risking your health! [...] And scabies, a skin infection with parasites, is the least harmful thing you can catch from them!" [716]

(dd) Maria Frank, the Land chairwoman of the Berlin National Women's Ring (RNF), speaking at a demonstration [...] in July 2013, described Moslems and black Africans generally as rapists, drug dealers and filthy: [...]. [717]

(ee) [...] [718-719]

(ff) [...] [720]

(b) (aa) All these utterances are aimed at depriving asylum seekers and immigrants of their human dignity. [...] The utterances also exceed [...] the limits of general criticism of immigration policy [...]. [721]

(bb) Each of these utterances is attributable to the respondent and its content is unmistakeable. [722]

[...] [723-725]

cc) In addition to asylum seekers and immigrants, the respondent also attacks religious and social minorities in a similar way, thus setting itself in opposition to human dignity. [726]

[...] [727-734]

In his 2009 Ash Wednesday speech given in the Saarland, Pastörs described citizens of Turkish origin as "sperm guns" and was as a result sentenced [...] to a term of imprisonment […] by the Saarbrücken Regional Court (Landgericht) [...] for incitement to hatred and violence. [735]

[...] [736-739]

(bb) High-ranking party functionaries of the respondent have also taken anti-Semitic stances in public utterances. [740]

(α) [...] [741]

[...] [742]

(β) Karl Richter stated on 8 January 2015: [743]

> [...] There have been Jews in the Occident for at least 1500 years only as traders, usurers, Christ-murderers and in the ghetto.
>
> [...]
>
> To put it briefly and bluntly: MY Occident is Christian and in at least the same part Germanic. I do not need the "Jewish" in my Occident, and - if I may be so bold - I set no great store by it.

(χ) [...] [744]

[...] [745]

(δ) The […] chairman of the respondent's regional association of the Land of Berlin, Sebastian Schmidtke, [was] convicted of slander for wearing a black t-shirt with the slogan "All Jews are Bastards". [746-747]

(ε) [...] [748]

(ζ) [...] [749]

(b) [...] [750]

[...] [751]

(3) The respondent's disrespect for human dignity is not limited to the […] mentioned groups. It is clear from statements of its opinions regarding other groups that it does not respect insofar the right to personal respect deriving from human dignity. [752]

[...] [753-757]

2. The respondent also disrespects the free democratic basic order with a view to the principle of democracy. It is true that this attitude cannot be inferred with the requisite unambiguousness from the NPD party programme (a). But its rejection of the fundamental design of free democracy is clear if other publications and utterances by leading functionaries attributable to the respondent are considered, too (b). [...] [758]

a) [...] [759-761]

aa) The political concept of the respondent is incompatible with the right of all citizens of a state to equal participation in the formation of the political will of the state. [762]

(1) (a) If the "rule of the Volk" (Volksherrschaft) presupposes the Volksgemeinschaft, as the respondent advocates [...], this necessarily results in an exclusion from the democratic process of those people who, by reason of their ethnicity, do not belong to the Volksgemeinschaft.[...] Rather, the excluding nature of the Volksgemeinschaft involves a limitation, on grounds of ethnicity, of the right to equal participation in the formation of the political will which is incompatible with Art. 20(2) first sentence GG. [763]

(b) When asked about this in the oral hearing, Jürgen Gansel confirmed this finding. He drew an explicit distinction between rule by the Volk (Volksherrschaft) and rule by the population (Bevölkerungsherrschaft) and stated that Volksherrschaft was linked to the ethnic Volk of the state and therefore only existed in the Federal Republic of Germany to a limited degree. [...] [This] documents the fact that, in the view of the respondent, the right to democratic participation should be limited to members of the ethnically homogenous Volksgemeinschaft. [764]

(2) (a) [...] [766-767]

bb) In addition, the respondent's anti-democratic stance is clear from its negation of the principle of parliamentary democracy. [...] [768]

(1) (a) The fundamental rejection of the existing representative parliamentary system [...] is made clear in an interview with Holger Apfel in Deutsche Stimme ("German Voice", issue 12/2008, p. 3): [769]

[...] Parliament degenerated into a cheap caricature of real rule by the Volk a long time ago.

(b) Similarly, the former chairman of the respondent's regional association of the Land of Saxony Anhalt, Matthias Heyder, said at the 2010 Bamberg programme party convention: [770]

What's out there is a cold, concreted-over, anti-social system that is hostile to the Volk and it doesn't need to be changed, it needs to be abolished.

[...] [771-773]

(2) At the same time, the respondent sets the idea of the Volksgemeinschaft against the principle of democracy, thus relativising the latter's claim to validity. [774]

(a) This becomes clear when W., the former deputy president of the regional association of the Land of Bavaria, writes: [775]

Rule by the Volk is put into practice more if a Volk is led in all areas of life by its most capable and most competent members than if it allows itself to be managed by a mere majority or by corrupt parliamentarians. [...]

(b) [...] [776]

(c) In the journal Der Aktivist […], D. fundamentally challenges the claim of democracy and the majority principle to validity: [777]

Democracy seems to have become a kind of religion for the people currently in power. [...] However, the constant mantra-like repetition of the assertion that it is in fact the "best form of society" is just not tenable. [...] There is no formula for the perfect form of the state; there is only the inner balance of the Volk with the state.

(d) Udo Pastörs emphasised at the NPD Swabian Day (Schwabentag) in Günzburg in 2011: [778]

What lies ahead of us is the last stretch of a corrupt system that has to be abolished because it endangers the preservation of the Volk, dear friends.

(3) [...] [779-796]

(δ) Karl Richter writes in hier & jetzt ("here and now", issue 15/2010, p. 4 et seq. <7>) under the headline 'What did you mean, Mr Homer? Ithaka in Bottrop - Why the 'Odyssey' should in fact be banned' (Wie meinten Sie das, Herr Homer? Ithaka in Bottrop - warum die 'Odyssee' eigentlich verboten gehört): [797]

Anyone who got into bed with foreign rule must go, with no messing about; scum that has to be cleaned out, we want to prevent it rising up again - as the myth knows.

(c) The respondent, as its party programme makes clear, advocates replacing the existing political system with the "national state" as "[t]he political organisational form of a Volk" […]. In this connection, according to the information submitted by the respondent's former party chairman and MEP Voigt in the oral hearing, there should be a return to the concept of the German Reich. This coincides with other statements which are attributable to the respondent. [798]

(aa) Following Udo Voigt, Claus Cremer wrote in an online post on the homepage of the regional association of the Land of North Rhine-Westphalia in June 2011: [799]

The Reich is our goal, the NPD our way.

(bb) Similarly, in 2011 Karl Richter and Eckart Bräuniger called for the (re)vival of a German Reich in Deutsche Stimme ("German Voice", issue 2/2011, p. 22) […]: [800]

Let us integrate the idea of the Reich into the themes and challenges of the present to secure the continued existence of what remains of the body of our Volk […]. Yes to Germany - yes to the Reich!

(cc) H., a former elected municipal council deputy from Lower Saxony called in the journal Volk in Bewegung - Der Reichsbote ("People in motion - Herald of the Reich") not only for the re-establishment of the German Reichbut also for the reinstatement of the constitution and laws […] which were in force on 23 May 1945. […]: [801]

[…] [802-804]

3. The respondent is similar in nature to National Socialism. Its concept of the Volksgemeinschaft, its fundamentally anti-Semitic stance and its disparaging of the existing democratic order reveal clear parallels to National Socialism (a). In addition, its proclaimed identification with leading personalities of the NSDAP, the use of selected National Socialist vocabulary, texts, songs and symbols as well as revisionist statements with regard to history demonstrate an affinity of at least relevant parts of the respondent with the mind-set of National Socialism (b). […] Taken together, this confirms the respondent's disrespect for the free democratic basic order (c). [805]

a) aa) The term and the concept of the Volksgemeinschaft are a central feature which the political concepts of the respondent and the NSDAP have in common. […] Point 4 of the 25-point programme of the NSDAP read: "Only those who are members of the Volk (Volksgenossen) can be citizens of the state. Only those who are of German blood, regardless of religion, can be Volksgenossen. Therefore, no Jew can be a Volksgenosse." Apart from the specific emphasis on the exclusion of Jewish people, this definition corresponds exactly to the respondent's ideas. [806]

[...] [807]

bb) Clearly, the respondent and the NSDAP also share a fundamentally anti-Semitic stance. […] [808]

cc) Finally, the rejection and disparaging of parliamentary democracy is a further feature shared by the respondent and National Socialism. […] [809]

b) Affinity with National Socialism is also expressed in various ways in the actions of the respondent: [810]

aa) These include […] references by leading representatives of the respondent glorifying protagonists of the Nazi regime: [811]

(1) As Thomas Wulff, former deputy chairman of the regional association of the Land of Hamburg, put it in a statement on the website www.altermediadeutschland.info on Hitler's birthday, 20 April 2013: [812]

May this party conference on the weekend of 20 April remind one or two delegates like a flash of lightning what the greatest son of our Volk […] was able to do. He was able to do it because, committing his whole person and acting completely selflessly, incorruptible and prepared to make every personal sacrifice, he became the embodiment of the hope of millions! […]

[...] [813-817]

bb) The link with the National Socialist past is also clear from the use of National Socialist vocabulary, texts, songs and symbols. [818]

(1) [...] [819]

(2) Jürgen Gansel entitled his Facebook post on 12 January 2015 'People, rise up!', words used by Goebbels in his […] Sportpalast speech on 18 February 1943. The Brandenburg JN, too, in their Facebook post on 28 November 2014 used the wording "Das Volk steht auf, der Sturm bricht los" (The people rise, the storm breaks loose), which originally came from the poem 'Männer und Buben' (Men and Boys) by Theodor Körner. [820]

(3) [...] [821-830]

cc) Furthermore, it is clear that leading representatives of the respondent are endeavouring to glorify National Socialism and to relativise its crimes. [831]

[...] [832-834]

(4) In a press statement by the respondent dated 18 January 2010, Karl Richter stated that the national opposition would not "accept" the [...] 65th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz as a "ritual permanent stigmatisation of the German as a people of perpetrators (Tätervolk)": [835]

For the Holocaust has many facets and includes those burned to death and murdered in Dresden and Hiroshima [...]. [...]

(5) [...] In the Landtag of Saxony, Jürgen Gansel diagnosed "historical pornography in the shape of Holocaust memorial rituals and other forms of national masochism" [...]. Udo Pastörs spoke in the Landtag of Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania of a "one-sided cult of guilt" and "Auschwitz projections" [...]. In the same place Tino Müller stated: [836]

You are lying to our young people by hiding the fact that it was not the German Reich that declared war on Great Britain and France, but the British and French who declared war on us. [...]

Holger Apfel stated in the Landtag of Saxony: [837]

66 years after the end of the Second World War there must finally be an end to our Volk being beaten into servitude with the club of Auschwitz. 66 years after the end of the Second World War it is finally time to take off the sinner's hair shirt and the dunce's cap. The desk for tickets to Canossa, [...] should be closed once and for all. [...]

The then members of the respondent's parliamentary group in the Landtag of Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania demonstratively absented themselves from a minute of silence to commemorate the victims of National Socialism on 30 January 2013. [838]

c) The [...] evidence [...] documents to a sufficient degree - without there being any need for recourse to the expert opinion by the Institute of Contemporary History (Institut für Zeitgeschichte) submitted by the applicant - the links in terms of content between relevant parts of the respondent and historical National Socialism. [839]

The former federal chairman of the respondent, Holger Apfel, also confirmed this in the oral hearing and drew attention to the fact that "at least some party members still find themselves in many points in the world of the political ideas of the Third Reich". The former Hamburg Land chairman Wulff, he said, openly professes to be a National Socialist. According to Mr Apfel, proceedings to exclude Mr Wulff from the party failed. [840]

It may be presumed from all of this that a similarity in nature exists between the respondent and National Socialism. [...] [841]

[...] [842]

At the same time, this confirms the disparaging by the respondent of the free democratic basic order. [...] [843]

4. [...] [844]

II.

What precludes a prohibition of the respondent, however, is the fact that the criterion of "seeking" (darauf ausgehen) within the meaning of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG is not met. While the respondent does indeed advocate aims which are directed against the free democratic basic order and although it systematically acts […] towards achieving those aims [...] (1.), there are no specific and weighty indications suggesting even at least the possibility that these endeavours [...] might be successful (2.). [845]

1. The respondent works [...] in a systematic manner towards the realisation of its anti-constitutional aims (c). [846]

a) aa) The respondent has a nationwide organisational structure. [...] [847]

The respondent's financial report for 2013 shows that the respondent had 5,048 members [...] as of 31 December 2013. [848]

The respondent attempts to prepare its adherents for the political struggle by means of training courses and similar measures. [...] [849]

bb) The respondent is represented in the European Parliament by one member. It has no members in the Bundestag or in any federal state parliament. Some 350 members of local representative bodies […] are members of the respondent. [...] [850]

cc) The respondent's public relations work uses the entire spectrum of media opportunities. [...] [851]

[...] [852-854]

b) The basis of the respondent's political work is a self-contained strategic concept, which it describes as its "four pillar strategy" […]. [855]

c) The respondent systematically attempts to put these strategic goals into practice [...]. [856]

aa) (1) Within the framework of the first pillar of this strategy ("Fight for Hearts and Minds"), it endeavours to enhance its public acceptance by means of "national-revolutionary grass-roots work" [...]. The political message is not the primary factor here. [...] [857]

[...] [858-860]

bb) The aim of the "Fight for the Street" is the dissemination and implementation of the respondent's ideology. For this, it uses its media opportunities, election campaigns and - where it has one - its parliamentary presence. Beyond this, the respondent attempts to influence the formation of political opinion with [...] high-profile public activities [...]. [861]

(1) The respondent endeavours to address potential voters and sympathisers at an early age by using materials specifically aimed at young people [...]. [862]

[...] [863-866]

(2) The main focus of the respondent's publicity activities is on the topic of asylum. [...] [867]

(a) (aa) According to the applicant's submission, which remained uncontested, the respondent held a total of 192 events in 2015 which were directly attributable to it with more than 20 people attending each event and 23,000 people attending in total. In the view of the applicant, a further 95 events must be added to this, with a total of 20,000 people attending, since in particular rallies by MVGIDA and THÜGIDA [translator's note: two regionally active anti-Islam organisations, both of which are offshoots of PEGIDA - Patriotische Europäer gegen die Islamisierung des Abendlandes, Patriotic Europeans against the Islamisation of the Occident] are heavily influenced by the respondent. [868]

[...] [869-871]

(4) The attempt to disseminate the respondent's political ideology takes place on the basis of what is known as the "strategy of taking the floor" (Wortergreifungsstrategie) […] in direct confrontation with political competitors. [...] [872]

cc) The respondent also uses the "Fight for the Parliaments" to strive for its anti-constitutional aims and work towards their realisation in election campaigns and parliamentary work. […] [873]

[...] [874-876]

dd) The respondent's "Fight for the Organised Will" involves striving, on the basis of existing personal interconnections (1), to form a "comprehensive national opposition movement" under its own leadership (2). This uses co-operations with various different regional constellations of the extreme right-wing scene which is not affiliated with the NPD and preparedness to integrate members of this scene into the respondent who wish to join it (3). At the same time it seeks to collaborate with and influence the movements directed against an alleged "Islamisation of the Occident" (4). [877]

(1) A considerable number of persons at the respondent's executive levels used to be members of banned extreme right-wing organisations. […] [878]

[...] [879-895]

2. Even though all this shows that the respondent is committed to its anti-constitutional aims and is systematically working towards achieving them, its actions do not amount to a fight against the free democratic basic order in the sense of "seeking" (Art. 21(2) first sentence GG). There are no sufficiently weighty indications suggesting that it will succeed in achieving its anti-constitutional aims. […] [896]

a) [...] [897]

aa) Currently, parliamentary majorities enabling the respondent to impose its political concept are achievable neither through elections nor by means of forming coalitions. [898]

(1) At a supra-regional level, it has just one MEP in the European Parliament. […] [899]

Election results in European Parliament and Bundestag elections are stagnating at a very low level. In the last Bundestag election in 2013 the respondent […] gained 1.3 % of the valid second votes cast. […] In the 2014 European Parliament election it gained 1 % of the valid votes cast […]. [900]

In the former West German federal states, the respondent's election results varied at the last Landtag elections between 1.2 % (Saarland) and 0.2 % (Bremen) of the valid votes cast. Although the level was already low, it suffered further losses of votes in the Landtag elections in 2016 […]. [901]

There has also been a decline in the respondent's election results, albeit from a higher starting level, in Landtag elections in the former East German federal states. […] In Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania the respondent gained 7.3 % of the valid votes cast in the 2006 Landtag election, 6.0 % in the 2011 Landtag election and just 3.0 % in the 2016 Landtag election. [902]

In the more than five decades of its existence, the respondent has not been able to gain representation in any federal state parliament on a permanent basis. There are no indications that this development will change in the future. In addition, the other political parties represented in the parliaments […] have hitherto not been prepared to enter into coalitions or even ad hoc co-operations with the respondent. […] [903]

(2) Nor is the situation different at municipal level. Even though the respondent has more than 350 seats in local representative bodies throughout Germany […], it is very far from having the ability to influence the shaping of relevant policy. This is confirmed by the fact that the respondent's seats amount to around just one-thousandth of the estimated total number of more than 200,000 seats at municipal level. [904]

Nor does a consideration on a case-by-case basis yield any different assessment […]. [905]

[…] This is the case even when considering the municipalities upon which the applicant has laid particular emphasis, and in which the respondent gained a disproportionately high share of up to 27.2 % of the valid votes cast […] in the 2014 local government elections […]. [906]

The vast majority of the municipalities cited has a small number, in four digits, some even in just three digits […], of inhabitants which means that the high results in these individual cases were not sufficient even for one seat for the respondent in the respective municipal councils. […] At the relevant district level, the respondent did not gain more than 7 % of the votes in 2014 anywhere. […] [907]

Thus, the respondent has no policy-shaping majorities of its own in the municipal parliaments of the former East German federal states. […] Moreover, it has just as few coalition options there as in the former West German federal states. […] [909]

bb) There are likewise no specific and weighty indications suggesting that the respondent will succeed in achieving its aim of abolishing the free democratic basic order by democratic means outside the parliamentary level. […] [910]

(1) Compared with its highest level of 28,000 in 1969, the respondent's membership numbers have clearly declined. […] Neither the respondent's merger with the German People's Union (DVU) nor opening itself up to the neo-Nazi scene and the formation of its own regional associations in the former East German federal states have been able to put a permanent halt to the decline in membership. […] With a total of fewer than 6,000 members, the respondent's possibilities for action are limited significantly. [911]

(2) [...] [912]

(a) The Federation's Annual Report on the Protection of the Constitution (Verfassungsschutzbericht) for 2014 shows the respondent to be in a state of sustained crisis. Although it is still the most effective extreme right-wing political party, the report finds that it is suffering from internal strife, declining membership numbers, unsolved strategic issues, financial problems and the pending prohibition proceedings […]. [913]

[...] [914-916]

(aa) In this connection, the expert witness Prof. Jesse submitted his opinion in the oral hearing that the respondent is an isolated, ostracised political party whose campaign capability, such as it is, has declined in recent years. The expert witness Prof. Kailitz, too, stated in the oral hearing that the respondent is at present unable to reach the centre of society. [...] In the oral hearing the former party chairman of the respondent, Holger Apfel, said that the respondent has always been accorded an importance in public perception which has not matched the reality. He said that taboo-breaking had been deliberately staged in the parliaments in order […] to give the impression of an effective and professional organisation. [917]

(bb) The finding of a low level of effectiveness in society [...] is confirmed by reports of the constitutional protection authorities of the Federation and the federal states. All annual reports on the protection of the Constitution by the former West German federal states consistently show that attendance figures for the respondent's events are following a downward trend with numbers below three digits, while the number of counter-demonstrators has often been very much higher [...]. In the former East German federal states, it is also found that, apart from the respondent's anti-asylum campaigns (cf. para. 924 et seq.), the respondent's members frequently have only themselves for company at their events [...]. [918]

[...] [919]

(3) Nor is the respondent able to compensate in other ways for its structural deficits and low level of effectiveness in society. [...] [920]

[...] [921-923]

(c) This is also the case [...] to the extent that the respondent concentrates on activities directed against asylum seekers and minorities as part of its 'Fight for the Street'. [...] [924]

[...] While the respondent does indeed try to instrumentalise the refugee and asylum problems for its own purposes, it frequently acts not in its own name but under the umbrella of apparently neutral organisations [...]. When, on the other hand, it becomes evident that it is the respondent that is responsible for the event, attendance significantly declines. The applicant has itself submitted that the attendance figures at MVGIDA events declined from around 600 to 120 […] once the dominance of the respondent became evident. It was similar with the 'Schneeberger Lichtelläufen' event series directed against a local home for asylum seekers. While more than 1,500 people attended the first three events [...] only some 250 participants, most of them belonging to the respondent and its entourage, could be mobilised for the fourth event on 25 January 2014, for which the respondent took a more prominent, offensive stance as an organiser [...]. This documents the fact that the anti-asylum initiatives by the respondent have in individual cases been very successful in mobilising attendees. It is, [however], not discernible that this means that its social acceptance is increasing and that it will be able to assert its anti-constitutional aims through the process of forming the political will by democratic means. [...] [925]

(d) Finally, it does not seem likely that the respondent will be able to strengthen its impact by co-operating with forces which are not affiliated with it. [...] [926]

(aa) [...] [927]

[...] On the contrary, the respondent has been unable to achieve a "concentration of all national-minded forces" under its leadership. Its co-operation with unaffiliated forces takes place on an ad hoc basis without any firm organisational foundation. The respondent is not accorded a leading role. [...] [928]

[...] In the expert report by Prof. Borstel submitted by the applicant, co-operative ventures with extreme right-wing movements have been assessed as being existential for the respondent. Prof. Borstel reports, however, that these co-operations are temporary and on a regional basis, and that any permanent integration of the neo-Nazi groups and 'free' networks would run counter to the self-perception of these groups as extra-parliamentary resistance groups [...]. [929]

b) [Finally, there are] no specific and weighty indications suggesting that the respondent exceeds [...] the boundaries of admissible political struggle of opinions in a manner that would satisfy the constituent element of "seeking". [...] [933]

aa) It is not discernible that the respondent is capable of asserting to a relevant degree its claims for territorial dominance in a manner which excludes equal participation in the formation of the political will. There are no "national liberated zones" (1). [...] [934]

(1) Contrary to its original assertion, the applicant admitted [this] in its brief of 27 August 2015 [...]. [935]

(2) In this connection, the tiny village of Jamel constitutes a special case, which cannot be generalised. [...] [936]

[...] [937]

The gaining of a majority in the village by right-wing extremists is reflected in the villagescape. [...] [938]

[...] [939]

There is no doubt that Jamel is a village permeated with extreme right-wing ideas. This is, however, a singular [case] that is limited to a few persons. As the expert witness Prof. Jesse has confirmed in the oral hearing, this situation cannot be transferred to other places, particularly not larger villages or towns. […] [940]

(3) Other examples of successful implementation of the respondent's claims for territorial dominance were not identified. [941]

(a) Contrary to the applicant's opinion, it cannot be assumed that the Hanseatic city of Anklam [...] is a zone of cultural hegemony of the respondent. [...] [942]

(aa) The applicant's reference in this context to a […] property which, as a "nationalist meeting centre" […] serves as a venue for right-wing extremists across the country […] cannot be taken as evidence of the assertion of claims to dominance. [...] [943]

(bb) Nor is the carrying out of a demonstration on 31 July 2010 under the title of "Gegen kinderfeindliche Bonzen [...]" (Against Child-Hating Bigwigs) called jointly by the respondent and the organisations Nationale Sozialisten Mecklenburg (Mecklenburg National Socialists) and Freies Pommern (Free Pomerania) evidence of the respondent's dominance in Anklam. [...] [944]

[...] [945]

(cc) Furthermore, the suggestion that the respondent has a dominant position in Anklam is also refuted by the fact that in the 2014 municipal council election the respondent won merely 9.3 % of the valid votes cast and accordingly took only two of the 25 municipal council seats there. There are, moreover, several active anti-right-wing extremism initiatives in Anklam. [...] [946]

(b) The same holds for Lübtheen, which the applicant has portrayed as a further example of a zone of domination [...]. The fact that several leading functionaries of the respondent [...] live and are active in Lübtheen, and possibly moved there deliberately, is not sufficient for the presumption of a situation of dominance. The same applies to the extent that the respondent uses a property prominently located in the town centre and that its representatives are present at events, even ones directed against right-wing extremism. [947]

[...] [948]

[...] Here, too, the fact that the respondent won 10.7 % of the valid votes cast in the 2014 municipal election and accordingly took only two of the 17 seats in the municipal council is evidence against the respondent's dominance. Apart from that, the applicant itself admits that the respondent would not be able to realise fully its claim to dominance, not least due to the citizens' initiative against right-wing extremism initiated by the mayoress. [...] [949]

(c) [...] [950]

bb) Nor are there sufficient indications that there is a fundamental tendency of the respondent to assert its anti-constitutional aims by violent means or by committing criminal offences. [...] [951]

(1) While the applicant refers [...] to the fact that the number of attacks on homes for asylum seekers peaked in 2015 with 1,031 criminal offences (177 of them crimes of violence) being committed, this cannot be attributed to the respondent. [...] It is not sufficient in this regard for the respondent to be involved in creating a climate of hostility to foreigners with its inhuman agitation. [...] This cannot be simply taken on its own to prove that it regards attacks on refugee homes as a means likely to aid the achieving of its ends or that it approves of them in any other way. [...] [952]

(2) Contrary to the applicant's view, it cannot be inferred from the general lack of law-abiding behaviour on the part of its adherents that the respondent is prepared to use force or commit crimes to achieve its […] aims. [...] [953]

(a) In this connection, the anonymised statistics by the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (Bundesamt für Verfassungsschutz) submitted by the applicant regarding delinquency of the respondent's executive committee members cannot be used to support the applicant's view [...]. [954]

(b) This is not altered by the fact that the applicant has reacted to the notice as to inadmissibility as evidence and submitted a list of 57 criminal convictions of the respondent's functionaries in total. A large number of these convictions had [...] no political background [...]. A political background is at least doubtful in the case of a number of other criminal offences. [...] Moreover, the convictions cover a period of 25 years, largely concern purely propaganda offences and predominantly involve petty crime, with some being for offences committed as juveniles. The number, subject and severity of the criminal offences on the list committed by individual members of the respondent are not sufficient […] to accuse it of having the intention of asserting its political aims by using force or by committing crimes. [955]

(3) Nor are the events and facts set out in detail by the applicant sufficient for an inference that the respondent is prepared to use force or fails to obey the law such that the constituent element of "seeking" within the meaning of Art. 21(2) first sentence GG is met. [...] [956]

[...] [957-958]

(b) The violent assaults and other criminal offences described by the applicant cannot be unreservedly attributed to the respondent. [959]

(aa) Since the perpetrators who caused the arson attacks on the barn in Jamel and on a sports hall in Nauen planned as emergency accommodation for asylum seekers have not yet been identified [...], these occurrences cannot be taken into consideration. The same applies to the damaging and removal of posters in the run-up to the demonstration in Anklam on 31 July 2010 [and the damage to property and threatening of the director of a socio-cultural meeting place in Güstrow]. [960-961]

Nor can any involvement by the respondent be established in the spraying […] in Demmin on 19 August 2010 and in Ueckermünde on 20 August 2010 of so-called "Stolpersteine" [translator's note: "stumbling blocks" - small, square plaques set into pavements] which had been placed to commemorate Jewish fellow citizens. The posters simultaneously pasted up in Ueckermünde suggest rather that this was an act carried out by an extreme right-wing movement […]. [962]

Similarly, the riots in Leipzig-Connewitz on 11 January 2016 cannot be attributed to the respondent. [963]

(bb) The riots in Dresden on 24 July 2015 and Heidenau on 21 August 2015 following demonstrations by the respondent cannot be attributed to the respondent. [964]

(α) The demonstration […] organised in Dresden […] was notified to the authorities by a member of the respondent and advertised as an event of the party. […] Violent clashes took place following this demonstration […]. [965]

[…] There is, however, nothing to show that the respondent incited these clashes or contributed to them in any other way. […] [966]

(β) The same applies to the riot which took place following the respondent's protest rally in Heidenau on 21 August 2015 […]. [967]

(cc) Attacks on constituency offices of other political parties in MecklenburgWestern Pomerania cannot be attributed to the respondent, either. Since the perpetrators of these attacks have not been identified, members or adherents of the respondent cannot be accused of being involved in carrying out these attacks. Nor can it be established that the respondent supported these attacks or took credit for them. [968]

[...] [969]

(c) Therefore, what remains is merely a small number of acts of violence involving members and adherents of the respondent (aa), which are not, however, sufficient to prove that it has a fundamental tendency to assert its anti-constitutional intentions by violent means or by committing criminal offences (bb). [970]

(aa) (α) These include the assault by JN functionaries on a rally by the German Association of Trade Unions (Deutsche Gewerkschaftsbund - DGB) in Weimar on 1 May 2015. […] [971]

[...] [972]

(β) Moreover, a total of twelve convictions have been handed down to members and adherents of the respondent for policy-related violent offences. […] [973]

(χ) The applicant also refers to […] two assaults on counter-demonstrators at events held by the respondent in Lingen and Aschaffenburg in 2013. In the oral hearing, the third-party expert Röpke also reported on further acts of violence by security staff. […] [974]

[...] [975]

(bb) […] Including the events described by the applicant and the third-party witness Röpke, this involves a total of 20 independent offences over a period of more than ten years. The vast majority of these cases does not involve the planned and deliberate use of force to assert political aims, but rather incidental scuffles at the margin of or leading up to political events […] A fundamental tendency of the respondent to assert its political aims by violent means or by committing criminal offences cannot (yet) be inferred from the individual cases which have been described. [976]

cc) Nor can it be established that the respondent's actions lead to an atmosphere of fear that is likely to undermine the right to free and equal participation in the formation of the political will. […] [977]

(1) (a) The list submitted by the applicant with freely-given information on threat experiences (Liste mit freien Angaben zu Bedrohungserfahrungen) drawn up by the psychologist Anette Hiemisch cannot be referred to as evidence establishing the creation of an atmosphere of fear by the respondent. […] This list […] does not show which organisations are the source of the threats in question, nor are dates, places or involved persons specified in detail. […] [978]

(b) The Senate cannot concur with the applicant's opinion that threats and intimidations by members of comradeships and other neo-Nazi groups can generally be attributed to the respondent. […] Comradeships and other neo-Nazi groups act autonomously and do not represent themselves as an "extended arm" of the respondent. […] [979]

(c) [...] [980]

(d) Nor can the events following a demonstration organised in October 2013 by the citizens' initiative Schneeberg wehrt sich (Schneeberg defends itself) be attributed to the respondent. […] After this demonstration, 30 to 50 attendees at the event carrying lit torches drew up outside the mayor's private house. […] There is no indication that the respondent instigated these events or supported them in any other way. […] [981]

(e) [...] [982]

(2) [...]

(a) Mere participation by the respondent in the battle of political opinions must […] remain outside the scope of consideration. As long as it does not exceed the boundaries of what is permissible in democratic discourse, this does not result in any limiting of third parties in the exercise of their democratic rights, regardless of any other motives the respondent may have and the subjective feelings of individuals concerned. [984]

(aa) [...] [985-986]

(bb) With regard to the resignation of the mayor of Tröglitz, it appears doubtful whether the boundaries of the permissible battle of political opinions [...] were exceeded. [...] [987]

Even though the mayor of Tröglitz may have subjectively felt the planned march of the demonstration announced by the NPD district council member T. past his house to be a threat to himself and his family, merely marching as announced along an approved route [...] does not yet in itself constitute an interference with the process of free and equal participation in the formation of the political will. [988]

(cc) [T]he protests against the use of the Spreehotel in Bautzen do not yet exceed the permissible boundaries of the battle of political opinions. [...] [989]

(dd) The same applies to the protest and call for a demonstration against the mosque in Leipzig-Gohlis with the motto Maria statt Scharia! (Mary, not sharia!) [...]". [990]

(b) It may be the case that other activities by the respondent have exceeded the permissible boundaries of the battle of political opinions […]. Nevertheless, it cannot be inferred from individual cases that they are objectively likely to bring about an […] atmosphere of fear which stands in the way of the exercise of democratic rights. [991]

[This is the case with regard to individual election campaign activities by the respondent and visits to refugee homes and the rally directed by the respondent's Berlin-Pankow district association against the Pankow borough mayor K. and the occurrences between 2007 and 2009 in Schöneiche near Berlin described by the applicant.] [992-1000]

(d) Finally, the respondent's activities with regard to forming militias and undertaking patrols are not objectively sufficient to amount to a creation of an atmosphere of fear, since, as far as is evident, lawful limits have not been exceeded and there has been no impermissible interference with the rights of third parties. [...] [1001]

(3) Moreover, to the extent that individual situations remain in which a potential threat exists or at least cannot be ruled out which may undermine the freedom of formation of the political will (a), this is not sufficient to infer that the respondent has a fundamental tendency to pursue its political aims by creating an atmosphere of fear (b). [1002]

(b) [...] Like crimes which have been committed, the action of individual members of the respondent against the director of the multi-cultural meeting centre in Güstrow and against the mayor of Lalendorf are individual occurrences which cannot in a generalised way be laid at the door of the respondent. The same also holds for the references to the conduct of the respondent's security staff. The factual situations which have been described are not yet enough to justify the ordering of the prohibition of the party. [...] [1007]

dd) The Senate is not overlooking the fact that affected persons may feel that their constitutionally-guaranteed freedom of expression and action are seriously and sustainably undermined by behaviour of members or adherents of the respondent which is intimidating and deliberately provocative or crosses the boundary to criminality. The evidence presented in the oral hearing does not, however, show that the extent, intensity and density of such occurrences reaches the threshold for the prohibition of a political party determined by Art. 21(2) GG [...], which is high for the reasons set out above (cf. para. 523 et seq.). Intimidation and threats, as well as the building-up of potentials for violence, must be countered thoroughly and in due time with the means of preventive police law and repressive criminal law in order to effectively protect the freedom of formation of the political will as well as individuals affected by the respondent's behaviour. [1008]

XI. Privacy of Communications - Article 10 of the Basic Law

1. Eavesdropping, BVerfGE 30, 1

Explanatory Annotation

Article 10.1 of the Basic Law protects the privacy of postal or telecommunication (telephone, email etc.) from interference by the state, i.e. by the state security organizations. This covers measures such as intercepting letters and packages and wiretapping telephone lines insofar as entering the home or office of the victim is not necessary.[143]

As there are few rights without exceptions, Article 10.2 of the Basic Law provides a framework for justified infringements of the right guaranteed in Article 10.1. Any such restriction must be based on a law that spells out the conditions for such infringements in a transparent way and that can be qualified as a proportional limitation of this core privacy right.

This decision of the Constitutional Court, however, deals with the possible restriction spelled out in the second sentence of Article 10.2 of the Basic Law. This provision was added to Article 10.2 in 1968 and subsequently complemented by the passage of a statute regulating the details. The new Article 10.2 made it possible under limited circumstances that the targeted person would not be informed of the measures breaching his or her privacy, not even subsequently, and that no legal remedy to the courts would be available against such measures, again not even subsequently. Instead, there will be a Committee of five members of Parliament, which will be informed every six months on all ongoing measures and which will exercise legal supervision. This constitutional amendment was challenged under Article 79.3 under which amendments of the Basic Law passed in the constitutional amendment process must not violate the principles protected in Articles 1 and 20 of the Basic Law. At issue were especially the human dignity guarantee of Article 1, the right to a legal remedy protected in Article 19.4 and the separation of powers as one constitutive element of Article 20.2 and 20.3 of the Basic Law. Human dignity could be affected if one came to the conclusion that such secretive measures of which the victim is never informed reduce the victim to a mere object of government action. The fact that no recourse to the courts was possible could point in that same direction and the fact that the application of the measures was supervised by a legislative rather than a judicial committee gave rise to the separation of powers issue.

The applicants could not persuade the Court. Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, while restricting possible amendments, does not prohibit such amendments even if they touch on the principles protected. Only the removal of the core of the protected principles could justify a limitation of the constitutional amendment power of Parliament. Here the access to a Court was removed only in a very limited field of application and in addition compensated by a different form of legislative supervision. The same holds true for the separation of powers especially in the light of the fact that the Basic Law and its order of parliamentary order does not follow an absolute approach on the separation of powers in the first place. Finally the Court pointed out that some of the restrictions are inherent: If the collection of information for certain purposes is regarded as possible if only in limited circumstances, informing the addressee of these measures would be senseless and legal protection is indeed impossible.

However, there is one gap: If the information collected leads to criminal proceedings, the victim will know about this by way of the subsequent proceedings. If nothing follows from the collection of the information the victim could at least be informed after the measure has been terminated, if there are no reasons to assume that the effectivity of the measure will be in jeopardy in the case at issue or in similar circumstances. The victim could then seek judicial protection at least after the fact and this could not only be valuable to the affected person but also for future measures undertaken. The Constitutional Court pointed out exactly that and based that finding on the principle of proportionality. This gap in the legislation did not necessitate a finding of unconstitutionality because it can be achieved by interpretation as subsequent information of the affected persons is not precluded.

The Court also pointed out that the Basic Law, whereas providing the framework for a democratic and free society, has consciously opted to also defend this freedom and if necessary to do so by restricting the liberty of those who seek to undermine and abolish the Basic Law's framework for freedom. Provocatively and certainly with a degree of exaggeration one can say that the Basic Law guarantees no - better: a little less - freedom for the enemies of freedom or, to formulate it differently, that the Basic Law does not allow the rights and liberty protected by it to be used to overthrow the democratic and free order.

Headnotes:

1. If a person affected is prevented from contesting an enforcement measure because that person has received no knowledge of an encroachment upon his or her rights, that person must be afforded the possibility of lodging a constitutional complaint directly against the law in the same manner as in those cases in which a constitutional complaint against an enforcement measure is for other reasons not possible.

2. As regards the principle of proportionality, Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) must be construed to require subsequent notification of the subject of surveillance in those cases in which a threat to the purpose of the surveillance measure and a threat to the protection of the free democratic fundamental order or the existence or security of the Federation or a Land can be excluded.

* Translation by Donna Elliott; © Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung.

3. In respect of the principle of proportionality, Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law requires that the Act on Article 10 of the Basic Law (Gesetz zu Art. 10 GG - G 10) must limit the admissibility of restriction of the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications to cases in which concrete circumstances justify suspicion of anti-constitutional conduct and it is possible to cope with such anti-constitutional conduct in the concrete instance only through encroachment upon the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications, after all other investigatory possibilities have been exhausted.

   The constitutional requirement to the effect that surveillance activities must be restricted to that which is unavoidably necessary does not preclude surveillance of channels of communication of third parties that can be assumed to serve the purposes of the suspect.

4. Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law requires that the Act on Article 10 of the Basic Law make provision for review that is as regards its substance and procedure the equivalent of review by the courts even if the person affected has no opportunity to participate in such "substitute" proceedings.

5. Article 79.3 of the Basic Law prohibits general abandonment of the principles contained therein, but does not, however, preclude modification of basic constitutional principles through constitutional amendments.

6. The treatment of a person by the public authority that enforces the law must if it is to be considered to violate human dignity constitute a manifestation of disdain for the esteem to which that person is entitled as a human being.

7. The principle of the separation of powers allows, under exceptional circumstances for legal protection against acts of the executive not through the courts, but rather through independent institutions appointed or formed by the legislature within the functional area of the executive.

8. A majority of the legislature can also abuse its rights. A faction or coalition that appoints only persons of its own persuasion as members of the body provided for under s. 9.1 of the Act on Article 10 of the Basic Law and would endeavour to achieve membership by only such persons of the commission provided for under s. 9.3 of the Act on Article 10 of the Basic Law would in case of doubt be acting abusively.

Judgment of the Second Senate of 15 December 1970 on the basis of the oral hearing of 7 July 1970 - 2 BvL 1/69, 2 BvR 629/68 and BvR 308/69 -

Facts:

The currently valid versions of Article 10 and Article 19.4 sentence 3 of the Basic Law, which stipulate in particular that the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications may also be restricted without notification of the person affected and without the possibility of recourse to the courts, stem from the Seventeenth Act to Amend the Basic Law (Siebzehntes Gesetz zur Ergänzung des Grundgesetzes) of 24 June 1968 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 709). At the same time, the Act on the Restriction of the Secrecy of Correspondence, Posts and Telecommunications (Gesetz zur Beschränkung des Brief-, Post- and Fernmeldegeheimnisses) (referred to as the "G 10 Act") of 13 August 1968 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 949), which also introduced provisions governing the surveillance of telecommunication traffic in connection with criminal proceedings, regulated the possibilities for such encroachment and the procedure to be followed.

The government of the Land of Hesse initiated abstract judicial review proceedings against Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law and against s. 9.5 of the G 10 Act, which excluded the possibility of recourse to the courts against restrictive measures ordered under the G 10 Act except in the form of oversight by a parliamentary control commission. A group of public prosecutors and lawyers also filed a constitutional complaint against the amendment of the Basic Law and against various provisions of the G 10 Act.

The Federal Constitutional Court then ruled by a vote of five to three that the challenged provisions were, with the exception of the exclusion of notification in individual cases involving no danger to the purpose of the restriction pursuant to s. 5.5 of the G 10 Act, in compliance with the Basic Law in the interpretation provided in the decision.

C. I.

A decision as to the compatibility of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, which was inserted by the constitutional amendment, with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law requires the interpretation of both provisions.

1. Interpretation of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law yields the following:

   a) The privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications was from the very outset not unconditionally protected by the Basic Law; indeed, restrictions - which in each case required a legal basis - were always permissible. This very general reservation of the possibility of restriction of the fundamental right was to be sure subject to limits as regards the prerequisite for and scope of restriction; it did, however, as regards the scope of application, from the very beginning also include the possibility of legislation that makes provision for restriction of the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications for the purposes of protection against endangerment of the free constitutional order or the existence of the state. In that regard, the new sentence 2 inserted into Article 10.2 of the Basic Law is nothing new; it merely provides a concrete case for application of sentence 1, in that it circumscribes the measures involved in connection with the restriction of privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications that may be rendered permissible by law, for the purposes of protecting the free democratic fundamental order or the existence or security of the Federation or a Land.

      Whenever the Basic Law makes provision for restriction of fundamental rights, it is consistently done to provide effective protection for another - individual or collective - legal interest that takes precedence either in general or in a concrete case. Viewed under this aspect, the provision contained in sentence 2 loc. cit. is consistent with the intent of the reservation. The existence of the Federal Republic of Germany and its free constitutional order represent a superior legal interest; fundamental rights may be restricted to the extent absolutely necessary for the purposes of providing effective protection of that interest.

What is new about the provision inserted through constitutional amendment is therefore not actually the "restriction" of the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications - such restriction being considered to include "surveillance" of correspondence, post and telegraph traffic, "eavesdropping" on communication and the opening and reading of letters - but rather the additional authority to not inform the persons affected of such restrictions and the substitution of review by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the legislature for recourse to the courts. The relationship between these special measures and the above-mentioned restrictions (eavesdropping and inspection of letters) is clear. Undertakings, plans and measures directed against the constitutional order and against the security and existence of the state are for the most part carried out by groups that conceal and carry out their work in secret and are well organized and especially reliant upon channels of communication that function without being disturbed. The authorities responsible for the protection of the constitution can carry out their work against such an "apparatus" effectively only if their surveillance activities remain secret in principle and are therefore also not divulged in the context of judicial proceedings. Even subsequent disclosure of a surveillance measure and subsequent discussion thereof in the context of judicial proceedings can give enemies of the constitution information on the methods and concrete field of observation of the authorities responsible for the protection of the Basic Law and the identity of previously unknown agents of the authorities, thereby compromising to a significant extent the effectiveness of the latter. The power not to inform a person affected of eavesdropping measures and to assign review of such measures to an authority that is not a court therefore contributes to the effectiveness of the authorities responsible for the protection of the Basic Law, and is actually what makes eavesdropping and the opening of letters purposeful in the first place. Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law therefore also allows restriction of the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications for the purposes of protection of the constitution and the state through covert interception and monitoring of telephone communication and radio transmissions, facsimiles, telegrams and letters without disclosure and judicial review afterwards.

b) A provision of the Basic Law may not be interpreted exclusively on the basis of its wording. Indeed, all interpretations of the provisions of the Basic Law must be compatible with the fundamental principles of the Basic Law and its system of values (BVerfGE 19, 206 [220]). In the case of the interpretation of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, it is therefore necessary to take into account the context of the Basic Law and in particular fundamental decisions embodied in the Basic Law and general constitutional principles. In the present context, the fact that the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany embodies advocacy of "militant democracy" is of special importance. It does not accept the abusive use of fundamental rights to combat the free order (BVerfGE 28, 36 [48]). Enemies of the constitution may not be allowed to invoke liberty guaranteed by the Basic Law and under the protection of this liberty endanger, impair or destroy the constitutional order or the existence of the state (see Article 9.2, Article 18 and Article 21 of the Basic Law). The Basic Law explicitly makes provision for a separate institution for the purposes of protection of the constitution, i.e., the Office for the Protection of the Constitution (Verfassungsschutzamt) (see Article 73 no. 10 and Article 87.1 of the Basic Law). It cannot be the intent of the Basic Law to invest the supreme bodies of the state under the Basic Law with a duty and make provision for a separate office for such purpose on the one hand, but to deprive these constitutionally ordained bodies and the Office of the means required to fulfil their constitutional mandate.

Of no less importance is the fundamental decision embodied in the Basic Law as regards the limits imposed upon the fundamental rights due to considerations of public interest and for the purposes of protection of precedential legal interests (see, for example, Article 2.1 of the Basic Law). "The image of man under the Basic Law is not that of an isolated, independent individual; rather, the Basic Law embodies in negotiating the tension between the individual and the community a decision in favour of civic participation and civic responsibility of individuals without infringement upon the inherent value of the individual. This follows in particular from Articles 1, 2, 12, 14, 15, 19 and 20 of the Basic Law taken in their entirety. That means, however, that individuals must accept those restrictions upon their freedom of action that the legislature imposes in order to maintain and foster social coexistence within the limits of what may generally be considered reasonable in any given situation, provided that the independence of the individual is at the same time preserved" (BVerfGE 4, 7 [15-16]).

Finally, the Federal Constitutional Court has derived the principle of proportionality from a third fundamental decision embodied in the Basic Law, i.e., the principle of the rule of law, whereby the principle of proportionality requires in the case of restriction of issues involving fundamental rights that, only that which is absolutely necessary for the protection of a legal interest recognized by the Basic Law, in this instance the existence of the state and its constitutional order, may be provided by law and ordered in the individual case (see BVerfGE 7, 377 [397 et seq.]). It also follows from the principle of the rule of law that any governmental encroachment upon the freedom or property of citizens must be subject at least to effective judicial review.

This context, which includes Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, first of all provides confirmation of the interpretation that is obtained from the wording of the provision itself under (a). In particular, it follows that non-notification of the persons affected and substitution of another form of control for judicial protection are justified not only by the "nature of the matter" - precisely because the purpose of restriction of the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications would not be achievable without these measures - but also enjoy constitutional legitimacy due to the fundamental decision in favour of militant democracy embodied in the Basic Law.

As regards the constitutional principle of proportionality, note must also be taken of the following: under Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the law "may provide that the person affected shall not be informed of the restriction and that recourse to the courts shall be replaced by a review of the case by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the legislature." As regards the principle of proportionality, the constitutional provision can only be construed to permit and require subsequent notification of persons subjected to surveillance in cases in which a threat to the purpose of the surveillance measure and endangerment of the protection of the free democratic fundamental order or the existence or security of the Federation or a Land can be excluded. The provision otherwise also leaves room for retention of normal recourse to the courts or institution of special judicial proceedings, instead of review by agencies appointed by the legislature, in the event this should be possible, without compromising protection of the free democratic fundamental order or the existence or security of the Federation or a Land.

Apart from this, the formulation "If the restriction serves to protect the free democratic fundamental order or the existence or security of the Federation or of a Land" allows the interpretation required under the principle of proportionality to the effect that infringement of the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications must be limited to cases in which concrete circumstances justify suspicion of anti-constitutional conduct and it is possible to cope with such anti-constitutional conduct in the concrete instance only through encroachment upon the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications after all other investigatory possibilities have been exhausted. This also limits the number of cases in which the persons affected are not informed.

It follows further from the constitutionally required limitation of surveillance measures to what is unavoidably necessary, that only such persons may be the subject of surveillance activities under Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, who have become subject to concrete suspicion of the above nature, such surveillance of course being not prohibited if in the course of surveillance due to the nature of posts and telephony as means of communication persons with whom a suspect maintains contact also necessarily become subjects of such surveillance. The constitutional requirement to the effect that surveillance activities be limited to that which is unavoidably necessary also does not exclude the possibility of surveillance of channels of communication of third parties that can be assumed to be used for the purposes of the suspect. In view of the above constitutional requirement, Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also authorizes surveillance for the sole purpose of acquiring knowledge of anti-constitutional activities. Finally, the interpretation of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law that follows from that constitutional requirement also prohibits making knowledge gained through surveillance available to other (administrative) authorities for their purposes and requires that materials collected, that are not or no longer of importance for the purposes of protection of the free democratic order, be promptly destroyed.

Finally, as regards "exclusion of recourse to the courts," the fact that "recourse to the courts shall be replaced" by review by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the legislature assumes special importance in view of the constitutional principle of the rule of law. This means that the law must in the context of implementation of this provision provide for review that is as regards its substance and procedure, the equivalent of review by the courts and in particular at least as effective even if the persons affected are given no opportunity to participate in such "substitute" proceedings. Under this interpretation, Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law requires that legislation enacted for the purposes of its implementation make provision for and include among the agencies and auxiliary agencies to be appointed by the legislature, an agency that makes decisions independently of the judiciary, that are binding upon all parties involved in preparations for administrative decisions relating to and the execution of surveillance activities as regards the permissibility of surveillance activities and the question as to whether the persons affected are to be informed thereof and prohibits such surveillance activities if the legal prerequisites are not in place. This agency may be constituted within or without the legislature. It must, however, have at its disposal the requisite technical and legal expertise; it may not be bound by instructions; and its members must be appointed for a specific fixed term. It must have the power to oversee all agencies involved in preparations for, decisions relating to and the oversight of encroachment upon the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications and all measures taken by such agencies. This control function must be exercised on an ongoing basis. All records that are relevant to the decision in the specific case must be made available to the controlling agency for this purpose. This control must constitute a judicial control. Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law does, however, allow for provisions that also enable the controlling agency to require waiver or suspension of surveillance for reasons of expediency, i.e., to further reduce the number of instances of surveillance, in cases in which the legal prerequisites for surveillance are in place.

2. Interpretation of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law yields the following:

   a) The purpose of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, which constitutes a bar to the amendment of the Basic Law by the legislature, is to make it impossible to do away with the substance and principles of the existing constitutional order through the formally legal means of a constitutional amendment and abusively use that order for purposes of subsequent legalization of a totalitarian regime. The provision therefore prohibits general abandonment of the principles enumerated therein. Principles are to begin with not "affected" as "principles" if they are taken into account in general and are modified for obviously objective reasons only for a special situation due to its unique nature. The formulation to the effect that modification of these principles is "inadmissible" has therefore no stricter meaning than the related formulation in Article 19.2 of the Basic Law, according to which "the essence of a fundamental right" may in no case be affected.

   b) The fact that, apart from the principle of the division of the Federation into Länder and the participation in principle of the Länder in the legislative process, Article 79.3 of the Basic Law describes "the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20" as inviolate is also of importance in respect of its interpretation. This is different from a formulation

- and means to some extent more, to some extent less - to the effect that Article 79.3 of the Basic Law precludes amendment of the constitutional principle of respect for human dignity and the principle of the rule of law. More principles are "laid down" in Article 1 of the Basic Law than only the principle of respect for human dignity. Several principles are also laid down in Article 20 of the Basic Law; the "principle of the rule of law" is not, however, laid down therein, but rather only very specific principles underlying the principle of the rule of law: the principle of the separation of powers in paragraph 2 and the principle to the effect that the legislature is bound by the constitutional order and the executive and the judiciary by law and justice in paragraph 3. More can be inferred from the principle of the rule of law than the legal principles of Article 20 of the Basic Law referred to in Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, and the Federal Constitutional Court has developed such legal principles (e.g., prohibition of ex post facto laws, the principle of proportionality, resolution of the tension between legal certainty and justice in individual cases, the principle of the most complete legal protection possible). The conditional restriction of the power of the legislature to adopt constitutional amendments inherent in the formulation of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law must be taken all the more seriously for the purposes of interpretation since this is a provision governing exceptions that may in no case also prevent the legislature from modification of basic constitutional principles through constitutional amendment. Under this view, the principle derived from the principle of the rule of law to the effect that citizens must be afforded the greatest possible judicial protection does not figure among the "principles laid down" in Article 20 of the Basic Law; there is no mention of it in Article 20 of the Basic Law. Article 19.4 of the Basic Law, which contains a guarantee of recourse to the courts to this end, is therefore not immune from restriction and modification through constitutional amendment by virtue of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law.

c) As regards the inviolability of human dignity mentioned in Article 1 of the Basic Law, which according to Article 79.3 of the Basic Law is immune to amendment, everything depends upon the circumstances under which human dignity can be violated. This can obviously not be formulated in general terms, but rather always only in view of a concrete case. General formulations such as that to the effect that human beings may not be degraded to mere objects of state power can only suggest the area in which instances of violation of human dignity may be found. Human beings are not infrequently, mere objects not only of circumstances and social developments, but also of the law insofar as they must submit to the law without regard to their interests. It is not possible to find a violation of human dignity in this alone. They must in addition be subjected to treatment that calls into question in principle their quality as subjects or that constitutes in the specific case arbitrary disregard for human dignity. The treatment of a person by the public powers that enforce the law must if it is to be considered to be in violation of human dignity constitute a manifestation of disdain for the esteem to which that person is entitled as a human being, i.e., it must constitute "disdainful treatment."

II.

The interpretation of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law under I.1 is compatible with the interpretation of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law under I.2.

1. The omission of notification to the extent allowed by Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law under the interpretation provided above is not incompatible with the principle of respect for human dignity, which under Article 79.3 of the Basic Law is also immune to amendment. For, since it makes reference to Article 1.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, Article 79.3 of the Basic Law does not in any case as regards its substantive content provide any more protection than Article 1.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law itself. It is, however, indisputable that not every provision of law and order that without their consent restricts the freedom of citizens, charges citizens with duties or subjects citizens to measures that are unknown to them and remain unknown to them constitutes a violation of Article 1.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. This starts, for example, with the legal duty of physicians and certain authorities to report specific occurrences or with police investigations of certain individuals that ultimately prove to be inconclusive or unwarranted or with interception of private radio traffic. In the present context, the omission of notification is not a manifestation of disdain for an individual human being or that person's dignity, but a burden imposed upon citizens that they are required to bear for the sake of protection of the existence of their state and the free democratic order. The notion that such omission of notification could in practice lead to abusive eavesdropping practices, which would be incompatible with Article 1.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, does not constitute the basis for a legal argument in support of the incompatibility of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. The possibility of illegal and unconstitutional abuse does not suffice to make the provision unconstitutional; to the contrary, when interpreting and assessing a provision of law, it must be assumed in a free democracy governed by the rule of law, that it will be applied properly and fairly.

2. The substitution of another form of legal control for recourse to the courts, also does not constitute a violation of human dignity in the present case. Respect for the quality of human beings as subjects does, to be sure normally require that they not only hold rights as subjects, but that they may also initiate proceedings to defend and assert their rights and present their case to the courts and in this sense therefore enjoy the protection of the courts. There have always been exceptions to this rule that do not offend human dignity. In any case, human dignity is not violated if the exclusion of judicial protection is motivated not by disregard or disrespect for an individual human being, but by the necessity of maintaining secret measures intended to protect the democratic order and the existence of the state. On the other hand, exposure of an individual to arbitrariness on the part of the authorities due to the exclusion of recourse to the courts would constitute a violation of human dignity. Precisely this is, however, excluded since it has been shown, Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law requires legal control that is to be sure different, but equivalent, and also serves to protect the rights of the person affected.

3. The substitution of a different form of legal control for recourse to the courts as provided by Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also does not violate the principle of separation of powers, which is declared inviolate under Article 79.3 of the Basic Law and which Article 20.2 of the Basic Law guarantees by stating that the authority of the state will be exercised "through specific legislative, executive and judicial bodies." For this principle does not require strict separation of powers, but permits under exceptional circumstances legislation by bodies of the government and administration or government and administration by legislative bodies. The principle of the separation of powers allows under exceptional circumstances for legal protection against measures of the executive not through the courts, but instead through independent institutions appointed or formed by the legislature within the functional purview of the executive. What is of the essence in this case is that the reason for the separation of powers is fulfilled, namely, reciprocal limitation and control of the powers of the state. The substitution of an independent institution under the executive for judicial control may not be simply undertaken discretionarily and arbitrarily, but only in cases in which a compelling, objectively obvious reason so requires and such that the core purview reserved to the judiciary is not infringed.

4. Finally, replacement of recourse to the courts by another form of independent legal control as is provided by Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law and restricted omission of notification as allowed by Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law do not conflict with the principle of the rule of law as referred to in Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. Only the principle mentioned in Article 20.3 of the Basic Law comes into consideration in this context: Executive power is bound by law and justice. This of course applies with the same force to authorities charged with protection of the constitution; the fact that persons affected receive no knowledge of surveillance measures and cannot seek recourse to the courts to verify the legality of the surveillance measures does not in any way change this. A provision of law that has for effect that a party affected need not under specific conditions be informed of surveillance measures and that recourse to the courts is replaced by review by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the legislature cannot therefore infringe the principle of the rule of law, according to which all administrative authorities are bound to law and justice.

5. Finally, apart from the considerations under nos. 1 to 4, the compatibility of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law follows from the general aspect that Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law concerns modification of general constitutional principles, which as was shown above is inadmissible under Article 79.3 of the Basic Law.

D.

1. The Act on Article 10 of the Basic Law governs subject matter that falls under the legislative authority of the Federation. The legislative authority of the Federation to enact Article 2 of the G 10 Act, which governs the admissibility of measures to restrict the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications in criminal proceedings through a change in the Criminal Procedure Code (Strafprozessordnung), is based on Article 74 no. 1 of the Basic Law.

The authority of the Federation to enact the provisions governing the restrictive measures in the area of non-criminal proceedings included in Article 1 of the G 10 Act derives from Article 73 nos. 1, 7 and 10 and Article 74 no. 1 of the Basic Law.

Article 1.2 of the G 10 Act serves to defend against anti-constitutional undertakings prior to criminal investigation. Admissible restrictive measures are limited to cases in which actual evidence exists to suspect that certain criminal acts have been planned, are being committed or have been committed. The restrictive measures under Article 1.2 of the G 10 Act therefore serve (at least indirectly) to prevent, investigate and prosecute criminal acts. The legislative authority of the Federation therefore derives in this regard directly from Article 74 no. 1 of the Basic Law.

3. As regards the individual provisions of the Act on Article 10 of the Basic Law that are challenged in the present proceedings, the following applies: ...

b) As was also set forth under C.I.1, the principle of the rule of law and therefore Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law in the mandated interpretation require that restrictive measures be made known as soon as the interests involved no longer justify secrecy. Since s. 5.5 of the G 10 Act excludes notification of the parties affected of restrictive measures in all cases, it is to some extent not covered by the interpretation of Article 10.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law mandated by constitutional law that is presented above and in that respect incompatible with the Basic Law. This provision therefore had to be declared void since notification of the parties affected of restrictive measures is also excluded even if possible without compromising the purpose of the restriction.

c) Article 1 s. 2.2 sentence 2 of the G 10 Act and the last sentence of s. 100a of the Criminal Procedure Code in the version contained in Article 2 of the G 10 Act, according to which restrictive measures may also be taken against persons who can on the basis of certain facts be assumed to receive or transmit messages for, or from suspects or accused parties or whose connections can be assumed to be used by suspects or accused parties, are compatible with the Basic Law.

The provisions to be reviewed do not affect the right to occupational freedom. They basically do not even contain a provision at the level of the practice of a profession. Both provisions are not directed against the complainant explicitly in his capacity as a lawyer. They affect him, if at all, the same way they affect any other citizen. It is true, however, that activity as defense counsel is especially likely to bring a lawyer into close contact with suspects within the meaning of Article1 s. 2 of the G 10 Act or defendants within the meaning of s. 100a of the Criminal Procedure Code. If therefore a lawyer, as the complainant under (3) claims applies in his case, is involved almost exclusively as defense counsel in matters involving the security of the state and in proceedings involving capital crimes, the possibility cannot be excluded that the provisions under challenge will affect the exercise of his profession. This does not, however, make these provisions unconstitutional.

The freedom to exercise a profession may be restricted by law within the meaning of Article 12.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law if reasonable considerations having to do with the public interest would seem to warrant it. In this case, the protection of the fundamental right is limited to a defense against obligations that are unconstitutional because they represent an excessive burden and are unreasonable (BVerfGE 7, 377 [405 and headnote 6a]); established case law since then. Reasonable grounds of public interest speak in favour of the provisions under challenge: the restrictive measures the legislature considers necessary in the area of the surveillance of correspondence, posts and telecommunications cannot be effective and are susceptible to circumvention if surveillance cannot be extended to cover facilities of certain contact persons of suspects or defendants. This lies in the nature of the means of communication to be monitored. The particular nature of the purpose of the restrictive measures does not allow distinctions to be made between individual groups of possible contact persons. Under these circumstances, the extension of surveillance measures to the facilities of specific contact persons and possibly also lawyers' offices is not so unreasonable and burdensome for the party affected that they must not be accepted in view of the compelling necessity thereof.

Explanatory Annotation

This decision dealt with a specific aspect of state interference with private communication: The intelligence gathering of the German Intelligence Agency. The special statute governing interference with private communication required under Article 10 of the Basic Law had been amended to give a broader role to the Agency in what is referred to as "strategic surveillance". The Agency had been given the power to engage in strategic surveillance only to gather information about a military armed attack on the territory of Germany. The object was not to gain information about persons but only information about relevant activities. In essence the Agency would record international telecommunication in bulk fashion and run computerized searches for certain nonpersonal markers. The amended statute expanded the role of the Agency to international terrorism, drug trafficking into Germany, military arms trafficking and money laundering and counterfeiting activities. Also broadened was the scope of passing on relevant information to the criminal prosecution authorities for gathering personal information. The Court did not mind the recording of international (not national) telecommunication and only exempted the counterfeiting from the scope of this activity because the Court qualified this activity not as sufficiently dangerous to warrant such significant interference with the right guaranteed in Article 10 of the Basic Law. The Court also took issue with some deficiencies of the statute pertaining to the nexus between the reason for gathering the intelligence and the use of that part of the data that is not immediately destroyed. The Court demanded that the statute be amended to clearly address this issue. In addition the Court demanded that insofar as the Agency reports to the Federal Government, the statute will have to clearly limit what the government can in turn do and what the government cannot do with this information to make sure that the information remains closely linked to the purpose of the intelligence gathering, which is not the prosecution of crimes. Insofar as the information is passed on directly to other agencies, e.g. for criminal prosecution, the Court held that the statute must limit the types of crimes to very serious ones in order to limit the effect of the intelligence gathering and remain within the bounds of the proportionality principle.

The decision reinforces the Court's approach that the gathering of information and the use of the data collected are two separate issues and the legality of data gathering does not imply the legality of the use of this data, even if the information pertains to criminal activity. The decision also emphasizes the principle of strict separation between police and criminal prosecution on the one hand and intelligence agencies on the other. Information gathered by intelligence agencies cannot simply be turned over and used by the police and for criminal prosecution purposes.

Headnotes:

1. Article 10 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) not only provides protection from the state taking note of telecommunications contacts. Its protection also extends to the procedures by which information and data are processed following permissible acts of taking note of telecommunications contacts, and it extends to the use that is made of the obtained knowledge.

2. The territorial scope of protection of telecommunications privacy is not restricted to the domestic territory. Rather, Article 10 of the Basic Law is also applicable if an act of telecommunication that takes place abroad is, due to the fact that it is screened and evaluated on the domestic territory, sufficiently linked with domestic action of the state.

3. Article 73 no. 1 of the Basic Law grants the Federal government the competence to regulate the screening, utilisation and transfer of telecommunications data by the Bundesnachrichtendienst (Federal Intelligence Service). On the other hand, Article 73 no. 1 of the Basic Law does not entitle the Federal parliament to grant the Federal Intelligence Service powers that are aimed at the prevention or prosecution of criminal offences as such.

4. Whereas the Parliament empowers the Federal Intelligence Service to conduct telecommunications, monitoring that encroaches upon telecommunications privacy. Article 10 of the Basic Law obliges the Federal Intelligence Service to take precautionary measures against the dangers which result from the collection and utilisation of personal data. These precautionary measures include, in particular, that the use of obtained knowledge be bound to the objective that justified the collection of the data in the first place.

5. The competence of the Federal Intelligence Service under s. 1 and s. 3 of the G 10 Act to monitor, record and evaluate the telecommunications traffic for the timely recognition of specified serious threats to the Federal Republic of Germany from abroad and for the information of the Federal government is, in principle, consistent with Article 10 of the Basic Law.

6. The transfer of personal data that the Federal Intelligence Service has obtained from telecommunications monitoring for its own objectives to other government authorities is consistent with Article 10 of the Basic Law; it must, however, comply with the following prerequisites: (1) the data is necessary for the receiving agency's objectives; (2) the requirements placed on changes of objective as set forth in BVerfGE (Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court) 65, 1 (44 et seq., 62) are met; and (3) the statutory thresholds for transfer comply with the principle of proportionality.

Judgment of the First Senate of 14 July 1999 - (1 BvR 2226/94, 2420/95 and 2437/95)

Facts:

A.

The constitutional complaints concern the authority of the Bundesnachrichtendienst (Federal Intelligence Service) to monitor, record and evaluate telecommunications traffic and to transfer the data thus obtained to other public agencies. The constitutional complaints also challenge other regulations of the Gesetz zur Beschränkung des Brief, Post und Fernmeldegeheimnisses (Act on the Restriction of the Secrecy of Mail, Posts and Telecommunications) as amended in 1994 by the Verbrechensbekämpfungsgesetz (1994 Fight against Crime Act).

B.

With the exception of the constitutional complaint lodged by the second of the two complainants bringing the second constitutional complaint (1 BvR 2420/95), the constitutional complaints are admissible.

C.

The challenged regulations are not fully consistent with the Basic Law.

I.

The standard applied to the review of the constitutionality of the challenged legislation is, above all, Article 10 of the Basic Law. Article 10 of the Basic Law protects interests that are distinct from the right to informational self-determination that follows from Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. As concerns telecommunications traffic, Article 10 of the Basic Law contains a special guarantee which supersedes the general protections of Article 2.1 (cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 [171]). To the extent that the possibility of taking recourse to a court against measures taken pursuant to s. 3 of the G 10 Act is concerned, Article 19.4 of the Basic Law is relevant as well. The same is true regarding the restrictions on the recourse to a court set forth in s. 9.6 of the G 10 Act. Apart from that, the constitutional complaints lodged by the first of the two complainants bringing the second constitutional complaint and both complainants bringing the third constitutional complaint are to be reviewed in accordance with the standards established in Article 5.1(2) of the Basic Law.

1. Article 10 of the Basic Law protects telecommunications privacy.

   a) Telecommunications privacy covers, first and foremost, the content of an act of communication. Public authority is, in principle, not supposed to have the possibility of obtaining knowledge about the content of the exchange of information and thoughts, whether oral or written that takes place via telecommunications equipment. In this context, Article 10 of the Basic Law draws no distinction between communication of a private nature and other communication, e.g. business or political communication

(cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 [172]). To the contrary, the protection of fundamental rights extends to all acts of communication that take place by means of telecommunications technology.

The protection of fundamental rights, however, is not restricted to shielding the content of an act of communication against the state taking note of it. The protection of fundamental rights also covers the circumstances of communication, particularly including: (1) information about whether, when and how often telecommunications traffic has taken place or has been attempted; (2) information about the individuals between whom telecommunications traffic has taken place or has been attempted; and (3) information about which subscriber lines have been used (cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 [172]; BVerfGE 85, 386 [396]). The state cannot, in principle, claim to be allowed to take note of the circumstances of acts of communication. The use of the medium of communication is supposed to remain confidential in all respects.

By withdrawing, in principle, individual acts of communication from the state's access, the fundamental right protecting telecommunications privacy intends to preserve the conditions of free telecommunication in general. The inviolability of telecommunications privacy, as a fundamental right, seeks to avoid the following: that the exchange of opinions and information by means of telecommunications equipment ceases altogether or is modified in its form and content because communication partners expect the state: (1) to interfere with their communication; or (2) to take note of the circumstances or the content of their communication.

Apart from that, the freedom of the use of telecommunications that is safeguarded by Article 10 of the Basic Law suffers if there is fear that the state utilises knowledge about the circumstances and the contents of acts of telecommunication in other contexts to the detriment of the telecommunications partners (cf., altogether, BVerfGE 65, 1 [42-43]; BVerfGE 93, 181 [188]). For these reasons, the protection provided by Article 10 of the Basic Law extends not only to the state taking note of acts of telecommunication that the telecommunications partners wish to keep to themselves, but also to the procedures by which information and data are processed that follow the state's taking note of protected acts of communication and the use of the knowledge obtained therefrom (concerning the right to informational self-determination, cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [46]).

b) Certainly, Article 10.2 of the Basic Law permits restrictions of telecommunications privacy. Such restrictions, however, require, as does every restriction of a fundamental right, a legal regulation that serves a legitimate aim in the public interest and respects the principle of proportionality. Article 10 of the Basic Law also places special requirements on the parliament that particularly refer to the processing of personal data that has been obtained through interference with telecommunications privacy. The standards the Federal Constitutional Court developed for the right to informational self determination pursuant to Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, in its "Census" decision (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [44 et seq.]), can largely be applied to the more specific guarantee in Article 10 of the Basic Law.

One of these standards is that the prerequisites for and the extent to which privacy may be restricted must be clearly recognisable by an objective person in the regulations. In particular, the objective for which telecommunications privacy may be restricted must be precisely specified, naming the area of threat to which it refers. The data collected must also be suitable and necessary for achieving the objective of the restriction on telecommunications privacy. It would be incompatible with this principle to create, for unspecified objectives or for objectives that cannot yet be specified, a stock of data, the sources of which are not anonymous. Therefore, the storage and the use of collected data is, in principle, bound to the objective specified in the law that empowers the respective agency to take note of the collected data in the first place.

Acts of communication do not lose their Article 10 privacy protection because the state has been able to learn of the existence of the telecommunications contact; the standards established pursuant to fundamental rights apply equally to the transfer of data and information that has been obtained by an infringement of telecommunications privacy. The protection applies all the more, as the transfer of data, as a general rule, does not only result in an increase of the agencies or persons who are informed about the act of communication but also leads to the fact that the data is conveyed to a different context for altogether new uses. This after-effect of the transfer of data involves additional, possibly more serious, consequences for the monitored persons than when registered only in its original context of use.

Certainly, the principle of tying an encroachment on telecommunications privacy to a specific objective does not altogether preclude the possibility that the objective for such an encroachment might change. Any changes, however, require a statutory basis consistent in form and substance with the Basic Law. This means, inter alia, that a change of the objectives that justify encroachments upon privacy must be justified by interests of the common good that rise above the interests that are protected by the Basic Law. The new intended use of the data must refer to the missions and authorities of the agency to which the data is transferred, and its wordings must respect the principle of clarity. Moreover, the objective for which the data was originally collected must not contradict the new objective being offered as the justification for the collection or use of the data (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [51, 62]).

Assurance that the rule, which requires that all encroachments upon telecommunications privacy must be bound to a specific objective, is observed, can only be had if, after the data has been screened, it can still be determined whether the data was collected by means of an encroachment upon telecommunications privacy. Therefore, constitutional law requires that the data be marked accordingly.

Moreover, Article 10 of the Basic Law stipulates that the holders of fundamental rights are entitled to be informed of telecommunications monitoring that involved them. This requirement ensures the effective protection of fundamental rights, as without such notification, the monitored persons can neither claim that the screening and monitoring of their telecommunications contacts were illegal, nor can they assert possible rights regarding deletion or correction with respect to the collected data. Such a claim is not, from the outset, restricted to the recourse to a court that follows from Article 19.4 of the Basic Law. First of all, it is rather a specific right to data protection that can be asserted vis-à-vis the state agency that processes information and data.

The Basic Law does not prescribe in detail the manner in which the monitored person is to be informed. The Constitution only requires that the people being monitored be notified in those cases where the data was collected secretly and the monitored persons were not entitled to demand that they be informed of the monitoring, or if the notification to which the monitored persons were entitled did not adequately take their rights into account (cf. BVerfGE 30, 1 [21, 31-32]). The duty to inform, however, is also subject to the reservation of Article 10.2 of the Basic Law. To the extent that the encroachment upon telecommunications privacy cannot achieve its aim if the monitored person is informed of the monitoring activity, it is not objectionable from the constitutional point of view to restrict the notification that monitoring is taking place accordingly. It may be sufficient to inform the monitored person about the encroachment after the fact (cf. BVerfGE 49, 329 [at 342-343]).

An encroachment upon telecommunications privacy can be imperceptible and the subsequent act of processing the obtained data is unfathomable for the unsuspecting subject of telecommunications monitoring; moreover, the possibility of restricting notification about an encroachment leads to gaps in legal protection. For these reasons, Article 10 of the Basic Law requires that controls be incumbent on state agencies and subsidiary agencies that are independent and not bound by instructions (cf. BVerfGE 30, 1 [23-24, 30-31]; BVerfGE 65, 1 [46]; BVerfGE 67, 157 [185]). The Constitution, however, does not prescribe how these controls are to be organised. The Parliament is free to choose the manner it regards as the most suitable, provided that it always adequately takes into consideration fundamental rights. One aspect of adequacy is that the controls cover each step of the process of telecommunications monitoring. The legitimacy of an encroachment upon telecommunications privacy, as well as the compliance with the legal regulations for the protection of telecommunications privacy, must be controlled.

Finally, as the screening and recording of telecommunications traffic and the use of the information thus obtained is bound to specific objectives, the obtained data must be destroyed as soon as it is no longer required for the specified objectives or for legal protection by recourse to a court.

c) Constitutional jurisprudence has not yet clarified how far the geographical range of the protection provided by Article 10 of the Basic Law extends. The Federal government assumes, though it remains an open question, that the constitutional protection of Article 10 only applies if there is a sufficiently close relationship to the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany. This interpretation leads to the conclusion that the Article 10 protection neither extends to foreign telecommunications traffic nor to persons living abroad. This question has not arisen in this way before because state power, as a general rule, could only be exercised on the territory of the state. Generally, the borders of the state were at the same time the borders of state power. Only the development of technology has made it possible for the state to extend its activities to the territory of other states without having to be physically present there in the shape of representative entities. In particular, the use of satellites permits, inter alia, the monitoring of acts of communication conducted outside Germany without a physical connection to that foreign territory.

The starting point of the answer to the question about the territorial scope of Article 10 of the Basic Law is Article 1.3 of the Basic Law, which determines the scope of the application of the fundamental rights in general. The fact that this regulation provides that the fundamental rights bind the legislature, the executive and the judiciary in a comprehensive way, does not, however, result in a final determination of the territorial scope of application of the fundamental rights. The Basic Law does not content itself with defining the internal order of the German state but also determines the essential features of the German state's relationship to the community of states. In this respect, the Basic Law assumes that a delimitation between states and legal systems is necessary, and that coordination between states and legal systems is also necessary. On the one hand, the scope of competence and responsibility of organs of the German state must be taken into account when determining the scope of application of the fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 66, 39 [57 et seq.]; BVerfGE 92, 26 [47]). On the other hand, constitutional law must be coordinated with international law. International law, however, does not, in principle, preclude the validity of fundamental rights in matters that bear on relations with foreign countries. The territorial scope of the fundamental rights, however, must be drawn from the Basic Law itself, taking into account Article 25 of the Basic Law. When doing so, modification and differentiation may be permissible or required, depending on the relevant rules of constitutional law (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 [72 et seq.]; BVerfGE 92, 26 [41-42]).

The protection of telecommunications privacy provided by Article 10 of the Basic Law, in accordance with the provisions of international law (cf. Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 10 December 1948; Article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 4 November 1950; in this context, cf. EGMR [Entscheidungen des Europäischen Gerichtshofs für Menschenrechte, Decisions of the European Court of Human Rights], NJW [Neue Juristische Wochenschrift] 1979, p. 1755 [at p. 1756]), aims at assuring that telecommunications remain free of undesired or unnoticed monitoring and that the holders of fundamental rights can communicate in an unhindered way. The protection of telecommunications privacy relates to the medium of communication itself and intends to counteract the threats to confidentiality that result precisely from the use of this medium, which is more likely to be the object of encroachment by the state than direct communication between partners who are physically present (cf. BVerfGE 85, 386 [396]. Modern technology, like satellite and microwave technology, permits access to foreign telecommunications traffic by means of monitoring equipment that is located on the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany.

The screening and recording of telecommunications traffic with the help of the Federal Intelligence Service's reception equipment located on German soil already establishes a technical and informational relation to the respective participants in an act of communication and, depending on the particular characteristics of data and information, establishes a contact to a specific territory. The evaluation, by the Federal Intelligence Service, of the acts of telecommunication that were screened in this way takes place on German soil. Under these circumstances, an act of communication abroad is linked with the action of the state on the domestic territory in such a way that the fundamental rights pursuant to Article 10 of the Basic Law are binding even if it must be supposed, for this binding effect to apply, that the territorial reference must be sufficiently close. Secret service activities that do not fall under the G 10 Act are not to be decided in this context, nor is the question of the legal situation of foreign communication partners abroad. In any event, pursuant to Article 19.3 of the Basic Law, Article 10 of the Basic Law does not apply to foreign legal entities.

2. Parts of the challenged regulations are also to be reviewed applying the standards of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law.

Article 19.4 of the Basic Law establishes the citizen's right to effective judicial review in cases in which it seems possible that their rights have been violated by acts of state power (by the German authorities). However, in Article 10.2(2) of the Basic Law makes an exception to this guarantee exclusively with respect to encroachments upon telecommunications privacy. Pursuant to Article 19.4(3) of the Basic Law, this exception is unaffected by the otherwise comprehensive guarantee of legal protection provided by the guarantee of recourse to a court. These provisions, however, do not set forth that the encroachments are not subject to any review whatsoever. Rather, recourse to a court is replaced by a review of the case by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the parliament.

The right provided by Article 19.4 of the Basic Law, however, is not restricted to judicial review and judicial proceedings. If the guarantee of legal protection provided by the right of recourse to a court is supposed to ensure the possibility of safeguarding other material rights, this guarantee can, parallel to Article 10 of the Basic Law, require that a monitored person be informed of the monitoring activities, if this form of granting knowledge is the prerequisite of the monitored person taking recourse to a court (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [70]). However, Article 19.4 of the Basic Law, which must be made more concrete and implemented by laws, does not preclude limitations on the right that it secures.

The obligation to destroy data that is no longer needed, which exists in principle, must also be understood in light of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law. The guaranteed right of recourse to a court provided by Article 19.4 of the Basic Law prohibits measures that are aimed at and likely to frustrate the protection of the monitored person's right of recourse to a court (cf. BVerfGE 69, 1 [49]). In cases in which the monitored person strives for judicial review of state measures of information and data processing, the obligation to destroy data must therefore be reconciled with the guarantee of recourse to a court in such a way that legal protection is not undermined or frustrated.

3. The fundamentally private acts of communication protected by Article 10 of the Basic Law, including correspondence, post and telecommunication, can be further protected by guarantee of fundamental rights that are relevant because of the content or the context of a specific act of communication. Guarantee of protection in addition to Article 10 may also be necessary in light of the impairment of fundamental rights that might result from use of the obtained data in new contexts.

To the extent that the complainants engage in the press sector and to the extent that they have claimed that they are hindered in this activity by the challenged regulations, the freedom of the press pursuant to Article 5.1(2) of the Basic Law can be considered as an additional guarantee of a fundamental right to telecommunications privacy. The freedom of the press not only refers to the dissemination of news and opinions in the press but also includes the prerequisites and auxiliary activities without which the press is unable to fulfil its function. This especially applies to the secrecy of its sources of information and to the mutual trust between the press and its informants (cf. BVerfGE 20, 162 [176, 187 et seq.]; BVerfGE 50, 234 [240]; BVerfGE 77, 65 [74-75]) as well as to the confidentiality of editorial work (cf. BVerfGE 66, 116 [130 et seq.]).

II.

The challenged regulations allow encroachments upon the aforementioned fundamental rights in several respects.

1. The monitoring and recording of acts of wireless international telecommunication by the Federal Intelligence Service encroaches upon telecommunications privacy.

As Article 10.1 of the Basic Law intends to protect the confidentiality of communication, every effort to take note of, record and utilise communication data by the state is an encroachment upon fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 85, 386 [398]). There is, therefore, no doubt that the fact that Federal Intelligence Service staff takes note of screened acts of tele-communication constitutes an encroachment upon fundamental rights. In order to determine whether this also applies to the measures that precede analysis by the Federal Intelligence Service, they must be regarded in their context that is determined by the objective of monitoring and of the use of the obtained data.

This means that the screening alone constitutes an encroachment, to the extent that it makes the communication available to the Federal Intelligence Service and is the basis of the subsequent comparison with the search concepts. Screening does not constitute an encroachment to the extent that acts of telecommunication between German subscriber lines were also screened in an untargeted manner and solely for technical reasons but were discarded by technical means immediately after signal editing without leaving any indication that monitoring had taken place. The mere fact that the obtained data cannot be immediately attributed to specific persons does not mean that there has been no encroachment; it was confirmed at the oral argument that in these cases it is also possible, without any difficulty, to establish references, especially to the identity of individuals.

The encroachment upon telecommunications privacy persists through the storage of the screened data, which makes the material available for comparison with the search concepts. The comparison itself constitutes an encroachment, as it comprises the selection of data for further evaluation. This applies whether or not the comparison takes place automatically or is carried out by staff of the Federal Intelligence service who, for this objective, takes note of the content of the act of communication. As the further storage after screening and comparison serves to make the data available for evaluation, it is also an encroachment upon Article 10 of the Basic Law.

The examination made pursuant to s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act, which determines whether the personal data obtained by telecommunications monitoring is required for the objectives which justify these measures, also constitutes an encroachment. This examination is an act of selection by which the recorded data is either submitted to further use, stored for further use or destroyed.

An encroachment upon the right to telecommunications privacy also occurs when the Federal Intelligence Service, in the framework of its duty to inform the Federal government, transfers personal data that it has obtained through telecommunications monitoring. This transfer of the collected data expands the circle of those who know of the acts of communication and can make use of this knowledge. The Federal Intelligence Service's transfer of this recorded data to the receiving agencies, an act that is regulated in s. 3.5 and s. 3.3 of the G 10 Act, constitutes an encroachment upon telecommunication privacy, as does the further examination by the receiving agencies, which is regulated in s. 3.7 of the G 10 Act.

The limitation imposed by s. 3.8(1) and s. 3.8(2) of the G 10 Act on the duty to inform the monitored person about the monitoring taking place also constitutes an encroachment upon the fundamental right to telecommunications privacy.

2. Moreover, the guarantee of the right of recourse to a court provided by Article 19.4 of the Basic Law is impaired by: (1) the limitation, contained in s. 3.8(1) and s. 3.8(2) of the G 10 Act, on the duty to inform the monitored person that monitoring has taken place; and (2) the preclusion of the recourse to a court contained in s. 9.6 of the G 10 Act. Apart from that, the obligation to destroy personal data pursuant to ss. 3.6, 3.7 and 7.4 of the G 10 Act can have a detrimental effect on the judicial review of the measures.

3. To the extent that measures ordered on the basis of ss. 1.1 and 3.1 of the G 10 Act also cover telecommunications links of press publishers or journalists, an impairment of the fundamental right of the freedom of the press also occurs as a result of: (1) the authority to examine such acts of telecommunication that is conferred upon the Federal Intelligence Service pursuant to s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act; (2) the duty to inform the Federal government; (3) the authority to transfer data to other agencies pursuant to ss. 3.5 and 3.3 of the G 10 Act; and (4) the authority to examine the received data conferred upon these agencies pursuant to s. 3.7 of the G 10 Act.

III.

The authority to monitor and record telecommunications traffic pursuant to s. 1.1 and s. 3.1 sentence 2 nos. 1-6 of the G 10 Act is, essentially, in accord with Article 10 of the Basic Law. s. 3.1 sentence 2 no. 5 of the G 10 Act is not, however, consistent with this fundamental right to the extent that this provision permits monitoring in order to gather intelligence that is necessary to be able to timely recognise counterfeiting committed abroad and to counteract such a threat.

1. In the formal sense, there are no problematic constitutional considerations as against the provisions found in s. 1.1 and s. 3.1 of the G 10 Act. The legislative competence for the matters regulated by these provisions belongs to the Federal Republic of Germany. The Federal Republic's competence follows from Article 73 no. 1 of the Basic Law, which exclusively confers legislation in foreign affairs and defence to the Federal Republic of Germany.

b) The regulation in s. 1.1 and s. 3.1 sentence 2 nos. 1 to 6 of the 1994 Fight against Crime Act can be identified as belonging to the legislative competence over foreign affairs. This is obvious as regards the threat of an armed aggression (no. 1), which, apart from this, also belongs to the area of competence over defence, but also applies to the areas of threat specified under nos. 2 to 6.

2. The regulations in s. 1.1 and s. 3.1 of the G 10 Act also fulfil the prerequisites laid down by Article 10 of the Basic Law concerning the specificity and clarity of powers of encroachments upon telecommunications traffic.

In particular the Parliament has determined, in a sufficiently specific and clear manner, the objectives for which telecommunications links may be monitored and for which the intelligence thus gathered may be used. The threatening situations that are supposed to be timely recognised by observation or monitoring are described precisely enough and are further specified by reference to other laws. The scope of monitoring is determined by its limitation to international wireless traffic. In view of the mission and the workings of intelligence services, it was not possible to further specify the prerequisites that must exist for monitoring to take place.

3. As regards substance, however, s. 3.1 sentence 2 no. 5 of the G 10 Act disproportionately restricts telecommunications privacy. Apart from this, s. 3.1(2) of the G 10 Act complies with the requirements of the principle of proportionality.

a) The objective of timely recognising and counteracting the threats specified under numbers 1 to 6 of the provision is a legitimate interest of the common good. It is true that the threats specified under nos. 2 to 6, which were newly incorporated into the law, do not carry the same weight as the threat of an armed aggression, which has from the outset been regarded as a legitimate reason for telecommunications monitoring (cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 [178]). Whereas such an aggression jeopardises the existence of the state, the well-being of the population and the freely chosen liberal order of the state, the newly incorporated threats, as a general rule, do not affect the existence of the state or its order in the same fundamental manner. They do, however, concern high-ranking public interests whose violation would result in serious damage to external and internal peace and to the legal interests of individuals, albeit to different degrees.

b) Telecommunications monitoring on the basis of s. 3.1 of the G 10 Act is suitable for achieving the objective of the law.

The wide range of screening, which only in comparatively few cases is likely to yield information, is no argument against suitability. On the legal level, it is sufficient if there is an abstract possibility that the permitted measures achieve the intended objective, i.e. if the measures are not unsuitable from the outset but may contribute to the desired success (cf. BVerfGE 90, 145 [172]). This is the case here.

The requirement of suitability is also sufficiently taken into account on the level of implementation. On the one hand, monitoring takes place in a series of procedural steps that, by rendering the measures more specific, may promote their suitability. The determination of specific telecommunications links and the ordering of restrictions on the privacy of telecommunications links are meant to establish a framework that delimits the monitoring measures. The monitoring measures take place in regulated procedures, the elements of which comprise, in particular: (1) the application by the Federal Intelligence Service (ss. 4.2 no. 2 and 4.3 of the G 10 Act), which requires a statement of reasons; (2) the determination of the search concepts, which according to the text of the law must be suitable for achieving the aims of telecommunications monitoring (s. 3.2[1] of the G 10 Act); and (3) (previous) supervision by the panel of parliamentarians and the G 10 Commission (s. 3.1[1], s. 9.2 of the G 10 Act). On the other hand, monitoring is subject to subsequent control by the G 10 Commission, which is established pursuant to s. 9 of the G 10 Act. The panel of parliamentarians established pursuant to s. 9.1 of the G 10 Act is to be informed by the Federal Minister of the Interior, at intervals not greater than six months, about the state of implementation of the law.

In some of the listed areas of threat, however, it is likely that exactly the individuals or organisations that are the targets of monitoring are, due to their high degree of organisation and their use of modern infrastructure, in a position to evade telecommunications monitoring whereas unsuspected individuals who cannot make use of encryption technologies (as is the case with journalists, in view of their working conditions) become subjects of monitoring. The Federal Intelligence Service itself has stated that the poor results of monitoring in the areas of international terrorism and drug trade can, inter alia, be explained by the use of code words. In the oral argument the Federal government countered the objection that monitoring is unsuitable by stating that practical experience had shown that only relatively few of the screened telecommunications links were encrypted.

This leads to the conclusion that the question whether monitoring for the objective of early recognition of the respective threats fails due to the use of encryption technologies cannot, at least according to the present state of knowledge, be answered on an abstract level but only on account of practical experience. On the legal level, the permitted measures are not unsuitable from the outset. On the level of implementation, the Federal Intelligence Service and the supervisory bodies that are involved pursuant to the procedural arrangements are to ensure that in spite of the possibility of encryption, the suitability of the measures in the areas of threat that are the subject of an order restricting telecommunications privacy is maintained.

c) The law is necessary for achieving its aims. There are no means available that are equally effective, which less significantly impair the holders of fundamental rights. In particular, the possibility of cooperation with the states in which the sources of the threats arise is not equally promising. This is, on the one hand, due to the fact that cooperation requires previous knowledge about relevant facts. On the other hand, this is due to the fact that in many cases the threats are caused or condoned by government authorities abroad.

d) The restrictions on the right to privacy in telecommunication traffic instituted pursuant to s. 1.1 and s. 3.1 of the G 10 Act (screening, recording, storage, comparison) are, in essence, proportional in the narrower sense. Only restrictions instituted for the objective of recognising counterfeiting committed abroad (no. 5) fail to meet this requirement.

aa) The principle of proportionality requires that a loss of the freedom that is protected by the Basic Law is not disproportionate to the objectives of public interest that are served by the restriction of the fundamental right in question. Due to the fact that the individual is integrated in the community and depends on the community, the individual must tolerate restrictions of his or her fundamental rights if they are justified by prevailing public interests (cf. e.g. BVerfGE 65, 1 [44] with further references). The Parliament must, however, achieve an adequate balance between public interests and the interests of the individual. In this context, the important questions with respect to the fundamental rights of the individual are: (1) under what circumstances and how many holders of fundamental rights are subject to impairments; and (2) what is the degree of intensity of these impairments? The standards for determining this include: (1) which thresholds for intervention have been created; (2) the number of persons affected; and (3) the intensity of the impairments. The intensity of the impairment, in turn, depends on: (1) whether the communication partners' identities remain anonymous; (2) which calls and (3) which contents can be screened (cf. e.g., on the basis of the standard of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, BVerfGE 34, 238 [247]); and (4) what disadvantages threaten, or are justly feared by, the holders of fundamental rights on account of the monitoring measures. On the other hand the considerations of the public interests lie, as determined by the weight of the aims and interests served by the telecommunications monitoring. The decisive factors in this context are, inter alia: (1) how great are the dangers that are to be recognised with the help of telecommunications monitoring; and (2) how probable is their occurrence.

bb) Telecommunications privacy is seriously impaired by the challenged regulations.

The limitation is, first of all, apparent from the fact that, pursuant to sentence 1 of s. 3.1(1) of the G 10 Act, only wireless international telecommunications traffic is subject to monitoring. Monitoring measures do not extend to domestic telecommunications traffic. Restrictions of telecommunications privacy may include line bound traffic only in order to recognise the threat of an armed aggression, but not concerning the other threats which have been newly incorporated into the law (s. 3.1[3] of the G 10 Act). Wireless traffic, i.e. traffic that is transmitted via microwave or satellite, presently amounts to approximately ten per cent of the entire telecommunications traffic but will, according to the independent, court appointed expert Professor Dr. Wiesbeck, continually increase due to technological progress.

Whether a specific act of communication takes place via line bound or wireless telecommunications systems, is, according to the experts' statements, determined automatically depending on the capacity and capacity utilisation of the transmission routes and is therefore unpredictable for the communication partners as well as for the Federal Intelligence Service. For these reasons alone, comprehensive screening is not feasible, at least as far as the international telecommunications traffic is concerned. It is true that in any telecommunications contact abroad, the individual engaged in this contact must be aware of the possibility that the contact is screened by the Federal Intelligence Service. Such a screening will in actuality, however, only rarely occur.

Other limitations on the monitoring permitted by the challenged regulations result from the fact that, in order to initiate telecommunications monitoring, it is necessary to determine the specific links and establish the monitoring thereof by specific orders. Furthermore, restrictions on telecommunications privacy resulting from monitoring will only occur if the threatening situation is sufficiently established by the Federal Intelligence Service and, in view of the Federal Intelligence Service's limited capacities, sufficient results are expected. It has become apparent in practice that considerations like limited resources and utility actually achieve a limiting effect: the orders concerning the areas of threat of international terrorism and drug trade, have, pursuant to s. 5.3(2) of the G 10 Act not been renewed due to the poor results of the monitoring.

On the other hand, the assumptions that formed the basis of the Federal Constitutional Court's 1984 decision, which found the weight of the impairment of fundamental rights arising out of telecommunications monitoring to be relatively low (BVerfGE 67, 157), are no longer valid. In that decision the Federal Constitutional Court proceeded on the assumption that the determination of telecommunications links and the ordering of restrictions on the privacy of telecommunications traffic issued after consultation with the parliamentary panel, as required by law, would result in a strong geographic restriction of the monitored areas and to a strong restriction of the monitored routes (cf. BVerfG, loc. cit., 174). Strategic surveillance was regarded as proportional, as the Court claimed that: (1) it serves an especially important objective, i.e. the prevention of an armed aggression against the Federal Republic of Germany; (2) there is very little probability that an individual will become the subject of surveillance; and (3) that surveillance places only a minor burden on the individual due to the fact that anonymity of the communication partners is, in principle, assured (cf. BVerfG, loc. cit., 178-179).

Certainly, telecommunications monitoring pursuant to s. 3.1 and s. 5.1 of the G 10 Act is still to be determined and ordered by the responsible Federal minister and requires approval by the parliamentary panel established pursuant to s. 9 of the G 10 Act. The change of the factual and legal framework conditions has, however, considerably diminished the limiting effect these procedures can be expected to have on the encroachments on telecommunications privacy, that are permitted by the challenged regulations. As long as strategic surveillance of telecommunications, as based on the original version of the G 10 Act, only referred to the threat of an armed aggression against the Federal Republic of Germany and as long as, according to political analysis, such an aggression only emanated from the Eastern Block, surveillance was restricted to the countries of the Warsaw Pact. Moreover, an order for monitoring under the previous regime, under the existing technical conditions, always referred to individual routes of communication, so-called corridors, e.g. specific collective cables for the transfer of long distance calls to the respective area.

Meanwhile, the incorporation of nos. 2 to 6 into the G 10 Act has considerably increased the quantity of threats about which intelligence should be gathered. Consequently, surveillance is no longer restricted to a single crisis region. This means that the geographical area that may be covered by monitoring measures has been considerably expanded. The observation of satellite radiuses has considerably increased the volume of screened telecommunication traffic links. Under these circumstances, mainly the search concepts as defined by s. 3.2 of the G 10 Act that are approved in the order establishing the monitoring measures, which control the selection of the monitored telecommunications contacts, serve to limit surveillance.

Finally, the anonymity of the act of communication is no longer assured as was the case under the previous regime. It is true that the search concepts as defined by s. 3.2 of the G 10 Act, apart from the exception in sentence 3 that is not under review here, may not contain any characteristics for identification that result in the targeted screening of specific acts of telecommunication traffic. This prohibition, however, no longer shields the subscriber lines to which it applies from the identification of the subscribers in the same way as it used to do. One reason for this is that, due to the development of technology, the information regarding the circumstances of an act of communication, including the parties' identities, is also gathered and retained. On the other hand, the identification of individuals now results from the fact that the threats that have been newly incorporated into the Act are, to a far greater extent, related to specific individuals than was the case with respect to the threat of war. Furthermore, the Federal Intelligence Service concedes that monitoring often only yields the desired intelligence of the identity.

When judging the intensity of the impairment of fundamental rights, it is important that every participant in international telecommunications traffic is exposed to the monitoring measures whether or not there is a relationship between the monitoring and his or her behaviour and whether or not the monitoring was provoked by his or her behaviour. As regards content, acts of communication of all kinds are screened in their entirety. In this context, it is possible that Federal Intelligence Service staff takes note of the communication. In this respect, the fact that the search concepts, due to the state of technological development, only insufficiently fulfil the function that is assigned to them by the Parliament, i.e. to make human access to the obtained material unnecessary until comparison has taken place, shows its effects.

According to the statements of the Federal Intelligence Service, which have been confirmed by the experts, only in the exceptional case of telex monitoring is fully automatic comparison of search terms feasible. Telex traffic, however, is less and less frequent. Contrary to this, fax traffic can only be automatically compared and reviewed to a limited extent and telephone traffic cannot be automatically compared and reviewed at all. This explains why most intelligence, by far, is gathered by means of so-called formal search concepts (foreign subscriber numbers) based on the exemption provision of s. 3.2(3) of the G 10 Act. According to the statement of the expert Professor Waibel, voice recognition procedures cannot yet be effectively employed, in spite of their continuous improvement, in the implementation of the G 10 Act nor will they be effective in the near future without human contribution. Independent of the practice of the Federal Intelligence Service, the Act does not preclude that the comparison is done by staff, even though the Parliament may have imagined comparisons taking place automatically.

When judging the intensity of the impairment of fundamental rights, the lack of anonymity of the participants in communications is to be considered as well. The fact that the intelligence gathered relates to specific individuals is not restricted to the screening and recording phase. In practical work with the intelligence gathered, this relation is preserved. According to the statements of the Federal Intelligence Service, this is necessary, in some of the cases, in the framework of evaluation, to assess and classify the intelligence. The Federal Intelligence Service eschews the use of technically possible temporary memory systems that would allow it to access the information regarding the circumstances of the call, including the parties' identities, only if it proves necessary to make use of information regarding the individuals involved in the communication contact in order to fulfil the tasks of the Federal Intelligence Service.

The risks that can objectively be expected or must be feared begin to emerge as early in the monitoring process as that point when the Federal Intelligence Service takes note of an act of communication. In fact, even before the Federal Intelligence Service takes note of acts of communication, the fear of being monitored, (and of the dangers of recording, subsequent evaluation, possible transfer and further utilisation by other authorities, that are connected with monitoring), may lead to inhibitions in communication, to communication disturbances and to the individual adapting his or her behaviour, in this context especially in order to avoid specific contents of conversation or specific terms. In this context, not only the individual impairment of a large number of holders of fundamental rights must be taken into consideration. Rather, the secret monitoring of telecommunications traffic concerns the communication of society as a whole. Therefore, the Federal Constitutional Court has stated that the right to informational self-determination, which is comparable in this respect, also bears a relation to the common good that goes beyond the interest of the individual (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [43]).

cc) On the other hand, it is of importance that the restrictions of fundamental rights serve to protect high-ranking public interests.

Monitoring measures based on s. 3.1(1) and s. 3.1 sentence 2 no. 1 of the G 10 Act are supposed to yield intelligence about facts that are relevant under defence policy aspects so that threats to the Federal Republic of Germany involving armed aggression can be timely recognised. It is true that the nature of such a threat has changed with the dissolution of the Warsaw Pact. The Act, however, is not bound to the historical constellation that the parliament had in mind when enacting the law. Rather, the telecommunications monitoring regime can still be applied even if the threat that such measures are intended to counteract has shifted. This is true in the case of the threat of armed aggression. Even after the dissolution of the Warsaw Pact, this threat still exists.

In the new areas of monitoring, increased threats have developed due to the increase of internationally organised crime, in particular in the area of illegal trade with weapons of war and with drugs as well as in the area of money laundering. Even if such activities cannot, altogether, be put in the same category of importance as armed aggression aimed at the Federal Republic of Germany, they considerably affect, in any case, the foreign and security policy interests of the Federal Republic of Germany. Nor are the threats in the specified areas remote. In the area of weapons proliferation, the Federal government has furnished sufficient examples that are generally known.

The threats, the sources of which are predominantly located abroad and which are supposed to be detected by means of the authority to restrict telecommunications privacy, are of great importance. This still applies to the threat of armed aggression but also, as has been sufficiently established by the Federal Intelligence Service, to the threats of weapons proliferation, arms trade, and international terrorism. The aim behind the mission of foreign surveillance, i.e. to provide the Federal government with information that is of foreign and security policy interest for the Federal Republic of Germany, is of considerable importance if the Federal Republic of Germany is to act effectively in the field of foreign policy and maintain the reputation of its foreign policy.

dd) In a weighing of interests that takes these aspects into consideration, s. 3.1 sentence 2 nos. 1-4 and no. 6 of the G 10 Act are not objectionable from the constitutional point of view.

Contrary to the opinion of the complainant bringing the first constitutional complaint, the authority to monitor and record, and the other measures provided by the challenged Act is not out of proportion simply because it lacks intervention thresholds like the traditional concepts of 'konkrete Gefahr' (specific threat) in the field of resistance to threats and of "hinreichender Tatverdacht" (reasonable grounds for the suspicion of a criminal act) in the field of criminal prosecution. Certainly, telecommunications monitoring is conducted without an existing suspicion. Neither is the encroachment upon fundamental rights limited to the general risk that the individual may become the subject of an unjustified suspicion. In the framework of determining and ordering restrictions to telecommunications privacy, anyone can easily become the object of monitoring measures.

The different aims, however, justify that the prerequisites for encroachments on telecommunications privacy are determined differently in the G 10 Act than in police law and law of criminal procedure. On account of the legislative power of the Federal Republic of Germany flowing from Article 73 no. 1 of the Basic Law, the only possible aim of monitoring by the Federal Intelligence Service is foreign surveillance with respect to specified threatening situations that are relevant to foreign and security policy. This type of surveillance shows the following characteristics: (1) it is concerned with the external security of the Federal Republic of Germany; (2) its subject is threatening situations that originate abroad, not predominantly threatening situations and suspected threats that are related to individuals; and (3) intelligence in this respect can only to a limited extent be obtained by other means. In this context, the Federal Intelligence Service's sole mission is to collect and evaluate the information required for obtaining intelligence about foreign countries that are of importance for the foreign and security policy of the Federal Republic of Germany, and, on account of its duty to inform the Federal government, to provide it with information to support it in its decisions.

It is true that even the considerable threats, which telecommunications monitoring is supposed to counteract, would not justify, from the constitutional point of view, telecommunications monitoring for objectives of foreign surveillance without any prerequisites or limitations. The law, however, has not dispensed with such prerequisites. SS. 3.1(1) and 3.1(2) of the G 10 Act contain specified substantive standards and procedural safeguards, chiefly that monitoring is only permissible for collecting information about issues the knowledge of which is necessary for the timely recognition of the threatening situations. Under the procedural aspect, one of the prerequisites of the determination and ordering of monitoring is that the Federal Intelligence Service, in its application, conclusively establishes why the affected telecommunications links can provide, in a timely manner, information about one of the relevant threats.

Taking into account the safeguards provided in the G 10 Act, screening and recording for the objective of informing the Federal government do not appear to be disproportionate. Certainly, the number of screened telecommunications links is not low. It is low, however, compared with the total number of telecommunications contacts, or even in comparison only with the number of international telecommunications contacts. In this context, the ban on targeted monitoring of specified individual subscriber lines contained in s. 3.2(2) of the G 10 Act is of great importance. In view of the fact that encroachments on telecommunications privacy are implemented without the existence of a suspicion, in view of the broad range of screened telecommunications contacts and of the possibility of identifying the participants in a telecommunications contact, proportionality would not be ensured without such a ban. The Federal Constitutional Court is not called upon to review the constitutionality of s. 3.2(3) of the G 10 Act because the complainants who have lodged admissible constitutional complaints are not affected by this regulation. Even if free communication, which Article 10 of the Basic Law is supposed to ensure, may be disturbed by the screening and recording of acts of telecommunication, the danger of disturbing it gains its full significance only through subsequent evaluation and especially by the transfer of the gathered information. In this respect, however, it can be adequately counteracted on the level of the authority to evaluate and transfer.

ee) Proportionality in the narrower sense is not ensured, however, with respect to the threat of counterfeiting committed abroad, as it is listed under no. 5 of the regulation.

Counterfeiting is neither a threat, the seriousness of which is comparable to the threat of armed aggression, nor does it concern legal interests that are as important as the other threats incorporated into s. 3 of the G 10 Act by the 1994 Fight against Crime Act. Counterfeiting also does not show, in all its forms of perpetration, the same potential for danger that characterises the other threats. Counterfeiting neither constitutes a threat to the existence or the safety of the Federal Republic of Germany that is necessarily connected with foreign countries, nor is it necessarily a considerable threat to the existence or the safety of the Federal Republic of Germany. This does not preclude that in individual cases, large scale counterfeiting committed abroad impairs the Federal Republic of Germany's monetary stability, and thus its economic performance, to a degree that is comparable to the other threats. The provision, however, is not limited to such cases. With respect to the threat posed by counterfeiting generally, the degree of the threat and the weight of the impairment of fundamental rights is out of proportion.

By incorporating respective limitations, however, s. 3.1 sentence 2 no. 5 of the G 10 Act can be given a wording that is consistent with the Basic Law. This part of the regulation is therefore not to be declared void but is only to be declared inconsistent with the Basic Law. The Parliament is obliged to create consistency with the Basic Law.

IV.

The provision of s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act, which obliges the Federal Intelligence Service to examine whether the personal data obtained by telecommunications monitoring is required for the objectives that justify these measures is not objectionable from a constitutional point of view when considered by itself. This provision does not sufficiently take account of the requirements, which follow from Article 10 of the Basic Law, that: (1) an infringement upon telecommunications privacy be bound to a specific use; and (2) that an infringement upon telecommunications privacy be proportional. To this extent, this provision is inconsistent with telecommunications privacy and the freedom of the press (which is to be considered alongside telecommunications privacy).

It is true that s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act complies with the principle that an infringement upon the right to telecommunications privacy be bound to a specified purpose to the extent that this provision of the G 10 Act requires that the Federal Intelligence Service examine whether the data that is obtained by means of telecommunications monitoring is suitable for a specified objective. Apart from that, this principle is observed by the fact that s. 3.6 (1) of the G 10 Act orders the destruction or deletion of the data if the examination has shown that the data is unnecessary for the objectives of the Federal Intelligence Service. The Act, however, does not sufficiently ensure that the use of the data that is not destroyed or deleted is bound to the objective that justified the collection of data in the first place. Possible uses other than the early recognition of the threats specified in the Act and the corresponding provision of information to the Federal government are not excluded. The regulations provided by the Federal Intelligence Service Act, which address the processing and utilisation of personal data, cannot fill this gap. s. 11 of the Federal Intelligence Service Act excludes the application of the general provisions in s. 14 of the Federal Data Protection Act for which the storage, modification and use of obtained data is permissible. Apart from this, s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act does not acknowledge the duty, which follows from Article 10 of the Basic Law, to identify and mark the object of protection of fundamental rights to make it possible to track the object of fundamental rights protection throughout the remaining steps of processing.

Nor does the challenged regulation make the further evaluation of the data dependent on meeting a threshold of proportionality. s. 3.3 of the G 10 Act, which establishes specified requirements for the utilisation of the data, makes no reference to the Federal Intelligence Service. Instead, the provision's objective (the prevention, resolution or prosecution of criminal offences identified by this article) is addressed to the authorities to which the Federal Intelligence Service, pursuant to s. 3.5 of the G 10 Act, is to transfer information. The Act does not contain provisions that ensure that the Federal Intelligence Service evaluates only the data obtained by telecommunications monitoring that shows a sufficient relevance to the work of the intelligence service for the areas of threat specified in ss. 1.1 and 3.1 of the G 10 Act. The fact that such a threshold is lacking is also of importance with regard to Article 5.1(2) of the Basic Law, because such a threshold would ensure that the Federal Intelligence Service takes the interests of the protection of informants and of the confidentiality of editorial work into account.

An interpretation of the provision that is consistent with the Constitution is not possible as it would not be in conformity with the requirements of specificity and clarity placed on legal regulations by Article 10 of the Basic Law. The challenged provision only requires amendment; its deficiencies do not result in the provision being void but only result in its inconsistency with the Basic Law. The Parliament is obliged to create consistency with the Basic Law.

V.

S. 12 of the Federal Intelligence Service Act obligates the Federal Intelligence Service to report to the Federal government, the content of the data obtained pursuant to its telecommunications monitoring activities. This obligation is challenged in these proceedings only to the extent that s. 3.3(2) of the G 10 Act excludes the reporting obligation from the requirements of s. 3.3(1) of the G 10 Act. In the framework of the Federal Intelligence Service's obligation to report to the Federal government, telecommunications' privacy is not sufficiently protected.

The effect of Article 10 of the Basic Law and Article 5.1 of the Basic Law (to the extent that acts of communication fall under the freedom of the press) also extends to the Federal Intelligence Service's duty to inform the Federal government of its telecommunications monitoring activities because informing the Federal government is one of the objectives for which the Federal Intelligence Service has been granted the right to conduct telecommunications monitoring. The protection provided by the obligation to report to the Federal government by no means becomes unnecessary simply because personal data obtained as a result of monitoring is judged to be of no importance as regards the fulfilment of the duty to inform the Federal government. The duty to inform the Federal government does not only require that the Federal Intelligence Service draw up situation reports. The Federal Intelligence Service is, as s. 12 of the Federal Intelligence Service Act explicitly emphasises, authorised to transfer personal data.

It certainly cannot be criticised that s. 3.3(2) of the G 10 Act excludes the duty to inform the Federal government established by s. 12 of the Federal Intelligence Service Act from the limitations of use pursuant to s. 3.3(1) of the G 10 Act, as the limitations provided in this sentence are not geared to the tasks of the Federal Intelligence Service. It is, however, inconsistent with Article 10 of the Basic Law that this provision also does not provide that telecommunications monitoring be bound to the objectives established in s. 1.1 and in ss. 3.1(1) and s. 3.1(2) of the G 10 Act that justify telecommunication monitoring. Moreover, the absence of an obligation to mark personal data constitutes a violation of Article 10 of the Basic Law.

As the challenged provision, considered on its own, does not contradict the constitution but only requires amendment, its deficiencies also do not result in the provision being void but only results in its inconsistency with the Basic Law. The Parliament is obliged to create consistency with the Basic Law. The Basic Law leaves the decision about the precise place in which this duty is fulfilled to the legislative discretion of the Federal government.

VI.

The provision of s. 3.5(1), in conjunction with s. 3.3(1) of the G 10 Act, that obliges the Federal Intelligence Service to transfer data obtained by telecommunication monitoring to other authorities for the execution of their duties is not entirely consistent with the provisions of Article 10 of the Basic Law and the complementary provisions of Article 5.1(2) of the Basic Law.

1. The objective of the regulation, however, is not objectionable from the constitutional point of view. The data and information that the Federal Intelligence Service has obtained from telecommunications' traffic when fulfilling its mission, are supposed to be utilised for the prevention, resolution or prosecution of criminal offences to the extent that they indicate offences committed by specified individuals. The Basic Law confers great importance to the prevention and resolution of criminal offences. The Federal Constitutional Court has therefore repeatedly emphasised the irrefutable requirement that criminal offences be effectively prosecuted and of an effective fight against crime. The Federal Constitutional Court has also repeatedly stressed the public interest in the truth being ascertained as completely as possible in criminal proceedings, for the conviction of offenders as well as for the exoneration of the innocent, and has described the effective resolution especially of serious criminal offences as an important mission of a polity governed by the rule of law (cf. BVerfGE 77, 65 [76] with further references; BVerfGE 80, 367 [375]).

2. The parliament has also complied with the requirement that it determines, precisely and specifically for each area, the objectives for which personal data may be transferred and further used (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [46]). This provision permits a transfer of data to the receiving agencies specified in s. 3.5 of the G 10 Act only to the extent that this is required for the execution of the receiving agency's duties. Thus, the provision refers to the intelligence service tasks, the administrative and monitoring duties and the missions of crime prevention, of the resistance to threats and of the prosecution of criminal offences that are assigned to the respective receiving agencies. S. 3.3(1) of the G 10 Act further delimits the objectives of use, in the framework of these agencies' tasks, to the prevention, resolution or prosecution of the listed criminal offences.

3. Moreover, the objectives justifying the transfer of data are consistent with the objective for which a restriction of telecommunications' privacy has already taken place, and which resulted in the collection of data (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [62]).

It is true that the Federal Intelligence Service's telecommunication monitoring without an existing suspicion is only permissible for strategic surveillance. The characteristic feature of this type of monitoring is that its aim is not to initiate measures against specific individuals but that it concerns threatening situations on an international level about which the Federal government is supposed to be informed. Only this limited objective justifies such a broad scope and the depth of encroachment upon fundamental rights, that results from monitoring without an existing suspicion. If the monitoring were, from the outset, justified by efforts aimed at the prevention or prosecution of criminal offences, the power to conduct such monitoring would not be consistent with Article 10 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 [180-181]. Limitations on employing specified methods of collecting data, which are required by fundamental rights, may not be evaded by making legally gathered data available for objectives that would otherwise not justify monitoring.

Article 10 of the Basic Law does not, however, exclude all transfers of data to agencies that may not or should not be permitted, on their own, to conduct telecommunication monitoring without an existing suspicion. As the Federal Intelligence Service, on account of the liberal methods it is permitted to employ, necessarily screens a large number of acts of telecommunication that are from the outset irrelevant for the receiving agencies, it must, in any case, be ensured that these agencies are not permitted to access the complete stock of data. On the other hand, it does not contradict the primary objective for which the data is collected if information that is relevant to the prevention, resolution or prosecution of criminal offences (although it has been collected with different objectives in mind) is transferred to the agencies mentioned under s. 3.5 of the G 10 Act after careful examination of the data by the Federal Intelligence Service. The provisions of the challenged regulation that govern the transfer of data comply with the requirements that must be met in this context: i.e. a threshold for the transfer that is established in s. 3.5(1) as well as in s. 3.1(1) of the G 10 Act, and a particular review by an official who is qualified to hold judicial office established in s. 3.5(2) of the G 10 Act.

4. The challenged provisions are, on the other hand, not fully consistent with the principle of proportionality.

a) What is lacking, however, is not the suitability and necessity of the regulation for achieving the desired objective.

It is obvious that the transfer of data to agencies whose mission is, inter alia, the prevention, resolution or prosecution of criminal offences, aids the fulfilment of this mission. Nor has the circle of receivers been expanded to include agencies that cannot contribute to achieving the objective of the Act. Those agencies that are not entrusted with tasks concerning the prosecution of criminal offences but only perform administrative or intelligence services functions, have, in any case, within the boundaries of their mission, the possibility to prevent criminal offences.

There is no apparent means that would constitute a less intrusive encroachment while at the same time promising similar chances for success. Within the boundaries set by the authority they have been granted, the receiving agencies could not otherwise receive this information, which the Federal Intelligence Service can acquire due to its broader authorisation to monitor telecommunications. Moreover, the Parliament has ensured compliance with the principle of necessity by limiting the duty to transfer data to that data which is necessary for the execution of the receiving agency's duties.

b) The Parliament, however, has not complied with the requirements that the principle of proportionality, in its narrower sense, places on regulations that permit encroachment upon fundamental rights.

aa) The more narrowly construed principle of proportionality prohibits encroachments upon fundamental rights of an intensity that is out of proportion to the importance of the matter and the harm the individual citizen must suffer (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 [54]). Rather, an adequate relationship between the importance of the fundamental rights in question and the seriousness of the restrictions on these fundamental rights must be established. In an overall balancing between the severity of the encroachment on the one hand, and the importance and urgency of the reasons that justify the encroachment on the other hand, the bounds of reasonableness must still be respected (cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 [173, 178]; established case law).

The severity of the encroachment upon telecommunications privacy that results from the transfer permitted by the G 10 Act is best characterised by the fact that the transfer of personal data constitutes another break of telecommunications privacy that can result in an even greater impairment than the original encroachment (that took place with the monitoring). The effect of data transfer is not limited to the expansion of the group of persons that obtain knowledge of the circumstances and the content of an act of telecommunication. Taking note of an act of telecommunication may precede measures taken against the subjects of monitoring. The Federal Intelligence Service cannot take any measures that are directed against individuals, and the Federal government, which the Federal Intelligence Service is to inform about specified threatening situations, does not take measures against the participants in an act of communication in the framework of its political counter strategies. But the agencies to which the data is to be transmitted pursuant to s. 3.5(1) of the G 10 Act will, as a general rule, institute investigations against the subjects of monitoring that may lead to further inquiries and, as the case may be, to the institution of criminal proceedings.

In this context it is also of importance, for judging the intensity of the encroachment, that the Federal Intelligence Service has obtained the information by means of a method that, due to the broad scope of its power to monitor telecommunications, including the power to conduct monitoring that is not motivated by suspicion, very severely affects telecommunications' privacy. This is only consistent with Article 10 of the Basic Law because it merely serves strategic objectives and requires the identification of the participants in an act of communication only to facilitate the interpretation of the information, which is always fragmentary and therefore requires interpretation. Under these circumstances, the acceptability of the transfer of data to the designated agencies can only be ensured if the interests served by the transfer prevail over telecommunications' privacy and if there is a safe basis for the assumptions that: (1) the data is relevant to these interests; and (2) that the persons affected by monitoring are, with sufficient probability, involved in criminal offences. If this basis is lacking, the bounds of what is reasonable have been transgressed.

It is therefore imperative that the legal interest (the prevention, resolution and prosecution of the listed criminal offences) justifying the transfer be of great importance. A sufficient factual basis for the suspicion that criminal offences are being planned or have been committed is also imperative. A lower degree of probability (with respect to a possible or actual violation of the applicable legal interest) justifies transfer when the legal interest at stake is very important. Similarly, less cogent facts may form the basis of a suspicion justifying transfer when the legal interest at stake is very important.

The more important the legal interest is, the further the threshold for transfer may be shifted to a point in time prior to the threatening violation of a legal interest.

In order for acts of planning, together with the prerequisite of the existence of factual grounds, to be sufficient to serve as a threshold for the transfer of data, the legal interest must be of outstanding importance (cf. BVerfGE 30, 1 [18]). This means that if the Parliament confines itself to a few high-ranking legal interests when identifying the applicable legal interests and ascertaining if the damage that threatens them is extraordinarily high, the Parliament is not hindered from keeping the threshold for transfer relatively low. If the Parliament, on the contrary, considerably expands the catalogue of protected legal interests and also includes acts that show a low degree of threat in the success that is to be prevented, it must set a high threshold for transfer.

bb) The Parliament has not, in all respects, achieved this state of balance with regard to the elements of a criminal offence that justify the transfer of data. Certainly s. 3.5 in conjunction with s. 3.3 of the G 10 Act is not objectionable to the extent that it permits data transfer regarding persons against whom restrictions of telecommunications privacy pursuant to s. 2 of the G 10 Act have been ordered. To the contrary, the scope of the elements of a criminal offence is not sufficiently delimited with respect to suspicion related restrictions. This results from the interplay between the catalogues of relevant criminal offences, the factual basis for the suspicion of criminal offences and the duration of the threat to the legal interest.

This results in different consequences for the prevention of criminal offences on the one hand and for the resolution and prosecution of criminal offences on the other hand. These consequences spring from the fact that data transfer for the protection of legal interests can show different degrees of urgency. Whereas the prevention of criminal offences is part of the resistance to threats and is meant to protect the affected legal interest from threatening violation, i.e. is supposed to prevent success, the prosecution of criminal offences is aimed at the state sanctioning the violation of a legal interest that has already taken place and can no longer be prevented. If a telecommunications contact that is screened by the Federal Intelligence Service contains indications concerning the planning as well as the completion of criminal offences contained in the catalogue of s. 3.3(1) of the G 10 Act, this can, consequently, lead to a different legal assessment of a transfer carried out pursuant to s. 3.5 of the G 10 Act.

Because, in the case of the prosecution of a criminal offence, the violation of the legal interest has already taken place and the focus is now on sanctioning it, it is not justified to lower the threshold for the transfer of personal data that was obtained by means of encroachments upon telecommunications privacy pursuant to ss. 1 and 3 of the G 10 Act below the threshold that otherwise applies to encroachments upon telecommunications privacy pursuant to s. 100a of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung - stop) in crime prosecution. In the case of the transfer of the data collected by the Federal Intelligence Service, it appears necessary from the constitutional point of view, with regard to the fact that encroachment in this case is no less serious, to establish the requirement of a factual basis for the suspicion that corresponds to the one prescribed by s. 100a of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Otherwise, the number of holders of fundamental rights affected could not be kept within the bounds of what is reasonable. s. 3.3(1) of the G 10 Act does not comply with this requirement. It lowers the threshold for transfer below the bounds of what is reasonable by establishing that factual grounds for the suspicion that criminal offences have been committed are a sufficient standard for the transfer of data, a standard, however, which is considerably lower than that established by s. 100a of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

To the extent that the prevention of criminal offences is concerned, the regulation does not comply with the interests that are protected by the Basic Law. All in all, the following circumstances result in a marked imbalance to the detriment of the fundamental rights affected: (1) that factual grounds are sufficient for a suspicion; (2) that the planning phase is included in the consideration; and (3) that less serious criminal offences also justify the transfer of data. In particular, a result of the circumstances that factual grounds are connected with the planning of criminal offences is that the power to monitor sets in at very early, preliminary stages of the threatened violation of a legal interest, which results in lowering the degree of probability and the certainty of predictions. Another consequence is that the power to monitor may be based on relatively low requirements as regards the factual basis.

The provisions cannot be interpreted to be in accord with the Constitution because, on the one hand, the Parliament can remedy the unconstitutionality of the provisions in different ways. The Federal Constitutional Court must not anticipate such a solution. On the other hand, an interpretation of the provisions that is in accord with the Constitution would not be consistent with the requirement of specificity and clarity that the Basic Law places on provisions that permit the transfer of personal data obtained by an encroachment upon fundamental rights and the change of the objective for which this data may be used. The Parliament is obliged to create consistency with the Basic Law.

VII.

S. 3.7 of the G 10 Act is inconsistent with Article 10 of the Basic Law.

Certainly, the regulation is, in itself, not objectionable from a constitutional point of view. When considered on its own, the regulation obliges the receiving agencies to evaluate whether they need the data transferred pursuant to s. 3.5 of the G 10 Act for the objectives specified in s. 3.3 of the G 10 Act. This is a step of selection that corresponds to the step regulated in s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act. This step is meant to ensure, as established in ss. 3.3 and 3.5 of the G 10 Act, that the objective for which data is collected in a specific case is identified and that collecting data in this case is bound to this objective. Thus, it complies with the requirements of Article 10 of the Basic Law. Unlike s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act, the provision in s. 3.7(3) of the G 10 Act explicitly prohibits the further use of the data that is not needed but was not immediately destroyed due to the unreasonable effort this would involve. Moreover, fundamental rights interests, especially that of the freedom of the press, can be sufficiently protected within the framework of the concept of necessity that is established in s. 3.7(1) of the G 10 Act.

What is lacking, however, in this context as well as in the case of the corresponding powers of the Federal Intelligence Service, is the obligation to mark the data accordingly; the Parliament is to impose this obligation on the receiving agencies as a safety precaution in the context of binding the use of data to a specific objective. Without such an obligation, the data and information from transfers pursuant to the G 10 Act could be stored, after being examined for their relevance as established in s. 3.7 of the G 10 Act in such a way, or mix with other data and information, that their origin from a measure of strategic telecommunications monitoring is no longer recognisable. This would circumvent the restriction of use provided in s. 3.3 of the G 10 Act.

An interpretation consistent with the constitution is ruled out in this case as well. The Parliament is obliged to create consistency with the Basic Law.

VIII.

The provisions of s. 3.8(2) of the G 10 Act, which address the duty to inform the subject of telecommunication monitoring that such monitoring has taken place, is not consistent with the Basic Law.

1.

What applies in this context, however, is Article 10.2(1) of the Basic Law, which permits the restriction of telecommunications privacy for other objectives. Justification for such secrecy can include the risk that the disclosure of information or of methods applied, which are in the concrete case in question still to be kept secret, would jeopardise the fulfilment of the involved agency's mission (cf. BVerfGE 57, 250 [284]). Apart from the fulfilment of the involved agency's mission, overriding detriment to the good of the Federal Republic of Germany or to a Land (Federal state) that is to be expected if the affected person is informed, can, under certain circumstances, be taken into consideration as an opposing interest. In the intelligence service sector, this may be the case e.g. when foreign secret services are involved or in the field of counter intelligence (in this context, see the decision of the Oberverwaltungsgericht [Higher Administrative Court] of Berlin, NVwZ [Neue Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht] 1987, p. 817 [at p. 819]). The protection of informants can also be regarded as a legitimate interest that justifies the maintenance of secrecy (cf. BVerfGE 57, 250 [284]).

2. However, s. 3.8 (2) of the G 10 Act violates Article 10 and Article 19.4 of the Basic Law.

Pursuant to this regulation, notification of the measures restricting telecommunications privacy can be excused if the data has been destroyed by the Federal Intelligence Service or a receiving agency within three months after it was obtained. Thus, the regulation only focuses on the point in time when the data is deleted. For the decision whether or not to give notice to the subject of monitoring, it is not of importance what has happened to the data during the three month period. As the oral argument has shown, this results, in practice, in the monitored persons not being informed by the Federal Intelligence Service. Instead, the Federal Intelligence Service applies the regulation as if it established a duty to destroy data after three months.

Reasons of administrative practicability on which the regulation is based cannot justify such a far-reaching preclusion of the duty to give notice that telecommunications monitoring has taken place. It is true that, in view of the large number of screenings and in view of the fact that the material obtained largely proves irrelevant and is soon destroyed, there are legitimate reasons that justify withholding notification. The mere lapse of time, however, is not sufficient for justifying this, as it does not provide the assurance that within this period of time no further use has taken place.

As a general rule, it is the use to which collected data is put that constitutes the most grievous strain on a subject of telecommunications monitoring. Nonetheless, collecting the data itself constitutes an encroachment upon telecommunications privacy against which recourse to a court, in principle, must be possible. Under these circumstances, the fact that the affected person is not informed about the monitoring could, at most, be justified if the collected data was destroyed immediately, without further steps, as it was regarded as irrelevant. Without such a limitation, s. 3.8(2) of the G 10 Act thus restricts Article 10 and Article 19.4 of the Basic Law in a disproportionate manner.

As the provision can be made consistent with the fundamental rights by amending it, it is not to be declared void but is only to be declared inconsistent with the Basic Law. The Parliament is obliged to create consistency with the Basic Law.

IX.

However, the regulation on the preclusion of the recourse to a court in s. 9.6 of the G 10 Act is consistent with the Basic Law.

This regulation has its constitutional basis in Article 10.2(2) of the Basic Law. This sentence permits, in the case of restrictions on telecommunications privacy that serve to protect the free democratic basic order or the existence or the security of the Federal Republic of Germany or of a Land, the preclusion of the right to the recourse to a court if that right is replaced by a review of the case by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the parliament. The Federal Constitutional Court has declared this regulation, by which the 1968 constitutional amendment altered Article 10 of the Basic Law, consistent with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 30, 1 [26 et seq.]).

S. 9.6 of the G 10 Act keeps within the bounds of Article 10.2(2) of the Basic Law. The preclusion of the recourse to a court is limited to orders pursuant to s. 2 and s. 3.1 sentence 2 no. 1 of the G 10 Act and does not cover the threats specified in nos. 2-6 of this regulation. Parliamentary control is ensured by s. 9 of the G 10 Act. Apart from that, the persons affected do have recourse to a court, pursuant to s. 5.5(3) of the G 10 Act, after being informed of the measures restricting telecommunications privacy. s. 9.6 of the G 10 Act is declared to be inapplicable.

The question whether this also opens the recourse to a court in the cases of s. 2 and s. 3.1 sentence 2 no. 1 of the G 10 Act when the subjects of measures restricting telecommunications privacy have been informed is not important from the point of view of constitutional law. As regards the constitutional aspect, it is sufficient to state that when interpreting s. 5.5(3) of the G 10 Act, notifying the monitored person may not be made the prerequisite of opening the recourse to a court. Even if the person affected has learned about the monitoring of his or her telecommunications traffic from another source, he or she is free to take recourse to a court. The possibility of taking recourse to a court would be unnecessarily diminished if the person affected by monitoring would also have been in such cases dependent on information about the monitoring activity being provided.

X.

The regulations on the deletion of data in s. 3.6 and in ss. 3.7(2) and 3.7(3) as well as in s. 7.4 of the G 10 Act are also consistent with the Basic Law.

They comply with the requirement, which follows from Article 10 of the Basic Law, that data obtained by means of encroachments upon telecommunications privacy be deleted as soon as it is no longer needed for the objectives that justify the encroachment. It cannot be inferred that the regulations fall short of the required minimum protection of fundamental rights.

Nor can the regulations be criticised from the perspective of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law. The guarantee of recourse to a court, however, prohibits measures that undermine the protection afforded by this guarantee (cf. BVerfGE 69, 1 [49]). The duty to delete data that is no longer required must therefore, for those cases in which a judicial review of telecommunication monitoring conducted by the Federal Intelligence Service is possible, be coordinated with the guarantee of recourse to a court in such a way that this guarantee is not circumvented. The provisions, however, permit such an interpretation.

XI.

The provision of s. 9.2 (3) of the G 10 Act, which provides for the control of the monitoring measures by the Commission, is inconsistent with Article 10 of the Basic Law. It does not sufficiently ensure that the control covers the entire process of screening and utilisation of the data. Without such control, the challenged regulations that contain authorisations could not continue to exist. It is true that s. 9.2 (3) of the G 10 Act provides that the Commission decides about the permissibility and necessity of measures restricting telecommunications privacy. It is not clear, however, what is to be understood by measures restricting telecommunications privacy. The subsequent provision of s. 9.2 (4) of the G 10 Act, according to which the responsible Federal Minister is to immediately cancel any orders which the Commission declares impermissible or unnecessary, could be interpreted to mean that the authorisation to control only refers to the ministerial order.

Such a view, which is incompatible with Article 10 of the Basic Law, is not only in the range of possibility. Rather, the Federal government expressed exactly such an interpretation in a letter to the G 10 Commission dated 9 December 1996. In spite of its diverging interpretation of the law, the Commission accepted this view and has since refrained from controlling in the cases of ss. 3.3, 3.5, 3.6 and s. 3.8 of the G 10 Act. Due to the strict requirements placed on specificity when personal data is involved, the regulation therefore requires that the scope of its application be clarified. This clarification is to be made by the Parliament.

Moreover it must be ensured that the G 10 Commission, in view of the fact that the Fight against Crime Act has considerably expanded the Federal Intelligence Service's monitoring activities, is provided with the staff needed to effectively fulfil its mission. Moreover, it must be ensured that sufficient control exists also in the administrative sector on the level of the Länder (Federal states) level, as far as the data obtained by eliminating telecommunication privacy is transferred to Land (Federal state) authorities pursuant s. 3.5 of the G 10 Act.

XII.

To the extent that this judgment obliges the parliament to create consistency with the Basic Law, its time limit for doing so is 30 June 2001.

In the meantime, s. 3.1 sentence 2 no. 5 of the G 10 Act may only be applied if counterfeiting committed abroad results in a threat to monetary stability in the Federal Republic of Germany. s. 3.3 (2) of the G 10 Act is to be applied with the limitation that the personal data contained in the Commission's report to the Federal government is marked and that it remains bound to the objectives that justified the collection of the data in the first place. s. 3.4 of the G 10 Act is to be applied with the limitation that the personal data may be marked and may not be used for other objectives than those specified in s. 3.1 of the G 10 Act. S. 3.5 (1) in conjunction with s. 3.3 (1) of the G 10 Act is applicable with the limitation that personal data may only be transferred in accordance with the prerequisites of the temporary injunction order issued on 5 July 1995, and that a record of the transfer is kept. In this respect, the Federal Constitutional Court refrains from changing the present state of the law again only for the short transition period until a new regulation is enacted, although this means that in this transition period, the parts of the regulation that the Parliament can enact again in the framework of a new regulation without violating the Basic Law may not be applied. If, on the contrary, the provision that has been declared unconstitutional were to remain applicable until the enactment of the new regulation, transfers of data would be possible that violate fundamental rights. In the oral argument, no evidence was provided that the temporary injunction order resulted in considerable detriment to the Federal Republic of Germany in the past. This aspect was the one that tipped the balance in the weighing of consequences. If the Parliament regards the state of the law that is valid in the transition period as hardly tolerable, it is the duty of the Parliament to change this state of the law by quickly enacting a new regulation.

S. 3.7 of the G 10 Act is to be applied with the limitation that the data must be marked. S. 3.8 (2) of the G 10 Act is applicable with the limitation that no utilisation of the data has taken place before it is deleted. s. 9.2 (3) of the G 10 Act is applicable with the limitation that the Commission's power to control also extends to measures pursuant to ss. 3.3, 3.5, 3.6 and 3.8 of the G 10 Act.

XII. Freedom of Movement (within the Federal Territory) - Article 11 of the Basic Law

BVerfG, 17.12.2013, 1 BvR 3139/08, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20131217_1bvr313908en.html – "Garzweiler Lignite Strip-Mining"

Explanatory Annotation

Article 11 of the Basic Law has not played a huge role in the constitutional history of the Basic Law and the Constitutional Court has not had a lot of opportunities to deal with this provision. As explained above, the freedom of the individual to "move away" from the concrete space and, for example, not be barred by a (prison) door, is covered by Article 2.2 of the Basic Law. Article 11 protects the freedom of German citizens – not aliens - to take residence within the country wherever they choose without restriction or to stay where they are.[144] Article 11.2 explains when this right can be justifiably restricted, for example, to combat the dangers of an epidemic or in situations involving natural disasters. The Constitutional Court's decision in the "Garzweiler" Lignite Strip-Mining case, however, did provide an opportunity for the Court to elaborate on Article 11. The case arose in the context of administrative and planning decisions allowing a large lignite strip-mining operation which involved the devastation of several communities and the resettlement of their inhabitants. Affected persons saw a violation of the free movement guarantee of Article 11 because they were forced to move away as their settlement was destroyed. The applicants also claimed that Article 11, beyond the freedom of movement, also guarantees the right to a "homeland".[145] The Court disagrees on both counts.

5. The fundamental right to freedom of movement does not grant a right to take up residence and to remain in places in those parts of the Federation's territory where regulations on real estate or land use conflict with a permanent residence, as long as they apply generally and are not intended to specifically target the freedom of movement of certain persons or groups of persons.

145 The word "homeland" is used in the English translation provided by the Court. The German term is the word "Heimat". That word is indeed almost impossible to translate adequately. What is meant is not the "homeland" as in the US Department of Homeland Security, which stands for the territorial United States. The applicants describe what they mean by the word "Heimat" as an identity creating, sociocultural, territorially marked secure context where one chooses to take residence and builds to people and place. See BVerfG, 17.12.2013, 1 BvR 3139/08, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20131217_1bvr313908en.html, para. 46 (translation by the author; this paragraph was not part of the official translation and is hence only available in German).

The constitutional complaints are directed against government and judicial decisions in connection with the realisation of a project for an opencast lignite mine project in North Rhine-Westphalia. The complainant in proceedings 1 BvR 3139/08 challenges the approval of the framework operating plan for the Garzweiler I/II opencast mine, while the complainant in proceedings 1 BvR 3386/08 challenges a condemnation order against a property it owns. [1]

1. Lignite coal in Germany is mined in large opencast mines. The economically reasonable implementation of projects regularly necessitates making use of settled areas and thus also the resettlement of entire localities. By far the largest part of the lignite thus mined is used for generating electricity. Lignite's share of power generation in Germany has been greater than 20 per cent for years. [2]

[Excerpt from press release no. 76/2013 of 17 December 2013]

The complainant in proceedings 1 BvR 3139/08 owns a piece of land in the mining area, namely in the Immerath part of the town of Erkelenz. He lives in a house built on this land. His constitutional complaint challenges the official approval decision from the Düren Mining Office on the approval of the framework operating plan for the Garzweiler opencast mine of 22 December 1997, as well as the decisions by the authorities and administrative courts that affirmed that approval.

The approval of the framework operating plan for the Garzweiler I/II opencast mine does not interfere with the fundamental right to freedom of movement (1.) and consequently also does not violate the complainant's fundamental right to property (2.). [249]

1. The fundamental right to freedom of movement (a) does not protect the complainant against the need to surrender his residential property and relocate, as a consequence of the approval of the framework operating plan for the Garzweiler I/II opencast mine, because the scope of protection under Art. 11 sec. 1 GG does not extend to defending against state measures on the use of land that ultimately result in an involuntary surrender of one's place of residence (b). Nor does the fundamental right to freedom of movement confer an independent right to a homeland - however, that does not result in a gap in protection for those affected (c). This understanding of the fundamental right to freedom of movement ultimately also corresponds to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights (d). [250]

a) In acknowledgement of the free and self-determined organisation of one's own life, Art. 11 GG guarantees freedom of movement for all Germans within the entire federal territory. Through a free choice of their place of settlement and residence, it protects their planning and organisation of their own lives against interference from the state. [251]

aa) Historically, the fundamental right to freedom of movement goes back to the tradition of the freedom of movement that was reserved for free persons in the Middle Ages […]. The German constitutions of the 19th and early 20th centuries then guaranteed the right to freedom of movement for all citizens; at that time, it was closely associated with freedom of profession or occupation (cf. § 133 of the Constitution of 1849 drafted in St. Paul's Church (Paulskirchenverfassung) and Art. 111 of the Weimar Constitution, as well as § 1 of the Freedom of Movement Act of the North German Confederation of 1867 […]; likewise the first draft of a fundamental right to freedom of movement in the Parliamentary Council (Parlamentarischer Rat) […]). Irrespective of the guarantee of occupational freedom as an independent fundamental right under Art. 12 GG, the guarantee of the free choice of a place for settlement and residence in a differentiated society based on the division of labour is a fundamental condition for a free choice of occupation and for independently gaining one's own livelihood. However, irrespective of its connections with a choice of occupation, the fundamental right to freedom of movement also guarantees a free choice of place of settlement and residence as an expression of self-determined organisation of one's own life. It acknowledges the right, by one's own free decision, to travel generally without hindrance and without any official permit anywhere in the federal territory, and remain there. [252]

bb) Freedom of movement within the meaning of Art. 11 sec. 1 GG means the right to settle or reside anywhere within the federal territory (cf. BVerfGE 2, 266 <273>; 43, 203 <211>; 80, 137 <150>; 110, 177 <190 and 191>). This includes entering Germany for the purpose of taking up residence here (cf. BVerfGE 2, 266 <273>; 43, 203 <211>; 110, 177 <191>) as well as freedom of movement between federal states, between municipalities, and within a municipality (cf. BVerfGE 110, 177 <191>; see also BVerfGE 8, 95 <97>). [253]
The fundamental right to freedom of movement guarantees not only the freedom to move into a location in the federal territory, but the right to remain in the place chosen in one's exercise of the right to freedom of movement, and thus also generally protects against forced resettlements. […] [254]

The right to settle or reside anywhere in the federal territory could be undermined and rendered ineffective if the fundamental right did not also include the right to remain or live in the freely chosen place. Otherwise, citizens would have no constitutional protection, comparable to the right to move to a place, against being expelled from their chosen place by state measures immediately after exercising the right to freedom of movement. [255]

b) However, the fundamental right to freedom of movement does not grant a right to take up residence and to remain in places in those parts of the federal territory where regulations on real estate or land use conflict with a permanent residence, and thus already preclude or restrict taking up residence, or, if such regulations are established later, ultimately compel a person to move away. At least when they apply generally and are not intended to specifically target the freedom of movement of certain persons or groups of persons, such provisions do not fall within the scope of Art. 11 sec. 1 GG. [256]

aa) Article 11 sec. 1 GG in general confers a right to relocate and reside only in places where anyone can settle and reside. However, it does not confer an entitlement to establish and maintain the legal and factual requirements for permanent residence. The configuration of the legal requirements for the permissible land use associated with residence at a particular place therefore does not fundamentally affect the scope of protection of freedom of movement, but rather shapes the preconditions for exercising this fundamental right […]. The laws that thus structure the preconditions for exercising this fundamental right, include in case of the right to freedom of movement, which necessarily relies on the use of space, provisions on land use such as building codes, regional development laws, infrastructure planning laws, laws to protect nature and landscape, or - as in the instant case - mining law. [257]

This placement of regulations governing land use outside the scope of protection of the freedom of movement applies not only to restrictions on taking up residence, but also to those regulations that cause or even compel a person to move away or to leave a permanent residence. Just like the impediment to taking up residence under construction planning laws, expropriation of residential land for a planned subsequent infrastructure measure is a consequence of existing or changed conditions for exercising the right to freedom of movement, but it does not fall within the scope of protection of this fundamental right. […] [258]

bb) Both the article's legislative history ((1)) and its purpose of protection and system ((2)) support this interpretation of the right to freedom of movement. [259]

(1) The legislative history of Art. 11 GG shows that the debate about incorporating this fundamental right into the Basic Law, and about its configuration, was strongly shaped by the special challenges that West Germany faced in view of the large number of refugees in the American, British and French Occupation Zones, and the expectation of additional Germans intending to immigrate. This first of all concerned the question of whether under the conditions at that time it would even be possible to grant all Germans a right to freedom of movement (cf. the Third and Fifth Sessions of the Committee on Fundamental Questions, 21 and 29 September 1948 […]; Twentythird Session of the Committee on Fundamental Questions, 19 November 1948 […]; Forty-fourth Session of the Main Committee, 19 January 1949 […]). There are no in- dications in the documentation on Art. 11 GG that the right to freedom of movement, and its intentionally strict limiting provisions, were intended to significantly restrict the already existing and implemented legal possibilities for the planning and organisation of land use - for example by raising dams or building roads and railway tracks. On the contrary, the detailed discussion of the problem of restrictions at the Thirty-Sixth Session of the Committee on Fundamental Questions on 27 January 1949 […] strongly suggests the conclusion that the Parliamentary Council did not view an absence of the factual and legal conditions for taking up residence - for example, a lack of living space in a disaster area - as a restriction on the right to freedom of movement […]. [260]

(2) The fundamental right to freedom of movement unfolds its freedom-protecting intent by guaranteeing that all Germans have the possibility of moving from one location to another unhindered by state restrictions, and settling and residing there, whether for purposes of carrying out an occupation, or for other freely chosen reasons in the organisation their life. This freedom of movement is not reduced in its freedom-protecting intent by considering generally applicable rules for land use, and therefore does not need to be exempted from them. [261]

Article 11 sec. 1 GG does not guarantee that an intended settlement or taking of residence will be suitable or permissible under the land laws. If the general rules of land use or real estate, and their implementation, were to be understood as interference with the scope of protection of the fundamental right to freedom of movement, then in view of the narrow restrictions of Art. 11 sec. 2 GG a meaningful control of settlement development and other land use by means of the laws for regional development and construction planning, and the other instruments of spatially related planning, would scarcely be possible. The definition of the possibilities for restricting the right to freedom of movement in Art. 11 sec. 2 GG argues against understanding the scope of protection of Art. 11 sec. 1 GG to include the legal requirements for land use. Pursuant to Art. 11 sec. 2 GG , the right to freedom of movement may be restricted only by and pursuant to a law, and only in cases in which the absence of adequate means of support would result in a particular burden for the community, or in which such restriction is necessary to avert an imminent danger to the existence or the free and democratic basic order of the Federation or of a Land, to combat the danger of an epidemic, to respond to a grave accident or natural disaster, to protect young persons from serious neglect, or to prevent crime. None of the listed cases includes situations in which, based on space-relevant plans or other measures for land use taken by the state, the persons concerned are prevented from taking up residence in a certain place or compelled to abandon their home or change their place of residence. There is also no indication of any kind that major projects taking up space, or other space relevant plans, are no longer permissible or should be intolerably impeded under the Basic Law. [262]

c) Article 11 sec. 1 GG does not guarantee an independent right to a homeland (Recht auf Heimat) in the sense of the urban and social environment permanently associated with a chosen residence […]. [263]

In view of the consequences of flight and expulsion, the Parliamentary Council deliberately declined to include an independent right to a homeland in the Basic Law (cf. Forty-second Session of the Main Committee, 18 January 1949 […]). If a chosen and occupied residence has a special quality for its occupant, which might have consolidated over time, with regard to the associated social contacts and ties within the geographic environment, and the residence being rooted in a specific urban context, the right to reside ensuing from Art. 11 sec. 1 GG gains more importance - if the protection of this fundamental right applies at all (see b above). Extensive resettlements in particular, such as the one required for large-scale opencast mining, impose extraordinary burdens on established social relations and local and regional ties, because they can result in the disappearance of entire communities, including all of their buildings and infrastructure. All of this must duly be taken into account when reviewing the proportionality of an interference with the fundamental right to freedom of movement, or, if its protection does not apply, the otherwise affected fundamental right (see 2. a below). [264]

d) A constitutional gap in protection for the persons affected arises neither because the Basic Law does not provide an independent right to a homeland, nor because the fact that a person is forced to abandon his or her residence or home due to real estate measures or land use regulations does not render the protection of Art. 11 sec. 1 GG applicable. The affected persons' particular hardships resulting from the loss of social, regional and urban ties, can be considered in the context of the fundamental rights protection under Art. 14 secs. 1 and 3 GG, insofar as interferences with the right to property are concerned (see 2. a below), and otherwise under Art. 2 sec. 1 GG. [265]

e) This interpretation of Art. 11 GG does not conflict with the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. That court viewed the resettlements occasioned by the Horno opencast lignite mine as an interference with both the right to respect for private and family life under Art. 8 ECHR and the right to freedom of movement enshrined in Protocol No. 4 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (cf. ECtHR, decision of 25 May 2000 - Complaint no. 46346/ 99 (Noack) -, Landes- und Kommunalverwaltung - LKV 2001, p. 69 <71 and 72>). In accordance with the limiting provisions stipulated in Protocol No. 4 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which are less strict than those in Art. 11 sec. 2 GG, the European Court of Human Rights held that this interference was justified. Ultimately this does not conflict with the Federal Constitutional Court's interpretation that on the basis of the strict limiting provisions under Art. 11 sec. 2 GG, the protection of the fundamental right to freedom of movement does not apply, however, that protection against the special burdens caused by resettlement measures is provided primarily through Art. 14 or Art. 2 sec. 1 GG (see 2. a below). The European Convention on Human Rights and its interpretation by the European Court of Human Rights must be used to assist in interpreting the fundamental rights and the principles of the rule of law established by the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <315 et seq.>; 128, 326 <366 et seq.>; 131, 268 <295 and 296>). Using this aid of interpretation does not demand a schematic parallelisation of the terms of the Basic Law with those of the European Convention on Human Rights, but rather an incorporation of their values, to the extent that this is methodologically justified and compatible with the requirements of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <315 et seq.>; 128, 326 <366 et seq.>; 131, 268 <295>). [266]

XIII. Freedom of Occupation - Article 12 of the Basic Law

1. Pharmacy, BVerfGE 7, 377

Explanatory Annotation

The "Pharmacy-decision" of the Constitutional Court is one of the early classics of the Court and a "must-know"-judgment for every law student in Germany. The reason for this is that the Court in this early (1958) decision set the standards for the occupational freedom protected in Article 12 of the Basic Law and also developed a detailed and somewhat specific three pronged proportionality test to be applied for any governmental authority impacting on this freedom of Article 12 of the Basic Law. It should also not be overlooked that the decision with its emphasis on individual freedom had a significant impact on the structure of the business world in Germany.

Until this judgment the operation of pharmacies in Germany, albeit being run as private businesses, required special authorization by the relevant authorities, which was only granted if the opening of a new pharmacy was deemed to be in the public interest, economically sound and with no negative impact on the economic soundness of neighbouring pharmacies. This was thought to be necessary so as to maintain a functioning network of pharmacies that were economically able to provide the level of service prescribed by law, for example pertaining to the stocking of a great number of medications at any given time.

The Court regarded this strictly needs-based and administratively-determined access quota to the occupation of a self-employed pharmacist as unconstitutional. It construed the freedom of occupation as a right, protecting the access to and free choice of an otherwise legal occupation and as a right protecting the exercise of this occupation. Article 12.1-2 of the Basic Law contains limitation language pertaining to the exercise or practice of an occupation only. On the basis of this the Court developed its famous three-pronged proportionality test. Government regulations of this exercise or practice, being authorized by the Basic Law, are on the lowest level and require only plausible reasoning and proportionality. Governmental restrictions on the access to a profession, however, must meet stricter proportionality standards. The Court differentiated subjective and objective access rules. Subjective access rules place a requirement on the person wishing to enter this profession such as passing a certain exam or possessing a certain qualification. It is in the hands of the person wishing to enter a profession so regulated to fulfil such subjective criteria. The test for these subjective access rules is a slightly stricter version of proportionality where the government must show that the subjective access rules are really necessary for an orderly exercise of the profession. The most serious interference is created by objective access rules, i.e. governmental regulation that places conditions on access to a profession, which cannot be fulfilled by the person seeking entry. Access quotas would be a good example or the specific access rules of economic soundness and non-interference with neighbouring businesses, as was the case in this decision. Such objective access rules can only be justified if they serve to protect against grave and real risks to an eminently important public interest. In the case at issue, the eminently important public interest was public health and the protection of functioning pharmacies as part of the public health protection system. The Court, however, did not accept that the objective restriction to the profession of self-employed pharmacist was necessary to achieve this goal.

The decision did have significant impact in the economic sector. However, not all professions are always measured by the same yardstick. The exclusive and legally very interesting institution of the German notary[146], for example, still today has many parallels with the pre 1958 pharmacist's situation. However, more than 50 years later the objective restrictions in some parts of Germany still stand.

Headnotes:

1. Article 12.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) does not proclaim free enterprise to be an objective principle of the social and economic order, but guarantees the fundamental right of the individual to engage in any legal activity as an occupation or profession even if that activity does not correspond to a traditionally or legally defined "occupational profile".

2. The term "occupation or profession" in Article 12.1 of the Basic Law also includes in principle those activities that are reserved to the state as well as "governmentally regulated" occupations and professions. However, Article 33 of the Basic Law provides and permits a wide range of special conditions for occupations and professions that qualify as "public services".

3. If an activity can be exercised in the form of self-employment or non-self-employment and both forms of employment are of equal social weight, the choice of the one or the other of the two forms of occupational or professional activity and the transition from one to the other then constitutes a choice of occupation or profession within the meaning of Article 12.1 of the Basic Law.

4. The content and scope of the regulatory power of the legislature under Article 12.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law can be determined rather objectively simply on the basis of an interpretation that takes into account the purpose of the fundamental right and its importance in the context of society; reference to the provision governing restriction of the essence of the fundamental rights (Article 19.2 of the Basic Law) is then not necessary.

5. The regulatory power alluded to in Article 12.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law covers both the exercise and choice of an occupation or profession, but not to the same extent. This power pertains to the practice of occupations and professions and may only under that aspect also encroach upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession. As far as substantive content is concerned, the more the exercise of an occupation or profession is involved, the greater the latitude; the more the choice of an occupation or profession is involved, the less.

146 There are historically three principal models for notaries in Germany. The "Prussian" model prevalent mainly in northern Germany works with subjective access rules and is hence in principle open to any lawyer. The "Bavarian" model works with objective access restrictions by allowing only for a certain number of notaries per notary district. Finally there is also the institution of the public notary as a civil servant in some pockets of southwestern Germany.

6. The fundamental right is intended to protect the freedom of the individual and the reservation of regulatory power is intended to ensure adequate protection of public interests. As regards encroachment by the legislature, the necessity of doing justice to both requirements entails making distinctions, for example, on the basis of the following principles:

    a) The freedom to practice an occupation or profession may be restricted if reasonable considerations of public interest would seem to warrant such restriction; the protection afforded by the fundamental right is limited to a defense against requirements of law that are unconstitutional because they represent an excessive burden and are unreasonable.

    b) The freedom to choose an occupation or profession may be restricted only insofar as compellingly required to protect especially important public interests. If such encroachment is unavoidable, the legislature must consistently choose that form of encroachment that limits the fundamental right the least.

    c) In the case of the encroachment upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession through the imposition of specific conditions for commencement of the practice of an occupation or profession, it is necessary to distinguish between subjective and objective prerequisites: in the case of subjective prerequisites (in particular education and training), the principle of proportionality applies in the sense that the prerequisites may not be disproportionate to their intended purpose, which is to ensure that the occupational activity is properly exercised . The standard of proof for the necessity of objective prerequisites for admission to practice must be especially stringent; in general, such measures can be justified only if required to avert dangers to a public interest of overriding importance that have been demonstrated to exist or are extremely likely to occur.

    d) Regulations permitted by Article 12.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law must consistently be implemented at the "level" that entails the least encroachment upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession; the legislature may not move to the next "level" until it can be demonstrated with a high degree of certainty that the feared dangers cannot be effectively averted through (constitutional) means at the lower "level".

7. The Federal Constitutional Court must establish whether the legislature has respected the restrictions on its regulatory power that follows from the above; when the freedom to choose an occupation or profession is encroached upon by objective prerequisites for admission to practice, the Court may also establish whether this specific form of encroachment is compellingly required to protect a public interest of overriding importance.

8. In the area of law pertaining to pharmacies, only the freedom of establishment, which is understood to mean the absence of an objective restriction of admission to practice, is currently consistent with the Basic Law.

Order of the First Senate of 11 June 1958 - 1 BvR 596/56 -

Facts:

The complainant had been a licensed pharmacist since 1940; in 1956, he applied for issuance of an operating permit for the purposes of opening a pharmacy in the municipality of Traun-reut in Upper Bavaria. The application was rejected on the basis of the Bavarian Pharmacy Act (Bayerisches Apothekengesetz - BayApothekenG), which in its then current version required that a permit be obtained to operate a pharmacy. In order for an operating permit to be issued, the applicant had to be in any case licensed, be a German citizen within the meaning of Article 116 of the Basic Law, have been active as a licensed pharmacist for a certain period of time and be personally reliable and suitable. In addition, Article 3.1 of the Pharmacy Act required as conditions for issuance of an operating permit

"a) that the establishment of the pharmacy for the purposes for ensuring provision of the population with pharmaceuticals lie in the public interest and

b) that it be possible to assume that its economic base is secure and that it will not compromise the economic base of the neighbouring pharmacy to such an extent that the prerequisites for the proper operation of that pharmacy are no longer guaranteed."

The authority gave as the reason for its refusal to issue the operating permit that the needs of the local population were completely covered by the pharmacy already established in the municipality. The authority claimed that the establishment of the pharmacy did therefore not lie in the public interest (Article 3.1.a of the Pharmacy Act). In addition, it was stated, the economic base of the new pharmacy would not be secured and that of the existing pharmacy also threatened (Article 3.1.b of the Pharmacy Act).

The constitutional complaint challenging the negative decisions of the authority and, indirectly, Article 3.1 of the Pharmacy Act was successful.

B. IV.

The question as to whether Article 3.1 of the Pharmacy Act is compatible with Article 12.1 of the Basic Law requires consideration of various fundamental aspects in respect of the importance of this provision of the Basic Law.

1. Article 12.1 protects the freedom of citizens in an area that is especially important to a modern society based on the division of labour: it guarantees individuals the right to pursue any activity for which they consider themselves suitable as an "occupation or profession," i.e., as the basis for their conduct of life. It involves a fundamental right, and not - as, for example, in

Article 151.3 of the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Verfassung - WV) - a proclamation of "free enterprise" as an objective principle of the social and economic order. Individuals are guaranteed more than the freedom to operate their own business. The purpose of the fundamental right is indeed to protect economically meaningful work, but such work is also viewed as an "occupation or profession", i.e., in its relationship to the overall personality of human beings, which is fully formed and completed only through the fact that human beings devote themselves to activities that constitute their life's work and the basis for their lives and through which they at the same time contribute to the total social product. The fundamental right thus assumes importance for all social classes; as an "occupation or profession," work has the same value and the same dignity for everyone.

2. When the fundamental right is viewed in this light, a broad definition of the term "occupation or profession" is called for. It encompasses not only all occupations and professions that can be described in terms of specific "occupational profiles" that are defined by custom or law, but also atypical (admissible) activities freely chosen by individuals that may in turn also result in the establishment of new occupational profiles (In principle also BVerwGE 2, 89 [92]; 4, 250 [254-255]).

Occupations and professions involving activities that must, because of current notions as regards the organization of the community be reserved primarily to the state, are also covered by Article 12.1, in any case in the sense that they may also be freely chosen as occupations or professions by individuals and no one may be forced to choose them or prohibited from doing so. There is no reason to assume that the fundamental right does not "because of its nature" apply to such occupations and professions, as did the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht) (BVerwGE 2, 85 [86]; 4, 250 [254]). However, Article 33 of the Basic Law contains and permits extensive special provisions for all occupations that represent "public services". They stem from the nature of the situation; the number of employment positions (and therefore in extreme cases under certain circumstances the actual impossibility of choosing the occupation for certain individuals) is in this case determined exclusively by the organizational powers (in the broadest sense) of the respective public law entity involved. The degree of freedom for individuals to choose an occupation or profession that therefore results is guaranteed by equal eligibility for all public offices for those who are equally qualified (Article 33.2 of the Basic Law).

"Governmentally regulated" occupations are possible and exist in many forms. They are also covered by Article 12.1.The answer to the question as to where such occupations should be situated between "free" professions, which are subject to certain regulatory requirements, and occupations that are completely integrated directly into the organization of the state will depend upon the nature and importance of the public functions to be fulfilled. The closer an occupation or profession is to "public service" due to regulatory controls and requirements, the greater the possibility that special provisions may in fact roll back the effect of the fundamental right contained in Article 12.1 by virtue of Article 33 of the Basic Law. The operating latitude of the legislature need not be examined more closely here since the Bavarian provision is consistent with the general situation as regards pharmacies in Germany (see BVerfGE 5, 25) - and despite certain regulatory requirements is in terms of its structure a provision that governs trade or business activity.

Article 12.1 makes no distinction between self-employment and non-self-employed professions; non-self-employment can also be chosen as an occupation or profession and this is in fact becoming increasingly common in modern society. If an activity can be exercised in the form of self-employment or non-self-employment and both forms of employment are of equal social weight, the choice of the one or the other of the two forms of occupational activity and the transition from one to the other then constitutes a choice of occupation or profession within the meaning of Article 12.1 of the Basic Law. This applies to the profession of pharmacists; self-employed pharmacists operate enterprises that constitute the basis of their economic existence, and non-self-employed pharmacists work for such enterprises. The general public and the members of the profession themselves are of the opinion that various "occupations" exist within the "pharmacist" profession; membership in one is not merely a preparatory and transitional phase for entry into the other. It is therefore necessary in the end to concur with the Federal Administrative Court (BVerwGE 4, 167 [170]) that the transition from the activity of an employed pharmacist to that of a self-employed pharmacist constitutes an act of choosing an occupation that is covered by the protection of Article 12.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

3. The decisive aspects of the content and scope of the regulatory power of the ordinary legislature under Article 12.1 sentence 2 can be inferred from the general importance of Article 12.1 as presented above.

a) If free enterprise were the only principle that is constitutionally established in Article 12.1, it would have been only natural to implement this principle simply in connection with a general reservation of legislative power and guarantee free enterprise - as in the case of the Weimar Constitution - "pursuant to a law." The legislature would then, to be sure, also be bound by the principle, but could make provision for exceptions that seem proper and desirable within the context of its general economic policy. In view of the complexity of the modern economy, this would likely mean the tendency that has already long been prevalent towards restriction of completely free enterprise that originated during the early liberal period would be more pronounced. It would not be possible to object to this on constitutional grounds.

   The scope of discretion of the legislature becomes much narrower if one proceeds from the assumption that a real fundamental right of the individual citizen is involved here, that is also a fundamental right that in terms of the idea behind it is closely related to the development of human personality and which therefore is also in practical terms of paramount importance for the overall conduct of life of every individual - in contrast to those fundamental rights that serve only to protect against occasional isolated encroachments by public powers. In this case, effective protection of this fundamental right requires in principle that narrow limits be imposed on statutory encroachments.

   It is of course necessary to note that legislative discretion may be restricted only when it deals with the protection of fundamental rights. The Basic Law is in terms of economic policy neutral in that the legislature may pursue any economic policy it considers proper as long as it respects the Basic Law and in particular the fundamental rights (BVerfGE 4, 7 [17-18]). A statute enacted under Article 12.1 sentence 2 may therefore also not be objected to on constitutional grounds because it happens to conflict with the rest of governmental economic policy or because it is not consistent with a specific economic doctrine underlying such general economic policy and of course even less so if the judge does not approve of the interpretation of economic policy manifested in that statute.

The legislature is subject to limitations only where they must be imposed on the basis of the fundamental right, i.e., on the basis of the correct interpretation thereof. The practical difficulty lies in the reconciliation of the freedom of discretion of the legislature that must be preserved in the area of economic, social and employment policy with the protection of the freedom to which, especially as regards the legislature, each individual also has a constitutional right.

b) If the regulatory possibilities of the legislature in the area protected by the fundamental right are examined on the basis of the definition contained in the Basic Law itself, the wording of Article 12.1 could be construed to indicate that the practice of an occupation or profession is subject to statutory regulation whereas the choice of an occupation or profession is completely beyond the reach of such regulation. This can, however, not be the intent of this provision. For it is not possible to separate the terms "choice" and "practice" when used in respect of an occupation or profession so that each refers only to a specific temporal phase of occupational or professional life that does not coincide with the other; indeed, the commencement of an occupational or professional activity represents not only the beginning of the practice of an occupation or profession, but also the choice of an occupation or profession, which is manifested precisely in the commencement of such activity - and frequently only therein; likewise, the intention of remaining in an occupation or profession that is expressed in the ongoing exercise of that activity and finally voluntary termination of such occupational or professional activity are basically at the same time acts of choice. The two terms describe the same complex of "occupational or professional activity" from different perspectives (Similarly Klein-v. Mangoldt note IV 2 [370 et seq.] on Article 12 following Über Freiheit des Berufs, Hamburg 1952).

As a result, an interpretation that would prohibit absolutely every form of encroachment upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession on the part of the legislature cannot be correct; it would not correspond to the reality of life and would therefore also not yield lucid conclusions as regards the legal issues involved. Furthermore, a provision of law that would seem to regulate primarily the practice of an occupation or profession is in principle admissible even if it has an indirect effect on the freedom to choose an occupation or profession. This occurs especially when conditions are established for the assumption of an occupational or professional activity, i.e., the commencement of the practice of an occupation or profession, in other words when commencement of the practice of an occupation or profession is made contingent upon admission. Article 74 no. 19, which justifies the authority to regulate "admission" to certain occupations and professions, shows that it was not intended to have the Basic Law exclude absolutely all admission requirements. The historical development also shows the intention was to avoid authority to restrict admission in principle, but that there was on the other hand no intention of declaring the numerous existing restrictions on admission inadmissible in general (Member of the Bundestag v. Mangoldt at the 5th and 23rd sessions of the Committee for Policy Issues [Ausschuss für Grundsatzfragen] on 29 September and 19 November 1948).

The framers of the Basic Law did not in this case, however, completely succeed in objective and terminological resolution of the issues involved; they ultimately chose a formulation that derives from the distinction commonly made between "choice" and "practice" in legislation governing trade or business and otherwise deliberately left regulation "largely" to the legislature (see Jahrb. d. öff. Rechts [new version] vol. 1 pp. 134, 136).

It is for the most part assumed in the case law and scholarly literature that the regulatory power pursuant to Article 12.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law pertains to the practice and choice of occupation and professions in the sense elaborated above (see, for example, Hamel DVBl. 1958 p. 37 and the documentation indicated therein); for both the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof) and the Federal Administrative Court are of the opinion that the legislature may make the practice of certain occupations and professions subject to permission - in the form of "admission" - and require fulfilment of certain specific conditions for the issuance of such permission see, for example, BVerwGE 4, 167 [169]; 4, 250 [255]; German Federal Court of Justice in the opinions, "Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Criminal Cases" (Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen - BGHSt). 4, 385 [391]; 7, 394 [399]).

In that respect Article 12.1 is a uniform fundamental right (to "occupational freedom"), in any case in the sense that the reservation of regulatory power in sentence 2 covers "in principle" both the practice and the choice of occupations or professions. This does not mean, however, that the powers of the legislature as regards each of these two "phases" of occupational or professional activity are equally extensive in terms of their substantive content. For the intention of the Basic Law, which is clearly expressed by the wording of Article 12.1, is to guarantee the "free" choice of an occupation or profession, while permitting regulation of practice, and this must always be respected. This can follow only from an interpretation based on the assumption that the regulatory power does not apply to both "phases" with the same objective intensity; in fact, the more the legislature encroaches upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession, the less latitude it enjoys. This interpretation is also consistent with the basic concepts embodied in the Basic Law and the underlying image of man (BVerfGE 2, 1 [12]; 4, 7 [15-16]; 6, 32 [40]). The choice of an occupation or profession constitutes an act of self-determination and a decision based on the free will of the individual; it must remain to the greatest extent possible free from encroachment by the public powers. Individuals have a direct effect on society when they practice an occupation or profession; they may therefore in this regard be subjected to restrictions in the interest of other individuals and society as a whole.

To summarize: the regulatory power covers both the practice and choice of occupations and professions. However, this power exists in respect of the practice of an occupation or profession and may only under that aspect also encroach upon the freedom of choice of an occupation or profession. As far as substantive content is concerned, the more the exercise of an occupation or profession is involved, the greater the latitude; the more the choice of an occupation or profession is involved, the less, it is.

c) In respect of the substantive content of the regulatory power that is described in such general terms as regards its purview, it is first necessary to clarify the meaning of the term "regulate," in particular in connection with the freedom to choose an occupation or profession. It cannot mean that the legislature has on the whole broader latitude for discretionary judgment than that otherwise allowed by a general reservation of legislative power and may regulate the entire area of employment law to a greater extent, thereby constitutively establishing the substantive content of the fundamental right in the first place (according to Scheuner, Handwerksordnung und Berufsfreiheit [reprint from "Deutsches Handwerksblatt"], 1956, for example, pp. 21, 27-28, 31, and Ipsen, Apothekenerrichtung und Article 12 GG, 1957, pp. 41-42).

If such an opinion were to prevail, the fundamental right would be debased since its substantive content would be left entirely to the discretion of the legislature although the legislature itself is bound by the fundamental right (Article 1.3 of the Basic Law). This would not be in keeping with the importance of precisely this fundamental right, would hardly be consistent with the specific (pleonastic) emphasis on the "free" choice of occupation or profession in Article 12.1 and would also be incompatible with the general tenor of the section on fundamental rights, which as the Federal Constitutional Court set forth in its decision of 16 January 1957 (BVerfGE 6, 32 [40-41]) no longer recognizes "empty" fundamental rights in the former sense. Moreover, when the legislature operates in the area protected by fundamental rights, the principle elaborated in the decision of 15 January 1958 (BVerfGE 7, 198 [208-209]) to the effect that the legislature must take as the basis for its regulatory acts the importance of the fundamental right within the social order also applies here. The legislature does not freely determine the substantive content of the fundamental right, but, rather, a substantive limit to legislative discretion may follow from the substantive content of the fundamental right. A clear substantive value based decision of the Basic Law for a concrete important area of life also exists in Article 12.1; the legislature does not therefore enjoy as much freedom in this case as, for example, in the case of application of the general equality provision, which represents a principle of law that applies to the public powers in general and the concrete substantive content of which remains to be established by the legislature for specific life situations on the basis of the relevant applicable aspects of justice.

On the other hand, "regulate" does not mean that the legislature may not restrict the fundamental right in any way. In principle, every regulation also involves making limits visible. But the obviously deliberate use of the term "regulate" by the framers of the Basic Law instead of "restrict," which is otherwise usual in the provisions governing fundamental rights, indicates that more specific prescription of the limits from within is meant, i.e., of the limits inherent in the nature of the fundamental right itself rather than limits through which the legislature itself might determine the substantive content of the fundamental right, namely, by narrowing the natural sphere of operation based on rational interpretation from without.

d) The fundamental right is intended to protect the freedom of the individual and the reservation of regulatory power is intended to ensure adequate protection of public interests. As was shown, the more the individual's right to freely choose an occupation or profession is called into question, the stronger is the effect of the individual's right to freedom; the greater the disadvantages and dangers that could arise for the public from complete freedom as regards the exercise of an occupation or profession, the more urgent is the need to protect the public interest. If an attempt is made to do justice in the most effective manner possible to both of these requirements, which are equally legitimate in a social constitutional state, a solution can be found only by carefully balancing the importance of the respective opposing and possibly even conflicting interests. Assuming at the same time that the free human personality is the supreme value from the overall perspective of the Basic Law and that it must therefore also be afforded maximum freedom as regards the choice of an occupation or profession, it then follows that this freedom may be restricted only insofar as is absolutely necessary in the public interest.

Accordingly, the Basic Law requires that certain distinctions be made in the case of encroachment on the part of the legislature on the basis of principles that may be summarized as described below:

The freedom to practice an occupation or profession may be restricted by way of "regulation" if reasonable considerations of public interest would seem to warrant such restriction. The freedom to choose an occupation or profession may on the other hand be restricted only insofar as compellingly required to protect especially important ("overriding") public interests, i.e.: insofar as such protection involves interests that after careful consideration must be accorded precedence over the individual's right to freedom and insofar as such protection cannot be ensured otherwise, namely, through means that restrict the freedom of choice of occupation or profession either not at all or less so. In the event that such encroachment upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession is unavoidable, the legislature must consistently choose that form of encroachment that least restricts the fundamental right.

Several "levels" as it were exist as regards the scope of regulatory power:

> the legislature has most freedom when it regulates only the practice of an occupation or profession without affecting the freedom to choose that occupation or profession and furthermore only specifies in detail the nature and manner in which the members of an occupation or profession must conduct their occupational or professional activities. Considerable latitude exists here for taking into account aspects of a practical nature; such aspects serve to determine what conditions members of an occupation or profession must meet in order to avert disadvantages and dangers to the general public. The desire to promote an occupation or profession and thereby increase the total social product of its members may also justify certain provisions that restrict the freedom to practice an occupation or profession. The protection afforded by the fundamental right is therefore limited to a defense against requirements of law that are unconstitutional because they represent an excessive burden and are unreasonable; apart from these exceptions, the > impairment of freedom of occupation or profession at issue here does not excessively affect those protected by this basic right since they are already in practice and their license to practice is not affected.

On the other hand, a regulation that makes commencement of the practice of an occupational or professional activity dependent upon fulfilment of specific conditions and thereby affecting the freedom of choice of occupation or profession, can be justified only insofar as it is intended to protect an overriding public interest that takes precedence over the freedom of the individual. In this context, it obviously makes an important difference - which has also long been emphasized in the case law and the scholarly literature (see Scheuner op. cit. p. 25 and documentation cited) - whether "subjective" prerequisites for admission to practice are involved, especially as regards education and training, or objective conditions that have nothing to do with personal qualifications and are beyond the control of the candidate.

The regulation of subjective prerequisites for commencement of the practice of an occupation or profession is inherent to the legal order governing that occupation or profession; it allows only candidates who meet certain qualifications, most of which are certainly of a formal nature, access to an occupation or profession. Such restriction is legitimate due to the nature of the matter at issue; it is based on the fact that many occupations and professions require specific technical knowledge and skills (in the widest sense of the term) that can be acquired only through theoretical and practical training and that the exercise or proper exercise of such occupations and professions without such knowledge would be impossible or inappropriate or, indeed, would entail dangers for the general public. The legislature only renders concrete and "formalizes" this exigency, which follows from a given life situation; that which is expected of the individual in the form of mandatory formal training is only something that such an individual would in principle actually have to accept anyway by reason of the matter involved in order to exercise the occupation or profession properly. This restriction of freedom therefore represents an adequate means for avoidance of potential disadvantages and dangers; it is also not unreasonable since it applies equally to all candidates for the occupation or profession and is known to them beforehand, which means that each individual can judge prior to choosing an occupation or profession whether he or she will be able to fulfil the required conditions. In this case, the principle of proportionality applies in the sense that the mandatory subjective prerequisites may not be disproportionate to their intended purpose, which is to ensure the proper exercise of the occupational or professional activity.

The situation is different when objective conditions must be met for admission to an occupation or profession. Fulfilment of such conditions is completely beyond the control of the individual. They run absolutely counter to the spirit of the fundamental right since even those who have already in fact chosen and were allowed to choose an occupation or profession through fulfilment of all required conditions may still be excluded from admission to the respective occupation or profession. The longer and more specialized the education and training, i.e., the more obviously the choice of such training also represents a choice of a specific occupation or profession, the more > important this restriction of freedom becomes and accordingly the more serious its effect. Since the immediate disadvantages for the general public that result from the practice of an occupation or profession by professionally and morally qualified candidates are also not readily obvious, it is often not possible to clearly demonstrate the existence of a causal relationship between this restriction of the freedom of choice of occupation or profession and the desired effect. The danger that irrelevant motives may become involved is therefore especially great; in particular, it is only natural to suspect that the restriction of access to an occupation or profession is intended to protect those already in practice from competition, could be a motive that is generally felt could never justify encroachment upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession. Apart from a possible conflict with the principle of equality, it is possible to violate an individual's right to freedom in an especially egregious manner through the choice of this most primitive and most radical means of excluding candidates who are (presumptively) professionally and morally completely suitable. It follows from this that the necessity of such a restriction of freedom must meet especially stringent standards of proof; in general, such encroachment upon the freedom of choice of an occupation or profession is legitimate only if required to avert dangers to a public interest of overriding importance that have been demonstrated to exist or are extremely likely to occur; the desire to promote other public interests or preservation of the social prestige of an occupation or profession through limitation of the number of members does not suffice even if such goals would otherwise justify legislative action.

> The legislature must implement regulations permitted under Article 12.1 sentence 2 at the "level" that entails the least encroachment upon the freedom to choose an occupation or profession and may proceed to the next "level" only when it can be proven with a high degree of probability that the feared dangers cannot be effectively combated with (constitutional) means at the preceding lower "level."

4. The Federal Court of Justice and the Federal Administrative Court also want to limit the legislature's freedom to establish objective conditions for admission by statute; however, they infer these limits exclusively from the provision contained in Article 19.2 of the Basic Law although they are not in agreement as regards the interpretation thereof (see Hamel DVBl. 1958 pp. 37 [38] and the documentation cited therein).

Viewed from the position taken here, the questions as to whether the prohibition of infringement of the substantive content of the fundamental rights would result in the imposition of further limits on the regulatory power of the legislature under Article 12.1 sentence 2 and what they might be like in detail can be ignored. For it follows from the above that an interpretation that takes into account the purpose of the fundamental right and its importance in the context of social life leads to an appropriate restriction of the regulatory power of the legislature.

5. The restrictions of regulatory power that follow from consideration of the fundamental right are substantive constitutional commandments that are directed primarily at the legislature itself. However, the Federal Constitutional Court monitors compliance with these commandments. When a restriction of the freedom of choice of occupation or profession at the "last level" (that of objective conditions for admission) is at issue, the Federal Constitutional Court must therefore initially determine whether an overriding public interest is threatened and whether the provision of law can even serve to avert this danger in the first place. The Court must, however, also determine whether precisely this specific form of encroachment is compellingly required to protect that interest, in other words, whether the legislature could not have provided this protection through regulation at a preceding level.

It has been objected that review in the latter direction exceeds the authority of a court: it is argued that a court cannot appreciate whether a specific legislative measure is appropriate since it cannot know whether other equally effective means exist and whether they are amenable to implementation by the legislature and that this can be determined only if all life circumstances to be regulated are known, including political possibilities of legislation. This position, which its advocates would primarily for practical considerations use to impose narrow limits on the powers of review of the Federal Constitutional Court, is occasionally supported in theory by asserting that the Court would encroach upon the sphere of the legislature and thereby violate the principle of the separation of powers by claiming such extensive powers of review.

The Federal Constitutional Court cannot concur in this view.

The Court is charged with protecting the fundamental rights against the legislature. When limits upon the legislature follow from the interpretation of a fundamental right, the Court must be able to oversee compliance with such limits; it may not evade this responsibility if it wants to avoid invalidating the fundamental rights to a great extent in practice and depriving the function assigned to it by the Basic Law of its actual purpose.

The requirement that is often set forth in this context to the effect that the legislature must be free to choose from among several equally suitable means would fail to address the specific problem that is at issue here. It refers to the (usual) case of a fundamental right that involves no areas of protection that contain multiple levels (as, for example, in BVerfGE 2, 266). In this case, the legislature may, however, freely choose - within certain limits - among several equally suitable legal measures since they all pertain to the uniform substantive content of the same fundamental right without multiple levels. However, when dealing with a fundamental right that embodies areas of lesser and greater protection of a freedom, it must then in any case be possible for the Federal Constitutional Court to verify whether the prerequisites for a regulatory measure exist at the level at which that freedom enjoys the greatest protection, in other words, it must be possible to establish whether legislative measures at the preceding levels would not have sufficed, i.e., whether the actual encroachment was "compellingly required." If the legislature were to be allowed to freely choose from among "equally suitable means" that belong to different levels, this could in practice have for effect that precisely those forms of encroachment that restrict the fundamental right most severely, which are especially suitable for achieving the desired end due to their drastic effect, would be chosen most frequently and then have to be accepted without review. Effective protection of precisely that area of freedom that Article 12.1 of the Basic Law is intended to protect most sustainably would then no longer be ensured. ...

Since, therefore, the courts have already considered up to now that it is legally required and in fact possible in the interest of protection of the freedom of the citizenry to review laws under certain circumstances to establish whether they are necessary, it is even less possible to remove such powers of review from the purview of the Federal Constitutional Court; for the Court is entrusted with the protection of fundamental rights precisely against encroachment by the legislature - in particular through the institution of the constitutional complaint - and is by virtue of its general standing as a constitutional body and court for constitutional issues much less susceptible than other courts to reproach for unjustified encroachment upon the legislative sphere.

(The Federal Constitutional Court applies these standards to Article 3.1 of the Bavarian Pharmacy Act below, assuming that the intent and purpose of the provision is to maintain the health of the pharmacy profession and thereby at the same time serve the health needs of the population. In so doing, the Court then finds that the legislature has not yet availed itself of more lenient possibilities for encroachment at the level of the practice of the profession to protect against the risk that could possibly arise from the manufacture and distribution of pharmaceuticals.

The Court then concludes as follows:

6. The above references to possible legislative measures are not to be construed to mean that the Federal Constitutional Court would like to make general legislative recommendations to the legislature; that is not its responsibility. It was only to do justice to its responsibility to ensure the most effective protection possible for fundamental rights that the Court was compelled to find that restriction to the narrowest area of protection afforded by the fundamental right to freely choose an occupation or profession may be contemplated only when the dangers to be averted cannot be prevented or attenuated by other regulatory measures that might be reasonably considered and do not restrict the fundamental right either at all or to the same extent. This finding would seem all the more necessary since the radical expedient of restrictive admission lies in the German tradition (see on this Urdang-Dieckmann op. cit. pp. 63-64)in the area of law pertaining to pharmacies although, as was shown, it follows from Article 12.1 of the Basic Law that it is first necessary to exhaust other legislative possibilities.

It is of course left to the legislature to decide whether to take the measures alluded to, which of them to choose and in what order to implement them. The Court has limited itself to the mention of such measures as are already under public discussion (at least among experts) and have already to some extent even been implemented or in any case would seem amenable to implementation in consideration of the overall situation.

Since legislative powers in this area reside to some extent with the Länder and are to some extent shared by both the Federation and the Länder, the Bavarian legislature could of course not, for example, claim that the possibilities alluded to here could provide an effective remedy only if the Federation were to make use of its legislative powers, but that the Land legislature is not obliged to encroach any further upon the area of the fundamental right in the absence of any such initiative on the part of the Federation. Such a suggestion would not be admissible in respect of the fundamental right of occupational freedom. Article 12.1 of the Basic Law makes no distinction between Federal and Land law in respect of statutory regulation of the practice of occupations or professions. The fundamental right under Federal constitutional law is universally applicable and as such enjoys equal protection under Federal law and that of the Länder. The Federation and the Länder may not permit more serious encroachment upon the fundamental right by invoking their lack of legislative authority in respect of any given measure. Instead, in matters involving the protection of the fundamental rights of citizens, who after all are subject to both Federal law as well as Land law, the legislatures of the Federation and the Länder must accept treatment as a single entity. ...

2. Non-Smoker Protection, BVerfGE 121, 317

Explanatory Annotation

What has been a reality in many jurisdictions came relatively late to Germany - legislation regulating smoking in pubs, bars and restaurants. At issue in this decision of 2008 was legislation in the states of Baden-Württemberg and Berlin banning smoking in pubs. Exceptions were possible for certain types of establishments and the provision of separate smoking rooms was also possible. However, smoking was completely banned in discotheques because of the increased frequentation by younger people and the physical activities there, which were thought to increase the risk of passive smoking. These provisions were successfully challenged by a small 'one-room' publican who could not offer a separate non-smoking room and by operators of discotheques. The protective purposes of the regulations had to be balanced against the freedom of commercial activity guaranteed under Article 12 of the Basic Law. The Court did not deny that the legislator could indeed act on the increased health risks of passive smoking but saw a violation of the principle of proportionality because the legislation was inconsequent in the Court's view. The health risks involved either call for a total ban on smoking in pubs and restaurants and the legislator would have been free to impose such a complete ban or, if exceptions are provided for as was the case with the provisions at issue, they would have to take into account the special situation of 'one-room' smaller pubs as they are especially affected by the restrictions imposed. Whereas exceptions are not mandated by the Basic Law, once provided for, they must take into account and adequately reflect the protection of all interests involved, including specific commercial interests as brought forward by the applicants.

The Court, in other words, demanded systematic stringency. In this sense, the Court introduced an equal protection requirement into the proportionality test. If the legislator grants an exception for one group but not for another, this can have an effect on the outcome of the proportionality test and render the non-recognition of the interests of the disadvantaged group disproportional.

Translation of the Non-Smoker Protection Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 121, 317*

Headnotes:

1. If due to the scope for assessment, evaluation and action accorded to the legislature it decides in favour of a concept to protect non-smokers in food and drinking establishments seeking to balance health protection against, in particular, the occupational freedom of establishment operators, then exceptions to the ban on smoking must be drafted in such a way that they also cover certain groups of food and drinking establishments - in this case smaller establishments which primarily serve alcoholic beverages - in order to prevent such establishments from being exposed to an especially strong economic burden.

2. It is a violation of the principle of equality if the law allows smoking rooms in food and drinking establishments, but excludes discotheques from this privilege.

Judgment of the First Senate of 30 July 2008 - 1 BvR 3262/07 - / - 1 BvR 402/08 - / - 1 BvR 906/08 -

Facts:

The complainants are operators of food and drinking establishments and a discotheque in Baden-Württemberg and direct their complaints against provisions of Land law on the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments.

The first and second complainants each operate single-room pubs. They allege that the ban on smoking has resulted in a drop in their turnover.

The first complainant alleges a violation of his fundamental rights under Article 12.1 and Article 14.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz -GG). He alleges that s. 7 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg (Landesnichtraucherschutzgesetz - LNRSchG) is unconstitutional in that it bans smoking in single-room pubs in which a smokers' room cannot be established.

The second complainant alleges a violation of her fundamental rights under Article 12.1, Article 3.1, Article 2.1, Article 1.1 and Article 14.1 of the Basic Law. S. 2.1 no. 8 in conjunction with s. 4.3, s. 6.2, s. 7.2 of the of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Berlin (Landesnichtraucherschutzgesetz - LNRSchG) are unconstitutional insofar as a ban on smoking applies to owner-operated single-room pubs, while at the same time smokers may under certain conditions be served food and drink in pubs with two or more rooms.

The third complainant operates a large discotheque. He submits that the challenged provision of Land law violates its fundamental right under Article 12.1 in conjunction with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. s. 7 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land BadenWürttemberg is unconstitutional in that it imposes a complete ban on smoking in discotheques.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

The constitutional complaints are admissible and founded.

I.

1. The ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments in s. 7.1 sentence 1 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg violates the first complainant's fundamental right to the free pursuit of his occupation (Article 12.1 of the Basic Law). The same applies in the case of the second complainant in view of the ban on smoking pursuant to s. 2.1 no. 8 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Berlin. A ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments is to be sure not as such incompatible with the Basic Law. However, a violation of the Basic Law does result from the fact that Land legislatures took no measures in the formulations of the protection of non-smokers they chose that, taken as a whole, also seem reasonable when the special burden upon a specific class of operators of food and drinking establishments are taken into account.

a) Although the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments is primarily directed at patrons, it also encroaches on the protected area of freedom of occupation of operators of such establishments. The ban on smoking on the other hand is not to be measured against the standard of the guarantee of property (Article 14.1 of the Basic Law).

aa) The freedom to pursue a profession or occupation enjoys comprehensive protection under Article 12.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 85, 248 [256]).

This protection also extends to the right of individuals to determine the nature and quality of goods and services they offer on the market (see BVerfGE 106, 275 [299]). and as a result their right to choose freely their target audiences. Under this aspect, the ban on smoking restricts the freedom of operators of food and drinking establishments to pursue their occupation.

The ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments as regulated in the present cases by s. 7.1 sentence 1 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg and s. 2.1 no. 8 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Berlin deprives operators of food and drinking establishments of the possibility of determining themselves whether to allow patrons to smoke in their establishments or to prohibit them from doing so. As a result, operators of food and drinking establishments may decide whether they also want to offer the services and prestations of their establishment to patrons who would like to accept that offer in combination with the possibility of smoking only in exceptional cases provided for by law. It is not only made more difficult for operators of food and drinking establishments to proffer their offerings to smokers, but they are as a rule prevented from performing services, i.e., serving food and drink, for patrons who do not want to abstain from smoking in food and drinking establishments.

bb) This restriction on occupational activity is not merely the result of a ban directed at smokers, but represents direct encroachment on the freedom of operators of food and drinking establishments to pursue their occupation. It follows from the logic behind the legal statutes governing the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments that these provisions also prohibit operators of food and drinking establishments from offering their services and prestations to those of their patrons who smoke, for the non-smoking laws under challenge combine the ban on smoking directed at patrons of food and drinking establishments with a duty on the part of the operators of such establishments to obviate violation of this ban and to prevent further violations (s. 8.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 8.1 sentence 1 and 3 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg; s. 6.1 no. 2 in conjunction with s. 6.2 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Berlin).

b) In order to be able to withstand scrutiny against the guarantee of the freedom of occupation (Article 12.1 of the Basic Law), any encroachment on the freedom to exercise an occupation or profession must have a legal basis that is sufficiently warranted for reasons of the public good (see BVerfGE 7, 377 [405 and 406]; 94, 372 [390]; 101, 331 [347]).

Restrictions of the freedom of occupation that are unavoidable for reasons of the public good must satisfy the requirement of proportionality (see BVerfGE 19, 330 [336 and 336]; 54, 301 [313]; 104, 357 [364]).

As a result, any encroachments must be suitable for achieving the respective purpose and may not exceed that which is required in the interest of the public good (see BVerfGE 101, 331 [347); 104, 357 [364]). The means of encroachment may also not be excessively onerous (see BVerfGE 19, 330 [337]) so that the overall balance between the severity of such encroachment and the weight of the reasons for such encroachment still remains within the limits of the reasonable (see BVerfGE 103, 1 [10]; 106, 181 [192]).

The provisions under challenge in respect of the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments do not satisfy these requirements in every respect. A legal basis is to be sure not lacking (aa); the bans are also based on legitimate purposes (bb); and the provisions are suitable and necessary for achievement of such purposes (cc). In the case of the formulations to be judged here, however, the ban on smoking results in an excessive burden upon a specific class of operators of food and drinking establishments that includes the first and second complainants (dd).

aa) Only a duly enacted law can satisfy the requirements for a legal basis for encroachment on the freedom of occupation (Article 12.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law) (see BVerfGE 98, 265 [298]; 102, 197 [213]).There can be no objection to the challenged provisions under this aspect.

bb) With the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments, the legislature is pursuing a goal in the public interest that is based upon reasonable considerations and may therefore in principle legitimate restriction of the freedom to exercise an occupation or profession.

(1) Both laws cite as their purpose protection of the public against the health risks of passive smoking (see s. 1.1 sentence 2 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg; s. 1 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Berlin). Protection of the public against health risks ranks among the public interests of salient importance (see BVerfGE 7, 377 [414]) that can even justify objective prerequisites for admission to the practice of an occupation or profession and therefore all the more so restrictions on the exercise of an occupation or profession. The voluntary nature of the decision of individuals to expose themselves to the burden of tobacco smoke, in particular when visiting food and drinking establishments, does not render the issue of health protection obsolete. In any case as long no adequate possibilities exist for non-smokers to find smoke-free rooms in food and drinking establishments, such a decision will typically not be indicative of acceptance of the health risks of passive smoking, but only de facto unavoidable toleration of this risk in order to be able to participate without restriction in society by frequenting the food and drinking establishments of their choice.

(2) There can be just as little objection on constitutional grounds to the fact that the Land legislatures considered passive smoking, i.e., environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), to constitute a risk to the health of the public and as a result took legislative action.

cc) Laws against smoking in food and drinking establishments are suitable and necessary for protection against the health risks of passive smoking.

(2) Since no other equally effective means is available that would restrict freedom of occupation to a lesser extent, laws against smoking are also necessary (see Drug and Addiction Report of the Commissioner for Narcotics of the Federal Government (Drogen- und Suchtbericht der Drogenbeauftragten der Bundesregierung), May 2008, p. 38).

There can in particular be no objections on constitutional grounds to the fact that the legislatures did not consider that obligating operators of food and drinking establishments to choose whether to operate their establishments as smoking or non-smoking establishments would be as equally effective as a law against smoking.

dd) The provisions under challenge are, however, not proportionate in the narrower sense of the term, for they place an unreasonable burden on operators of smaller one-room establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages.

(1) If the legislature adopts laws that encroach on the freedom to pursue an occupation, the overall balance between the severity of the encroachment and the weight of the reasons for such encroachment must remain within the limits of what is reasonable (see BVerfGE 102, 197 [220]; 112, 255 [267]).

(a) A ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments represents a serious encroachment on the right of operators of food and drinking establishments to freely pursue their occupation. Since operators of food and drinking establishments may no longer allow smoking on the premises of their establishments, they can reach the smokers among their potential patrons with their offerings, in particular food and drink, only with difficulty or, if the latter in no case want to abstain from smoking in food and drinking establishments, they can no longer reach them at all. Many smokers will, - at least temporarily - frequent food and drinking establishments less often or spend less time in such establishments since their stay will lose considerable appeal because of the ban on smoking. In view of the fact that smokers represent 33.9% of the adult population in Germany (see Drug and Addiction Report of the Commissioner for Narcotics of the Federal Government, May 2008, p. 38), this may, depending upon the orientation of the culinary offering and clientele appealed to by the offering, result in significant revenue shortfalls for the operators of food and drinking establishments. This is confirmed by a study of the Federal Statistical Office (Statistisches Bundesamt) according to which the revenue shortfall of food and drinking establishments - in particular those that concentrate on the sales of alcoholic beverages - was significantly greater in Länder with bans on smoking laws than in those Länder that still have no bans on smoking in food and drinking establishments (see Press Release of the Federal Statistical Office of 6 June 2008 - 207/08).

Even if reports from countries that have had no-smoking laws in force for a longer period of time to the effect that revenues recover or even improve are correct and this is also found to be the case in Germany, the operators of food and drinking establishments would have to accept lower revenues for a lengthier period of time until this development sets in. This alone can restrict or even make it necessary to shut down a business.

(b) On the other hand, however, bans on smoking in food and drinking establishments serve public interests of salient importance. This applies first of all to protection of the health of the public, which is accorded considerable importance within the order of values of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 110, 141 [163]). A duty to provide protection on the part of the state can therefore be inferred from Article 2.2 of the Basic Law, which includes preventive action against health risks (see BVerfGE 56, 54 [78]).

In view of the number of deaths that scientific findings have shown can be attributed to passive smoking, protection of human life is also involved. In that respect, the Basic Law also provides justification for a protective duty that requires that the state protect and foster the life of each individual (see BVerfGE 39, 1 [42]; 46, 160 [164]; 115, 118 [152]).

There can be no objection on constitutional grounds to the assumption to the effect that a significant threat exists to these legal interests since the Land legislatures can in this respect rely on the prevailing scientific opinion to the effect that tobacco smoke is a health risk even in minimal quantities because of the genotoxic carcinogens it contains (see above B. I. 1. b bb (2) (a))

(2) It is the affair of the legislature to decide with respect to any given area of life whether, with what level of protection, and in what way to work counter to situations that may in the opinion of the legislature prove harmful (see BVerfGE 110, 141 [159]; see also BVerfGE 111, 10 [38 and 39, 43]). In this context, the legislature enjoys in principle discretionary, evaluative and operating latitude (see BVerfGE 96, 56 [64]).

This also enables the legislature to take into account interests that run counter to the goal it pursues in the interest of the public good when choosing its protective plan and thereby develop a solution by assigning and balancing conflicting legal interests. If in the case of certain exceptions a concrete protective duty cannot be inferred from the Basic Law that makes specific action compulsory, the creation and legislative deployment of a protective duty are left to the legislature as the body of government responsible for this.

(3) On the basis of the latitude that must be afforded the legislature, it would not be prevented from assigning health protection priority over the freedoms that this would restrict, in particular the freedom of the operators of food and drinking establishments to pursue their chosen occupation and the freedom of smokers to conduct themselves as they see fit, and imposing a strict ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments.

(a) Since health, and even more so, human life, ranks among the values that are of especially great importance, they may also be protected through the use of means that encroach significantly on freedom of occupation (see BVerfGE 17, 269 [276]; 85, 248 [261]; 107, 186 [196]). The legislature is therefore not bound on constitutional grounds to take into account the freedom of occupation of operators of such establishments by allowing for exceptions to a ban on smoking for food and drinking establishments in buildings and completely enclosed spaces. Indeed, the legislature may opt in favour of a plan for the protection of non-smokers that gives priority to the greatest possible reach and efficiency of protection against the risks of passive smoking, for if exceptions are made to the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments, in particular for smoking rooms or food and drinking operations in tents, this would represent partial dispensation with the intended goal of health protection. In order to avoid the threat of "significant reduction of protection of non-smokers" that would otherwise result, the federal legislature allowed no exceptions from the ban on smoking in s. 1.3 sentence 2 of the Act on Protection against the Dangers of Passive Smoking (Gesetz zum Schutz vor den Gefahren des Passivrauchens) (of 20 July 2007, Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 1595) for public means of transport, i.e. in particular for trains, trams, busses and aircraft (see Bundestag document 16/5049, p. 9).

(b) If the legislature decides in favour of a strict ban on smoking due to the high rank of the interests to be protected, no exception need be made for those establishments that are to be classified as small food and drinking establishments because of their limited seating capacity and whose offering consists primarily of alcoholic beverages ("corner pubs").

A law restricting freedom of occupation that is as such in compliance with the principle of proportionality is to be sure in violation of Article 12. 1 in conjunction with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law if its provisions fail to take into account differences that typically exist within the occupational class affected. This must be assumed to be the case when the burden imposed upon members of that class is greater than that imposed upon others not only in respect of isolated special constellations that deviate without adequate objective reason from the norm, but also in respect of certain cases that are typical, albeit limited in number (see BVerfGE 25, 236 [251]; 30, 292 [327]; 59, 336 [356]; 68, 155 [173]; 77, 84 [113]).

The legislature may then be bound to take into account the different ramifications of statutory regulations through hardship provisions or by making further distinctions such as exceptions (see BVerfGE 34, 71 [80]).

It need, however, not be decided here whether smaller one-room food and drinking establishments fulfil these conditions for special consideration, for there is sufficient objective reason for justification of the imposition of a greater burden upon this class, including the threat to its economic existence, which is why differentiated regulation is not required (see BVerfGE 34, 71 [79]).

The legislature need not entertain the possibility of making an exception for small food and drinking establishments if it opts for a strict ban on smoking. For this would mean that it would be necessary despite the legislature's regulatory intent, which is covered by the order of values of the Basic Law, to completely and permanently forego protection of the public against the risks of passive smoking in respect of a not insignificant segment of the hospitality industry. However, the special professional and economic interests of operators of small food and drinking establishments also cannot compel the legislature to completely abandon its decision to strictly pursue public interests of salient importance in an area that presents not insignificant risks.

(c) A strict ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments is not disproportionate even in view of the interests of those patrons who want to smoke. The ban on smoking does to be sure result in a not insignificant restriction upon smokers since it is made less convenient for them to spend time in food and drinking establishments due to the obligation to abstain from smoking and visits to food and drinking establishments also represent a not insignificant aspect of participation in society. This impairment of the freedom of conduct of smokers (Article 2.1 of the Basic Law) would, however, not seem to be inappropriate due to the salient importance of the purpose of protection pursued with the ban on smoking, especially since it is still possible to leave an establishment temporarily to smoke. Smokers are not disfranchised in an impermissible manner in this case; in particular, they are not compelled to protect themselves against risk (see BVerfGE 59, 275 [278 and 279]). The Land no-smoking laws are intended neither to prevent addiction nor to protect individuals against themselves. Instead, their purpose is to protect against the risks of passive smoking (see s. 1.1 sentence 2 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg; s. 1 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Berlin). What is involved is not the protection of the health of smokers but rather the protection of that of other persons in a given situation, who do not themselves smoke.

The non-smokers among the patrons of food and drinking establishments are similarly not forced to accept protection against the risks of passive smoking. The statutory regulation merely takes into account the circumstances that as long as there is not a sufficient number of places in non-smoking public rooms they have no choice other than to accept the health risk due to passive smoking when they frequent a food and drinking establishment (see above B. I. 1. b bb (1)). Non-smokers should be able to participate in this area of society not only at the price of jeopardizing their health.

(4) However, a proportionality test leads to different results if the decision does not involve a strict ban on smoking, but rather a plan for protection against the risks of passive smoking is chosen - as by the Land legislatures in the present cases - that assigns greater weight to the interests of operators of food and drinking establishments and smokers and, taking this into account, makes protection of health a relative goal, thereby partially abandoning it.

(a) The legislature could surely, as has been shown (see above B. I. 1. b dd (3)), also have allowed the opposing interests of operators of food and drinking establishments and smokers to be in effect completely ignored. However, in view of the discretionary, evaluative and operating latitude to which the legislature is entitled, it is not prevented from choosing an approach to protection that involves less stringent pursuit of protection of the health of non-smokers when weighed against the freedom of operators of food and drinking establishments and smokers. It cannot be ascertained that the Land legislatures in opting for such an approach incorrectly assessed the interests of the parties affected that were to be reconciled in a manner that is inconsistent with the Basic Law.

The choice of such a protective approach that allows more room for the freedom of operators of food and drinking establishments and smokers does not, however, remain without consequences at the level of the review of the proportionality of the encroachments of fundamental rights that remain nonetheless. The reason for this is that by deciding to adopt a specific approach the Land legislatures assess the advantages and disadvantages for the respective legal interests involved and balance these interests against one another as regards their implications for the various legal interests involved. In that regard, it is the legislature that determines, within the framework of constitutional requirements, the value of the interests of the general public it pursues that are to be weighed in the context of a proportionality test (see BVerfGE 115, 205 [234]).

(b) In Baden-Württemberg, the Land legislature first banned smoking in all food and drinking establishments without making any distinctions as regards size, previous use or special characteristics such as, for example, the nature of the regular clientele with s. 7.1 sentence 1 of the Non-Smoking Act. However, exceptions from the ban are then made for food and drinking operations under tents, outdoor venues and itinerant businesses in s. 7.1 sentence 3 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg. Finally, s. 7.2 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg makes provision for the possibility of maintaining separate smoking rooms. Comparable provisions are in effect in Berlin. The ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments (s. 2.1 no. 8 of the Non-Smoking Act) does to be sure also apply to food and drinking operations under tents (see s. 2.2 of the Non-Smoking Act), but the creation of smoking rooms is also allowed in Berlin pursuant to s. 4.3 sentence 1 of the Non-Smoking Act. As a result, important exceptions are made in both Länder in practice, and the goal of protection of health is thereby pursued with a lesser degree of intensity.

The compromises in terms of health protection become clear in connection with the creation of smoking rooms. If the legislature allows this exception from the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments, the possibility cannot be excluded that smoking rooms will also be frequented by non-smoking patrons who follow smokers to such rooms or who retreat to such rooms because all seats are occupied in the non-smoking area. Especially affected are children and youths who are taken along to smoking rooms by the adults accompanying them and - under the no-smoking laws to be judged here - are not prohibited from being there. Although the Land legislatures are also not prevented from protecting the health of the personnel of food and drinking establishments in the interest of the public good (see above B. I. 1. b aa (1)), health risks are accepted in the case of those employees who must enter smoking rooms, in particular to serve patrons. Finally, scientific investigation indicates that the toxic substances in tobacco smoke that permeate smoking rooms cannot be reliably kept away from adjoining non-smoking premises and therefore also represent a burden to those in non-smoking areas (see Blank/Pötschke-Langer, in: Deutsches Krebsforschungszentrum (ed.), Erhöhtes Gesundheitsrisiko for Beschäftigte in der Gastronomie durch Passivrauchen am Arbeitsplatz, 2007, p. 18).

The situation as regards beer, wine and party tents, which are exempted from the ban on smoking in Baden-Württemberg (s. 7.1 sentence 3 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Ba-den-Württemberg), is in effect no different. Even in the case of temporary venues established for only a limited period of time, for which, however, no provision is made by law in Baden-Württemberg, the general exemption for food and drinking establishments under tents represents a significant limitation of protection of non-smokers since patrons have no possibility at all of escaping the burden of tobacco smoke. In this context, it is not sufficiently certain that tents are consistently or even only as a rule better ventilated than buildings and that the exposure of patrons to tobacco smoke is therefore significantly lower.

(c) Such exceptions are not required on constitutional grounds (see above B. I. 1. b dd (2)). The Land legislatures allowed them on the basis of their own evaluative and operating decisions, opting thereby in favour of approaches to protection of non-smokers that do not pursue absolute protection, but, taking into account conflicting interests, consider limited protection that makes allowance for various exceptions to be sufficient. Accordingly, the risks of passive smoking are to be sure considered to be significant, but - which is constitutionally defensible - they are not considered to be so serious that health protection should in every respect enjoy priority over the occupational interests of operators of food and drinking establishments and the freedom of conduct of smokers.

The Land legislatures remain bound to their decisions as to the intensity with which they want to pursue the protection of non-smokers in connection with the conflict with the interests of operators of food and drinking establishments and smokers even if - as in the present cases - the reasonableness of the ban on smoking for operators of smaller one-room food and drinking establishments must be assessed. If the legislature has on the basis of the latitude to which it is entitled, decided in favour of a specific assessment of the potential risks, evaluated the interests involved on this basis, and chosen a legislative approach, then it must also consistently follow up on this decision. Assessment of risks is not consistent if the same weight is not assigned to identical risks in the same law (see BVerfGE 107, 186 [197]).

(d) Accordingly, if the Land legislatures have made the current importance of the legitimate goal of health protection they are pursuing a relative consideration through extensive regulations governing exceptions by allowing in particular the interests of operators of food and drinking establishments to be taken into account, then the specific ramifications of the ban on smoking for smaller establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages logically assume greater weight in the context of the overall balance to be struck.

Such establishments are different from other food and drinking establishments not only because they cannot seat as many people and because they serve primarily alcoholic beverages and less food, but also because of the special structure of their clientele. Such food and drinking establishments are frequented for the most part by regular patrons, and of these a relatively large number are smokers. In this regard, the Federal Hotel & Catering Association referred in an additional opinion to investigations according to which the percentage of smokers among the patrons of such food and drinking establishments is at least 50% and in many cases exceeds three-quarters. Since the operators of such food and drinking establishments cannot provide smoking rooms due to the limited availability of space, their establishments become significantly less appealing to the clientele, consisting of smokers that they primarily serve. It can therefore be expected that many smokers will either no longer patronize such food and drinking establishments that do not allow them to smoke while there or spend significantly less time in such establishments.

That there is at least a tendency towards a concomitant shortfall in revenues is documented by the investigation of the Federal Statistical Office (see above B. I. 1. b dd (1) (a)) that has already been mentioned. According to that investigation, the shortfall in revenues of establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages, to which the food and drinking establishments under discussion may be assigned, has been significantly greater in those Bundesländer with bans against smoking in food and drinking establishments than in Länder in which such bans on smoking have not yet gone into effect. For example, the decrease in revenues was 9.8% in the third quarter of 2007 as compared with 6.8%, whereas the decrease was even as high as 14.1% as compared with 8.8% in the fourth quarter of the same year. The investigation shows at the same time the special vulnerability of food and drinking establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages, for the same comparison yielded no decrease in revenues for the third quarter for establishments that serve primarily meals and only a slight decrease in the fourth quarter.

It is also logical to assume that allowing separate smoking rooms will mean that patrons who do not want to abstain from smoking will abandon smaller food and drinking establishments that cannot provide such rooms and instead frequent larger establishments with smoking rooms. Not only did the Non-Smoking Action Alliance (Aktionsbündnis Nichtrauchen) express in its brief the opinion to the effect that the possibility of a migration from one-room food and drinking establishments to establishments with smoking rooms could not be ruled out; in addressing the question as to the possibility of migration of regular customers from corner pubs to the smoking rooms of larger food and drinking establishments, the German Cancer Research Center (Deutsches Krebsforschungszentrum - DKFZ) also stated that such behaviour on the part of the clientele would be very plausible for economic reasons. A survey conducted by the Baden-Württemberg Hotel & Catering Association on the implications of the ban on smoking from March 2008 also makes reference to such behaviour on the part of patrons. According to this survey, the no-smoking law had a negative effect, with 77.7% of the single-room establishments losing over 20% of their revenues and 61.3% of these establishments even reporting that their further existence was threatened. On the other hand, it was reported that the no-smoking law even had a positive effect on 11.4% of the establishments with several rooms. The above-mentioned survey by the TNS-Emnid Opinion Research Organization confirms that regular customers have migrated from small food and drinking establishments, for it shows that 24% of those surveyed switched from "single-room pubs" to larger food and drinking establishments, and in particular to establishments with separate smoking rooms, because of the ban on smoking.

The revenue shortfall caused by the ban on smoking also has serious repercussions for operators of smaller food and drinking establishments even if they are only temporary. Due to their smaller seating capacity, the operators of such establishments cannot generate high revenues and therefore also cannot build up larger reserves. As a result, revenue shortfalls with no change in overhead costs mean that weaker business phases cannot be bridged for a longer period of time and the operations of such establishments may soon become no longer profitable.

(e) In terms of the discretionary, evaluative and operating decisions upon which the plans for the protection of non-smokers are based in the present cases, the operators of small establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages cannot be reasonably expected to accept these special burdens that the ban on smoking creates for them.

The Land legislatures have allowed exceptions from the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments for separate enclosed rooms. In the case of larger food and drinking establishments that have or can provide such separate rooms, only a relative ban on smoking applies; the legislature has therefore accommodated their interest in also being able to accommodate smoking patrons. On the other hand, an absolute ban on smoking does exist for smaller food and drinking establishments as long as separate rooms are not available and can also not be created - which will regularly be the case due to the fact that less floor space is available. The goal of protection is strictly pursued only in respect of the operators of such establishments. The health risks associated with passive smoking are therefore weighted differently when balanced against the freedom of occupation of the operators of food and drinking establishments.

Due to this unequal weighting, the ban on smoking results in a significantly greater economic burden for operators of smaller food and drinking establishments than for those of larger establishments. Only the latter can make their offerings more attractive by reserving smoking rooms for smokers. In the case of small food and drinking establishments, on the other hand, the disadvantages associated with the current absolute ban on smoking that affect them in particular may result in the existence-threatening revenue shortfalls described above. This will typically affect small establishments that essentially limit themselves to serving alcoholic beverages. Strict compliance with the ban on smoking is therefore expected of the operators of such establishments even at the price of losing their economic existence although the Land legislatures do not want to pursue the desired protection of health without restriction, but only insofar as the occupational interests of operators of food and drinking establishments are taken into account. However, in view of the retraction of the intended goal of protection, the degree of burden affecting them is no longer reasonable in relation to the benefits to which the Land legislature aspired with the relaxed ban on smoking for the general public.

This applies all the more so since it also would have been only logical to take into account precisely the interests of small establishments that primarily serve alcoholic beverages in the approach chosen for the formulation of protection of non-smokers since the latter are in any case especially disadvantaged by the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments. In fact, however, as is shown by the legislative materials, no importance worth mentioning was attached to this aspect. To the contrary, the exceptions from the ban on smoking, and in particular the approval of smoking rooms, has created an additional cause of deterioration of the economic situation of these operators of food and drinking establishments. The Land legislatures are to a significant extent responsible for the fact that the economic situation of small food and drinking establishments has deteriorated even more due to their approach to and formulation of protection of non-smokers. Since smoking rooms cannot be made available for these establishments, their operators must not only absorb losses due to the smokers who now completely abstain from patronizing their establishments or spend less time there, but they also suffer from the migration of those patrons who now frequent food and drinking establishments with smoking rooms. The legal situation thereby increases the burden on operators of smaller establishments by putting larger establishments that can provide separate smoking rooms at an advantage in terms of their ability to compete for business. Against this background, the various effects of the legal regulations on the different types of establishments cannot be dismissed as the mere manifestation of their respective economic performance and competition.

The Land legislatures must surely, be given credit in the present cases for the fact that the plan they chose to protect non-smokers, proceeds from the logical premise to the effect that a patron should have the possibility of finding a seat in any given food and drinking establishment where he will not be exposed to tobacco smoke. This principle is, however, already compromised by the fact that the loss of the seating capacity required for smokers reduces the capacity available in the non-smoking area, forcing patrons to take recourse to smoking rooms. Moreover, the basic idea of a ban on smoking with an exception for separate rooms in Baden-Württemberg is abandoned for one subclass by completely exempting food and drinking establishments under tents from the ban on smoking. In particular, however, the plan chosen for protection deviates from its own basic approach, which is to achieve a balance of interests, and does not take into account the interests of small food and drinking establishments, which are especially affected by the ban on smoking, but exclusively and one-sidedly the interests of the non-smoking patrons of food and drinking establishments.

However, frequentation of smaller one-room establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages is not typically of significant importance in terms of their participation in society, which means only slight improvement can be expected for the protection of non-smokers from current regulations. The number of 60,000 to 80,000 single-room food service establishments cited by the Federal Hotel & Catering Association (DEHOGA Bundesverband) as compared with a total of some 243,000 hotel and restaurant operations is in that regard not meaningful. That figure makes no distinction as to whether these single-room establishments serve primarily alcoholic beverages or meals, nor does it contain any indication of room size and as a result information as regards possibilities for providing smoking rooms. Due to the typically small seating capacity, the percentage of all food and drinking operations accounted for by single-room establishments also does not make it possible to infer that their total share of seating accommodations is commensurately large. Instead, the minor importance of smaller single-room food and drinking establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages for effective protection of non-smokers is reflected in the exceptionally high percentage of smokers among their patrons. In particular, however, the substantial revenue shortfalls following the entry into force of the bans on smoking show that the operators of such establishments have not been able since then to attract more non-smoking patrons with their hospitality offerings. The Land legislatures therefore must have assumed that an exception from the ban on smoking for smaller single-room establishments that serve primarily alcoholic beverages does not seriously detract from adequate protection of non-smokers since sufficient smoke-free seating is available in food and drinking establishments as a whole.

2. The constitutional complaint of the third complainant, which is directed against s. 7.2 sentence 2 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg, is also founded. Unlike the first and second complainants, the third complainant seeks no additional exception from the ban on smoking in food and drinking establishments, but instead objects to the fact that it was denied the benefit of exemption as already provided for by law. The complainant is successful. It is incompatible with Article 12.1 in conjunction with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law for discotheques that do not admit youths to be excluded from the possibility of providing smoking rooms pursuant to s. 7.2 sentence 1 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg.

a) Notwithstanding the requirements that derive directly from Article 12.1 of the Basic Law, provisions of law that govern the exercise of an occupation or profession can be valid only if they are also otherwise in every respect consistent with the Basic Law and in particular in compliance with the general principle of equal treatment under the law pursuant to Article 3.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 25, 236 [251]).

The general principle of equal treatment under the law pursuant to Article 3.1 of the Basic Law requires that the legislature treat matters that are essentially the same in the same manner and those matters differently that are essentially different (see BVerfGE 1, 14 [52]; 98, 365 [385]; 116 [180]); established case law.

This does not, however, completely prevent the legislature from making distinctions. Indeed, depending on the subject of regulation and the criteria for differentiation involved, the constraints imposed by the general principle of equal treatment under the law vary, ranging from mere prohibition of arbitrariness to strict compliance with the requirements of proportionality (see BVerfGE 110, 274 [291]; 117, 1 [30]); established case law.

Since the principle to the effect that all persons are equal before the law is primarily intended to prevent unwarranted differences in the treatment of individuals, the legislature is regularly bound to strict compliance in the case of matters involving unequal treatment of different classes of persons (see BVerfGE 88, 87 [96]). The fundamental right to equal treatment before the law is therefore violated if in the case of provisions of law that affect different classes of persons the legislature treats one class of persons addressed by a statute differently from any other class despite the fact that no difference exists between the two classes of such nature or weight as to justify such unequal treatment (see BVerfGE 102, 41 [54]; 104, 126 [144 and 145]; 107, 133 [141]; established case law).

However, these principles also apply if unequal treatment in respect of a matter results indirectly in unequal treatment of different classes of persons. For that reason, the more unequal treatment can negatively impact the exercise of freedom that enjoy constitutional protection, in particular the freedom of choice of occupation or profession protected by Article 12.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 62, 256 [274]), the narrower becomes the operating latitude of the legislature (see BVerfGE 92, 53 [69]; established case law).

The general principle of equal treatment under the law applies for unequal burden as well as for unequal privileges. Discriminatory exclusion from a privilege is also prohibited if it involves granting a privilege to one class of persons but denying it to another class (see BVerfGE 116, 164 [180] with further references).

b) Measured against this standard, the general exclusion of discotheques from the privilege that is to be seen in the exemption of separate smoking rooms from the ban on smoking pursuant to s. 7.2 sentence 1 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg is not warranted.

aa) The distinction to be assessed here between eating and drinking establishments in general and those that fall into the special category of "discotheques" (see s. 3.1 of the Licensing Act (Gaststättengesetz - GastG)) involves different treatment of matters. Nevertheless, the review must be based on the assumption to the effect that the legislature is bound to a more stringent standard since the unequal treatment of separate matters entails unequal treatment of classes of persons. The distinctions made in the provisions contained in s. 7.2 sentence 1 and 2 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg are responsible for the fact that, unlike operators of other food and drinking establishments, operators of discotheques are prevented from providing smoking rooms for their patrons. As a result, operators of discotheques cannot freely pursue their occupation and make the offerings of their food and drinking establishments attractive for smokers. Unequal treatment of the matters at hand therefore has a negative effect on the exercise of freedoms protected by fundamental rights, namely, occupational freedom, which the third complainant may invoke as a limited partnership pursuant to Article 19.3 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 105, 252 [265]; established case law)

bb) Sufficient reasons for such unequal treatment are lacking.

(1) According to the grounds provided in the draft of the law of the Land government of Baden-Württemberg, the purpose of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg containing the ban on smoking with no exception for discotheques, is in particular to protect youths against the risks of passive smoking. According to the grounds, the fact that the concentration of harmful substances is especially high in discotheques is taken into account, which in combination with the physical activity of the patrons results in greater inhalation of the inside air containing the harmful substances (see Landtag document (Landtagsdrucksache - LTDrucks) 14/1359, p. 16).

It is also stated that the absence of an exception to the ban on smoking in discotheques is also necessary since the effects of the pressure to imitate and conform play an important role in the case of youth. Furthermore, it is submitted, if there is a smoking room in a discotheque and the core members of the group spend time there, peer pressure will also cause non-smokers to go there, exposing themselves thereby to passive smoking (See Landtag document 14/1359, p. 24).

(2) These reasons are not of such nature and weight as to justify unequal legal consequences for discotheques on the one hand and other food and drinking establishments on the other hand.

(a) This applies first of all to the extent that the legislature assumes a greater need for protection of patrons in the case of discotheques. The legislature does surely enjoy a certain latitude as regards its assessment of the risks threatening the general public. There can therefore be no objection on constitutional grounds to the fact that the Land legislature has based its assessment of the situation on the existence of an especially high concentration of harmful substances in discotheques. The legislature may rely in this context on relevant scientific investigations such as, for example, the results of the research project already mentioned that was carried out under the auspices of the Bavarian Land Office for Health and Food Safety (Landesamt für Gesundheit und Lebensmittelsicherheit) (see above B. I. 1. b bb (2) (b)). According to that research, a high level of contamination of the air with toxic and carcinogenic substances from tobacco smoke was ascertained in all food and drinking operations, no matter what the category, the highest level of contamination being found in discotheques. This circumstance does not, however, necessitate the general exclusion of this exception for discotheques if smoking rooms are approved for other food and drinking establishments. If smoking is allowed only in completely separate rooms, the argument to the effect that there is a greater danger of passive smoking in discotheques due to the specific nature of the operation no longer holds. Risks to patrons in non-smoking areas can be prevented through strict compliance with the requirements of s. 7.2 sentence 1 of the Non-Smoking Act of the Land Baden-Württemberg, which must also be observed in the case of smoking rooms in discotheques. According to this legislation, the fact that smoking rooms are provided may not compromise the interests of protection of non-smokers, which means that it is necessary to ensure - if necessary through the use of technical means - that no deterioration in the quality of the air by tobacco smoke can be detected outside the smoking rooms.

(b) Reference to the considerable importance of effects of pressure to imitate and conform in the case of youths or young adults cannot justify different treatment of discotheques as compared with other types of food and drinking establishments.

Due to the discretionary latitude of the legislature, there can surely be no objection on constitutional grounds to this assessment of the situation as regards the risks for youth. The ban on smoking in discotheques without provision for any exceptions is, however, not necessary in order to prevent youths from following their crowd or individuals to the smoking area. In order to achieve the desired protection of this class of the public, it suffices if - as, for example, stipulated by s. 4.3 sentence 2 of the Non-Smoking Act in the Land of Berlin - the exclusion of smoking rooms is limited to those discotheques that admit persons under the age of 18. The operators of many discotheques - including the third complainant - impose age limits for their clientele and in this manner decide for themselves whether they would prefer to forego providing smoking rooms or restrict admission. Such a regulatory situation that gives operators of discotheques options represents the milder means as compared with the general exclusion of smoking rooms.

The exclusion of smoking rooms is also not warranted for the purpose of preventing the effects of conformity and peer pressure among the adult clientele of discotheques. By generally allowing smoking rooms in food and drinking establishments, the Land legislature has already accepted the fact that non-smokers will also spend time in such rooms. This is, however, tantamount to acceptance of the effects of peer conformity among adults, which may not be eliminated through unequal treatment only in the case of discotheques. Even the increase in the effect of the pressure to conform that the legislature assumes to exist due to the fact that the patrons of discotheques are for the most part young adults can be counteracted in a less onerous manner by making smoking rooms less attractive. This would include in particular consideration of the possibility of prohibiting the installation of dance floors in smoking rooms. This is achieved by statute in, for example, the Free Hanseatic City of Bremen (s. 3.6 sentence 3 of the Bremen Non-Smoking Act (Bremisches Nichtraucherschutzgesetz - Brem-NiSchG)) and the Länder Rhineland-Palatinate (s. 7.1 sentence 2 of the Rhineland-Palatinate Non-Smoking Act (Nichtraucherschutzgesetz Rheinland-Pfalz)), Saarland (s. 3.5 sentence 2 of the Act on the Protection against the Risks of Passive Smoking (Nichtraucherschutzgesetz)) and Thuringia (s. 5 sentence 3 of the Thuringia Act on the Protection against the Risks of Passive Smoking (Thüringer Nichtraucherschutzgesetz-ThürNRSchutzG)).

II.

The fact that the provisions under challenge are in violation of the Basic Law does not make them invalid. Since several possibilities for reform are available to the Land legislatures, it is possible to ascertain only that the current provisions are incompatible with the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 117, 163 [199] with further references).

3. Glycol Wine, BVerfGE 105, 252 (and the Osho-Sect Judgment, E 105, 279)

Explanatory Annotation

A wine scandal and an Asian sect[147] do not appear to have anything in common, however, the two decisions rendered by the Constitutional Court on the same day in 2002 dealt with the same legal problem: Can the federal government issue a warning about a perceived danger by way of publishing information or giving certain answers in question-and-answer sessions in the Parliament, holding speeches or issuing reports?[148]

147 Osho was the name given by his followers to the Indian mystic Rajneesh Chandra Mohan. The movement was also known under the names Shree Rajneesh, or Bhagwan.

148 Due to this similarity of the legal issues in both judgments a translation is provided only for the Glycol Wine decision.

In the Glycol case the relevant federal minister had published a list of wines in which the poisonous chemical glycol had been found after testing. The publication made it clear that the results would only apply to the wines tested and that it is well possible that other wines from the same source might not be affected. The effect on the sales figures for wine was catastrophic when this glycol-scandal erupted but those businesses on the warning list were particularly affected, notwithstanding the fact that most of their wines were clean. In the Osho case the sect complained against negative reports, speeches and government answers to questions raised in Parliament on the dangers posed by "psycho-sects".

Warning implies a danger or risk against which the warning is directed. Risk prevention and damage control is, in addition to the prosecution of criminals, core police work. In Germany the police when exercising its preventive function fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Länder. The Federal Government has no power to act in this regard. The warnings could therefore have been regarded as unconstitutional for lack of jurisdiction at the federal level. The Court, however, held differently. It differentiated between action through legislation and executive action on the one hand, where the delineation of power between the federal level and the Länder must be adhered to and the exercise of mere political leadership ("Staatsleitung") on the other hand, i.e. leadership by communication with other state organs or the interested public. This leadership by communication is an inherent power of any government in general and, in these two cases, the Federal Government in particular. But even this communication effort must measure up to the fundamental rights protected by the Basic Law. In the Osho case this was the freedom of religion guarantee of Article 4 of the Basic Law, which the Court saw violated because of the use of unwarranted derogatory adjectives describing the Osho movement. In the Glycol case it was the freedom of occupation guarantee of Article 12. The Court saw no violation because the information published about the glycol-affected wines had been correct.

Both cases carried case numbers pointing to 1991.[149] It took the Constitutional Court 11 years to decide those cases. The facts of the two cases go back to 1985 and before. Whereas this is not the norm for the length of proceedings before the Constitutional Court it does illustrate that justice is not always swift when it comes to constitutional justice.

Translation of the Glycol Wine Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 105, 252*

Headnotes:

1. Market-related information provided by the government does not restrict the area of the guarantee of the fundamental rights of the affected competitors under Article 12.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG), if the effect on factors that are relevant to the competitive process is consistent with the provisions of law governing the state's information activity and does not distort market conditions. The existence of a governmental responsibility and observance of the division of powers as well as compliance with requirements pertaining to the accuracy and objectivity of the information are the important constitutional aspects involved in this context.

2. The Federal Government may due to its responsibility for the administration of the state engage in information work whenever it bears a responsibility for the state as a whole, that can be discharged with the help of information.

Facts:

In the spring of 1985, it became known that wine that had been adulterated with diethylene glycol (DEG) was being sold in Germany in not insignificant quantities. DEG is normally used as an anti-freeze and as a chemical solvent. This resulted in a considerable "media storm," uncertainty on the part of the population and a drastic drop in the consumption of wine.

Against this background, the Federal Ministry of Health (Bundesgesundheitsministerium - BGM) published lists of wines between July and December 1985 that had been found to contain DEG along with the names of the bottlers. The lists also contained mention of the fact it was thoroughly possible that wines from the same bottlers that did not contain DEG could also be on the market.

The complainants are winemakers whose wines appeared in the list. Their wine sales had decreased considerably, and they ultimately petitioned the Court to find the action of the Federal Ministry of Health illegal. The action was unsuccessful in all instances (most recently BVerwGE 87, 37).

The constitutional complaint was dismissed by the Federal Constitutional Court.

C.

The constitutional complaints are unfounded. Publication of the list of wines containing DEG and the decisions of the court under challenge do not violate the fundamental rights of the complainants under Article 12.1 sentence 1, Article 14.1 sentence 1, Article 3.1 and Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

I.

The fundamental right of the complainants under Article 12.1 of the Basic Law is not impaired.

1. Freedom of occupation under Article 12.1 of the Basic Law guarantees all Germans the right to freely choose and exercise their occupation or profession. An "occupation or profession" is any activity that is intended to be pursued over a prolonged period of time and serves to establish and maintain a livelihood (see BVerfGE 7, 377 [397 et seq.]; 54, 301 [313]; 68, 272 [281]; 97, 228 [252-253]). According to Article 19.3 of the Basic Law, this fundamental right also applies to artificial persons to the extent that they engage in an activity for commercial purposes that by virtue of its essence and nature is equally accessible to artificial and natural persons (see BVerfGE 50, 290 [363]; established case law).

This applies in the case of the complainants.

2. Under the existing economic order, the freedom pursuant to Article 12.1 of the Basic Law relates in particular to the occupational activity of individual persons or enterprises (see BVerfGE 32, 311 [317]).

This fundamental right does not, however, protect against the dissemination of accurate and objective information in the market that could be of importance in terms of the behaviour of market participants involved in the competitive process even if the content of such information negatively affects the situations of individual competitors. The Federal Government must, however, observe the legal requirements that govern information activity.

a) Although entrepreneurial occupational or professional activity in the market is governed by the principles of competition, the reach of the protection of the freedom to engage in such activity is also defined by the legal rules that permit and limit the competitive process. In this context, Article 12.1 of the Basic Law safeguards the right to participate in the competitive process under the conditions that govern its operation. Accordingly, the guarantee of the fundamental right does not include protection against effects that operate upon factors that govern the competitive process. In particular, the fundamental right includes no entitlement to success in the competitive process and assurance of the possibility of future earnings (see BVerfGE 24, 236 [251]; 34, 252 [256]).

Indeed, the situation of a market participant with respect to the competition, and as a result sales and income are subject to the risk of continual change as a function of market conditions.

b) An enterprise that is active in the market is exposed to communication and therefore also to criticism of the quality of its products or its actions. An enterprise that is so affected can defend itself against negative information through the use of its own information in a manner appropriate to the market, i.e., through its own advertising and emphasis on the quality of its product. For the protection of the freedom to exercise an occupation or profession extends to the projection of a public image, including advertising for the enterprise or for its products, for the purposes of promotion of the professional success of an enterprise (see BVerfGE 85, 97 [104]; 85, 248 [256]; 94, 372 [389]).

   The provision containing the fundamental rights does not, however, guarantee an enterprise an exclusive right to its public image and as a result to an unrestricted right to project that image in the marketplace. An enterprise may surely decide itself how it would like to present itself and its products in the context of the competitive process. But Article 12.1 of the Basic Law does not afford enterprises a right to be portrayed by others only the way they would like to be seen or the way they see themselves and their products. Contrary to the opinion of the complainants, such a right cannot also be established by way of analogy with the general right of personality, especially since this right also does not include such an entitlement (see BVerfGE 97, 125 [149]; 97, 391 [403]; 99, 185 [194]; 101, 361 [380]).

c) Competition functions on the basis of market participants having maximum access to information concerning factors that are relevant to the market. Being informed is what in the first place enables market participants to make decisions aligned with their own interests as regards the conditions for their participation in the market, especially as regards the supply of or demand for goods and services. The availability of such information contributes indirectly to the quality and variety of products available on the market. If, for example, consumers lack information that is relevant for making decisions, they cannot adequately determine whether an offering meets their needs. Informed activity on the part of consumers also has a retroactive effect on providers, who can as a result adapt to the needs of consumers. Accordingly, deficits in the availability of information that is relevant for making decisions threaten the self-regulating power of the market.

   However, the market is not an institution that guarantees the availability of a certain level, and certainly not a high level, of information. The information available in the market is frequently not complete. Information is often selectively disseminated. In addition, not all information available in the marketplace is equally likely to be received and processed in all consequence by those addressed. In such situations, the functionality of the market is enhanced when counterpoints are set in the form of information, including governmental information, or when the superior informational power of individual market participants is counterbalanced.

d) The goal of the legal system is to make possible a high level of information relevant to the market and thereby make the market transparent. This is achieved, for example, through legal measures to combat unfair competition, establishment of rules for advertising and measures to protect consumers, which is achieved primarily through the availability of information. In particular, s. 1 of the Act against Unfair Competition (Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb - UWG) protects the operational functionality of competition based on merit against dissemination of information that is in violation of public policy because market participants are deceived. The legal system considers this to be anti-competitive (see in particular ss. 2 et seq. of the Act against Unfair Competition). Accordingly, the principle of truthfulness, which is understood to mean prohibition of deception, is viewed as the prevailing guideline of competition law (see Baumbach/Hefermehl, Wettbewerbsrecht, 22nd ed., 2001, marginal note 5 on s. 1 of the Act against Unfair Competition).

The case law provides a more concrete definition of the standards for protection against deception and therefore also for the accuracy of statements under the Act against Unfair Competition as regards requirements in terms of competitive activity in the area of commercial trade (see Federal Court of Justice, NJW 1987, p. 2930 [2931]; Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters (Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen - BGHZ) 139, 368 [376]).

The goal of ensuring market transparency is, however, also served when information is disseminated by instances other than competitors (Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters 65, 325 [332 et seq.]).

It also lies in the nature of the overall context of its activities as regards the competitive process that the government disseminates information relevant to competition without itself being a competitor.

e) Market-related information provided by the government does not restrict the area of the guarantee of the fundamental right of the affected competitors if the effect on factors that are relevant to the competitive process is consistent with the provisions of law governing the state's information activity and does not distort market conditions. The existence of a governmental responsibility and observance of the division of powers (aa) as well as compliance with requirements pertaining to the accuracy and objectivity of the information; (bb) are the important constitutional aspects involved in this context.

aa) Dissemination of information by the government presupposes responsibility on the part of the acting agency (1) and compliance with limits of authority (2).

(1) If the responsibilities of the government or the administration can be discharged through public information, the assignment of such responsibilities also includes in principle the power to engage in information activity.

This applies in the case of the administration of the state by the government. This responsibility is intended to achieve the political legitimacy that is important in a democracy and includes involvement in the fulfilment of concrete public duties lying outside the sphere of administration activities. Administration of the state is not achieved exclusively through legislative means and influence on the enforcement of legislation through policy, but also through the dissemination of information to the public (see BVerfGE 105, 279 [279] - Osho Judgment).

Governmental participation in public communication has in the course of time undergone a fundamental transformation and continues to change under contemporary conditions. Expansion of the role of the mass media, the prevalence of modern information and communication technologies and the development of new information services also affect the nature of the performance of the duties of government. The official public relations activities of government have traditionally involved in particular the dissemination of information on governmental measures and projects, the presentation and explanation of plans for undertakings to be accomplished in the future and solicitation of support (see BVerfGE 20, 56 [100]; 44, 125 [147]; 63, 230 [241 et seq.]). Contemporary information activity goes much further than such public relations activities (see also Constitutional Court of the Land of North Rhine-Westphalia [V*erfassungsgerichtshof des Landes Nordrhein-Westfalen* - VerfGH NW], North Rhine-Westphalia Law Gazette 1992, p. 14 [15-16]).

For example, the responsibility of government in a democracy also includes informing the public of important matters outside of or well in advance of the government's own operational political activity. In a political system that is based on a high degree of personal responsibility on the part of citizens when it comes to solving social problems, the task of government also includes dissemination of information that enables citizens to participate in the management of problems under their own responsibility. Accordingly, citizens expect information from the government that would otherwise not be available for the purposes of forming their own personal opinions and guidance. This can in particular involve areas in which the public's source of knowledge is based on information that is dictated by special interests and entails the risk of being biased and the forces of society are not sufficient to create a satisfactory balance of information.

Administration of the state in this sense includes not only responsibility for facilitating the management of conflicts within the state and society through timely public information, but also for confronting new challenges in this manner, which often arise suddenly, for reacting quickly and expediently to crises as well as for providing citizens with guidance. Current crises in the area of agricultural and food products, for example, have shown how important it is for information that is accompanied by the authority of the government to be available to the public in order to be able to master such tension-ridden situations in an appropriate manner. Were the state to abdicate this responsibility to give the public guidance through education, advice and recommended actions and instead limit itself to legislative initiatives or await administrative measures of other governmental bodies, an important component of crisis management would be lacking that is quick, expeditious and suitable for keeping negative effects on third parties to a minimum. Silence on the part of the government would also be considered failure by many citizens. This can lead to a loss of legitimacy.

(2) The division of powers must also be respected when it comes to information activity. At the level of the Federation, the division of powers among the Federal Chancellor, the Federal Ministers and the Federal Government as a collegium derives from Article 65 of the Basic Law. In addition, the division of federal powers between the Federation and the Länder must be preserved (see BVerfGE 44, 125 [149]).

In this context, decisions as to institutional authority hinge upon whether the responsibility for information activity lies with the Federation or the Länder or whether parallel powers exist.

The responsibility for the administration of the state and the information activities of the Federal Government that represent an integral part of this responsibility is a manifestation of the overall responsibility of the state. Unlike in the case of legislative and administrative powers, the Basic Law contains no provisions that explicitly cover the power of the government to administer the state. Such powers are, however, tacitly assumed in the Basic Law, for example, in the provisions on the composition and responsibilities of the Federal Government (Article 62 et seq. of the Basic Law) or on the duty of the Federal Government to inform the Bundestag and its committees; the same applies to the duty of the government and its members to answer to the Bundestag and provide the members of the latter with the information required to discharge their duties (see on the latter BVerfGE 13, 123 [125-126]; 57, 1 [5]; 67, 100 [129]). The Federal Government may engage in information work wherever it bears responsibility for the administration of the state as a whole that can be discharged with the help of information. Indications of the existence of such a responsibility can be inferred from other provisions that govern powers, for example, from those governing legislation, and to be sure also independently of concrete legislative initiatives. The Federation is empowered to assume responsibility for the administration of the state in particular in the case of matters that are of a national nature due to the involvement of a foreign component or their cross-border importance and when such that information work throughout the country on the part of the government contributes to effective resolution of the problem. The Federal Government may in such cases take charge of the respective matter, present the issue and assess it for Parliament and the public and, if it considers it necessary to manage the problem, also issue recommendations or warnings.

In addition to empowering the Federal Government to engage in information activity in this manner, the Basic Law at the same time contains a different provision that concerns the Länder under Article 30 of the Basic Law. The provisions of Articles 83 et seq. of the Basic Law are not the standards that determine the power of the Federal Government in the area of information activity. Governmental activity does not include administration within the meaning of these provisions. The Federal Government is not empowered to enforce laws through administrative measures. As a result, the information activity of the Federal Government is unaffected by the provisions of law that empower administrative authorities to inform and warn the public in connection with the enforcement of laws such as s. 8 of the Product Safety Act (Produktsicherheitsgesetz - PSG) of 22 April 1997 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 934]), s. 69.4 of the Medicinal Products Act (Arzneimittelgesetz - AMG) in the version promulgated on 11 December 1998 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 3586) or s. 6 of the Equipment Safety Act (Gerätesicherheitsgesetz - GSG) in the version promulgated on 11 May 2001 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 866).

The information power of the Federal Government does not by any means end where action by governmental bodies with other institutional powers could also be considered for the purposes of managing a crisis, for example, that of the Land governments in connection with their own responsibilities for the administration of the state or that of the administration in connection with the prevention of danger through the police. The purpose could be defeated if the information activities of the Federal Government were to be allowed to include all else required to manage crises, but not reference to the danger of specific circumstances. Completeness of information is an important element of credibility. As regards the aspect of the division of powers at the federal level, there can be no objection to dissemination of information by the Federal Government which to an extent commensurates with the problem and if appropriate in a manner that overlaps with the powers of other governmental bodies since such information activity neither excludes that of the Land governments in their own areas of responsibility nor prevents administrative authorities from discharging their duties.

bb) Article 12.1 of the Basic Law does not protect against the dissemination of information by an agent of governmental power that is substantively accurate and formulated to respect the requirement of objectivity and exercise appropriate restraint.

The substantive accuracy of information is in principle a prerequisite for fostering transparency in the market and as a result its ability to function. An agent of governmental power may, however, under special conditions also be empowered to disseminate information even if the accuracy of such information has not yet been conclusively determined. In such cases, the legitimacy of governmental information activities depends upon whether the facts of matter have been carefully determined possibly prior to dissemination using available sources of information, if appropriate also by hearing those affected, and in an attempt to achieve the reliability possible under the circumstances. If any uncertainty still remains as regards the facts, the state is nevertheless even then not prevented from disseminating the information, in any case not if it is in the public interest that market participants be informed of a circumstance, for example, a danger to consumers, that is important in terms of the course of action they might prefer to take. In such cases, it will be appropriate to inform market participants of any remaining uncertainty as regards the accuracy of the information in order to allow them to make their own decisions as to how to cope with that uncertainty.

Like any governmental activity, information is subject to the requirement of objectivity (see BVerfGE 57, 1 [8]). In the case of information that relates to the market, the requirements to be met also depend on necessities that have to do with the way competition functions. Assessment may not be based on irrelevant considerations. Even if information is accurate, it may not be formulated in an unobjective or denigrating form. The dissemination of information must otherwise be restricted to what is necessary to convey the informational content, taking into account possible disadvantageous effects for any competitors affected.

cc) The area of the fundamental right guaranteed under Article 12.1 of the Basic Law is, however, restricted by activity on the part of the state when such activity is not limited to making available relevant information on the market, which market participants can use as a basis for making independent decisions with respect to their behaviour in the market as a function of their interests. Governmental information activities can constitute restriction of the area of the fundamental right that is guaranteed in particular when their intent and effect serve to replace a governmental measure that would qualify as encroachment upon a fundamental right. The specific constraints of the legal order may not be circumvented by choosing the functional equivalent of such encroachment; on the contrary, the relevant legal requirements pertaining to encroachments on fundamental rights must be fulfilled.

The protected area is also compromised when information proves to be inaccurate in retrospect and is nevertheless disseminated or not corrected despite the fact that it continues to be important in terms of market behaviour. The establishment of an encroachment upon the area of protection in such cases also establishes the existence of an illegal act since there can be no justification for further dissemination of information that is known to be inaccurate.

3. There can be no objection to the challenged publication of the list of wines containing DEG on the basis of these standards. Publication of the list with information on wines containing DEG that was indisputably accurate also did not encroach upon the area covered by the guarantee of the fundamental right of the complainants to exercise an occupation or profession even if it did affect possible sales of wine that did not contain DEG. Publication of the list does not qualify as encroachment. The government respected the legal limits to its information activities.

a) As a measure taken in the context of administration of the state, publication of the list fell into the area of responsibility of the Federal Government. It was in purpose, substance and effect intended to be different to an administrative act.

aa) The Federal Minister for Youth, Family and Health (Bundesminister für Jugend, Familie und Gesundheit) exercised a responsibility of the Federal Government for the administration of the state. Its action was intended to manage a crisis that was a cause of concern to the public and a threat to the supraregional wine market by making available information within the limits of governmental responsibility.

The publication contained relevant information on the market concerning the violation of standards of quality in the case of wine from specific areas and bottlers. The information created transparency and put the suppliers and purchasers involved in the wine market in a position to use knowledge that was important to them but would otherwise not have been accessible to make their own decisions in the context of the market. The content and format of the publication showed that it also served many other purposes. The Federal Government wanted to accommodate public expectations of effective measures to manage the crisis and stabilize the supraregional wine market, which had largely collapsed. In this context, the government wanted to enable suppliers and purchasers to deal with the undesirable and possibly even dangerous situation in an informed and therefore independent manner. It was intended to enable wine merchants to adapt their offerings and consumers their purchasing behaviour on the basis of the information provided. In particular, the list gave wine merchants the possibility of removing the wines in question from their own selection of wines if appropriate as well as the possibility of advertising to make it clear that the German wine sector was involved only to a limited extent and that German wines were affected only to a limited extent. The dissemination of the information was intended to restore the confidence of the market participants in other wines. As regards wines containing DEG, the content of the list represented a warning to consumers; as regards other wines, it represented an all-clear signal. However, it was left up to the market participants to determine the corresponding consequences; the government limited itself to providing the findings of the investigation.

The list constituted a contribution of information against the background of uncertainty on the part of the public, and the Federal Government was also assigned political responsibility for the alleviation of this uncertainty. Its publication was intended to manage the crisis in a complex manner, in particular through the restoration of confidence in the supraregional wine market. It was not - unlike in the case of administrative measures to protect legal interests through the prevention of dangers - intended to deal with concrete individual cases and eliminate the resultant disadvantages for individual persons or classes of persons. The list was in particular not intended to cause the responsible administrative authorities to waive other measures for avoiding danger - for example, through the introduction and enforcement of a ban on the sale of wines containing DEG. Measures on the part of the Länder to avert danger remained possible, as did information activity by the Land governments.

bb) The Federal Minister for Youth, Family and Health acted within the limits of the affairs of his department in compliance with Article 65 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. The Federation had the institutional authority to act for the government. The "glycol scandal" had - as the courts also found - attracted the attention of the entire population and called for a supraregional reaction. The events even extended beyond the territory of the Federal Republic to Austria, where the adulteration with DEG was first detected. It was initially necessary to obtain information from that country through diplomatic channels and deal with issues involving regulation of wine imports by customs. In view of the lack of clarity as to the effects of DEG in wine, it was appropriate to involve the Federal Health Office (Bundesgesundheitsamt - BGA). Cross-border coordination that involved the Federation was also appropriate for the management of the crisis situation. A reaction was also expected of the Federal Government. This was confirmed by a large number of interpellations in the Bundestag concerning the activities of the government as regards this issue. In addition, the media called for clarification and measures by the Federal Government. The government reacted to this manifestation of supraregional public interest in information. The Federal Government could assume that it would not have been possible to satisfy the need for information through activity on the part of the governments of the Länder alone. For that reason, efficient management of the various aspects of the problem was also a consideration that spoke in favour of the necessity of action on the part of the Federation.

b) Publication of the list did not violate standards of accuracy and objectivity.

The accuracy of the information contained in the list was beyond dispute. The details provided in the list were limited to information on the DEG content of the examined wines that was legally not allowed, which information was important in terms of market behaviour. It was made clear under the heading "Important Information" that it was possible that wine that was not adulterated with DEG was available on the market from the same bottler with the same designation and presentation . It was further stated that it should not be inferred from the indication of an appellation that all wines from that region could contain DEG, but that this could be deduced only in connection with the name of the bottler and the official number (Amtliche Prüfungsnummer).

The list also cannot be considered inaccurate on the grounds that the question as to the marketability and the health risks of wines with a low DEG content had not been resolved. There was a need for information on the part of broad segments of the uncertain public. The government communicated the information, to which it had access, on wines containing DEG. The accuracy of this information did not depend on whether a danger existed within the meaning of the regulatory requirements. There was also no obligation to maintain secrecy as regards the knowledge acquired through governmental investigation of the wines mentioned. Furthermore, the accuracy and objectivity of the information was not open to question because it was not possible to investigate all wines for reasons having to do with available capacity.

4. Since the fundamental right of the complainants under Article 12.1 of the Basic Law was not restricted by publication of the list of wines containing DEG, the court decisions under challenge also do violate this fundamental right, at least as regards the outcome. It is also not possible to object on constitutional grounds to the fact that the courts assumed that timely rough orientation for the consumers would have been impossible without mentioning the names of the bottlers and that the information would therefore only to a limited extent have been suitable for management of the problem by the individuals affected.

II.

The remaining challenges as regards fundamental rights are also unsuccessful.

1. Article 14.1 of the Basic Law is not violated for the very reason that the area of protection of the constitutional guarantee of property is not affected by the publication of the list.

The guarantee of property is intended to safeguard the freedom with regard to property of a holder of fundamental rights and to thus allow him to arrange his life autonomously. It protects concrete holdings of property against unjustified encroachment by the public powers. A general guarantee for the value of legal interests in property does not follow from Article 14.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 105, 17 [30]). Article 14.1 of the Basic Law covers only legal interests to which a legal subject is already entitled, but not opportunities and possible earnings in the future (see BVerfGE 68, 193 [222] with further references).

It follows from this that the impairment of possible sales due to the publication of the list advanced by the complainants does not affect any interest that is protected by Article 14.1 of the Basic Law. The property protected under the Basic Law is characterized by the fundamental right afforded the owner to exercise control over that property. This also covers the right of the owner to dispose of property. The right of the complainants to offer their wine on the market was not, however, restricted by the publication of the list. What was restricted according to their submission, was the actual possibility of continuing to sell the products and thereby realize the opportunity to effect the profitable sales inherent in that offer. Whereas the legal right to offer property for sale must be considered part of the estate that is acquired and protected under Article 14.1 of the Basic Law, the actual possibility of a sale has nothing to do with that which has already been acquired, but rather with commercial activity.

A different assessment also does not follow from the aspect of protection of an established and operating commercial enterprise. The Federal Constitutional Court has up to now left open, whether and the extent to which the guarantee of the right of property independently covers an established and operating commercial enterprise as the actual subsumption of the property and rights constituting the assets of a company (see BVerfGE 51, 193 [221-222]; 68, 193 [222-223]).

The constitutional complaints provide no occasion for deciding this question here. Even if mere sales and opportunities for profit or actual circumstances are of considerable importance for the company, they are not assigned to the protected estate of the individual enterprise by the Basic Law as property rights (see BVerfGE 68, 193 [222-223]; 77, 84 [118]; 81, 208 [227-228]).

The situation as regards the damage to the reputation of the company objected to by the complainants is no different. This is in any case not protected by Article 14 of the Basic Law insofar as it involves prospects and favourable opportunities. If the reputation of an enterprise is presented as the result of previous performance, it is also not assigned to the company within the meaning of the property rights protected by Article 14.1 of the Basic Law (see Philipp, Staatliche Verbraucherinformation im Umwelt and Gesundheitsrecht, 1989, pp.175 et seq.)

It is continually redefined in the market through the performance of the company and the image it projects on the one hand and through assessment by market participants on the other hand and is therefore subject to constant change. Article 14 of the Basic Law protects only legal rights assigned by law, but not the result of situational assessment of the market participants, even if this is serious in economic terms.

2. Article 3.1 of the Basic Law is, despite the opinion of the first complainant, not violated because no warnings were issued to the public in the past when monobromacetic acid or homogeneous acetic acid were detected in wine or sparkling wine. A legal measure does not become inequitable because other cases that may have been similar were treated differently. The complainants do not claim arbitrariness in this concrete case, for example, in the form of the use of motives that would have to be disapproved of on objective grounds.

3. Article 2.1 of the Basic Law is excluded as a standard since the questions regarding the protection of competing market participants raised by the constitutional complaints are covered by the objectively more specific fundamental right contained in Article 12.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 25, 88 [101]; 59, 128 [163]; established case law).

XIV. Inviolability of the Home - Article 13 of the Basic Law

1. Right to Inspect Business Premises, BVerfGE 32, 54

Explanatory Annotation

Article 13.1 of the Basic Law protects the home from intrusion by the state subject to now very lengthy exceptions (and counter-exceptions) stipulated - or rather narrated - in Sections 13.2 to 13.7. The case concerned the legality of a statutory right of representatives of the Chamber of Trades and Crafts to enter business premises to assess whether such a business could become a member of the Chamber. The two applicants operated a business that was potentially affected by this statutory right of entry and brought constitutional complaints against this new legislative provision. This complaint could only make sense under the assumption that business premises also partake in the protection of Article 13.1 and not only private residences. The Constitutional Court affirmed the broader scope of Article 13.1 to include business premises as well as private residences on the basis of a noteworthy comparative law exercise.

It should be noted that this question arose again years later in the case law of the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg (ECJ), the Court of the European Union, and the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in Strasbourg, the Court of the European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR). In a case concerning cartel investigations by the Commission of the European Community (as it then was), the ECJ had held, that business premises are not protected by the European Union equivalent of Article 13.1, which the ECJ had in principle recognized under its own doctrine of fundamental rights of the European Union as part of the general principles of European Union law.[150] The ECtHR on the other hand in a later judgment indicated that the protection should be broader and include business premises as well, albeit with the proviso, that the intensity of the protection of business premises is less than that of private residences.[151] In other words the Strasbourg Court chose the same approach as the German Constitutional Court regarding the scope of the rights and the extent of the exceptions. The ECJ subsequently corrected its position and decided that business premises are protected, as demanded by the Strasbourg Court.[152]

Translation of the Right to Inspect Business Premises Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 32, 54*

Headnotes:

1. The term "home" as used in Article 13.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) must be broadly interpreted; it also encompasses workplaces, business premises and offices.

2. The interpretation of the terms "encroachments and restrictions" in Article 13.3 of the Basic Law must take into account the difference in the need for protection of private dwellings on the one hand and workplaces, business premises and offices on the other hand.

Order of the First Senate of 13 October 1971 - 1 BvR 280/66 -

Facts:

The complainants were proprietors of enterprises engaged in craft-like activities. With their constitutional complaint, they directly challenged the right to enter and inspect premises afforded to the Chamber of Skilled Crafts under s. 17 of the Trade and Crafts Code (Gesetz zur Ordnung des Handwerks - HwO) as it would also apply to them in respect of their business premises and offices. S. 17 of the Trade and Crafts Code reads as follows:

(1) Craftsmen who are entered in or are to be entered in the Crafts Register must provide the Chamber of Skilled Crafts with the information required for entry in respect of the nature and scope of their enterprise, the number of skilled and unskilled persons employed by the enterprise and craft-related examinations of the proprietor of the enterprise and the manager of the enterprise.

(2) Agents of the Chamber of Skilled Crafts are empowered to enter the premises and offices of parties required to provide such information and carry out audits and inspections on such premises and in such offices for the purpose specified in paragraph 1. Parties required to provide such information must tolerate such measures. The fundamental right stipulating that the home is inviolable (Article 13 of the Basic Law) is in this regard restricted.

The constitutional complaint was unsuccessful.

Extract from the Grounds:

(The Court ruled as follows on the admissibility of the constitutional complaint lodged directly against s. 17.2 of the Trade and Crafts Code:)

2. Insofar as the constitutional complaint challenges s. 20 in conjunction with s. 17.2 of the Trade and Crafts Code, it is - despite the opinion of the Federal Minister of the Economy - to be considered admissible. The obligation of the complainants to tolerate the measures pursuant to s. 17.2 sentence 2 of the Trade and Crafts Code is directly established by force of law. This obligation does surely presuppose an act on the part of the Chamber of Skilled Crafts, namely, an order to enter the premises to carry out the audit or inspection. However, whether and when the Chamber actually exercises this right lies within its discretion. It may also dispatch its agents to the enterprise at any time without observing any formalities The complainants may not be advised either to contest an impending inspection through the administrative courts beforehand or to initially refuse to allow such inspection, thereby establishing the elements of a regulatory offence (s. 118.1 no. 2 of the Trade and Crafts Code) that may result in regulatory proceedings. They statutory obligation to tolerate inspections is immediately incumbent upon the complainants.

(The Court then proceeds to elaborate on the grounds for the constitutional complaint:)

C. II.

The complainants specifically challenge s. 20 of the Trade and Crafts Code insofar as this provision states that s. 17.2 is applicable. They consider that to allow agents of the Chamber of Skilled Crafts the right to enter their "premises and offices" for the purposes of carrying out "audits and inspections" constitutes a violation of their fundamental right to the inviolability of the home.

The wording and obvious intent of these provisions suggest the assumption that they are meant to allow entry of only premises used for commercial purposes, but not the private dwelling of the proprietor of the enterprise. The challenge of the complainants would therefore be without merit if business premises and offices did not even fall under the term "home" within the meaning of Article 13 of the Basic Law. The Federal Constitutional Court cannot, however, concur with this view, which is also held by the Federal Minister of Justice.

1. Article 13.1 of the Basic Law uses a long established formulation to describe the area of this fundamental right it protects. Article 10 of the Belgian constitution of 1831 had already expressed this fundamental right in a brief and memorable phrase: "Le domicile est inviolable". It was taken over without any change in the section on fundamental rights of the Frankfurt Imperial Constitution (Frankfurter Reichsverfassung) of 1848/49 (s. 140) and in Article 6 of the Prussian Constitution of 5 December 1848/31 January 1850. Article 115 of the Weimar Imperial Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung) then provided: Every German's home is his sanctuary and is inviolable.

Within the jurisdiction of the Prussian Constitution, it was unanimously agreed in case law and the scholarly literature that the term "home" was to be broadly interpreted and also encompassed offices (including those of associations) (see Decisions of the Prussian Higher Administrative Court [Entscheidungen des Preußischen OVG] in PrOVG 1, 375; 27, 325; 49, 207 and in PrVerwBl. vol. 25 (1903/04), p. 795; also Anschütz, The Verfassungsurkunde für den Preußischen Staat, vol. I, 1912, note II 1 on Article 6).

The teachings of constitutional law during the Weimar period overwhelmingly concurred in this opinion (according, for example, to Anschütz, Die Verfassung des Deutschen Reichs, 14th ed., 1933, comment 1 on Article 115; Giese, Die Verfassung des Deutschen Reichs, 8th ed., 1931, note 1 on Article 115).

During the preliminary work, the Herrenchiemsee draft (Article 5) of the version of Article 115 of the Weimar Imperial Constitution was initially used as the basis for the Basic Law. However, the authors finally reverted to the simple formulation of the Prussian Constitution and the Frankfurt Imperial Constitution. There was no intention to change the previous interpretation of the term "home" (see in particular the statements of the Members of the Bundestag Zinn and v. Mangoldt, JbÖffR 1, pp. 139 and 181).

The constitutional literature has consistently adopted this interpretation and includes offices in the area protected by the fundamental right. This serves to emphasize the continuity of the development of the law well as the protective purpose of the provision, which, it was argued, was to safeguard the spatial area for the development of the personality of the individual, including as well, undisturbed occupational activity. Reference is also made to the practical difficulties that would ensue from a narrower interpretation of the term "home" (see in detail the commentaries on the Basic Law: v. Mangoldt-Klein, 2nd ed., vol. I, p. 401; Bonner Kommentar - Zweitbearbeitung (Dagtoglou) - marginal note 21 on Article 13; Maunz-Dürig-Herzog, marginal note 1 on Article 13; also, for example, Gentz, Die Unverletzlichkeit der Wohnung, 1968, pp. 24 et seq. with further bibliography).

A look at foreign provisions shows that a broad interpretation of the term "home" predominates in the case of identical or substantially identical formulations of legal texts (see, for example, for Switzerland BGE 81 I, pp. 119 et seq.; for Austria the decision of the Constitutional Court [Verfassungsgerichtshof] of 22 November 1932 no. 1486, of 14 March 1949 no. 1747, of 2 July 1955 no. 2867 and of 16 December 1965 no. 5182, and Ermacora, Handbuch der Grundfreiheiten und der Menschenrechte; for Italy: Enciclopedia del Diritto XIII [1964], pp. 859 et seq. and Faso, La Liberte di Domicilio, 1968, pp. 34 et seq.; for the USA the dissenting opinion of Justice Frankfurter on Davis v. United States of 10 June 1946 - 328 US 582, 596 and 597 and See v. City of Seattle of 5 June 1967 - 387 US 541).

2. There is no reason to depart from the broad interpretation of the term "home" even if one takes into account the fact that the earlier provisions described above and to some extent also foreign provisions afford the legislature stronger rights of encroachment than are provided under Article 13 of the Basic Law. Since business premises and offices were already considered to belong to the area of the personal sphere of freedom of the citizenry in times when the protection of fundamental rights was in principle significantly less developed and therefore subject to the specific constitutional and statutory provisions intended to protect against trespass, it would be difficult to understand and run counter to the basic tendency of the framers of the Basic Law of 1949 if such premises were now to be generally excepted from the protection of this fundamental right. The interpretation that has since remained unchanged for more than a century has become entrenched as a general legal conviction and lent the fundamental right reach that may be curtailed only if it can be demonstrated that compelling objective reasons require such dilution of substantive content and that the historical development at least does not stand in the way of such dilution. However, as has been shown, the opposite is the case. Not only has the traditional formulation of the fundamental right been taken over without any change, the statements by the authoritative authors that were made to justify this and have remained without contradiction clearly show that the previous interpretation should be retained along with the formulation that has been handed down. There is in no case any reason to suspect that there was any thought of restricting the fundamental right in view of very recent historical experience, which showed the vulnerability of precisely this area of life to encroachment by the public powers. Only a broad interpretation can do justice to the principle according to which in cases of doubt that interpretation is to be chosen that most strongly gives effect to the legal force of the fundamental right (BVerfGE 6, 55 [72]).

It is moreover consistent with the principles that the Federal Constitutional Court has developed for the purposes or interpretation of the fundamental right of occupational freedom. If occupational activity is considered to constitute a significant aspect of the development of an individual's personality and is therefore afforded an especially high level of importance in the context of the conduct of the life of the individual (BVerfGE 7, 377 [397]; 13, 97 [104-105]), it is then only logical to afford the spatial area in which this work takes place commensurately, effective legal protection and in any case refrain in the absence of any compelling necessity from curtailing the constitutional protection of such space already in place. In this context, mention must be made of the fact that only this interpretation also allows legal entities and associations to benefit from the protection of this fundamental right that they have, according to prevailing opinion enjoyed up to now.

The wording of Article 13.1 of the Basic Law can on the other hand not be considered of decisive importance. The linguistic cloak of this fundamental right has been such as to sacrifice legal precision for the solemn pathos of a memorable phrase. "Home" is in this context always to be understood in the sense of the "private spatial sphere."

3. The narrower interpretation of the term "home" advocated by the Federal Minister of Justice is obviously also motivated by a concern that it would not be possible to uphold many customary rights of administrative authorities to enter and inspect premises in connection with business, labour and fiscal oversight if business premises and offices were to be included in the area of protection of Article 13 of the Basic Law since they would no longer be covered by the restrictive provision contained in Article 13.3 of the Basic Law. Even if this were the case, it would seem questionable to define the sphere of operation of the fundamental right on the basis of the restrictive provision and argue, for example, thus: a narrower interpretation must be chosen that would render the restrictions meaningless because a broad interpretation would present practical difficulties. In fact, the substantive content of the fundamental right must be determined first; only then may restrictions on the exercise of the fundamental right that are defensible under the rule of law be defined, taking into account the basic presumption of freedom and the constitutional principles of proportionality and reasonableness. Furthermore, the practical difficulties feared by the Federal Minister of Justice can to a great extent be overcome, as will be shown, through a differentiating interpretation.

4. a) Inclusion of offices in the area of protection of Article 13 of the Basic Law means first of all that "searches" of such premises may in principle be ordered only by a judge (paragraph 2). The Federal Minister of Justice recognizes that the same need for protection exists in principle as in the case of dwellings, and he is of the opinion that there is no question of any restriction of the basic requirement for a previous judicial order in view of the protection against searches that also applies to commercial and business premises that has long been acknowledged in all constitutional democracies and also in Germany. This end cannot, however, be achieved with sufficient certainty as regards compliance with constitutional law with a narrower interpretation of the term "home."

   It is not necessary to decide in detail here how far the term "search" can be extended under constitutional law (see on this Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court [Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE] 28, 285); for rights to entry and inspection under legislation governing the exercise of crafts are not searches.

   b) The inviolability of the home in principle is secured in Article 13.3 of the Basic Law by the fact that "encroachments and restrictions," which are not "searches," may be carried out only under very specific, precisely described conditions. In the case of homes in the narrower sense, the strict limitation of permissible encroachments reflects the basic requirement of unconditional respect for the private sphere of the citizenry. The Federal Minister of Justice does go too far in assuming that the restrictions in paragraph 3 are "in substance adapted (only) to dwellings;" for entry of business premises and workplaces by the responsible authorities can be expeditious and necessary "to combat the danger of an epidemic" as well as "to protect young persons at risk" (namely, under the aspect of protection of minors in the workplace). However, it may in fact seem that there is some question as to whether a sufficient constitutional basis exists for the right afforded governmental authorities under a series of laws, to enter business premises for control purposes and carry out inspections and audits of various kinds if offices are included within the sphere of operation of Article 13.3 of the Basic Law. In some cases, the purpose, which is "to confront an acute danger to public safety and order," will surely justify encroachment, especially under the broad interpretation of this clause such as that used as the basis for the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court of 13 February 1964 (BVerfGE 17, 232 [251-252]) that encompasses confrontation of pending danger. However, to the extent that the authorities responsible for the supervision of business, labour and fiscal matters are afforded the right to enter business premises and offices for the purposes of auditing books and records or inspecting merchandise and facilities by virtue of the proprietor's duty to disclose information, it would be possible to infer a constitutional basis for these measures compatible with customary interpretation only by extending the area of application of paragraph 3 to a degree that can no longer be justified. On the other hand, it is necessary to agree with the Minister in that such rights of entry and inspection often represent an indispensable control instrument for modern oversight of business activities; such rights are even becoming more important for effective and uniform law enforcement as governmental controls make inroads into the management of private companies and business oversight in the broadest sense becomes commensurately more sophisticated and intensive.

The Federal Minister of Justice assumes that it was not the intention of the Parliamentary Council to eliminate these rights - of which it was aware - of governmental authorities to enter and inspect premises; he is of the opinion that these cases were "obviously not taken into consideration" when Article 13.3 of the Basic Law was formulated. This opinion is also found in the scholarly literature (see, for example, the commentaries of Maunz-Dürig-Herzog, marginal note 22 on Article 13; v. Mangoldt-Klein, 2nd ed., vol. I, pp. 405-406 and Kern in Neumann-Nipperdey-Scheuner, Die Grundrechte, vol. II, pp. 105 et seq.).

Accordingly, as the Minister emphasizes, the federal legislature has always assumed since the Basic Law went into force that such rights to enter and inspect premises were not excluded by Article 13.3 of the Basic Law. Of course, the Minister correctly rejects reliance on customary law to justify continuation of this assessment. Very basic reservations speak against the assumption of any restriction of rights of freedom by customary law in view of the fact that the framers of the Basic Law always carefully adapted restrictions as a function of the nature of the individual fundamental rights. Establishment with certainty of a common legal conviction on the part of all parties involved would moreover be hardly possible in this area.

c) Given this situation, an interpretation would seem appropriate and permissible. One that starts initially with the terms "encroachments and restrictions" and interprets them in a manner that does justice to the protective purpose of the fundamental right, reflects the discernible will of the framers of the Basic Law, but also appropriately takes into account the objective necessities of the administration of the modern state. This interpretation is based on the assumption that - if business premises and offices are also in principle included within the area of protection of Article 13 of the Basic Law - the need for protection of all premises to be assigned to the "private spatial sphere" does in fact vary in degree. Business premises and offices are, because of the nature of their purpose, more amenable to greater openness "to the outside;" they are intended to be used for the purposes of social contact, and the occupant therefore releases them to a certain extent from the private intimate sphere to which the home in the narrower sense of the term belongs. It is in keeping with the greater need to keep disruptions at a distance from private life and the spatial sphere in which it unfolds that the terms "encroachments and restrictions" are more strictly interpreted when they refer to the home in the narrower sense. That means that a right to enter and inspect premises in provisions of the nature at issue here is excluded. For this is where the full effect of the protective purpose of the fundamental right, which is to safeguard the right of the individual "to be left in peace," (BVerfGE 27, 1 [6]) comes to bear. This also applies when a professional or commercial activity is exercised on these premises at the same time. In the case of premises used exclusively for commercial or business purposes, this need for protection is reduced by the purpose that the occupant himself wants them to fulfil. The activities that the occupant of these premises pursues necessarily have an effect toward the outside and can therefore also affect the interests of others and those of the general public. It is then logical that the authorities charged with the protection of these interests also monitor such activities on site within certain limits and may enter the premises for this purpose. This purposeful process is not actually trespassing. The proprietor of the enterprise will accordingly not, as a rule, perceive entry of the premises by agents of the authorities as an encroachment upon his householder's rights. His psychological resistance might be directed against the inspection and audit itself, which he considers unnecessary, burdensome and therefore unreasonable; he will generally not view mere entry of the premises, which he himself has opened to the outside through its dedicated purpose, as a restriction of the sphere protected by his fundamental right.

If one assumes along with the Federal Minister of Justice that because of the inconsistency of the provision that Article 13.3 of the Basic Law was "from the outset" not supposed to apply to customary rights to enter and inspect business premises and offices, the assumption that the Parliamentary Council also proceeded from this "unbiased" perspective would not seem unwarranted. It must be left to the legislature to determine at the appropriate time whether there is occasion for unambiguous expression of this will through reformulation of the text of the Basic Law.

5. If the bounds of the rights to enter and inspect business premises and offices that are accordingly no longer to be qualified as "encroachments and restrictions" are defined objectively, namely, taking into account Article 2.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the principles of proportionality and reasonableness, it then follows that in particular the following conditions must be required:

a) the entry of premises must be authorized by a specific provision of law;

b) the entry of premises and the conduct of inspections and audits must serve a legitimate purpose and be necessary to achieve this purpose;

c) the law must make it possible to clearly recognize the purpose of entry, the objective and the scope of the permissible inspection and audit;

d) the entry of the premises and the conduct of the inspection and audit must be allowed only at times at which the premises are normally available for the respective business or commercial use.

Although entry of business premises and offices by agents of the authorities in connection with their duties is not to be considered a restriction of the right of inviolability of the home under these conditions, it cannot by the nature of things be excluded that the administrative action it serves to implement may as such be objected to under other constitutional aspects.

6. If these standards are applied, there can be no constitutional objections as regards the provisions ss. 20 and 17.2 of the Trade and Crafts Code under challenge here. They serve the legitimate interests of the administration and do not unreasonably burden the proprietor of the enterprise. His private dwelling is not affected.

2. Acoustic Surveillance, BVerfGE 109, 279

Explanatory Annotation

Article 13 of the Basic Law is devoted to the privacy of the home. Originally three short subsections were sufficient to achieve the goal. However, in 1998 four new subsections were inserted and Article 13 inflated to over 340 words. The reason for this amendment of Article 13 was to enable the acoustic surveillance of homes in the context of the prosecution of serious crimes in the context of organized crime and international terrorism.

The Court addressed the 'eternity clause' of Article 79.3, which limits the scope of constitutional amendments by safeguarding the principles of Article 1 and 20. As in the case concerning the privacy of mail and other communication, the Court went on to explain that this limitation of the constitutional legislator must be narrowly interpreted and does not preclude amendments to the scope of guarantees. It also does not preclude that the government in the context of the prosecution of serious crimes takes to clandestine measures of which those observed do not know.

However, the Court did define limits. Acoustic surveillance will not be compatible with the human dignity core of the protection of Article 13 if it reaches into the very private sphere of an individual. The Court specifically mentioned sexual relationships as one example and communication with close family members and a spouse as another, albeit even more complicated example, because the conversation with family members could, of course, also yield the very information about the criminal activity, which the observers are after. The surveillance activity must immediately be curtailed when such situations arise or are foreseeable; any information so obtained must be immediately destroyed and cannot be used in court. This obviously complicates matters for the authorities considerably as they will have to carefully tread and instantly decide when to turn the microphone off. The Court also placed time limits on this type of surveillance. Acoustic surveillance around the clock and for a longer time in the private home is not possible. The Court went on to hold that the specific provisions in the Criminal Procedure Code dealing with the acoustic surveillance are not sufficient to secure the limitations spelled out.

2. The inviolability of human dignity under Article 1.1 of the Basic Law includes recognition of a core area of private conduct of life that is afforded absolute protection. This area may not be encroached upon through acoustic surveillance of private dwellings for the purposes of prosecution of criminal offences (Article 13.3 of the Basic Law). As a result, the inviolability of the home (Article 13.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law) and the interest in prosecution of criminal offences may not be balanced against one another according to the principle of proportionality.

3. Not every form of acoustic surveillance of private dwellings constitutes a violation of the substantive content of human dignity under Article 13.1 of the Basic Law.

4. Legal power to permit surveillance of private dwellings must contain safeguards for the inviolability of human dignity and be consistent with the requirements defined in Article 13.3 of the Basic Law as well as the other constitutional requirements.

5. If acoustic surveillance of a private dwelling on the basis of such power does nevertheless result in the collection of information from the protected core area of private conduct of life that is afforded absolute protection, it must be terminated and the recordings deleted; any use of such information is prohibited.

6. The provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code (Strafprozessordnung - StPO) that govern the acoustic surveillance of private dwellings for the purposes of prosecution of criminal offences do not completely satisfy the requirements of the Basic Law in respect of the protection of human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law), the principle of proportionality embodied in the principle of the rule of law, the guarantee of effective recourse to the courts (Article 19.4 of the Basic Law) and the right to a hearing in accordance with the law (Article 103.1 of the Basic Law).

Judgment of the First Senate of 3 March 2004 - 1 BvR 2378/98 -/- 1 BvR 1084/99 -

Facts:

The constitutional complaints are directed immediately at Articles 13.3 to 13.6 of the Basic Law and the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code that permit acoustic surveillance of private dwellings for the purposes of prosecution of criminal offences.

The new paragraphs 3-6 were inserted into Article 13 of the Basic Law by constitutional amendment in March 1998. They served as the basis for the inclusion of new provisions governing acoustic surveillance of private dwellings in the Criminal Procedure Code through the Act on the Improvement of the Fight against Organized Crime (Gesetz zur Verbesserung der Bekämpfung der Organisierten Kriminalität - OrgKVerbG) of May 1998.

According to the new s. 100c.1 no. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code, technical means may be employed to monitor and record the words of a suspect spoken in the privacy of the home if certain facts support the suspicion that he has committed one of the criminal offences specified in the provision, i.e., one of what are referred to as catalogue offences. The catalogue includes in particular offences that are considered typical of the phenomenon of organized crime. Various offences against the security of the state are also included. According to s. 100c.2 sentence 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code, surveillance activities may be directed only against the actual suspects. However, s. 100c.2 sentence 5 of the Criminal Procedure Code makes it explicitly clear that the private dwellings of other persons may also be monitored if the presence of a suspect in such dwellings can be - with the same degree of suspicion, assumed. Surveillance may pursuant to s. 100d.2 of the Criminal Procedure Code be ordered only by a state security chamber of a Regional Court (Landgericht) or, in the case of imminent danger, by its president. As regards the interception and recording of communication between suspects and persons who enjoy the right to refuse to give testimony, s. 100d.3 of the Criminal Procedure Code makes a distinction between persons afforded the professional privilege mentioned in s. 53 of the Criminal Procedure Code and relatives and care professionals who have a right to confidential communication within the meaning of ss. 52 and 53a of the Criminal Procedure Code. Evidence may not be collected in the case of conversations involving persons who enjoy professional privilege. In the case of relatives and care professionals, on the other hand, the provision prohibits only the use of evidence and is not absolute, but explicitly subject to the application of the principle of proportionality. According to s. 100d.6 of the Criminal Procedure Code, legal remedies are also available after termination of surveillance activities.

SS. 100 et seq. of the Criminal Procedure Code govern the use of the knowledge obtained. Personal information acquired through surveillance under s. 100c.1 no. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code may in principle be used for the purposes of criminal proceedings. This can also refer to the proceedings in connection with which the measure was ordered or other criminal proceedings (s. 100d.5 sentence 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code) involving a catalogue offence pursuant to s. 100c.1 no. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Paragraph 1 also permits use for preventive police purposes to a limited extent.

The constitutional complaints directed immediately against Articles 13.3 to 13.6 of the Basic Law were dismissed; they were in part successful in respect of the surveillance measures in connection with criminal proceedings.

C.

The constitutional complaints are, to the extent admissible, in part, founded. The amendment of Article 13.3 of the Basic Law does surely comply with the requirements of Article 79 of the Basic Law. The challenged provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code are on the other hand not entirely consistent with the Basic Law.

I.

Article 13.3 of the Basic Law, which was inserted by constitutional amendment, is in compliance with the Basic Law.

1. Article 13.3 of the Basic Law permits restriction of the fundamental right of inviolability of the home contained in Article 13.1 of the Basic Law. This fundamental right affords the individual a fundamental living space and guarantees the right to be left in peace within this space (see BVerfGE 32, 54 [75]; 42, 212 [219]; 51, 97 [110]. Article 13.1 of the Basic Law protects the private spatial sphere in particular in the form of a defensive right (see BVerfGE 7, 230 [238]; 65, 1 [40]).

The provision, which is directed at the holders of public powers, contains a fundamental prohibition not only against entering and remaining in a private dwelling against the will of the occupant (see BVerfGE 76, 83 [89-90]), but also against the installation or use of acoustic surveillance devices (see BVerfGE 65, 1 [40]).

At the time of the creation of the Basic Law, the fundamental right under Article 13.1 thereof served primarily to protect occupants against the undesired physical presence of representatives of governmental power. Since that time, new possibilities for endangering the fundamental right have been added. The current state of technology also makes it possible to intrude upon the spatial sphere in other ways. The protective purpose of the provision containing the fundamental right would be defeated if the protection of private dwellings against surveillance with technical means were not also covered by paragraph 1 even when such means are used outside dwellings. Article 13.3 of the Basic Law therefore creates a constitutive restriction of the fundamental right under Article 13.1 of the Basic Law.

2. The formalities for the proper adoption of Article 13.3 of the Basic Law were complied with.

Article 13.3 of the Basic Law was inserted into the Basic Law by the Act Amending the Basic Law of 26 March 1998, which explicitly supplements the wording of the Basic Law (see Article 79.1 of the Basic Law). The law adopting the constitutional amendment was enacted by a two-thirds majority of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat in compliance with Article 79.2 of the Basic Law.

3. The legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment also respected the substantive limits to constitutional amendment drawn by the Basic Law.

a) Article 79.3 of the Basic Law prohibits amendments to the Basic Law that affect the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 of the Basic Law. These include the principle of respect for and protection of human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law), but also recognition of inviolable and inalienable human rights as the basis of every community, of peace and of justice (Article 1.2 of the Basic Law). In conjunction with the reference to the following fundamental rights contained in Article 1.3 of the Basic Law, the guarantees of these rights are in principle immune to restriction since they are indispensable to the maintenance of an order in compliance with Articles 1.1 and 1.2 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 84, 90 [121]).

   The fundamental elements of the principles of the rule of law and the social state expressed in Articles 20.1 and 20.3 of the Basic Law must also be respected.

   Article 79.3 of the Basic Law provides for an exception that must be narrowly interpreted; it does not prevent the legislature from adopting amendments to modify those aspects of these principles embodied in positive law for appropriate reasons (see BVerfGE 84, 90 [120-121]; 94, 49 [102-103]).

The Federal Constitutional Court must respect the right of the legislature to amend, restrict or even suspend individual fundamental rights as long as it does not affect the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 of the Basic Law. The legislature is not prohibited from modifying those aspects of these principles that are embodied in positive law for appropriate reasons (see BVerfGE 94, 49 [103-104]).What the substantive guarantee contained in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law encompasses as regards the individual fundamental rights must be established through independent interpretation of each individual provision.

Constitutional amendments are not to be measured against the guarantee of the essence of the fundamental rights contained in Article 19.2 of the Basic Law. This guarantee is binding upon the ordinary legislature, but not upon the legislature with the power to amend the Basic Law. An effect on the essence of a fundamental right within the meaning of Article 19.2 of the Basic Law may surely at the same time restrict the substantive content of human dignity covered by a fundamental right protected by Article 79.3 of the Basic Law in an individual case. The essence of a fundamental right may not, however, be equated with the aspect of human dignity contained in that right. The possibility of congruency in the individual case does not in any way change the fact that the aspect of human dignity contained in a fundamental right, which is protected by Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, is the sole standard for measurement of the restriction of a fundamental right through constitutional amendment.

b) Article 13.3 of the Basic Law is compatible with the guarantee of human dignity under Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

A more tangible standard for the measurement of human dignity is obtained through examination of the specific situation in which a conflict may arise. Acoustic surveillance of private dwellings for the purposes of prosecution of criminal offences will generally not violate the aspect of human dignity contained in Article 13.1 of the Basic Law and Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. However, the nature and manner in which the surveillance of private dwellings is carried out may result in a situation in which human dignity is violated. Article 13.3 of the Basic Law works counter to this possibility through explicit legal precautions; further requirements also exist that can be inferred from interpretation of the Basic Law. The power to authorize acoustic surveillance of private dwellings under Article 13.3 of the Basic Law does not therefore violate Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, for the necessary provision of law can and must ensure that human dignity is not violated in the individual case. The power pursuant to Article 13.3 of the Basic Law covers the enactment of only such provisions as contain such a guarantee.

aa) Human dignity is a fundamental constitutional principle and a paramount constitutional value (see BVerfGE 6, 32 [36]; 45, 187 [227]; 72, 105 [115]). The substantive content of the guarantee of this term, which implies value judgments, must be concretely defined. This is done by the courts on the basis of the facts involved in the individual case by examining the respective area of life affected by provisions of law and isolating classes of cases and typical examples (see on Article 100 of the Bavarian Constitution [Verfassung des Freistaates Bayern - BV], for example, Bavarian Constitutional Court [Bayerischer Verfassungsgerichtshof - Bay-VerfGH], BayVBl 1982, p. 47 [50]).

In this context, the term "human dignity" is often described through inference from the act of violation (see BVerfGE 1, 97 [104]; 27, 1 [6]; 30, 1 [25]; 72, 105 [115 et seq.]).

Immediately following the experiences of the period of National Socialism, phenomena such as abuse, persecution and discrimination were initially at the center of consideration. As the Federal Constitutional Court phrased it in one of its first decisions, what was at issue in particular was protection against "humiliation, stigmatization, persecution, ostracism, etc." (see BVerfGE 1, 97 [104]).

Thereafter, the guarantee of human dignity became the standard of measurement for new threats, for example, the abuse of the collection and use of data in the 1980s (see BVerfGE 65, 1).Violation of principles of humanity, including those involving the collection and dissemination of information, was one of the issues addressed by the courts in their efforts to deal with past injustice in the German Democratic Republic (see BVerfGE 93, 213 [243]).

Currently, the debate over the substantive content of human dignity is conditioned by questions involving the protection of personal identity and psychological and social integrity.

(1) The Federal Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasized that it is incompatible with human dignity to make human beings mere objects of governmental power (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [25-26 and 39 et seq.]; 96, 375 [399]). For example, criminals may not be treated in a manner that violates their constitutionally protected right to social esteem and respect and thereby reduced to mere objects of crime prevention and prosecution (see BVerfGE 45, 187 [228]; 72, 105 [116]).

However, limits are also set to the potential of the term "object" (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [25]).

Human beings are not infrequently mere objects, not only of circumstances and social developments, but also of the law that they must obey. Human dignity is not violated merely because a person becomes the object of criminal prosecution measures, but it is when the nature of the measures taken is in principle such as to call into question the quality of the person involved as a subject. This is the case when treatment by the public powers is lacking in respect for the value that every human being represents in his own right. Such measures may also not be taken in the interest of achievement of efficient criminal justice and investigation.

In this context, covert activity on the part of the state does not in itself lead to a violation of the right to respect, which is afforded absolute protection. In the event a person becomes the object of observation, this does not compellingly entail a disregard for that person's value as a human being. In the case of such observation, an inviolable core area of private conduct of life must be preserved (see on the guarantee thereof BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]; 27, 1 [6]; 32, 373 [378-379]; 34, 238 [245]; 80, 367 [373]).

Were the state to intrude upon this area, this would infringe the inviolable freedom guaranteed all human beings to personal development as regards strictly personal matters. Even the predominant interests of the general public cannot justify encroachment upon this core area of private conduct of life, which is afforded absolute protection (see BVerfGE 34, 238 [245]).

(2) The protection of human dignity is also concretely embodied in the fundamental right under Article 13.1 of the Basic Law. The inviolability of the home is intimately related to human dignity and at the same time closely associated with the constitutional requirement of unconditional respect for the individual's exclusively private sphere of - "strictly personal" - development. Individuals are to be afforded the right to be left in peace, especially in their private dwellings (see BVerfGE 75, 318 [328]; see also BVerfGE 51, 97 [110]).

Development of personality in the core area of private conduct of life includes the possibility of expressing internal processes such as emotions and feelings as well as thoughts, opinions and experiences of a strictly personal nature, and to do so without fear of surveillance by governmental agencies. This protection also encompasses emotional expression, expression of unconscious experience and forms of sexual expression. The possibility of such development presupposes that the individual has appropriate free space for such purposes. Confidential communication also requires a spatial substratum, in any case wherever the legal system affords special protection; for the strictly personal conduct of life and citizens rely on such protection. This will regularly be a private dwelling that can be closed to others. If individuals have such space, they can be alone and develop freely in accordance with standards they set for themselves. A private home is an "ultimate refuge" that constitutes a means of safeguarding human dignity. This does not require absolute protection of the premises constituting the private dwelling, but it does require protection of conduct on these premises to the extent that such conduct represents individual development within the core area of private conduct of life.

(3) This protection may not be relativized by balancing it against the interests of the prosecution of criminal offences on the basis of the principle of proportionality (see BVerfGE 34, 238 [245]; see also BVerfGE 75, 369 [380]; 93, 266 [293]).

There will always be suspicions of especially serious forms of crime and situations involving suspicions of such crimes that will to some seem to make the expediency of criminal justice outweigh the preservation of the human dignity of suspects.

However, Article 1.1 and Article 79.3 of the Basic Law prohibit an evaluation of such kind on the part of the state.

bb) Acoustic surveillance of private dwellings for the purposes of prosecution of criminal offences violates human dignity when the core area of private conduct of life is not respected.

Whether the facts of a case warrant assignment to the inviolate core area depends upon whether the substantive content is of a strictly personal nature and therefore also upon the nature and intensity of the effect had upon the sphere of others or the interests of society (see BVerfGE 80, 367 [374]).

The specific circumstances involved in the individual case are what matter (see BVerfGE 34, 238 [248]; 80, 367 [374]).

Of decisive importance in a given situation is whether the inviolable core area of private conduct of life is affected in the individual case as evidenced by concrete indications or typically and without actual evidence to the contrary, for example, in the course of observation of expressions of innermost feelings or forms of sexual expression.

cc) The power to authorize surveillance of private dwellings by law under Article 13.3 of the Basic Law does not violate Article 79.3 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law since it permits only provisions of law and measures based on such provisions that respect these limits. Limitations to this constitutional power are contained in Article 13.3 of the Basic Law on the one hand, but also follow from other provisions to be taken into consideration in the course of a systematic interpretation of the Basic Law. To the extent that elements of the principle of proportionality are of importance, they do not call into question the absolute nature of the protection of human dignity. Furthermore, the principle of proportionality may be applied as an additional restriction only in cases in which a surveillance measure does not violate human dignity. In this context, commensurate limitations of the power to conduct acoustic surveillance of private dwellings are, however, also intended to exclude the possibility of violation of the substantive content of Article 13.3 as regards human dignity in connection with the execution of the corresponding measures.

(1) Article 13.3 of the Basic Law governs substantive and procedural prerequisites for legal encroachment.

Acoustic surveillance within the meaning of Article 13.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is permissible only to prosecute specific individuals, especially serious criminal offences when suspicion of such offences is supported by certain facts (see Bundestag document 13/8650, pp. 4 et seq.).

The legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment had at the time primarily criminal offences in mind that are typically perpetrated by groups that proceed in an organized manner and in particular by perpetrators involved in what is referred to as organized crime (see Bundestag document 13/8650, p. 4; 13/9660, p. 3). Investigations of such criminal offences will regularly not be limited to the possibility of public indictment, conviction and enforcement of punishment. Although the goal of the legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment that is documented in the legislative materials is achieved, which is to penetrate the core area of organized crime and permit elucidation of its structures, there is a possibility that this may indirectly serve at the same time to prevent further criminal offences.

Article 13.3 of the Basic Law also requires that alternative methods of investigating the matter be disproportionately difficult or unproductive. As a result, the very wording of the Basic Law makes it clear that acoustic surveillance is a measure that constitutes especially serious encroachment upon the fundamental right to protection of the home and represents the last resort in the context of prosecution of criminal offences. Surveillance of a private dwelling otherwise comes into question only when, and as long as, the suspect is likely to be present in that dwelling.

The legislature that adopted the amendment of the Basic Law ensured compliance with procedural requirements by requiring a judicial order for surveillance measures. In so doing, the legislature provided that the order must be issued in principle by a panel composed of three judges and for a limited period of time.

(2) Article 13.3 of the Basic Law does not explicitly describe all limits to the use of acoustic surveillance of private dwellings for the purposes of prosecution of criminal offences that derive from the requirement that the inviolable core area of private conduct of life be afforded absolute protection. Further limits follow - as in the case of all provisions relating to fundamental rights - from other provisions of the Basic Law. In the case of modification of provisions relating to fundamental rights, the legislature that adopts a constitutional amendment is also under no obligation to reiterate all relevant constitutional rules that otherwise apply. Review against the standard of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law is therefore subject to Article 13.3 of the Basic Law in conjunction with such other constitutional rules.

(a) Restrictions of constitutional rights inserted through constitutional amendment must therefore be systematically interpreted against the background of other provisions containing fundamental rights, in particular Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, and construed by applying the principle of proportionality (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [20-21]).

In the case of a provision created through constitutional amendment, the limits to interpretation of constitutional law also lie where a provision with unambiguous wording and intent yields an opposite meaning, the substantive content of the provision to be interpreted is fundamentally redefined or the provision fails in an essential point to achieve its goal (see BVerfGE 11, 77 [84-85]; 33, 52 [69]; 54, 277 [299]; 82, 1 [11 et seq.]).

(b) There is no reason to assume that these limits have been transgressed in the present case. For Article 13.3 of the Basic Law authorizes only implementation in the form of legislation that adequately takes into account the limits to encroachment imposed by Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. This must also be complemented by reference to the principle of proportionality. Such interpretation is not in contradiction with the will of the legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment.

The deliberations over the constitutional amendment did surely involve significant controversy as regards the legal requirements to be put in place for acoustic surveillance of private dwellings, and efforts to modify the version of Article 13.3 of the Basic Law that was ultimately adopted were not successful. This did not, however, indicate that it was the will of the legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment to exclude further concretization through other provisions of the Basic Law. For example, the report of the Committee on Legal Affairs of the Bundestag on the draft of the act to amend Article 13 of the Basic Law explicitly mentions that the possibility of electronic surveillance of private dwellings is excluded from the outset in cases that fall into the inviolable core area of private conduct of life protected by Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. Examples mentioned included priest-penitent communication and strictly personal communication with immediate family members. It was added that the principle of proportionality is applicable only when the core area that is afforded absolute protection is not affected. To take into account such cases, reference was made to the further necessity of ensuring that the more intensive the surveillance becomes, the more stringent become the requirements for permitting encroachment in the individual instance (see Bundestag document 13/9660, p. 4). These considerations show that the legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment also proceeded on the basis of the assumption of the necessity of restrictive interpretation of Article 13.3 of the Basic Law, especially as regards human dignity. The legislature assumed in this context that this requirement is also fulfilled by Article 13.3 of the Basic Law, which is already very detailed, without further explicit precautions.

The rejection of motions to include further restrictions in Article 13.3 of the Basic Law, in particular rights to refuse to give testimony, did not mean that the primacy of the guarantee of human dignity was called into question under the amended provision of the Basic Law. Corresponding statements are also not found in the records of the parliamentary deliberations. Furthermore, the relevance of other provisions of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 13.3 of the Basic Law was explicitly emphasized, for example by the Member of the Bundestag Schily when he submitted that the fact that Article 1 of the Basic Law must be respected when deciding whether acoustic surveillance may be carried out could lead to a situation in which surveillance would have to be foregone from the outset (see Member of the Bundestag Schily, 214th session of the 13th German Bundestag of 16 January 1998, Stenographic Record vol. 191, p. 19549).

The Member of the Bundestag also expressed his opinion to the effect that those constitutional guarantees that apply in any case need not be mentioned in Article 13.3 of the Basic Law (see Member of the Bundestag Schily, 197th session of the 13th German Bundestag of 9 October 1997, Stenographic Record vol. 189, p. 17694).

(c) Article 13.3 of the Basic Law is to be understood to mean that its statutory embodiment must preclude collection of information through acoustic surveillance of private dwellings whenever investigatory activities would intrude upon the inviolable area of private conduct of life protected by Article 13.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 and Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

dd) Accordingly, this calls for provisions of law that respect the principle of statutory certainty and ensure that acoustic surveillance of private dwellings is by nature and manner such as not to entail any violation of human dignity. It is necessary to refrain from surveillance from the outset in situations in which there are indications to the effect that such activities will result in violation of human dignity. If acoustic surveillance of a dwelling otherwise unexpectedly results in the collection of absolutely privileged information, it must be terminated and the recordings deleted; any use of such absolutely privileged data in connection with the prosecution of criminal offences is prohibited.

(1) Precautions intended to protect human dignity are necessary not only in situations in which an individual is alone, but also when such an individual is engaged in communication with others (see BVerfGE 6, 389 [433]; 35, 202 [220].

As human beings, individuals are also of necessity involved in social relationships within the core area of personality (see BVerfGE 80, 367 [374]).

A situation cannot therefore be classified as belonging to the inviolable area of private conduct of life or - if that area is not involved - to the social realm, which is under certain conditions exposed to governmental intervention, simply as a function of whether a matter of importance or concern to society is present; what is of decisive importance is in fact the nature and intensity in the concrete case (see BVerfGE 80, 367 [374]).

(2) The content of communication that contains information on criminal offences that have been committed does not fall into the inviolable core area of private conduct of life (see BVerfGE 80, 367 [375]).

It does not, however, follow from this that just any given link between the suspicion of commission of a criminal offence and the statements of a suspect suffices to confirm the existence of a concern of society. Recordings or statements made in the context of a conversation between two individuals that, for example, convey exclusively personal impressions and feelings and contain no indications of any concrete criminal offence do not take on the nature of a public concern simply because they may reveal the origins or motives for criminal conduct. A concern of society can on the other hand be assumed to exist with sufficient certainty in the case of statements that relate directly to a concrete criminal offence.

(3) Interception of non-public utterances spoken in private dwellings is prohibited in order to avoid encroachment upon the core area of private conduct of life when an individual is alone in a private dwelling or exclusively with other persons with whom that individual enjoys a special confidential relationship that falls into the core area of protection - for example, with family members or other very close confidants - and no concrete indications exist to the effect that the expected content of the communication will relate directly to a criminal offence. To be sure, not all communication between an individual and very close confidants in a private dwelling falls into the core area of private conduct of life. This is, however, to be assumed in the interest of effective protection of human dignity. Surveillance measures are prohibited when it is probable that absolutely privileged communication will be affected.

(4) The content of communication constitutes the standard to be applied for the purposes of classification of a situation. It will normally be possible to determine with certainty whether a situation is to be classified as belonging to the area that is strictly personal or to the social realm only after the information has been obtained. In order to safeguard the core area of private conduct of life, actual indications must be present that make it possible to infer that the communication is such that it would at least typically not relate to the strictly private area before measures involving acoustic surveillance of private dwellings are undertaken. Investigatory measures are prohibited whenever it is probable that the interception of non-public words spoken in private dwellings will result in violation of the core area of protection.

In assessing a situation prior to the commencement of surveillance measures, prosecuting authorities must take into account possible indications of activities relating to the core area in the private dwelling that will be the object of surveillance. This is also possible in actual practice.

(a) Initial bases for assessment of the situation can be inferred from the nature of the premises to be subjected to surveillance:

(i) For example, communication that takes place in commercial and business premises will regularly be of a business nature and therefore typically involve a social relationship (see BVerfGE 34, 238 [248]).Communication in premises that are used exclusively for commercial or business purposes is surely included under the protection provided by Article 13.1 of the Basic Law, but does not in the absence of a link between the concrete communication and the core area of personality involve the substantive content of human dignity embodied in the fundamental right. Business premises are, because of their intended use, by their very nature more open to the outside (see BVerfGE 32, 54 [75]).

They will regularly lack the intimacy and security of a private dwelling. As a result, business premises will in the typical case be justifiably considered to enjoy less protection than private premises. If strictly personal communication does take place in such premises, absolute protection then does, however, apply when this becomes concretely evident.

Premises that are used for both working and residential purposes must be treated differently. In such cases, it is not to be assumed that communication that takes place in working quarters will be of a purely business nature. The same applies in the case of premises that are used for the purposes of exercising occupations or professions that entail special relationships of confidentiality that relate to the strictly personal sphere.

(ii) Communication is to be assumed to lie in the inviolable core area in the case of premises that typically or in the individual case function as an area of retreat for the purposes of the private conduct of life. It will, however, regularly not be possible to make distinctions as regards the individual rooms within a private dwelling. Strictly personal acts and communication must not be restricted to specific rooms within a private dwelling. Individuals generally consider each of the rooms in their homes to be equally accessible and feel equally unobserved everywhere. The variety of different personal uses of private dwellings defies any typical assignment of activities to specific rooms. The core area of the private spatial sphere cannot therefore be associated with specific areas within a private dwelling.

(b) It is also necessary to take into account that the probability of intrusion upon the core area of personality through surveillance measures depends upon who is present in the private dwelling, to be subjected to surveillance.

A weighty indication of the relevance of the content of communication to human dignity is the presence of individuals standing in a strictly personal relationship of confidence. Individuals form their personalities primarily through interaction with others, i.e., through communication. Marriage and the family are therefore specially important in the strictly personal area and in particular in the intimate sphere. For example, communication between spouses, the thematic content of which is especially likely to be unlimited because of the intimate nature of marriage, is predicated on the assumption that outsiders cannot acquire knowledge of such communication. The situation is no different in the case of communication with other close family members, for example, siblings and direct relatives, especially when they live in the same household. In addition to Article 13.1 of the Basic Law, Articles 6.1 and 6.2 of the Basic Law also come to bear in this context.

The protection of the core area of private conduct of life also includes communication with other individuals with whom a special relationship of confidence exists (see BVerfGE 90, 255 [260]).

This class coincides only partially with those parties mentioned in ss. 52 and 53 of the Criminal Procedure Code who have the right to refuse to give testimony. The prohibitions of surveillance that follow from the core area of private conduct of life are not identical with the right to refuse to give testimony in criminal proceedings. For example, s. 52 of the Criminal Procedure Code was not created to protect the relationship of confidence between the relatives mentioned in that section and defendants. It is primarily intended to take into account the predicament of witnesses who are bound to the truth and must fear doing harm to a relative. In addition, the right to refuse to give testimony derives from the formal criterion of kinship and not from a special relationship of confidence such as may also exist in particular with close personal friends.

The basic idea behind s. 53 of the Criminal Procedure Code does surely protect the relationship of confidence between witnesses and the defendant. However, this protection too is not provided because of the human dignity of defendants or their interlocutors in all cases covered by s. 53 of the Criminal Procedure Code. This assumption does, however, apply in the case of priest-penitent communication. For example, the protection of confessions or communication of a confessional nature is covered by the substantive content of the human dignity of the exercise of religion within the meaning of Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. Communication with defence counsel also has the function of ensuring that defendants do not become mere objects in criminal proceedings, which is important for the preservation of human dignity. Communication with physicians may in the individual case be assigned to the inviolable core area of private conduct of life (see BVerfGE 32, 373 [379]).

The rights of members of the press and members of Parliament to refuse to give testimony on the other hand, do not relate directly to the core area of private conduct of life. These rights are guaranteed for the sake of the functionality of the respective institutions and not because of the protection of the personality of the defendants.

(5) Surveillance of private dwellings must even when permissible in principle be restricted to communication situations that are likely to include content that is relevant for the purposes of criminal proceedings. If appropriate, it is necessary to ensure that the acoustic surveillance of private dwellings remains limited to activities that take place within the dwellings that are relevant for the purposes of criminal proceedings, through suitable preliminary investigation that does not encroach upon the protection of the core area of private conduct of life. It is not permissible, for example, to encroach upon the absolute core area of private conduct of life to establish in the first place whether the collection of information relates to this area.

Temporal and spatial "total surveillance" will as a rule not be permissible for the very reason that the probability is great that strictly personal communication will be overheard. Human dignity is also violated in the case of surveillance that is conducted over a lengthier period of time and is so extensive that virtually all movements and expressions of life of the objects of the surveillance are recorded and can be used as the basis for a personality profile (on this risk see BVerfGE 65, 1 [42-43]).

(6) When the acoustic surveillance of a private dwelling is not prohibited because of the absence of sufficient outward indication of the probability that absolutely privileged communication will be recorded, the communication of a suspect may be monitored for the purposes of establishing whether it contains information suitable for use in criminal proceedings. There are no constitutional grounds under these conditions that militate against initial "screening" of the content of communication that is required for the purposes of assessment with a view to protection of human dignity. Suitable measures must, however, be taken to ensure maximum discretion (see BVerfGE 80, 367 [375, 381]).

For example, the protection afforded by Article 1.1 of the Basic Law may make it necessary to refrain from the use of automatic recording alone, in the case of eavesdropping on a private dwelling in order to be able to interrupt the investigatory activity at any time.

If in the course of the surveillance of a private dwelling a situation arises that must be considered to belong to the core area of private conduct of life, surveillance must be terminated. Recordings made nevertheless must be destroyed. Information so obtained may not be transferred to others or used. Article 13.3 of the Basic Law must be interpreted to mean that there must be regulations in place that prohibit the use of evidence obtained in connection with such recordings (on the constitutional foundation of such requirements see BVerfGE 44, 353 [383-384]; see also BVerfGE 34, 238 [245 et seq.]).

c) Article 13.3 of the Basic Law is also not in violation of the principle of the rule of law. It is therefore not necessary to determine the extent to which elements of the principle of the rule of law are declared immune to amendment under Article 79.3 of the Basic Law.

Article 13.3 of the Basic Law does not restrict the principle of proportionality but, to the contrary, also leaves its validity intact as regards the acoustic surveillance of private dwellings and in addition contains concrete clauses that take this principle into account.

The requirement of a fair trial is not compromised by Article 13.3 of the Basic Law. This principle includes the right to freedom of expression and self-determination within the framework of criminal proceedings, which is reflected inter alia in ss. 136a and 163a.4 sentence 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That means that no one may be compelled to incriminate himself of a criminal offence through his own testimony in the context of criminal proceedings or actively contribute to his conviction (see BVerfGE 56, 37 [49]).

Covert acoustic surveillance of private dwellings entails no such effect on communication.

The secrecy of measures undertaken in connection with the prosecution of criminal offences does not in itself violate the prohibition of deception rooted in the requirement of a fair trial. Covert interception of communication does surely take advantage of a mistaken impression on the part of the object of the surveillance as regards the insulated nature of the home. The utterances of the suspect are, however, based on a voluntary decision. The transfer of knowledge of these utterances to the representatives of governmental power is surely not voluntary. Investigation in secrecy is, however, an essential prerequisite to the success of various measures employed for the purposes of the prosecution of criminal offences, but this alone does not mean that they are in violation of the principle of the rule of law.

II.

The legal power to conduct acoustic surveillance of private dwellings under ss. 100c.1 no. 3, 100c.2 and 100c.3 of the Criminal Procedure Code and regulation of the prohibition of collection and use of evidence under s. 100d.3 of the Criminal Procedure Code do not adequately take into account the requirements that must otherwise be met under Articles 13.1 and 13.3 of the Basic Law and Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, as regards the protection of the inviolable area of the private conduct of life, the formulation of the catalogue of offences and compliance with the principle of proportionality. They are only partially compatible with the Basic Law.

bb) The legislature also failed to take adequate precautions in s. 100d.3 of the Criminal Procedure Code to ensure that surveillance is terminated if a situation should unexpectedly occur that involves the inviolable core area of private conduct of life. Continuation of surveillance is in such cases illegal.

cc) Adequate provisions are also lacking to ensure that knowledge will not be used if acquired in connection with violation of the core area of private conduct of life and that information already collected is destroyed in such cases.

(1) The Basic Law imposes requirements upon the legislature in both regards.

(a) The Basic Law requires rules to the effect that no use may be made of data that stem from the core area of private conduct of life.

The risk of encroachment upon the core area of private conduct of life associated with the acoustic surveillance of private dwellings is acceptable under the Basic Law only if precautions are taken to ensure that no further implications ensue from violations that have exceptionally occurred. It is necessary to ensure that knowledge acquired through such encroachment is not used in any way in further investigatory proceedings or under other circumstances.

Comprehensive prohibition of the use of such knowledge is required first of all for the eventuality that prosecuting authorities exceed their authority and carry out acoustic surveillance of a private dwelling, for example, despite the existence of the probability that the surveillance will involve absolutely privileged communication. None of the information, no matter what its content, acquired during the period within which the collection of such information is prohibited may be used in criminal proceedings. This applies not only with respect to use as evidence in the main proceedings, but also if this information could be considered for use as the evidentiary basis for investigation in connection with other matters.

The use of such evidence is also prohibited when circumstances do not warrant an assumption that collection is prohibited, but a situation nevertheless develops during acoustic surveillance of a private dwelling that results in interception of communication of a strictly personal nature. There will in practice always be cases in which there are no sufficient outward indications that make it possible to determine whether absolutely privileged communication can or cannot be expected inside a dwelling. It will also not always be possible to confirm beyond all doubt suspicion of involvement in a criminal offence on the part of one of the close family members present in a dwelling. Reliable assessment by prosecuting authorities will be impossible in particular when unambiguous identification is not possible because of the social environment of a suspect despite appropriate effort - for example, through previous observation. It will not always be possible to determine in advance whether communication involves possible perpetrators of a crime. It is for that reason indispensable that prohibition of the collection of evidence be complemented by prohibition of the use of evidence in order to be able to ensure comprehensive protection of the core area. The use of data obtained in connection with activities involving the inviolable area of private conduct of life is absolutely prohibited on constitutional grounds and such data may be used neither in main proceedings nor as the basis for other investigations (see BVerfGE 44, 353 [383-384]).

(b) When information stemming from the core area of private conduct of life is collected, it must be deleted without delay. This applies notwithstanding the requirement of effective recourse to the courts provided under Article 19.4 of the Basic Law. In that respect, it is of decisive importance that further retention of strictly personal data that ought not to have been collected entails a risk of exacerbation of a violation of the right of personality. Subsequent recourse to the courts would also only make it possible to ascertain that the interception and recording of the deleted information were illegal and that the data must be destroyed. However, this purpose is also adequately achieved as far as considerations having to do with constitutional law are concerned through immediate deletion when carried out on the basis of the finding of an authority to the effect that the recording was illegal. However, a possible interest on the part of the parties involved in acquiring complete knowledge as to what communication content was intercepted by the prosecuting authorities remains unsatisfied. This interest cannot, however, justify the risks of further violations of fundamental rights associated with further retention.

Not only the original tape, but also any copies made subsequently, must be deleted. In view of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law, prosecuting authorities must document in writing that the content of absolutely privileged communication was recorded and that the relevant recordings were for that reason completely deleted.

(2) The legislature has only partially fulfilled its duty to adopt provisions of law that satisfy these constitutional requirements.

III.

The legislature failed to limit the formulation of the catalogue of criminal offences, such as offences are, when viewed in the abstract, especially serious within the meaning of Article 13.3 of the Basic Law. Insofar as this was not the case, s. 100c.1 no. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code does not satisfy Article 13.3 of the Basic Law. As a result, changes in legislation effected after submission of the constitutional complaint are also subject to review pursuant to s. 78 sentence 2 and s. 82.1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act(Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG), which are to be applied accordingly in constitutional complaint proceedings (see BVerfGE 18, 288 [300]).

(a) The possible range of punishments provided for under the criminal statute indicates whether the legislature has classified a given crime as being especially serious. The catalogue of criminal offences of s. 100c.1 no. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code includes, in addition to indictable offence, summary offences, including those that do not manifest any above-average degree of unlawfulness. The minimum penalties range from fines to imprisonment for three or for six months to imprisonment of one year or two, three, five or ten years. The maximum penalties also vary from three years to more than five and ten years up to life imprisonment.

The legislature may exercise discretionary judgment when defining the degree of unlawfulness of criminal offences and deciding which offences will warrant acoustic surveillance of private dwellings. According to Article 13.3 of the Basic Law, such offences must be, in the abstract, especially serious. The range of possible penalties provides a standard of reference for such purposes. It is possible to assume that a criminal offence is especially serious within the meaning of Article 13.3 of the Basic Law only if the legislature imposes a penalty that in any case exceeds five years of imprisonment. The legal system is such that the maximum penalty of ten or more years of imprisonment is also provided for criminal offences punishable by a term of more than five years. Such penalties are reserved for offences that involve an especially serious unlawful act and therefore clearly depart from the category of crimes of medium seriousness.

(b) If this standard is applied, the reference of s. 100c.1 no. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code to such criminal offences is in violation of the Basic Law since this section may be applied at best to the areas of crime of medium seriousness because of the penalty provided for.

IV.

The provisions contained in s. 101 of the Criminal Procedure Code on the acoustic surveillance of private dwellings that govern the duty to notify the parties involved is only partially consistent with Article 19.4 and Article 103.1 of the Basic Law.

1. S. 101.1 sentence 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code is incompatible with Article 13.1 and Article 19.4 as well as with Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law insofar it provides for notification of the persons affected by the acoustic surveillance of private dwellings only if this can be accomplished without any threat to the safety of the public or the continued use of an official assigned to an undercover investigation. The court's single opportunity to decide to postpone notification until six months after termination of the measure pursuant to s. 101.1 sentence 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code also fails to adequately ensure compliance of procedural law with the duty to make such notification as required by the Basic Law.

a) Article 13.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the requirement of effective recourse to the courts (Article 19.4 of the Basic Law) provides for holders of fundamental rights to be informed of measures involving the acoustic surveillance measures of private dwellings that affect them.

In the case of covert encroachment, holders of fundamental rights have in principle a right to be informed after the fact of surveillance measures undertaken by the government by reason of the guarantee of effective recourse to the courts (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [361] on Article 10 of the Basic Law).

Without such knowledge, the persons affected can neither assert the illegality of the collection of the information nor any rights they may have to have the recordings deleted. Subsequent notification is also required because no hearing has been held due to the covert nature of the encroachment. The Basic Law does not specify in detail how notification is to be made. Article 13 of the Basic Law requires only that notification be made when data are collected covertly, but the right to notification has not been granted or the rights of the persons affected have not been adequately taken into account (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [361] on Article 10 of the Basic Law).

The duty to make subsequent notification that follows from the fundamental right is subject to the same restrictions as the fundamental right itself. When knowledge of an encroachment could defeat its very purpose, there can therefore be no objection on constitutional grounds to commensurate limitation of the extent to which such knowledge is made available.

In addition, the guarantee of recourse to the courts under Article 19.4 of the Basic Law requires notification in principle if this is a prerequisite to the possibility of seeking judicial relief. The possibility of limitation of this right is, however, also not excluded by Article 19.4 of the Basic Law, which is amenable to regulation by law (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [364]).

A right to notification of the fact that surveillance of a private dwelling was ordered and carried out inures to the respective persons affected from Article 13.1 and Article 19.4 of the Basic Law, but only in principle. The limitation of the duty to make notification on the other hand represents encroachment upon fundamental rights under Article 13.1 and Article 19.4 of the Basic Law that requires justification and must therefore also satisfy the requirements of proportionality (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [365, 398-399]). Since postponement of notification delays possibilities for recourse to the courts and the efficacy of judicial relief decreases with temporal distance from the measure ordered, postponement must be restricted to that which is absolutely necessary.

V.

The provisions contained in s. 100d.5 sentence 2 and s. 100f.1 of the Criminal Procedure Code on the use of personal information in other proceedings are not compatible with Article 13.1, Article 2.1 and Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, insofar as no duty is prescribed to identify the information that is made available to others for such use.

Exclusivity of purpose can be guaranteed only if it also remains obvious after the information is collected; that the data were acquired through acoustic surveillance of a private dwelling. Appropriate identification of data is therefore required by the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [360-361] on Article 10 of the Basic Law). The legislature must impose a duty to identify information not only on the authority that collects the data but also on authorities that receive such data in order to ensure the exclusivity of purpose. Otherwise, data stemming from the acoustic surveillance of private dwellings could be stored and co-mingled with other data in a manner that would make it no longer possible to recognize their origin (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [396-397]). The restrictions on the use of data provided under s. 100f.1 of the Criminal Procedure Code would then be circumvented.

VI.

The provisions governing the destruction of data contained in s. 100d.4 sentence 3 and s. 100b.6 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which like the provisions governing the transfer of data to others form a constitutionally relevant regulatory complex with the provisions governing the collection of such data, are in violation of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law.

The protection of Article 13.1 of the Basic Law, which also extends to subsequent phases of processing such data, does surely require in principle that legally acquired data be destroyed as soon as they are no longer required for the original purposes (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [362] on Article 10 of the Basic Law). The provisions of law governing the destruction of data must, however, at the same time satisfy the requirement of effective recourse to the courts. As a result, this may result in a specific conflict situation since it is on the one hand consistent with legislation governing data protection to delete data that are no longer needed and on the other hand the deletion of data makes effective recourse to the courts more difficult, if not impossible, because it is possible to review a matter only to a limited extent once records are destroyed (see Constitutional Court of Mecklenburg-West Pomerania [Verfassungs-gerichtshof Mecklenburg-Vorpommern - MVVerfG], LKV 2000, p. 345 [354]).

Against this background, the duty to destroy data must be balanced with the guarantee of recourse to the courts so that it is not thwarted or frustrated in cases in which the person affected seeks judicial review of governmental acts involving information and the use of data (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [364, 400]).

Explanatory Annotation

The rise of domestic and international terrorism and especially the 9/11 terror attacks in New York have led to a re-emphasis of the security aspect in the eternal struggle between freedom and its protection on the one hand, and the maintenance of public security on the other. The situation is further complicated by the fact that strengthening security by giving security agencies more and more powers inherently diminishes freedom and thus limits the sphere of personal autonomy. At the same time security, as in the creation of a secure space for people to be able to live the freedoms we so cherish, is a precondition for freedom. There is no freedom if there is no security. The balancing act is inherently difficult and always controversial. For Germany, the rise of terrorism in the new millennium was not an entirely new experience. In the 70's and 80's, the country already struggled with the violent leftwing terrorism of the so-called "Red Army Fraction" and similar groups and the considerable violence exercised by these groups[153] and this struggle had led to considerable anti-terror legislation, of which one of the most notorious was so-called Kontaktsperregesetz, which allowed terrorists to be held in custody incommunicado to ensure that there would be no communication between imprisoned terrorists and those on the outside engaging in kidnapping to demand their release.[154] In the late 90's Article 13 of the Basic Law was amended to allow for acoustic surveillance outside of ("small acoustic surveillance") and inside ("large acoustic surveillance") to combat serious crime whether of terrorist or other backgrounds.[155] This domestic anti-terrorism agenda era more or less seamlessly segued into the 9/11 and post 9/11 era of Islamist terror, which is also marked by the increasing use of computers and their potential for processing vast amounts of data to allow for new forms of policing (security) and infringements on fundamental rights, not least privacy. Practically, most legislative acts passed to use these technologies in policing were challenged before the Constitutional Court. There are now about 20 decisions of the Court attempting to balance the quest for security with the need to maintain individual freedom.[156]

The 2016 judgment reported below deals with the Act on the Federal Criminal Police Office (BKA), a federal police agency roughly comparable to the FBI in the US, operating in a constitutional framework where police powers belong to the core powers of the Länder and operational power are limited for that reason already. Legislation amended in 2009 authorized the BKA to use covert surveillance practices, including the remote, software-based data collection from private computers and cloud data storage facilities[157] and provided for the possibility to transfer data obtained to other authorities. The Constitutional Court decided that the legislation is in principle compatible with the Basic Law and in particular with Article 13 of the Basic Law but that several constitutional shortcomings are resulting from the application of the principle of proportionality, which is given extensive scrutiny in this decision. As a result, the Court quashed some provisions of the legislation outright. For other provisions, the Parliament was given time to make the necessary corrections following the Court's instructions. Two dissenting opinions criticized the majority for going too far and placing too many restrictions of the security agencies and for behaving more like an alternative legislator than a court interpreting the law.

Headnotes:

1. a) The authorisation of the Federal Criminal Police Office to carry out covert surveillance measures (surveillance of private homes, remote searches of information technology systems, telecommunications surveillance, collection of telecommunications traffic data and surveillance outside of private homes using special means of data collection) is, for the purpose of protecting against threats from international terrorism, in principle compatible with the fundamental rights enshrined in the Basic Law.

   b) The design of these powers must satisfy the principle of proportionality. Powers that constitute a serious interference with privacy must be limited to the protection or legal reinforcement of sufficiently weighty legal interests; require that a threat to these interests is sufficiently specifically foreseeable; may, only under limited conditions, also extend to third parties from whom the threat does not emanate and who belong to the target person's sphere; require, for the most part, particular rules for the protection of the core area of private life as well as the protection of persons subject to professional confidentiality; are subject to requirements of transparency, individual legal protection, and supervisory control; and must be supplemented by deletion requirements with regard to the recorded data.

2. The requirements for the use and transfer of data collected by the state follow the principles of purpose limitation and change in purpose.

   a) The scope of a purpose limitation depends on the specific legal basis for the data collection: the data collection initially takes its purpose from the respective investigation procedure.

   b) The legislature may allow a use of the data beyond the specific procedure of the data collection in the context of the original purposes of the data (further use). This implies that the use of collected data is limited to the same authority acting in the same function and for the protection of the same legal interests. For data from the surveillance of private homes or from access to information technology systems, each further use must additionally also fulfil the relevant risk situation requirements applicable to the data collection.

   c) Moreover, the legislature may also allow for a further use of data collected by the state for other purposes than those determining the original data collection (change in purpose).

      The proportionality requirements for such a change must conform to the principle of a hypothetical re-collection of data. According to this, the new use of the data must serve the protection of legal interests or aim to investigate criminal offences of such weight that would, by constitutional standards, justify collecting them again with comparably weighty means. A specific risk situation, as required for the initial data collection, is generally not required a second time; it is necessary but generally also sufficient that there be a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations.

With regard to data from the surveillance of private homes and from remote searches of information technology systems, a change in purpose is only permitted if the relevant risk situation requirements applicable to the collection of the data are again fulfilled.

3. The transfer of data to state authorities in third countries is subject to the general constitutional principles of purpose limitation and change in purpose. In assessing a new use, the autonomy of the other legal order must be respected. A transfer of data to third countries requires the ascertainment that, in the third country, the data will be handled in sufficient conformity with rule-of-law standards.

Facts:

A.

I.

The constitutional complaints are directed against the provisions of the Federal Criminal Police Office Act (Bundeskriminalamtgesetz - BKAG) inserted as Sub-Title 3a by the Act on Prevention by the Federal Criminal Police Office of Threats from International Terrorism of 25 December 2008 (Federal Law Gazette, Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl I p. 3083), effective 1 January 2009. On the basis of Art. 73 sec. 1 no. 9a of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) (BGBl I p. 2034), created for this purpose in 2006, the federal legislature assigned the Federal Criminal Police Office tasks extending beyond its previous law enforcement duties, reaching into the domain of the protection against threats from international terrorism, a task hitherto reserved solely for the Laender (federal states). An additional subject-matter of the constitutional complaints is the previously existing provision in the Federal Criminal Police Office Act on the transfer of data to third countries, the scope of which has been extended by the newly attributed powers. [1]

II.

The constitutional complaints are directed, first, against the granting of various investigative powers. The challenged powers include the authorisation to question persons pursuant to § 20c BKAG, as well as the use of special means of data collection outside of private homes pursuant to § 20g secs. 1 to 3 BKAG including, in particular, the covert monitoring and recording of non-public speech, image recording, the application of tracking devices, and the use of police informants and undercover investigators. The constitutional complaints also challenge the power to carry out visual and acoustic surveillance of private homes pursuant to § 20h BKAG, to conduct electronic profile searching pursuant to § 20j BKAG, to access information technology systems pursuant to § 20k BKAG, to monitor on-going telecommunications pursuant to § 20l BKAG as well as to collect telecommunications traffic data pursuant to § 20m secs. 1 and 3 BKAG. Insofar, the challenges also encompass § 20u BKAG which deals with the protection of persons having the right to refuse to give evidence, as well as § 20w BKAG which sets out the duty to inform affected persons at the conclusion of the surveillance measure. [2]

Second, the constitutional complaints are directed at provisions on the use of data. This affects, firstly, the provision on the use of data collected in accordance with Sub Title 3a of the Act pursuant to § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 BKAG by the Federal Criminal Police Office itself. The power pursuant to § 20v sec. 5 BKAG - with the exception of sentence 3 no. 2 - to transfer this data to other domestic public authorities is also challenged. Finally, § 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 nos. 1 and 3 and sentence 2, sec. 7 BK- AG, which generally permits the transfer of data to authorities in third countries, is also challenged. § 14a BKAG, which additionally establishes a separate power to transfer personal data to Member States of the European Union, however, is not at issue in this proceedings. [3]

C.

Insofar as the constitutional complaints are directed against the investigative and surveillance powers, they are well-founded in several respects. [86]

I.

In respect of legislative competences, meanwhile, the challenged provisions are constitutional. [87]

[…] [88-89]

II.

The challenged surveillance and investigative powers authorise interferences with fundamental rights, which, depending on which fundamental right is affected and on the varying weight of the interference, must individually be measured against the principle of proportionality and the principle of legal clarity and specificity. The powers have in common that the potential interferences they authorise are for the most part very serious, yet since their objective is to protect against the threat of international terrorism, they have a legitimate aim and are, to that end, suitable and necessary. [90]

1. The challenged powers authorise the Federal Criminal Police Office to covertly collect personal data in the context of the protection against threats and the prevention of criminal offences. This allows for - depending on the power in question - interferences with the fundamental rights of Art. 13 sec. 1, Art. 10 sec. 1 and Art. 2 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 1 sec. 1 GG, the latter both in its manifestation as the right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems as well as the right to informational self-determination. [91]

All these powers provide the legal bases for investigative and surveillance measures which are usually carried out covertly without the knowledge of the parties concerned and can constitute a serious interference with privacy. Even if legitimate expectations of confidentiality are affected to differing degrees and the powers' weight of interference varies significantly, these powers generally all have a weight of interference which weighs heavily in any case. Only individual measures pursuant to § 20g secs. 1 and 2 BKAG constitute an exception. [92]

2. The constitutionality of the powers depends on the limits arising from each of these fundamental rights and the proportionality requirements which must be determined for each of the powers. According to the principle of proportionality, the granting of these powers must always pursue a legitimate aim and must be suitable, necessary and, in the strict sense, proportionate to achieving this aim (cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 <173>; 70, 278 <286>; 104, 337 <347 et seq.>; 120, 274 <318 and 319>; 125, 260 <316>; established case-law). [93]

Furthermore, the challenged powers are to be measured against the principle of legal clarity and specificity, which aims to increase the predictability of interferences for citizens, constitute an effective limit to administrative powers and enable effective judicial review (cf. BVerfGE 113, 348 <375 et seq.>; 120, 378 <407 and 408>; 133, 277 <336 para. 140>; established case-law). With regard to the powers in question here that pertain to the covert collection and processing of data, and that have the potential to constitute serious interferences with privacy, the principle sets up particularly strict requirements. Since affected persons can for the most part neither notice nor challenge the use of these powers, their content - in contrast to, for example, administrative law terms that are open to interpretation and executed by means of an administrative act - can only be rendered more specific to a very limited extent within the interplay between actual application and judicial review. Individually, however, the requirements differ, depending on the weight of the interference, and are thus tightly linked to the respective substantive requirements of proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 110, 33 <55>; 113, 348 <376>). [94]

3. The challenged provisions pursue a legitimate aim and are suitable and necessary to that end. [95]

a) The powers pursue a legitimate aim. They provide the Federal Criminal Police Office with means of gathering information which it can use in fulfilling its new task of protecting against threats from international terrorism. The term "international terrorism" as set out in the description of tasks in § 4a sec. 1 BKAG and its reference to § 129a secs. 1 and 2 of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB) is, in line with the EU Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 and international terminology (OJ L 164, p. 3; Draft Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism, in: Measures to eliminate international terrorism, Report of the Working Group of 3 November 2010, UN Doc. A/C.6/65/L.10) and - in conformity with the notions of the constitution-amending legislature upon the creation of Art. 73 sec. 1 no. 9a GG (cf. Bundestag document, Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks 16/813, p. 12), limited to specifically characterised criminal offences of particular weight. Criminal offences characterised as terrorism in this sense aim to destabilise society and comprise, in a reckless instrumentalisation of other people, attacks on the life and limb of random third parties. They are directed against the basic pillars of the constitutional order and of society as a whole. The provision of effective means of gathering information for protecting against terrorism constitutes a legitimate aim and is of great significance for a democratic and free basic order (cf. BVerfGE 115, 320 <357 and 358>; 120, 274 <319>; 133, 277 <333 and 334 para. 133>). [96]

b) The granting of the surveillance and investigative powers in question is suitable for achieving this aim. They provide the Federal Criminal Police Office with the means for gathering information that can play a role in countering the threat of international terrorism. The different powers are, at least in principle, necessary for this. Each power allows specific measures that cannot always be replaced by others. Less intrusive measures that provide equally effective and broad possibilities for gathering information for protecting against international terrorism are not apparent. Evidently, this does not affect the fact that in each individual case, the exercise of these powers, too, must be in accordance with the concepts of suitability and necessity. [97]

III.

Limitations result mainly from the requirements of proportionality in the strict sense. Accordingly, the surveillance and investigative powers must be appropriately designed with a view to the weight of the interference. It is the legislature's task to balance the seriousness of the interferences with fundamental rights of the potentially affected persons that are at issue here, on the one hand, with the duty of the state to protect the fundamental rights of its citizens, on the other. [98]

1. The legislature must thereby take into account, on the one hand, the weight of the interference of the measures allowed by the challenged provisions. These allow - to differing degrees, depending on the power - far-reaching interferences with privacy and can, in individual cases, even intrude upon private refuges the protection of which is of particular significance for the safeguarding of human dignity. The legislature must also consider the developments of information technology which increasingly extend the scope of surveillance measures, facilitate their operability, and enable making connections, which can go so far as to create personality profiles. In each case, differentiations must be based on the respective power in question as well as the fundamental rights it affects. [99]

2. On the other hand, the legislature must ensure the effective protection of the fundamental rights and legal interests of citizens. With regard to the constitutional appropriateness test, it must be taken into account that the constitutional order, the existence and the security of the Federation and of the Laender (federal states), and life, limb and the freedom of persons are legally protected interests of significant constitutional weight. Accordingly, the Federal Constitutional Court has underlined that the security of the state, as a constituted power of peace and order, as well as the safety of the population it is bound to guarantee - while respecting the dignity and the intrinsic value of the individual - rank equally with other highly valued constitutional rights. It thus considers the state to be under an obligation to protect the life, physical integrity and freedom of the individual, which also means, in particular, to protect against unlawful interferences by others (cf. BVerfGE 115, 320 <346 and 347>; see also BVerfGE 49, 24 <56 and 57>; 90, 145 <195>; 115, 118 <152 and 153>). [100]

In testing appropriateness, it must also be considered that the challenged provisions do not constitute provisions whose broad scope of interference affect the entire population equally. Rather, these are predominantly provisions aimed at enabling security authorities to protect, in individual cases, legal interests having constitutional rank from serious threats as well as to prevent criminal offences of great weight. [101]

In light of the threat posed by international terrorism, the decision to collect data is also of particular significance for the exchange of information between domestic authorities as well as for rendering the cooperation with security authorities of other states as effective as possible. A functioning exchange of information, which is in the interest of the constitutionally required protection of persons, presupposes the transfer of information gathered domestically and in return relies on information from third countries. [102]

IV.

For powers of investigation and surveillance constituting serious interferences with privacy, which are predominantly in question here, the Federal Constitutional Court has derived overarching requirements from the principle of proportionality in the strict sense. These concern specific wide-ranging potential threats to fundamental rights, in particular those entailed in the context of electronic processing of data (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <358 et seq.>; 115, 320 <341 et seq.>; 125, 260 <316 et seq.>; 133, 277 <335 et seq. para. 138 et seq.>), as well as individual case-by-case measures against persons who are being focussed on by the acting authorities (BVerfGE 107, 299 < 312 et seq.> - Collection of telecommunications traffic data -, BVerfGE 110, 33 <52 et seq.>; 113, 348 <364 et seq.>; 129, 208 <236 et seq.> - Telecommunications surveillance under federal, federal state and criminal procedural law -, BVerfGE 109, 279 <335 et seq.> - Surveillance of private homes -, BVerfGE 112, 304 <315 et seq.> - GPS observation -, BVerfGE 120, 274 <302 et seq.> - Online search -). [103]

1. Covert surveillance measures, to the extent that they seriously interfere with privacy, as most of the measures at issue here do, are only compatible with the Constitution if they pursue the aim of protecting or legally reinforcing sufficiently weighty legal interests when these are in danger or are violated, as evidenced by strong factual indications in the specific case. They generally require that the person targeted by the measure would be considered, by a reasonable person examining the objective circumstances, to be involved in a potential violation of a legal interest. A mere possibility based primarily on the intuition of the security authorities that further intelligence might be obtained is not sufficient for carrying out such measures (see BVerfGE 107, 299 <321 et seq.>; 110, 33 <56>; 113, 348 <377 and 378, 380 and 381>; 120, 274 <328>; 125, 260 <330>). The Constitution thus sets clear limits to lowering the threshold for crime prevention measures that are carried out covertly and can seriously interfere with privacy; in contrast, with regard to measures involving less serious interferences with privacy, the constitutionally permitted leeway in crime prevention matters is broader. [104]

With regard to the detailed design of the individual powers, what matters substantially for their appropriateness as well as the required specificity is that they be tailored to the weight of each codified interference. The more seriously the surveillance measures interfere with privacy and thwart legitimate expectations of confidentiality, the stricter the requirements must be. The surveillance of private homes and the access to information technology systems constitute particularly serious interferences with privacy. [105]

a) Covert surveillance measures must be limited to the protection or legal reinforcement of sufficiently weighty legal interests. [106]

For measures that serve a law enforcement purpose and are thus repressive in nature, the weight of the criminal offences in question is relevant for their classification, which the legislature has divided into significant, serious and particularly serious criminal offences, each defined in greater detail. Thus, the surveillance of private homes requires the suspicion of a particularly serious criminal offence (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <343 et seq.>); telecommunications surveillance or the use of telecommunications traffic data collected as a precaution requires the suspicion of a serious criminal offence (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <328 and 329>; 129, 208 <243>); while the collection of telecommunications traffic data with cause or observation by means of a GPS tracker, for example, requires a significant criminal offence - and, in the former case, one that is specified in the law - (cf. BVerfGE 107, 299 <321 and 322>; 112, 304 <315 and 316>; with regard to the latter decision, see also European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), Uzun v. Germany, judgment of 2 September 2010, no. 35623/05, para. 70, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift - NJW 2011, p. 1333 <1336>, on Art. 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights - ECHR). [107]

With regard to measures that serve to protect against threats and are thus of a preventive nature, what matters is the weight of the legal interests being protected (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <329>). Covert surveillance measures that constitute a serious interference with privacy are only permissible with regard to particularly weighty legal interests. These include life, limb and the freedom of persons as well as the existence or security of the Federation or a Land (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <328>; 125, 260 <330>) In contrast, the Federal Constitutional Court has not deemed the unlimited protection of proprietary interests to be sufficiently weighty. However, the Court has held that access to data stored as a precaution (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <330>) or the surveillance of private homes also in cases of general danger (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <379>), or remote searches of information technology systems [translator's note: previous translations of the German term Onlinedurchsuchung have used "online search"; this translation uses "remote search" with the same meaning] in cases of danger to interests of the public that affect the existence of people (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <328>) are generally compatible with the Constitution. Against that background, the legislature is not hindered from uniformly establishing the relevant threshold for the protection of legal interests with regard to these surveillance measures. [108]

b) In the context of the protection against threats to the legal interests mentioned above, the collection of data by means of covert surveillance measures having a high interference intensity is generally only proportionate if there is a sufficiently specific foreseeable danger to these legal interests in an individual case and the person targeted by these measures appears, to a reasonable person examining the objective circumstances, to be involved therein (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <328 and 329>; 125, 260 <330 and 331>). [109]

These conditions also depend, in each case, on the type and weight of the interference. For the particularly serious interferences with privacy that the surveillance of private homes constitutes, Art. 13 sec. 4 GG requires imminent danger. The term "imminent danger" thereby not only refers, in the sense of the qualified protection of legal interests, to the extent, but also to the probability, of damage (cf. BVerfGE 130, 1 <32>). [110]

Furthermore, the requirements of a sufficiently specific foreseeable risk situation with respect to the mentioned legal interests must be determined in relation to the burden on the affected person. Sufficient from a constitutional perspective are the requirements for the prevention of specific, directly imminent or present threats from persons subject to police action (polizeipflichtige Personen) according to the standards of general security law pertaining to the legally protected interests relevant here. The traditional police law term "specific threat" requires a factual situation that in the specific case, if left unhindered and provided that the events proceed in line with what is objectively to be expected, will lead, in foreseeable time, and with sufficient probability, to a violation of an interest protected by the police (cf. BVerfGE 115, 320 <364>; Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE 116, 347 <351>). An even closer temporal link is required when the respective legal authorisation requires a "directly imminent" or "present threat" (cf. BVerwGE 45, 51 <57 and 58>). [111]

However, the legislature is not constitutionally limited at the outset to creating, in respect of each type of function, criteria for interferences that reflect the usual model in security law of protecting against specific, directly imminent or present threats. Rather, it can set wider limits for particular fields, in order to aim at already preventing criminal offences, by lowering the requirements of foreseeability of the causal chain. However, the legal basis for the interference must then also require a sufficiently specified threat, in the sense that there be at least factual indications of the emergence of a specific threat to the legally protected interests. General experience alone is not sufficient for justifying an interference. Rather, certain facts must be determined that, in the individual case, substantiate the prognosis that an event leading to an imputable violation of the legally protected interests relevant here will occur (cf. BVerfGE 110, 33 <56 and 57, 61>; 113, 348 <377 and 378>). A sufficiently specific threat in this sense may already exist even where the causal chain leading to the damage is not yet foreseeable with sufficient probability, as long as certain facts already indicate that a threat to an exceptionally significant legal interest may occur. In such a case, the facts must allow the inference of, firstly, an occurrence that can be specified at least with regard to its type and which is temporally foreseeable, and, secondly, of the involvement of persons whose identity has at least been determined to the extent that the surveillance measure can target them specifically and is largely limited to them (BVerfGE 120, 274 <328 and 329>; 125, 260 <330 and 331>). With regard to terrorist offences, which are often committed at unforeseeable locations, planned far in advance by individuals who have no criminal record, and carried out in very different ways, surveillance measures may also be authorised if, despite the lack of a temporally foreseeable occurrence of a specific type, the individual behaviour of a person substantiates the specific probability that the person will commit such offences in the near future. For instance, this is conceivable in the case of a person entering the Federal Republic of Germany after having been abroad at a training camp for terrorists. [112]

In contrast, the weight of interference of covert police surveillance measures is not sufficiently taken into account when the factual grounds for the interference are shifted so as to include the preliminary stages of a still vague and unforeseeable specific threat to the legal interests protected by the provision. Linking the threshold for interference to the preliminary stages is constitutionally unacceptable if there are only relatively diffuse indications for potential threats, given the weight of the interference. The factual situation at such a stage is often characterised by the rather ambivalent meaning of individual observations. While occurrences may remain harmless, they might also be part of a process that develops into a threat (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <329>; see also BVerfGE 110, 33 <59>; 113, 348 <377>). Such openness is not sufficient as a basis for carrying out covert and highly intrusive surveillance measures. For example, the mere knowledge that a person is attracted to a fundamentalist understanding of religion would not be sufficient for such measures. [113]

c) Tiered requirements arise with regard to the extent to which surveillance measures can be carried out in a target person's sphere where the measures also affect persons not responsible for particular actions or circumstances or who are not suspects and therefore bear no special responsibility. [114]

Access to information technology systems and the surveillance of private homes may only directly target persons responsible for impending or imminent dangers (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <351, 352>; 120, 274 <329, 334>). These measures constitute such a serious interference with privacy that they cannot be extended to other persons. It is not constitutionally objectionable for measures targeting the persons responsible to also cover third parties, so long as this is inevitable (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <352 et seq.>). Thus, the surveillance of the home of a third party may be authorised, if on the basis of certain facts it can be supposed that the target person will be present while the measure is carried out, will conduct conversations relevant to the investigation there, and the surveillance of that person's own home would not in itself be sufficient for investigating the factual circumstances (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <353, 355 and 356>). Likewise, a remote search may be extended to the information technology systems of third parties if factual indications suggest that the target person has saved information relevant to the investigation there and access solely to the target person's own information technology system would not be sufficient for achieving the aims of the investigation. [115]

The ordering of other covert surveillance measures directly targeting third parties is not impermissible per se. It is conceivable that the surveillance of persons - to be clearly defined - in the target person's sphere be authorised, for instance with regard to contacts or messengers. The justification for such authorisation lies in the objective nature of protecting against threats and of truth-finding in criminal investigations. The extension of such an authorisation to third parties is subject to strict proportionality requirements and requires a specific individual proximity of the person concerned to the threat or criminal offence being investigated. In that respect it is not sufficient that there merely be some sort of contact with the target person. Rather, further indications are needed showing that the contact is relevant to the object of the investigation and that there is thus a non-negligible probability that the surveillance measure will contribute to elucidating the threat (cf. BVerfGE 107, 299 <322 and 323>; 113, 348 <380 ad 381>). The surveillance of persons that - based merely on the fact that they have been in contact with the target person - attempts to find out whether this can result in further evidentiary bases for further investigations, is constitutionally impermissible. With regard to these contact persons, however, the Constitution does not bar investigative measures that entail a lower level of interference from aiming to thereby attain the threshold for surveillance measures entailing a higher level of interference. [116]

2. Overarching procedural requirements also derive from the principle of proportionality. The investigative and surveillance measures in question here, which predominantly involve serious interferences, and regarding which it can be presumed that they will also record highly private information, and that are carried out covertly without the knowledge of the affected persons, as a rule require prior review by an independent body, in the form, for example, of a judicial order (on this, see also ECtHR, Klass and others v. Germany, judgment of 6 September 1978, no. 5029/71, para. 56; ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Zakharov v. Russia, judgment of 4 December 2015, no. 47143/06, paras. 258, 275; ECtHR, Szabó and Vissy v. Hungary, judgment of 12 January 2016, no. 37138/14, para. 77). For measures relating to the surveillance of private homes this already results from Art. 13 secs. 3 and 4 GG (cf. in this respect BVerfGE 109, 279 <357 et seq.>) and directly follows from the principle of proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <331 et seq.>; 125, 260 <337 et seq.>). [117]

The legislature must combine the imperative of a precautionary independent review framed in specific and legally clear form with strict requirements in respect of the content and the reasons for judicial orders. Also deriving from this is the requirement that the application for an order have a sufficiently substantiated justification and limits, which makes it possible in the first place for the courts or an independent body to exercise effective review. In particular, the authority submitting the application must provide comprehensive information on the situation in question (cf. BVerfGE 103, 142 <152 and 153>). In connection with this, it is the duty and obligation of the court or the other decision-makers to independently reach a decision on whether the covert surveillance measure being applied for fulfils the legal requirements. The needed material and staffing requirements must be provided by the judicial administration of the Laender and the Chief Justice of the competent court (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <338>). [118]

3. In addition to the constitutional requirements for the general conditions for interference, the respective fundamental rights in conjunction with Art. 1 sec. 1 GG give rise to particular requirements with regard to the protection of the core area of private life in the context of surveillance measures causing a particularly serious interference. [119]

a) The constitutional protection of the core area of private life guarantees a highly private area for the individual which is free from surveillance. It has its roots in each of the fundamental rights affected by surveillance measures in conjunction with Art. 1. sec. 1 GG and ensures a core of human dignity that is beyond the state's reach and provides constitutional protection against such measures. Even paramount interests of the general public cannot justify an interference with this absolutely protected area of private life (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <313>; established case-law). [120]

The possibility of expressing inner processes such as impressions and feelings, as well as reflections, views, and experiences of a highly personal nature belongs to the free development of personality in the core area of private life (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <313>; 120, 274 <335>; established case-law). Particular protection is afforded to non-public communication with persons enjoying the highest level of personal trust, conducted under the reasonable assumption that no surveillance is taking place, as is the case, in particular, in a private home. This group of persons includes, in particular, spouses or partners, siblings and direct relatives in ascending or descending line, in particular if they live in the same household, and can also include defence counsel, doctors, the clergy and close personal friends (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <321 et seq.>). This group only partially overlaps with those persons who have the right to refuse to give evidence. These conversations do no lose their overall highly personal character merely because they combine highly personal with everyday matters (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <330>; 113, 348 <391 and 392>). [121]

In contrast, communication directly about criminal offences is not protected, not even when it also covers highly personal elements. The discussion and planning of criminal offences is not content that belongs to the core area of private life, but rather is of societal relevance (cf. BVerfGE 80, 367 <375>; 109, 279 <319 and 302, 328>; 113, 348 <391>). Of course this does not mean that the core area is subject to a general balancing requirement with regard to public safety interests. A highly personal conversation does not fall outside the core area of private life simply because it could provide helpful insights for the investigation of criminal offences or dangers. Recordings or statements made in the course of a dialogue that only reveal, for instance, inner impressions and feelings and do not contain any indications with regard to specific criminal offences, do not simply become relevant to society by the fact that they might elucidate the reasons or motives for criminal behaviour (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <319>). Furthermore, despite having some link to criminal offences, situations in which individuals are in fact encouraged to admit wrongdoing or to prepare for the consequences thereof, such as confessions or confidential conversations with a psychotherapist or defence counsel, belong to the core area of private life, from which the state is absolutely excluded (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <322>). There is sufficient societal relevance, however, when the subject of conversations - even with highly trusted persons - is directly focused on criminal offences (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <319>). [122]

b) Any surveillance measure must take into consideration the core area of private life. If it typically leads to the collection of data relevant to the core area, the legislature must provide provisions that guarantee effective protection in a legally clear manner (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <318 and 319>; 113, 348 <390 and 391>; 120, 274 <335 et seq.>). Powers that do not tend to lead to interferences do not require such provisions. Limits that in individual cases might arise here with regard to access to highly personal information must be applied directly, on constitutional grounds. [123]

c) The protection of the core area of private life is strict and cannot be relativized through a weighing with security interests in accordance with the principle of proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <314>; 120, 274 <339>; established case-law). This does not mean that every instance in which highly personal information is indeed collected constitutes a violation of the Constitution or of human dignity. Given the uncertainty of action and prognosis under which security authorities carry out their duties, an unintentional intrusion upon the core area of private life in the course of a surveillance measure cannot be excluded ahead of time in every case (cf. BVerfGE

120, 274 <337 and 338>). However, the Constitution does require that in the design of surveillance measures, the respect of the core area be drawn as a strict limit, insurmountable by considerations in individual cases. [124]

aa) Thus, firstly, it is absolutely impermissible to make the core area a target of state investigations and use information from these in any way or to otherwise use it as a basis for further investigations. Even if additional findings could result from it, a targeted interference with core privacy - not including the discussion of criminal offences (see above, C IV 3 a) - is ruled out from the outset. The protection of the core area cannot be subject to the proviso that interests must be balanced in individual cases. [125]

bb) Furthermore, it also follows that, when carrying out surveillance measures, the protection of the core area must be taken into account on two levels. Firstly, at the data collection level, arrangements must be made in order to rule out as far as possible the unintentional collection of information stemming from the core area. Secondly, at the level of the subsequent analysis and use of the information, the consequences of an intrusion into the core area of private life that was not prevented must be strictly minimised (see BVerfGE 120, 274 <337 et seq..>; 129, 208 <245 and 246>). [126]

d) In this context, the legislature must design the protection of the core area of private life differently for each surveillance measure, depending on the type of power and its proximity to the absolutely protected area of private life (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <337>; 129, 208 <245>). In doing so, it must, however, make legislative arrangements on both levels. [127]

At the data collection level, with regard to measures likely to result in interference, a pre-emptive examination must ensure that situations or conversations relevant to the core area are excluded to the extent that this can be done in advance, practicably and with a reasonable amount of effort (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <318, 320, 324>; 113, 348 <391 and 392>; 120, 274 <338>). Under certain circumstances, with regard to conversations with persons enjoying the highest level of personal trust, which are typically indicative of confidential situations, the presumption may be warranted that these belong to the core area and may not be subject to surveillance (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <321 et seq.>; 129, 208 <247>). The legislature may design this presumption to be refutable and in particular make it dependent on whether there are indications in an individual case that criminal acts will be discussed. In contrast, the fact that apart from highly personal issues, everyday matters will also be discussed is not sufficient to refute the highly confidential nature of a conversation (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <330>). In any case, the measure must be discontinued when it becomes apparent that the surveillance is intruding upon the core area of private life (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <318, 324, 331>; 113, 348 <392>; 120, 274 <338>). [128]

At the level of analysis and use of data, the legislature must provide for cases in which it was not possible to avoid collecting information relevant to the core area, by requiring, as a rule, the screening of the collected data by an independent body that filters out the information relevant to the core area prior to use by the security authorities (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <331 et seq.>; 120, 274 <338 and 339>). However, the constitutionally required procedural safeguards do not, in every type of case, require the creation of independent bodies other than the investigative bodies of the state (cf. BVerfGE 129, 208 <250>). The necessity of such a screening depends on the type, as well as, if applicable, the design of the power in question. The more reliably the collection of information relevant to the core area is already avoided at the first level, the more likely a screening by an independent body can be dispensed with, and vice versa. This does not affect the fact that the legislature has the possibility to enact the necessary provisions to provide the investigative bodies of the state with short-term possibilities for action in exceptional cases in case of immediate danger. In any case, the legislature must provide for the immediate deletion of any highly personal data collected and ensure that it be cannot be used at all. The deletion is to be documented in a manner that renders a subsequent review possible (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <318 and 319, 332 and 333>; 113, 348 <392>; 120, 274 <337, 339>). [129]

4. Separate constitutional limits arise with regard to interplay between the different surveillance measures. Surveillance taking place over an extended period of time, encompassing almost every movement and expression of the person under surveillance and that could constitute the basis for a personality profile, is incompatible with human dignity (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <323>; 112, 304 <319>; 130, 1 <24>; established case-law). With the use of modern and in particular covert investigative methods, security authorities must, with respect to the potential for harm inherent in the "additive" interference with fundamental rights, coordinate to ensure that the overall extent of surveillance remains limited (cf. BVerfGE 112, 304 <319 and 320>). The limits on an exchange of data between authorities arising from the principle of purpose limitation (Zweckbindung) remain unaffected by this (see below, D I). [130]

5. Out of proportionality considerations, separate constitutional limits to covert surveillance measures may arise with regard to certain groups of professionals or other persons, whose activities are constitutionally deemed to be particularly confidential. The legislature must ensure that the authorities respect these limits when ordering and carrying out surveillance measures. [131]

As a rule, the legislature is not required to completely exempt certain groups of persons from surveillance measures in advance (cf. BVerfGE 129, 208 <262 et seq.>), given the already very high requirements for ordering such measures and the great significance of an effective protection against terrorist threats for the free and democratic order (cf. BVerfGE 115, 320 <357 and 358>; 120, 274 <319>; 133, 277 <333 and 334 para. 133>) and for the safety of persons, as well as with a view to the multitude of considerations to be balanced, and, at the same time, with a view to the necessity of limiting opportunities for misuse. Rather, it may generally predicate the protection of confidentiality upon a weighing of considerations in the individual case. [132]

The legislature has leeway to design with regard to establishing and delimiting the confidential relationships that are to be protected. It must balance the public's interest in the effective protection against threats with the weight of the measures for persons subject to professional confidentiality who depend upon a particular degree of confidentiality. In doing so, it must not only take into account the specific weight of the interference that such a measure constitutes for these persons with regard to their generally relevant fundamental rights, but also consider its effects on other fundamental rights, particularly Art. 4 sec. 1, Art. 5 sec. 1 and Art. 12 sec. 1 GG, or the independent mandate pursuant to Art. 38 sec. 1 GG. Insofar as it subjects certain professional groups to a stricter protection, these groups must be suitably delimited from the surveillance targets. [133]

6. The principle of proportionality also sets requirements for transparency, the judicial protection of individuals, and supervisory control (BVerfGE 133, 277 <365 para. 204>; see also BVerfGE 65, 1 <44 et seq.>; 100, 313 <361, 364>; 109, 279 <363 and 364>; 125, 260 <334 et seq.>; established case-law; cf. similarly the Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data by competent authorities for the purposes of prevention, investigation, detection or prosecution of criminal offences or the execution of criminal penalties, and the free movement of such data of 25 January 2012, COM/2012/010 final - as of the conclusion of the trilogue, 16 December 2015: 15174/15; as of 28 January 2016: 5463/16, annex). The requirements applicable in this respect are derived from the fundamental right in question in conjunction with Art. 19 sec. 4 GG (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <335>; 133, 277 <366 para. 206>). [134]

The transparency of data collection and processing should contribute to the emergence of trust and legal certainty as well as to the on-going addressing of the topic of data handling within a democratic discourse (BVerfGE 133, 277 <366 para. 206>). Its aim is to provide, as far as possible, subjective legal protection to affected parties, while at the same time counteracting the diffuse sense of threat emerging from covert state surveillance (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <335>; similarly Court of Justice of the European Union - ECJ, Digital Rights Ireland Decision, C-293/ 12, EU:C:2014:238, para. 37). The less it is possible to ensure subjective legal protection, the greater the significance of effective supervisory control and of transparency in the actions of the authorities vis-à-vis the public (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <366 and 367 para. 207>). [135]

a) Another requirement for the proportionate design of the surveillance measures in question is a legislative provision ordering an obligation to notify. Given that such measures must be carried out covertly in order to achieve their aim, the legislature, in order to ensure subjective legal protection within the meaning of Art. 19 sec. 4 GG, must ensure that the affected persons are generally notified, at least subsequently, of the surveillance measures. The legislature may provide for exceptions by weighing the notification against the constitutionally protected legal interests of third parties. These must, however, be restricted to what is absolutely necessary (BVerfGE 125, 260 <336>). […] If there are compelling reasons for ruling out a subsequent notification, this must be confirmed by a judge and reviewed at regular intervals (BVerfGE 125, 260 <336 and 337>). [136]

b) As a supplement to information-related interferences the carrying out or scope of which the affected persons cannot assess with certainty, the legislature must provide information rights. Restrictions are only permissible if they serve opposing interests of even greater weight. Legislative exclusionary criteria must ensure that the affected interests are comprehensively weighed against one another, taking into account the individual case in question (BVerfGE 120, 351 <365>). Should the practical effectiveness of such rights to information nevertheless remain limited, given the type of tasks being performed - as for example in the case of covert data processing for the protection against threats from international terrorism -, this is constitutionally acceptable (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <367 and 368 paras. 209 et seq.>). [137]

c) In light of Art. 19 sec. 4 GG, a proportionate design of surveillance measures further requires that following notification, the affected persons may obtain, in a reasonable manner, judicial review of legality (in this respect see also Arts. 51 and 52 of the Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data by competent authorities for the purposes of prevention, investigation, detection or prosecution of criminal offences or the execution of criminal penalties, and the free movement of such data, loc. cit.). [138]

Moreover, proportionate design requires effective sanctions for violations of rights. If serious violations of the conditions for interference were to ultimately remain without sanction, resulting in atrophy of the protection of the right to personality due to its intangible nature, this would be contradictory to the duty of the state to effectively protect the development of personality. This could in particular be the case if the unauthorised collection or use of data were to routinely remain without any counterbalancing satisfaction or compensation for the affected person, due to lack of material damage. In this regard, however, the legislature has wide legislative discretion (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <339 and 340>, with further references). [139]

d) Since with regard to covert surveillance measures, the transparency of data collection and data processing as well as the facilitation of the protection of the rights of individuals can be ensured only to a very limited degree, the guarantee of effective supervisory control is all the more significant. With regard to surveillance measures that constitute serious interferences with privacy, the principle of proportionality therefore places more rigorous demands on the effective design of this supervision both at the level of the law itself and in administrative practice (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <369 para. 214>). [140]

To begin with, the guarantee of effective supervisory control requires a body vested with effective powers, such as, under current law, the Federal Data Protection Commissioner (see, fundamentally, BVerfGE 65, 1 <46>). It also requires to fully document the data collection. Technical and organisational measures must ensure that the data is available to the Federal Data Protection Commissioner in such a way that it can be evaluated in a practicable manner, and that the documents include sufficient information to match it with the process being overseen (BVerfGE 133, 277 <370 para. 215>). Since supervisory control has the function of compensating for a weak protection of the rights of the individual, it is particularly important that it be carried out regularly. Such supervision must be performed at reasonable intervals, the duration of which must not exceed a certain maximum of approximately two years. This must be taken into account with regard to the funding of the supervisory body (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <370 and 371 para. 217>). Guaranteeing compliance with the constitutional requirements for effective supervisory control is the joint responsibility of the legislature and the authorities (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <371 para. 218>). [141]

e) Finally, to guarantee transparency and oversight, a legal rule on reporting duties is also needed. [142]

Since covert surveillance measures occur largely unnoticed by persons concerned and the public, and since the obligation to notify or the right to information can only counteract this to a limited extent by offering the subsequent possibility of the protection of subjective rights, regular reports by the Federal Criminal Police Office to Parliament and to the public on the exercise of these powers must be required by law. These are necessary and must be sufficiently substantial in order to facilitate a public discussion on the nature and scope of data collected by means of these powers, including the handling of the obligations to notify or delete, and thus subject the data collection to democratic oversight and review (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <372 paras. 221 and 222>). [143]

7. The provision of deletion requirements also belongs to the overarching proportionality requirements (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 <46>; 133, 277 <366 para. 206>; established case-law). The purpose of these is to ensure that the use of personal data remains limited to the purposes that justified the data processing, and that the use is no longer possible once these have been achieved or settled. The deletion of the data must be documented in order to ensure transparency and oversight. [144]

V.

In various respects, the challenged police surveillance measures do not satisfy the constitutional requirements set out above with regard to their respective conditions for interference. [145]

1. § 20g sec. 1 to 3 BKAG is only partially compatible with the Constitution. [146]

a) § 20g sec. 1 BKAG permits surveillance outside of private homes using the particular means of data collection defined in greater detail in § 20g sec. 2 BKAG. It thus authorises the Federal Criminal Police Office to interfere with the right to informational self-determination (Art. 2 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 1 sec. 1 GG). [147]

The provision, however, does not authorise interferences with Art. 10 sec. 1 GG. In contrast to §§ 20l, 20m BKAG, the powers listed in § 20g BKAG do not permit measures that interfere with the secrecy of telecommunications; nor do they permit measures that interfere with the right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems, such as the manipulation of such systems for observation purposes. The provision is not to be measured against Art. 13 sec. 1 GG either. It only authorises surveillance outside of private homes (cf. BTDrucks 16/9588, p. 23) and thus operates on the premise that the surveillance measures undertaken pursuant to it will, as must be ensured by technical means if need be, end at the doorstep. The powers of § 20g sec. 4 BKAG that reach beyond this are not subject-matter of these proceedings. [148]

b) With regard to the weight of its interference, § 20g secs. 1 and 2 BKAG covers a wide spectrum, also encompassing serious interferences. [149]

The provision permits surveillance outside of private homes using the means listed in section 2. Among these, in particular, are surveillance for extended periods, the covert creation of visual records, the covert monitoring of non-public speech, the application of tracking devices, or the use of police informants and undercover investigators. [150]

The weight of interference of these measures can vary greatly. It extends from rather small to medium interferences, such as the taking of individual photographs or simple observation for a limited time, all the way to serious interferences such as the long-term on-going covert audio and visual recording of a person. Particularly when these measures are carried out together and thereby aim, with the help of modern technology, to register and audio-visually record as many utterances and movements as possible, they can constitute a particularly serious interference with privacy. [151]

Similarly to the prevention of other weighty violations of legal interests or to the prosecution of significant criminal offences, the public interest in the effective prevention of terrorism can justify such interferences (see above, C II 3 a), provided that they are designed in a proportionate manner. This is, however, only partially the case here. [152]

c) Deriving from general security law, the conditions for interference set out in in § 20g sec. 1 no. 1, sec. 2 BKAG are not objectionable. [153]

aa) The provision limits the surveillance measures to the protection of sufficiently weighty legal interests. [154]

Firstly, this applies insofar as it allows measures for the purpose of protecting the existence or the security of the state or the life, limb, or freedom of persons. In addition, the same applies to the extent that the provision allows measures aiming at the protection of property of substantial value the preservation of which is in the public interest. A reasonable interpretation of this will not include the preservation merely of significant material assets. Rather, in the regulatory context of the protection against terrorism, this will be taken to mean significant infrastructure facilities or other sites of direct importance for society (vgl. BVerfGE 133, 277 <365 para. 203>). [155]

Pursuant to § 20g sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG, the powers to interfere are also further restricted in that measures for the protection of the legal interests mentioned above are only permitted when these are threatened by one of the criminal offences listed in § 4a sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG. This is evident in function provision of § 4a BKAG itself into which the powers of §§ 20a et seq. BKAG are integrated. The powers to interfere are thus restricted to the protection against threats from international terrorism. Here, the legislature does not merely refer to the unspecific term "terrorism", nor to §129 StGB in general, but rather it specifies that the threat to legal interests must emanate from specific criminal offences that are individually defined and particularly qualified in § 129a StGB. The provision is thus restricted to the protection of particularly weighty legal interests against particularly threatening attacks. Leaving aside the question of where the constitutional limits generally lie in respect of such measures - for example, also in terms of the corresponding powers under the Police Acts of the Laender -, the proportionality requirements are met at any rate in the case at hand. [156]

In contrast, the reference in § 20g sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG to the legal definition of "threat" in § 20a sec. 2 BKAG cannot be understood to mean that § 20a sec. 2 BKAG overrides the limitation of the legal interests in § 20g sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG and assumes that any threat to public security arising in the context of criminal offences pursuant to § 4a sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG is sufficient. § 20a sec. 2 BKAG does indeed specify the term "threat", as applying to all powers listed thereafter, and by highlighting the requirement that it must arise in an individual case. Yet, under a reasonable and constitutionally required interpretation, the function of this provision is not to override the specifically limited requirements pertaining to the protection of legal interests as they apply to individual powers. [157]

bb) § 20g sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG also requires sufficiently specified grounds for ordering the measures. The provision requires the presence of a threat. Pursuant to § 20g sec. 2 BKAG this is to be understood as an "existing threat in an individual case" and thus as "a specific threat" within the meaning of general security law. In light of the regular courts' jurisprudence shaping this term, there are no grounds for objections on the basis of specificity or proportionality considerations. [158]

cc) Furthermore, there are no constitutional objections to the fact that § 20g sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG determines the persons addressed by the measures by reference to §§ 17, 18 and 20 of the Act on the Federal Police (Bundespolizeigesetz - BPolG) and thus to principles of responsibility under police laws. The legislature is permitted to resort to the institutions of general security law. […] With regard to the powers of § 20g secs. 1 and 2 BKAG in question here, which neither interfere with Art. 10 sec. 1 GG, nor with the right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems, nor with Art. 13 sec. 1 GG, there is also no objection to be made on the basis that surveillance pursuant to § 20 BPolG can also be ordered with regard to a person from whom the threat does not emanate, under the same conditions required for state of necessity duties. The provisions to this effect are narrowly defined and are to be interpreted strictly. […] [159]

dd) The means of surveillance defined in § 20g sec. 2 BKAG are also not too unspecific or disproportionate. However, these powers also include - irrespective of the different weight of the individual interferences - particularly serious interferences, such as the possibility of long-term audio and visual recording of private conversations and situations, or the taking advantage of trust by undercover investigators and police informants. In order to protect against the particularly serious threats named in § 20g sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG, though, these serious interferences may also - in accordance with a test of proportionality carried out in the individual case - be constitutionally justified. [160]

The technologically open definition of the means of surveillance of § 20g sec. 2 nos. 2 and 3 BKAG does not meet with any objections either. The legislature is not obligated to limit the authorised means of surveillance to the technological state of the art at the point in time of the legislative process. As long as the type of surveillance that is permitted can be sufficiently made out, the legislature can provide that the authorisation shall also cover future technological developments. […] Furthermore, it falls upon the legislature to carefully observe technological developments and to take appropriate corrective action if the specific defining of openly phrased legal terms takes an undesirable turn (cf. BVerfGE 112, 304 <316 and 317>). [161]

d) § 20g sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG, however, is not compatible with the constitutional requirements. The conditions for interference neither satisfy the principle of specificity nor the principle of proportionality in the narrow sense. [162]

aa) § 20g sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG complements the basis for interference of § 20g sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG, which is limited to the protection against threats. It is intended by the legislature to set in earlier and serve to prevent criminal offences. [163]

According to the standards set out above, the legislature is not generally prevented nor constitutionally barred from limiting security measures to the protection against - according to established understanding - specific threats. However, even in respect of measures for preventing criminal offences, a prognosis is needed that is based on facts relating to a specific threat, rather than merely on general experience. In principle, this means that an occurrence that is specific at least with regard to its type, and temporally foreseeable, must be in evidence (cf. BVerfGE 110, 33 <56 and 57, 61>; 113, 348 <377 and 378>; 120, 274 <328 and 329>; 125, 260 <330>). In respect of terrorist offences, the legislature can alternatively also apply the standard of whether the individual behaviour of a person substantiates the specific probability that the person will commit a terrorist offence in the near future (see above, C IV 1 b). The requirements to this effect must be set out with legal clarity. [164]

bb) § 20g sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG does not satisfy these standards. The provision does indeed require the possible commission of a terrorist offence. Yet the prognosis requirements to this effect are not sufficiently substantive. The provision does not preclude the possibility that the prognosis is solely based on general experience. It neither contains the requirement that an occurrence that is specific at least with regard to its type and temporally foreseeable must be in evidence, nor the alternative that the individual behaviour of a person must substantiate the specific probability that the person will commit a terrorist offence in the near future. Thus, the provision does not give the authorities and the courts sufficiently specific criteria to work with and provides for measures that can be disproportionately broad. [165]

e) If interpreted in conformity with the Constitution, there can, in contrast, be no constitutional objection to § 20g sec. 1 no. 3 in conjunction with § 20b sec. 2 no. 2 BK- AG. [166]

§ 20g sec. 1 no. 3 BKAG also allows measures affecting contacts or accompanying persons. The term "contacts or accompanying persons" is defined in greater detail in § 20b sec. 2 no. 2 BKAG and is to be understood, when construed appropriately, as an umbrella term solely for the groups of persons designated in it. [167]

With this proviso, § 20g sec. 1 no. 3 BKAG is constitutionally sound. The legislature does not indiscriminately open up the possibility of carrying out surveillance of all persons in the target person's sphere, in order to - based merely on the fact that there has been contact with that person - then find out whether this will uncover evidentiary bases for further investigations. Rather, for the ordering of measures targeting third parties, the provision requires that they have a particular proximity to the offence defined in greater detail in § 20b sec. 2 no. 2 BKAG. […] [168]

There are also no objections to be raised with regard to the individual criteria set out in § 20b sec. 2 no. 2 a to c BKAG. Certainly, for constitutional reasons, the criteria cannot be understood as being limitlessly broad so as to include persons who had economic relations with the target person long before any criminal offence. Rather, § 20b sec. 2 no. 2 b BKAG limits the obtained benefits to the exploitation of the offence and thus to the fruit that stems from its unjust nature, while § 20b sec. 2 no. 2 c BKAG also requires that the instrumentalisation of the person concerned must be closely connected to the offence itself. If these conditions are fulfilled, the relevant orders are constitutionally justified. This is not altered by the fact that these measures can thus also target third parties acting in good faith who are not responsible for any threat. While this does constitute a particularly serious interference, it is a constitutionally justified means in the context of exceptionally significant public interests, similar to obligations of witnesses or duties in a state of necessity. [169]

f) As far as the principle of proportionality is concerned, the procedural requirements of § 20g sec. 3 BKAG are not sound in all respects. [170]

aa) It is not objectionable that the surveillance measures under this provision, each of which may be ordered for a reasonably limited period of time only, can be extended without this being subject to any maximum limit. The legislature could assume that a specific risk situation, as is required for the ordering or extension of the measures, generally does not last over a long period of time, so that there is, generally, no risk that this will lead to disproportionate on-going surveillance. Furthermore, a limit can be imposed, based on the principle of proportionality in individual cases even if no maximum limit is expressly set down, since the longer the surveillance measures, the more intensive the interference with the general right of personality, which may render a further renewal constitutionally unjustifiable (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <362>). [171]

bb) With regard to proportionality aspects, however, the rule on the requirement of a judicial order in § 20g sec. 3 BKAG is insufficient. [172]

§ 20g sec. 3 BKAG requires a direct judicial order for the initial ordering of a measure only if undercover investigators are to be employed (cf. § 20g sec. 3 sentence 1 BKAG). In other cases, it permits an initial order directly from the Federal Criminal Police Office itself and requires a judicial decision only for a potential extension (§ 20g sec. 3 sentence 8 BKAG). This applies, on the one hand, with respect to the monitoring and recording of non-public speech and the use of police informants or undercover investigators (§ 20g sec. 2 nos. 2 b, 4 and 5 BKAG), as well as, on the other hand, long-term observation (§ 20g sec. 2 no. 1 BKAG), which also includes those cases in which it is carried out by means of visual recordings or the use of technical means such as tracking devices (cf. § 20g sec. 2 nos. 2 a and 3 BKAG). [173]

This provision only partially satisfies the constitutional requirements. It is, however, not objectionable that image recording as well as merely short-term observations - even using visual recording or technical means such as tracking devices - are not subject to a judicial order. Should the surveillance measures remain limited in this manner, then the weight of their interference is not so significant as to constitutionally require a judicial order (cf. stricter with regard to observation by means of a GPS tracker, Supreme Court of the United States, United States v. Jones, 132 S. Ct. 945 [2012]; on the surveillance of a suspect by means of GPS, more reserved on the other hand, ECtHR, Uzun v. Germany, judgment of 2 September 2010, no. 35623/05, para. 70, NJW 2011, p. 1333 <1336 and 1337>, on Art. 8 ECHR). In contrast, an independent review is constitutionally indispensable if observations within the meaning of § 20g sec. 3 no. 1 BKAG are to be carried out over a longer period of time - particularly when this involves visual recording or the use of particular technical means such as tracking devices -, if non-public speech is to be monitored or if police informants are to be used. These measures constitute such a serious interference with privacy that their ordering must be reserved for an independent body, such as a court. In this respect, it is not sufficient to permit the security authority to initially order the measures itself but to provide for the disciplinary effect of a judicial decision - possibly on the basis of the information thus obtained - only at the renewal stage. To the extent that it is provided that the initial ordering of these measures may occur without a judicial decision, the procedural design of § 20g BKAG is not proportionate. [174]

g) § 20g BKAG is also insufficient with regard to the constitutional requirements insofar as it does not provide for any protection of the core area of private life. [175]

§ 20g BKAG authorises surveillance measures of varying quality and proximity to privacy. By also permitting long-term visual recording and long-term monitoring and recording of non-public speech, the provision authorises surveillance measures that typically constitute a serious interference with privacy. These measures all involve surveillance taking place outside of private homes. Yet this does not mean that - be it in the car, be it sitting separately in a restaurant, be it secluded on a stroll - highly confidential situations belonging to the core area of private life are not likely to be recorded […]. [176]

With regard to certain powers, the provision thus has a proximity to the core area that makes an express legal provision for the protection of the core area of private life necessary. The legislature must, in a clear manner, provide for protective provisions both with regard to data collection as well as with regard to data analysis and use (see above, C IV 3 c bb, d). Such provisions are lacking, so that § 20g secs. 1 and 2 BKAG are not compatible with the Constitution in that respect either. [177]

2. § 20h BKAG, too, only partially satisfies constitutional requirements. [178]

a) § 20h BKAG permits audio and visual surveillance in private homes. It thus constitutes an interference with Art. 13 sec. 1 GG. [179]

With the power to conduct surveillance within private homes, the provision authorises interferences with fundamental rights that are particularly serious. It permits the state to penetrate into spaces that are a person's private refuge and that are closely linked to human dignity (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <313 and 314>). This does not, as implied by Art. 13 secs. 3 and 4 GG, rule out surveillance measures. The protection against threats from international terrorism may justify such measures (see above, C II 3 a). These are, however, subject to particularly strict requirements, which § 20h BKAG does not fulfil in every respect. [180]

b) § 20h secs. 1 and 2 BKAG is not constitutionally objectionable insofar as it - comprehensively, with regard to all persons potentially addressed - governs the general conditions for the surveillance of private homes. [181]

aa) The provision does satisfy constitutional requirements insofar as it limits measures to the protection of particularly weighty legal interests, and at the same time requires the presence of imminent danger, and defines the persons addressed by it as those responsible for particular actions or circumstances. [182]

[…] [183]

bb) In accordance with Art. 13 sec. 4 GG, the provision also requires the presence of imminent danger. For this, both the extent as well as the probability of the damage to be expected must be considered (cf. BVerfGE 130, 1 <32>). Strict requirements, going beyond those needed in relation to a specific threat, must be laid down with regard to the presence of imminent danger (cf. BVerwGE 47, 31 <40>; Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Criminal Matters - Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofs in Strafsachen - BGHSt 54, 69 <83 and 84>).

From a proportionality perspective, this does ensure sufficiently specific grounds for carrying out such measures (see above, C IV 1 b). [184]

cc) The provision is also not disproportionate for permitting audio as well as visual surveillance of private homes. The fact that the Constitution does not already fundamentally rule out visual surveillance of private homes for interferences serving to protect against threats pursuant to Art. 13 sec. 4 GG can be deduced a contrario from Art. 13 sec. 3 GG. However, interference combining audio and visual surveillance carries substantially more weight than, for example, audio surveillance only, and requires special justification. Accordingly, when ordering these measures, the suitability, necessity and appropriateness requirements for each form of surveillance must be examined individually, as well as with a view to their combination with one another, where applicable. It will normally not be sufficient for the additional ordering of visual surveillance to cite merely the increased ease at matching voices; rather, more significant grounds relevant to the success of the surveillance are needed. In the context of applying the law, these requirements can and must be taken into consideration. § 20h sec. 1 nos. 1 and 2 BKAG, which lays down audio and visual surveillance of private homes as separate surveillance measures which must therefore be examined separately, provides a sufficient basis for this. [185]

c) The definition of the persons potentially addressed by the surveillance measures, however, is partially disproportionate and incompatible with the Constitution. [186]

aa) There is nothing to object to with regard to § 20h sec. 1 no. 1 a BKAG, which provides for the authorisation to order the surveillance of private homes targeting persons responsible within the meaning of §§ 17, 18 BPolG (see above C IV 1 c). [187]

There is also no cause for objection in that § 20g sec. 2 BKAG thereby permits the surveillance of such persons not only in their own home but also in the home of third parties, if the target persons are present and measures in the home of the target person alone would not lead to protection against the danger. However, the Federal Constitutional Court has formulated restrictive standards of interpretation with regard to such surveillance measures in the homes of third parties […] (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <356 and 357>). [188]

bb) § 20h sec. 1 no. 1 b BKAG, which permits the surveillance of private homes with respect to persons whose involvement in specific preparations justify the assumption of the commission of terrorist offences, is constitutionally sound. [189]

Unlike § 20g sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG, the provision does not create separate grounds for interference applying particularly far ahead of the time of the danger. Instead, it requires - in accordance with Art. 13 sec. 4 GG - imminent danger to qualified legal interests for whose protection the surveillance must be necessary. Moreover, the class of persons addressed by these measures is sufficiently limited: By requiring knowledge of specific preparations of - more narrowly qualified - terrorist offences, the provision stipulates the existence of an occurrence that is specific with regard to its type and temporally foreseeable. In doing so, it provides a basis for carrying out such measures that satisfies the constitutional requirements (see above, C IV 1 b). [190]

cc) The authorisation of the surveillance of private homes with regard to contacts or accompanying persons (§ 20h sec. 1 no. 1 c BKAG), however, is incompatible with Art. 13 secs. 1 and 4 GG. It is disproportionate. [191]

The surveillance of private homes is a particularly serious interference with privacy. By its nature, it has a more serious impact than surveillance measures outside of private homes or than telecommunications surveillance. The weight of its interference is paralleled only by interferences with information technology systems. For this reason, the appropriateness of such a measure can only be ensured if it is restricted from the outset to exclusively capturing conversations of the target person responsible for the threat (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <355>). Directly extending these measures to third parties is disproportionate and is to be ruled out with regard to such a serious interference (see above C IV 1 c). [192]

This does not affect the fact that it is permissible for the surveillance of the private home of the target person to also include non-involved third parties so long as this is inevitable (cf. § 20h sec. 2 sentence 3 BKAG). It is even permissible, as explained, to carry out surveillance of the private homes of third parties in order to carry out surveillance of the target person. [193]

d) There is no constitutional objection to be raised with regard to the surveillance of private homes in terms of its procedural design. In particular, it is to be ordered by a judge. The fact that the Act thereby requires an indication of the "material grounds" (§ 20h sec. 4 no. 4 BKAG) - as required in the other corresponding provisions of the Act, too (cf. § 20k sec. 6 no. 4 BKAG) - does not constitute a revocation of the constitutional duty to review and the duty to justify (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <359 and 360>), but rather emphasises that all legally relevant aspects must be substantiated in a sound manner. [194]

It is also constitutionally unobjectionable that there is no maximum limit for the number of times the order for the surveillance of private homes can be extended, since a temporal limit can, if needed in an individual case, arise on the basis of proportionality considerations (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <362>). [195]

e) The provisions on the protection of the core area of private life in § 20h sec. 5 BKAG are not constitutionally sufficient. They do not satisfy the requirements of Art. 13 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 1 sec. 1 GG. [196]

aa) Since the surveillance of private homes is a particularly serious interference with privacy and an intrusion into individuals' personal refuges which are particularly important for safeguarding human dignity, the related requirements for the protection of the core area are particularly strict (BVerfGE 109, 279 <313 et seq., 318 et seq., 328 et seq.>). [197]

(1) Firstly, particular requirements apply at the level of the collection of data. When weighing whether there is a probability that highly private situations will be recorded, presumptions shall apply in the interest of an effective protection of the core area (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <320>). Accordingly, conversations taking place in private spaces with persons enjoying the highest level of personal trust (see above, C IV 3 a) are presumed to fall within the core area of private life and cannot be subject to surveillance (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <321 ff.>). An automatic on-going surveillance of spaces in which such conversations are to be expected must thus be ruled out (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <324>). This presumption can be refuted when specific indications suggest that certain conversations are, within the meaning of the standards set out above, directly related to a criminal offence - a relation that exists even when the conversations are mixed with highly personal content, or if their overall character will not be highly confidential. The mere prognosis, however, that highly confidential and everyday matters will be combined in a conversation is not sufficient (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <330>, see above, C IV 3 a, d). [198]

If, considering the above, there is a probability that a surveillance measure will interfere with the core area of private life, the measure may not be carried out. If - also taking into account rules of presumption - there are no indications that there will be an intrusion into the core area of private life, the measures may be carried out. However, should highly confidential situations nevertheless be recorded, the measures must be discontinued immediately (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <320, 323 and 324>). If there are doubts - for linguistic reasons, for example - as to the highly confidential nature of a situation, or specific reasons to believe that together with the exchange of highly private thoughts criminal offences are also being discussed, then the surveillance may be continued in the form of automatic recording. [199]

(2) Specific constitutional requirements also arise at the level of data analysis and data use. It must be provided that the results of the surveillance will be screened by an independent body. This screening serves both as a review of legality as well as a filtering out of highly confidential data, so that - as far as possible - it is not disclosed to the security authorities. The independent body is to be provided with all the data resulting from the surveillance of private homes (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <333 and 334>; differently Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court - Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGK 11, 164 <178>). [200]

In the case that, despite all safeguards, information relevant to the core area is collected, both a prohibition of its use, as well as a deletion requirement, including the documentation of the deletion, must be put in place (see above, C IV 3 c bb, d, 7). [201]

bb) On this basis, § 20h sec. 5 BKAG satisfies the constitutional requirements at the data collection level, but not at the level of its use. [202]

(1) For the surveillance of private homes, § 20h sec. 5 sentences 1, 2, 3 and 5 BKAG requires an examination of whether information from the core area will be collected. By allowing surveillance only under the presumption, based on a prognosis, that any expression that is to be attributed to the core area of private life may not be collected and that the measures will be stopped if, contrary to the prognosis, the surveillance of private homes provides reasons to believe that highly private information is being collected, the provision satisfies constitutional requirements. This also applies to the authorisation to record automatically pursuant to sentence 3, which does not set aside the legality requirements of sentence 1, but rather ties in with the interruption of monitoring and observation of individual persons required by sentence 2. Where § 20h sec. 5 sentence 1 BKAG protects "expressions" relevant to the core area, this also includes, when construed appropriately, visual recordings of equivalent situations. [203]

(2) At the level of data use, however, the approach with regard to the protection of the core area does not satisfy the constitutional requirements in every respect. The Act provides for a screening of the recordings by a court, yet it limits this screening to automatic recordings in respect of which doubts have arisen (§ 20h sec. 5 sentence 4 BKAG). Insofar, the legislature is clearly guided by the consideration that further independent screening is not necessary, because the collection of highly personal information is ruled out at the collection level by § 20h sec. 5 sentences 1 and 2 when the Act is properly applied. This does not, however, justify such a limit to the independent screening of recordings from the surveillance of private homes. For the aim of such screening is not solely filtering cases of doubt but also to guarantee an independent review with regard to the requirements that serve to protect the core area in general. The courts' only limited power to review pursuant to § 20h sec. 5 sentence 4 BKAG, however, does not guarantee this.. Indeed, the Basic Law gives the legislature sufficient leeway to provide for special rules applicable exceptional cases in case of immediate danger when designing the review powers. [204]

In accordance with the constitutional requirements, for highly personal data that is nevertheless collected, the legislature has indeed provided for a prohibition of use and its immediate deletion, as well as a documentation of the deletion. What is unconstitutional, however, is the very short period of time in § 20h sec. 5 sentence 10 BKAG during which the deletion logs are to be deleted. This period is so brief that during the storage period of the deletion logs typically neither a review by the Federal Data Protection Commissioner nor by the party concerned is likely to occur and the documentation of the deletion thus becomes meaningless (cf. Bäcker, loc. cit., p. 88; cf. in this respect also BVerfGE 100, 313 <400>; 109, 279 <332 and 333>). Since the deletion logs themselves do not contain any data that might incriminate the person concerned, this brief period in particular cannot be justified on the grounds that it serves to protect this person. [205]

3. The conditions set out for electronic profile searching pursuant to § 20j BKAG are constitutionally unobjectionable. [206]

The provision provides the basis for an interference with the right to informational self-determination. Yet the conditions for interference are sufficiently specific and proportionate in their design, so that the interference is justified. In particular, electronic profile searching is permitted for the protection of sufficiently weighty legal interests (see above, C V 1 c aa) and requires a specific threat pursuant to § 20j sec. 1 sentence 1 in conjunction with § 20a sec. 2 BKAG. There can be no constitutional objection either to the example in the second half of § 20j sec. 1 sentence 1 BKAG, in which the legislature specifies the required risk situation exemplarily. The relevant requirements (cf. BVerfGE 115, 320 <363 et seq.>) remain unaffected by this. The provision is also proportionately designed in procedural respects; in particular, it requires a judicial order. [207]

4. § 20k BKAG, if interpreted in conformity with the Constitution, is constitutional with regard to the general conditions for interference. However, the rules with regard to the protection of the core area of private life do not satisfy the constitutional requirements. [208]

a) § 20k sec. 1 BKAG authorises access to information technology systems and permits covert remote searches of information technology systems, by means of which data saved or stored on the affected person's private computer or other computers linked thereto (for example in "the cloud") can be collected and the person's online behaviour can be tracked. The provision thus permits interference with the fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems (Art. 2 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 1 sec. 1 GG). [209]

With this stand-alone manifestation of the general right of personality, the Constitution takes account of the significance of the use of information technology systems, which nowadays reaches deep into privacy, for the development of personality (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <302 et seq.>). Today, diary-like written expressions, intimate statements, or other written manifestations of highly personal experience, film or audio recordings are increasingly generated, saved and in part exchanged in electronic form. A large part of highly personal communication takes place electronically by means of communications services over the internet or in the context of internet-based social networks. This data, whose confidentiality the persons concerned depend upon and trust in, is largely no longer to be found on personal information technology systems alone but rather on that of third parties. The fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems therefore protects against covert access to this data, and thus in particular against remote searches whereby private computers as well as other information technology systems are manipulated and read, and whereby personal data stored on external servers with a reasonable expectation of confidentiality is accessed and movements on the web of the persons concerned are tracked. Given the often highly personal nature of this data, which arises in particular when it is taken as a whole, this constitutes a particularly intense interference with this fundamental right. Its weight is commensurable with that of an interference with the inviolability of the home. [210]

b) The requirements of § 20k secs. 1 and 2 BKAG with regard to access to information technology systems, when interpreted in conformity with the Constitution, satisfy the constitutional requirements. [211]

aa) Interferences with the right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems, however, are subject to strict conditions (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <322 et seq., 326 et seq.>). Specifically, the measures must be contingent on factual indications that a specific impending danger to an exceptionally significant legal interest is present in the individual case. § 20k sec. 1 BKAG satisfies this requirement. […] [212]

§ 20k sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG, however, must be subject to a restrictive interpretation in conformity with the Constitution. The possibility presented in this provision of carrying out measures in advance of a specific danger if certain facts indicate that, in an individual case, an impending danger of a terrorist offence is present is to be interpreted in such a way that such measures are only permitted if the facts indicate an occurrence that is specific at least with regard to its type and that is temporally foreseeable, and if it is clear that specific persons will be involved and their identity is sufficiently determined for surveillance measures to be carried out with respect to and largely limited to them (BVerfGE 120, 274 <329>). It is also sufficient if an occurrence is not specific at least with regard to its type and not temporally foreseeable yet the individual behaviour of the person concerned substantiates the specific probability that the person will commit such offences in the near future (see above, C IV 1 b). [213]

Since § 20k sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG is drafted in accordance with the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfGE 120, 274 <329>), it can be presumed that the legislature intended to refer to it. The provision can thus still be interpreted in a manner that is compatible with the Constitution. [214]

bb) Furthermore, in respect of the substantive conditions for interference, the provision satisfies the principle of proportionality. In particular, § 20k sec. 2 BKAG provides that changes to the information technology system caused by the access must be minimised, the use of the access by third parties must be prevented, and at termination it must be reversed to the greatest extent possible (cf. in this respect BVerfGE 120, 274 <325 and 326>). The fact that consequential damage cannot be ruled out entirely does not render the measure disproportionate from the outset. Respect for the principle of proportionality in individual cases also means that open access to a target person's data sets must generally be given priority over covert infiltration. [215]

c) Moreover, there are no objections to the procedural design of the provision (cf. § 20k secs. 5 and 6 BKAG). A measure may only be ordered by a judge and the order requires substantive reasoning (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <331 et seq.>; see above, C IV 2). The measure can be ordered for a long period of up to three months. This is constitutionally sound only on condition that this be a maximum time limit for each order and the actual duration of the order be determined by a test of proportionality in the individual case. [216]

d) The provisions for the protection of the core area of private life, however, do not satisfy the constitutional requirements in every respect. [217]

aa) Given that covert access to information technology systems typically carries with it the risk of the collection of highly confidential data, and thus is in particular proximity to the core area, it requires express legislative safeguards for the protection of the core area of private life (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <335 et seq.>). The relevant requirements are not identical in every respect to those that apply to the surveillance of private homes, and shift the protection away from the collection level to the subsequent analysis and use level (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <337>). The reason for this lies in the specific nature of access to information technology systems. Here, protective measures to prevent violations of the core area do not aim primarily at preventing the collection and recording of a fleeting, highly confidential moment in a private space, but rather at preventing the reading of highly confidential information within a comprehensive data set of digital information that already exists, and that, taken as a whole, is typically not of a private nature the way behaviour or communication in a home would be. Here, the surveillance does not take place in the form of a chronologically ordered occurrence in different locations, but rather as access by means of a spy program which, as far as the access is concerned, presents only the alternatives of all or nothing. [218]

The requirements for the protection of the core area have thus to a certain extent been cut back. However, even here, it must be provided that the collection of information that can be considered to belong to the core area does not take place to the extent that this is possible from a technical and investigative standpoint. Available information technology safeguards in particular are to be used; if these can detect and isolate highly confidential information, access thereto is prohibited (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <338>). [219]

If, however, data relevant to the core area cannot be filtered out before or at the time of the data collection, access to the information technology system is nevertheless permissible even if it is probable that highly personal data too might incidentally be collected. In this respect, the legislature must take into account the need for protection of the person concerned by putting in place safeguards at the levels of analysis and use, and by minimising the effects of such access. Decisive significance attaches to the screening by an independent body that filters out information relevant to the core area prior to its availability to and use by the Federal Criminal Police Office (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <338 and 339>). [220]

bb) § 20k sec. 7 BKAG only partially satisfies these requirements. [221]

(1) The requirements applicable at the level of data collection, however, are unobjectionable if interpreted in conformity with the Constitution. The second sentence of the provision, in conformity with the aforementioned requirements, provides that all technically available means must be used to prevent the collection of information relevant to the core area. Furthermore, the provision prohibits access to information technology systems solely in cases where "only" information from the core area of private life is collected. According to the standards presented above, this is constitutionally sound. For constitutional reasons, the provision, however, must be interpreted in such a manner that communication on highly confidential matters is not excluded from the strict protection of the core area merely because it combines highly confidential with everyday matters (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <330>). In this respect, the provision is to be interpreted and applied in conformity with the constitutional requirements for the protection of the core area of private life and in light of the relevant understanding of the concept (see above, C IV 3 a, d). [222]

(2) In contrast, the measures in question lack constitutionally sufficient safeguards at the level of a subsequent protection of the core area. § 20k sec. 7, sentences 3 and 4 BKAG do not provide for sufficiently independent review. [223]

The constitutionally required screening by an independent body serves not only as a review of legality, but also significantly as a way of filtering out data relevant to the core area of private life so that, where possible, it remains undisclosed to the security authorities. This presupposes that the review is largely conducted by external persons not charged with security tasks. This does not rule out the involvement of an employee of the Federal Criminal Police Office - subject to a separate duty of confidentiality - in order to ensure expertise in a specific investigative matter. Moreover, in a similar manner, the Federal Criminal Police Office can offer technical support - including, for example, for language mediation purposes - for the screening. Yet the actual carrying out and decision-making responsibility must remain in the hands of persons who are independent with regard to the Federal Criminal Police Office. [224]

This is not ensured by the current statutory approach. It largely entrusts the Federal Criminal Police Office itself with the screening. The fact that one of the employees, such as the Federal Data Protection Commissioner within this specific public authority, is not subject to instruction does not mitigate this issue; nor does subjecting the screening to the general "expert oversight" of the ordering court. [225]

By contrast, § 20k sec. 7 sentences 5 to 7 BKAG ensures further safeguards at the level of use for an effective protection of the core area in a constitutionally sound manner. What is unconstitutional here too, however, is the very short period of time in § 20k sec. 7 sentence 8 BKAG, during which the deletion logs must be retained (see above, C IV 3 d). [226]

5. § 20l BKAG is only partially compatible with the Constitution. [227]

a) § 20l BKAG governs telecommunications surveillance and thus provides a basis for interferences with Art. 10 sec. 1 GG. In that respect, Art. 10 sec. 1 GG is not only the relevant standard with regard to § 20l sec. 1 BKAG, which governs the conventional surveillance of telecommunications, but also with regard to § 20l sec. 2 BKAG, which allows telecommunications surveillance at the source insofar as technical measures ensure that the surveillance only covers on-going telecommunications. While this technically requires having access to the respective information technology system, § 20l sec. 2 BKAG only allows those surveillance measures that are limited to on-going telecommunications processes. Thus, the purpose of the provision is merely to track the technological developments in information technology and to allow - without accessing further content-related information provided by the information technology system - telecommunications surveillance also in those cases in which it is no longer possible by means of the old surveillance technology. As a result, this measure must not be evaluated in the light of the fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems but rather with a view to the standards set out in Art. 10 sec. 1 GG (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <309>). [228]

Telecommunications surveillance entails interferences that are serious (cf. BVerfGE 113, 348 <382>; 129, 208 <240>). However, they are justified for the purpose of protecting against threats from international terrorism (see above, C II 3 a) insofar as the grounds for the interference are proportionately restricted in the individual case. § 20l BKAG, however, only partially ensures that this is the case. [229]

b) § 20l sec. 1 nos. 1 to 4 BKAG provides different grounds for interferences with regard to different addressees. Not all of them satisfy the constitutional requirements. [230]

The authorisation to carry out surveillance measures against those persons deemed to be responsible under police laws pursuant to § 20l sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG does not raise constitutional concerns as it in fact also aims to protect qualified legal interests and has the sole purpose of providing protection against imminent dangers. [231]

However, in contrast, the not specifically limited extension of telecommunications surveillance under § 20l sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG to also cover persons regarding whom certain facts justify the assumption that they are preparing terrorist crimes is not compatible with the Constitution. The provision, which shifts interference powers beyond the prevention of a specific threat to an earlier stage with the aim of preventing criminal offences, violates, given its ill-defined open phrasing, the principle of legal certainty and is disproportionately broad. In this respect, the same considerations as developed with regard to § 20g sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG (see above, C V 1 d) apply here, too. The marginally different formulations of the two provisions do not imply any difference in substance. This is also clarified by the Act's explanatory memorandum that partially paraphrases the content of § 20l sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG by using those words that were also used by the legislature in § 20g sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG (cf. BTDrucks 16/10121, p. 31). The same applies insofar as § 20l sec. 2 BKAG contains a reference to that provision. [232]

In contrast, the possibility of extending telecommunications surveillance to also cover messengers pursuant to § 20l sec. 1 nos. 3 and 4 BKAG is, when interpreted in conformity with the Constitution, compatible with Art. 10 sec. 1 GG. The provision, formulated closely in line with § 100a sec. 3 Code of Criminal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung - StPO), is sufficiently open to interpretation and satisfies the requirements of the principle of legal certainty. Like the rules on contacts and accompanying persons set out in § 20b sec. 2 no. 2 BKAG, this provision does not allow indiscriminately extending surveillance measures to all persons that have exchanged messages with the target person, but rather requires that there be specific grounds - that are to be set forth in the order accordingly - indicating that the target person is involving the messenger in the realisation of a criminal offence and that the latter is thus particularly closely linked to a crime or threat. [233]

c) The additional further conditions under which § 20l sec. 2 BKAG allows, subsidiarily, telecommunications surveillance at the source do not raise effective constitutional concerns. […] [234]

d) Procedurally, and in accordance with the constitutional requirements, § 20l sec. 3 BKAG sets out the requirement of a judicial order (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <337 and 338>). However, it lacks a statutory rule that stipulates - as required under constitutional law (see above, C IV 2) - that the order for telecommunications surveillance informs of the grounds for this measure. This cannot be overcome by means of an interpretation in conformity with the Constitution. In light of the fact that the Act expressly sets out obligations to provide explanatory statements in other provisions (cf. § 20g sec. 3 sentence 6, § 20h sec. 4, § 20k sec. 6 BKAG), an interpretation here in the sense that the absence of a rule requiring that the reasons be communicated is based on an intentional decision to that end cannot be ruled out with sufficient certainty. [235]

e) The provisions on the protection of the core area of private life pursuant to § 20l Abs. 6 BKAG are for the most part compatible with the Constitution. [236]

aa) Telecommunications surveillance constitutes a serious interference that is in particularly close proximity to the core area. As a form of content-related surveillance of all kinds of telecommunications-based exchanges, it typically entails the risk of also collecting highly private communication that is subject to the protection of the core area of private life. Insofar, special legislative protective precautions are needed (cf. BVerfGE 113, 348 <390 and 391>; 129, 208 <245>). [237]

However, telecommunications surveillance is, considering its overall character, not defined by an intrusion into privacy to the same extent as the surveillance of private homes or remote searches might be (cf. BVerfGE 113, 348 <391>). It covers any kind of communication in any situation, as long as it is transmitted by technical means. Highly confidential communication is indeed one small component that is under threat of being covered by the surveillance measures, too; however, it is not - unlike in the case of the surveillance of a person's private refuge in a private home - a distinctive feature. In that respect, it is also different from remote searches. […] Its proximity to the core area of private life lies mainly in the fact that it also covers highly personal communication between highly trusted persons (cf. BVerfGE 129, 208 <247>). [238]

The legislature can take this into account by stipulating less stringent requirements for the protection of the core area. However, this too requires an assessment - to be taken at the collection stage - as to whether it is likely that highly private conversa- tions will be covered, the surveillance of which must thus be prohibited if necessary. Provided such conversations cannot be identified with sufficient probability, the surveillance measure may be carried out - and, in accordance with a proportionality test, also by means of automatic on-going surveillance in the individual case (cf. BVerfGE 113, 348 <391 and 392>; 129, 208 <245>). [239]

As far as the protection of the core area at a subsequent level is concerned, prohibitions regarding the use of inadmissible evidence and data deletion requirements, including documentation requirements to this effect, must be provided for, while screening by an independent body is not always necessary (cf. BVerfGE 129, 208 <249>). Regarding telecommunications surveillance, the legislature can in fact determine that such screening is conditional upon whether and to what extent it is likely that the surveillance measure will also encompass highly private information. In that respect, there is an interrelation with the precautionary measures taken at the data collection level. [240]

To that end, the legislature is given considerable leeway to design. […] [241]

bb) § 20l sec. 6 BKAG satisfies these requirements for the most part. [242]

(1) Substantively, § 20l sec. 6 sentence 1 BKAG stipulates that an assessment with regard to the protection of the core area must be carried out before implementing telecommunications surveillance measures and that such measures may not be taken if there are factual indications suggesting that the measure will only generate insights from the core area of private life. Given that this provision is also subject to a constitutional understanding according to which conversations with highly trusted persons are not already removed from the strict scope of protection if these conversations combine highly personal with everyday matters (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <330>), this is not objectionable. In accordance with the Constitution, the Act also stipulates that the measure be discontinued if the surveying persons gain direct knowledge of highly confidential conversations; furthermore, if doubts arise, the Act limits the surveillance measure to automatic recordings, § 20l sec. 6 sentences 2 and 3 BKAG. [243]

However, beyond that, the Act also allows automatic recording measures in general, i.e. even in those cases in which such measures might also encompass, in addition to other conversations, conversations that are of relevance with regard to the core area (cf. first half of § 20l sec. 6 sentence 2 BKAG). As far telecommunications surveillance is concerned, this is, nonetheless, still constitutionally acceptable. In that respect, the more stringent requirements applying to the surveillance of private homes (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <324>), which are, given their nature, more closely linked to the core area, are not applicable here. Nonetheless, an order to carry out such automatic recording is subject to a strict proportionality test assessing the measure's temporal and factual scope in the individual case. Also, the fact that this provision accepts that measures might cover highly personal information requires effective protective precautions at the level of the analysis and use of the data. [244]

(2) Also in this respect, the provision meets the constitutional requirements for the most part. The provision not only provides for the required prohibitions regarding the use of inadmissible evidence and data deletion requirements, but, regarding automatic recordings, also requires prior screening by a court. The fact that this review is limited to automatic recordings and thus to covering cases of doubt does not raise constitutional concerns. Unlike in case of the surveillance of private homes, the independent screening of telecommunications surveillance may be limited to cases of doubt. [245]

In contrast, however, the safekeeping period for the deletion protocols set out in § 20l sec. 6 sentence 10 BKAG is too short and thus unconstitutional (see above, C IV 3 d). [246]

6. Insofar as it corresponds to § 20l BKAG, § 20m secs. 1 and 3 BKAG suffers from the same constitutional deficiencies and is itself also unconstitutional in this respect. As for the rest, the provision is compatible with the Constitution. [247]

a) § 20m secs. 1 and 3 BKAG, which allows the collection of telecommunications traffic data, provides the basis for an interference with the right to secrecy of telecommunications under Art. 10 sec. 1 GG. This right protects not only the actual contents of the communication but also the confidentiality of the specific circumstances of communication events which include in particular whether, when and how often telecommunications traffic occurred or was attempted between whom or between which telecommunications equipment (cf. BVerfGE 67, 157 <172>; 130, 151 <179>; established case-law). [248]

An interference with Art. 10 sec. 1 GG by means of the collection of telecommunications traffic data is serious - even if it does not directly cover the contents of the communication (cf. BVerfGE 107, 299 <318 et seq.>; regarding the precautionary storage of such telecommunications traffic data cf. also BVerfGE 125, 260 <318 et seq.>). However, if designed proportionately, it can be justified for the purpose of protecting against terrorism. As with § 20l BKAG, this is, however, not the case in all respects. [249]

b) Regarding the constitutional appraisal of the provision, whose conditions for interference essentially correspond to those set out in § 20l secs. 1 and 3 to 5 BKAG, the statements made in that context apply here accordingly. Given that the requirements for investigative and surveillance measures constituting a serious interference, stemming from the overarching principle of proportionality, are not met in this respect (see above, C IV 1 b, 2), the approach taken with regard to the collection of telecommunications traffic data does not differ from that applied in content-related surveillance of telecommunications. [250]

Accordingly, § 20m sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG is not compatible with the Constitution, while § 20m sec. 1 nos. 3 and 4 BKAG requires an interpretation in conformity with the Constitution; a statutory obligation to substantiate the reasons underlying the order of the measure is lacking, too (see above, C V 5 b, d). [251]

As for the rest, § 20m secs. 1 and 3 BKAG is compatible with the Constitution. […] Also § 20m sec. 3 sentence 2 BKAG, which, in view of ordering measures, provides for a facilitation of the description of the data to be collected, does not raise constitutional concerns; this does not have implications for the fact that § 20m sec. 1 BKAG allows the collection of data only with regard to individual persons. [252]

VI.

In several respects, the challenged investigative and surveillance powers are not compatible with the Constitution in terms of the further requirements that they too must meet (see above, C IV 4 to 7). They lack supplementary provisions without which the proportionality of the challenged investigative and surveillance powers is not satisfied. [253]

1. It is not objectionable, however, that the Act does not contain an express rule that specifies in detail the prohibition of comprehensive surveillance with a view to the interplay of the different powers (see above, C IV 4). Stemming from the principle of proportionality, the prohibition of comprehensive surveillance serves the purpose of safeguarding, for constitutional reasons, the inalienable core of personality that is rooted in human dignity; within their powers, security authorities must observe this prohibition upon their own initiative (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <323>; 112, 304 <319>; 130, 1 <24>; established case-law). Insofar, further statutory specifications are not required. […] [254]

2. However, the degree of protection of professional groups and other groups of persons whose activities require, for constitutional reasons, that their communication be treated as particularly confidential is not viably designed in all respects. [255]

a) Yet with § 20u BKAG, the legislature has created a provision that largely meets the relevant constitutional requirements. In particular it is not objectionable that § 20u sec. 2 BKAG - drafted closely in line with § 160a StPO - does not strictly rule out the surveillance of persons subject to professional confidentiality but rather rules out such surveillance only subject to a weighing of considerations in the individual case, and requires in § 20u sec. 1 BKAG a stricter prohibition of surveillance only with a view to a small group of persons whom the legislature has identified as being in particular need of protection (cf. BVerfGE 129, 208 <258 et seq.>). The weighing of considerations required under § 20u sec. 2 BKAG needs to give appropriate weight to the affected persons' fundamental rights. The weighing is structured in line with the principle of proportionality. In accordance with the second half of § 160a sec. 2 sentence 1 StPO, the Constitution sets down the presumption that the interests of the Federal Criminal Police Office in collecting data generally will not prevail if the measure does not aim to provide protection against a significant danger. [256]

b) In that respect, however, the level of protection afforded to the relationship of trust between lawyers and their clients is not compatible with the Constitution. The legislative distinction between defence counsel and other lawyers acting within a lawyer-client relationship does not as such constitute a suitable criterion for differentiating the respective protection level, given that the surveillance measures in question do not pursue the aim of prosecuting criminal offences but of protecting against threats, meaning that criminal defence is in fact not of any relevance here. [257]

c) Beyond that, however, violations of fundamental rights resulting from § 20u BKAG are not discernible. In particular, Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG does not result in media representatives being entitled to claim stricter protection (cf. BVerfGE 107, 299 <332 and 333.>). Further limits do not stem from Art. 3 sec. 1 GG either. The legislature is permitted to understand the recognition of stricter protection against surveillance measures as an exception for specific situations requiring protection and with regard to which the legislature's discretion is broad. In a judgment of 12 October 2011, the Second Senate ruled that the recognition that clergy or political representatives are in need of special protection compared to other professional groups is sound at least. However, an obligation to also extend this particular level of protection to other groups cannot be derived from that finding (cf. BVerfGE 129, 208 <258 et seq., 263 et seq.>). […] [258]

3. The provisions aiming to guarantee transparency, legal protection, and supervisory control do not satisfy the constitutional requirements in all respects either. [259]

a) When construed appropriately, the drafting of obligations to notify as set out in § 20w BKAG is not objectionable. The provision, which is drafted closely in line with § 101 secs. 4 to 6 StPO, satisfies the constitutional requirements (cf. BVerfGE 129, 208 <250 et seq.>). [260]

The same applies with regard to the second half of § 20w sec. 2 sentence 1 BKAG, which allows refraining from notification for the purpose of securing the further deployment of an undercover investigator. Unlike the case where the notification of the deployment of undercover investigators for the surveillance of private homes is deferred - for which this purpose is not sufficient (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <366 and 367>) -, this exception from the obligation to notify concerns the deployment of an undercover investigator as such. […] [261]

The permission to refrain definitely from a notification after a period of at least five years according to § 20w sec. 3 sentence 5 BKAG, is constitutional. In accordance with the current practice of definitively deciding to refrain from a notification as described by Federal Criminal Police Office representatives in the oral hearing, such decisions, when interpreting the provision in conformity with the Basic Law, require that a further use of the data against the affected person be ruled out and the data deleted. [262]

b) With regard to the challenged investigative and surveillance powers, the rights to information as well as the possibility of a retrospective judicial review and, where appropriate, compensation are guaranteed in a manner that does not raise constitutional objections. [263]

c) In contrast, supervisory control requirements are not designed in a constitutionally sufficient manner (see above, C IV 6 d). Indeed, the provisions of the Federal Data Protection Act demand a review by the Federal Data Protection Commissioner who has adequate powers in that respect (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <370 para. 215>). However, sufficient statutory requirements of regular mandatory reviews that must take place at certain minimum intervals of approximately two years are lacking (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <370 and 371, para. 217>). [266]

Comprehensive documentation requirements that allow the full and effective review of the surveillance measures in question are lacking, too (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <370, para. 215>). The Act does set out sporadic documentation requirements, such as in § 20k sec. 3 BKAG regarding the access to information technology systems or in § 20w sec. 2 sentence 3 BKAG regarding the deferral of a notification. However, even in those cases that require the documentation of the notification, it remains unclear whether this also includes the reasons for a deferral. In any event, the provisions remain sporadic and fail to adequately ensure a retrospective review of the surveillance measures. While important findings resulting from the data collection are at least documented on the basis of the general rules for file keeping, this is neither set out with sufficient clarity nor statutorily with regard to the data protection law requirements of effective review. This is particularly significant in the area of the protection against threats where the investigation of and protection against threats does not need to be directed at specific individual persons, unlike in the case of criminal investigations in criminal proceedings. Insofar, it is not apparent that there is a guarantee that the collection of data is documented in a transparent manner - also from the perspective of affected parties in potential subsequent criminal proceedings. The fact that the measure requires a judicial order does not alter this finding, given that such an order only gives the permission to carry out the measure but does not indicate whether and to what extent use was made of it. Furthermore, and unlike in the case of criminal proceedings pursuant to § 100b sec. 4 sentence 2 StPO, there is not even a requirement demanding that the ordering court be informed of the results of the investigations. [267]

d) Finally, reporting duties vis-à-vis Parliament and the public that are necessary for a proportionate design of the challenged surveillance powers are lacking, too (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <372 paras. 221 and 222>). The law neither requires reports indicating the degree in which the powers were made use of and on the grounds of which suspicious circumstances, nor does it require reports providing information as to whether the affected parties were notified of the exercise of such powers and if so to what extent. However, given that the exercise of the powers in question occurs largely without the knowledge of the affected party and the public, such reports are constitutionally required at regular intervals in order to enable a public debate and democratic control (see above, C IV 6 e). [268]

4. The provision in § 20v sec. 6 BKAG governing the requirements to delete the collected data also does not satisfy the constitutional requirements in all respects. [269]

a) The overall structure of the provision is indeed not objectionable under constitutional law. Data must be deleted after the underlying reason for the data collection is fulfilled (sentence 1). This refers to the constitutional law principle of purpose limitation (see below, D I). Accordingly, with regard to a further use of the data pursuant to § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 BKAG, refraining from deleting the collected data beyond the specific incident is, when interpreting the provision in conformity with the Constitution, only permissible insofar as the data provides a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations to protect against threats from international terrorism. The deletion must be documented (sentence 2). The deletion may be deferred so as to be available for a possible judicial review; in that case, the data in question needs to be blocked (sentence 4). Procedurally, the provision is to be read in conjunction with § 32 BKAG. In addition to requiring an individual handling of cases, that provision's section 3 also requires periodic reviews of the deletion requirements. [270]

Regarding electronic profile searching measures, § 20j sec. 3 BKAG sets out specific deletion requirements which the provision specifies in a manner that does not raise constitutional objections. [271]

b) In contrast, however, the very brief safekeeping period for the deletion of the "files" in § 20v sec. 6 sentence 3 BKAG, with which the Act governs the deletion of the deletion protocols, is not compatible with constitutional requirements. Deletion protocols serve the purpose of enabling the tracing back and review of the deletion. Thus, the safekeeping period must be calculated so as to ensure that the logs still exist after the persons concerned have been notified, and are still available for the next pending periodic review by the Federal Data Protection Commissioner (cf. in this respect also BVerfGE 100, 313 <400>). [272]

The same applies accordingly to the safekeeping period set out in § 20j sec. 3 sentence 3 BKAG. [273]

c) Furthermore, § 20v sec. 6 sentence 5 BKAG is unconstitutional. The provision gives permission to refrain from deleting the data once it has served its purpose on grounds that the data is needed for law enforcement purposes or - pursuant to the standards set out in § 8 BKAG - for the prevention of crimes or as a precaution for the future prosecution of a criminal offence of considerable significance. Thus the provision allows the storage of data with a view to using it for new purposes that are, however, only circumscribed in general terms; the Act does not provide a legal authorisation to that end for such generally circumscribed purposes and in fact could not provide a legal authorisation in such broadness. [274]

D.

Insofar as the constitutional complaints are directed against the powers to further use the data and the powers to transfer data to domestic authorities and authorities in third countries, the complaints are also well-founded in several respects. [275]

I.

The requirements for the further use and transfer of data collected by the state follow the principles of purpose limitation and change in purpose (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 <51, 62>; 100, 313 <360 and 361, 389 and 390>; 109, 279 <375 et seq.>; 110, 33 <73>; 120, 351 <368 and 369>; 125, 260 <333>; 130, 1 <33 and 34>; 133, 277 <372 et seq. paras. 225 and 226>; established case-law). [276]

If the legislature also permits the use of data beyond the specific incident and beyond the reason justifying the data collection it must establish a distinct legal basis to that end (cf. only BVerfGE 109, 279 <375 and 376>; 120, 351 <369>; 130, 1 <33>; established case-law). Insofar, the legislature may, on the one hand, provide for a further use of the data in the context of the purposes determining the data collection. Provided that the legislature ensures that the further use of data satisfies the specific constitutional requirements of the principle of purpose limitation, such an approach is generally constitutionally permissible (1.). On the other hand, the legislature may also allow a change in purpose. As an authorisation for the use of data for new purposes this is, however, subject to specific constitutional requirements (2.). [277]

1. The legislature may allow a use of the data beyond the specific procedure of the data collection as a further use in the context of the original purposes of the data. Insofar, the legislature may invoke the justification underlying the data collection and is thus not subject to the constitutional requirements applied to a change in purpose. [278]

a) The permissible scope of such uses depends on the authorisation for the data collection. The respective legal basis for interferences determines the competent authority as well as the purpose of and conditions for data collection and thus defines the permissible scope of use. Accordingly, the principle of purpose limitation that applies with regard to information obtained on the basis of the authorisation is not a restriction to certain abstractly defined functions of the authorities but is determined in accordance with the scope of the collection purpose stipulated in the relevant legal basis for the respective case of data collection. For that reason, further use of the data within the scope of the originally determined purpose is only permissible insofar as it involves the same authority acting within the same assignment of tasks and for the protection of the same legal interests as were determinant for the data collection. If this specific permission to collect data is restricted to collection for the purpose of protecting certain legal interests or preventing certain criminal offences, this limits both its immediate and its further use even by the same authority insofar as there is no other legal basis allowing a further use in the context of a permissible change in purpose. [279]

b) Generally, the relevant intervention thresholds required for the collection of data, such as the traditional thresholds requiring a sufficiently specific risk situation in the context of the protection against threats or a sufficiently strong suspicion in the context of criminal prosecution, do not belong to the purpose limitations that the same authority must reconsider for each and every further use of data. The requirement of there being a sufficiently specific risk situation or a qualified suspicion determines the grounds that may prompt the permission to collect data. Such requirements do not, however, determine the permissible purposes for which the authority may then use the data. [280]

For that reason, the principle that data must be used in accordance with its original collection purpose is not automatically contradicted if the further use of such data is permitted as a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations (Spurenansatz) when performing the same task, irrespective too of further legal requirements. Insofar, the authority may use the findings thus obtained - either alone or in combination with all other available information - as a simple starting point for further investigations to protect the same legal interests within the same assignment of tasks. This takes into account that it is not possible to reduce the generation of knowledge - and not least when aiming to understand terrorist structures - to a mere sum of separated and individual data which one could reveal or suppress in line with legal criteria. Within the described limits, this is recognised by the legal order. […] [281]

Observance of the principle of purpose limitation depends on whether the authority that is empowered to collect data uses it while acting within the same assignment of tasks for the protection of the same legal interests and the prosecution or prevention of the same criminal offences as is determined in the relevant data collection provision. These requirements are necessary but generally also sufficient to legitimise a further use of the data within the scope of the principle of purpose limitation. [282]

However, with regard to data obtained by means of the surveillance of private homes and remote searches, the principle of purpose limitation is broader in scope: here, any further use of the data only correlates with the purpose if it is also necessary in accordance with the collection requirements of a corresponding imminent danger (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <377, 379>) or a specific impending danger (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <326, 328 and 329>). The extraordinary weight of the interference resulting from such data collection is also reflected in a particularly narrow limitation of any further use of the obtained data to the requirements and thus to the purposes of the data collection. These findings may not be used as a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations irrespective of an imminent or specific impending danger. [283]

2. The legislature may also allow for a further use of data for other purposes than those determining the original data collection (change in purpose). In that case, however, the legislature must ensure that the weight of the interference resulting from the data collection is also taken into consideration with regard to the new use of data (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <389 and 390>; 109, 279 <377>; 120, 351 <369>; 130, 1 <33 and 34>; 133, 277 <372 and 373 para. 225>). [284]

a) The authorisation to use data for new purposes constitutes a new interference with the fundamental right with which the data collection interfered (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <360, 391>; 109, 279 <375>; 110, 33 <68 and 69>; 125, 260 <312 and 313, 333>; 133, 277 <372 para. 225>; cf. also ECtHR, Weber and Saravia v. Germany, judgment of 29 June 2006, no. 54934/00, para. 79, NJW 2007, p. 1433 <1434>, on Art. 8 ECHR). For that reason, changes in purpose need to be measured against those fundamental rights that were relevant for the data collection. This applies to any type of data use for purposes differing from those for which the data was originally collected, irrespective of whether the use pursues evidential purposes or constitutes a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <377>). [285]

b) In that respect, an authorisation to change the purpose is subject to the principle of proportionality. The weight attached to such a provision when weighing considerations corresponds to the weight of the interference resulting from the data collection. Information obtained by measures constituting a serious interference may only be used for particularly weighty reasons (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <394>; 109, 279 <377>; 133, 277 <372 and 373 para. 225>, with further references). [286]

aa) Regarding the standards applied to the proportionality test, the former case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court reviewed whether the changed use was "incompatible" with the original purpose (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1, <62>; 100, 313 <360, 389>; 109, 279 <376 and 377>; 110, 33 <69>; 120, 351 <369>; 130, 1 <33>). Meanwhile, this approach has been specified and replaced by the criterion of a hypothetical recollection of data (hypothetische Datenneuerhebung). Accordingly, as far as data that results from particularly intrusive surveillance and investigative measures is concerned, such as the data at issue in these proceedings, it is necessary to determine whether it would be permissible, by constitutional standards, to also collect the relevant data for the changed purpose with comparably weighty means (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <333>; 133, 277 <373 and 374 paras. 225 and 226>; in substantive terms, this specification is not new cf. already BVerfGE 100, 313 <389 and 390> and is referred to as a "hypothetical substitute interference" in BVerfGE 130, 1 <34>). However, the criterion of a hypothetical re-collection of data is not applied in a rigid systematic manner and does not rule out the possibility that further aspects may be taken into consideration (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <374 para. 226>). Thus the fact that the authority receiving the data is not - unlike the authority that permissibly collected the data and from which the data emanates - empowered to collect certain data itself due to its assignment of tasks does not bar, as a matter of principle, the exchange of data between these authorities (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <390>). Furthermore, when establishing data transfer provisions, considerations such as simplification and practicability can justify the fact that not all individual requirements that must be met for the collection of data will also apply, with the same level of detail, to the transfer of data. This, however, does not affect the requirement that the new use must be of equal weight. [287]

bb) However, for that reason a requirement for a change in purpose is that the new use of the data must serve the protection of legal interests or aim to detect criminal offences of such a weight that would, by constitutional standards, justify collecting them again with comparably weighty means (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <389 and 390>; 109, 279 <377>; 110, 33 <73>; 120, 351 <369>; 130, 1 <34>). [288]

In contrast, the requirements for a change in purpose are not always identical to the requirements for a data collection with regard to the necessary degree of specificity of the risk situation or of the suspicion that a crime has been committed. With a view to proportionality considerations, the relevant requirements primarily only establish the direct grounds for the data collection as such but not also those for the further use of the collected data. An authorisation to use data for other purposes constitutes an interference that requires a new justification. For that reason, such an authorisation also requires its own, sufficiently specific grounds. Under constitutional standards, it is thus necessary but generally also sufficient that the data - either as such or in combination with the authority's additionally available information - results in a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations. [289]

With regard to the use of data by security authorities, the legislature may thus generally allow for a change in purpose of data if it concerns information that results, in individual cases, in a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations investigating comparably serious criminal offences or providing protection against threats that, at least in the medium term, threaten comparably weighty legal interests as those with regard to whose protection the respective data collection is permissible. [290]

The same, however, does not apply with regard to information obtained through the surveillance of private homes or access to information technology systems. Considering the significant weight of the interference reflected in these measures, each and every new use of data is subject to the same justification requirements as the data collection itself in that the new use also requires imminent danger (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <377, 379>) or a sufficiently specific impending danger (see above, C IV 1 b). [291]

cc) These requirements for the permissibility of a change in purpose reflect a specifying consolidation of a long line of jurisprudence developed by both Senates of the Federal Constitutional Court (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 <45 and 46, 61 and 62>; 100, 313 <389 and 390>; 109, 279 <377>; 110, 33 <68 and 69, 73>; 120, 351 <369>; 125, 260 <333>; 130, 1 <33 and 34>; 133, 277 <372 and 373 para. 225>). It does not constitute an intensification of the standards but carefully delimits them in that it does not apply the criterion of a hypothetical re-collection of the data in a strict manner (cf. already BVerfGE 133, 277 <374 para. 226>) but instead partially revokes former requirements with regard to the interference thresholds that determine the required temporal proximity of the risk situation

(cf. in particular BVerfGE 100, 313 <394>; 109, 279 <377>). Also giving up the requirement of a protection of comparably weighty legal interests - as suggested in one of the separate opinions - would mean that the limits of the principle of purpose limitation as a core element of constitutional data protection (cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 <45 and 46, 61 and 62>) would practically be rendered obsolete with regard to security law - in particular if the requirement of a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations is at the same time held to be too strict (or at most these limits would be limited rudimentarily to data stemming from the surveillance of private homes or remote searches). [292]

II.

In light of the abovementioned standards, § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 BKAG, which sets out how the Federal Criminal Police Office may use data it collected itself, does not satisfy constitutional requirements. The provision is unconstitutional. [293]

1. The use of data as set out in § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 1 BKAG solely with regard to carrying out tasks to protect against threats from international terrorism is generally compatible with constitutional requirements; however, the provision lacks a sufficient limitation for data obtained through the surveillance of private homes and remote searches. [294]

a) Generally, the provision does not give rise to effective constitutional concerns. [295]

aa) The provision gives the Federal Criminal Police Office the permission to use data it collected itself for the purpose of protecting against international terrorism in the performance of its duties pursuant to § 4a sec. 1 sentence 1 BKAG. With that, the provision first - as an inherent consequence of authorising the collection of data - enables the use of the data in accordance with the specific purpose for which it was collected. Furthermore, however, it also enables a use of the data that goes beyond the respective investigation procedure. Due to the reference to § 4a sec. 1 sentence 1 BKAG, this further use of the data is limited to the protection against international terrorism. When applying a factually appropriate understanding of this reference, it also determines that the data may only be used to prevent those qualified criminal offences mentioned in § 4a sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG and thus only for the protection of those high-ranking legal interests regarding which the data collection powers of subsection 3a - including the particularly intrusive surveillance powers in §§ 20g et seq. BKAG - may be deployed for protection purposes. [296]

(1) The reference to § 4a sec. 1 sentence 1 BKAG, however, raises doubts as to its meaning. These can be overcome by way of interpretation so that the provision does not fail to meet specificity standards. It is not clear how § 4a sec. 1 sentence 1 and 2 BKAG are to be delimited: in assigning the task of providing protection against dangers, sentence 1 is aligned with the wording of Art. 73 sec. 1 no. 9a GG which also covers the prevention of criminal offences (see above, C I 1); sentence 2, however, explicitly distinguishes between the prevention of criminal offences and the protection against dangers. However, due to its nature as a provision setting out duties for the protection against dangers, § 4a sec. 1 sentence 1 BKAG also includes investigations in advance of specific dangers, and the reference in § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 1 BKAG is thus, essentially, sufficiently open to interpretation after all; the provision aims to allow the use of data in general, and, if necessary, also as a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations, for the purpose of providing protection against threats from international terrorism. [297]

In addition, the provision is not too unspecific insofar as § 4a sec. 1 BKAG only generally refers to "threats from international terrorism". Even though § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 1 BKAG only refers to sentence 1 of the provision, the further specification of the dangers listed therein requires resorting to the detailed definition in sentence 2, which conclusively enumerates and further specifies certain criminal offences. The fact that the criminal offences enumerated there with regard to the prevention of criminal offences are also decisive for the protection against threats under sentence 1 also conforms to the systematics of the Act as such (cf. e.g. § 20a sec. 2 BKAG). [298]

(2) Given that § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 1 BKAG allows the use of data only to protect against threats from terrorist offences within the meaning of § 4a sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG, this also ensures that this use is only permitted for the protection of those legal interests in regard to which the data collection powers may also be exercised. The same applies to data obtained by particularly intrusive surveillance measures, which are only justified for the protection of particularly high-ranking legal interests. [299]

Nearly all criminal offences enumerated in § 4a sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG in conjunction with § 129a secs. 1 and 2 StGB concern crimes that are directly directed against life or limb or - for example, as crimes endangering the general public - that draw their wrongful nature from threats thereto, or concern property of substantial value of value the preservation of which as essential infrastructure is in the public interest. Insofar as this is not necessarily the case with some individual crimes enumerated in § 129a StGB, it needs to be taken into account that § 4a sec. 1 sentences 1 and 2 BKAG determines that the prevention of such criminal offences only falls within the Federal Criminal Police Office's remit if the offences have a terrorist dimension that is statutorily defined in greater detail. Thus, the factually appropriate understanding of the provision results in the finding that information obtained through individual investigative powers must, also when resorted to for a further use pursuant to § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 1 BKAG, always serve to protect those legal interests for whose protection the collection of data was already justified, even in the case of more intrusive measures. [300]

bb) Generally, it is not objectionable either that § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 1 BKAG allows the further use of data in general terms and thus also as a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations irrespective of specific threats or specific evidentiary bases. Insofar as the use does not concern data stemming from the surveillance of private homes or remote searches (see below, D II 1 b), it it still within the scope of the purpose limitation. [...] This, however, does not affect the requirement to delete the recorded data after achieving the purpose of the data collection (see above, C VI 4 a). [301]

b) § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 1 BKAG is, however, disproportionately broad insofar as it covers all data indiscriminately and thus also covers the further use of data stemming from the surveillance of private homes and remote searches. Accordingly, the provision allows the further use of data irrespective of whether there is an imminent danger (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <377, 379>) or a risk situation that is sufficiently specific in the individual case (see above, C IV 1 b; D I 2 b bb). This is incompatible with the constitutional prohibition of excessiveness. As far as information that stems from such particularly intrusive surveillance measures is concerned, any use that goes beyond the original investigations requires that all conditions for interference be met again each time and in the same way as would be necessary on constitutional grounds in case of a re-collection of data (see above, D I 1 b). [302]

2. § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 no. 2 BKAG, on the use of data for the protection of witnesses and other persons, is also incompatible with constitutional requirements. Due to its lack of specificity alone, the unrestricted and general reference to the duties of the Federal Criminal Police Office under § 5 and § 6 BKAG does not satisfy the standards developed above. [303]

III.

Various rules within § 20v sec. 5 BKAG, which governs the transfer of data to other authorities, do not satisfy the constitutional requirements. [304]

1. § 20v sec. 5 BKAG provides various legal bases for the transfer of data, collected for the purpose of preventing terrorist threats, to other authorities. The relevant rules constitute authorisations with which the legislature allows a change in purpose of the use of data in individual cases and with regard to specific grounds. In that way, the legislature allows the use of data by other authorities, which - in accordance with the image of a double door - themselves must also be authorised to retrieve and use this data (cf. BVerfGE 130, 151 <184>). Thus, the provision provides for interferences with fundamental rights, each of which must be measured against those fundamental rights that were interfered with by the collection of the transferred data (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <360, 391>; 109, 279 <375>; 110, 33 <68 and 69>; 125, 260 <312 and 313, 333>; 133, 277 <372 para. 225>; cf. also ECtHR, Weber and Saravia v. Germany, judgment of 29 June 2006, no. 54934/00, § 79, NJW 2007, p. 1433 <1434>, on Art. 8 ECHR). [305]

2. § 20v sec. 5 BKAG does not violate the requirements of the principle of specificity. This also applies insofar as the provision comprehensively allows a transfer of data to "other public entities". The specific understanding of this phrasing, i.e. identifying which entities are meant, depends on the respective transfer purposes which further specify the different transfer powers. It is thus possible to determine the potential addressees of a transfer with sufficient specificity on the basis of the competence provisions. [306]

3. Yet the transfer powers are unconstitutional insofar as their requirements fail to satisfy the standards developed above with regard to the criterion of a hypothetical re-collection of data (see above, D I 2 b). [307]

a) § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 1 BKAG, however, does not raise constitutional concerns. The transfer of data for the purpose of mutual understanding and coordination does not itself implicate a change in purpose. It aims to coordinate the protection against threats in a manner that § 4a sec. 2 BKAG always requires for the Federal Criminal Police Office to exercise its functions, and is thus necessarily included in the data collection provision. This also justifies the broadness of the provision that does not provide restrictions to the transfer of data. Coordination is only provided for with regard to measures that are based on a lawful use of data; for that reason, it need not be feared that the purpose limitation of information stemming from the surveillance of private homes or remote searches, and which may be used only if there is a sufficiently specific risk situation, is undermined. [308]

In functional terms, however, the provision is to be construed narrowly. It only allows the transfer of information for the purpose of coordinating the exercise of the tasks of federal and Laender authorities, respectively. Under this provision, the use of data is limited to such internal coordination. If, in contrast, the authority receiving the data should be allowed to also use also for operational purposes, the transfer is subject to § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 nos. 2 et seq. BKAG. [309]

b) § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 2 BKAG governs the transfer of data for the purpose of protecting against threats. For the most part, it satisfies constitutional requirements. However, the provision is disproportionate insofar as it generally already allows a transfer of data for the prevention of certain criminal offences. [310]

aa) § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 2 BKAG allows a transfer of data stemming from measures taken pursuant to §§ 20h, 20k or 20l BKAG for the purpose of protecting against an imminent threat to public security. With this threshold, which is directly deduced from Art. 13 sec. 4 GG, the legislature, with regard to a change in purpose, conforms to the requirements for a hypothetical re-collection of data; also, a transfer of information from particularly intrusive measures, including the surveillance of private homes and remote searches, is justified. While it is generally the duty of the legislature to specify the legal interests to be protected in the context of conditions for interference and to thus also flesh out the concept of public security which, while being enshrined in Art. 13 sec. 4 GG, is described only in general terms (cf. accordingly for Art. 14 sec. 3 GG BVerfGE 134, 242 <294 para. 177>), here such specifications can be deduced from the regulatory context. Upon a reasonable interpretation, the concept of an imminent threat to public security must be held to mean a threat to the particularly high-ranking legal interests enumerated in §§ 20h, 20k and 20l BKAG (cf. in this respect also BVerfGE 109, 279 <379>). [311]

bb) It is not objectionable either that the transfer of data collected by means of other measures only requires a significant danger to public security. It is, first, not objectionable with regard to data obtained by means of low-threshold interferences (cf. for example §§ 20c et seq. or §§ 20q et seq. BKAG). The transfer of such data is, to be permissible, generally subject to less restrictive requirements. Furthermore, the provision is also constitutional with regard to data from intrusive measures such as those adopted pursuant to §§ 20g, 20j or 20m BKAG. Also here, the public security concept is not to be interpreted as being as comprehensive as in the sense of the general clause of police law that relates to the inviolability of the legal order […]. Instead it is given shape by the term "significant" danger. In accordance with the respective interpretation under general security law, this requires that there be a danger to an important legal interest; this includes life, limb, freedom or the existence of the state in particular […]. An interpretation of the provision based on the Constitution must result in the conclusion that a precondition for the transfer of data from particularly intrusive measures is the protection of sufficiently weighty legal interests. [312]

cc) However, § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 2 BKAG is disproportionately broad and thus unconstitutional insofar as it generally also allows a transfer of data for the purpose of preventing criminal offences enumerated in § 129a secs. 1 and 2 StGB. Indeed, these all constitute particularly serious criminal offences. However, given that the Act allows the transfer in general terms for the purpose of preventing such criminal offences, it fails to provide for a restricting specification of the transfer in line with the particular grounds prompting the transfer; thus information can already be transferred as a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations even if it only has potential informative value - and even if it was obtained by means of intrusive measures. In light of the standards developed above, this does not satisfy constitutional requirements (see above, D I 2 b bb). A transfer of data from intrusive surveillance measures to other security authorities constitutes a change in purpose and is only permissible if it involves at least a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations for the detection of equivalent criminal offences. The provision, however, fails to ensure that this requirement is adhered to. [313]

c) § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 3 BKAG, which governs the transfer of data for criminal prosecution purposes, is not compatible with the Constitution either. [314]

aa) The provision is disproportionate insofar as its first case group for a transfer of data generally refers to the standards set out in the Code of Criminal Procedure regarding a request for information and thus also refers to data from surveillance measures that are not specifically mentioned in no. 3 sentence 2 but are, nonetheless, intrusive surveillance measures such as those taken pursuant to §§ 20g, 20j or 20m BKAG. With its reference to the Code of Criminal Procedure, the provision refers to § 161 secs. 1 and 2 StPO in particular. This provision, however, does not ensure the constitutionally required limitation of the transfer of data. In particular, it does not follow from the provision that data may only be used to prosecute those criminal offences regarding which it would have been permissible to collect the data with the appropriate means (see above, D I 2 b). In fact, § 161 sec. 1 StPO provides an information obligation and thus an obligation to transfer data with respect to every type of criminal act. The restrictions contained in § 161 sec. 2 StPO only refer to the use of data in criminal proceedings for evidentiary purposes. Against that background, the stipulated restrictions do not rule out the possibility that the data be used as a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations for the investigation of any criminal offence, including minor crimes [...]. This, however, fails to ensure the constitutionally required restriction of a change in use of data to the protection of equally important legal interests. Moreover, the provision fails to guarantee that only data actually indicating that there is a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations in the crimes in question may be transferred. [315]

bb) The provision is also disproportionate insofar as its sentence 2 stipulates distinct requirements for the use of data from measures taken pursuant to §§ 20h, 20k and 20l BKAG. The legislature allows their transfer for the purpose of enforcing crimes that are subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of more than five years (§ 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 3, 2nd sentence thereof BKAG). Regarding data obtained through measures carried out pursuant to §§ 20k and 20l BKAG, this constitutes a limitation of the general reference to provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and thus to § 161 sec. 1, sec. 2 sentence 1 StPO. In contrast, as far as data stemming from the surveillance of private homes is concerned, it constitutes an expansion, given that a change in use of this data is construed more narrowly in § 161 sec. 2 sentence 2, § 100d sec. 5 no. 3 StPO. Irrespectively, however, this threshold does not satisfy the standards developed with regard to the criterion of a hypothetical re-collection of data. Regarding the surveillance of private homes, the Federal Constitutional Court has explicitly held that a maximum term of imprisonment of more than five years does not constitute a sufficient threshold for ordering such a measure and this also applies to any further use of the data, including its use as a mere evidentiary basis for further investigations (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <347 and 348, 377>). The same applies to access to information technology systems, which is an equally significant interference and thus subject to the same requirements. While the requirements for the surveillance of telecommunications are indeed less strict, the collection of data and, accordingly, the power to transfer, which constitutes a change in purpose, at least require that there be a focus on serious criminal offences (cf. BVerfGE 125, 260 <328 and 329>; 129, 208 <243>). For that reason, it is disproportionate that § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 3, 2nd sentence thereof BKAG states that criminal offences subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of more than five years are sufficient as this also includes crimes of medium severity and possibly also volume crime offences such as simple theft, public slander or simple bodily harm. [316]

Furthermore, it is constitutionally objectionable that data stemming from the visual surveillance of private homes is not barred from being transferred to law enforcement authorities. With regard to law enforcement, Art. 13 sec. 3 GG only allows the acoustic surveillance of private homes. This may not be undermined by a transfer of data obtained through a preventatively ordered visual surveillance of private homes. [317]

cc) While the transfer of data from particularly intrusive surveillance measures is subject to qualified requirements, the transfer of data obtained by means of low-threshold interferences (cf. for example §§ 20b et seq., §§ 20q et seq. BKAG) is constitutionally permissible on a wider scale. To that end, the requirements set out in § 20v sec. 5 sentence 1 no. 3 BKAG can provide a viable basis. However, in this respect the legislature must distinguish between the different types of data. In its current version, the provision is too broad in that is does not distinguish between different data, and it is thus disproportionate. [318]

d) Also § 20v sec. 5 sentence 3 no. 1 BKAG, which allows the transfer of data to offices for the protection of the Constitution (Verfassungsschutzbehörden) and the Military Counter Intelligence Agency (Militärischer Abschirmdienst), is incompatible with constitutional requirements. [319]

The provision, which applies to all data except that obtained through the surveillance of private homes (cf. § 20v sec. 5 sentence 5 BKAG), allows the transfer of data to the abovementioned authorities provided that there are factual indications suggesting that the data is necessary for the gathering and analysis of information on endeavours falling within the remit of the offices for the protection of the Constitution or the Military Counter Intelligence Agency. For that reason, it does not satisfy the standards of a hypothetical re-collection of data, which is, however, decisive for the transfer of data for a changed purpose (see above, D I 2 b). Indeed, the transfer of data generally pursues the objective of protecting particularly weighty legal interests in that it references the duties of the offices for the protection of the Constitution and the Military Counter Intelligence Agency. Furthermore, with regard to § 8 of the Act Regulating the Cooperation between the Federation and the Federal States in Matters Relating to the Protection of the Constitution and on the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (Bundesverfassungsschutzgesetz - BVerfSchG), which is decisive for a hypothetical re-collection of data, the transfer of certain data, such as that obtained through measures taken pursuant to § 20g BKAG […], can be justified to a relatively broad extent. Yet a provision that allows the transfer of essentially any data for the purpose of supporting the exercise of tasks without determining specific interference thresholds to that end is disproportionately broad. Indeed, the criterion of a hypothetical re-collection of data does not generally require that a specific risk situation, which is required for the collection of data - and which is generally also required for data collection by the offices for the protection of the Constitution, irrespective of the fact that their mandate is essentially limited to activities in the preliminary stages of a threat (cf. BVerfGE 100, 313 <383 and 384>; 120, 274 <329 and 330>; 130, 151 <205 and 206>) - also always be a precondition for each and every case of data transfer

(see above, D I 2 b bb). However, for constitutional reasons, it is imperative that the transfer of data be limited to data which, from the perspective of the Federal Criminal Police Office, not only constitutes a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations in criminal offences or dangers to high-ranking legal interests but also, at the same time, reveals specific insights on the endangerment of such legal interests (cf. on the transfer of data from intelligence services to the Federal Criminal Police Office BVerfGE 133, 277 <329 para. 123>) that are relevant for assessment of a situation in accordance with the duties of the offices for the protection of the Constitution. Regarding the transfer of data stemming from remote searches, it is furthermore necessary - like in the case of data stemming from the surveillance of private homes which the legislature has already made specific provision for in this respect - that the interference threshold for the data collection as such is reached, namely a specific impending danger (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <326, 328 and 329>). [320]

e) Accordingly, § 20v sec. 5 sentence 4 BKAG, too, does not satisfy the constitutional requirements. The provision allows a transfer of data to the Federal Intelligence Service (Bundesnachrichtendienst) subject to standards equivalent to those set out in § 20v sec. 5 sentence 3 no. 1 BKAG. The differences in wording do not - considering, too, the legislative reasons of the Act (cf. BTDrucks 16/9588, p. 34) - have an obvious substantive meaning and cannot, at any rate, alter the appraisal in terms of constitutional law. The constitutional deficiencies of § 20v sec. 5 sentence 3 no. 1 BKAG also arise with regard to this provision. [321]

4. Finally, all transfer powers lack overarching statutory provisions that ensure sufficient supervisory control. The data collection requirements calling for the substantive documentation and effective review by the Federal Data Protection Commissioner apply here, too (cf. above, C IV 6 d). [322]

IV.

In part, § 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 nos. 1 and 3, sentence 2 BKAG, which governs the transfer of data to public authorities of third countries - insofar as § 14a BKAG, which applies to transfers of data to Member States of the European Union, a rule that is not under scrutiny here, is not applicable -, also does not satisfy the constitutional requirements. [323]

1. The transfer of personal data to public authorities of third countries is, like the transfer of data to domestic authorities, a change in purpose. Insofar, in accordance with general standards, this change in purpose is to be assessed in light of the relevant fundamental rights with which the data collection interfered (see above, D I 2 a). However, with a view to the due respect owed to foreign legal orders, the transfer of data to third countries is subject to its own constitutional requirements. [324]

a) The result of a transfer of data to third countries is that, after the transfer, the guarantees of the Basic Law can no longer be applied as such and the standards prevailing in the respective receiving country apply instead. This does not, however, generally prevent a transfer to third countries. With its Preamble, Art. 1 sec. 2, Art. 9 sec. 2, Art. 16 sec. 2, Arts. 23 to 26 and Art. 59 sec. 2 GG, the Basic Law links the Federal Republic of Germany to the international community and has programmatically aligned the German state authority towards international cooperation (cf. BVerfGE 63, 343 <370>; 111, 307 <318 and 319>; 112, 1 <25, 27>). This includes dealing with other countries even if their legal order and judicial conception does not fully conform to the German domestic conception (cf. BVerfGE 31, 58 <75 et seq.>; 63, 343 <366>; 91, 335 <340, 343 et seq.>; 108, 238 <247 and 248). Such an exchange of data also aims to maintain intergovernmental relations in mutual interests and the Federal Government's freedom of action in the area of foreign policy (cf. BVerfGE 108, 129 <137>). [325]

As a starting point, the German state authority, when deciding on the transfer of personal data to third countries, remains bound by the fundamental rights (Art. 1 sec. 3 GG); the foreign state authority is only committed to its own legal obligations. [326]

Insofar, limits to the transfer of data emerge, on the one hand, in view of the preservation of data protection guarantees. The limits in the Basic Law on the domestic collection and processing of data may not be undermined in their substance by an exchange of data between security authorities. The legislature must thus ensure that this protection of fundamental rights is not eroded through the transfer of data collected by German authorities to third countries and to international organisations, just as it must not be eroded by the receipt and use of data from foreign authorities that was obtained in violation of human rights. [327]

On the other hand, limits to the transfer of data arise with regard to the use of the data by the receiving state if violations of human rights are to be feared. In any event, the transfer of data to third countries is imperatively barred if violations of the fundamental rule-of-law principles are to be feared (cf. BVerfGE 108, 129 <136 and 137>). Under no circumstances may the state be complicit in violations of human dignity (cf. BVerfG, Order of the Second Senate of 15 December 2015 - 2 BvR 2735/14 - para. 62, with further references). [328]

b) Accordingly, the transfer of data to third countries presupposes a restriction to sufficiently weighty purposes for which the data may be transferred and used (aa), as well as the ascertainment that the data will be handled in the third country in acceptable conformity with rule of law standards (bb). Apart from that, the guarantee of effective domestic oversight is required here, too (cc). The requirements are to be ensured through specific and clear foundations in German law (dd). [329]

aa) As far as the requirements for the purpose of the transfer and use of the data are concerned, the constitutional criteria for a change in purpose, being the relevant standards under the German legal order, apply (see above, D I 2). A transfer is thus permissible insofar as it would be permissible to collect the transferred data with comparably weighty means also for the purpose of the transfer (criterion of a hypothetical recollection of data). Thus, the transfer must pursue the aim of detecting comparably weighty criminal offences or the protection of comparably weighty legal interests as were relevant for the original data collection. As a rule, however, the transfer is not subject to the requirement that there be a specific risk situation or suspicion of a criminal offence; it suffices that the transferred information or the request by the receiving state show that there is, in the specific case, an evidentiary basis for further investigations for the purpose of detecting such criminal offences or protecting against impending dangers to such legal interests and threatening these at least in the medium term. Insofar, the requirements for the transfer of data stemming from the surveillance of private homes and remote searches are stricter in that this requires that interference thresholds relevant for the data collection are fully complied with (see above, D I 2 b bb; cf. also BVerfGE 109, 279 <377, 379>; 120, 274 <329 et seq.>). [330]

With regard to the resulting necessity of appraising the use of data by the receiving country, which is necessary in particular in the case of a transfer request by a third country, sufficient weight must be attached to the autonomy of the respective other legal order. As far as the question of equal weight of the respective purpose of use is concerned, it needs to be considered in this respect that the German legal order faces another legal order whose parameters, categories and assessments are not identical to those reflected in the German legal order and Basic Law and do not have to be identical. The fact that purpose limitations of the German legal order are insofar not identically reflected in the foreign legal order in the same detail does not bar a data transfer from the outset. When transferring the data, the receiving authorities must be notified clearly and expressly of limitations of use. [331]

bb) Furthermore, the transfer of personal data to third countries presupposes that the data will be handled in the third country in acceptable conformity with human rights and data protection standards (1), and requires an according ascertainment by the German state to that end (2). [332]

(1) A transfer of data to third countries requires that the data will be handled in the third country in sufficient conformity with rule-of-law standards. [333]

(a) In terms of the requirements for the handling of the data in light of data protection standards it is, however, not necessary that the receiving country has enacted rules for the processing of personal data that are comparable to the rules applicable under the German legal order, or that the receiving country provide the same level of protection as the Basic Law. In fact, the Basic Law recognises the autonomy and diversity of legal orders and generally respects them, also in the context of the exchange of data. Parameters and assessments do not need to conform to those of the German legal order or the German Basic Law. [334]

However, the transfer of personal data to third countries is only permissible if the handling of the transferred data in these countries does not undermine the human rights protection of personal data. This is not to say that the third country's legal order must guarantee institutional and procedural precautions in line with the German approach; in particular, it is not necessary that there be the same formal and institutional safeguards as required under data protection laws applicable to German authorities (see above, C IV 6). In this sense, it is necessary that an appropriate and substantive level of data protection be guaranteed with regard to the handling of the transferred data by the receiving state (cf. similarly ECJ, Judgment of 6 October 2015 - C-362/14 -, Schrems/Digital Rights Ireland, NJW 2015, p. 3151 <3155>, para. 73; cf. also Art. 8 ECHR; on this ECtHR, [GC], Roman Zakharov v. Russia, no. 47143/06, Judgment of 4.12.2015, §§ 227 et seq.; Art. 17 sec. 1 sentence 1 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) of 16 December 1966, BGBl. 1973 II p. 1534, UNTS 999, p. 171; Art. 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) of 10 December 1948, General Assembly Res. 217 A III, GAOR III, Doc. A/810, p. 71; cf. in this respect The right to privacy in the digital age, UN General Assembly Resolution 68/167 of 18 December 2013, UN Doc. A/Res/ 68/167 (2014), no. 4). Insofar, it needs to be considered in particular whether limitations resulting from the principle of purpose limitation, the requirement to delete the recorded data as well as fundamental requirements regarding oversight and data security are at least observed in general terms. The relevant standards for this appraisal are the domestic laws and the international obligations of the receiving state as well as their actual day-to-day application (cf. similarly ECJ, Judgment of 6 October 2015 - C-362/14 -, Schrems/ Digital Rights Ireland, NJW 2015, p. 3151 <3157>, para. 75). [335]

(b) In view of the fear of potential human rights abuses through the use of the data in the receiving state, it must be guaranteed in particular that the data will neither be used for political persecution nor inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment (cf. Art. 16a sec. 3 GG). Overall, the legislature must ensure that the transfer of data collected by German authorities and transferred to third countries or international organisations does not undermine the protection of the European Convention on Human Rights and the other international human rights conventions (cf. Art. 1 sec. 2 GG). [336]

(2) Whether the required protection level is guaranteed in the receiving state need not be examined separately for each individual case and secured through individually assured commitments that are binding under international law. In this respect, the legislature may instead also rely on a generalising factual assessment rendered by the Federal Criminal Police Office regarding the legal and factual situation in the receiving states. This assessment may claim validity as long as it is not opposed by facts to the contrary in special circumstances (cf. BVerfG, Order of the Second Senate of 15 December 2015 - 2 BvR 2735/14 - para. 69, with further references). [337]

If decisions with a view to a receiving state cannot be based on such assessments, it is necessary to conduct a facts-based case-by-case assessment that determines whether it is at least guaranteed that essential requirements for the handling of data are sufficiently met (see above, D IV 1 b bb (1)). If necessary, binding individual guarantees can and must be provided. As a rule, a binding assurance is a suitable means for removing concerns with regard to the permissibility of the transfer of data, so long as it is not to be expected that the assurance will not be adhered to in the individual case (cf. BVerfGE 63, 215 <224>; 109, 38 <62>; BVerfG, Order of the Second Senate of 15 December 2015 - 2 BvR 2735/14 - para. 70). However, as far as the individually applicable requirements are concerned, the legislature may also choose to determine these on the basis of an appraisal of the individual case. [338]

Ascertaining that the required degree of protection is met - be it generalised, be it in the individual case - is not a decision at the German authorities' free political disposal. In fact, the decision must be based on substantial and realistic information and must be updated regularly. Its reasons must be documented in a comprehensible manner. Further requirements are that the Federal Data Protection Commissioner has the opportunity to review the decision and that it may be subjected to judicial review (cf. also ECJ, Judgment of 6 October 2015 - C-362/14 -, Schrems/Digital Rights Ireland, NJW 2015, p. 3151 <3156>, paras. 78, 81, 89). [339]

cc) Even so, requirements of effective supervisory control including the suitable documentation of the respective transfer activities as well as the requirement of reporting duties apply in Germany (see above, C IV 6 d, e). [340]

dd) The standards developed above must be statutorily enshrined in a manner that satisfies the principle of specificity and legal clarity. This also includes the fact that the legal bases which, insofar as permissible, are meant to authorise a transfer of data for the purpose of receiving information through a matching of data collected by authorities in third countries as well as a return of supplementary information are as such designed with legal clarity. [341]

2. The transfer requirements stipulated in § 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 nos. 1 and 3 and sentence 2 BKAG are incompatible with these requirements. [342]

a) Insofar as it is to be understood as constituting an own legal basis […], § 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 no. 1 BKAG does not satisfy the constitutional requirements for a change in purpose. By generally allowing a transfer of data by the Federal Criminal Police Office for the purpose of fulfilling the tasks incumbent upon it, it lacks standards ensuring that data stemming from particularly intrusive surveillance measures may only be transferred for purposes that conform to the criterion of a hypothetical re-collection of data (cf. above, D I 2 b). Thus the power is not sufficiently delimited and disproportionate [343]

b) With respect to data stemming from the surveillance of private homes, § 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 no. 3 BKAG, too, is too broad and thus incompatible with constitutional requirements. According to the standards developed above, it must be ensured that such data may only be transferred in the event of imminent danger (see above, D I 2 b bb; cf. also BVerfGE 109, 279 <377, 379>). The provision does not contain such a limitation. [344]

Yet as far as other data is concerned, the provision is not constitutionally objectionable when construed appropriately. […] [345]

c) Finally, the transfer requirements set down in § 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG are also not compatible with the requirements for a change in purpose. [346]

The provision fails to sufficiently ensure that the transfer of data, following the criterion of a hypothetical re-collection of data, is limited to the protection of sufficiently weighty legal interests (cf. above, D I 2 b). The provision generally allows a transfer of data to prevent criminal offences of particular seriousness, without distinguishing with respect to the respective means chosen for the collection of the data. This threshold, however, does not justify the transfer of data stemming from particularly intrusive measures. If the legislature, in the context of data transfers for the purpose of preventing threats - as it does here for the prevention of criminal offences - does not invoke legal interests to determine the new purposes but rather refers to the nature of the crimes it intends to prevent, the respective weightings that apply to data collection under criminal procedural law are relevant here, too. Accordingly, the transfer of data stemming from telecommunications surveillance measures is limited to the prevention of serious criminal offences, while the transfer of data stemming from the surveillance of private homes and remote searches is limited to the prevention of particularly serious criminal offences (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279, <343 et seq.>; 125, 260 <328 and 329>; 129, 208 <243>; see also above, C IV 1 a). The provision, however, does not stipulate such requirements with regard to the transfer of data. [347]

Furthermore, in terms of the necessary degree of specificity of the risk situation, the provision does not meet the constitutional requirements in all respects. By indiscriminately allowing a transfer of data as soon as there are "grounds for believing" that a criminal offence will be committed in the future, it also allows a transfer of data obtained through the surveillance of private homes and remote searches without requiring an imminent danger (cf. BVerfGE 109, 279 <377, 379> on the surveillance of private homes) or a sufficiently specific impending danger (cf. BVerfGE 120, 274 <326, 328 and 329> on remote searches). This is incompatible with the requirements set out above (cf. above, D I 2 b bb). However, insofar as other types of data are concerned this interference threshold is not objectionable. As the provision requires indications that a crime will be committed, the transfer of data is conditional on whether a specific evidentiary basis for further investigations arises from the data. This is compatible with constitutional requirements. [348]

d) In contrast, the overarching rule in § 14 sec. 7 BKAG does not raise effective constitutional concerns. [349]

aa) § 14 sec. 7 sentence 7 BKAG determines that the transfer of data is barred insofar as the person concerned has a prevailing and legitimate interest in halting the transfer; thus, the provision leaves sufficient room for the constitutionally required ascertainment as to whether the required human rights standards are adhered to. [350]

bb) § 14 sec. 7 BKAG takes account of the Basic Law's data protection requirements by setting out procedural law standards for the transfer and by requiring an ascertainment of an appropriate level of data protection in the receiving country. [351]

(1) The provision establishes the Federal Criminal Police Office's responsibility for the admissibility of the transfer of data and thus demands an examination in particular as to whether sufficiently plausible indications result from the transferred information itself or in the context of a transfer request according to which the transfer of data is permissible for the respective purposes. If construed appropriately, the provision ensures both that the transfer purpose is formally communicated and that it is clearly pointed out that the data may be used only for this indicated purpose. In this respect, it is not objectionable that the purpose limitation is secured only by means of a reference to it, rather than by means of a formal obligation; nor is it objectionable that with regard to the deletion period only an informational notice on the German legal situation must be provided. Generally it is sufficient that, with regard to the factual and legal situation in the receiving state, the authorities ascertain that the data protection level is in actual fact appropriate. [352]

(2) § 14 sec. 7 sentences 7 to 9 BKAG stipulates such ascertainment requirements. This provision, when interpreted in conformity with the Constitution, is compatible with the constitutional requirements. It prohibits the transfer of data if a balancing of interests in the individual case results in the finding that legitimate interests of the person concerned prevail and, to that end, notes that these include an appropriate level of data protection in the receiving state. When interpreted in the light of the Constitution, however, the adherence in the receiving state to the fundamental rights requirements requiring appropriate data protection when handling data is not merely a factor the authorities can discretionarily overcome on a case-by-case basis. Instead, minimum fundamental rights requirements must always be ensured. If it is not possible by other means to ascertain that the transferred data will be handled in acceptable conformity with fundamental rule-of-law principles in the third country, recourse must be taken in individual cases to obtaining assurances that meet the requirements set out in § 14 sec. 7 sentence 9 BKAG. Such an interpretation of the provision does not raise concerns as to its constitutionality. The general provision § 27 sec. 1 no. 1 BKAG is an additional backup for the provision. [353]

e) As for the rest, the transfer rules set out in § 14 sec. 1 BKAG do not meet the constitutional requirements insofar as, with regard to transfer practices, they lack sufficient rules on supervisory control and the ordering of reporting duties (see above, C VI 6 d, e). In contrast, documentation requirements are set out in § 14 sec. 7 sentence 3 BKAG as constitutionally required (cf. BVerfGE 133, 277 <370 para. 215>). In light of the fact that § 19 Federal Data Protection Act (Bundesdatenschutzgesetz) applies, the data subjects' rights to information are also provided for (cf. BVerfGE 120, 351 <364 and 365>; see above, C IV 6 b; C VI 3 b). [354]

E.

I.

1. The finding that certain provisions are unconstitutional generally results in their voidness. However, the Federal Constitutional Court may also - pursuant to § 31 sec. 2 sentences 2 and 3 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) - confine itself to simply declaring that an unconstitutional provision is incompatible with the Constitution (BVerfGE 109, 190 <235>). This results in a mere contestation of the unconstitutionality of a provision without the declaration of its voidness. At the same time, the Federal Constitutional Court may combine the declaration that a provision is incompatible with the Constitution with an order according to which the unconstitutional provision shall nonetheless stay in effect on an interim basis until a date specified by the Court. This option is feasible if the immediate voidness of the contested provision would deprive common goods of paramount importance of their protection and if the outcome of a weighing of these interests with the fundamental rights at stake is that the interference can be tolerated during a transitional period (BVerfGE 33, 1 <13>; 33, 303 <347 and 348>; 40, 276 <283>; 41, 251 <266 et seq.>; 51, 268 <290 et seq.>; 109, 190 <235 and 236>). During the transitional period, the Federal Constitutional Court may, until the constitutional order is restored, take interim measures to reduce the authorities' powers, in line with what appears necessary in light of the weighing of interests (BVerfGE 40, 276 <283>; 41, 251 <267>). [355]

2. Accordingly, § 20h sec. 1 no. 1 c and § 20v sec. 6 sentence 5 BKAG are to be declared unconstitutional and void. The provisions do not satisfy the constitutional requirements and the legislature cannot remedy this by adopting a provision with comparable legislative content. [356]

In contrast, § 20g secs. 1 to 3, §§ 20h, 20j, 20k, 20l, § 20m secs. 1 and 3 - in this respect also § 20v sec. 6 sentence 3 (second half) - and § 20u secs. 1 and 2 as well as § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2, sec. 5 sentences 1 to 4 (without sentence 3 no. 2), § 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 nos. 1 and 3, sentence 2 BKAG are merely declared to be incompatible with the Constitution; the declaration that the provisions are incompatible with the Constitution is combined with the order that they shall nonetheless stay in effect on an interim basis until 30 June 2018 at the latest. The grounds for the unconstitutionality of the provisions do not affect the core of the powers granted through the provisions but merely touch upon individual aspects of their design in light of the rule of law; the fact that the overall assessment resulted in the finding of unconstitutionality is largely due to the fact that there is a lack of individual provisions capable of ensuring proportionality in a comprehensive manner, such as provisions guaranteeing effective review. Under such circumstances, the legislature is given the opportunity to remedy the constitutional contestations and thereby achieve the core of the objectives pursued by the provisions. In light of the great importance of an effective fight against international terrorism for a free and democratic state based on the rule of law, the provisions' continued interim applicability is more tolerable than a declaration of their voidness; a declaration to that effect would deprive the Federal Criminal Police Office of pivotal investigative powers for fighting international terrorism until the adoption of new legislation. [357]

However, with regard to the fundamental rights at issue, the order that the provisions are subject to continued applicability, for an interim period, necessitates certain restrictive requirements. A necessary order is, first of all, that measures adopted pursuant to § 20g sec. 2 nos. 1, 2 b, 4 and 5 BKAG may only by ordered by a court; in case of immediate danger, § 20g sec. 3 sentences 2 to 4 BKAG applies accordingly. Furthermore, measures set out in § 20g sec. 1 no. 2, § 20l sec. 1 no. 2 and § 20m sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG may only be ordered if the conditions stipulated in § 20k sec. 1 sentence 2 BKAG are fulfilled in the sense of the interpretation in conformity with the Constitution laid out in the grounds of this decision. Finally, the further use of data pursuant to § 20v sec. 4 sentence 2 BKAG or the transfer of data pursuant to § 20v sec. 5 and § 14 sec. 1 BKAG is, with regard to data stemming from the surveillance of private homes (§ 20h BKAG), only permissible in cases of imminent danger and, with regard to data stemming from remote searches (§ 20k BKAG), only permissible if there is, a sufficiently specific impending danger to the relevant legal interests in that particular case. [358]

II.

In parts, the decision was not adopted unanimously. This is true in particular with regard to the finding that § 20g sec. 1 no. 2, § 20l sec. 1 no. 2 and § 20m sec. 1 no. 2 BKAG are unconstitutional (rather than ruling that they may be interpreted in conformity with the Constitution); the recognition that the investigative powers set out in § 20g BKAG typically affect the core area; the objections raised against insufficiently designed supervisory powers, reporting and sanctioning duties; and, in parts, also with regard to the lack of requirements of a judicial decision. These findings were handed down with 5:3 votes. [359]

XV. Protection of Property - Article 14 of the Basic Law

Some General Background

The history of the protection of property in constitutions and international treaties reveals difficulties. Some noteworthy instruments, such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) did not contain property protection clauses. In the case of the ECHR such a clause was added to the first Protocol to the Convention[158], which went into effect in 1954, one year after the original Convention. To this day Switzerland has not ratified this Protocol[159]. Property protection, as included in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in Article 17 requires that "[e]veryone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others" and "[n]o one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property".[160] The reason for these difficulties mainly has to do with the potential impact a property protection clause was perceived to perhaps have on the economic order of a state. There was a certain reluctance to, in essence, set a free market economy as the only possible option for a state by introducing a property protection clause. The alternative, namely to limit property protection to personal property was also not very attractive. A second difficulty lies in the fact that the concept of property itself is an abstract legal concept. The term 'property' refers to a legal relationship of one or several - natural or legal - persons to chattel or immovable property, usually to the exclusion of others. Property is therefore the product of a legal order, notwithstanding the fact that core elements of property can be traced to trans-positivist notions of natural law or the like. The Basic Law has incorporated this inherent difficulty by guaranteeing property and the right of inheritance (property succession) in Article 14.1 but at the same time stipulating in Article 14.2 that property has a social function and the owner a social responsibility. Article 14.3 regulates the taking (expropriation) of property. Article 15, which specifically allows for the nationalization of "Land, natural resources and means of production", the embodiment of the conflict among the drafters of the Basic Law between free marketers on the one side and a more socialistically inclined opposition. Article 15 has never become relevant and probably will not become relevant in the foreseeable future, not only because the communist model for economic organization has not proven to be very successful, but also because Article 15 makes nationalization subject to the payment of compensation and hence prohibitively expensive.

1. Groundwater, BVerfGE 58, 300

Explanatory Annotation

In this case a gravel pit operator sought authorization from the relevant water authorities to continue extracting gravel at sub-ground-water level in a water protection zone. This authorization was denied. The applicant did not seek legal remedies against the denial and instead demanded compensation for what he regarded as a taking of his land because the commercial exploitation of it had been made impossible.

The case is significant because of the Court's attempt to develop a clear structure of the protection in Article 14. The Court distinguished between a legal taking, i.e. a taking of property directly afforded by statute, an administrative taking, i.e. a taking afforded on the basis of an administrative act based on statute on the one hand and a "content definition", i.e. a legal definition of what is to be property - and thus protected - and what isn't. At issue here were several provisions of the Federal Water Act, which made any use of groundwater subject to authorization. The Court regarded these provisions as content definition provisions, i.e. it regarded these provisions as withdrawing the groundwater and its use from the ownership of the land. In other words insofar as the groundwater is concerned, there is no property and hence there cannot be any taking.

A further consequence of the decision was that those affected by such administrative acts do not have a choice to either accept the administrative restriction and demand compensation for it or challenge the administrative act. Either the act in question is an admissible expropriation, in which case the only option is to seek adequate compensation or it is not, in which case the administrative act and the restriction it contains must be challenged.

Headnotes:

1. a) In the case of a dispute with respect to the legality of an expropriatory action, the administrative courts, which in principle have jurisdiction, must examine all aspects of the legality of the action. This includes determining whether the law on which the interference is based contains a provision governing the nature and extent of compensation to be awarded.

   b) In the case of a dispute with respect to the amount of compensation for expropriation, the ordinary courts are responsible for determining whether the party affected was awarded compensation as called for by (existing) legislation (see BVerfGE 46, 268 [285]).

* Translation by Donna Elliott; © Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung.

2. If the party affected considers an action directed against him to constitute expropriation, that party may bring an action for compensation only if a legal basis exists for such a claim. In the absence of any such legal basis, the party affected must petition the courts of jurisdiction for reversal of the interventionary action.

3. Civil law and provisions of public law enjoy equal priority for the purposes of the definition of the legal interests of owners of landed property pursuant to Article 14 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG).

4. The fact that the Federal Water Act (Wasserhaushaltsgesetz - WHG) has subjected the use of subsurface water to regulations of public law that are independent of property in land for the purposes of ensuring viable water management - in particular as regards the public water supply - is consistent with the Basic Law.

Order of the First Senate of 15 July 1981, 1 BvR 77/78

Facts:

The claimant in the initial proceedings had been operating a wet gravel pit on his property in the Münsterland region since 1936. The extraction of gravel from the aquifer was allowed under the Prussian Water Act (Preußisches Wassergesetz) of 1913, which was in force at the time. An application for a permit to continue extraction of gravel filed after the Federal Water Act went into effect was denied by the public authority. The objection of the claimant was unsuccessful; the claimant did not bring any action to compel issuance of the permit applied for. Instead the petition submitted by the claimant for compensation due to an expropriatory action in respect of his established and operational commercial enterprise and his landed property as a result of the denial of the water use permit was dismissed by the Land of North Rhine-Westphalia. The subsequent action before the civil courts seeking appropriate compensation resulted in a stay of the proceedings by the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof). The Federal Court of Justice referred the question as to whether s. 1a.3, s. 2.1 and s. 6 of the Federal Water Act are compatible with Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to the Federal Constitutional Court. The Federal Court of Justice saw a violation of property rights in the fact that the provisions of the Federal Water Act made any use of groundwater that is relevant in terms of water management dependent upon a "loan" to which the property owner has no legal claim.

The Federal Constitutional Court found the provisions of the Federal Water Act on which the Federal Court of Justice based its decision to be consistent with the Basic Law.

B.

The referral is admissible.

I.

The purpose of judicial review pursuant to Article 100.1 of the Basic Law is to ensure that decisions made in the case of concrete legal disputes are consistent with the Basic Law. Accordingly, these interlocutory proceedings are required and admissible if the validity of a provision submitted for review is relevant for the purposes of rendering a decision in initial proceedings; the provision must be relevant to the subject matter and outcome of the legal dispute. This will be the case only if the decision would have to be different if the provision is invalid from what it would have to be if the provision is valid (BVerfGE 46, 268 [283]).

The order for reference satisfies these conditions only if the question referred for review (s. 81 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act can be interpreted to be whether the provisions of the Federal Water Act under challenge are incompatible with the Basic Law because they involve expropriatory norms that contain no provision for appropriate compensation as called for by Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

In addition, constitutional review of the facts underlying the initial legal dispute must also be expanded to cover s. 17 of the Federal Water Act.

1. The order for reference contained mention of the following alternative decisions at the level of the initial proceedings: If the provisions of the Federal Water Act that qualify as laws within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law are valid, the action must be dismissed; if they are invalid, the Senate must stay the decision "until the legislature has provided a constitutionally unobjectionable definition of the substantive content of landed property in respect of groundwater."

This examination does not constitute a ground for considering the provisions under challenge relevant for the purposes of the decision. Proceeding on the basis of the legal opinion of the Court, the action would also have to be dismissed if the cited provisions are incompatible with the Basic Law. The initial proceedings involved a dispute over compensation within the meaning of Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law; this provides the basis for the alternative decisions.

a) The Basic Law assigned adjudicatory authority over decisions regarding the area of law governing expropriation that is limited in terms of function and content to the ordinary courts. According to Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law, they must rule if a dispute arises as to the amount of compensation. Since the judicial review proceedings pursuant to Article 100.1 of the Basic Law represent an integral part of the initial legal dispute - even if referred to the Federal Constitutional Court for decision, it follows from the provision of the Basic Law governing legal recourse that only such provisions of law may be referred for constitutional review and only such legal issues referred for decision (s. 81 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act) as are of legal importance in such proceedings. On the other hand, legal issues that arise outside the area of jurisdiction identified by Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law may not constitute the subject matter of a reference. Otherwise, proceedings pursuant to Article 100.1 of the Basic Law would result in abstract judicial review pursuant to Article 93.1 no. 2 of the Basic Law, which the courts have no authority to initiate. The Federal Constitutional Court may in connection with concrete abstract judicial review proceedings also rule only on legal issues of importance for decisions in initial proceedings.

b) Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law is the procedural complement to the principle formulated in Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to the effect that a legal basis for compensation must exist. The content and scope of claims for compensation that may be sought by the party affected must be determined by law (BVerfGE 46, 268 [285]).

The court must rule on whether the expropriated party has been awarded compensation in compliance with the provisions of law. This represents the limit to the jurisdictional competence of the ordinary courts. They may not award compensation for expropriation in the absence of a basis for such claims created by the legislature.

As regards judicial review, what is important is therefore whether the legal dispute is based on an expropriation law that satisfies the requirements of Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. This provision permits expropriation only on the basis of legislation that at the same time regulates the nature and extent of compensation; a law that does not satisfy these requirements is unconstitutional (BVerfGE 24, 367 [418]; 46, 268 [287]).

As a result, two legal questions are at issue in the reference proceedings: first of all, whether the law on which the administrative action is based and on the basis of which compensation is claimed is an expropriation law within the meaning of Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law and secondly - if that is the case - whether the law at the same time makes provision for compensation.

In that regard, it must be initially noted that the provisions under challenge specify the conditions under which the use of water may be permitted. However, this is not for the ordinary courts to decide. In addition, the decision of a legal dispute pursuant to Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law may not hinge upon whether a law that governs the content and limits of property pursuant to Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is compatible with the Basic Law. Such a question would be of no importance as regards the legality of an expropriation since it can in no case - neither if the provisions are valid, nor if they are invalid - result in confirmation of the existence of an expropriation that entails obligatory compensation. The opinion of the Court of Appeal cited in the order for reference to the effect that going beyond the bounds of "responsibility to society ... gives rise to a right to compensation" is not consistent with the Basic Law. A provision defining substantive content retains its legal character as a norm within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, even if it is in violation of the Basic Law and is not transformed into an expropriation law that is subject to the requirements of Article 14.3 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 52, 1 [27 and 28]).

A provision of law cannot at one and the same time be both constitutional and unconstitutional. Accordingly, the application of such a provision by public authorities cannot be considered to constitute an instance of administrative expropriation that entails an obligation to provide compensation, but still represents in any case mere enforcement of a law, which, however, may be contested through legal channels. Whether a party affected by an invalid law has any grounds for remedial action may also not be decided in proceedings pursuant to Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law.

2. The admissibility of the order for reference as regards the relevance of the provisions under challenge to the decision can accordingly be confirmed only on the basis of the question presented in respect of the legality of the expropriation. The question at issue is whether the cited provisions of the Federal Water Act involve expropriatory norms that must be complemented by provision for compensation on constitutional grounds.

However, although the Federal Court of Justice also views the provisions under challenge as laws within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, that it considers to be unconstitutional, analysis of the order for reference shows that the Court ultimately proceeds from the expropriatory character of the provisions under challenge, which would be incompatible with the Basic Law due to the absence of a compensation clause.

The fact that the legality of expropriation is at issue in the order for reference is reflected by, among other things, the fact that the Court several times characterizes the loss of the possibility of extracting gravel due to the denial of the water usage permit as encroachment on property rights protected by the Basic Law and deprivation of an ownership interest. The complainant is deprived of his legal interest as defined by ss. 903 and 905 of the Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch - BGB) and the "nature of the matter" by the provisions under challenge. Deprivation of a legal interest guaranteed by Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, which, accordingly, constitutes the substantive content of the provisions under challenge, is, however, the typical characteristic of expropriation (BVerfGE 52, 1 [27]).

The Federal Court of Justice also does not consider the fact that the complainant in the initial proceedings was prevented from carrying out plans to engage in wet extraction of gravel in the immediate vicinity of a water works to be in any way unconstitutional. In fact, it was emphasized, and to be sure repeatedly, that the Basic Law does not allow such measures without compensation.

In the final analysis, the Federal Court of Justice is prevented from deciding in favour of the claimant because the provisions under challenge do not at the same time contain the necessary provisions for compensation required by Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. It is therefore necessary to reinterpret the question posed in the order for reference accordingly in order to determine whether the provisions of the Federal Water Act are unconstitutional under this aspect.

Such reinterpretation is warranted in view of the function of judicial review, which is to create legal clarity in the case of provisions of law whose constitutional validity is disputed. The question as to whether the government is constitutionally required to provide compensation when applying the provisions of the Federal Water Act in cases such as that at hand - as the Federal Court of Justice has assumed in its previous case law - is one of far-reaching legal and economic importance. As is illustrated by the order of the Senate of 7 June 1977 (BVerfGE 45, 63), municipalities, which are primarily affected, have no possibility of clarifying this legal issue through constitutional proceedings. In addition, the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht) takes a position that differs from that of the Federal Court of Justice.

3. The claimant in the initial proceedings did not contest denial of a water usage permit through an action that was available to him. The question that follows from this as to whether a legal dispute is even possible in respect of the amount of compensation pursuant to Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law can be answered in the affirmative only by way of exception in view of the special nature of the facts involved in the matter.

a) A citizen affected by an expropriatory action has - except in the case of special situations that need not be considered here - pursuant to Article 19.4 sentence 1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with s. 40 of the Code of Administrative Court Procedure (Verwaltungsgericht-sordnung - VwGO) recourse to the administrative courts. The role of these courts is to review all factual and legal aspects of the administrative action to determine its legality (BVerfGE 32, 195 [197] with references).

In this context, their powers of review exceed those of the ordinary courts. Apart from determining whether the action satisfies the constitutionally mandated conditions of Article 14.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law and the principle of proportionality, (BVerfGE 24, 367 [404 and 405] they must in particular establish whether the action was taken on a constitutional basis. This also includes a determination of whether the law on which the action is based contains a provision governing the nature and extent of compensation to be provided. Since a law that does not satisfy this requirement is unconstitutional, the administrative courts may not apply such a law; instead, they must obtain a decision as to the validity of the law from the Federal Constitutional Court pursuant to Article 100.1 of the Basic Law (See, for example, BVerfGE 25, 112 [114]; 51, 193 [210 and 211]; 52, 1 [14]).

If the law is declared unconstitutional, the administrative action based on that law must be voided since it violates the fundamental right of the party affected under Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

The guarantee of property protects concrete holdings in the possession of the individual owner (BVerfGE 24, 367 [400]; 38, 175 [181, 184 and 185]).

He need accept deprivation of his constitutionally protected legal interest only if such action satisfies in every respect the requirements stipulated in Article 14.3 of the Basic Law. In such cases, the guarantee of an existing legal interest is replaced by a guarantee of its value, which is intended to ensure compensation whose details are determined by the legislature (Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court [Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE] 24, 367 [397]; 46, 268 [285]).

On the other hand, voidance of the interventionary action is the consequence of an unconstitutional "expropriation" provided for by the Basic Law (BVerfGE 56, 249 [266]).

By opening the way to recourse to the administrative courts, the Basic Law has also given parties affected by such actions the possibility of defeating the administrative action themselves if the underlying law is invalid, either because it lacks provision for compensation, or for any other reason [see BVerfGE 45, 297 [342 et seq.]).

Such parties may as a final resort avail themselves of the possibility of a constitutional complaint if the administrative courts do not agree with their submission to the effect that an unconstitutional expropriation law is involved (See, for example, BVerfGE 45, 297 [346]; 53, 336 [349]).

b) The following consequences ensue as regards the adjudicatory authority of the ordinary courts over proceedings pursuant to Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law: if a citizen considers the action directed against him to constitute expropriation, that citizen may bring an action for compensation only if a legal basis exists for such a claim. In the absence of any such legal basis, the party affected must seek voidance of the interventionary action through the administrative courts. The party may not, however, forego appeal and claim compensation to which the party is not entitled by law; in the absence of any legal basis, the courts also cannot award any such compensation.

Accordingly, the party affected does not have the option to choose whether to defend himself against an "expropriation" that is illegal because of the lack of legal provision for compensation or to demand compensation without doing so. If that party neglects to contest the interventionary action, the action for compensation must be dismissed. Individuals who fail to avail themselves of the possibilities afforded by the Basic Law to create a situation that is consistent with the Basic Law may not then turn around and demand pecuniary compensation from the government for a loss of legal rights that they themselves brought about.

Referral to the possibility of contesting the administrative action does not represent an unreasonable burden for the party affected. The decision to avail oneself of this legal remedy involves no greater difficulty than the decision to bring an action for compensation. It presupposes only that it be ascertained whether the law makes provision for compensation.

II.

The decision to be rendered in the initial proceedings therefore hinges upon whether the fact that the Federal Water Act does not entitle the claimant to compensation because of the denial of a water usage permit is compatible with the Basic Law. The question referred for review (s. 81 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act) is therefore whether Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law has been violated.

C.

I.

It is not possible to concur with the opinion of the referring court in the assessment of the constitutional issue involved.

II.

1. In reviewing the provision against the standard of the Basic Law, it must be assumed that the legislature can enact three different types of laws relating to property rights under Article 14 of the Basic Law.

Taken in the sense of assignment of a legally protected interest to a legal entity, property necessarily requires legal definition in order to be viable in the legal sphere. Accordingly, the Basic Law assigns the legislature responsibility for determining the content and limits of property in Article 14.1 sentence 2. Such norms specify, generally and in the abstract, the rights and obligations of ownership and therefore determine the substantive "content" of property (BVerfGE 52, 1 [27]).

The legislature thereby creates at the legislative level those legal norms that establish and define the legal position of ownership; such norms may be of the nature of private law or public law.

Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also gives the legislature the possibility of depriving an identified or identifiable class of individuals of concrete property rights by law that were legally acquired on the basis of generally applicable laws within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (expropriation by operation of law - BVerfGE 24, 367 [395 and 396]; 45, 297 [325 and 326]; 52, 1 [27]).

Finally, the legislature may - also pursuant to Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law - empower the executive to deprive individuals of concrete property. Expropriation on the basis of a law (administrative expropriation) requires an enforcement action by a public authority that - unlike expropriation by operation of law - may be contested through legal channels.

The various provisions of law pertaining to property rights that come into question here are subject to different requirements as regards their admissibility under the Basic Law. This applies not only in respect of the definition of substantive content and expropriation. The two forms of expropriation are not arbitrarily interchangeable as regards the guarantee of comprehensive and effective legal recourse under the Basic Law (BVerfGE 24, 367 [401]; 45, 297 [331, 333]).

In addition, their effects are not identical since the deprivation of rights occurs at different points in time (see BVerfGE 45, 297 [326]).

Contrary to the legal opinion advocated in the order for reference, expropriation by operation of law and administrative expropriation are mutually exclusive: a legal interest that has already been appropriated by the legislature cannot then be set aside again through administrative action. One and the same provision of law cannot effect expropriation by operation of law and at the same time empower the executive to undertake expropriation. That means that if the Federal Water Act appropriated the power inferred by the court from s. 905 of the Civil Code as soon as it went into force, application of s. 6 of the Federal Water Act cannot constitute expropriation of powers invested pursuant to that provision.

Definition of substantive content, expropriation by operation of law and administrative expropriation are all independent legal institutions that the Basic Law clearly distinguishes from one another. That does not, however, exclude the possibility that a new legislative provision within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to be applied in the future will at the same time effect expropriation by operation of law because, and to the extent, it appropriates rights that an individual has exercised on the basis of previous law (BVerfGE 45, 297 [332]; 52, 1 [28]).

The provisions under challenge are not expropriation laws in the context of this system; they neither empower the executive to seize the land of the owner who plans to engage in the wet extraction of gravel, nor is expropriation by operation of law involved; instead, they regulate the content of and limits to property within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

2. In order to determine whether a legal action qualifies as expropriation, it is necessary to establish whether the party affected has a claim to a legal interest amenable to expropriation at the time of the seizure (BVerfGE 25, 112 [121]; 29, 348 [360]).

a) In that regard, the referring court proceeds on the basis of the following opinion: landed property includes the groundwater, which is considered to belong to that part of the terrestrial body covered by the right of property owners pursuant to s. 905 of the Civil Code. The question as to whether groundwater is a physical object need not be addressed; in any case, the right to dispose of the groundwater found on the land is considered to inure to the landed property. The public law use regulations of the Federal Water Act restrict the "right inherent in landed property" to "free access to groundwater."

   It is not possible to concur with this legal opinion.

b) The order for reference is also based on the legal opinion to the effect that ownership of landed property must be considered a comprehensive right that in principle encompasses any possible and economically reasonable use and is conditioned by civil law and in particular by s. 903 of the Civil Code. This is reflected by, among other things, the fact that the court speaks of property "within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law and s. 903 of the Civil Code."

   Proceeding from this basis, the public law regulations of the Federal Water Act that restrict the owner's enjoyment of property under private law would seem to constitute restriction of his property rights, which are "per se" comprehensive and constitutionally guaranteed. The Federal Water Act leads - according to the order for reference - to an "encroachment upon the sphere of private law" and therefore potentially to expropriation. In that case, the decision as to the expropriatory character would hinge upon the intensity of the encroachment, i.e., upon its "nature and severity."

   It is also not possible to concur with these premises as regards the law governing expropriation.

   The legal opinion to the effect that the legal interest of individual property owners described by s. 903 of the Civil Code is restricted by the general provisions of the Federal Water Act in a manner tantamount to expropriation derives from the opinion advocated in connection with the Imperial Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung) to the effect that an expropriation can already be ascertained "if the right of the owner to dispose at will of his physical object pursuant to s. 903 of the Civil Code is impaired for the benefit of a third party." (Decisions of the Imperial Court in Civil Matters [Reichsgericht in Zivilsachen - RGZ] 116, 268 [272]; Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen - BGHZ] 6, 270 [276] - order for reference p. 14).

This legal opinion, which is based on the precedence of the provisions of civil law governing property rights over provisions of public law, is not consistent with the Basic Law.

The definition of property that is guaranteed by the Basic Law must be inferred from the Basic Law itself. The definition of the term property within the meaning of the Basic Law cannot be inferred from provisions of ordinary law, which is inferior to the Basic Law, nor can the scope of the guarantee of concrete property be derived from the legal position under private law.

The Basic Law has charged the legislature with the creation of a system of property rights that does justice to both the private interests of the individual and those of the general public (See BVerfGE 21, 73 [83]; 25, 112 [117 and 118]; 37, 132 [140 and 141]; 50, 290 [340]; 52, 1 [29]).

The legislature has in this regard a twofold task: On the one hand, it must create in the area of private law (BVerfGE 42, 20 [30 et seq.]), the provisions to be applied in connection with legal transactions and legal relationships among citizens (for example, for the transfer or encumbrance of property, law governing relations between neighbours and law governing restitution in the case of impairment of property by third parties); on the other hand, it must take into account the interests of the general public - which especially include every owner of landed property - in the provisions of (for the most part) public law. Although legal relationships under civil law are usually subsumed under the term private rights, both civil law and provisions of public law enjoy equal priority for the purposes of assessing the legal interests of property owners. The system of property rights under civil law does not conclusively regulate the content and limits of property. In the context of Article 14 of the Basic Law, the provisions of private law governing property also do not enjoy precedence over the provisions of public law that govern property rights.

In fact, the concrete rights that a property owner enjoys at a given time follow from the entirety of all provisions governing the ownership interests of property owners that are in force at that time. If it should happen in this connection that a property owner does not have a specific right, this right is then not part of his right of ownership. How the legislature achieves this exclusion is merely a legislative drafting issue. If the legislature initially defines the legal interest in a comprehensive manner only to exclude certain rights of domain in another provision, the party affected is from the outset afforded only a legal interest that is restricted in this manner (See BVerfGE 49, 382 [393]).

The nature and scope of the protection of an existing legal interest guaranteed by Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law follow from the entire body of constitutional law that defines the content of property, and this also holds in the case of deprivation of property rights that entails mandatory compensation.

3. The following ensues from this legal situation:

   a) The provisions under challenge do not empower the executive to deprive owners of landed property of their constitutionally protected rights. Instead, they regulate in a general manner the relationship between landed property and groundwater and define the legal interest of individual owners of landed property within this area of law. According to the provisions of the Federal Water Act, an owner of landed property - apart from exceptions that are not involved here - has no right to affect the groundwater in connection with the use of the property. Such an owner is therefore not deprived of any right through application of the law. The denial of the permit to use the groundwater in connection with the wet extraction of gravel on the basis of s. 6 of the Federal Water Act cannot therefore constitute administrative expropriation. Application of this provision merely concretizes regulations adopted by the legislature pursuant to Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law; the provision makes known the limits imposed upon the owner in the exercise of his property rights.

      The primary focus of the order for reference on the extraction of gravel, and not on the use of groundwater, does not in any way change this. The Federal Water Act excludes interference with the groundwater from the content of landed property in principle. It makes no difference in this context whether the purpose of such interference is to make use of the groundwater itself or the interference is only an undesirable side effect of measures taken for other purposes. Property in land does not include the right to use the terrestrial body, which is possible only in connection with the use of the groundwater and requires permission. Wet extraction of gravel cannot be broken down into extraction of gravel that is authorized under private law and the use of groundwater, which is pursuant to the Federal Water Act not authorized. To the extent that the gravel lies in the aquifer, the owner has the right to extract it only with permission under legislation governing the use of water. The denial of the permit under legislation governing the use of water therefore also does not represent a deprivation of property in that regard.

   b) As regards its temporal sphere of operation, the public law water use regulations apply to cases involving the use of water that are to occur after the Federal Water Act goes into force. This does not constitute expropriation by operation of law as compared with previous law (e.g., the Prussian Water Act) that afforded owners of landed property the right to use water. The law has merely redefined the content of landed property in respect of groundwater for the future for the entire Federal Republic at the legislative level. Such a change in the law does not result in the deprivation of a concrete legal interest protected by the guarantee of an existing legal interest under Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law and therefore does not constitute expropriation.

The problem of expropriation by operation of law does, however, arise in the case of a change in the law when the right to use groundwater under previous law has already been exercised and the property owner is deprived of this right (see D below). In connection with the legal question this gives rise to (s. 81 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act) as to whether the Federal Water Act constitutes expropriation by operation of law in respect of the "old uses" under discussion here, it is first necessary to address the question as to whether the provisions of law are themselves consistent with the Basic Law (BVerfGE 31, 275 [285]; 51, 193 [207]). If the public law use regulations contained in the provisions cited were to be considered unconstitutional, the transitional law created for such cases would lose its importance.

III.

Further examination shows that the provisions under challenge properly define the content and limits of property in land.

1. In the exercise of its duty to define the content and limits of property imposed by Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the legislature must respect recognition of private property under constitutional law pursuant to Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law as well as the social imperative contained in Article 14.2 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 37, 132 [140]; 52, 1 [29]).

As the Federal Constitutional Court has repeatedly ruled, certain limits are imposed upon the legislature when it comes to the restriction of rights of ownership. In the present case, at issue is whether the guarantee of property has been violated because the right to use groundwater is in principle divorced from property in land and subjected to regulation under public law.

a) First of all, it is not possible to infer from Article 14 of the Basic Law that groundwater must in principle be legally assigned to owners of property in land because of the existence of a natural relationship between groundwater and landed property. In creating a system of property rights that is consistent with the Basic Law, the legislature is not bound by a definition of property that derives from the "nature of the matter." (see BVerfGE 31, 229 [248]).

The guarantee of private property as a legal institution (BVerfGE 20, 351 [355]; 24, 367 [389]), does to be sure prohibit removal of such areas from the system of private law as it belongs to the elementary inventory of activities protected by the Basic Law, within the area of law governing property and consequently also elimination or significant restriction of the area of freedom protected by Article 14 of the Basic Law. It does not, however, follow from this that the Basic Law requires that every legally protected interest be subject to control under private law (BVerfGE 24, 367 [389]).

The guarantee provided by this legal institution is not infringed if interests that are of vital importance to the general public are subsumed not under the system of private law but rather under a system of public law for the purposes of securing interests of overriding importance to the common good and averting danger (BVerfGE 24, 367 [389]).

b) The provisions to be reviewed are intended to ensure "economical" management of water resources. The water supply itself is, however, a phenomenon (like air) and as such is not amenable to regulation by law. However, human interference with subsurface water may be subjected to regulation by generally binding provisions of law. Such interference may affect the quantity as well as the characteristics of the water. ...

The volumetric demands on the water supply and threats to its biological, physical and chemical characteristics due to human interference have, in addition to other considerations, caused the constituent legislature to place a theretofore unknown area, water management, under the jurisdiction of the federal government (Article 75.1 no. 4 of the Basic Law). In so doing, the legislature indicated that - in addition to existing legislation governing the use of water - it was necessary to enact laws that ensure ordered management of available water resources. When the legislature addressed this constitutional issue by enacting the Federal Water Act, it was faced with the task of creating a system of law for the "economical" use of water to take into account general needs while at the same time protecting the groundwater against harmful effects caused by property owners. The path chosen, which was to subject the use of groundwater to regulation under public law that is divorced from surface ownership, is to a great extent an extension of a legal development that had already been anticipated by the previous law governing water rights. This development was necessary to take into account modern technical and other possibilities that have an effect upon groundwater. The Civil Code, which governs legal relationships in the private sphere, did not address this issue, which arose after its enactment, in its ss. 903 and 905, nor could it have.

c) Water is one of the most important bases for all human, animal and plant life. It is needed not only for drinking and domestic use, but is also required as a means of production in industry and the trade sector. Due to the disparate and to some extent competing interests in the use of water, the Federal Constitutional Court had already in the past established that ordered water management was of vital importance not only for the population but also for the overall economy (BVerfGE 10, 89 [113]).

d) Since groundwater flows through the earth like a river, the effect of removing water or introducing substances cannot be limited to a specific piece of property. Groundwater that is removed from one piece of property is no longer available to the property downstream. Contamination that occurs on one piece of property can make the water over vast expanses unsuitable for other uses, in particular for use as drinking water. Interference with groundwater also has an intensive effect upon the surrounding areas.

e) The importance of groundwater for the general public, in particular for the public water supply, can therefore hardly be overestimated. At the same time, groundwater is especially susceptible to deleterious effects caused by property owners. The considerations presented above show that it would not be reasonable to leave the use of groundwater to the complete discretion of individuals or to limit its use exclusively

- which would have been sufficient under previous circumstances - on the basis of the legal principle of "general acceptability". The mastery of such a comprehensive task that serves the common good is typical of the issues addressed by public law that can hardly be accomplished with the means available under private law. There can therefore be no objection on constitutional grounds to the fact that the legislature has placed subsurface water under a system of public law that is divorced from surface ownership in order to ensure viable water management. What is involved here - despite the representations in the order for reference - is not the "unilateral interest of the state" but assertion of the public good by the state.

2. The objections to the legal regulation that have been advanced are based on the erroneous assumption that groundwater must be legally considered part of landed property on constitutional grounds.

a) First of all, the opinion to the effect that the provisions of the Federal Water Act resulted in an "erosion of the substance of landed property" because such property would be subject to "total subordination to the interests of society" is incorrect. Property in land is not deprived of the characteristics of private usufruct rights and the basic power of disposition (BVerfGE 37, 132 [140]; 50, 290 [339]; 52, 1 [31]) merely because the owner may dispose of groundwater only with regulatory approval. The usufruct rights of owners of landed property have always pertained primarily to the surface of the property, whereas the right to access materials lying below the surface has consistently been subject to far-reaching restrictions. Even the power to dispose of and make use of landed property is in many ways subject to constitutional restrictions (see, for example, BVerfGE 21, 73 [83.]; 25, 112 [117]).The possibility of making economically meaningful use of a piece of property does not as a rule hinge upon whether groundwater can be brought to the surface of the property or whether the owner must "resist" the groundwater. A right to precisely those possible uses that promise the owner maximum economic benefit cannot be inferred from the constitutional guarantee of landed property.

c) The provisions under challenge also do not violate the principle of proportionality.

The opinion to the effect that instead of a repressive ban with the possibility of exemption, a constitutional regulation must make provision for a procedure for obtaining a permit that gives owners of landed property a legal right for permission to use water if the reasons for denial contained in s. 6 of the Federal Water Act do not apply instead of a discretionary decision overlooks the following:

> A procedure for obtaining a permit that involves a legal right to issuance of a permit is constitutionally required if the procedure pertains to the exercise of rights that are guaranteed by the Basic Law. Preventive review with the possibility of a ban serves to determine whether the legal exercise of the fundamental right is intended (BVerfGE 20, 150 [154 and 155]).

But even these conditions do not exist because the access of owners of landed property to groundwater is in principle excluded by a law that is in compliance with the Basic Law.

Moreover, a preventive procedure for granting permission with the possibility of denial of permission would not suffice to ensure ordered water management. If permission to carry out plans to use water could be denied only when a project is expected to detract from the public good, it would - if all discretion on the part of the public authority were to be excluded - not be possible to achieve optimal use of available water resources. Such a regulatory system would inevitably fail to function, for example, when a concrete project is not in itself expected to detract from the public good but is, however, such as to trigger a development with unforeseeable effects at the level of water management (see Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht - BVerwG), ZfW, 1965, p. 98 [106]).

The results would be equally unacceptable in cases in which approval of a project would completely exhaust available capacity for the use of water so that no latitude would remain to accommodate any needs that might arise in the future.

These examples suffice to show that a preventive procedure for the issuance of permits with the possibility of denial would provide only minimal protection when the limits to water usage have been reached. It would make future-oriented, ordered management of the use of water impossible. In the case of a scarce resource that is of greater vital importance to the general public than virtually any other, such a system of regulation would be unacceptable.

According to the findings in the initial proceedings, the claimant has been extracting gravel without restriction since 1936. The decision in this legal dispute may therefore also hinge upon whether the Federal Water Act was directly responsible for depriving the claimant of a constitutionally protected legal interest that inured to the benefit of the claimant before the Federal Water Act went into force. In that regard, both previous law and the regulatory transition pursuant to s. 17 of the Federal Water Act must be reviewed. ...

The constitutional review must therefore be based on the assumption to the effect that the owner was not prevented from extracting gravel by provisions of law while the Prussian Water Act was in force and that the usage rights afforded owners of landed property under the old law and exercised by the claimant were protected by the guarantee of property. It would be incompatible with the content of this fundamental right for the state to be afforded the power to prohibit, abruptly and without any transition, further use of landed property in cases in which commencement of such use required substantial investment. Such a system of regulation would render valueless the work invested and capital employed from one day to the next. It would undermine confidence in the stability of the legal order, without which it would be impossible for individuals to assume responsibility for their conduct of life in the area governed by property law (see BVerfGE 31, 229 [239]; 50, 290 [339]; 51, 193 [217 and 218]).

2. Mandatory Deposit Copies, BVerfGE 58, 137

Explanatory Annotation

In 1981, the same year as the groundwater decision, the Constitutional Court further developed the property clause. The case concerned a statutory obligation in the German Land Hesse to submit one copy of every book published there to a designated library without compensation. This statutory obligation was to be applied to several books published by the applicant. These books, however, were special art editions and published in very small editions at relatively high prices. The applicant claimed that this constituted a taking and hence required compensation.

The Constitutional Court did not regard this as an expropriation as it was not directed against a specific object. Rather the Court regarded this as a content definition norm because the whole edition of any book was already reduced by the obligation to submit one copy even before it was printed. Consequently the Court held that property had not been taken and hence there was no basis for the operation of the expropriation compensation norm of Article 14.3 of the Basic Law. However, the Court did not stop there. Whereas it regarded the statutory obligation to submit one copy as constitutional in principle the Court also held that the principle of proportionality demanded to take into account that in untypical cases such as this one - a very expensive but low volume special edition - the obligation to submit without compensation is tantamount to a disproportionate sacrifice of the publisher.

Headnote:

It is inconsistent with the fundamental right to property to require that publishers of printed works furnish specimen copies for deposit even in the case of works that are produced at considerable expense and in small printings (s. 9 of the Hessian Land Press Act (Hessisches Landespressegesetz - Hess. LPrG)).

Order of the First Senate of 14 July 1981 - 1 BvR 24/78 -

Facts:

The matter referred for review concerns the question as to the extent to which the duty of publishers to provide state libraries with specimen copies (legal deposit copies) is compatible with the Basic Law.

The Land of Hesse has regulated the mandatory submission of legal deposit copies in s. 9 of the Hessian Freedom and Rights of the Press Act (Gesetz über Freiheit und Recht der Presse - LPrG) in the version promulgated on 20 November 1958 (BVerfGE 58, 137 [144], BVerfGE 58, 137 [145]) as well as in the Deposit of Printed Works Regulation of 21 March 1977 (BVerfGE 58, 137 [144], BVerfGE 58, 137 [145]). (Verordnung über die Abgabe von Druckwerken - PflEVO) issued by the Hessian Minister of Culture.

S. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act, which had already been included verbatim in the Hessian Press Act of 23 June 1949 (Bavarian Law Gazette [Bayerisches Gesetz- und Verordnungsblatt - GVBl.]. p. 75), reads as follows:

> "The Minister for Culture and Education may by way of executive order require that a specimen copy of every publication appearing within the sphere of operation of this law be deposited with the library designated by the latter free of charge."

The Deposit of Printed Works Regulation enacted on the basis of this power stipulates in s. 1.1 as follows:

> "The publisher of every printed work appearing in the Land of Hesse shall, unless exempted from doing so by s. 3, depending upon the place of publication, provide the following libraries with one copy (legal deposit copy) gratuitously and at his own expense: ..."

The claimant is a publisher in Offenbach. He publishes bibliophile books in small printings as well as original graphics. In the year 1976, he forwarded books identified with the number of copies printed and the sale price to the Hessian Landes- und Hochschulbibliothek in Darmstadt:

> Citing s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act and the Deposit of Printed Works Regulation, the library retained possession of the four works sent by the claimant and notified him accordingly. His objection was unsuccessful. The claimant was of the opinion that the books that were retained were not printed works within the meaning of the Press Act. In any case, he argued, a duty to furnish deposit copies without any compensation was in violation of Article 14 of the Basic Law.

The Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgericht) stayed the proceedings pursuant to Article 100.1 of the Basic Law and referred s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act for constitutional review. According to the Court, the provision is not consistent with Article 14 of the Basic Law to the extent that the Hessian Minister of Culture is empowered to require that a specimen copy of each printed work appearing within the sphere of operation of the law be submitted to a designated library for deposit.

C.

S. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act is not entirely consistent with the Basic Law.

I.

The standard of review for the referred provision is the fundamental right under Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

The order requiring submission of copies for deposit without compensation pursuant to s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act encumbers the proprietary rights in the printed work produced by the publisher. The provision therefore falls into the area protected by Article 14 of the Basic Law; as regards its content, it permits statutory regulation pursuant to Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

The duty to submit copies for deposit does to be sure relate to a single specimen copy; nevertheless, it does not involve expropriation within the meaning of Article 14.3 of the Basic Law. The provision does not empower the executive to seize a specific item of property that it requires through an individual action, but establishes, in general and in the abstract, a duty to make payment in kind in the form of a contribution. It affects those who - as a general rule in connection with the exercise of an occupation - market property as publishers and is based on the entirety of the copies constituting a printing that is the property of the publisher and is identified by statute as a printed work. The proprietary rights in a printed work are encumbered by a duty to furnish a copy for deposit upon its appearance. The act of selecting and depositing a random copy of the printed matter from the printing by the publisher constitutes concretization of a general duty of the publisher that already existed beforehand. The regulatory statute governing legal deposit copies is therefore a legal provision that defines in general the substantive content of property (BVerfGE 58, 137 [144], BVerfGE 58, 137 [145]) in a printed work as the entirety of all copies.

Contrary to the opinion of the referring court, this classification also retains its validity if the definition of substantive content - as will be shown - is not consistent with the Basic Law due to the degree of the burden imposed on the owner in certain cases. If the limits that follow from the Basic Law are exceeded when the duties of the owner are defined, the law is unconstitutional; this does not make it an expropriation. (see BVerfGE 52, 1 [27 and 28]).

Definition of substantive content and expropriation are fundamentally different in terms of the conditions and requirements for their substantive construction due to their disparate functions. Their classification and validity must therefore be assessed on the basis of the respective relevant provisions of the Basic Law. The duty that ensues from the regulatory statute governing legal deposit copies therefore falls into the area of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law regardless of the respective degree of burden affecting the publisher.

II.

S. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act satisfies the formal requirements for an enabling law that ensue from the reservation of legislative power in Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

1. The Hessian legislature did not exceed the legislative authority (see BVerfGE 34, 139 [144 et seq.]), to be respected under Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. The regulatory statute governing legal deposit copies does not fall into the category of copyright and publishing law (Article 73 no. 9 of the Basic Law), which is exclusively under the jurisdiction of the federal government. s. 4.1 and s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act are to be sure based on the use of the term "printed work," which derives from copyright and publishing law. The question as to the jurisdiction of the legislature must, however, be decided not on the basis of the point of reference chosen but on the basis of the subject matter of the statute. In that regard, the statute referred for review does not fall into the area governed by copyright and publishing law (BVerfGE 58, 137 [145], BVerfGE 58, 137 [146]. According to s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act, mandatory deposit may be ordered only in the case of a printed work that "appears;" the right of the author to determine whether and how his work is published (s. 12 of the Copyright Act (Urhebergesetz - UrHG)) therefore remains intact. Mandatory submission of deposit copies also does not interfere with legal relationships between publishers and authors, which are regulated by publishing law (s. 1 of the Publishing Act (Verlagsgesetz - VerlG)), since it establishes a duty on the part of the publisher under public law that is independent of such legal relationships. Furthermore, the German Library Act (Deutsche Bibliothek - DBiblG), which was enacted with reference to Article 74 no. 13 of the Basic Law, explicitly does not affect the provisions of Land law governing legal deposit copies (s. 25). Legislation governing legal deposit copies therefore falls under the jurisdiction of the Länder pursuant to Article 70 of the Basic Law.

2. In s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act, the legislature limited itself to enactment of the power to adopt a statutory instrument in a manner to which there can be no objection.

a) According to Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the substantive content and limits of property are to be sure defined "by the laws". Nevertheless, no general duty on the part of the legislature to itself regulate in detail the substantive content of the legal interest of owners of property ensues from this. In view of the elementary importance of Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 24, 367 [389]; 50, 290 [339]) for safeguarding freedom, the legislature is, however, bound to establish itself the conditions under which the use of property may be restricted by virtue of powers that are adequately defined in terms of content, purpose and degree.

b) S. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act satisfies the corresponding requirements to be met when such legal powers are delegated:

   The content of the powers granted follows directly from the enabling provision itself. The matter to be regulated is the submission of specimen copies of printed works appearing in Hesse for deposit with specific libraries. The Minister of Culture may effect such regulation by virtue of the powers granted him.

   The purpose of these powers is to collect the entire body of publications appearing in the Land, to make it available to the public and to preserve it for posterity. This follows from the content of the powers in conjunction with the historical development of legislation governing legal deposit copies. The decisive reason behind the regulatory statute may therefore lie exclusively in the interest of cultural policy intended to offer and make available to all interested parties as complete an overview as possible of intellectual creativity in the Land of Hesse.

Adequate guidelines as regards the scope of and limits to the regulatory statute to be adopted by the maker of the statutory instrument are also not lacking. It follows from the enabling law that a duty to furnish legal deposit copies may be imposed with respect to publications appearing in Hesse and even in this case only in respect of a single specimen copy of each printed work, which is to be deposited with a library designated by the maker of the statutory instrument.

The powers are also adequately defined as regards the issue of compensation. s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act stipulates that the Minister may order that legal deposit copies be furnished without any reimbursement of costs.

III.

As regards substantive law, s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act is not consistent with Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law in that the Minister of Culture is empowered to order that specimen copies be furnished without exception with no reimbursement of costs.

1. The Federal Constitutional Court has in numerous decisions ruled that the legislature must in the case of laws within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law take into account in the same manner constitutional recognition of private property by Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law as well as the social imperative of Article 14.2 of the Basic Law. In so doing, the legislature must achieve a just balance and equitable relationship between the legitimate interests of the parties involved. The extent and scope of the duty that may be expected of the owner under the Basic Law and effected by the legislature hinge accordingly, essentially upon whether and to what extent the property in question is relevant to society, and has a social function (for example, BVerfGE 37, 132 [140 and 141]; 42, 263 [294]; 50, 290 [340 and 341]; 52, 1 [32]).

This is the case when duties arising from the ownership of property must be consistently reasonable. They may not, in particular as regards the social relevance and social importance of the item of property and in view of the purpose of regulation, give rise to an excessive burden and unreasonably affect the owner's property rights (see BVerfGE 21, 150 [155]; 50, 290 [340 and 341, 351]; 52, 1 [29 and 30, 32]; 53 257 [292]).

In addition, the principle of equal treatment under the law must be respected as a general principle of the rule of law (for example, BVerfGE 52, 1 [29 and 30] with references).

These limits that the legislature must preserve when defining the substantive content of property rights also apply if the formal law permits enactment of statutes that define substantive content. The legislature may in granting powers to issue statutory instruments not extend such regulatory powers pertaining to the guarantee of property as it would be prevented from exercising itself.

2. In view of the standards described above, the duty to submit specimen copies without remuneration constitutes an admissible requirement under Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law as long as the resultant financial burden imposed on the publisher does not carry significant weight in the individual case. In that regard, the power to enact such a requirement also presents no cause for concern.

Every printed work takes on a life of its own as soon as it is published. It does not remain a mere financial asset that results from publishing efforts, but has effects that permeate the life of society. That is what makes it an independent factor that helps to determine the cultural and intellectual activity of its time.[161] It constitutes, apart from the possibility of disposition under private law, common intellectual and cultural property.

In view of this importance to society, it is legitimate to want to make literary production available as completely as possible to those with an academic or cultural interest in such production and transmit to future generations a comprehensive impression of the intellectual creativity of previous epochs. This cultural need can be taken into account in an appropriate manner by requiring that specimen copies be deposited with public libraries. In assessing the constitutional issue involved, it is not possible to ignore the fact that the general public makes a significant contribution to the achievement of the cultural goal pursued through legal deposit copies by building and maintaining state libraries. The general public for its part takes into account the importance of printed works to and their function within society in an appropriate manner. Under these circumstances, the deposit of a specimen copy of each printed work without remuneration represents a reasonable burden that does not excessively and solely affect the publisher if the concomitant economic disadvantage does not carry significant weight. This can be assumed to be the case of the majority of all periodical and non-periodical publications if they are produced in larger printings.

3. However, the deficiency of the regulatory provision adopted lies in the fact that the general requirement to the effect that specimen copies be furnished for deposit without any reimbursement of costs in all cases also applies to those printed works that are produced at great expense and also only in small printings.

It is obvious that the duty to furnish specimen copies of such printed works at no cost represents a burden that is significant as compared with the case of cut-rate and mass-produced products. Article 14.2 of the Basic Law cannot be used to justify such a burden upon the publisher in the interest of the general public.

The special importance to society that inures to printed works that are of exceptional artistic, scientific or literary value, and therefore regularly very expensive to produce, in view of Article 14.2 of the Basic Law cannot be considered in isolation from their production.

Printed works of this kind will frequently have only a small circle of buyers, which already is reflected in the small printing. The number of potential purchasers is small and sales as a rule by no means certain. Publishers undertake a significantly greater economic risk with the production of such works as compared with that involved in normal publishing activities. Only through private initiative and the willingness to accept risks does it become possible to make exclusive artistic, scientific and literary creativity available to the public, albeit at a high price. To also burden publishers with the cost of the production of legal deposit copies that significantly exceeds the average, stands in contradiction to the constitutional requirement that the interests of the owner affected, be equitably balanced against those of the general public and one-sided burdens avoided.

It therefore follows from the balance of the degree of burden against the weight of the reasons advanced in justification of that burden that mandatory submission of deposit copies at no charge exceeds the limits of a reasonable and still acceptable definition of the substantive content of the property of publishers in the case of valuable publications with small printings.

The regulatory provision under challenge also conflicts with the principle of equal treatment under the law that must be respected in connection with Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 52, 1 [29 and 30] with references).

In terms of ramifications in practice, a general obligation to furnish legal deposit copies coupled with a general exclusion of compensation leads, as has been shown, to burdens that vary significantly in degree within the class of publishers. Such unequal effects of a law that is per se uniform must also be taken into account in the area governed by Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. The principle of equal treatment under the law requires in this case that the elements of the regulatory provision that defines substantive content be ordered such that the differences in the burden imposed upon owners and as a result the differences in the weight of their interests as compared with the interests of the general public be taken into account with sufficient distinction and unequal burden avoided.

S. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act on the other hand grants the power to enact a regulatory statute governing legal deposit copies, the content of which lacks the degree of distinction required in view of the very disparate issues it covers in respect of property rights.

4. In view of the guarantee of property as a fundamental right, the objection to the effect that publishers could also pass the costs incurred due to mandatory submission of deposit copies on to purchasers in the cases under discussion here or offset them with revenues from other publications cannot prevail. In the case of costly printed works with small printings, there is already reason for doubt of a factual nature.

Apart from that, assessment of the constitutionality of regulatory provisions pursuant to Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law may not hinge exclusively upon whether the owner can recover expenses imposed upon him elsewhere or in some other manner. The guarantee of property is intended to enable its legal owner to manage his sphere of operation as he sees fit (for example, BVerfGE 24, 367 [389,396]; 50, 290 [339]).

This constitutional function would generally not be achieved if the state could establish duties to be fulfilled by owners of property and legitimize restrictions on the basis of more or less speculative economic considerations. The legitimacy of constitutional restrictions on property and burdens imposed on property is grounded in Article 14.2 of the Basic Law. The Federal Constitutional Court has in this context pointed out several times that the societal function of property and the importance of property to society justify restriction of the legal interests of owners. At the same time, however, the limits to the reasonable burdens that may be imposed by the legislature also follow from this (for example, BVerfGE 58, 137 [151]; BVerfGE 58, 137 [152]; 52, 1 [32]).

Reference to possible recuperation of losses by owners of property would in cases of the present nature exceed these limits that derive from the constitutional system of property rights and be incompatible with the guarantee of existing legal interests under Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

IV.

The constitutional considerations presented above cannot suffice to declare the provision objected to by the referring court void either in its entirety or in part. s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act covers the broad class of cases in which a requirement to the effect that legal deposit copies must be provided without remuneration results in only slight burdens on publishers and for that reason gives no cause for concern. To the extent that the enabling powers exceed the bounds of what is constitutionally admissible, the Land legislature has - as follows from the introductory presentation of the regulatory statutes - a series of possibilities for either completely realigning the law governing legal deposit copies or adapting it to the interests involved to take into account hardship cases in light of the guarantee of property. The Federal Constitutional Court must therefore limit itself to ascertainment of a violation of the Basic Law by s. 9 of the Freedom and Rights of the Press Act to the extent described in the operative section.

Explanatory Annotation

Monument protection law is that area of the law concerned with preserving buildings of historic value. Many of these buildings are held by private owners and statutory protection of these monuments will invariably place substantial restrictions and significant financial obligations on these owners, for example to refrain from tearing the building down, changing its appearance or renovating the building. In this case the Court had to deal with such statutory provisions of one of the German Länder regarding monument protection. The Court went on to further develop its jurisprudence of the "library-copy"-decision mentioned above. It construed the monument protection statute as a "content definition norm" for property in concretisation of the social nexus between property and the public good as stipulated in Article 14.2 of the Basic Law. However, even though such norms do not constitute takings requiring compensation in the sense of Article 14.3 of the Basic Law, they can nonetheless go beyond what can be demanded as a reasonable sacrifice of the owner of the property. Whenever this is the case the relevant statutes must take this into account and provide protection in order to be considered proportional and hence in conformity with Article 14.1. However, the Constitutional Court went on to also hold that providing for monetary compensation cannot always provide the necessary level of protection. Property protection must primarily aim at protecting the property as such and monetary compensation can only become relevant when the actual property cannot be adequately protected.

Headnotes:

1. Statutes governing the protection of monuments that define the substantive content and limits of property are incompatible with Article 14.1 of the Basic Law (Grundge-setz - GG) if they do not preclude unreasonable burdens on the owner and contain no provision for measures to avoid such restrictions on property rights.

2. Statutes governing compensation that are intended to preserve the principle of proportionality in cases of unusual hardship are deficient if they are limited to affording the parties affected the right to claim financial compensation. The guarantee of an existing legal interest under Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law requires first of all that measures be taken, that in fact avoid any unreasonable burden on the owner and preserve to the greatest extent possible private usufruct of property.

3. Just as the legislature must also regulate the prerequisites for, as well as the nature and scope of compensation for a burden that would otherwise be unreasonable when defining the content and limits of property at the statutory level, administrative authorities must at the same time make decisions, at least in principle, in respect of any compensation that might be required when concretizing restrictions on property rights. The legislature must create the prerequisites for this.

4. S. 13.1, sentence 2 of the Rhineland-Palatinate Monument Protection and Preservation Act (Denkmalschutz- und Pflegegesetz - DSchPflG) is incompatible with the guarantee of property under Article 14.1 of the Basic Law.

Order of the First Senate of 2 March 1999 - 1 BvL 7/91 -

Facts:

The claimant, in the initial proceedings, an industrial enterprise, is the owner of a large mansion property dating from the 19th century that was formally placed under the protection of the Rhineland-Palatinate Monument Protection Act of 1978. According to the provisions of that law, the owner was under an obligation to preserve and maintain the monument and could modify or raze it only with official permission. It was not necessary to take into account the interests of the owner in making decisions as regards such permission.

The claimant was unsuccessful in its application for permission to raze the mansion, on the grounds that there was no commercial use for it and efforts made over the years to find another meaningful use had been unsuccessful.

The appellate court found the statutory regulation unconstitutional and referred it to the Federal Constitutional Court, which declared it incompatible with Article 14.1 of the Basic Law.

C.

The statute referred for review is incompatible with Article 14.1 of the Basic Law.

I.

1. S. 13.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act involves a definition of the content and limits of property that must be measured against the standard of Article 14.1 and not Article 14.3 of the Basic Law.

Expropriation constitutes seizure of property of an individual by the state (BVerfGE 100, 226 [239], BVerfGE 100, 226 [240]). It is intended to deprive the owner of concrete legal interests, entirely or in part, that are protected by Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law for the purposes of fulfilment of certain public duties (BVerfGE 56, 249 [270 et seq.] - dissenting opinion; 70, 191 [199 and 200] with further references; 71, 137 [143]; 72, 66 [76]).

This is achieved either through a law that deprives a specific class of persons of concrete property rights - expropriation by operation of law - or through an act of enforcement by a public authority on the basis of its legal power to effect such seizure - administrative expropriation (see BVerfGE 52, 1 [27]; 58, 300 [330 and 331]; established case law).

These prerequisites do not obtain here. Neither the statute referred for review on which the obligation to obtain permission to raze protected cultural monuments is based, nor denial of the permit itself, represents an expropriation within the meaning of Article 14.3 of the Basic Law. The statutory regulation does not deprive the owner of any concrete ownership interests for the purposes of fulfilment of specific public duties, but rather restricts, generally and in the abstract, the possible uses of a piece of land with a monument constructed on it; the action of denial concretizes this restriction. s. 13.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act therefore defines the content and limits of property within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. This categorization of the statute is independent of the extent of the burden on the legal owner. It retains its validity even in cases in which the effects of the action approximate or are tantamount to expropriation as far as the party affected is concerned (see BVerfGE 83, 201 [211 et seq.]).

Since the constitutionality of the statutory regulation referred for review is therefore to be measured against the standard of Article 14 1 in conjunction with Article 14.2 of the Basic Law, the requirement contained in Article 14.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to the effect that expropriation laws must also regulate the nature and extent of compensation (reciprocity clause) is just as inapplicable as the provision governing legal recourse contained in Article 14.3 sentence 4 of the Basic Law.

2. In defining the content and limits of property within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the legislature must achieve a just balance and equitable relationship between the legitimate interests of the owner and the needs of the public good. In so doing, the legislature must remain consistent with all other (BVerfGE 100, 226 [240], BVerfGE) 100, 226 [241]) constitutional norms; in particular, it is bound to the constitutional principle of proportionality and the principle of equal treatment under the law pursuant to Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. The public good is not only the reason for but also the limit to the burden that may be placed upon property. Restrictions on rights of ownership may not exceed that which suffices to achieve the purpose of protection intended by the statutory regulation. This may not be allowed to deplete the core area of the guarantee of property. This includes not only private usufruct, i.e., assignment of property to a legal entity whom it is intended to benefit by serving as the basis for private undertakings, as well as the basic power of disposition over the property (see BVerfGE 70, 191 [200]; 79, 174 [198]; 87, 114 [138 and 139]; 91, 294 [308]).

The regulatory power of the legislature is subject to various restrictions. To the extent that property rights secure the personal freedom of the individual in the area covered by the law governing property, the protection they enjoy is especially pronounced (see BVerfGE 42, 263 [294]; 50, 290 [340]; 70, 191 [201]; 95, 64 [84]).

On the other hand, the greater the importance of an item of property to society, the broader is the operating latitude of the legislature; its nature and function are of decisive importance in this regard (see BVerfGE 53, 257 [292]).

Restriction of rights of ownership must in principle be accepted without compensation in this context as a consequence of the importance of the property to society (Article 14.2 of the Basic Law). If the legislature exceeds the above limits when defining the content and limits of property, the statutory regulation is invalid (BVerfGE 52, 1 [27 and 28]) restrictions or burdens based on any such statute are illegal and may be contested through recourse to the courts of first instance. They do not give rise to a right to compensation on constitutional grounds (see BVerfGE 58, 300 [320]).

II.

Measured against these principles, s. 13.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act is not consistent with Article 14.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 100, 226 [241], BVerfGE 100, 226 [242]).

1. The statutory regulation that makes no provision for taking into account the interests of owners - unlike the monument protection laws of other Länder - may unreasonably restrict the rights of owners affected by it under certain circumstances.

a) The protection of cultural monuments is a legitimate concern of the legislature and the maintenance of monuments is a public duty that enjoys high priority; restrictive statutes within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law are warranted. Article 40.3 of the Constitution for Rhineland-Palatinate of 18 May 1947 (Ordinance Gazette [Verordnungblatt - VOBl] p. 209, most recently amended by the Act of 12 October 1995 [Law Gazette (Gesetz- und Verordnungsblatt - GVBl.) p. 405]) also imposes upon the Land the duty to take under its care and maintain monuments of art and history.

b) The conditions for issuance of a permit set forth in s. 13.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act are appropriate and required to achieve the purpose of the law. Since the razing of a cultural monument may be approved only if other needs of the public good outweigh the interest in protection of that monument and it is necessary to establish whether the overriding needs of the public good cannot be taken into account in some other manner, the preservation of protected cultural monuments is safeguarded in all other cases. It is not possible to discern any other means that is equally effective but would constitute less of an encumbrance upon property rights.

c) Application of the statute will as a rule also not result in an unreasonable burden upon the owner in the narrower sense. The public interest in the preservation of a protected monument can be taken into account only by imposing a duty upon the owner of the property and building, whose property therefore becomes more subservient to the interests of society. This follows from the situational context, in this case the location and nature of the land (see Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court [Entscheidungen des Bundeswaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE] 94, 1 [4]; Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen - BGHZ] 105, 15 [18], each with further references; Supreme Court of the State of Bavaria (Bayerisches Oberstes Landesgericht - BayObLG), BayVBl 1999, p. 251 [252]).

The prohibition against razing an architectural monument does not restrict its current use. In view of the high priority of the protection of monuments and with an eye to Article 14.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the owner must in principle accept that he may possibly be prevented from making more profitable use of the land (see BVerfGE 100, 226 [242], BVerfGE 100, 226 [243]). Article 14.1 of the Basic Law does not protect the most remunerative use of property (see BVerfGE 91, 294 [310]).

d) The situation is different, however, when a meaningful use for a protected architectural monument no longer exists. This may occur if the original use becomes obsolete due to changes in circumstances and another use that could reasonably be imputed to the owner cannot be realized. When even an owner who is amenable to protection of monuments can make no reasonable use of an architectural monument and for practical purposes cannot dispose of it, the possibility of private usufruct by that owner is virtually completely excluded. If the legal duty to maintain the property is also taken into account, the right becomes a burden that the owner must bear alone in the public interest without being able to enjoy the benefits of private use. The legal position of the party affected therefore comes close to being a situation in which it is no longer deserving of the term "property." Denial of a demolition permit is then no longer reasonable. If in the opinion of the legislature the public good nonetheless requires that the protected cultural monument be preserved, as is conceivable in the case of structures of great importance in terms of cultural history, this can be achieved only through expropriation (s. 30.1 no. 1 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act).

The question as to where the limit of reasonableness lies in detail and the extent to which owners are affected to an unacceptable extent by the statute referred for review can be left open. s. 13.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act is in violation of the Basic Law, if for no other reason because the norm fails to exclude unreasonable burdens on owners and makes no provision for avoidance of such restrictions on property.

2. The unreasonableness of the prohibition of demolition in certain classes of cases is in no way changed by s. 31.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act. According to this so-called severability clause, the Land must provide appropriate compensation if an action taken under the Monument Protection Act does not affect the previous use (sentence 1), but nevertheless ("otherwise") has an expropriatory effect. The legislature may to be sure in principle - albeit not to an unlimited extent - preclude unreasonable (see BVerfGE 100, 226 [243], see BVerfGE 100, 226 [244]) effects of a statutory regulation that defines the content of property through compensatory measures (a) s. 31.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act cannot, however, fulfil this function since the requirements to be met (b) by such a provision are not satisfied (c) by the provision.

a) Provisions governing content and limits that would in, and of themselves, be unreasonable, but have been linked with compensatory measures by the legislature may in exceptional cases be consistent with Article 14.1 of the Basic Law.

aa) The legislature is even in cases of hardship not prevented in principle from enforcing measures restricting property rights that it considers warranted in the interest of the public if it avoids imposing burdens that are unreasonable or inequitable upon the owner and takes into account legitimate expectations (see BVerfGE 58, 137 [149 and 150]; 79, 174 [192]; 83, 201 [212 and 213]). Otherwise unreasonable or inequitable provisions that define content and limits within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law can be made constitutionally admissible through such compensation in respect of specific classes of cases.

bb) Provisions that call for compensation do of course, not generally constitute a constitutionally acceptable way of achieving consistency of unreasonable restrictions on property with Article 14.1 of the Basic Law. Norms that define the content and limits of property must in principle also preserve the substance of property rights without provision for compensation and comply with the principle of equal treatment under the law (see BVerfGE 79, 174 [198] with further references).

When under exceptional circumstances the application of the law results in an unreasonable burden on the owner, provision for compensation may, however, be considered in order to comply with the principle of proportionality and alleviate especially inequitable hardship.

cc) Finally, compensatory measures do not provide further help in cases in which it is not possible with either technical or administrative or financial means to achieve a balance that is consistent with the principle of proportionality (see BVerfGE 100, 226 [244], BVerfGE 100, 226 [245]) and therefore withstands scrutiny against Article 14.1 of the Basic Law. Such a situation may occur in the area at issue here if, for example, the preservation of a monument in a given situation is of relative little importance and the interests of the owner are especially deserving of protection and not of a purely financial nature. In cases of such hardship, the law must allow the demolition of the architectural monument pursuant to a provision for special exceptions in order to achieve complete consistency with the guarantee of property.

b) Norms that make provision for compensation in the area of application of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law must meet the following requirements:

aa) They must have a legal basis. It is in principle the affair of the legislature to define the content and limits of property. The legislature must preserve the constitutional limits of laws that define the content and may, if it imposes a mandatory prohibition not rely on the administrative authorities or the courts to avoid any violations of the guarantee of property through compensatory measures or financial payments. To the extent that claims for compensatory restitution are to be justified, this may in any case, even taking into account the budgetary powers of the parliament, be effected only through operation of law.

bb) Laws governing compensation that are meant to preserve the principle of proportionality in cases of unusual hardship are inadequate if they only entitle the parties affected to the right to claim financial compensation. The guarantee of an existing legal interest under Article 14.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law requires first of all that measures be taken, that in fact avoid an unreasonable burden on the owner and preserve to the greatest extent possible the private usufruct of the property The instruments available to the legislature for this include transitional arrangements, provisions of law governing exceptions and exemption and the use of other administrative and technical measures. If such compensation is impossible or possible only at unreasonable expense in an individual case, financial compensation may be considered in this case or it may be expedient to give the owner the right to have the government acquire the property (see BVerfGE 100, 226 [245], BVerfGE 100, 226 [246]) at market value.

Just as the legislature must also regulate the prerequisites for as well as the nature and scope of compensation for a burden that would otherwise be unreasonable when defining the content and limits of property at the statutory level, administrative authorities must at the same time make decisions in respect of any compensation that might be required at least in principle when concretizing restrictions on property rights (likewise Hermes, NVwZ 1990, pp. 733 and 734).

A property owner who considers an administrative action that infringes his fundamental right under Article 4.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law to be unreasonable, must contest it through recourse to the administrative courts. If he allows such an action to take effect, he may no longer demand compensation even as provided within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 58, 300 [324]).The party affected must therefore decide whether he wants to accept or contest the interventionary action concretizing the restriction on his property rights. He can make a meaningful decision only if he knows whether he is entitled to compensation. The party affected cannot be reasonably expected to allow an administrative action that he considers incompatible with the guarantee of property under the Basic Law, to become final in the uncertain expectation of compensation to be awarded retroactively in separate proceedings. The administrative courts must also know whether and in what manner compensation will be provided for an otherwise unreasonable burden in order to be able to assess conclusively the legality of an administrative action that encroaches on property interests.

The legislature must therefore complement its substantive provisions for compensation, with provisions governing administrative procedure that ensure that the administrative actions that concretize restrictions on property are at the same time accompanied by a decision as regards the compensation that could be awarded the owners subjected to the burden; in the case of financial compensation, it is necessary to decide at least whether a claim exists.

c) The severability clause of s. 31.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act does not satisfy these requirements (BVerfGE 100, 226 [246], BVerfGE 100, 226 [247]). It neither makes provision for avoidance of unconstitutional infringement of property rights, primarily in the form of statutes governing exceptions and exemption as well as other administrative and technical measures, nor does it make provision for administrative proceedings so that the possibility of legal recourse of parties affected is taken into account in the manner described above. For that reason alone, it provides no constitutionally adequate basis for compensation for unreasonable infringement on the basis of s. 13.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act. It is the affair of the courts with jurisdiction to decide whether, in view of its wording, the legal logic behind it and the will of the legislature, any area of application even remains for this provision, which cannot be considered either a basis for compensation for expropriation within the meaning of Article 14.3 sentences 2 and 3 of the Basic Law or as a compensatory provision in connection with the legal definition of the content and limits of property within the meaning of Article 14.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

III.

The incompatibility of s. 13.1 sentence 2 of the Monument Protection and Preservation Act with Article 14.1 of the Basic Law does not render the provision void. The Federal Constitutional Court may refrain from pronouncement of this legal consequence if the legislature has several possibilities for remedying the unconstitutional situation.

That is the case here. …

Explanatory Annotation

Fundamental rights, whether they be human rights or citizen rights, are often envisaged as a scenario of one person against the state with a massive power imbalance where the person is often perceived as a victim of sorts and, of course, too often is indeed a victim of the exercise of state power. That is true in the context of property rights as well. The image of expropriation will often be that of the individual landowner, the farmer or owner of a little property, who is subjected to state power, for example, to give up his land or parts of it to build a piece of infrastructure. However, it is not always thus. This case deals with property rights in the context of a political decision to terminate the use of nuclear power to generate electricity in the wake of the Fukushima reactor catastrophe in Japan.[162] However, in this case the property interests are presented by large multibillion-dollar multinational energy corporations.

That stands in contrast to the lignite strip-mining decision of 2013 concerning vast lignite mining operation around the municipality of Garzweiler in Germany, which divulged villages and turned whole landscapes into wastelands (to be recultivated and restored after the extraction of the lignite).[163] However, the lignite case also involved questions concerning the expropriation of property for mining purposes based on specific legislation created for such purposes. It also raised questions about the impact on property rights of planning decisions which were required for the continuation of the strip-mining operation. The people affected by the mining operation lost their homes in more than one way. They lost their houses, but they also lost their community because both had to be destroyed and whole communities had to be resettled. It is somewhat ironic that the big energy utility RWE[164] was involved in both cases. In the nuclear power case as the victim, i.e., as the operator of a nuclear power plant that stands to be decommissioned much earlier than envisaged and in the lignite case as the operator of the mine who profited from the expropriations and planning decisions at issue.

Germany had already decided to get out of nuclear energy in 2002 and passed the respective legislation. In this legislation, certain electricity volumes were allocated to the various power plants with the intention that more modern, younger reactors could run longer than older ones. In 2009, the government had second thoughts and amendments were made including the allocation of further electricity production volumes, essentially extending the run-time for the reactors for more than ten years. The Fukushima accident in the wake of the devastating tsunami in Japan, however, led to an about-face and legislation passed in July 2011.[165] Production volumes were cut again, and fixed dates were introduced for the decommissioning of the reactors. The last reactors (of seven still in operation in 2019) will be phased out by the end of 2022.[166]

The Constitutional Court held that the complaints were largely unfounded. It did not treat the impact of the legislation as measures with expropriating effect[167] but qualified them as "content and limitation" defining measures in the sense of Article 14.1(2) of the Basic Law. One consequence – and explanation – of this approach is that the increase in production volumes in the 2009 legislation did not create a property right[168] and hence could not be subject to expropriation or measures tantamount to expropriation. If the regulation of production volumes and run-times for reactors cannot be considered property then limiting measures must logically be considered as outside the scope of the expropriation compensation clause of Article 14.3 of the Basic Law. But that does not mean that such measures are legal. They must still comply with the general framework of proportionality.[169] In this case, the Court saw two violations of that general framework. One pertained to the fact that two applicants were affected in a particular way in that they could not shift electricity production volumes stipulated in the original 2002 legislation to other plants in their intra-corporate network. The second violation of this general proportionality framework was seen in the lack of any consideration in the legislation for investments made pursuant the increased allocation of production volumes in 2010 and the information by the relevant government minister concerning the about-face in the government's nuclear policy and the ensuing moratorium.

The Constitutional Court held that it is not warranted to declare the whole legislation unconstitutional but that the Parliament must undertake corrections and amendments to the legislation to accommodate the legitimate concerns in regard to intra-corporate use of electricity production volumes and investment protection for investments undertaken during the brief period of time after the extension of production volumes at the end of 2010 and the information about a "moratorium" of which the industry was informed in March of 2011 in the wake of Fukushima.[170] As a result, the 16th Act Amending the Atomic Energy Act was passed in 2018.[171]

Headnotes:

1. The Thirteenth Act Amending the Atomic Energy Act (Dreizehntes Gesetz zur Änderung des Atomgesetzes - 13th AtG Amendment) which aims to realise the acceleration of the nuclear phase-out is for the most part compatible with the Basic Law.

2. A legal person governed by private law, which is operated domestically for profit and entirely owned by a Member State of the European Union, can, by reason of the Basic Law's openness toward European law, as an exception, invoke freedom of property and file a constitutional complaint.

3. a) The electricity volumes allocated by law to the nuclear power plants in 2002 and 2010 do not constitute, in and of themselves, stand-alone property rights enjoying protection of property; given that they are significant parameters for the use of the power plants, the electricity volumes do, however, benefit from protection of ownership of the power plants.

   b) A licence granted under public law does not generally constitute property.

4. An expropriation under Article 14 sec. 3 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) presupposes the deprivation of property through a change in the assignment of ownership and always also presupposes a process for the acquisition of goods. Accordingly, the provisions of the Thirteenth Act Amending the Atomic Energy Act of 31 July 2011 that are set out to accelerate the nuclear phase-out do not amount to an expropriation of property.

5. Insofar as restrictions of the power of use and disposition over property qualifying as determinations of content and limits within the meaning of Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG lead to a deprivation of specific property interests without contributing to the acquisition of goods, enhanced requirements must be applied with regard to their proportionality. They then also always raise the question of a settlement provision.

6. The revocation, without compensation, of the prolongation of the operational lifetimes of the nuclear power plants by an average of twelve years that had been set down statutorily at the end of 2010, brought about by the challenged Thirteenth Act Amending the Atomic Energy Act is constitutional, given the repeated limiting of expectations with regard to preserving the additional electricity output allowances. The legislature was also entitled to use the reactor accident in Fukushima, even without any new findings as to dangers, as an opportunity to accelerate the nuclear phase-out for the protection of the health of the people and the environment.

7. Due to the statutorily fixed operational lifetimes of the power plants and due to the specifically established protection of legitimate expectations in this case, the Thirteenth Act Amending the Atomic Energy Act contains a determination of the contents and limits of property that is unreasonable insofar as it hinders two of the complainants from using up substantial parts of the residual electricity volumes of 2002 within their corporations.

8. Under certain conditions, Article 14 sec. 1 of the Basic Law protects legitimate expectation in the stability of a legal situation as a basis for investments in property and its use.

Facts:

The constitutional complaints are directed against the Thirteenth Act Amending the Atomic Energy Act (Dreizehntes Gesetz zur Änderung des Atomgesetzes) of 31 July 2011 (BGBl I p. 1704; hereinafter: 13th AtG Amendment), which resolved to accelerate the phase-out of the peaceful use of nuclear energy. In the 13th AtG Amendment, the legislature tightened the fundamental decision made in 2002 in favour of what is known as the nuclear phase-out by legislating, for the first time, fixed dates by which the operation of nuclear power plants must end and at the same time revoking the prolongation of the operational lifetimes of nuclear power plants introduced in the autumn of 2010. The complainants are the nuclear energy subsidiaries of three of Germany's four largest energy suppliers, as well as one nuclear power plant operating company. [1]

[Excerpt from press release no. 88/2016 of 6 December 2016]

The constitutional complaints challenge the acceleration of the phase-out of the peaceful use of nuclear energy enacted in 2011. The fundamental decision in favour of a phase-out was already taken in the Phase-Out Amendment Act (Ausstiegsnovelle) in 2002. Individual nuclear power plants were allocated a residual electricity volume that could be transferred to other, newer nuclear power plants. Once these were used up, the power plants were to be shut down. The 2002 Act on the phase-out did not contain a fixed end date. Following the 2009 parliamentary election, the new Federal Government put forth a modified energy policy in which nuclear energy should be used for a longer period of time as a "bridging technology". Accordingly, by means of the 11th AtG Amendment, the legislature granted nuclear power plants additional residual electricity volumes, and thus pursued the aim of prolonging the operational lifetimes of German nuclear power plants by an average of 12 years. As a result of the tsunami of 11 March 2011 and of the meltdown of three reactor cores this brought about at the Fukushima nuclear power plant in Japan, the legislature, for the first time, statutorily set down fixed end dates for the operation of nuclear power plants in the 13th AtG Amendment, and at the same time struck the prolongation of the operational lifetimes of the nuclear power plants undertaken in the 11th AtG Amendment in the autumn of 2010. The nuclear energy subsidiaries of three of Germany's four largest energy suppliers, as well as one nuclear power plant operating company, challenge this in their constitutional complaints. The fundamental decision taken in the Phase-Out Amendment Act of 2002 to end the peaceful use of nuclear power in Germany, however, is not the object of the constitutional complaints. The constitutional review of the challenged 13th AtG Amendment is thus based on a legal situation in which the end of the nuclear power plants' power production, given their allocated volumes of electricity, was already set down. The complainants principally challenge a violation of the freedom of property (Art. 14 sec. 1 GG).

It furthermore holds the operating licences for blocks A and B at the Biblis nuclear power plant and is a shareholder of the operating companies of the Gundremmingen B and C nuclear power plants (holding 75%) and of the Emsland nuclear power plant (shares totalling 87.5%). [78]

2. The complainant directs its constitutional complaint against Art. 1 no. 1 letter a, letter b, and letter c and Art. 1 no. 3 of the 13th AtG Amendment. It complains of a violation of its fundamental rights under Art. 2 sec. 1, Art. 3 sec. 1, Art. 12 sec. 1 and Art. 14 sec. 1 and 3 GG, each in conjunction with Art. 19 sec. 3 GG. [79]

1. The complainants in proceeding 1 BvR 1456/12 are Kernkraftwerk Krümmel GmbH & Co. oHG (hereinafter: Krümmel) and Vattenfall Europe Nuclear Energy GmbH (hereinafter: Vattenfall). [101]

The business object of Kernkraftwerk Krümmel GmbH & Co. oHG is operating the Krümmel nuclear power plant. It holds the operating licence, and as the holder of a leasehold for the land on which the nuclear power plant is built, is the owner of the plant situated there. [102]

Vattenfall Europe Nuclear Energy GmbH is a 50% owner of Kernkraftwerk Krümmel GmbH & Co. oHG; the other 50% is held by the complainant in proceeding 1 BvR 2821/11,

E.ON Kernkraft GmbH. The managing partner of Kernkraftwerk Krümmel GmbH & Co. oHG is Vattenfall Europe Nuclear Energy GmbH. The sole shareholder of Vattenfall Europe Nuclear Energy GmbH at the time when the constitutional complaint was lodged was Vattenfall Europe AG, which is operates as Vattenfall GmbH. Its sole shareholder was and is Vattenfall AB (Publikt Aktiebolag); the sole shareholder of Vattenfall AB is the Swedish state. Kernkraftwerk Krümmel GmbH & Co. oHG is the operator of the Krümmel nuclear power plant and holds the operating licence. [103]

2. The complainants direct their constitutional complaint solely against Art. 1 no. 1 letter a of the 13th AtG Amendment. They complain that it violates Art. 14 sec. 1 and sec. 3, Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 and Art. 3 sec. 1 GG. [104]

3. The complainants' submission concerning admissibility primarily concerns their ability to lodge a complaint in light of the involvement of the Swedish state, which is indirect in both cases. As for the merits of the case, the complainants do not claim that there has been a violation of Art. 12 sec. 1 GG. Their submission concerning Art. 14 GG focuses on the property-specific review of equality with regard to the Krümmel nuclear power plant. [105]

a) […] [106-108]

b) They argue that the fact that the Swedish state holds indirect shares in each of them does not oppose their ability to lodge a complaint. First of all, they state, there can be no question that the Swedish State does exercise an influence over them that is relevant in constitutional law. Furthermore, they argue, the considerations on the basis of which entities predominantly held by German public bodies have generally been denied the ability to have legal personality with regard to fundamental rights do not apply to them. [109]

II.

Complainants Krümmel and Vattenfall in proceeding 1 BvR 1456/12 also have the ability to lodge a constitutional complaint based on Art. 14 GG, even though a foreign state ultimately holds all shares of complainant Vattenfall (1) and 50% of the shares of complainant Krümmel (2). [184]

1. The shares of complainant Vattenfall are indirectly held entirely by the Swedish state. Nevertheless, as an exception, it may lodge a constitutional complaint invoking Art. 14 GG against the 13th AtG Amendment. [185]

a) Via a chain of ownership interests, the Swedish state holds and controls all shares of complainant Vattenfall. At the time when the constitutional complaint was lodged, the complainant's sole shareholder was Vattenfall Europe AG, whose sole shareholder was Vattenfall Deutschland GmbH. Since that time, Vattenfall Europe AG has been merged with Vattenfall Deutschland GmbH, which now operates as Vattenfall GmbH. Its sole shareholder was and is Vattenfall AB, a corporation under Swedish law. The sole shareholder of Vattenfall AB is the Swedish state. [186]

b) aa) Domestic legal persons governed by public law cannot invoke substantive fundamental rights (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE 4, 27 <30>; 15, 256 <262>; 21, 362 <368 et seq.>; 35, 263 <271>; 45, 63 <78>; 61, 82 <100 and 101>). Consequently, they cannot challenge a violation of substantive fundamental rights by lodging a constitutional complaint either (cf. BVerfGE 45, 63 <78>; 68, 193 <206> with further references). [187]

The Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht) has based this lack of legal personality with regard to fundamental rights on a number of different reasons, some of which are mutually complementary. In that respect, it has held that the state that is bound by the fundamental rights pursuant to Art. 1 sec. 3 of the Basic Law cannot be obliged by, as well as entitled to fundamental rights at the same time (cf. BVerfGE 15, 256 <262>; 21, 362 <369 and 370>). Even independent organisational units, when viewed from the perspective of humans and citizens as the original holders of fundamental rights, always only constitute a specific manifestation of a uniform state authority (cf. BVerfGE 4, 27 <30>; 21, 362 <370>). Legal persons can justifiably be viewed as holders of fundamental rights, and on that basis also included under the protection of certain substantive fundamental rights, only if the legal person's formation and operation are a manifestation of the free development of private, natural persons, and in particular only if this appears to be appear reasonable and necessary in consideration of the human beings acting behind the legal persons (cf. BVerfGE 21, 362 <369>; 61, 82 <101>; 68, 193 <206>). The Court has held that in performing their public duties, legal persons governed by public law, unlike individual holders of fundamental rights, do not face the state from the same characteristic situation of danger to fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 45, 63 <79>; 61, 82 <102>). [188]

However, this does not apply to those legal persons governed by public law that are directly categorised in a sphere of life protected by certain fundamental rights, or that inherently belong to that sphere because of their particular nature, such as broad- casters, universities and their faculties (cf. BVerfGE 31, 314 <321 and 322>; 74, 297 <317 and 318>; 93, 85 <93>; 107, 299 <309 and 310>) or churches and other ideological communities governed by public law (cf. BVerfGE 19, 129 <132>; 30, 112 <119 and 120>; 42, 312 <321 and 322>; 70, 138 <160 and 161>). [189]

bb) On substantially the same considerations, the Federal Constitutional Court has also denied that legal persons governed by private law but entirely controlled by the state have legal personality with regard to substantive fundamental rights, in part because if this were not the case, the question of public bodies' legal personality with regard to such rights would depend to no small extent on their particular organisational form (cf. BVerfGE 45, 63 <79 and 80>; 68, 193 <212 and 213>). Equivalent considerations apply to what are commonly called "mixed-ownership" entities insofar as the state holds more than 50% of the shares of these legal persons governed by private law (cf. correspondingly, on the question of being bound by fundamental rights, BVerfGE 128, 226 <244, 246 and 247>). [190]

c) However, the same considerations that are relevant to the denial of the ability to have legal personality with regard to fundamental rights that apply to legal persons governed by public law or by private law and that are completely or for the most part held by the German state, do not apply unreservedly to those domestic legal persons governed by private law that are held by a foreign state - like Vattenfall in the present case. [191]

aa) Thus what is known as the "confusion argument", according to which the state cannot be both obliged by and entitled to fundamental rights, cannot be raised to argue that a legal person governed by private law and owned by a foreign state has no ability to have legal personality regarding fundamental rights. After all, a foreign state is inherently not obliged to guarantee the fundamental rights of people in Germany, nor to protect them accordingly. However, although the foreign state is not bound by fundamental rights, it does not necessarily follow that it is concomitantly entitled to assert those rights. Nor does anything to the contrary proceed from the Federal Constitutional Court's Fraport Judgment (BVerfGE 128, 226); there the Court concluded, solely for the converse case, that being bound by fundamental rights did not mean that there was an entitlement to assert fundamental rights (loc. cit., pp. 244, 246 and 247). [192]

The fact that opening up the protection of fundamental rights to state entities might generally weaken and endanger the protection of citizens exercising their nonderivative, original freedom (cf. BVerfGE 75, 192 <196>; 128, 226 <244 and 245>) does not preclude granting protection of fundamental rights in situations like those at issue. The state entity is not relieved of an inherent duty to protect fundamental rights, for as an entity owned by a foreign state, it is not bound by the Basic Law's fundamental rights in the first place. Furthermore, the situation at issue here does not concern a multipolar relationship of fundamental rights, in which granting protection of fundamental rights to the state entity would directly affect the position of a different holder of fundamental rights exercising an original freedom, and thus weaken the constitutional protection of original freedom. [193]

Legal persons governed by private law, held by a foreign state and acting entirely as a commercial subject, do not have domestic powers, whether direct or indirect, any more than any other purely private market participant does. Such legal persons, like complainant Vattenfall, furthermore are threatened with a specific situation of danger in that unlike all other market participants, if they are entirely denied the ability to invoke fundamental rights, they have no legal protection against state interference and statutorily initiated economic control measures. Purely private market participants have the option of lodging constitutional complaints. Neither are legal persons governed by public law and held by the Federation, a Land, or a municipality without protection, even though they cannot lodge a constitutional complaint due to the lack of legal personality in regard to fundamental rights. The sovereign authorities behind them can defend themselves against alleged unconstitutional restrictions of their business activities by means of protective mechanisms provided to protect areas of competence within the state. This option is not available to legal persons governed by private law and held by foreign states. If they are denied the right to lodge a constitutional complaint, they would have no possibility of claiming legal protection against direct legislative interference with their rights. The protection of legal interests that regular courts provide under administrative law usually cannot be directed against statutory acts (see B III 2 below, paras. 208 et seq.). [194]

bb) However, in cases of foreign state entities, these organisational units also lack people behind them who are to be protected against sovereign encroachment and regarding whom the fundamental rights enshrined in the Basic Law ultimately intends to protect their ability to freely participate in and contribute to the community (cf. BVerfGE 61, 82 <100 and 101>). In any case, a "characteristic situation of danger to fundamental rights" does not result from the mere fact that property of a state entity is also configured under private law - i.e., as private property - and that the entities concerned are thus not entitled to rights that are farther-reaching than the rights private market participants are entitled to. After all, when property is owned by a state - even a foreign state - it does not serve the function for which it is protected by funda- mental rights, namely to serve its owner "as the basis for private initiative and to be useful in the owner's autonomous private interest". As a fundamental right, Art. 14 GG does not protect property governed by private law, but the property of private persons (BVerfGE 61, 82 <108 and 109>). [195]

d) Given the special circumstances of this case, the interpretation of Art. 19 sec. 3 GG, which is open in this regard, must also be undertaken in view of the freedom of establishment protected under EU law. In this way, inconsistencies between the German and EU legal systems can also be avoided. Here, considering the freedom of establishment, complainant Vattenfall can, as an exception, be provided with the means to lodge a constitutional complaint invoking Art. 14 GG (concerning the Basic Law's openness to European law cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <354>; 126, 286 <303, 327>; 136, 69 <91 para. 43>). [196]

The freedom of establishment is affected here. Although complainant Vattenfall is a Gesellschaft mit beschränkter Haftung under German corporate law (i.e., a limited liability company), it is nonetheless held by Vattenfall AB, a Swedish parent company. Vattenfall AB exercised its freedom of establishment in founding its German subsidiary (Art. 54 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 49 sec. 1 sentence 2 Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU)). Complainant Vattenfall, as a subsidiary within the meaning of Art. 49 sec. 1 sentence 2 TFEU, can invoke the protection conferred on its parent company under the freedom of establishment (cf. European Court of Justice (ECJ), Judgment of 26 June 2008, Burda, C-284/06, EU:C:2008:365). It does not stand to oppose the applicability of freedom of establishment that the company is wholly owned by the Swedish state. The fundamental freedoms under EU law make no distinctions in this regard. Art. 54 sec. 2 TFEU expressly includes entities governed by public law within the protection of freedom of establishment, provided that they are operated for profit. [197]

Art. 49 TFEU precludes national measures or regulations that, even though they are applicable without discrimination on grounds of nationality, are liable to hamper or to render less attractive the exercise by the Union nationals, of fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (see, fundamentally, ECJ, Judgment of 31 March 1993, Kraus, C-19/92, EU:C:1993:125, para. 32; established case-law). [198]

Denying an entity the ability to invoke fundamental rights, and thus also the possibility of lodging a constitutional complaint under national constitutional procedural law, presumably does not in itself constitute a restriction of freedom of establishment. [199]

However, given the special circumstances of this case, the denial of the ability to lodge a constitutional complaint here would have to be justified in light of the freedom of establishment. First of all, without the possibility of lodging a constitutional complaint against legislation complainant Vattenfall, under applicable German procedural law, could not claim legal protection against impairments associated with the 13th AtG Amendment (B III 2 below, paras. 208 et seq.). Second, the impairments associated with the 13th AtG Amendment are particularly significant, because the amendment forces complainant Vattenfall to carry out an early shutdown of the nuclear power plant in which it also ownership shares, and which is operated by complainant Krümmel, and thus precludes insofar the further exercise of the freedom of establishment. Finally, complainant Vattenfall would have to accept a substantial competitive disadvantage. Its private competitors, in turn, have the possibility to claim legal protection against the impairments associated with the 13th AtG Amendment, through a constitutional complaint against legislation. Even a competitor held by the German state has ways of protecting its interests, at least within the organisation of the state (B II 1 c aa above, para. 194). [200]

The conditions justifying a mere restriction of freedom of establishment are lacking. According to the established case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, restrictions on freedom of establishment which are applicable without discrimination on grounds of nationality may be justified by overriding reasons relating to the general interest, provided that the restrictions are appropriate for securing attainment of the objective pursued and do not go beyond what is necessary for attaining that objective (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 24 March 2011, Commission v. Spain, C-400/08, EU:C:2011:172, para. 73; established case-law). No such overriding reasons relating to the general interest are evident here. In and of itself, the fact that the complainant is a state entity does not as such amount to an overriding reason relating to the general interest, because the fundamental freedoms precisely do not distinguish within their personal scope of protection between state and non-state entities (concerning freedom of establishment, Art. 54 sec. 2 TFEU). [201]

e) The European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) likewise imply that complainant Vattenfall should have the possibility to claim effective legal protection against the 13th AtG Amendment. They must be taken into account in the form of interpretative guidance when interpreting the fundamental rights and the principles of the Basic Law under the rule of law, although they do not demand that parallels should be drawn schematically (cf. BVerfGE 131, 268 <295 and 296> with reference to BVerfGE 111, 307 <315 et seq.> and 128, 326 <366 et seq.>). There is no need to decide here how the decision of the European Court of Human Rights on the ability of state-controlled entities to have human rights (cf. ECtHR, Islamic Republic of Iran Shipping Lines v. Turkey, Judgment of 13. December 2007, no. 40998/98, para. 79 et seq.) can be included within the German legal system. In any case, complainant Vattenfall can arguably claim that its right to property under Art. 1 of the Additional Protocol to the European Convention of Human Rights has been violated, a case for which Art. 13 ECHR requires a right of effective remedy before a national authority (cf. ECtHR, Lithgow and others v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 8 July 1986, no. 9006/80, para. 205; ECtHR, Leander v. Sweden, Judgment of 26 March 1987, no. 9248/81, § 77). While this does not compel a state to provide a remedy to challenge legislation (cf. ECtHR, Lithgow and others v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 8 July 1986, no. 9006/80, para. 206), it does require the availability of an avenue for a complaint (cf. ECtHR, Leander v. Sweden, Judgment of 26 March 1987, no. 9248/81, para. 77). [202]

2. Ultimately, the other complainant in proceeding 1 BvR 1456/12 - Krümmel - is also entitled to invoke the fundamental rights under Art. 14 and Art. 3 GG that it claims have been violated. [203]

The complainant Krümmel is owned 50% by complainant Vattenfall and 50% by E.ON Kernkraft GmbH, whose sole shareholder is E.ON Energie AG. The question of whether Kernkraftwerk Krümmel GmbH & Co. oHG should ultimately be viewed as a private entity because Vattenfall holds only 50% of it, or rather as an entity that is state-controlled as a whole because of possible state interests held in E.ON Energie AG does not need to be settled here. In any case, complainant Krümmel has legal personality with regard to the fundamental rights that it claims have been violated. [204]

[…] [205-206]

III.

1. The complainants in all three proceedings may lodge their constitutional complaints directly against the 13th AtG Amendment. Because that amendment revokes the additional electricity output volumes allocated by the 11th AtG Amendment (11. AtG-Novelle), and introduces fixed shut-down dates for all nuclear power plants, the complainants are individually, presently and directly affected in their fundamental rights (on these requirements, cf. BVerfGE 97, 157 <164>; 102, 197 <206>; 108, 370 <384>; established case-law). In particular, the challenged provisions do not require an administrative act of transposition. [207]

2. The complainants are not compelled for the sake of subsidiarity of constitutional complaints to seek legal protection in the regular courts beforehand. [208]

[…] [209]

There is no avenue through which the complainants can reasonably be expected to seek legal protection in the regular courts against the challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment. An action seeking a declaratory judgment handed down by the administrative courts is the only potentially available option here; however, although this type of action is not automatically ruled out when it comes to challenges brought against legislation, it does presuppose at least the possibility of a finding that there is a specific legal relationship (cf. Federal Administrative Court, Bundesverwaltungsgericht - BVerwG, Judgment of 23 August 2007 - BVerwG 7 C 13.06 -, Neue Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht, NVwZ 2007, p. 1311 <1312 and 1313>; Judgment of 28 January 2010 - BVerwG 8 C 19.09 -, Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE 136, 54 <58 et seq.>; each with further references; see also BVerfGE 115, 81 <91 et seq.> on the necessity of recognising legal protection by regular courts under Art. 19 sec. 4 GG for sub-statutory provisions). However, it is not evident here that there is a meaningful application for a declaratory judgment that would go beyond the finding that the challenged provisions are unconstitutional - a finding which administrative courts are, in any event, not competent to hand down - while still making the question of constitutionality the subject matter of the clarification of a specific legal relationship. [210]

C. […] [211-212]

The challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment must be measured primarily against the fundamental right to property, with which they are essentially in line with yet not in all respects (I). Nor do any further consequences proceed from Art. 12 GG (II). There is no violation of the prohibition of laws that apply merely to a single case (Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG) (III). [213]

I.

The challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment must be measured against Art. 14 GG, because they interfere in several respects with interests of the complainants that are protected by property law (1). However, they do not involve an expropriation (2). The determination of the content and limits of the complainants' property under the 13th AtG Amendment is for the most part but not on all points compatible with the Constitution (3). [214]

1. The first standard against which the challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment must be measured is Art. 14 GG. [215]

a) Property is an elementary fundamental right, and its protection is of particular importance for a social state governed by the rule of law (cf. BVerfGE 14, 263 <277>). Within the framework of the fundamental rights, the guarantee of the right to property has the task of ensuring in particular that the holder of that fundamental right has freedom to act within the sphere of property rights. The constitutional guarantee of property is characterised by its nature of being of private benefit, and by the owner's general power of disposition over an owned object (cf. BVerfGE 31, 229 <240>; 50, 290 <339>; 52, 1 <30>; 100, 226 <241>; 102, 1 <15>; established case-law). It is intended to be of use as a foundation for private initiative and to serve people's autonomous private interest (cf. BVerfGE 100, 226 <241>). Insofar as safeguarding individuals' personal freedom is concerned, it enjoys particularly pronounced protection (cf. BVerfGE 50, 290 <340>; established case-law). Yet at the same time, property is supposed to be used in a way that serves the public interest (Art. 14 sec. 2 GG; cf. BVerfGE 134, 242 <290 and 291 paras. 167 and 168>). [216]

The guarantee of the right to property protects the specific status quo of assets held by the individual owners (cf. BVerfGE 24, 367 <400>; 38, 175 <181, 184 and 185>; 56, 249 <260>) against measures taken by state authorities (cf. BVerfGE 72, 175 <195>; 83, 201 <208>). In the case of an expropriation that is compatible with the Constitution, the guarantee of the status quo of assets is replaced by a guarantee of value, which is oriented towards the granting of a compensation on a basis to be determined by the legislature (cf. BVerfGE 24, 367 <397>; 46, 268 <285>; 56, 249 <261>; 58, 300 <323>). However, this does not alter the fact that Art. 14 GG first and foremost protects the continued existence of property in terms of its function of protecting freedom, and not just its value (cf. BVerfGE 134, 242 <290 and 291 para. 168>). [217]

The specific scope of protection under the guarantee of the right to property only results once the content and limits of property are determined, which is a matter for the legislature under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG. The legislature is not entirely free in this regard: it must create a balanced relationship between the individual's sphere of freedom and the public good, which is not only a point of orientation, but also the limit to restrictions of the right to property (cf. BVerfGE 25, 112 <118>). At the same time, the permissible scope of the social responsibility of property must also be derived from the property itself (cf. BVerfGE 20, 351 <361>; 50, 290 <340>). The guaranteed continued existence of property under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG, the regulatory task under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG, and the fact that, pursuant to Art. 14 sec. 2 GG, property entails the obligation to serve also social ends are inseparably linked. In that regard, the legislature's power to determine content and limits is all the more broad, the stronger the social dimension of the property involved; in that respect, the property's specific nature and function are of crucial significance (cf. BVerfGE 21, 73 <83>; 31, 229 <242>; 36, 281 <292>; 37, 132 <140>; 42, 263 <294>; 50, 290 <339 and 340>; 53, 257 <292>; 100, 226 <241>). [218]

With regard to the nuclear power plants built by energy suppliers under the AtG, along with the various property interests related thereto, it must be taken into account that these constitute property with a particularly strong social dimension. On the one hand, in the Atomic Energy Act of 1959, the state deliberately decided in favour of the peaceful use of nuclear energy, and also gave rise to private investments through numerous support measures. On the other hand, the public has become increasingly aware over the past few decades that the peaceful use of nuclear energy is a high risk technology which is encumbered with extreme risks of harm, among other issues, as well as still-unclarified problems of final disposal (cf., e.g., BVerfGE 49, 89 <142 and 143, 146 and 147>; 53, 30 <55 et seq.>). For that reason, the legislature has particularly broad leeway to design atomic energy laws, even in respect of existing property interests, without, however, completely depriving them of protection (cf. BVerfGE 49, 89 <145 et seq.>). [219]

b) The terms of the 13th AtG Amendment impose burdens on the complainants in several respects (aa). They thereby affect the scope of protection under Art. 14 sec. 1 GG, which provides constitutional protection for property in various forms (bb). [220]

aa) The 13th AtG Amendment's staggering of shut-down dates and its revocation of the additional output allowances allocated in 2010 adversely affect the complainants, as the owners and operators of the nuclear power plants, in different ways under the decision to phase out nuclear power ((1) - (4)). However, the decision made in 2000/ 2002 to phase out the commercial use of nuclear energy, together with the limitation at that time to use up specific residual electricity volumes, determined the complainants' property interests thus affected and the remaining possible uses considerably. [221]

(1) With the new § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG, the 13th AtG Amendment establishes, for the first time, fixed dates for the expiry of the entitlement to produce power at the individual nuclear power plants. Upon the expiry of the entitlement to operate, the right, which proceeds from the ownership of the sites and installations, to use them for the purpose of producing electricity by means of atomic energy lapses. [222]

This impairment goes further than the pre-existing impacts resulting from the nuclear phase-out legislated in 2002. Given that the end dates for production are now fixed, it will, in all likelihood, neither be possible to use up the residual electricity volumes originally allocated in 2002 will at the nuclear power plant to which it "belongs", nor at the same corporations' other nuclear power plants to which such volumes may be transferred (C I 3 c cc (2) (a) below, paras. 313 et seq.); this finding is true even when taking into consideration that the new version of § 7 sec. 1b sentence 4 AtG extends the possibilities for transferring electricity output volumes to other plants. In fact, the new § 7 sec. 1a AtG can lead to substantial losses of existing possibilities for using, these residual electricity volumes. [223]

(2) Art. 1 no. 1 letter b aa, letter c aa and no. 3 letter a of the 13th AtG Amendment revoke the additional residual electricity volumes that had been allocated to the nuclear power plants only shortly before through the new column 4 of Appendix 3 to the Atomic Energy Act under the 11th AtG Amendment of 8 December 2010 (BGBl I p. 1814). Thus the legislature rescinds the prolongation of operational lifetimes of about 12 years per nuclear power plant that shortly after actually assigning this prolongation to the plants (Bundestag document, Bundestag-Drucksache - BTDrucks 17/3051, p. 6) and curtails their possible operating life accordingly. [224]

(3) The fixed end dates that the new § 7 sec. 1a AtG introduces for the power production do not only limit the potential use of nuclear power plants through an inflexible end point; at the same time, they also restrict the entrepreneurial leeway - which still existed despite the already decided nuclear phase-out - to determine how long which nuclear power plant should continue to operate, as well as the leeway to determine downtimes or phases of reduced production where applicable. [225]

(4) Finally, as the complainants have argued, the introduction of fixed shut-down dates, all by itself, but also in combination with the revocation of additional electricity volumes, can void investments undertaken on the basis of the expectation that the legal situation will not change. [226]

bb) This affects the guarantee of property in various ways. Property rights that the legislature must observe in accelerating the nuclear phase-out under the 13th AtG Amendment relate to the existing plants and their use (1), and also - linked to the plant ownership - to the residual electricity volumes from 2002 (3) and 2010 (4), but do not concern the licences under atomic energy law as such (2). In this respect, the right to an established and exercised business itself, however, is not of any additional relevance here (5). The right to use and consume nuclear fuels under EU law does not affect national protection of property either (6). [227]

(1) The protection of property under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG includes civil-law ownership of property, its possession, and the possibility of using it (cf. BVerfGE 97, 350 <370>; 101, 54 <75>; 105, 17 <30>; 110, 141 <173>). Accordingly, the complainants' property and possession enjoy constitutional protection of property for the plant sites and the power plant installations. The usability of these operating facilities is constitutionally protected, too. [228]

If property is already subject to a regime of use governed by public law at the time when it is established, the constitutional protection of the use of property against later interference and configurations is limited in principle to what is allowed by that regime, yet the protection of allowed uses may vary, depending on the respective field of law. [229]

[…] [230]

(2) A licence awarded under atomic energy law to construct and operate a nuclear power plant, or a licence to produce power (§ 7 secs. 1 and 1a AtG), is not in and of itself a protected property right under Art. 14 GG. Such licences to operate dangerous plants are state permits which, depending on their configuration, overcome either repressive or preventive prohibitions that reserve the option of granting the permission to carry out the activity sought. Thus they are not comparable with those subjective public rights on which established constitutional case-law confers protection of the type provided to property. According to this case-law, such property-type protection is granted due to the fact that those rights provide individuals with a legal interest which is tantamount to that of an owner and strong enough to assume that depriving it without compensation would contradict the Basic Law in terms of its rule-of-law content (BVerfGE 40, 65 <83>). Such rights are characterised by a power of disposal - at least a limited one - and by the fact that they are obtained, to a significant extent, through an acquisition measure that is based an act accomplished by the owner itself (BVerfGE 14, 288 <293 and 294>; 18, 392 <397>; 30, 292 <334>; 53, 257 <291 and 292>; 69, 272 <300>; 72, 9 <19 and 20>; 72, 175 <193>; 97, 67 <83>). Licences under atomic energy law lack both of these features. [231]

[…] [232]

(3) The residual electricity volumes allocated to the individual nuclear power plants by the Phase-Out Amendment Act under a new § 7 sec. 1a AtG Appendix 3 column 2 Atomic Energy Act do not enjoy stand-alone protection under Art. 14 sec. 1 GG. They do, however, share in the constitutional protection of property that Art. 14 GG confers on the use of property in a licenced nuclear technology installation. [233]

(a) The residual electricity volumes allocated to the nuclear power plants under the Phase-Out Amendment Act determine the use of the nuclear power plants covered by the protection provided by Art. 14 sec. 1 GG; however, they lack essential features of stand-alone property interests. [234]

The residual electricity volumes, on the one hand, hallmark the restriction of plant ownership resulting from the nuclear phase-out, because they established the expiry of the use of the power plants. At the same time, however, they are a significant factor in terms of power production, given that they are allocated to the individual nuclear power plants for the purpose of producing electricity and thus to generate profits, and therefore define the value of private benefits. [235]

Pursuant to § 7 sec. 1b AtG, residual electricity volumes may be transferred to other nuclear power plants to a limited extent. However, they cannot be disposed of as freely as other property interests. Instead, transferability of residual electricity volumes is limited from the outset to the other German nuclear power plants, and is subject to further restrictions set out in § 7 sec. 1b AtG, particularly the principle of "old to new" in § 7 sec. 1b sentence 1 AtG. Besides, without a nuclear power plant at which residual electricity volumes can be produced, those residual electricity volumes are worthless. [236]

Finally, the granting of residual electricity volumes under the Phase-Out Amendment Act is not immediately based on a significant contribution accomplished by the complainants themselves. The residual electricity volumes are not conceived as direct compensation for the investments rendered worthless by the phase-out, but are a decisive feature of the time limit the operation is subject to. However, under the Phase-Out Amendment Act the residual electricity volumes were also granted in order to maintain the principle of proportionality in view of the interference with fundamental rights associated with the phase-out (cf. BTDrucks 14/6890, pp. 15 and 16.). [237]

(b) The residual electricity volumes allocated in Appendix 3 column 2 of the Atomic Energy Act to the Mülheim-Kärlich nuclear power plant, which had already been shut down at that time, are exceptional in that this allocation was made in the course of an amicable settlement, in return for the cessation of public liability proceedings initiated against the Land of Rhineland-Palatinate and for the withdrawal of an application for the issuing of a license under atomic energy law to operate that nuclear power plant. Thus there is no need to decide whether and to what extent these residual electricity volumes take on an autonomous position under property law in virtue of the fact that from the outset, they were not linked to the operation of a specific power plant, and thus were not the guarantee of a remaining operational lifetime, but rather a quid pro quo for waiving the assertion of a pecuniary claim. In any event, given their contractual basis, the Mülheim-Kärlich residual electricity volumes certainly do not enjoy any less protection as property than the other residual electricity volumes allocated in 2002. In fact, considering also their ability to be transferred to other nuclear power plants, they rather enjoy a more extensive degree of protection than the other residual electricity volumes. [238]

(4) In view of the possibilities of use they opened up, the additional output allowances allocated by the 11th AtG Amendment at the end of 2010 obtain property related protection tantamount to the protection accorded to residual electricity volumes of 2002. The fact that they do not reflect a form of consideration of the nuclear power plant operators' property in terms of its respective status quo, but are actually the result of a legislative energy, climate and economic policy decision (cf. BTDrucks 17/3051, p. 1), broadens the legislature's leeway in structuring property (for more details see C I 3 c cc (1) (b) below, paras. 295 et seq.). It does not, however, alter the fact that protection of property is generally also available to this type of guaranteed use by the nuclear power plants. [239]

(5) Protection of property provided with regard to the operating sites and nuclear power plants, as well as with regard to their use, particularly as concretised in the residual electricity volumes, covers all material property interests of the complainants. Farther-reaching constitutional property protection against the accelerated termination of nuclear power plant operations under the 13th AtG Amendment could not be conferred on them by way of the legal concept of an established and exercised business either. Such protection is definitively not broader than the protection the business's economic basis enjoys (BVerfGE 58, 300 <353>) and covers only the specific inventory of rights and goods (BVerfGE 123, 185 <259>); in contrast, mere revenue and profit prospects, or actual circumstances, are not covered by the guarantee of property relating to an established and exercised business (BVerfGE 105, 272 <278>). […] [240]

(6) Insofar as the nuclear fuels used at the nuclear power plants are property of the Community under Art. 86 of the Treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community (hereinafter: EAEC Treaty) and insofar as energy production companies have an unlimited right to use and consume those fuels pursuant to Art. 87 of the EAEC Treaty, this has no significant impact on the requirements of property law the German legislature must observe in the acceleration of the nuclear phase-out at issue here. Art. 194 sec. 2 subsec. 2 TFEU determines that a Member State's right to determine the conditions for exploiting its energy resources, its choice between different energy sources, and the general structure of its energy supply remains unaffected. In a given case, the right to use nuclear fuels under EU law therefore goes only so far as the use of those fuels is factually and legally possible under national law. In that sense, European ownership of and rights to use nuclear fuels are accessory to the national system governing use. In that respect, Arts. 86 and 87 of the EAEC Treaty do not affect the protection of property with regard to the owners and operators of nuclear power plants under Art. 14 GG. [241]

2. The challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment do not result in an expropriation of the complainants' property. [242]

An expropriation under Art. 14 sec. 3 GG (a) presupposes the deprivation of property through a change in the assignment of ownership (a aa) and always also presupposes an acquisition of goods (a bb). In contrast, restrictions of the power of use and disposition over property qualify as determinations of content and limits within the meaning of Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG; if they lead to a deprivation of specific property interests without contributing to the acquisition of goods, enhanced requirements must apply with regard to their proportionality. They then also raise the question of a settlement provision (a cc). The provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment neither change the assignment of ownership nor do they constitute a process for the acquisition of goods (b). [243]

a) Through an expropriation, the state seizes the property of individuals. It deprives them of their property and obtains it for itself or for third parties in the public interest. [244]

aa) Expropriation is directed at the complete or partial deprivation of specific subjective property interests guaranteed by Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG, for the purpose of fulfilling certain public tasks (cf. BVerfGE 101, 239 <259>; 102, 1 <15 and 16>; 104, 1 <9>; 134, 242 <289 para. 161> established case-law). An indispensable feature of expropriation under Art. 14 sec. 3 GG, for which compensation is mandatory, in contrast to determinations of content and limits under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG, which are generally not subject to compensation, is the criterion of the complete or partial deprivation of property interests and the resulting loss of rights and assets (cf. BVerfGE 24, 367 <394>; 52, 1 <27>; 83, 201 <211>). Thus, restrictions of an owner's power to use and dispose of its property cannot amount to an expropriation (cf. BVerfGE 52, 1 <26 et seq.>; 58, 137 <144 and 145>; 70, 191 <200>; 72, 66 <78 and 79>), even if they entirely or almost entirely devalue the use of the property (cf. BVerfGE 100, 226 <240>; 102, 1 <16>). Nor does the concept of a "quantitative partial expropriation" (Ossenbühl, Verfassungsrechtliche Fragen eines beschleunigten Ausstiegs aus der Kernenergie, 2012, p. 45), which is put forward by the complainants, turn a restriction of use into an expropriation, unless it results in a change in the assignment of a property right or of a separable part thereof. [245]

bb) Expropriation within the meaning of Art. 14 sec. 3 GG further makes it a mandatory requirement that the sovereign seizure of a property right at the same time constitutes an acquisition of goods for the benefit of the public authorities or another beneficiary of the expropriation. [246]

(1) Thus far, the question of whether a the expropriation requirements under Art. 14 sec. 3 GG are only met in the case of an acquisition of goods has not been answered uniformly in the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court. […] [247]

(2) Under the most recent case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court, acquisition of goods continues to be a constitutive element of expropriation under Art. 14 sec. 3 GG. [248]

(a) The wording and historical background of the fundamental right to property do not provide an unequivocal answer. […] [249]

[…] [250]

(b) Functional reasons of protecting property in particular argue for an adherence to the classic concept of expropriation, which requires an acquisition of goods. [252]

The expansion of the constitutional concept of property that began during the Weimar Republic already has continued under the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 25, 371 <407> shares; BVerfGE 31, 229 <239> copyrights; BVerfGE 36, 281 <290 and 291> patent rights; BVerfGE 53, 257 <288 et seq.> entitlements under social insurance law; BVerfGE 53, 336 <348 and 349> reimbursement claims under public law; BVerfGE 89, 1 <5 et seq.> tenant's right of possession; cf. in this respect Ossenbühl/ Cornils, Staatshaftungsrecht, 6th ed. 2013, pp. 157 et seq.). This extension of the guarantee of property to very different configurations of subjective legal interests is associated with multi-layered requirements for the statutory design of a fair property system, which must appropriately balance concerns of the public good and subjective legal interests (C I 3 below, paras. 267 et seq.). To that end, the legislature needs broad leeway, which the Basic Law confers for the determination of the content and limits of property, but not for expropriations, which are subject to strictly established prerequisites and legal consequences. Therefore, an expropriation is thus restricted to its classic scope of application, which is characterised by a specific deprivation of property and an acquisition of goods.

A particular argument in favour of limiting expropriation to procedures for the acquisition of goods is that the practical need for a mere dispossession of property that does not entail at the same time the transfer of its ownership to the state or a third beneficiary arises specifically in cases where the property right is flawed in a broad sense, or is otherwise perceived as a burden on the public interest. In such cases, the state thus has no inherent interest in acquiring the object in question for the public good (see, for example, the deprivation of wrongfully obtained property as an incidental consequence of a criminal conviction - BVerfGE 110, 1 <24 and 25>; the prohibition of importing and transporting certain breeds of dogs - BVerfGE 110, 141 <167>; the securing and confiscation of items for evidential purposes - Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGK 17, 550 <557>). It is consistent with the general social obligations that property entails (Art. 14 sec. 2 GG) that such cases of deprivation of property not be considered expropriations requiring compensation, but rather as a determination of the content and limits of property, which requires compensation only in exceptional cases, even when property is deprived. […] [253]

(b) Objections put forward against the narrow interpretation of expropriation fail to convince. […] [254-255]

[…] [256-257]

cc) If the state deprives an owner of property for reasons of the public good, but does not actually expropriate the act does not entail an acquisition of goods, the legislature is always faced with the question of whether, in the light of Art. 14 GG, such a determination of content and limits can remain valid only if appropriate provisions are made for settlement. [258]

Even in cases of hardship, the legislature is not generally prohibited from asserting determinations of content and limits that restrict property and that it considers necessary in the public interest, provided it takes compensatory precautions to avert disproportionate burdens on the owner or burdens contrary to equality requirements, and provided it takes due account of legitimate expectations that are worthy of protection (cf. BVerfGE 58, 137 <149 and 150>; 79, 174 <192>; 83, 201 <212 and 213>; 100, 226 <244>). In certain groups of cases, such a settlement can ensure constitutionality within the meaning of Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG of a determination of contents and limits that would otherwise be disproportionate or contrary to equality requirements (BVerfGE 100, 226 <244>). [259]

However, the possibility under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG of ensuring the constitutionality of an otherwise disproportionate determination of content and limits by way of a financial settlement to be set out by the legislature exists only for those cases in which the public interest ground pursued through the determination of limits generally justifies the interference as such, but additionally requires, for proportionality reasons, a settlement provision (cf. BVerfGE 100, 226 <244 et seq.>). Nevertheless, a determination of content and limits for which it is necessary to provide a financial settlement is an exceptional case. Within the limits of what is possible, the protection of property anchored in Art. 14 GG primarily requires that provisions that interfere with property should be designed proportionately, without recourse to compensatory settlement payments; such proportionate designs can be based on exceptions and exemptions, for example, or on transitional provisions (cf. BVerfGE 100, 226 <244, 246 and 247>). Conversely, and by the same token, the owner does not need to accept disproportionate interference with property, and consequently must seek legal protection against such interference by challenging the interfering measure and seeking its elimination or limitation. The Constitution does not give owners the right of opting to accept a disproportionate determination of content and limits and demanding an appropriate settlement instead. [260]

By limiting expropriation to cases where goods are acquired, however, burdens on property cannot be categorised as expropriations requiring compensation if they only consist of a deprivation by the state of specific property interests, and thereby give particular weight to the interference. In such cases, the legislature must examine particularly carefully whether such a deprivation is only compatible with Art. 14 sec. 1 GG if the owner is provided with an appropriate settlement. In the review of reasonable- ness that is required here, in each instance it will be of particular importance to what extent the owner is responsible for the reasons that legitimate the deprivation of property, or to what extent those reasons are at least attributable to the owner (cf. in this respect BVerfGE 102, 1 <17 and 18, 21>). [261]

b) The challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment do interfere with the complainants' property, but do not establish an expropriation. They do not deprive the complainants of any specific stand-alone property rights, nor are they associated with an acquisition of goods. [262]

[…] [263-266]

3. The challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment largely satisfy the requirements for the determination of content and limits of property under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG (a). The statute does not prove to be unconstitutional because of violations of formal requirements for legislation (b). The design of the content and limits is largely proportionate, albeit not in every point (c). It does not meet the requirements of the principle of equality in every respect either (Art. 3 sec. 1 GG) (d). [267]

a) The legislature that determines the content and limits of legal interests protected by the fundamental right to property must take due account of both the constitutional recognition of private property under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG and also the social obligations property entails (Art. 14 sec. 2 GG). The public good that must serve the legislature for orientation in this task represents not only the reason, but also the limit for restricting an owner's powers (cf. BVerfGE 25, 112 <118>; 50, 290 <340 and 341>; 100, 226 <241>). The legislature must find a fair equilibrium and a balanced relationship between owner's interests that are worthy of protection and the public good (cf. BVerfGE 100, 226 <240>), and in so doing, must maintain consistency with all other constitutional provisions. In particular, any determination of content and limits must comply with the principle of proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 75, 78 <97 and 98>; 110, 1 <28>; 126, 331 <359 and 360>). However, the limits of the legislature's powers of design are not the same for all matters. First of all the scope of protection of the property guarantee is measured according to what powers an owner specifically has at the time of the legislative measure. Insofar as the property safeguards an individual's personal freedom in the economic sphere, it enjoys particularly strong protection. Second, the legislature's power to determine content and limits becomes all the broader, the more the owned object has a social dimension and a social function (cf., e.g., BVerfGE 50, 290 <340 and 341>; 70, 191 <201>; 102, 1 <16 and 17>; each with further references from the case-law). The legislature's leeway is shaped in particular by the respective economic and social circumstances (cf. BVerfGE 24, 367 <389>; 52, 1 <30>; 70, 191 <201>; 112, 93 <110>; 126, 331 <360>). Furthermore, in the context of the constitutional guarantee of property, due account must be taken of the principle of legitimate expectation under the rule of law, a principle which is distinctly refined under Art. 14 sec. 1 GG with regard to financial assets (cf. BVerfGE 36, 281 <293>; 72, 9 <23>; 75, 78 <105>; 95, 64 <82>; 101, 239 <257>; 117, 272 <294>; 122, 374 <391>). Still more, the legislature is also bound by the principle of equality under Art. 3 sec. 1 GG in determining the content of an owner's powers and duties (cf. BVerfGE 21, 73 <84>; 34, 139 <146>; 37, 132 <143>; 49, 382 <395>; 87, 114 <139>; 102, 1 <16 and 17>; 126, 331 <360>). [268]

The legislature may not only assign a new content to property rights under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG. Just as it may introduce new rights, it may also prevent new rights that were possible under former law from arising in the future. The guarantee of property does not require that once legal interests are established, their content must remain untouched forever after (cf. BVerfGE 31, 275 <284 et seq., 289 and 290>; 36, 281 <293>; 42, 263 <headnote 4 and p. 294>; 58, 300 <351>). Even the complete elimination of legal interests that formerly existed and were protected by the guarantee of property may be permissible under certain circumstances (cf. BVerfGE 78, 58 <75>). However, here the legislature is subject to special limits under constitutional law (cf. BVerfGE 83, 201 <212>; 102, 1 <16>). Interference with rights that existed under former law must be justified by reasons of public interest, taking due account of the principle of proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 31, 275 <290>; 70, 191 <201 and 202> with further references). The reasons of public interest that argue in favour of such an interference must be so serious that they take priority over citizens' legitimate expectation of the continuance of their right, which is safeguarded by the protection of the status quo inherent in Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG (cf. BVerfGE 42, 263 <294 and 295>; 58, 300 <351>). The permissible scope of the interference also depends on the weight of the underlying public interest (cf. BVerfGE 83, 201 <212>). In any case, a complete elimination of a legal interest, without transition or replacement, may be considered only under special circumstances (cf. BVerfGE 83, 201 <213>; referring to the foregoing, BVerfGE 102, 1 <16>). [269]

With regard to the protection of corporate investments, Art. 14 GG provides no lesser guarantees for companies than it does for other owners. In general, the same limits from Art. 14 GG result here for the legislature as have been developed in the Federal Constitutional Court's case-law on the protection of property in general. If the legislature wishes to expropriate a company's property for sufficiently weighty reasons of the public good, it is bound by the requirements of Art. 14 sec. 3 GG. In contrast, if the legislature determines the content and limits of corporately held property by changing the legal situation, it must adhere to the principles of proportionality, legitimate expectation and equality. The legislature must respect in an appropriate manner company assets and the investments undertaken in reliance on the legal situation. For the rest, however, Art. 14 sec. 1 GG does not guarantee companies that a legal situation that ensures favourable market opportunities for them will be preserved; neither do any other fundamental right provide such a guarantee (cf. BVerfGE 105, 252 <277 and 278>; 110, 274 <290>; likewise on Art. 12 GG, BVerfGE 121, 317 <383>). [270]

b) The definition under the 13th AtG Amendment of the content and limits of property in nuclear power plants does not prove to be unconstitutional on grounds that the law purportedly suffers from radical procedural or formal defects. [271]

Requirements for investigating facts and stating reasons that the complainants claim to have been violated, considering the speed and the sources of information of the legislative procedure, in fact do not exist in this form as a matter of principle, nor do they apply to the 13th AtG Amendment as an exception. [272]

aa) The Basic Law does not give rise to an obligation to investigate facts in the sense that such a duty exists independently from the requirements for the substantive constitutionality of legislation. [273]

[…] [274-277]

bb) There is also no constitutionally-based special procedural obligation to state reasons for legislation here. [278]

[…] [279-280]

c) The challenged provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment largely - although not on all points - satisfy the requirements of constitutional law for the determination of content and limits under Art. 14 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG. The amendment pursues a legitimate objective (aa). Its provisions are suitable and necessary in order to achieve that objective (bb). Proportionality requirements, in the strict sense, including the requirements it must meet in terms of legitimate expectations and equality (cc), are satisfied as far as the deprivation of the additional electricity volumes allocated in 2010 are concerned (cc (1)). However, setting fixed shut-down dates proves to be unconstitutional insofar as it has the result that to different extents some of the companies concerned are unable to use up, at least for the most part, the residual electricity volumes allocated in 2002, within the same corporation (cc (2)). The 13th AtG Amendment is also deficient in that it contains no provisions for an appropriate settlement with regard to devalued investments made for the additional output allowances allocated in 2010 (cc (3)). Other than that, however, further burdens on the complainants associated with the shut-down dates, above and beyond the ability to use the residual electricity volumes, must be tolerated (cc (4)). [281]

aa) The 13th AtG Amendment pursues the objective of "terminating the use of nuclear energy at the earliest possible date" (BTDrucks 17/6070, p. 1) by setting fixed end dates for power production at the individual nuclear power plants and by revoking the additional output allowances allocated in 2010. The background for the decision to accelerate the nuclear phase-out that had already been introduced in the Atomic Consensus (Atomkonsens) of 2000/2001 was the legislature's "reassessment of the risks associated with the use of nuclear energy", prompted by the events in Japan (BTDrucks 17/6070, p. 5). [282]

The legislature is pursuing a legitimate regulatory objective in accelerating the nuclear phase-out with the underlying intent of thus minimising, in time and scope, the associated residual risk. This generally applies irrespective of varying assessments as to the size and probability of the danger that this residual risk might materialise, and thus also irrespective of the conclusions that may be derived from the reactor disaster in Japan concerning the safety situation at German nuclear power plants. The legislature's objective of eliminating, as quickly and to the greatest possible extent, the residual risk that must inevitably be accepted together with the use of nuclear energy is constitutionally unobjectionable - even if it were to be founded solely on a political reassessment of the willingness to accept this residual risk. On the contrary, the acceleration of the nuclear phase-out intended by the legislature within its broad leeway in choosing what objectives of the common good to pursue (cf. in this respect BVerfGE 121, 317 <350>; 134, 242 <292 and 293 para. 172>) serves to protect the life and health of the people

(Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 1 GG) and to achieve the task imposed on the state under Art. 20a GG of protecting the natural foundations of life, in part as a responsibility towards future generations. [283]

bb) The provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment are suitable ((1)) and necessary ((2)) for achieving that objective. [284]

(1) The Federal Constitutional Court's review of a law's objective fitness to achieve its purpose is limited to determining whether the employed means are plainly or objectively unsuitable (cf. BVerfGE 126, 331 <361> with further references). To establish suitability, it is sufficient if the provision can further the desired results, and consequently there is simply a possibility of achieving the purpose (cf. BVerfGE 121, 317 <354> with further references). [285]

Measured by that standard, setting fixed shut-down dates and revoking the additional output allowances allocated in 2010 are undoubtedly suitable to bring about the final termination of the use of nuclear energy faster than under the previous legal situation. […] [286]

The fact that Germany remains exposed to a residual nuclear risk from the operation of nuclear power plants near the border in other countries does not affect the finding that shortening operational lifetimes is suitable to minimise risk domestically. The assessment of a law's suitability depends primarily on the furtherance of the achievement of an objective within the country's own territory. [287]

Equally, potential impacts of the accelerated nuclear phase-out on the security of the energy supply in Germany are of no relevance to suitability for achieving the legislative purpose, because - unlike the legislative energy package of 2011, of which the 13th AtG Amendment is a part (cf. BTDrucks 17/6070, p. 5) - it is not aimed at security of the energy supply, but aims to minimise risk associated with the use of nuclear energy. [288]

(2) A determination of the content and limits of property that interferes with property rights is necessary if no other means are available that are equally effective but less restrictive of property (cf. in general BVerfGE 121, 317 <354>; 126, 331 <362> with further references). [289]

[…] [290]

cc) The provisions of the 13th AtG Amendment prove to be largely, although not in all points, a reasonable determination of the content and limits of property, and therefore also one that satisfies the requirements of the protection of legitimate expectations and the principle of equal treatment. [291]

(1) The deprivation of the additional output allowances allocated to the nuclear power plants in Appendix 3 column 4 of the Atomic Energy Act under the 11th AtG Amendment in 2010 is consistent with Art. 14 secs. 1, 2 GG. The interference with Art. 14 GG is, to be sure, rather extensive from a quantitative perspective ((a)); yet the property interests concerned are limited in several ways in their worthiness for protection ((b)), so that in the overall balance with the public good, which favours the interference ((c)), the interference is proportionate. [292]

[…] [293]

(a) By striking column 4 from Appendix 3 of the Atomic Energy Act in the 13th AtG Amendment, the legislature deprived the nuclear power plants of an electricity production capacity of more than 1,804 TWh. This is equivalent to an average of approximately 12 years' worth of electricity production per nuclear power plant (cf. statement of reasons for the legislative proposal of an Eleventh Act Amending the Atomic Energy Act, BTDrucks 17/3051, p. 1). This figure is just short of twice the amount of residual electricity that was still available to the nuclear power plants from the original allocation in the Phase-Out Amendment Act of 2002 when the 11th AtG Amendment entered into force on 14 December 2010 […]. The magnitude of the cancelled electricity production capacity, and thus the restriction on the possibility of using the nuclear power plants, is therefore very large. [294]

(b) However, the property interests concerned are limited in several ways in their worthiness for protection. [295]

Art. 14 sec. 1 GG protects not only the physical existence of property, but also the possibility of using it (C I 1 b bb (1) above, paras. 228 et seq.). Since the use of nuclear power plants has been rationed with electricity volumes that can still be produced, corporately held property in the nuclear power plants is embodied not only by the installations and land, but substantially by the power of use as represented in the electricity volumes. If they are uncoupled from the rights to produce electricity, the installations cannot be used in a way that is consistent with their actual purpose of generating profits. The constitutional protection of the electricity volumes allocated under the 11th AtG Amendment shares, in its origins, the special features of the protection of property in nuclear plants in general ((aa)), but in addition has other distinct features, resulting from the reason for the creation and the circumstances of these residual electricity volumes, which reduce the degree to which such property interests are worthy of protection ((bb)). [296]

(aa) In the case of nuclear plants, there are limits on how worthy of protection property, as an individual fundamental freedom, can be. Because of its particular nature and function, this type of property serves an individual's personal freedom only to a small degree. Rather, it is corporately held property, with a particularly strong social dimension. On the one hand, the peaceful use of nuclear energy has served, and still serves, to supply the population with energy; on the other hand, it is a high-risk technology which is linked not only to extreme risks of harm, among other issues, but also to still-unresolved problems of final disposal (C I 1 a above, paras. 218 and 219). Both of these factors determine the strong social dimension of the ownership of nuclear power plants, and leave particularly broad leeway for the legislature in designing atomic energy law. [297]

In light of these special characteristics of the use of nuclear energy, the Federal Constitutional Court already emphasised in its Kalkar Decision that the normative decision of principle for or against the legal permissibility of the peaceful use of nuclear energy is a matter reserved for the parliamentary legislature (BVerfGE 49, 89 <127>) and that atomic energy law has an exceptional position that justifies diverging from constitutional principles that are recognised in other fields of law (loc. cit., p. 146). It follows that the legislature has great leeway in deciding on whether and how nuclear energy is to be used for peaceful purposes. Yet this does not entail a complete exemption from the settlement provisions that are otherwise required. [298]

(bb) Beyond the already strong social dimension of property in nuclear power plants (C I 3 c cc (1) (b) (aa) above, paras. 297 and 298), the protection of property with regard to the use of nuclear plants, insofar as it relates to the additional electricity output allowances allocated by the 11th AtG Amendment at the end of 2010, is further limited against state influence. [299]

The allocation of this very large volume of additional output allowances is not based on any act accomplished by the affected companies themselves. These additional output allowances, in contrast with the residual electricity volume allocated in 2002 (C I 3 c cc (2) (b) (bb) (c) below, paras. 344 and 345), do not constitute compensation for limitations imposed elsewhere on the complainants' property. Nor are they based in any other way on a specific act accomplished by the complainants; in particular, they are not granted in return for specific investments and expenditures that the complainants made out of their own resources, and regarding which the use now would have to be protected by a corresponding increase in the allowances. At the end of 2010, when the legislature decided to allocate the additional residual electricity volumes, it was not because it believed that the operational lifetimes remaining after the Phase-Out Amendment Act of 2002 would otherwise be incompatible with the property rights of the nuclear power plant operators. Rather, granting these additional volumes was the result of an energy, climate and economic policy decision by the Federal Government and the legislature (cf. BTDrucks 17/3051, p. 1). Under the "Energy Concept 2010" of the new Federal Government backed by the CDU/CSU and FDP (Christian Democratic Union, Christian Social Union and Free Democratic Party) political parties, nuclear energy was temporarily to be reinforced further, as a bridging technology, by significantly prolonging the operational lifetimes with the additional output allocations (cf. BTDrucks 17/3049, pp. 8 and 9); the underlying intent was to realise, during a transitional period, the Federal Government's three energy-policy goals of climate protection, cost-effectiveness, and energy supply security in Germany (cf. BTDrucks 17/3051, p. 1). [300]

Therefore, although the additional output allowances allocated in 2010 directly structure the exercise of ownership of the nuclear power plants, they are a result of this plant ownership only to a very limited extent. As a politically motivated grant by the legislature, conferred independently of the operators' legal interests, they therefore participate only to a small degree in the protection of the continued existence of property under property law. […] [301]

Finally, the nuclear power plant operators were also unable to obtain a stronger interest in protection of property by claiming a special legitimate expectation, worthy of protection, of the continued existence of the additional output allowances. Leaving aside the question of whether the legislature enacting the 13th AtG Amendment should have included compensation provisions or transitional provisions for frustrated investments specifically made during, and in reliance on, the statutory applicability of the additional output allowances - a matter which must be examined separately (see C I 3 c cc (3) below, paras. 369 et seq.) - the nuclear power plant owners could not develop the general expectation that these additional output allowances would remain unaltered in terms of their status quo, and cannot claim that they relied on this status quo throughout a longer period and focused their business policy accordingly. The 11th AtG Amendment was promulgated in the Federal Law Gazette (Bundesgesetzblatt) on 13 December 2010; the so-called "Moratorium" was then declared as early as March 2011, and the 13th AtG Amendment entered into force on 6 August 2011. That period of time is too short to justify a general assumption that the nuclear power plant operators had already adjusted on a lasting basis to the average twelve-year prolongation of operational lifetimes, and had already invested to a corresponding extent. [302]

(c) The public interests pursued by the 13th AtG Amendment are of high value and, in the specific implementation of the 2010 revocation of the prolongation of the operational lifetimes, they carry great weight. In the 13th AtG Amendment, the legislature wished to accelerate the phase-out, decided in 2002, of the peaceful use of atomic energy by introducing fixed shut-down dates and by revoking the prolongation of operational lifetimes that had only been introduced late in 2010 with the 11th AtG Amendment (cf. C I 1 b aa (1)-(2) and 3 c aa above, paras. 222 et seq. and 282 et seq.). Accelerating the nuclear phase-out, with its intended purpose of protecting the life and health of the people (Art. 2 sec. 2 GG) and the natural foundations of life (Art. 20a GG), serves constitutional interests of high value. By revoking the prolongation of operational lifetimes from 2010, with the resulting shutdown of nuclear power plants an average of 12 years earlier, the legislature realises a very considerable risk reduction. [303]

This is the case irrespectively of whether it was not or is not possible, according to now largely unanimous opinion, to derive new findings from the reactor disaster at Fukushima about other risks to German nuclear power plants, or risks significantly increased when compared to earlier assumptions […]. Furthermore, the reasons for the legislative proposal for the 13th AtG Amendment as stated by the CDU/CSU and FDP parliamentary groups do not actually suggest that any such new findings exist, but refer in this respect only to a reassessment of the risks associated with the use of nuclear energy as a result of the events in Japan (cf. BTDrucks 17/6070, p. 1, 5). In any case, the existing residual risk, even though it was known previously, must accordingly be tolerated for 12 years less than planned, and the extent of the disposal problems necessarily associated with the peaceful use of nuclear energy is reduced accordingly. [304]

(d) In the overall balance with the public good pursued with the challenged provision, the interference with the complainants' property as a result of the revocation of the additional output allowances of 2010 proves to be proportionate. The public interest, which is substantial in both quality and quantity, in reducing the nuclear power plants' operational lifetime by an average of twelve years (C I 3 c cc (1) (c) above, paras. 303 and 304) clearly outweighs the associated burdens on property for the complainants (C I 3 c cc (1) (a) above, para. 294). [305]

This result is not opposed by the complainants' contention that the legislature acted self-contradictorily and irrationally. They argue that first of all, believing that the known residual risk associated with the peaceful use of nuclear energy was still acceptable over a rather extended period in light of the high safety standards of German nuclear power plants, the legislature extended their operational lifetime by an average of twelve years at the end of 2010. Yet it revoked this decision only a few months later, with no substantive new findings as to danger. In so arguing, the complainants fail to recognise the legislature's decision-making leeway and its permissible reasons for action. [306]

Given an adequate knowledge of the existing risks, whether and under what conditions the legislature may permit a high-risk technology such as the peaceful use of nuclear energy is first of all a political decision, which it may regulate in a manner linked significantly to and dependent on society's acceptance of this technology. To that extent, the legislature is not generally precluded from amending, for the future, a decision that originally favoured the use of nuclear energy, even if there are no substantively new findings about its dangers and manageability. Regarding constitutional organs like the Federal Government and the legislature, who under their democratic responsibility decide considerably on the basis of political aspects, there is no doubt that in such a situation - like those at issue here - they may also respond to events like the reactor disaster in Japan, and derive consequences from heightened fears amongst the population or a change in risk tolerance. [307]

However, it is not possible to define in general the extent to which a mere change in political values or increased public concerns or fears can also sustain measures that - like the acceleration of the nuclear phase-out - significantly interfere with the fundamental rights of the persons concerned, nor what weight is to be attributed to them. In any case, any substantial interference with fundamental rights must be justified by sufficiently weighty reasons relating to the public interest, based on an assessment of the dangers or risks that are realistically recognisable amongst such fears and values. At any event, if existing legally protected interests resulting from legitimate expectations - namely investments whose continued existence is protected - are thus devalued, the mere political desire to respond to changes in values amongst the population will often not sustain sudden changes of policy. But if, as here (C I 3 c cc (1) (c) above, paras. 303 and 304), there are weighty public interests substantiating the associated interference, and if the matter concerns the evaluation of a high-risk technology whose risks of causing damage, in light of an extremely low probability of occurrence, on the one hand, but an extremely extensive scope of possible damage, on the other hand, are particularly dependent on political assessment and specifically also on public acceptance (cf. previously BVerfGE 49, 89 <127>), this may also ascribe a weight to events that only change the public's awareness of such risks without bringing new dangers to light. Consequently it is not objectionable that the legislature was reacting to the events in Fukushima even though no new finding as to dangers could be derived from them. [308]

The additional output allowances granted in 2010 are worthy of protection to only a small degree, for lack of an act accomplished by the companies themselves and for lack of a legitimate expectation that those allowances would continue. This justifies their revocation even without compensation. […] [309]

(2) The determination of the content and limits of property under the 13th AtG Amendment cannot, however, reasonably be imposed insofar as it means that Vattenfall and RWE are unable to use up, within their corporations, substantial parts of the residual electricity volumes from 2002 (electricity volumes under Appendix 3 column 2 AtG) at their plants due to the statutorily fixed operational lifetimes, while E.ON and EnBW, in contrast, have more electricity production capacity than they need in order to use up their residual electricity volumes from 2002. [310]

Neither Vattenfall nor RWE will be able to use all - or almost all - of the residual electricity volumes allocated to them in 2002 by the time when they shut down all the power plants that belong in whole or in part to their corporations ((a)). The interference with property weighs heavily, especially in light of the legal background of the residual electricity volumes allocated in 2002 and the unequal treatment in comparison to competing enterprises ((b)). It is true that the interference faces weighty public interests ((c)). Ultimately, however, the interference with property is not reasonable ((d)). [311]

The prevention of the production of the residual electricity volumes from 2002 is the relevant point of reference in assessing whether the burdens imposed on the complainants by the 13th AtG Amendment are reasonable. However, the assessment here no longer depends solely on the figure of a 32-year operational lifetime that is important in amortising the plants and ensuring an adequate profit, as was assumed as a basis for the Atomic Consensus Agreement (Atomkonsensvereinbarung) and the Phase-Out Amendment Act implementing that agreement. The 32-year operational lifetime was already included as a conversion factor in calculating the reference volumes in the original phase-out decision, and has been reflected ever since in the residual electricity volume (see A I 2 a aa and b above, paras. 5 and 8 et seq.). Therefore, since this system was introduced, appropriate amortisation and reliable profit from a nuclear power plant no longer depends primarily on 32 years of operation, but instead on the possibility of generating electricity in the amount of the residual electricity volumes. [312]

(a) As a consequence of the introduction of the fixed shut-down dates for the nuclear power plants (§ 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG), in combination with the limited possibilities of transfer (§ 7 sec. 1b AtG), two of the complainants will no longer be able to produce all of the residual electricity volumes allocated by the Phase-Out Amendment Act at their own corporations' nuclear power plants. [313]

(aa) […] [314]

(bb) The parties' arguments and the oral hearing showed that in all probability, all nuclear power plants that are allowed to operate beyond 6 August 2011 will be able to use up all the residual electricity volumes allocated to them in 2002 before their respective binding shut-down dates under § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 no. 2 - 6 AtG. [315]

However, this does not apply to the nuclear power plants in the group under § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 no. 1 AtG, which lost their entitlement to produce electricity when the 13th AtG Amendment entered into force, nor to the residual electricity volumes allocated to the Mülheim-Kärlich nuclear power plant. […] The table below provides details of the residual electricity volumes allocated to the individual nuclear power plants belonging to the first group under § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 no. 1 AtG and to the Mülheim-Kärlich nuclear power plant, and not yet used on 6 August 2011. (cc) A projection of the extent to which these residual electricity volumes can be used up within the remaining operating periods after being transferred to still-operable nuclear power plants, on top of those plants' own volumes, must be based on the corporation's own and internal estimation ((a)). This Senate's respective inquiry was not answered uniformly by the parties to the constitutional complaint proceedings ((b)). [317]

(α) Projections of the possible consumption of residual electricity volumes depend on the corporations' own and internal estimations. [318]

As part of the review of their property's determination of content and limits in terms of proportionality, the complainants must note that they may transfer electricity volumes that are no longer usable at one nuclear power plant, because that plant's shutoff date has been reached, to another nuclear power plant within their own corporation, or proportionally to one in which they hold at least a share of the ownership. It is reasonable to assume that the transferring nuclear power plant can obtain an adequate selling price, as all parts of the corporation ultimately have the same interests. Even if the selling power plant obtains only an inadequate price - measured in terms of the profit attainable by producing electricity itself - the normally equivalent increase in profit from producing electricity at the recipient nuclear power plant will still remain within the corporation, so that a uniform consideration is justified also in that respect. [319]

Other conditions, however, apply with regard to transfers beyond the corporation's sphere. According to the parties' largely coinciding projections, which substantially agree in this regard (C I 3 c cc (2) (a) (cc) (b) below, para. 327), there will be only two potential buyers (E.ON and EnBW) to take over the residual electricity volumes no longer usable within the corporation. Of these, E.ON holds two-thirds to three-quarters of the buyer power, depending on the projection. Here both buyers have only limited additional electricity production capacity, which does not fully cover the supply, and they will thus only take over residual electricity volumes if this pays off for them economically; they can therefore largely determine the price themselves. Under these circumstances, from the selling entities' viewpoint, a transfer of residual electricity volumes is not an entirely reasonable exploitation option. [320]

(β) The discrepancies in the parties' projections concerning the electricity volumes that can still be produced depend on their different assumptions as to the degree of utilisation that can realistically be expected from the individual nuclear power plants on which they based their calculations. All parties rightly assume that a 100% utilisation rate, over a longer period of time, has so far not yet materialised at a nuclear power plant, and therefore projections of future consumption cannot be based on such an assumption either, especially because in addition to the typical uncertainty factors, such as technically required downtime or the evolution of the electricity market, unpredictable shut-down-related factors such as the cost-effectiveness of nuclear fuel replacements or other measures to enhance fitness come increasingly into play in light of impending shut-down dates. [321]

(dd) There is no need to decide here which of the different projection approaches should govern the review of the legislative decision. While the complainants, as well as Greenpeace, base their projections on an extrapolation of statistically calculated levels of utilisation, the Federal Government takes as a basis the annual reference volumes, which are statistically calculated as a starting point, with reference to the annual utilisation between 1990 and 1999, but are otherwise set by law; the government figure furthermore pursued the goal of establishing a rather generous calculation basis for the Atomic Consensus - at that time, in favour of the operators of nuclear power plants. Even if one adopts the Federal Government's relatively optimistic utilisation assumptions, this leads to the conclusion that the residual electricity volume which RWE and Vattenfall will lo longer be able to use up within their own nuclear power plants would be so substantial that the determination of content and limits proves to be unreasonable (C I 3 c cc (2) (d) below, paras. 364 et seq.) in light of the special legitimate expectation to which the nuclear power plant operators are entitled here (C I 3 c cc (2) (b) (bb) below, paras. 334 et seq.) and the detriment that results in comparison to the other companies (C I 3 c cc (2) (b) (cc) below, paras. 347 et seq.).

(b) The interference with the property of complainants Vattenfall and RWE because of the inability to use up the residual electricity volumes from 2002 that can no longer be produced within the corporation, owing to the fixed shut-down dates, is significant. It is substantial in quantity ((aa)) and because of the special circumstances of its creation, it affects an ownership interest that enjoys elevated protection against change ((bb)). Furthermore, it places these complainants at a disadvantage in relation to competing companies ((cc)). [329]

(aa) The volume of electricity allocations that cannot be used within the corporation is substantial in Vattenfall's and RWE's case. [330]

(α) Depending on the projection, complainant Vattenfall will not longer be able to produce either 46,651 GWh or 45,890 GWh of the residual electricity volumes allocated in 2002. Based on the information about electricity volumes generated at still-operating nuclear power plants for 2000 through 2014 in columns 3 and 4 of the notice of the Federal Radiation Protection Office of 31 October 2015 (A VI 1 above, para. 166), this is equivalent to an average of approximately four and a half years' worth of production at a nuclear power plant. Thus about 30% of the originally allocated residual electricity volume can presumably not be produced within the corporation. If one sets this production deficit in relation to the residual electricity volume of 70,273 GWh that was still available to complainant Vattenfall at the end of 2010, the share of the electricity volume that can no longer be produced even amounts to about 66%. The interference caused by the 13th AtG Amendment in complainant Vattenfall's use authorisation for its nuclear power plants, as certificated with the residual electricity volumes from 2002, is therefore serious even in quantitative terms. [331]

It cannot ultimately be argued against this conclusion that the projected production deficit was caused by downtime at the Krümmel nuclear power plant for which complainants Krümmel and Vattenfall were responsible, and therefore should not have been taken into account when the legislature set the shut-down dates. This argumentation is not convincing with regard to the relevant period at issue here, i.e. the period prior to the entry into force of the 13th AtG Amendment in August 2011. After the nuclear phase-out under the 2002 legislation, the nuclear power plant operators were acting within a legal situation that set the end of the phase-out, barring further notice, by means of the residual electricity volumes, rather than with specific shutdown dates. It was permissible for the operators to orient their business operations to that situation and therefore they also did not have to carry out the production of the residual electricity volumes allocated to them under any particular time pressure. Within the limits thus established they could also allow for technically occasioned downtime. Ultimately, neither the oral hearing nor the parties' arguments suggest that complainants Krümmel and Vattenfall deliberately undermined the legislation's objective of terminating the peaceful use of nuclear energy as soon as possible. [332]

(β) For complainant RWE, the residual electricity volume that presumably cannot be produced within the corporation amounts to at least 35,821 GWh, and at most 42,079 GWh, depending on the projection. This too is equivalent to approximately four years' worth of production at a nuclear power plant. Measured against the residual electricity volume allocated to the corporation in 2002, however, this represents only between 5% and 6%, yet measured against RWE's residual electricity volume remaining at the end of 2010, it amounts to between 19% and 22%. Therefore the interference with property for complainant RWE is not inconsiderable either. [333]

(bb) The inability to use up the residual electricity volumes from 2002 that cannot be produced within the corporation because of the fixed shut-down dates affects property interests that are particularly protected against interference here because of special circumstances.

As a specific embodiment of the right to use the nuclear power plants, the residual electricity volumes allocated in 2002 do originally share the general character of property in nuclear plants, which in virtue of its particular nature and function does not primarily serve the personal freedom of the individual, but is characterised by a strong social dimension (C I 1 a and C I 3 c cc (1) (b) (aa) above, paras. 216 as well as 297 and 298). As far as the residual electricity volumes under the Phase-Out Amendment Act are concerned, the complainants' ownership for use, unlike the additional output allowances allocated in 2010 under the 11th AtG Amendment (C I 3 c cc (1) (b) (bb) above, paras. 299 et seq.), enjoys particular protection because these residual electricity volumes are the core matter of a transitional provision. [334]

In general, a transitional provision adopted by the legislature for reasons of protecting legitimate expectations can be amended only under special conditions ((a)). The residual electricity volumes are part of a transitional provision intended to provide a special degree of protection with regard to legitimate expectations ((b)). The expectation that the regulated residual electricity volumes will continue is also especially worthy of protection because those volumes have the function of compensating for restrictions of property elsewhere ((c)). This particularly applies to the electricity volumes at Mülheim-Kärlich ((d)). [335]

(α) If the legislature frustrates the legitimate expectation of the continuance of a limited transitional provision that it adopted to protect legitimate expectations, and eliminates that provision before its originally intended scope is exhausted, to the detriment of the entitled persons, it can in any case do so only subject to special requirements from the viewpoint of protecting legitimate expectation under the rule of law. Such a case is not a matter of protecting citizens' legitimate expectation of the continuation of applicable law in general. Here the citizen instead relies on the continuity of a provision according to which old law, or a particular transitional provision, continues to apply for a certain time to a limited group of persons upon the finding that such continuance is compatible with the public interest. By adopting such a provision, the legislature has established a special situation of legitimate expectation. To revoke it prematurely, or amend it to the detriment of the persons concerned, it does not suffice that a political assessment of the associated and tolerated dangers, risks or disadvantages to the general public has changed. Instead - provided the concerned persons' interest in the continuance of the provision is worthy of protection and is of sufficient weight - it is also necessary that keeping the applicable transitional provision in force must be expected to cause serious detriment to important common interests (cf. BVerfGE 102, 68 <97 and 98>; likewise BVerfGE 116, 96 <131>). [336]

(β) The residual electricity volumes allocated in 2002 are part of a transitional provision which, according to the historical development, reasons and design of the Phase-Out Amendment Act of 2002, were intended to provide a special protection of legitimate expectations. The historical development, reasons and design of the residual electricity volume provision leave no doubt that both the Federal Government and the legislature intended to guarantee that energy suppliers in the sector of nuclear power plants would have a reliable basis for their economic activities during the period of use remaining after the phase-out decision, and this included the continuance of the residual electricity volumes granted in 2002. [337]

In the Phase-Out Amendment Act of 2002, the legislature resolved on a phase-out of nuclear energy, and at the same time declaredly implemented the core points of the Consensus Agreement (cf. statement of reasons for the legislative proposal from the SPD and BÜNDNIS 90/DIE GRÜNEN parliamentary parties, BTDrucks 14/6890, p. 1; A I 2 b aa above, para. 9). The statement of reasons for the legislative proposal expressly reproduces the passage from the Consensus Agreement in which the Federal Government guarantees the undisturbed operation of the plants during the remaining term, subject to the conditions stated therein (BTDrucks 14/6890, p. 13). [340]

The statement of reasons for the legislative proposal views the design of the residual electricity volumes as a proportionate structuring of the concerned companies' property. It was said to ensure that the operators would be able to amortise their investments and furthermore obtain an adequate profit. All in all, together with certain other clarifications, the measures thus contributed "significantly towards protecting legitimate expectation" (cf. BTDrucks 14/6890, p. 16). [341]

The mention in the statement of reasons for the legislative proposal that "the exact date of expiry of the entitlement to produce power at a nuclear power plant (…)" did not need to be "rigidly set at the present time" (cf. BTDrucks 14/6890, p. 13) at most reveals a reservation of the option to set fixed end dates later, but cannot undermine the legitimate expectation of the guarantee of value of the residual electricity volumes, which according to the concept of the legislative provision would also have to be taken into account if a time limit were set later. [342]

[…] [343]

(χ) The expectation of a temporally unlimited and generally undiminished possibility of using the residual electricity volumes from 2002 is also especially worthy of protection because of its compensatory nature. These residual electricity volumes were supposed to compensate for the loss that the Phase-Out Amendment Act caused to the hitherto non-time-limited possibility of using the nuclear power plants, to an extent that would ensure the amortisation of the plants and an adequate profit, and thus help preserve the proportionality of the phase-out decision (cf. BTDrucks 14/6890, pp. 15 and 16). [344]

Ownership of the plants and the possibility of their use that existed until that time were founded substantially on acts accomplished by the power plant owners themselves, who bore the investments and maintenance, and thus enjoyed protection of property. The fact that the peaceful use of nuclear agency was subsidised by large amounts of public funding for decades did not stand to prevent the development of ownership of the plants for private benefit, any more than it did with other technologies subsidised by the state. Such support can in many regards give the legislature greater leeway in structuring the content and limits of this property, but it does not devalue the property and the associated authority to use the plants for profitable ends. The residual electricity volumes are a form of compensation for the termination of the previously non-time-limited possibility of using this property, and therefore - unlike the politically motivated allocation of additional output allowances in the 11th AtG Amendment (C I 3 c cc (1) (b) (bb) above, paras. 299 et seq.) - enjoy the same quality of protection of property in the plants and of the possibility of use that existed until 2002. [345]

(δ) The residual electricity volumes allocated to the Mülheim-Kärlich nuclear power plant enjoy all the more a protection of trust in their continuation and protection of legitimate expectations. They too were allocated by the 2002 Phase-Out Amendment, even though the nuclear power plant had already been permanently shut down in 2001. The volumes were allocated in the course of an amicable settlement in return for the cessation of public liability proceedings against the Land of Rhineland-Palatinate and for the withdrawal of an application for the issuing of an authorisation under atomic energy law for that nuclear power plant (A I 2 a bb above, paras. 6 and 7). Unlike the other residual electricity volumes, this allocation could thus not be the subject matter of a guarantee of a remaining operational lifetime for the Mülheim- Kärlich nuclear power plant, within which the power plant would be amortised. Instead, this residual electricity volume was granted - in a way not linked to the operation of a particular power plant - in return for a waiver of asserting a pecuniary claim. Therefore this residual electricity volume has a somewhat distinct nature (C I 1 b bb (b) above, para. 238). [346]

(cc) The fact that some of the residual electricity volume from 2002 can no longer be used within the corporation because of the fixed shut-down dates imposes an additional burden on complainants RWE and Vattenfall because without a sufficient justifying reason, they are thereby placed at a disadvantage against the competing firms E.ON and EnBW, which can use up all of their residual electricity volumes within the operational lifetime of their power plants. [347]

(α) In determining the content of owners' powers and obligations under Art. 14 sec. 1 GG, the legislature is also bound by the principle of equality under Art. 3 sec. 1 GG (cf. BVerfGE 21, 73 <84>; 34, 139 <146>; 37, 132 <143>; 49, 382 <395>; 87, 114 <139>; 102, 1 <16 and 17>). Therefore, burdens that structure ownership must be distributed equally if their circumstances are essentially the same, and differentiations are always in need of justification by objective reasons that are appropriate to the objective and scope of the unequal treatment (cf. BVerfGE 126, 400 <416>; 129, 49 <69>; 132, 179 <188 para. 30>). [348]

(β) The staggering of the residual operating times of the nuclear power plants places Vattenfall and RWE at a disadvantage in terms of the ability to produce the residual electricity volumes. The staggered timing of the end of the licence to produce power according to the six power plant groups in § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG, in conjunction with the provisions on the possibilities for transferring electricity volumes in § 7 sec. 1b AtG, has the result that in all probability, only Vattenfall and RWE will be unable, to any extent worth mentioning, to produce the residual electricity volumes allocated to their power plants in 2002. [349]

Accordingly it had to be assumed that E.ON, at its nuclear power plants still licenced to operate after 6 August 2011, would indisputably not only be able to use up all the residual electricity volumes allocated to those plants and left over from the nuclear power plants already shut down at 6 August 2011, but in addition would in any case have more than 35,000 GWh of further electricity production capacity available. Equivalent considerations apply to EnBW, with an expected capacity surplus of at least 9,000 GWh. [350]

Vattenfall, in contrast, according to concurring projections, will be unable to generate approximately 46,000 GWh of this electricity volume at power plants belonging to the corporation. This figure amounts to approximately 30% of the residual electricity volume allocated in 2002, or more than 60% of the volumes still remaining at the end of 2010. [351]

Complainant RWE is also to a significant extent placed in a poorer position than its competitors E.ON und EnBW with regard to the scope of the expected ability to produce the residual electricity volumes allocated to it. After the operational lifetimes of its nuclear power plants end, RWE will have residual electrical volume from 2002 that cannot be used within the corporation, in amounts that vary between nearly 36,000 GWh and more than 42,000 GWh, depending on the projection calculation. Although these figures represent only 5% to 6% of the residual electricity volume allocated in 2002 (C I 3 c cc (2) (a) (cc) (b) above, para. 327), in absolute figures the adverse position of RWE compared to E.ON and EnBW is considerable, equivalent to approximately four years' worth of production at a nuclear power plant, speaking only of the residual electricity volumes that can no longer be used. [352]

(χ) No adequate objective reason is evident for the unequal treatment of RWE ((αα)) and Vattenfall ((ββ)) in comparison to E.ON and EnBW with regard to the electric production deficits. These do not merely constitute acceptable forecasting inaccuracies either ((χχ)). Nor is the unequal treatment supported by legislative powers to categorise and consolidate ((δδ)). [353]

(αα) The electricity production deficit that can be expected for complainant RWE has its primary cause in the substantial Mülheim-Kärlich electricity volume allocated to RWE (C I 3 c cc (2) (a) (bb) above, para. 316). Even in 2000/2002, this electricity volume was not matched by any operable RWE-owned nuclear power plant to which the volume could originally have been allocated. The legislature enacting the 13th AtG Amendment should have taken this into account in allocating the respective volume of electric production capacity for each corporation, which was ultimately carried out by staggering the shut-down dates. It is true that when all nuclear power plants wholly or partially held by RWE are taken together, this staggering yields both an operational lifetime surplus well beyond the 32-year limit (Table C I 3 d below, para. 387), and also - if the Mülheim-Kärlich volumes are set aside - a surplus of electricity production capacity. However, these are able to absorb only about half of the Mülheim-Kärlich electricity volumes available at the time when the 13th AtG Amendment was enacted. In contrast, there is no evident objective reason why E.ON and EnBW should ultimately be able to use up all their electricity volume and even have surplus capacity available. At any rate, the objective of accelerating the nuclear phase-out pursued by the legislature with the 13th AtG Amendment (C I 3 c aa above, paras. 282 and 283) does not justify this unequal treatment. Neither the legislative background materials nor the arguments put forward by the parties to the proceedings show that the intended acceleration objective was supposed to be achieved precisely through this placement of RWE at a disadvantage. Considering the extensive capacity surpluses identified in the case of E.ON and EnBW, respectively (C I 3 c cc (2) (a) above, paras. 313 et seq.), there is also nothing in this matter that argues that placing RWE at a disadvantage would have been the only way to accelerate the phase-out. [354]

(ββ) Equivalent considerations apply to Vattenfall. In absolute figures (approximately 45,000 GWh), its disadvantage against E.ON and EnBW in terms of the expected electricity production deficit is approximately the same as that of RWE. The principal reason for the residual electricity volumes that will presumably not be usable within the corporation is the categorisation of the Krümmel nuclear power plant under the first shut-down group as set out in § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 no. 1 AtG. Vattenfall has no other nuclear power plants with noteworthy surplus capacity. [355]

As far as the Krümmel nuclear power plant is concerned, there is no reason to believe that assigning it to the first shut-down group, with the associated placement of Vattenfall at a disadvantage against E.ON and EnBW, was necessary in order to achieve the acceleration objective of the 13th AtG Amendment, or that the detriment could not have been avoided by grouping the nuclear power plants differently, or compensated in some other way, without reducing the acceleration effect (D II 2 below, paras. 403 et seq.). [356]

Assigning the Krümmel nuclear power plant to the first group under § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG terminated its licence to produce power as early as the end of the day on 6 August 2011, and therefore limits its operational lifetime to only 27.36 years. That is 4.5 years less than the 32 years that were promised to operators under the Atomic Compromise. The full term has largely been maintained otherwise under the legislative provisions for all other nuclear power plants, and according to the legislative intent of the 13th AtG Amendment was still supposed to be maintained even after the introduction of fixed shut-down times (cf. statement of reasons for the legislative proposal, BTDrucks 17/6070, p. 6). [357]

On the evidence of the statement of reasons for the legislative proposal, the staggering of operational lifetimes under § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG was intended not only to support the actual purpose of acceleration, but also to ensure that the companies concerned were not affected disproportionately in their fundamental right under Art. 14 sec.1 GG; the standard operational lifetime of 32 years was meant to ensure that this objective can be met (cf. BTDrucks 17/6070, p. 6). Furthermore, the staggering was supposed to guarantee security of energy supply (loc. cit., p. 7). Neither aspect can justify assigning the Krümmel nuclear power plant to the first group. This nuclear power plant is the only one that falls well short of the 32-year standard operational lifetime. It is not evident to what extent the idea of guaranteeing security of supply is supposed to require shutting down the Krümmel plant earlier. It is not evident, nor has it been argued, that the Krümmel power plant had to be included in the first group because this was the only way to ensure security of supply in certain regions of Germany through the longer operation of other nuclear power plants, while at the same time maintaining the general objective of accelerating the nuclear phase-out. [358]

Nor can the assignment to the first shut-down group be explained by reasons of op-erating safety at the Krümmel nuclear power plant, which were in fact not put forward by the Federal Government in particular before the constitutional complaint proceedings. Granted, recourse to reasons for differentiation that are adduced only later is not precluded by the fact that these reasons were not yet recognisable clearly enough from the legislation itself. Only for steering legislation has the Federal Constitutional Court required that the steering purpose must be supported by a recognisable decision of the legislature, especially in tax law (cf. BVerfGE 117, 1 <32> with referral to BVerfGE 93, 121 <147 and 148>; 99, 280 <296>; 105, 73 <112>; 110, 274 <293>) but also elsewhere (cf. BVerfGE 140, 65 <85 para. 45> with referral to BVerfGE 118, 79 <101>). Otherwise it is sufficient if a law ultimately proves to be constitutional (cf. BVerfGE 140, 65 <79 and 80 para. 33>). However, the 13th AtG Amendment is not a law with such a steering purpose. [359]

However, in point of fact, the safety aspect does not justify the unequal treatment. No specific, current safety shortcomings at the Krümmel nuclear power plant have been mentioned. It has not been contended in a substantiated form that specific security concerns would have conflicted with the resumption of operation at the Krümmel nuclear power plant that was planned, according to the arguments of complainants Krümmel and Vattenfall, to take place at the end of 2011. Moreover, concerns of that nature should have been met using the instruments provided for such purposes in the Atomic Energy Act. The age of the nuclear power plant in and of itself also does not support inclusion in the first group, because the Krümmel nuclear power plant started operation on 28 March 1984, and therefore later than, for example, the Grafenrheinfeld nuclear power plant that appears in § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 no. 2 AtG. Finally, the placement of Krümmel at a significant disadvantage cannot be explained by the fact that the Krümmel nuclear power plant still belongs to the 69 line of boiling water reactors, all other still-operating members of which also lost their entitlement to produce power in August 2011 by inclusion in the first group. Merely the statistically higher number of reportable events for this type of reactor, without specific findings of inadequacies in the particular reactor concerned, does not justify placing Krümmel at a disadvantage with such adverse consequences for its electric production capacity. [360]

(χχ) Neither do the complainants concerned have to accept unequal treatment in terms of the ability to produce electricity within the corporation as an inevitable projection inaccuracy of the legislature. […] [361]

(δδ) Nor are the electricity production deficits that are imposed only on complainants Vattenfall and Krümmel justified from the viewpoint of legislative powers to categorise and consolidate (cf. in this respect BVerfGE 84, 348 <359 and 360>; 126, 268 <278 and 279>; 133, 377 <412 and 413 paras. 86 et seq.> each with further references). […] [362]

(c) […] [363]

(d) In an overall balance with the public good, which favours the accelerated shutdown of the nuclear power plants, interferences with the property of complainants Krümmel/Vattenfall and RWE linked to the fixed shut-down dates and the expectable production deficit for the residual electricity volumes from 2002, proves to be untenable. [364]

The expected interferences in these complainants' property affect interests particularly worth protecting in terms of existing legitimate expectations; what is more, they were granted to the complainants even before the 13th AtG Amendment was adopted, not least so as to protect such legitimate expectations. Furthermore, the burdens, amounting to a combined total of between approximately 81,000 and 88,000 GWh of residual electricity volume from 2002 that can no longer be produced, are high both in absolute figures and in relation to the residual electricity volumes still available under the legislative decision on the 13th AtG

Amendment, and furthermore in proportion to the residual electricity volumes originally allocated to them by the Phase-Out Amendment Act (Table in C I 3 c cc (2) (a) (cc) (b) above, para. 327). Furthermore, the competing companies are not equally affected by these factors; only Krümmel/Vattenfall and RWE are encumbered with ultimately inadequate electricity production capacity, lacking adequate objective reasons. [365]

Then again, there are concerns relating to the fundamentally high-value protected interests of the life and health of the people (Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 1 GG) and the natural foundations of life (Art. 20a GG), which the acceleration of the nuclear phase-out contributes to. Nonetheless, a provision that avoided the electricity production deficits would have had only a relatively minor adverse effect on these public interests - even if a solution had been sought by way of a corresponding prolongation of the operational lifetimes of individual nuclear power plants of the complainants concerned. The volume of electricity involved is approximately eight and a half years' worth of a nuclear power plant's production - a volume which will presumably go unproduced under the challenged legal situation. In contrast, the total residual electricity volumes of 2,623,310 GWh (Table in C I 3 c cc (2) (a) (cc) (b) above, para. 327) allocated to the nuclear power plants in 2002 under the Phase-Out Amendment Act were equivalent to […] about 262 years' worth of output, assuming a nuclear power plant's average annual production to be 10,000 GWh. Here it must also be borne in mind that according to the staggered remaining operational lifetimes set in the 13th AtG Amendment, plants of E.ON and EnBW can legally be operated longer than will presumably be the case in practice, given the remaining residual electricity volumes within their corporations. Measured against this framework that the legislature itself, in the 13th AtG Amendment, set for its intended public-interest objective by way of the total remaining operating lifetimes, the detriment to the public interest resulting from a provision that would allow the production of RWE and Vattenfall' residual volumes would therefore even be significantly less. Furthermore, the production deficits could also have been avoided by staggering the specific shutdown dates differently for the individual power plants, even without calling the intended overall phase-out date into question. [366]

Ultimately, however, the electricity production deficit likely to arise in the case of the complainants Vattenfall and Krümmel is especially high, both in absolute terms and in relation to the residual electricity volumes originally allocated, and particularly when measured by the residual electricity volume that was left at the end of 2010. It is therefore so substantial in quantity that in an overall balance between protection of property and particular protection of legitimate expectation, as well as between the disadvantaged position against competing companies, on the one hand, caused by the deficit, and the reasons of public interest that argue in favour of the provision, on the other hand, it cannot reasonably be imposed on the owners. [367]

The electric production deficit for RWE is significantly lower in proportion to the original residual electricity volumes, but it is nevertheless considerable in absolute terms. […] [368]

(3) The 13th AtG Amendment violates Art. 14 sec. 1 GG insofar as it does not provide for any transitional periods, compensation clauses or other settlement provisions for cases in which investments in nuclear power plants were devalued through the revocation of the additional electricity output allowances allocated in 2010. [369]

However, the energy corporations' payments under the Development Fund Agreement (Förderfondsvertrag) (A I 3 b bb above, para. 21), adduced by the complainants in this context, are not expenditures frustrated by the 13th AtG Amendment for which a settlement provision should have been provided by that legislation. Whether, to what extent, and under what conditions the complainants' payments made in that connection must be refunded is a question that must be clarified first of all within the underlying contractual relationship. [370]

Subject to certain conditions, Art. 14 sec. 1 GG protects the legitimate expectation that the legal situation serving as a basis for investing in, and using, property will not change ((a)). Settlement provisions for frustrated investments ((b)) did not have to be provided in respect of the 2002 residual electricity volumes ((b) (aa)), but they should have been provided in respect of investments for the 2010 additional output allowances ((b) (bb)). [371]

(a) In Art. 14 sec. 1 GG, the principle under the rule of law of protecting legitimate expectations with regard to financial assets is distinctly refined (cf. BVerfGE 58, 81 <120>). It protects trust in the reliability and predictability of the legal system created under the applicability of the Basic Law, and of the rights acquired on the basis of that system (cf. BVerfGE 101, 239 <262>; 132, 302 <317>; 135, 1 <21 para. 60>). The fundamental right to property therefore also protects a legitimate expectation of the continuance of the legal situation as a foundation for investments in, and the use of, property. Whether and to what extent such an expectation is legitimate depends on the circumstances of the particular case. There is no guarantee that all investment expectations will be fulfilled. In particular, Art. 14 sec. 1 GG generally provides no protection against changes in the legal environment for commercial activity, or the effects of that environment on market opportunities. However, if the legislature directly suppresses or significantly restricts the further use of property, investments in such property made on the basis of the legitimate expectation that the legal situation will not change call for appropriate consideration, under the principle of proportionality, with regard to both whether and how a settlement should be provided. In this regard, the legislature has broad leeway in designing transitions for existing legal situations, entitlements, and legal relationships. In particular, when changing systems and restructuring legal situations, the Constitution does not require the legislature to spare concerned persons from all burdens or to address every special burden with a transitional provision (cf. BVerfGE 131, 47 <57 and 58>). In any case, a compensating settlement for devalued investments in property is not necessary if the legislature compensates for the restriction of usability of the property in some other way; double compensation is not permissible. [372]

(b) Measured against this standard, the 13th AtG Amendment is unconstitutional insofar as it does not provide for any settlement with regard to frustrated investments. [373]

(aa) However, insofar as investments were made in reliance on the ability to produce essentially all of the 2002 residual electricity volumes, there is no need for a separate settlement provision. To that extent, in regard to the deficit in electricity production, the legislature must already provide adequate compensation, a prolongation of operational lifetimes, or some other form of settlement (C I 3 c cc (2) (a) above, paras. 313 et seq.) that also appears adequate, from the viewpoint of proportionality, as compensation also for frustrated investments. As there will be electricity production or a legal surrogate for these volumes, investments made cannot be regarded as frustrated. Double compensation for both residual electricity volumes that cannot be used up as well as for frustrated investments is constitutionally impermissible. [374]

(bb) The 13th AtG Amendment should have provided an appropriate settlement for investments that were made in the nuclear power plants with a view to producing the additional output allowances allocated at the end of 2010, and that were devalued by the revocation of these volumes at the beginning of August 2011. [375]

(α) In principle, the circumstances were such that legitimate expectations worthy of protection could arise. It is true that there was no constitutional impediment for the legislature to eliminate the additional residual volumes granted under the 11th AtG Amendment without at the same time providing compensation for the fact that the additional volumes cannot be used (C I 3 c cc (1) above, paras. 292 et seq.). All the same, the power plant operators' expectation of the benefits from power plant investments they made to produce these amounts of electricity deserves protection in general. The declared basis for the 11th AtG Amendment was the legislature's political decision to continue using nuclear energy as a bridging technology for a longer period of time. The power plant operators were entitled to feel encouraged as a consequence to undertake investments in their plants, and did not have to expect that within the same legislative period, the legislature would again distance itself from its fundamental decision in energy policy matters under the 11th AtG Amendment. [376]

Legitimate expectations could arise, however, only within the short period between the Bundestag resolution on the 11th AtG Amendment on 28 October 2010 and the notice from the Federal Ministry for the Environment, Nature Conservation and Nuclear Safety (Bundesministerium für Umwelt, Naturschutz und Reaktorsicherheit) of 16 March 2011 on the Nuclear Energy Moratorium. Contrary to the opinion advanced by some of the complainants, legitimate expectations of the prolongation of operational lifetimes could not already arise upon the corresponding declaration of intent in the Coalition Agreement between the CDU/CSU and FDP parliamentary groups of 26 October 2009, nor at the time of the submission of the legislative proposal for the 11th AtG Amendment in the German Bundestag on 28 September 2010. While the formal submission of a legislative proposal for an amendment may indeed undermine trust in the existing legal situation (C I 3 c cc (2) (b) (bb) (α) above, para. 336 and BVerfGE 132, 302 <324 paras. 55 and 56>), legitimate expectations regarding a new legal situation whose subsequent frustration might have to be compensated with an entitlement to compensation cannot be established until the parliament resolves on the new legislation. Before that time, investors act at their own risk. Given the special circumstances of events at the time, once the notice from the Federal Ministry for the Environment, Nature Conservation and Nuclear Safety of 16 March 2011 was released, the operators of nuclear power plants could no longer have had legitimate expectations in terms of investments made on the basis of the legal situation then in force. [377]

However, it is not prejudicial to the development of a legitimate expectation worthy of protection that the constitutionality of the 11th AtG has been in dispute for years with regard to the fact that it came about without the consent of the Bundesrat. Debate about the constitutionality of a law is not rare. Given that only the Federal Constitutional Court is empowered to decide on the constitutionality of legislation, such debates do not generally call into question a law's suitability to provide a basis of trust for acts of the legal community. [378]

(β) The public interest grounds that prompted the legislature to amend the extensive prolongations of operational lifetimes under the 11th AtG Amendment and to accelerate the nuclear phase-out are of particular weight (C I 3 c cc (1) (c) and (2) (c) above, paras. 303 and 304 as well as 363). Furthermore, the expectation that the additional output allowances allocated at the end of 2010 would be maintained is not highly worthy of protection (C I 3 c cc (1) (b) (bb) above, paras. 299 et seq.). All the same, the paramount public interest grounds for an accelerated nuclear phase-out cannot absolve the legislature of the consequences of those investments that were undertaken during the short period of validity of the 11th AtG Amendment and in the legitimate expectation that the legislature itself had brought about in view of the prolongation of operational lifetimes. [379]

(χ) The inclusion of such an entitlement in the 13th AtG Amendment was not dispensable simply because there were no apparent cases in which it would apply. For example, complainants E.ON and RWE have furnished substantiated arguments that in view of the prolongation of operational lifetimes under the 11th AtG Amendment, investments were made for the Isar 1 and Unterweser nuclear power plants, and that the Biblis A nuclear power plant would have been shut down as early as mid-2011, with no further retrofitting investments, if the 11th AtG Amendment had not entered into force. [380]

(δ) However, it is not the task of this constitutional complaint proceeding to investigate the details of whether and to what extent an adequate compensation is constitutionally required in the investment cases cited by the complainants. [381]

It falls within the legislature's decision-making discretion to define the further details of the requirements and the scope of such an entitlement to compensation. The possibility of granting individual prolongations of operational lifetimes as compensation for frustrated investments also falls within the legislature's decision-making discretion. Insofar as the legislature chose not to consider this latter possibility, in light of the paramount importance the legislature attached to the acceleration objective, it was nevertheless not allowed to refrain from providing at least an entitlement to adequate compensation for frustrated investments. The required compensation does not affect the legislative objective of an acceleration. [382]

(4) Insofar as the complainants claim further interference from the 13th AtG Amendment, including economically relevant impairments, these instances concern constitutionally acceptable determinations of the content and limits of property, when measured against the weighty public interest grounds that favour an acceleration of the nuclear phase-out (C I 3 c aa and cc (1) (c) and (2) (c) above, paras. 282 and 283; also 303 and 304 as well as 363). [383]

[…] [384-385]

d) Because of the resulting electric production deficits, determinations of the content and limits of the complainants' property in the nuclear power plants defined by a staggering the shut-down dates in § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG violates, to the detriment of Krümmel and Vattenfall and to the detriment of RWE, the principle that legislative provisions governing property must be designed consistently with Art. 3 sec. 1 GG (C I 3 a, para. 268 above). Other than that, however, nothing suggests that further violations of equality have occurred. [386]

[…] [387]

The operational lifetimes of different lengths for the individual nuclear power plants, as a result of the staggering of expiry dates of the licence to produce power, violate equality standards with regard to the Krümmel nuclear power plant only. However, in terms of significance, the violation of equality in property law does not extend beyond the unreasonableness that has already been found with regard to the inability to produce the residual electricity volumes dating from 2002 (C I 3 c cc (2) (b) (cc) (c) (bb) above, paras. 355 et seq.). [388]

II. […] [389]

The terms of the 13th AtG Amendment not only structure and restrict property rights in the nuclear plants; they also indirectly interfere with the complainants' occupational freedom in that they accelerate the termination of their business activity in the field of the peaceful use of nuclear energy. Those terms must therefore also be measured against Art. 12 GG (on the joint applicability of freedom of property and occupational freedom cf. BVerfGE 50, 290 <361 and 362>; 110, 141 <166 and 167>; 128, 1 <36 et seq.>). [390]

However, there is no need here to review the challenged legislation more closely in light of Art. 12 GG, because this would yield no further constitutional consequences concerning these provisions than have already been found in addressing the parties' various positions in terms of property law. In this case, the protection of occupational freedom for business activity goes no further than the protection of property rights for the occupational exercise of those rights. [391]

III.

The 13th AtG Amendment, specifically § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG, is not a law that applies merely to a single case, which would be prohibited under Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG. [392]

[…] [393]

Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG provides that insofar as, under the Basic Law, a basic right may be restricted by or pursuant to a law, such law must apply generally and not merely to a single case. This does not exclude governing a single case if the matter is of such a nature that there is only one case of its kind, and governing this singular matter is supported by objective reasons. Ultimately, Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG specifies the general principle of equality, according to which the legislature may not select a single case from amongst a number of matters of the same nature, and subject it to a special rule (cf. BVerfGE 85, 360 <374>; 134, 33 <88 and 89>; 139, 148 <176 para. 53>). [394]

Measured against this standard, § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG does not violate the prohibition of laws that apply merely to a single case and limit fundamental rights. […] The act also does not select a single case or a specific group from amongst a plurality of cases of similar nature, but conclusively governs all remaining cases. The requirement of the arbitrary nature of a statutory provision on a single case, against which Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG is intended to protect, is not met here. [395]

D.

I. […] [396-398]

II.

§ 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG must be declared incompatible, to the extent found above, with Art. 14 sec. 1 GG. It must be ordered to remain in effect until the adoption of a new version of the Atomic Energy Act correcting the objected violations of the Constitution. The legislature must draw up new provisions no later than 30 June 2018. [399]

1. The violations of the Constitution identified do not result in a declaration that § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG is void, but merely in a finding that it is incompatible with the Basic Law, together with the order that it will continue to apply until new provisions are enacted. [400]

This is indicated because the legislature has various options for correcting the violations of the Constitution (on this group of cases cf., particularly for violations of equality, BVerfGE 99, 280 <298>; 105, 73 <133>; 107, 27 <57>; 117, 1 <69>; 122, 210 <245>; 126, 400 <431>; established case-law). Furthermore, declaring § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG void would result in a legal situation that would be even less consistent with the situation that the legislature intended, which as such is compatible with the Constitution, than would a time-limited continuation of the legal situation that is found to be unconstitutional (on this case group cf. BVerfGE 83, 130 <154>; 92, 53 <73>; 111, 191 <224>; 117, 163 <201>). [401]

The violations of the Constitution found here do not impinge on the core of the principal objective of the 13th AtG Amendment, the acceleration of the nuclear phaseout. The revocation of the additional output allowances extensively allocated at the end of 2010, the introduction of fixed end dates for the operation of the individual nuclear power plants, and the staggering of the shut-down dates have been found, in principle, to be compatible with the Basic Law. The constitutionally objectionable shortcomings may not be insignificant, yet measured against the overall regulatory scheme they affect only marginal aspects. Therefore to eliminate the entire regulatory scheme by voiding § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG would lack justification. [402]

2. The legislature has various options for correcting the violations of the Constitution found here. [403]

a) The primary reason why the electricity production capacities available to complainants Krümmel and Vattenfall and to complainant RWE are incompatible with Art. 14 sec. 1 GG is that it is entirely unlikely that essentially all the electricity from the residual electricity volumes allocated to them in 2002 can be produced, within the shut-down periods set by § 7 sec. 1a sentence 1 AtG, at nuclear power plants that are wholly or partially owned by the corporation concerned. This might, for example, be taken into account with a corresponding prolongation of the operational lifetimes of individual nuclear power plants that the corporations own. However, the Constitution confers no priority on this possibility; like other possibilities for a settlement, it lies within the political decision-making discretion of the legislature. A compensation for the electricity production deficits might also be provided by ensuring, statutorily, a possibility of transferring, on economically reasonable terms, electricity volumes that can no longer be produced to companies that have surplus electricity production capacity. In particular, however, the legislature is also free to provide an appropriate financial settlement for residual electricity volumes that cannot be produced anymore because of the legislative provision, especially because the legislative decision to support the nuclear phase-out specifies the abandonment of the inventory of nuclear power plants anyway. The settlement also need only achieve a size necessary to meet adequacy requirements; it does not necessarily have to correspond to the full equivalent value. [404]

A new provision that in essence completely remedies the electricity production deficits of complainants Krümmel and Vattenfall and of RWE also remedies their placement at a disadvantage in violation of equality. [405]

b) A legislative basis for settlement claims for frustrated investments is in need of more detailed definition by the legislature (C I 3 c cc (3) (b) above, paras. 373 et seq.). [406]

XVI. Citizenship and Extradition - Article 16 of the Basic Law

European Arrest Warrant Act, BVerfGE 113, 273

Explanatory Annotation

If an alleged criminal is arrested in one corner of a country there is usually little that bars his transfer to that part of the country where the alleged crime took place or to another location where the rules of jurisdiction provide for a competent criminal court. These jurisdictional rules are very important in order to secure a fair trial and ensure that the executive does not have an opportunity to interfere with the criminal proceedings, e.g. by bringing the case to trial at a favourable location. In federally organized states additional restrictions may apply. However, on the international plane matters become rather complicated. If an alleged criminal is prosecuted by one country but held in another, the only way to conduct criminal proceedings other than in absentia is to engage in extradition proceedings. This usually requires reciprocal extradition treaties between the countries involved and lengthy proceedings through diplomatic channels. When a country's own citizens are to be extradited the legal situation becomes more difficult yet again.

It is these complex complications that the European Arrest Warrant wants to overcome. The European Arrest Warrant is a European Union Framework Decision, i.e. a legislative act requiring legislative implementation in the Member States.[172] In Germany this was afforded by the European Arrest Warrant Act of 2004.[173] On the basis of this Act the applicant, a German and Syrian national, was to be transferred to Spain to face criminal charges for membership in and support of a terrorist organization (Al-Qaeda). The charges were based on travel to Spain and meetings and telephone conversations with other persons alleged to have relationships to terrorist organizations. The applicant fought extradition on the grounds that much of the activity took place before the European Arrest Warrant came into force and even before Article 16 of the Basic Law had been amended in 2000 to allow for the extradition of German nationals under certain circumstances.[174] In addition, the alleged acts were not, at least at the time of the relevant conduct, punishable under German law and the conduct had not exclusively taken place in Spain.

The Constitutional Court ruled in favour of the applicant and quashed the German implementation act. That was delicate in its own right, as a line had to be drawn between the supremacy of European Union law, which is not subject to review by German courts and the 173 Of 21 July 2004 (European Arrest Warrant Act, Federal Law Gazette (BGBl.) I p. 1748.

174 The amendment had become necessary to comply with Security Council Resolutions 827 and 955, which established, on an ad hoc basis, the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda in The Hague and Arusha. The Statute of the International Criminal Court also requires that own nationals be extradited to face charges there, albeit only on a subsidiary basis if no adequate charges are to be brought at home. Until the amendment of Article 16 in the year 2000, the extradition of a German national to a foreign country had been absolutely impossible.

German Implementation Act. The Court stated that the European Framework Decision had left the national legislator with sufficient discretion and that the German legislator had not used the available discretion to implement the Arrest Warrant in line with the Basic Law. This was crucial in avoiding a constitutional showdown with the European Union. The Framework Decision on the Arrest Warrant stands on shaky democratic ground as it was passed under the third pillar of the European Union without participation - other than consultation - of the European Parliament. Without the necessary discretion in the EU Framework Decision and the resulting opportunity by national Parliaments - and Courts - to safeguard fundamental rights and guarantees, the European Union legislation would have been doomed. The Court explained that extraditions under the European Arrest Warrant must take into account the severe impact such extraditions into a foreign country, with a foreign legal order, a different language and a different legal culture will have for affected individuals. Extraditions of German nationals therefore cannot take place when the criminal activity took place in Germany as that will justify a legitimate expectation that the relevant criminal responsibility lies in Germany as well, unlike in situations in which the alleged acts took place mainly within another state and the accused must therefore have been aware of the fact that the legal order of the host country must be obeyed and sanctions be faced if that is not the case. The Court also held that extraditions cannot take place if the conduct, in cases with a substantial nexus to Germany, i.e. where the alleged criminal activity reaches beyond the territory of the state seeking extradition in significant way, is not punishable under German criminal law because the rule of law in a democratic state requires that every person must be in position to know, in an abstract manner, what is allowed and what is not prohibited by criminal law. Finally the Court also held that the implementation act violated Article 19.4 of the Basic Law because it did not provide for adequate access to the courts for independent review of the decision to extradite.

This decision is important because it sheds light on the difficulty of globalization, in this particular case regionalization in the context of the European Union and the interaction between largely national legal systems such as criminal law with these international institutions. In the context of the European Union the additional constitutional aspect of the supremacy of European Union law added to the complexity. These issues arise not only in Europe or in a European context. Legal protection against the acts of the Security Council of the United Nations is also a problem as evidenced for example by the Kadi-decision of the European Court of Justice.[175] Such actions by the Security Council increasingly affect individuals, for example because of the inclusion in lists with names of people whose assets are to be frozen in the wake of "the war on terror" or they are suffering economic loss through embargo resolutions.

Translation of the European Arrest Warrant Act Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 113, 273*

Headnotes:

1. With its ban on expatriation and extradition, the fundamental right enshrined in Article 16 of the Basic Law guarantees the citizens' special association to the legal system that is established by them. It is commensurate with the citizen's relation to a free democratic polity that the citizen may, in principle, not be excluded from this association.

2. The cooperation that is put into practice in the "Third Pillar" of the European Union in the shape of limited mutual recognition is a way of preserving national identity and statehood in a single European judicial area, which is considerate in terms of subsidiarity (Article 23.1 of the Basic Law).

3. When adopting the Act implementing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, the legislature was obliged to implement the objective of the Framework Decision in such a way that the restriction of the fundamental right to freedom from extradition is proportionate. In particular, the legislature, apart from respecting the essence of the fundamental right guaranteed by Article 16.2 of the Basic Law, has to see to it that the encroachment upon the scope of protection provided by it is considerate. In doing so, the legislature has to take into account that the ban on extradition is precisely supposed to protect, inter alia, the principles of legal certainty and protection of public confidence as regards Germans who are affected by extradition.

4. The confidence of the prosecuted person in his or her own legal system is protected in a particular manner by Article 16.2 of the Basic Law, precisely where the act on which the request for extradition is based shows a significant connecting factor to a foreign country.

Judgment of the Second Senate of 18 July 2005 on the basis of the oral hearing of 13 and 14 April 2005 - 2 BvR 2236/04 -

Facts:

The complainant has German and Syrian citizenship. He is supposed to be extradited to the Kingdom of Spain for prosecution and has been in custody pending extradition since 15 October 2004. A "European arrest warrant" was issued against the complainant by the Central Court of Investigation in Criminal Matters (Juzgado Central de Instrucción) no. 5 of the Audiencia Nacional in Madrid on 16 September 2004. The complainant is charged with participation in a criminal association and with terrorism. He is alleged to have supported the terrorist Al-Qaeda network in financial matters and as concerns the contact between its members as a key figure in the European part of the network. In the European arrest warrant, these charges are based on detailed descriptions of visits to Spain that the complainant had made and of meetings and telephone calls with suspected criminals. On 15 October 2004, the Hamburg Hanseatic Higher Regional Court (Hanseatisches *Ober*landesgericht) issued an arrest warrant against the complainant and ordered his provisional arrest. The court stated that the complainant was charged of having been active in Spain, Germany and Great Britain since 1997 as one of the key figures of the Al-Qaeda terrorist network in the logistic and financial support of this organisation. The complainant was said to have, inter alia, taken part in the purchase of a ship for Osama bin Laden. According to the Court, he had also dealt with the management of the ship, in particular with the transmission of documents and the payment of invoices, and had been bin Laden's permanent interlocutor and assistant in Germany. Apart from this, he was alleged to have travelled to Kosovo at the end of the year 2000 on behalf of the network with the objective of taking an ambulance there to conceal other intentions.

The Higher Regional Court ordered the provisional arrest to continue as arrest, pending extradition.

By order of 23 November 2004, which is challenged here, the Higher Regional Court declared the complainant's extradition admissible.

The judicial authority of the Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg granted extradition on 24 November 2004. The grant was made contingent on the condition that after the imposition of a final and unappealable prison sentence or other sanction, the complainant would be offered to be returned to Germany for the execution of the sentence.

By his constitutional complaint, the complainant challenges the order of the Higher Regional Court that declared his extradition admissible, and furthermore, the decision of the judicial authority of the Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg on an application for a grant of extradition. He asserts the violation of his rights under Article 2.1, Article 3.1, Article 16.2 and Article 19.4 of the Basic Law and of Article 103.2 of the Basic Law.

B.

The admissible constitutional complaint is well-founded.

The European Arrest Warrant Act infringes fundamental rights and is unconstitutional as concerns substantive law (I.). The Act is void (II.). The legal basis of the challenged decisions is unconstitutional; they are therefore overturned (III.).

I.

The European Arrest Warrant Act infringes Article 16.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law because the legislature has not complied with the prerequisites of the qualified provision of legality under Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law when implementing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant. (1.). By excluding recourse to the courts against the grant of extradition to a Member State of the European Union, the European Arrest Warrant Act infringes Article 19.4 of the Basic Law (2.).

70 Years German Basic Law
The German Constitution and its Court

1. German citizens are protected from extradition by the fundamental right under Article 16.2 (a). Pursuant to the second sentence of this provision, the protection can, however, be restricted by law in specific cases (b). As regards the restriction, the legislature is subject to constitutional commitments. These commitments result from the fact that there is a proviso of legality and from the special extent of protection provided by the fundamental right and from the principle of proportionality. When pursuing public interests, the constitution-restricting legislature is obliged to preserve the extent of protection provided by the fundamental right as far as possible; the constitution-restricting legislature may therefore restrict it only in compliance with the principle of proportionality and is to observe other constitutional commitments, such as the guarantee of legal protection under Article 19.4 of the Basic Law (c). The European Arrest Warrant Act does not comply with these constitutional requirements also with a view to the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant (d).

a) With the sentence "No German may be extradited to a foreign country" (Article 16.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law), the Basic Law guaranteed, until its amendment by the Act of 29 November 2000, unrestricted protection for a German citizen from being transferred to a foreign state power. Extradition as a traditional institute of international cooperation of states in criminal matters is characterised as an encroachment upon fundamental rights by the fact that a person is removed by force from the sphere of the domestic jurisdiction and transferred to a foreign jurisdiction (see Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court [Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE] 10, 136 [139]) for criminal proceedings that have been instituted there to be brought to a close or a sentence imposed there to be executed (see BVerfGE 29, 183 [192]).

   Exactly like the ban on expatriation that is connected with it (Article 16.1 of the Basic Law), the ban on extradition (Article 16.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law) is not only an expression of the responsibility that the state claims for its own citizens, but both bans are guaranteed as liberty rights. The purpose of the liberty rights to protection from extradition is not to remove the person affected from a just and lawful sentence (BVerfGE 29, 183 [193]). Instead, its purpose is to ensure that citizens are not removed against their will from the legal system with which they are familiar. To the extent that they reside in the state territory, all citizens are supposed to be protected from the insecurities connected with being sentenced in a legal system that is unknown to them under circumstances that are inscrutable to them (see BVerfGE 29, 183 [193]); see also von Martitz, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, vol. I p. 1888; Mettgenberg, Ein Deutscher darf nicht ausgeliefert werden!, 1925, pp. 6 et seq.; pp. 35 et seq.; Baier, Die Auslieferung von Bürgern der Europäischen Union an Staaten innerhalb und außerhalb der EU, Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht - GA 2001, p. 427 [434 et seq.]).

   With its ban on expatriation and extradition, the fundamental right enshrined in Article 16 of the Basic Law guarantees the citizens' special association to the legal system that is established by them. The citizenship is the legal prerequisite for an equal civic status, which on the one hand establishes equal duties, but on the other hand, and above all, establishes the rights whose guarantee legitimises public authority in a democracy. The civic rights and duties that are connected with the possession of citizenship for every individual are at the same time constituent bases of the entire polity. It is commensurate with the citizen's relation to a free democratic polity that the citizen may, in principle, not be excluded from this association. The citizens' confidence in their secured residence in the territory of the state to which they have a constitutionally guaranteed connection in the shape of the citizenship is also acknowledged by public international law. States are under an obligation under international law to receive their own citizens, i.e. to permit their entry into the state territory and their residence there (see Verdross/Simma, Universelles Völkerrecht, 3rd ed., 1984, s. 1202 with further references; detailed account by Hailbronner, in: id./Renner, Staatsangehörigkeitsrecht, 3rd ed., 2001, Introduction E, marginal nos. 113 et seq.). The right to enter the state territory correlates to the right of the states to extradite foreigners from their state territory.

The fundamental right that guarantees the citizenship and the right to remain in one's own legal system ranks highly. The manner in which it is drafted is based, inter alia, on experience from recent German history in which, immediately after the coup d'état in 1933, the National Socialist dictatorship gradually excluded and expelled, in accordance with the letter of the law, particularly the Germans of Jewish faith or Jewish origin from the protection provided by the German citizenship and by their being part of the German people by devaluing citizenship as an institution and replacing it by a new "national status" for citizens entitled to this status (see s. 2 of the Reich Act on Citizenship (Reichsbürgergesetz) of 15 September 1935, Reich Law Gazette (Reichsgesetzblatt - RGBl) I p. 1146; see Grawert, Staatsvolk und Staatsangehörigkeit, in: Isensee/Kirchhof (eds.), Handbuch des Staatsrechts, vol. II, 3rd ed., 2004, s. 16.1, marginal no. 44). However, behind the guarantee provided by Article 16 of the Basic Law there is also the conviction, shared all over Europe since the French Revolution, that citizens can enjoy their legal status in politics and under civil law only where their status is secured by law (see Randelzhofer, in: Maunz/Dürig, Grundgesetz Kommentar, Article 16.1, marginal no. 2).

To ensure that the ban on extradition does not give a state's own citizens carte blanche for criminal action abroad, and to live up to the state's responsibility for their actions which goes with the state's promise to protect them, the Federal Republic of Germany's punitive power extends, in principle, also to offences committed abroad (see ss. 5 et seq. of the Criminal Code and s. 1 of the Code of Crimes against International Law (Völkerstrafgesetzbuch - VStGB)), so that, as a general rule, it is possible to prosecute offences committed by Germans abroad.

b) The encroachment upon the scope of protection of Article 16.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is justified exclusively under the prerequisites set out in Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. Since the entry into force of Article 1 of the 47th Act to Amend the Basic Law (47. Gesetz zur Änderung des Grundgesetzes) of 29 November 2000 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 1633), the Basic Law permits, under certain conditions, the extradition of a German citizen to a Member State of the European Union or to an international court of justice. To this extent, it also opens the national legal system to European law and to public international law and to international cooperation in the shape of a controlled commitment in order to promote respect of international organisations that preserve peace and liberty and respect of public international law, to promote the growing togetherness of the European peoples in a European Union (Article 23.1 of the Basic Law).

aa) The opening up of such permission to encroach upon the fundamental right to freedom from extradition, which had before been unrestrictedly guaranteed to Germans, has not established unconstitutional constitutional law. An amendment of the Basic Law would be inadmissible if it transgressed the bounds of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. The extradition of Germans does not infringe the principles laid down in Article 1 und Article 20 of the Basic Law, in any case if the commitments to constitutional law are complied with. An extradition of Germans that abides by the principles of the rule of law neither violates their human dignity nor infringes the principles of state structure laid down in Article 20 of the Basic Law (see already BVerfGE 4, 299 [303-304]; 29, 183 [193]).

bb) The extradition also of a state's own citizens corresponds to a general development that takes place on the supranational level and in public international law, against which the Basic Law, with its respect for international law, does not establish insurmountable hurdles. As a member of the United Nations, the Federal Republic of Germany is, pursuant to chapter VII of its Charter, in principle obliged to comply with the resolutions of the United Nations Security Council and to implement them (see Frowein/Krisch, in: Simma (ed.), The Charter of the United Nations, 2nd ed., 2002, vol. 1, p. 701 [708-709], marginal nos. 21 et seq.). Security Council Resolutions 827 and 955, which established, on an ad hoc basis, the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda in The Hague and Arusha, provide for the extradition of a state's own citizens because as a general rule, only this makes the intended international prosecution of presumed war criminals possible (see the Act on Cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (Gesetz über die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof für das ehemalige Jugoslawien) of 10 April 1995, Federal Law Gazette I p. 485, and the Act on Cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (Gesetz für die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Internationalen Strafgerichtshof für Ruanda) of 4 May 1998, Federal Law Gazette I p. 843; see in this context Uhle, Auslieferung und Grundgesetz - Anmerkungen zu Artikel 16 II GG, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift - NJW 2001, p. 1889 [1890]).

The statute of the permanent International Criminal Court in The Hague under the law of international agreements (see Act on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Gesetz zum Römischen Statut des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs) of 17 July 1998 - ICC Statute Act, Federal Law Gazette 2000 II p. 1393, entered into force on 1 July 2002, in its version promulgated on 28 February 2003, Federal Law Gazette 2003 II p. 293) took recourse to these two models in this respect, with the important proviso, however, that international jurisdiction is only established on a subsidiary basis. The States Parties to the Statute have ipso jure the possibility to prevent extradition of their own citizens by adequate national prosecution (as regards the principle of complementary jurisdiction, see Article 1 and Article 17 of the Statute and s. 1.1 of the Act of 21 June 2002 on the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court of 17 July 1998 (Gesetz vom 21. Juni 2002 zur Ausführung des Römischen Statuts des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs vom 17. Juli 1998), Federal Law Gazette I p. 2144). The responsibility for the punishment of certain offences is thus divided by a coordinated assignment of competences. Aware of its special responsibility, and also of the historical reasons for it, the Federal Republic of Germany, as a member of the international community of states, integrates in the process of evolution of an international system of criminal justice for crimes against humanity, which began with the trials of war criminals before the tribunals of Nuremberg and Tokyo after the Second World War (on the prosecution of genocide, see the Order of the Fourth Chamber of the First Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court of 12 December 2000 - 2 BvR 1290/99 -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2001, pp. 1848 et seq.).

As a Member State of the European Union, Germany has entered into further obligations. By ratifying the treaties of Amsterdam and of Nice, the Federal Republic of Germany has undertaken to take part in establishing and developing the "area of freedom, security and justice". The Member States' cooperation takes place within the - intergovernmental - "Third Pillar" of the law of the European Union. In this context, Article 31.1 letter b of the Treaty on European Union also provides to facilitate extradition between Member States. In doing so, the European Union pursues the objective to combine the process of growing together and of opening the borders for persons, goods, services and capital with better cooperation of law enforcement services. This is supposed to be ensured by a further judiciarisation of the relations between the Member States, i.e., inter alia, by the Member State governments' waiver of their political discretion that is customary in the states' conventional legal relations, which exists in particular in the law on extradition - in Germany, precisely in the context of the decision on the application on a grant of extradition.

cc) The possibility of restricting the ban on the extradition of Germans, whose validity had been absolute to date, also does not result in the legal system that is established by the Basic Law losing the core elements of statehood (Entstaatlichung), a development that, due to the inalienable principles of Article 20 of the Basic Law, would be removed from the constitution amending legislature's freedom of disposition (see BVerfGE 89, 155 [182 et seq.]). In particular, the institute of citizenship is neither abandoned nor substantially devalued or replaced by citizenship of the European Union so that its importance for the principle of democracy does not have to be discussed here. Notwithstanding its importance in other respects (see BVerfGE 89, 155 [184]), the citizenship of the Union is a derived status which complements national citizenship (Article 17.1 sentence 2 of the Treaty establishing the European Community); this is upheld also in Article I-10.1 sentence 2 of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe where it lays down that citizenship of the Union shall be additional to national citizenship and shall not replace it. Correspondingly, the ban under European Community law on discrimination on grounds of citizenship is not laid down comprehensively but, in line with the principle of conferral, only for the objectives set out in the Treaty, in particular in the context of the fundamental liberties. This at the same time contributes to the Member States being able to preserve their own national identities (Article 6.3 of the Treaty on European Union), which find their expression in their respective fundamental political and constitutional structures (see Hilf/Schorkopf, in: Grabitz/Hilf (eds.), Recht der Europäischen Union, Article 6 EU, marginal nos. 78 et seq. and Article I-5.1 of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe).

Due to the area-specific restriction of the European ban on discrimination on grounds of Member State citizenship, a loss of the core elements of statehood, which would be inadmissible pursuant to the regulations of the Basic Law, cannot be established in this context as concerns the extradition of German citizens to other Member States. Not only do tasks of substantial importance remain with the state; the restriction of the ban on extradition is also not tantamount to the waiver of a state task that is essential in its own right.

In particular with a view to the principle of subsidiarity, (Article 23.1 of the Basic Law), the cooperation that is put into practice in the "Third Pillar" of the European Union in the shape of limited mutual recognition, which does not provide for a general harmonisation of the Member States' systems of criminal law, is a way of preserving national identity and statehood in a single European judicial area.

c) The legislature cannot unrestrictedly depart from the ban on the extradition of Germans.

aa) As a qualified proviso of legality, Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law permits the extradition of Germans only "as long as the rule of law is upheld". Such prerequisite for an extradition not merely repeats the validity of the principle of the rule of law, which is not open to restrictions of fundamental rights anyhow, and in particular of the principle of proportionality. It rather constitutes an expectation referring to the requesting Member State and to the international court in terms of structural correspondence, as has also been set out in Article 23.1 of the Basic Law. When permitting the extradition of Germans, the legislature must examine in this context whether the prerequisites of the rule of law are complied with by the requesting authorities.

In this context, the legislature must verify when restricting fundamental rights that the observance of rule-of-law principles by the authority that claims punitive power over a German is guaranteed. Here, it will have to be taken into account that every Member State of the European Union is to observe the principles set out in Article 6.1 of the Treaty on European Union, and thus also the principle of proportionality and that therefore, a basis for mutual confidence exists. This, however, does not release the legislature from reacting, in cases in which such confidence in the general conditions of procedure in a Member State has been profoundly shaken, and from doing so irrespective of proceedings pursuant to 7 of the Treaty on European Union.

The particular bar mentioned in Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law does not, however, replace the limits of the constitution that exist for every law that restricts fundamental rights. In turn, the law that restricts fundamental rights must comply with all commitments to constitutional law, may not tolerate conflicts with other provisions of the constitution and must implement the encroachment in a considerate manner, complying with the precept of proportionality.

bb) The legislature was obliged in any case to use the latitude as concerns incorporation into national law that the Framework Decision leaves the Member States in a manner that is considerate with the fundamental rights. The fact that the responsibility for ensuring that incorporation is in conformity with the constitution is particularly high in comparison with the incorporation of European Community directives into national law also results from the circumstance that the measures in question are from the European Union's "Third Pillar". The Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States is an act of secondary Union legislation that legally implements the objective established by the Treaty on European Union. Pursuant to Article 34.2 letter b, the Treaty on European Union is binding as regards the "result to be achieved". It is true that as concerns its concept, the approach to action under European Union law is modelled after the directive under supranational Community law; in several aspects, however, it differs from this source of secondary law. A Framework Decision does not entail direct effect (Article 34.1 letter b of the Treaty on European Union); its national validity still depends on its being incorporated into national law by the Member States. By incorporating the exclusion of direct applicability into the Treaty on European Union, the Member States wanted to prevent in particular that the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Communities on the direct applicability of directives is interpreted in such a way that it also covers Framework Decisions (on the so-called "vertical direct effect" of directives see Court of Justice of the European Communities, Joint Cases C-6/90 and C-9/90, European Court Reports 1991 page I-5357 marginal no. 11 - Francovich and others; Case C-62/00, European Court Reports 2002, I-6325 marginal no. 25 - Marks & Spencer; summary in Borchardt, Die rechtlichen Grundlagen der Europäischen Union, 2nd ed., 2002, marginal nos. 341 et seq.).

As a form of action of European Union law, the Framework Decision is situated outside the supranational decision-making structure of Community law (on the difference on European Union law and Community law, see BVerfGE 89, 155 [196]). In spite of the advanced state of integration, European Union law is still a partial legal system that is deliberately assigned to public international law. This means that a Framework Decision must be adopted unanimously by the Council, it requires incorporation into national law by the Member States, and incorporation is not enforceable before a court. The European Parliament, autonomous source of legitimisation of European law, is merely consulted during the lawmaking process (see Article 39.1 of the Treaty on European Union), which, in the area of the "Third Pillar", meets the requirements of the principle of democracy because the Member States' legislative bodies retain the political power of drafting in the context of implementation, if necessary also by denying implementation.

cc) Pursuant to Article 4 no. 7 letters (a) and (b) of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, the execution of the European arrest warrant can be refused where it relates to offences that are regarded by the law of the executing Member State as having been committed in whole or in part on the territory of the executing Member State or in a place treated as such or which have been committed outside the territory of the issuing Member State and the law of the executing Member State does not allow prosecution for the same offences when committed outside its territory.

These provisions reveal a need for a restriction of extradition by national law. When adopting the Act implementing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, the legislature was obliged to implement the objective of the Framework Decision in such a way that the restriction of the fundamental rights to freedom from extradition is proportionate. In particular, the legislature, apart from respecting the essence of the fundamental right guaranteed by Article 16.2 of the Basic Law, has to see to it that the encroachment upon the scope of protection provided by it is considerate. In doing so, the legislature has to take into account that the ban on extradition is precisely supposed to protect, inter alia, the principles of legal certainty and protection of public confidence as regards German citizens who are affected by extradition. The reliability of the legal system is an essential prerequisite for freedom, i.e. for a person's self-determination over his or her own concept of life and its implementation. In this respect, already the principle of the rule of law requires that persons who are entitled to enjoy the fundamental right in question must be in a position to rely on their behaviour not being subsequently qualified as illegal where it complies with the law in force at the respective point in time (on the time aspect of the application of legal provisions, see BVerfGE 45, 142 [167-168]; 63, 343 [357]).

The prosecuted person's confidence in his or her own legal system is especially protected by Article 16.2 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law where the act on which the request for extradition is based has been committed in whole or in part on German territory, aboard German vessels or aircraft or in places that are under German sovereign power. Charges of criminal acts with such a significant domestic connecting factor are, in principle, to be investigated in the domestic territory by German investigation authorities if those suspected of the criminal act are German citizens.

A significant domestic connecting factor exists in any case if essential parts of the place where the criminal act was committed and of the place where the result of the act occurred are located on German state territory. In such a combination of circumstances, the state's responsibility for the integrity of its legal system and the prosecuted person's fundamental-rights claims come together in such a way that as a general rule, the result is a bar on extradition. Whoever, as a German, commits a criminal offence in his or her own judicial area need, in principle, not fear extradition to another state power. If this were different, such a restriction of the protection from extradition would already come close to affecting the essence of the fundamental right. For the prosecuted person, transfer to another Member State's legal system, even though it has been brought closer by European integration, not only means discrimination under procedural law, which can consist in language obstacles, cultural differences and different procedural law and possibilities of defence. Such transfer ultimately ties the prosecuted person to a substantive criminal law in respect of which no democratic means had existed for him or her to participate in its creation, which he or she - unlike German criminal law - does not need to know and which in many cases due to a lack of familiarity with the respective national context, does not permit him or her as a layperson a sufficiently secure comparative evaluation.

The result of the assessment is different where a significant connecting factor to a foreign country exists as regards the alleged offence. Whoever acts within another legal system must reckon with his or her being held responsible there as well. As a general rule, this will be the case if the act constituting the offence has been committed entirely or in essential parts, in the territory of another European Union Member State and if the result has occurred there. The fact that after committing an offence, the prosecuted person will possibly succeed in fleeing to his or her home state is not of decisive importance in this context. A significant connecting factor to a foreign country must also, and especially, be assumed in cases where the offence has a typical cross-border dimension from the outset and shows a corresponding gravity, as is the case with international terrorism or organised trafficking in drugs or human beings; all those who become part of such criminal structures cannot fully rely on their citizenship providing them protection from extradition.

Whereas in cases such as the ones outlined here, the result of the examination of proportionality is as a general rule predictable, specific weighing of the individual case is required if the act has been committed entirely or partly in Germany but the result has occurred abroad. What must be weighed and correlated in such cases are the gravity of the alleged offence and the possibilities of effective prosecution on the one hand and the prosecuted person's interests that are protected by fundamental rights on the other hand, taking into account the objectives connected with the creation of a single European judicial area.

To the extent that the legislature does not make use of the latitude provided to it by Article 4 no. 7 letter (a) of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant by specifying constituent elements of offences, it has to ensure through its programme of legal examination that the authorities that implement the Act will engage in a specific weighing of the conflicting legal positions. The requirements placed on the constitution amending legislature by Article 20 and Article 1 of the Basic Law are not met already by Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law demanding, in an abstract and general manner, that the requesting state's legal system adhere to the principles of the rule of law, and by the German implementing act establishing a corresponding concordance of minimum rule-of-law standards. As regards the extradition of persons, in particular of a state's own citizens, the Basic Law demands in each individual case a specific examination of whether the prosecuted person's corresponding rights are guaranteed. Such examination is necessary precisely because other states' sovereign punitive power is not, in principle, bound by the principle of territoriality and, pursuant to classical concepts under international law, is limited, apart from the requirement of a minimum connection of the alleged offence to the punishing state, by the fact that it is left to all other states' discretion whether they provide judicial assistance in criminal matters (see Maierhöfer, Weltrechtsprinzip und Immunität: das Völkerstrafrecht vor den Haager Richtern: Besprechung des Urteils des IGH vom 14. Februar 2002 (Demokratische Republik Kongo gegen Belgien), Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift - EuGRZ 2003, pp. 545 et seq.). In this respect, the Framework Decision has merely shifted the pattern of a political decision, which is not subject to judicial review, towards a judicial weighing-in where due account is to be taken of the Framework Decision's objectives of simplification.

d) The European Arrest Warrant Act does not meet these constitutional requirements. The manner of achieving the Framework Decision's objectives that the law has chosen encroaches upon the freedom from extradition under Article 16.2 of the Basic Law in a disproportionate manner.

aa) When implementing the Framework Decision, the legislature has failed to take sufficient account of the specially protected interests of German citizens. In this respect, s. 80 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters distinguishes between Germans who are supposed to be extradited to a Member State of the European Union and non-Germans only by making use of the possibility, provided in Article 5.3 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, of making extradition of a state's own citizens subject to conditions regarding the persons being returned to serve the sentence passed against them. Pursuant to s. 80 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters, extradition of a German for prosecution is only admissible where the requesting Member State offers to return the German after the imposition of the unappealable custodial sentence or other sanction at the person's request to the area of applicability of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters.

Beyond this, protection from extradition is only granted to the extent that is applicable also to foreigners. Consequently, extradition is inadmissible in particular where serious grounds exist to suspect that in case of their extradition, the prosecuted persons will be persecuted or punished on account of their race, their religion, their citizenship, their forming part of a specific social group or their political creeds or that their situation would be rendered more difficult for one of these reasons, (s. 6.2 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters). This protective provision also applies in case of extradition on account of a European arrest warrant (s. 82 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters).

Moreover, s. 9 no. 1 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters prohibits extradition on account of offences for which German jurisdiction has been established if a court or a public authority in the area of application of this Act has, on account of the offence, passed a judgment or a decision against the prosecuted person or refuses to open main proceedings (s. 204 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung - StPO)), has dismissed an application to prefer public charges (s. 174 of the Code of Criminal Procedure), has halted proceedings upon the imposition of conditions and instructions (s. 153.a of the Code of Criminal Procedure) or, finally, has halted proceedings pursuant to s. 45, s. 47 of the Juvenile Court Act (Jugendgerichtsgesetz - JGG). As a result of this provision, the ban on double punishment, which, in principle, only applies in the domestic territory, also covers extradition for the purpose of further prosecution. At the same time, however, protection from extradition, which is prescribed by the constitution, is complied with for those cases in which a German had been answerable before a German court, with corresponding decisions that concluded the proceedings, already before the decision on extradition. Where, however, the request for extradition is made before such conclusion of proceedings, or where no corresponding proceedings are instituted in Germany at all, there is, pursuant to the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters, valid in the version of the European Arrest Warrant Act, nothing that stands in the way of extraditing a German who is charged with an offence that has a significant domestic connecting factor. From the perspective of persons entitled to enjoy the fundamental right in question, there is a gap in legal protection in this context.

bb) A particular effect of encroachment upon fundamental rights is created where the citizens are supposed to be held responsible by other Member States for remote effects of their action in Germany that they could not easily have expected, or where they are confronted with prosecution claims by individual Member States that are extensive both as concerns their subject matter and the prosecuted persons themselves. Such effect of encroachment is even increased where the act alleged by the state requesting extradition is not punishable pursuant to German law.

The legislature could have chosen an implementation that shows a higher consideration in respect of the fundamental right concerned without infringing the binding objectives of the Framework Decision because the Framework Decision contains possibilities for exceptions that permit the Federal Republic of Germany to take account of the fundamental rights requirements that follow from Article 16.2 of the Basic Law. Article 4 no. 7 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant permits the executing judicial authorities of the Member States to refuse to execute the European arrest warrant where it relates, on the one hand, to offences which are regarded by the law of the executing Member State as having been committed in whole or in part in the territory of the executing Member State or in a place treated as such (Article 4 no. 7 letter (a) of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant) or where, on the other hand, the arrest warrant relates to offences that have been committed outside the territory of the issuing Member State and the law of the executing Member State does not allow prosecution for the same offences when committed outside its territory (Article 4 no. 7 letter (b) of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant). In any case as regards offences with a significant domestic connecting factor within the meaning that has been set out, the legislature had to create the possibility, as regards the constituent elements of offences, and the legal obligation of refusing the extradition of Germans.

Moreover, the legislature was called upon to decide upon enhancing the legal position of Germans over and above the regulations in s. 9 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters. The Framework Decision permits to refuse extradition where the person who is the subject of the European arrest warrant is being prosecuted in the executing Member State for the same act as that on which the European arrest warrant is based (Article 4 no. 2 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant) or where the judicial authorities have decided either not to prosecute for the offence on which the European arrest warrant is based or to halt proceedings (Article 4 no. 3 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant). In this respect, the preliminary investigation by the public prosecutor has an additional function, namely that of protecting individual rights, which would have had to be taken into account when the Framework Decision was incorporated into national law. In this context, the legislature should have examined the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure to verify whether decisions by the Public Prosecutor's Office to refrain from criminal prosecution must be subject to judicial review regarding a possible extradition. Also by doing so, it can be ensured already before a decision on extradition is issued that a German who has not left the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany and who, according to German law, has not committed a criminal offence is not extradited.

cc) The European Arrest Warrant Act's infringement of the fundamental right to protection from extradition and of the principles of the rule of law that are applicable in this context would have been avoided by exhausting the margins afforded by the framework legislation when incorporating it into national law. The legislature was not entitled to refrain in this context from exhausting the latitude afforded to it, not even taking into account the legislature's freedom of drafting. The legislature not correctly performed the weighing, which it is called upon to conduct by Article 16.2 of the Basic Law in connection with the principle of the rule of law, between the European interest in cross-border prosecution and the claim to protection that follows from the rights that stem from a person's status as a German. The legislature has already failed to see the mandate for weighing that follows from the special proviso of legality of Article 16.2 of the Basic Law; in any case, it factually has not carried it out by providing a sufficient extent of protection from extradition.

If the German legislature wants to restrict the protection of Germans from extradition in a constitutional manner on the basis of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, it must, by providing constituent elements of offences that are determined in accordance with the rule of law, put the executing authority at least in a position to weigh the citizen's confidence in the German legal system, which is protected in this respect, in the individual case according to these constitutional principles. The judge's general commitment to fundamental rights in conjunction with the principle of proportionality (Article 1.3 of the Basic Law) does not come up to these requirements placed on a law that restricts fundamental rights.

dd) If the distinction between an alleged offence with a domestic connecting factor and one with a significant connecting factor to a foreign country, which is necessary under constitutional law, were upheld, a conflict with the special ban on retroactivity pursuant to Article 103.2 of the Basic Law would be ruled out from the outset so that the importance of this Article to combinations of circumstances such as the one that exists here need not be finally determined. The principle according to which an offence may only be punished if punishability was legally determined before the offence was committed is a special guarantee under the rule of law of the confidence in the reliability of the legal system, which is to provide clear orientation on what is punishable and what is not. Without such reliable orientation, individual freedom cannot develop: Whoever must expect an unpredictable retroactive amendment of criminal law provisions will no longer be able to exercise his or her freedom of action with the necessary security and will lose his or her position as an autonomous individual in one of the areas that are most sensitive as concerns fundamental rights. Admittedly, the ban on retroactivity only applies to amendments of substantive criminal law and not to those of procedural law, of which the law on extradition is also regarded as a part (see Higher Regional Court (Oberlandesgericht) Braunschweig, Order of 3 November 2004 - Ausl. 5/04 -, Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht, Rechtsprechungs-Report - NStZ-RR 2005, p. 18 [19]; BVerfGE 109, 13 [37]). If however a German, who up to now enjoyed absolute protection from extradition, is answerable in a Member State of the European Union for acts that do not show a significant connecting factor to a foreign country and were not punishable in Germany when they were committed, this could be tantamount to a retroactive amendment of substantive law.

ee) The deficiencies of the legal regulation that have been shown are also not sufficiently compensated by the fact that pursuant to s. 80.1 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters, extradition of a German citizen for prosecution is only admissible when it is ensured that the Member State requesting extradition will offer to return the prosecuted person at his or her request to Germany for execution after the imposition of an unappealable custodial sentence or other sanction. It is true that the execution of a sentence in the domestic territory is, in principle, a protective measure for a state's own citizens, but it only concerns execution and not prosecution.

Apart from this, the legislature will have to examine whether the bar on admissibility that is constituted by the lack of a guarantee by the state requesting extradition to offer the requested state the prosecuted person's return for execution is an adequate measure. According to the legislature's intention, the requirement of the prosecuted person's return is supposed to comply with the principle of rehabilitation. The legislature, however, has admitted already in the legislative process that there could be individual cases in which the return of a person to be extradited could fail due to a lack of criminal liability on the part of the prosecuted person in Germany (see Bundestag document [Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks] 15/1718, p. 16). The mere promise of return is inadequate in this context because it does not tell anything about whether the possibility of serving the custodial sentence in Germany exists.

2. The lack of voidability of the decision on the application for a grant of extradition in proceedings concerning extradition to a Member State of the European Union pursuant to the eighth part of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters (see ss. 78 et seq. of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters) infringes Article 19.4 of the Basic Law. Admittedly, legal practice and legal literature have up to now rejected the possibility of recourse to the courts to void the decision on the application for a grant of extradition in extradition proceedings because its foreign-policy and general-policy aspects belong to the core area of executive power. This can, however, no longer apply if the decision on the application for a grant of extradition puts the legal restriction of a fundamental right in concrete terms.

a) Article 19.4 of the Basic Law guarantees a fundamental right to effective legal protection provided by the courts from acts of public authority (aa) to the extent that they encroach upon the rights of the person affected (bb).

aa) Article 19.4 of the Basic Law contains a fundamental right to effective judicial protection from acts of public authority that is as complete as possible (see BVerfGE 8, 274 [326]; 67, 43 [58]; 96, 27 [39]; 104, 220 [231]; established case-law). The guarantee provided by the Basic Law comprises access to the courts, the examination of the relief sought in formal proceedings and the binding decision of the court (see BVerfGE 107, 395 [401]). The citizen has a substantial claim to judicial review that is as effective as possible (see BVerfGE 40, 272 [275]; 93, 1 [13]; established case-law).

An integral part of the guarantee of effective legal protection is above all that the judge has sufficient authority to review as concerns the factual and legal aspects of a dispute so that he or she can remedy a violation of the law. The precept of effective legal protection does, however, not exclude that, depending on the type of measure that is to be examined, the concession of scope for drafting, discretion and assessment can result in differences regarding the completeness of judicial review (see BVerfGE 61, 82 [111]; 84, 34 [53 et seq.]).

bb) The prerequisite of the guarantee of recourse to the courts is that the person affected is entitled to a legal position; the violation of mere interests is not sufficient (see BVerfGE 31, 33 [39 et seq.]; 83, 182 [194]). Such legal position can be established by another fundamental right or from a guarantee that is equivalent to a fundamental right, but also by law, with the legislature determining the conditions under which a citizen is entitled to a right and the content that the right has (see BVerfGE 78, 214 [226]; 83, 182 [195]).

These principles also apply where an Act leaves a measure to the competent authority's discretion. Where the Act's regulations on decision-making enjoin the authority to take into account also legally protected interests of the person affected when exercising its discretion, the guarantee of legal protection under Article 19.4 of the Basic Law applies. Where, on the contrary, the legal provision does not protect any legal interests of the person affected, the discretionary decision need not be voidable by him or her in court proceedings; in the intermediate zone, an interpretation that gives prevalence to the fundamental rights merits preference (see BVerfGE 96, 100 [114-115] with further references).

As concerns the grant of extradition in the classical extradition proceedings, the Federal Constitutional Court has so far left it open in its case law whether the decision on the application for a grant of extradition can be challenged by a constitutional complaint; it has however, assumed that there is, in any case, only a limited possibility of review (see BVerfGE 63, 215 [226]; Order of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court (Preliminary Review Committee - Vorprüfungsausschuss) of 16 March 1983 - 2 BvR 429/83 -, Europäische GrundrechteZeitschrift 1983, pp. 262263; from the nonconstitutional courts' more recent case-law, see Berlin Higher Administrative Court (Oberverwaltungsgericht - OVG), Order of 26 March 2001 - 2 S 2/01 -, Decisions of the Higher Administrative Court (Entscheidungen des Oberverwaltungsgerichts - OVGE) 23, 232 - Neue Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht - NVwZ 2002, p. 114 on the one hand and the Order of the Berlin Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgericht - VG) of 12 April 2005 - VG 34 A 98.04 - on the other hand). In a decision on the parallel problem of the transfer of prisoners, the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court has regarded the non-voidability of the executive power's decision as compatible with Article 19.4 of the Basic Law because the decision had not affected legal interests of the person affected (see BVerfGE 96, 100 et seq.).

cc) The grant of extradition is the executive power's decision of granting a foreign state's request to extradite a wanted person. In the Federal Republic of Germany, the competence for granting extradition lies with the Federal Government and is exercised by the Federal Ministry of Justice in agreement with the German Foreign Office. The Federation has partly delegated the exercise of its competences regarding the decision on incoming requests to the Länder (states) on the basis of s. 74.2 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters; the Länder, in turn, can delegate their competences to the subordinate authorities (see the agreement of 28 April 2004, which entered into force on 1 May 2004, between the Federal Government and the Länder governments on the competences in the relations of mutual judicial assistance in criminal matters, Federal Bulletin (Bundesanzeiger) 2004, p. 1, 1494). This regulation expresses that extraditions are to be classified as part of relations with foreign states, for which the Federation has exclusive competence pursuant to Article 32.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 96, 100 [117]).

The division of German extradition proceedings into proceedings that review the admissibility of extradition and proceedings on the grant of extradition, which has historical reasons, has up to now resulted in a distinction concerning the functions of the two stages of proceedings and the prosecuted person's possibilities of legal protection that are connected with them. Under the conventional divided system, the admissibility proceedings have served, and still serve, the prosecuted person's preventive legal protection whereas the proceedings on the grant of extradition are intended to make it possible to take foreign-policy and general-policy aspects into account. In practice, it was therefore not possible to challenge the decision on the application on a grant of extradition before a court; moreover, this possibility was rejected in most of the legal literature (see Vogler, Auslieferungsrecht und Grundgesetz, 1970, pp. 306 et seq. with further references; id., in: Grützner/Pötz, Internationaler Rechtshilfeverkehr in Strafsachen, 2nd ed. 2004, s. 12, marginal nos. 20 et seq.; moreover BVerfGE 63, 215 [226]).

b) The European Arrest Warrant Act has extended the proceedings on the grant of extradition in case of extraditions to Member States of the European Union by elements of discretion, (refer (aa)), which serve the protection of the prosecuted person and which are therefore subject to the guarantee of legal protection refer (bb). Effective legal protection mandatorily requires that the extradition documents that are presented are complete (refer (cc)).

The European Arrest Warrant Act tries to take account of the citizen's interests that are protected by fundamental rights by partly incorporating the grounds for which the execution of the European arrest warrant may be refused that are provided in the Framework Decision (see Article 4 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant). Here, the Framework Decision has afforded the Member States of the European Union a margin for incorporating the grounds for non-execution that are listed in Article 4 of the Framework Decision into national law as mandatory or optional bars to extradition and for putting them into concrete terms there.

bb) What the fact that the procedure for granting extradition is complemented by specified grounds for refusing the grant gives rise to is that, in the case of extraditions to a Member State of the European Union, the authority responsible for granting extradition no longer merely decides on unspecified foreign-policy and general-policy aspects of the request for extradition but has to enter into a process of weighing the subject of which is in particular criminal prosecution of the person affected in his or her home state. Consequently, the competent German authorities are, on the one hand, afforded a margin of assessment and discretion while, on the other hand, there is also an obligation, which is based on constitutional law, to protect German citizens.

The obligation to give reasons for the decision (see s. 79 sentence 2 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters) shows that the legislature has also recognised the importance of the decision on the application for the grant of extradition as regards the individual rights of the person affected. This provision, which had not been contained in the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters before the entry into force of the European Arrest Warrant Act, has only been drafted in the course of the legislative procedure in such a way that not only the requesting state - as had been originally intended - but also the prosecuted person is provided with a reasoning. The provision contains an obligation to notify the prosecuted person of the reasoned decision on the application for a grant of extradition, so that other criteria are fulfilled according to which the grant can be classified as a classical administrative act (see s. 41.1 of the Administrative Procedure Act (Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz - VwVfG)), which is subject to review by the judiciary.

cc) Part of the required efficiency of legal protection is also that the extradition documents or a European arrest warrant, which is equivalent to these documents, permit judicial review that is appropriate for the fundamental rights affected. It is incompatible with this requirement that s. 83.a of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters makes reference to the extradition documents and specifies minimum information that must be provided in the European arrest warrant but - unlike s. 10 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters with regard to the conventional extradition proceedings - does not make the completeness of such information a conditio sine qua non for the decision on the admissibility of the application for the grant of extradition. Already in the short period of time after the entry into force of the European Arrest Warrant Act, the result of the fact that s. 83.a.1 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters was drafted as a directory provision (Soll-Vorschrift) has been that in concrete extradition proceedings, the completeness of the extradition documents has been regarded as dispensable for the admissibility of a request, with reference being made to the wording of the Act (see Stuttgart Higher Regional Court, Order of 7 September 2004 - 3 Ausl. 80/04 -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2004, p. 3437 [3438]; see also Seitz, loc. cit., p. 546 [548]). The deviation from the mandatory wording of s. 10 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters can also not be justified by arguing that the term sollen (should) as a general rule generates a legal commitment but does permit to deviate from such commitment under special circumstances. For an effective protection of the fundamental right enshrined in Article 16.2 of the Basic Law, the legislature would have to clarify in this case when such circumstances exist.

II.

The European Arrest Warrant Act is void (s. 95.3 sentence 2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act); an interpretation in conformity with the constitution or a ruling that establishes the Act's partial voidness are excluded because the German legislature must be in a position to decide again, in normative freedom and taking into account the constitutional standards, about the exercise of the qualified legal proviso in Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (1.). As long as the legislature does not adopt a new Act implementing Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the extradition of a German citizen to a Member State of the European Union is inadmissible (2.).

1. The constitutional prerequisites placed on the extradition of German citizens and the principles of legal clarity and legal certainty require that the Act implementing Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is understandable by itself and that it sufficiently predetermines the decisions on applications for the grant of extradition. The expression in concrete terms, which is called for by the constitution, must manifest itself in the text of the statute; this cannot be achieved by interpreting the European Arrest Warrant Act in conformity with the constitution or by establishing its partial voidness.

2. As long as the legislature does not adopt a new Act implementing Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the extradition of a German citizen to a Member State of the European Union is not possible. Extraditions can, however, be performed on the basis of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters in the version that was valid before the entry into force of the European Arrest Warrant Act.

III.

The order of the Higher Regional Court (1.) and the Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg's decision on the application of a grant of extradition (2.) are based on an unconstitutional law and are therefore overturned (s. 95.3 sentence 2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act).

1. The order of the Hanseatic Higher Regional Court of 23 November 2004 has been issued on the basis of an unconstitutional law and cannot be upheld for this reason alone.

2. Also the decision on the application of a grant of extradition is based on unconstitutional law and is overturned already for this reason.

Apart from this, the authority that granted extradition has exercised the discretion to which it is entitled in an erroneous manner. It has failed to recognise that a grant of extradition of a German citizen is subject to special constitutional standards that must be part of the process of weighing when the bars on extradition pursuant to s. 83.b of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters and the question of return pursuant to s. 80.1 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters are examined. It has, admittedly, made the grant contingent on the condition that the Spanish authorities will offer the return of the person affected after the imposition of a sentence, it has, however, not dealt with the question whether such an aid to execution is admissible under German law at all. Apart from this, the grant states that the Public Prosecutor General has no objections against the complainant's extradition in view of the German preliminary investigation by the public prosecutor. In his letter, the Public Prosecutor General merely summarised the state of the investigations against the complainant and pointed out that the investigations pursuant to s. 129.a of the Criminal Code had not been brought to a close yet.

The protection of German citizens requires that when a decision on the grant of an application for extradition is made, the fact that a national preliminary investigation by the public prosecutor has been instituted is taken into account in any case. Here, criminal investigations in Germany with a corresponding domestic connecting factor of the alleged act constituting the offence will as a general rule result in the existence of a bar to extradition; in this respect, the granting authority's discretion is significantly limited, and detailed reasons stating why a request for extradition is granted after all are required. The mere possibility of extradition to a Member State of the European Union is not an option of legal policy, the decision about which may only follow considerations of expediency or effectiveness of the administration of criminal justice.

C. …

Extracts from the dissenting opinion of Judge Broß:

I am only able to agree with the decision of the Senate majority to the extent that the European Arrest Warrant Act is declared void, but not as regards essential parts of the grounds, and above all, not in view of the fact that it regards extradition of German citizens as admissible, without any substantive restriction, in case of offences with a significant connecting factor to a foreign country.

The European Arrest Warrant Act is not only unconstitutional on account of the legislature's failure when incorporating the Framework Decision into national law; it is void already because it violates the limits on integration that are set out in Article 23.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. This is because the Basic Law opens up the national legal system to European Community law and European Union law only to the extent that the prerequisites established by Article 23.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, namely those of the principle of subsidiarity, have been complied with. The legislature must take this into account when incorporating the Framework Decision into national law. Already this is not the case.

2. The principle of subsidiarity, which is laid down as a rule in Article 23.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, directs the allocation of competences and tasks, with a principal preference for the lower level. The smaller social unit, which as such is closer to the citizens, is supposed to take precedence (see, as a fundamental source, Isensee, Subsidiaritätsprinzip und Verfassungsrecht, 2nd ed., 2001, pp. 223 et seq.; Rojahn, in: von Münch/Kunig [eds.], loc. cit., Article 23, marginal no. 30). The larger unit takes over only where the smaller one, which is closer to the citizens, is not, or less effectively, able to perform the respective task (see Pernice, in: Dreier (ed.), loc. cit., Article 23, marginal no. 71; Rojahn, in: von Münch/Kunig [eds.], loc. cit., Article 23, marginal no. 30).

3. On this basis, the extradition of German citizens for prosecution can actually only be a possibility where a realisation of the state's claim to prosecution fails for factual reasons that are plausible on the merits and that, apart from this, have been sufficiently substantiated in the particular case. Only to this extent may the legislature transform the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant into national law.

6. The Federal Constitutional Court must examine already ex officio violations of the principle of subsidiarity by nonconstitutional law under the aspect of the infringement of higher ranking law (Article 20.3 of the Basic Law). Notwithstanding this, the principle of subsidiarity applies not only to laws but also to individual rights. In this context, the close factual connection with Article 38 of the Basic Law must be seen. This provision excludes for the area of application of Article 23 of the Basic Law that the legitimisation of public authority and the influence on the exercise of public authority that have been effected by elections are devalued or factually bound and predetermined, by shifting the tasks and competences of the German Bundestag in such a way that the principle of democracy is violated (see BVerfGE 89, 155 [172]).

7. At the same time, the principle of subsidiarity (Article 23.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law) results in the legislature's obligation, which has however hardly been taken notice of so far, to plausibly substantiate a legislative project's "integration value added" in the area of the "Third Pillar" of the European Union. What requires justification is above all the following: the fact that, and if necessary to what extent, a task that has been made the subject of regulation - here, the extradition of Germans for prosecution to Member States of the European Union - exceeds the capability of the Federal and the Länder judiciary and can only be effectively dealt with on the level of the European Union - by means of extradition - (on this, see Pernice, in: Dreier [ed.], loc. cit., Article 23, marginal no. 73; Rojahn, in: von Münch/Kunig [eds.], loc. cit., Article 23, marginal no. 33).

8. By such an implementation of the Framework Decision, which takes the principle of subsidiarity into account, the legislature does not contradict requirements under European law. Article 4 nos. 2 and 3 of the Framework Decision explicitly permit to refuse extradition where prosecution by the "executing Member State" takes place for the same act on which the European arrest warrant is based (Article 4 no. 2 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant) or where the investigating authorities have decided either not to prosecute for the offence on which the European arrest warrant is based or to halt proceedings (Article 4 no. 3 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant). This has also been established by the Senate majority (see B.I.1.d) bb)). Apart from this, it has rightly stressed the authorisation of the legislative bodies of the Member States to also refuse the incorporation of the Framework Decision into national law if necessary (see B.I.1.c) bb)).

9. It is all the more surprising that the Senate majority considers it admissible to provide, in case of offences with a significant connecting factor to a foreign country, in spite of the duties to protect that have been stipulated with reference to citizenship, and misjudging the meaning and scope not only of the principle of subsidiarity (Article 23.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law) but also of the principle of proportionality (Article 20.3 of the Basic Law), the possibility of extraditing German citizens without any substantive restriction. Such a procedure, which counteracts the presumption of innocence and, with that, a mainstay of the principle of the rule of law (Article 20.3 of the Basic Law), remains incomprehensible.

Nevertheless, the legislature is not prevented from not making use of the legal opinion criticised here and to use the room for manoeuvre that is at its disposal, in the interest of the citizens who are entrusted to it and who are to be deemed innocent, and with that, unrestrictedly worthy of protection, by the legislature unless the contrary is proved.

Extracts from the dissenting opinion of Judge Lübbe-Wolff:

I share the Senate majority's opinion that when enacting the European Arrest Warrant Act, the German legislature has not taken sufficient account of the fundamental rights of persons potentially affected by it, but I cannot agree with large parts of the grounds (1.5.) and with the dictum on the legal consequences (6.). The European Arrest Warrant Act's deficiencies under constitutional law do not justify the nullification of the entire Act.

1. The basis of the - restricted - ban on the extradition of Germans is Article 16.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. The attempt to anchor it in higher spheres (of natural law, as it were), deeper (historical) ones and broader ones (under natural law), leads astray.

a) The principle that a state does not extradite its own citizens can neither be derived from the nature of "the citizen's relation to a free democratic polity", nor is there a "conviction, shared all over Europe since the French Revolution" that supports it. This principle does not apply, inter alia, in states of the Anglo-Saxon legal sphere to which we owe freedom and democracy (on this, see BVerfGE 4, 299 [303-304]; for further comparative-law information see Masing, in: Dreier, GG, vol. 1, 2nd ed., 2004, marginal no. 37 on Article 16 of the Basic Law). Unlike the ban on the deprivation of German citizenship (Article 16.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law), the principle of the non-extradition of Germans, which is enshrined in Article 16.2 of the Basic Law, is not based on the experience of National Socialist injustice. It can already be found in the Weimar Constitution (Article 112.3 of the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung - WRV)) and can be traced back to a tradition that is considerably older (see Masing, ibid., marginal no. 8, with further references). Finally, it also cannot be maintained that the citizens' confidence in their secured residence in their home state is protected by international law, in the respect that is of interest here. The states' obligation under international law to receive their own citizens to which the Senate references, does not have a trace of a content that would ban or restrict the extradition of a state's own citizens.

b) If one refrains from loading the ban on the extradition of a state's own citizens with a significance that is not stipulated in the constitution, the thought that the incorporation of Article 16.2 sentence 2 into the Basic Law could have exceeded the limits of a possible constitutional amendment that are embodied in Article 79.3 of the Basic Law is remote. If one intends to seriously ascertain in this context whether the constitution amending legislature brings about "the legal system that is established by the Basic Law losing the core elements of statehood" or has created an inadmissible cause for that, such a statement can, in any case, not be substantiated by explanations about the significance of the citizenship of the Union and about the scope of the ban on discrimination on grounds of citizenship under Community law (Article 12.1 of the Treaty establishing the European Community).

2. The statement that "in particular with a view to the principle of subsidiarity (Article 23.1 of the Basic Law)", the "cooperation" that is put into practice in the "Third Pillar" of the European Union "in the shape of limited mutual recognition, which does not provide for a general harmonisation of the Member States' systems of criminal law, is a way of preserving national identity and statehood in a single European judicial area", is also a vague signal. To the extent that this signal intends to object a general harmonisation of the Member States' systems of criminal justice, it is superfluous if only because no one intends a general harmonisation of the Member States' systems of criminal justice; under applicable law, it is ruled out not only for reasons of subsidiarity but already because the Treaty on European Union (Articles 29, 34 of the Treaty on European Union) does not provide a basis of competence for that.

3. I cannot go along with part of the course and of the results of the examination of proportionality that the Senate has performed.

a) Whether the provisions of the European Arrest Warrant Act take sufficient account of the principle of proportionality as regards Article 16.2 of the Basic Law and other fundamental rights that are potentially affected in the case of extraditions is a constitutional question; the standard for the answer to this question is not provided by the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant but by the Basic Law. The answer therefore does not depend on the latitude for refusing extraditions that the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant leaves to the German legislature. Correspondingly, the German legislature is also not obliged to make use of the grounds for optional refusal to execute the European arrest warrant provided in the Framework Decision solely because encroachments upon fundamental rights that are caused by extradition can be avoided in this way. What is decisive instead is a weighing of the interests of effective prosecution, which are pursued by the Framework Decision and its incorporation into national law on the one hand and of the interests of possible witnesses and victims on the other hand.

b) I regard as incorrect the view that apart from this, the European Arrest Warrant Act shows a constitutionally problematic gap in protection also as regards the possibility of refusing extradition where the person who is the subject of the European arrest warrant is being prosecuted in the executing Member State for the same act as that on which the European arrest warrant is based (Article 4 no. 2 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant) or where the judicial authorities have decided either not to prosecute for the offence on which the European arrest warrant is based or to halt proceedings (Article 4 no. 3 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant). …

The Senate does not substantiate, however, why, apart from the legislative implementation of the grounds for refusal under Article 4 no. 7 of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, which is unanimously regarded as necessary including the corresponding legal protection, separate claims to the use of the grounds for refusal under s. 83.b nos. 1 and 2 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters, which also enjoy legal protection, are supposed to be necessary at all in order to ensure the proportionality of extradition. …

c) The statement that the question of the return of the person affected for the execution of a possible custodial sentence "must be part of the process of weighing" and that the legislature is to examine whether "the bar on admissibility that is constituted by the lack of a guarantee by the state requesting extradition to offer the requested state the prosecuted person's return for execution is an adequate measure", the Senate evades answering the decisive constitutional question.

What is the issue here is the proportionality of the encroachment upon a fundamental right that extradition constitutes.

With regard to the groups of persons who enjoy particular protection (see 1.) it must thus be deemed a compulsory prerequisite of extradition that the possibility of the person's return for execution exists and that it will also be made use of later on.

4. The Senate regards the proviso of the rule of law being upheld (Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law) as an assignment of tasks to the legislature in the sense that it is directly incumbent on the legislature itself to establish "that the observance of rule-of-law principles by the authority that claims punitive power over a German is guaranteed".

To the extent that thus, the legislature is supposed to be authorised to make general declarations, which are binding to public authorities and nonconstitutional courts when assessing individual cases, as concerns the question whether rule-of-law principles are upheld in the EC Member State, objection must be made. Pursuant to the principle of the separation of powers (Article 20.3 of the Basic Law), the binding subsumption of facts under legal concepts is, in principle, not incumbent upon the legislature but upon the executive and the legislative powers.

5. The complainant has argued that the legal basis of his extradition showed an unconstitutional democratic deficit. His fundamental rights could only be encroached upon on the basis of an Act adopted by Parliament. The German Parliament had not been in a position to freely decide on the provisions of the European Arrest Warrant Act, which set out that extradition is possible irrespective of double criminality because it had been bound by the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, which had been enacted by government representatives alone.

As regards this argument, the Senate states that the fact that the European Parliament is merely consulted when European Framework Decisions are adopted is commensurate with the requirements of the principle of democracy because the Member States' legislative bodies retain the political power of drafting in the context of implementation, if necessary also by denying implementation. This is not an answer to the complainant's objection but a description of the problem, with the only particular feature that the problem is not regarded as being one. Where the belief is held that democratic legitimisation must be sought in the freedom of Parliament to infringe European Union law, something is going a bad way.

6. I cannot discern a justification for the declaration of nullity of the European Arrest Warrant Act. The Act is unconstitutional to the extent that it does not contain regulations that make it possible to safeguard the proportionality of extradition and to guarantee such safeguard through sufficient legal protection as regards special groups of persons and the groups of cases that concern them. In order to rule out infringements of the constitution that are based on such unconstitutionality, it is sufficient to state that until the entry into force of a regulation that is in conformity with the constitution, Germans, and non-Germans who are worthy of protection (see 1.), may not be extradited to the extent that the offences in question are among those with regard to which extradition can be refused pursuant to Article 4 no. 7.a or no. 7.b of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant (see 3.a) and to the extent that a return in order to serve a possible sentence fails under applicable law for lack of mutual criminality (see 3.c).

In contrast to this, the declaration of nullity of the European Arrest Warrant Act also eliminates the nonconstitutional bases of extradition on account of European arrest warrants also to the extent that they concern cases with regard to which the Senate itself has not in any way criticised the law as being constitutionally problematic.

Extracts from the dissenting opinion of Judge Gerhardt:

I cannot agree with the judgment. The constitutional complaint would have had to be rejected as unfounded. The declaration of nullity of the European Arrest Warrant Act is not in harmony with the precept under constitutional and European Union law of avoiding violations of the Treaty on European Union wherever possible. The Senate contradicts the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Communities.

I.

The ban on extradition, which is laid down in Article 16.2 of the Basic Law, is, on the one hand, supposed to prevent German public authority from enforcing other states' claims to punishment that do not have an equivalent in the valuations of the German legal system (1.).

On the other hand, the prosecuted person is supposed to be spared the added, possibly serious, difficulties that are connected with proceedings abroad (2.). Both objectives of protection are achieved by interpreting and applying the European Arrest Warrant Act in conformity with the constitution, with account being taken of European Union law. The same applies mutatis mutandis to compliance with the guarantee of legal protection (3.).

I very much regret that the Senate refuses to make a positive contribution to European solutions in this respect. In particular by alleging an intrinsic connection of the ban on extradition and citizenship as a status, and by using the topos of the confidence in the reliability of one's own legal system, which has remained undefined, it one-sidedly emphasises the national perspective instead of achieving a balance between the bonds of national law and that of European law. The fact that it deals with the Pupino judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities neither as far as concepts are concerned nor by discussing possible consequences, does not further the law.

2. The European Arrest Warrant Act provides sufficient possibilities of refusing surrender to the requesting state in cases in which the burden resulting from criminal proceedings abroad for the prosecuted person is out of all proportion to the advantages that can be put forward in favour of prosecution in the requesting state.

The instruction to the legislature to enact a new regulation is not only superfluous, incompatible with the principles of good lawmaking and an unnecessary burden on the legislative bodies. The declaration of nullity of the European Arrest Warrant Act also infringes the precept under European Union law to attain the objectives pursued by the Framework Decision as far as possible (ECJ, Judgment of 16 June 2005, loc. cit., marginal nos. 43, 47). This precept, however, manifests itself here as a precept of maintaining the statutory provision that runs parallel to the Federal Constitutional Court's domestic task of preserving the legislature's intent as far as possible in case of constitutional deficiencies.

3. Article 19.4 of the Basic Law requires that before extradition, a court examines compliance with the principle of proportionality. In the context of their decision on the admissibility of extradition, the Higher Regional Courts are obliged to do so. There is no gap in legal protection.

II.

Also from its own perspective, the Senate would not have been allowed to declare the European Arrest Warrant Act void in its entirety. It already does not ask itself the question to what extent it is at all justified to declare an Act that regulates government encroachment upon fundamental rights void in its entirety, following a constitutional complaint, due to the lack of certain regulations instead of merely stating its inapplicability under specific circumstances. If this question had been answered in the affirmative, the further question should have been asked, whether this also applies where it can be foreseen with certainty that the provisions which are regarded as missing will ultimately not play a role in the original case. If, apart from this, the Senate is of the opinion that partial voidness is out of the question it should have upheld the European Arrest Warrant Act by means of a transitory regulation with provisos for its application in conformity with the constitution until the adoption of a new Act. The Federal Republic of Germany has undertaken to incorporate the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, which was adopted unanimously in the Council and which is binding as regards the objective to be attained, into national law until the end of the year 2003. Notwithstanding the fact that the Treaty on European Union does not provide infringement proceedings in this respect, continued non-incorporation infringes the obligations of the Federal Republic of Germany to the Union and the requirement of consideration and solidarity in its relation to the other Member States. This infringement is all the more serious because pursuant to national constitutional law, the unconstitutionality of an Act indeed does not forcibly result in its being declared void. The Basic Law's commitment to Germany's integration into a unified Europe, which the Senate has strongly emphasised several times recently, and the obligation under European Union law to interpret Framework Decisions in conformity with European Community law (ECJ, Judgment of 16 June 2005, loc. cit., marginal no. 43) compel to create at least a legal situation that is as close as possible to European Union law by means of the continued application, albeit reduced factually and modified in conformity with the constitution for a transitional period.

III.

When drafting the new regulation, the legislature will have to consider whether, in view of the fact that the participation of the Federal Republic of Germany in the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant is constitutionally based on Article 23 of the Basic Law and that this Article has largely divested extradition proceedings within the European Union of their international law and foreign-policy elements, it is (still) justified in this context to assign the Federation administrative competence on the basis of Article 32 of the Basic Law (s. 74 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters). Here, the question at issue is not whether the European Arrest Warrant Act required approval by the Bundesrat but whether it is possible at all to deviate from Articles 83 et seq. of the Basic Law when drafting the executive competence. In the present proceedings, the question - which had not been discussed with the parties - does also in my view not require decision because an unconstitutionality of the European Arrest Warrant Act which would possibly have resulted from it would not have called its continued application for a transitional period into question.

XVII. Political Prosecution and Asylum - Article 16a of the Basic Law

Some General Background

The fundamental right to asylum was originally contained in Article 16 and was "moved" to the new Article 16a in 1993.[176] That explains why the first decision (BVerfGE 80, 315) of 1989 refers to Article 16 and not Article 16a. The right to asylum as part of the Basic Law's fundamental rights is one example of the Basic Law's reaction to the horror of the Nazi terror when so many in Germany (and elsewhere), especially Jewish Germans and other persecuted groups had to flee from Germany and seek refuge elsewhere.

The new Article 16a restricted the right to asylum considerably. Article 16a sentence 2 states that no asylum will be granted for those entering Germany from a secure third country.[177] Since Germany is surrounded by nine secure countries and the North Sea that leaves only air travel for potential asylum seekers[178], notwithstanding Article 16a.5, which prescribes a prevalence of international treaties and European Union legislation dealing with refugee matters. A respective European Union legislative act regulates which state has - exclusive - jurisdiction to deal with the asylum application.[179] According to Article 16a.3, federal legislation can determine other states where prima facie persecution does not take place, which effectively puts the onus of rebuttal on the refugee who must present evidence that the legislated list is wrong with regard to his or her claims on which country has been responsible for the persecution.

1. Tamils, BVerfGE 80, 315

Explanatory Annotation

The Constitutional Court interpreted the concept of political persecution, which is the prerequisite for the right to asylum. The Court made it clear that such persecution is not to be understood narrowly to only encompass political activism as such. Rather it extends to persecution for any characteristic, which objectively sets the applicant apart and makes him or her subject to persecution. Such criteria could be political beliefs, ethnicity or race, religion, nationality or sexual orientation, if these characteristics lead to persecution; mere discrimination is not sufficient.

176 The new Article 16a is an impressive example for excessive verbosity. The original asylum right consisted of four words. Whereas that may have been just a bit short, the new Article 16a contains 5 subsections and a total of 286 words in the German version and many of those words have no place in a constitution and should have been left to a concretizing statute.

177 European Union members states and member states which have ratified both the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, http://www.unhcr.org/3b66c2aa10.html, and the European Convention on Human Rights and where observance of these legal instruments is ascertained.

The Constitutional Court also emphasized that safe refuge in another part of the refugee's home country also preempts the right to asylum. Asylum is not the only way for refugees to remain in Germany because of the recognition of "de-facto"-refugees from civil wars and other such catastrophes and because of Articles 14.1, 33 of the Refugee Convention and Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which prohibit the sending back of persons to their home state in case of danger for life, freedom or inhumane treatment.

Headnotes:

1. Political persecution within the meaning of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) is in principle, governmental persecution.

2. Persecution is political when it deliberately violates the legal rights of an individual on the basis of his political convictions, fundamental choice of religion or characteristics beyond his control that account for his being different, such that the individual is excluded from the overarching peaceful order of the governmental entity due to the intensity of such violation.

3. Governmental prosecution of acts that in and of themselves represent a manifestation of political conviction may in principle also constitute political persecution and even if the state acts thereby in defence of the legitimate interest of its own existence or political identity. Special justification is required to exclude such prosecution from the area of political persecution.

4. Effective territorial control by the state in the sense of effective sovereign superiority is a prerequisite for persecution by or attributable to a state. The possibility of political persecution therefore does not exist as long as the state assumes only the role of a party that is engaged militarily in an ongoing civil war in a disputed territory but no longer exists as the overarching effective peacekeeping power. The same applies in certain crisis situations involving guerilla warfare.

   In all of these cases, political persecution is, however, involved if governmental forces wage combat in a manner deliberately intended to achieve physical annihilation of persons on the opposing side or attributed to that side who are selected on the basis of criteria that are relevant for the purposes of asylum although such persons no longer want to or cannot offer resistance or no longer want to participate in military activities, especially if their acts mutate into deliberate physical annihilation or destruction of the ethnic, cultural or religious identity of a portion of the population selected on the basis of criteria that are relevant for the purposes of asylum.

5. a) A person who is affected only by regional political persecution is not to be considered a political persecutee within the meaning of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, unless such regional persecution puts him in a hopeless situation throughout the country. This is the case if that person cannot find reasonable refuge in other parts of his home country (alternative domestic refuge).

   b) Alternative domestic refuge presupposes that the asylum seeker is sufficiently safe from political persecution in the areas that come into question and is in any case not threatened by any other disadvantages and dangers that are equivalent in terms of intensity and severity, to the impairment of legal rights for political reasons that is relevant for the purposes of asylum, if such existential endangerment did not exist at the place of origin.

Order of the Second Senate of 10 July 1989 - 2 BvR 502, 100, 961/86 -

Facts:

The complainants were Sri Lankan citizens of ethnic Ceylonese-Tamil origin. They directed their constitutional complaints against judgments of the administrative courts that denied their applications for asylum.

The constitutional complaints were successful since, among other things, the administrative courts did not in view of the civil war situation prevailing in Sri Lanka at the time in question consider the actions of the Sri Lankan security forces that were objected to as political persecution because of the motive of preservation of the state behind these actions; they therefore arrived at the assumption that the complainants were not threatened with persecution when they entered the country.

B.

The admissible constitutional complaints are founded. The challenged judgments violate the fundamental right of the complainants under Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

I.

1. a) According to Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, political persecutees have the right to asylum. The meaning of the term "political persecutee" cannot be narrowed down solely on the basis of the succinct wording of this provision. Instead, it is necessary to determine what was and is meant to be the overall intent and purpose of the legal definition that is expressed in the given formulation, taking into account in particular legislative tradition and the historical development of the fundamental right (see BVerfGE 74, 51 [57]).

In general, the fundamental right to asylum is based on a conviction predicated on respect for the inviolability of human dignity to the effect that no state has the right to threaten or violate the body, life or personal freedom of individuals for reasons that lie exclusively in their political convictions, fundamental choice of religion or characteristics beyond their control that account for their being different (criteria relevant for the purposes of asylum); the constitutional right to asylum is essentially defined by this legal doctrine (see BVerfGE 76, 143 [157 and 158]).

b) The descriptor "political" used in Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law does not mean an objectively demarcated area of politics, but identifies a characteristic or quality that measures and can at any time assume in any area under certain circumstances (see BVerfGE 76, 143 [157]).

A necessary prerequisite for persecution to manifest itself as political is that it be related to disputes over the organization and nature of the general order of coexistence of people and groups of people, which is to say that - unlike, for example, private persecution - it must be of a public nature and proceed from a wielder of superior, as a rule sovereign, power to which the victim is subservient.

Political persecution is therefore in principle governmental persecution (established case law; see BVerfGE 9, 174 [180]; 54, 341 [356 and 357, 358]; 76, 143 [157 and 158, 169]).

This follows from the historical development and intent of the fundamental right. The historical development documents the fact that the Parliamentary Council (Parlamentarischer Rat) assumed that it was self-evident that asylum was to be granted from governmental persecution (see Parliamentary Council, Delegates Wagner and Renner at the 44th session of the Main Committee, 19 January 1949, Stenographic Record p. 581, 582).

International law also proceeded at the time without further question on the basis of countries as subjects under international law; international law governing refugees dealt and deals with special situations involved in the relationship between states and their respective citizens. The authors of the Basic Law found that this concept already existed; they incorporated it into German constitutional law (see Reichel, Das staatliche Asylrecht "im Rahmen des Völkerrechts," 1987, pp. 87 et seq.).

If political persecution is therefore in principle governmental persecution, this is not in contradiction with the fact that the case law of the administrative courts equates such state-like organizations with the state as having ousted the respective state or to whom the latter has abandoned the field and which in fact replaced it (see Federal Administrative Court, Judgment of 3 December 1985, Buchholz 402.25 s. 1 of the Asylum Procedure Act [Asylverfahrensgesetz - AsyVfG] no. 43).

c) States represent internally pacified entities that relativize all differences, conflicts and disputes internally through an overarching order in such a manner that they remain below the threshold of violence and do not call into question the possible existence of the individual, which is to say that they do not therefore suspend the peaceful order

(see BVerfGE 76, 143 [159 and 160]). Governmental power serves this purpose. The power to protect includes, however, the power to persecute. As a result, the logic behind the guarantee of asylum in the Basic Law proceeds entirely from those dangers that issue from a specific type of use of persecutional governmental power (see BVerfGE 9, 174 [180]).

d) Accordingly, persecution is political if it deliberately violates the rights of an individual on the basis of characteristics that are relevant for the purposes of asylum such that the individual is excluded from the peaceful order of the overarching governmental entity due to the intensity of such violation.

aa) The measure in question must deliberately violate the legal rights of the party affected. This is absent in the case of disadvantages that an individual must suffer due to general circumstances in his home country such as hunger and natural disasters but also in the case of the general ramifications of civil disorder, revolution and war. For example, the Federal Constitutional Court made it clear that the right to asylum is not intended to give everyone who must live in material need in his home country the possibility of leaving his home country to improve his situation in life in the Federal Republic of Germany (BVerfGE 54, 341 [357]).

bb) Not every deliberate violation of rights that is inadmissible, for example, under the constitutional order of the Federal Republic of Germany, constitutes political prosecution for the purposes of asylum. The measure must be intended to affect the party affected precisely on the basis of characteristics that are relevant for the purposes of asylum. Whether such a specific intent is present and the persecution therefore takes place "due to" an asylum criterion must be determined as a function of the recognizable thrust of the measure itself on the basis of its substantive character, not on the basis of subjective reasons or motives that guide the persecutor (see BVerfGE 76, 143 [157, 166 and 167]).

cc) Finally, a violation of rights that is deliberately inflicted in the present sense must be of an intensity that represents not only an impairment but - ostracizing - persecution. The degree of intensity is not prescribed in the abstract. Its must be deduced from the humanitarian intent that the right to asylum serves, which is to afford those who find themselves in a hopeless situation refuge and protection (see BVerfGE 74, 51 [64] and in general BVerfGE 54, 341 [357]; 76, 143 [158 et seq., 163 and 164]).

2. According to the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, acts of persecution committed by third parties may also be considered political persecution within the meaning of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. However, this presupposes that they can be attributed to the respective government (see BVerfGE 54, 341 [358]; 76, 143 [169]).

This depends upon whether the state affords the party affected protection with the means actually available to the state (see BVerwGE 74, 41 [43]).

Grounds for attributing acts of persecution to the state exist if the state is either not prepared or does not see itself in a position to afford protection by making (sufficient) use of available means in the concrete case to confront acts of persecution on the part of certain third parties, in particular, for example, on the part of the state clergy or the state party (see BVerfGE 54, 341 [358]).

The situation is different if affording protection would exceed the ability of a specific state; its responsibility for the purposes of law governing asylum does not extend beyond the means actually at its disposal. The basis for attribution of acts of persecution by third parties for the purposes of the law governing asylum does not lie solely in the mere claim of a state to a monopoly on the legitimate use of force but only in its - fundamental - realization. If the guarantee of asylum is to offer protection against a specific type of use of persecutional governmental power, (see BVerfGE 9, 174 [180] and 1.c above) this contains the converse conclusion to the effect that protection against the results of anarchic circumstances or the dissolution of government power is not promised by Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

3. a) Acts of governmental self-defence may also provide grounds for a right to asylum. It is not compatible with the guarantee of asylum of the Basic Law to generally deny asylum to a person who has been involved in political activity against his state and is for that reason persecuted by that state. If the area protected by the fundamental right to asylum is defined with reference to the characteristics of refugees of the Geneva Convention, the characteristic "due to their political conviction" encompasses not only political views as such and the manifestation thereof but in principle also the corresponding activity.

   This follows from the legislative tradition of the right to asylum and the historical development of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. Prohibitions of extradition have traditionally constituted the core of the right to asylum; but since the 19th century they have also applied in favour of "political criminals," i.e., in favour of foreigners who have engaged in activities based on their oppositional political convictions and in so doing violated criminal laws used by their home government to defend its fundamental political order and territorial integrity. According to the German Extradition Act (Deutsches Auslieferungsgesetz - DAG) of 23 December 1929, foreigners who are to be prosecuted for a political crime may not be extradited, except in cases where they were guilty of a premeditated crime against life that did not take place in open combat (s. 3 of the German Extradition Act [Deutsches Auslieferungsgesetz - DAG], Reich Law Gazette [Reichsgesetzblatt - RGBl.] 1929 I p. 239; see s. 6 Act on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters [Gesetz über die internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen - öö] of 23 December 1982, Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 2071).

   The Parliamentary Council discussed the fundamental right to asylum against the background of this prohibition of extradition, which reflected practice with respect to asylum as generally exercised since the 19th century. In this context, the Parliamentary Council of course assumed that political criminals also had in principle a right to asylum to the extent that they were to be afforded protection against extradition (JöR 1, 1951, pp.165 et seq.; Parliamentary Council, 18th and 44th sessions of the Main Committee, Stenographic Record pp. 217 and 218, 582 et seq).

The traditional prohibition of extradition of political criminals may differ in principle today from asylum for political persecutees in terms of purpose, prerequisites and legal consequences (see BVerfGE 60, 348 [359]; 64, 46 [62 and 63]), but the substantive connection between the right to asylum and non-extradition of political criminals remains intact.

b) If therefore political conviction manifested in the form of action lies within the area of protection of the fundamental right to asylum, governmental prosecution of acts that in and of themselves represent a manifestation of political conviction - in particular separatist and revolutionary political activities - may in principle constitute political persecution and to be sure even if the state acts thereby in defense of the legally protected interest of its own existence or political identity. Special justification based on specific criteria for demarcation is required to exclude such prosecution from the area of political persecution.

Protection of legal interests is initially such a criterion. Political persecution is accordingly not present in principle when a state prosecutes criminal offences - even if they are also politically motivated especially those that are directed against the legal interests of its citizens: the prosecution of criminal offences is in that sense not "political" persecution.

All further objective circumstances must also be considered. Thus the prosecution of acts that are directed against political legal interests nevertheless does not represent political persecution if it is possible to conclude from such circumstances that such prosecution is not aimed at the political conviction manifested by the offence as such, but at an additional criminal component that is expressed in such acts as is commonly punishable in governmental practice. This is the case, for example, when criminal offences are prosecuted in an especially critical state of tension that goes beyond a threat to the entity of the state or the existing political order and immediately threatens the security of the populace in order to protect - in an objectively comprehensible manner - the private legal interests of the citizenry, but not, however, to punish the expression or manifestation of a political conviction. This can be the case if the expression or manifestation of a political conviction occurs in a situation of extreme uncertainty due to terrorist activities in such a demonstrative manner - which is to say without appropriate clear and credible dissociation from such activities - that they must be understood by the public precisely to constitute support for terrorism. Accordingly, the expression or manifestation of critical - and subversive - political convictions as such remains within the area of protection of the right to asylum.

However, the prosecution of criminal offences that does not represent political persecution according to the above may mutate into political persecution, namely, if objective circumstances make it possible to conclude that the party affected is nevertheless being persecuted because of a characteristic that is relevant for the purposes of asylum. This is to be suspected in particular if he suffers from treatment that is harsher than is usual in the case of prosecution of similar - non-political - criminal offences of comparable severity in the prosecuting state.

c) There is another limit to the prospects of asylum for political criminals whenever - notwithstanding the neutrality of the right to asylum as regards political convictions - the actions of an asylum seeker are in principle disapproved of by the Federal Republic of Germany in agreement with the international legal order it supports. The Parliamentary Council had already agreed that certain severe breaches of the public peace are also not to be tolerated under the law governing the right to asylum; reference was made in this context to the "assassination clause" of established extradition law and s. 3.3 of the German Extradition Act of 1929 (see Parliamentary Council, Delegate Dr. Schmid at the 4th session of the meeting of the Committee on Basic Issues of 23 September 1948, Stenographic Record p. 37).

The above limit is exceeded if in manifesting his political convictions an asylum seeker has made use of terrorist means, in particular therefore if the asylum seeker has made use of weapons that constitute a danger to the public or made attacks on the life of innocent parties. Persecution of political enemies is a ground for asylum, but not a defense against terrorism. Repressive or preventive measures that the state takes to defend against terrorism do not constitute political persecution for the purposes of legislation governing asylum if they are directed against active terrorists, accessories within the meaning of criminal law or those who involve themselves in preparations for terrorist activities beforehand without themselves participating in such activities. If, however, other circumstances - such as, for example, the special intensity of the acts of prosecution - make it possible to conclude that the party affected is nevertheless being persecuted because of a characteristic that is relevant for the purposes of asylum or if the measures taken by the state extend beyond the designated class of persons who, for example, advocate separatist or other political goals but do not, or only under coercion, support terrorist activities, political persecution that is relevant for the purposes of asylum when measured against the standards elaborated above (under b) may be present. This applies in particular for actions taken in connection with mere counter-terrorism that may to be sure be meant to combat terrorism and the environment actively supporting it but are intended - in response to the acts of terrorism - to subject the civilian population that is not immediately involved in the ongoing conflict to the pressure of brute force.

4. a) If effective territorial control by the state in the sense of effective sovereign superiority is a prerequisite for persecution by or attributable to a state, the possibility of political persecution does not exist as long as the state assumes only the role of a party that is engaged militarily in an ongoing civil war in a disputed territory but no longer exists as an effective overarching peacekeeping power. Measures taken in that territory by a state that has become a party to a civil war do not therefore constitute political persecution for the purposes of the law governing asylum if and to the extent that they exhibit a typically military character and serve to regain territory over which, although to be sure de jure (still) part of that state's national territory, territorial control has been de facto lost to the other forces against which combat is waged. In such situations, combat against the opposing side in a civil war by governmental forces does not generally appear to constitute political persecution. The situation is of course different if the governmental forces wage combat in a manner intended to achieve physical annihilation of persons on the opposing side or attributed to that side and selected on the basis of criteria relevant for the purposes of asylum although such persons no longer want to or cannot offer resistance or do not or no longer want to participate in military activities, especially if the acts of the governmental forces mutate into deliberate physical annihilation or destruction of the ethnic, cultural or religious identity of the entire insurgent portion of the population.

If, on the other hand, the state can assert its basic territorial control or - despite an ongoing civil war - regain it in specific areas, the possibility of political persecution for the purposes of asylum continues to obtain or occurs anew due to its position of superiority.

b) In addition to what is referred to as a situation of open civil war, guerilla warfare has become more common in recent decades. Its peculiarity lies in its asymmetry, in that insurgents remain in hiding in order to offer no exposure to attack but gradually erode the state's monopoly on the use of force. If this results in a sustained and not merely temporary challenge to the state's territorial control, an intermediate situation occurs in which the state's powers of protection and persecution remain to be sure partially intact, but have to compete with stronger or superior opposing forces. The state's peaceful order is thereby in principle suspended. Such a situation exists when terrorist attacks spread and are repeatedly directed against state security forces and, to compel support, against the perpetrators' own population group and these attacks overburden the state in such a manner that the conventional means of defense of police and criminal law no longer suffice such that the state must indeed react with military and martial means and will as a result not be able to provide reliable protection for the life, freedom and property of its citizens in the foreseeable future.

When such a crisis situation occurs, the state finds itself in a situation comparable to that of open civil war as long as such circumstances prevail: it increasingly loses the initiative as the overarching and effective peacekeeping power. Its actions therefore lose in that regard the character of persecution in terms of their relevance under legislation pertaining to asylum even if they are - which is not seldomly the case - in violation of international law and in particular contravene the Geneva Red Cross Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols of 1977.

However, political persecution is also present in such special situations if the actions of state security forces in the sense indicated above (4.a) go beyond measures to combat the opposing side in the civil war for the purposes of restoring the peaceful order of the state.

5. A person who is affected only by regional political persecution is not to be considered to be persecuted for political reasons within the meaning of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law unless such regional persecution puts him in a hopeless situation throughout the country. This is the case if he cannot find reasonable refuge in other parts of his home country (domestic refuge alternative).

a) As has been shown, the right to asylum is based on the relationship between the persecutee and the state of which he is a citizen. Only this state can in principle come into question as the agent of persecution (see 1.b above). The home country of the persecutee is also decisive in terms of regional considerations: Only those who are defenceless throughout their home country as a result of political persecution and must therefore seek protection in another country have a right to asylum within the meaning of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (see BVerwG, JZ 1984, p. 294; BVerwG, Buchholz 402.25 s. 1 of the Asylum Procedure Act no. 72).

It may, when considering states of European or North American character, the entire territory of which is subject to a single cultural and legal order, surely be difficult to imagine that the same state that is itself actively involved in persecution in one part of the country would not only not disturb those affected in another part of the country but would even protect them against persecution by others in that part of the country. In more than a few countries, the state presents two or multiple sides; it pursues different goals for different regions and establishes or tolerates various cultural or legal orders. This can be seen in the case of the present proceedings. When governmental leadership is of the opinion that its likely to be possible to successfully repel a separatist movement in one part of the country only through the use of means that can be considered to constitute political persecution, the use of these means is then naturally not required in other parts of the country in which such aspirations do not exist.

As regards the right to asylum, it follows from this phenomenon of the state with multiple facets that not necessarily everyone who is exposed, directly or indirectly, to prosecution by a state in one part of the country will require protection in another country and is therefore in a situation of need that would justify the granting of asylum. Those individuals can under such circumstances be referred to those parts of their country in which persecution is absent. However, it is necessary to take into account in this case that this state with multiple facets is also one and the same state. In examining the question as to whether a person can move to parts of the country in which persecution is absent, this circumstance may not be ignored.

b) The subsidiarity of asylum in another country to the guarantee of protection by one's own state is also reflected in international refugee law. According to Article 1.A no. 2 of the Geneva Refugee Convention, only persons who are unable to avail themselves of the protection of the country of their nationality or who because of a well-founded fear of prosecution are unwilling to avail themselves of that protection, are refugees. Persecutees must therefore first turn to the country of their nationality before seeking protection in another country (see Nehemiah Robinson, Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees - Its History, Contents and Interpretation, 1953, p. 46).

This idea is pursued in various bodies of international law: Article 1 no. 2 of the Convention of the Organisation for African Unity (OAU) establishes as a prerequisite for recognition of refugee status in the case of prosecution that is only regional, that such persecution be the compelling reason for leaving one's own country to seek refuge in another country (Association for the Study of the World Refugee Problem Bulletin, 1970, p. 86 [87]; see Goodwin-Gill, The Refugee in International Law, 1983, pp. 26 et seq., 42).

The institution of granting asylum under international law also had no other content when the Basic Law came into being. If it is assumed, however, that Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law was intended to elevate that which at the time was understood as asylum or the granting of asylum to a legal right, (see BVerfGE 74, 51 [57, 63]; 76, 143 [156 and 157]) the fundamental right to granting asylum under the Basic Law is not in any case, in the absence of special reasons for so doing, to be construed more generously than international refugee law under the Geneva Convention.

c) An alternative possibility within the country is considered to exist in other parts of a country if the party affected would not put himself in a hopeless situation there. This presupposes that asylum seekers are sufficiently safe from political persecution in the areas that come into question and are in any case not threatened by any disadvantages and dangers that are equivalent in terms of degree and severity to the impairment of legal rights for political reasons that is relevant for the purposes of asylum (see BVerfGE 54, 341 [357]) if such existential endangerment did not exist at the place of origin.

6. The right to asylum under Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is based, as the Senate emphasized, on the idea of refuge, that is to say on the causal relationship between persecution, flight and asylum (see BVerfGE 74, 51 [60]).

On the basis of the fundamental right's underlying legislative concept in which this is reflected, a person who due to political persecution is compelled to leave his country and seek protection and refuge in another country and for that reason comes to the Federal Republic of Germany will typically have the right to asylum. The case of persons who enter the country without being persecuted and nevertheless desire asylum here and justify this on the basis of circumstances that develop while in this country or the future development of which that person fears is atypical, albeit frequent (on what are referred to as circumstances occurring after flight, see op. cit., pp. 64 et seq.).

According to this legislative concept for the fundamental right to asylum, different standards apply for the purposes of assessment of whether an asylum seeker is a political persecutee within the meaning of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, depending upon whether that person has left his home country to flee the actual occurrence or the immediate threat of political persecution or has come to the Federal Republic of Germany without being persecuted.

a) In the event retrospective examination shows that the asylum seeker fled country wide political persecution, recognition of the right to asylum will regularly come into consideration. In the event that the danger of persecution is found to be only regional, it will also be necessary to establish that the asylum seeker would have been in a hopeless situation throughout the entire country (see 5.c above). This is the case, as has been shown, if the asylum seeker would not have been sufficiently safe from political persecution in other parts of the country or would have been faced with the threat of finding himself in a hopeless situation for reasons other than those relevant for the purposes of asylum by moving there. As regards safety from political persecution in other parts of the country, the "reduced" standard of probability is therefore to be applied - if one proceeds on the basis of the two standards of probability that have been established in practice by the administrative courts - for the purposes of retrospective evaluation. This also takes into account the considerations presented above (5.a) with respect to states presenting multiple facets. Relative improvement also as regards disadvantages and dangers that have nothing to do with persecution and would possibly have been associated with a move within the home country is not required. The party affected is accordingly considered to have left the country without being persecuted (see b below) if it can be established that he would have been safe from political persecution in other parts of the country and it cannot be established that he would have been threatened with the disadvantages and dangers mentioned in those parts of the country.

If, on the other hand, it is certain that the asylum seeker has left the country due to the occurrence or immediate threat of political persecution and that he cannot be reasonably expected to have moved within his home country as described above, he has a right to asylum pursuant to Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, unless he can again find protection in his own country. An application for asylum must therefore be successful if the circumstances that caused him to flee at the time of his decision persist without any significant change. If the danger of persecution has ceased to exist in the meantime, what is important is whether it can be expected to recur; recognition of the right to asylum is not required pursuant to Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law if the asylum seeker can be sufficiently safe from recurrent persecution (see BVerfGE 54, 341 [360]). The same applies if - in the case of persistent, regionally limited political persecution - a reasonable domestic alternative possibility for the refuge presents itself after arrival in the sphere of operation of the Basic Law. This presupposes that the person having fled prosecution in these parts of the country is sufficiently safe not only from political persecution but also from those disadvantages and dangers that made it unreasonable to expect that person to change his location when he fled and that person is also not threatened by any other disadvantages and dangers that would put him in a hopeless situation.

b) However, if the asylum seeker has left his home country without being persecuted, his application for asylum pursuant to Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law can be successful only if he is threatened with political persecution due to circumstances occurring after his flight that are, when measured against the standards of the decision of 26 November 1986 (BVerfGE 74, 51 [64 et seq.]), considerable. If this danger poses a threat in only part of the home country, the party affected may be referred to areas in which he would be sufficiently safe from political persecution unless there is a threat of other disadvantages and dangers that must be considered unreasonable on the basis of the principles presented in 5.c) above.

7. If a persecutee cannot claim asylum pursuant to Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, he need not be without protection. The Federal Republic of Germany, like other countries in Western Europe, allows refugees who are forced to flee because of civil war or severe domestic disorder to remain in the country (referred to as "de-facto refugees") for humanitarian reasons although the conditions for recognition as political refugees are not present. In addition, s. 14.1 of the Aliens Act (Ausländergesetz - AuslG), Article 33 of the Geneva Refugee Convention and Article 3 of the European Human Rights Convention guarantee protection against expulsion and deportation if the life or freedom of a person is threatened due to characteristics that make that person different from others or if a concrete danger of inhuman treatment exists.

This humanitarian protection may be regulated through contractual agreements between host countries, including in particular those lying in the vicinity of the respective home countries; in this case, uniform use of the capacity for accommodation of all countries offering protection may be agreed. In addition, the Federal Republic of Germany may work to achieve desistance from acts that are in violation of human rights and inhumane in a foreign state and may adopt measures for the protection of human rights in connection with the human rights pacts of the United Nations and the European Convention on Human Rights.

II.

The judgments under challenge do not satisfy the requirements of Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law on the basis of the standards presented.

2. Asylum (Third Country Rule), BVerfGE 94, 49

Explanatory Annotation

In this decision the Constitutional Court had to deal with amendments to Article 16a.2, the so-called 'secure third country'-provisions. Amended provisions of the Basic Law are, obviously, also part of the constitutional law. However, because of the somewhat peculiar provision of Article 79.3, which limits constitutional amendments and requires that any such amendment must adhere to the principles contained in Article 1 and 20 of the Basic Law, the German Constitutional Court is in effect in a position to test the constitutionality even of (amendments of) constitutional law. Article 1 contains a strong emphasis on the importance of human dignity and all the subsequent fundamental rights, which in essence means that at least the core of these rights is not amendable. However, that does not necessarily mean that the right to asylum could not be touched or even that it must remain constitutionally protected. It could only mean that the core of the right must remain. The new provisions in Article 16a of the Basic Law, with their reliance on safe third countries in conjunction with the European asylum framework[180], might be less favourable, especially procedurally, but still sufficiently guarantees safe refuge from persecution at home.

Translation of the Asylum - Third-Country Rule Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 94, 49*

Headnotes:

1. a) With the Act Amending the Basic Law (Gesetz zur Änderung des Grundgesetzes - GGÄndG) of 28 June 1993, the amending legislature created a basis for the achievement of an overall European system for the protection of the rights of refugees that would distribute the burden among the states participating in such a system.

   b) The amending legislature is also subject to no legal constraints as regards the formulation and modification of fundamental rights as long as the limits of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law are not infringed and prescribes the standard for the Federal Constitutional Court. The fundamental right to asylum is not included in the substantive content of the guarantee provided in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG). What the substantive content of that guarantee is and the consequences to be drawn from that content as regards the powers of the German state must be determined independently.

2. Article 16a.2 of the Basic Law restricts the sphere of operation of the fundamental right to asylum, which is still guaranteed under Article 16a.1 of the Basic Law. A person arriving from a safe third country within the meaning of Article 16a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is not in need of the protection of the fundamental right guaranteed under paragraph 1 in the Federal Republic of Germany since that person could have found protection from political persecution in that third country.

3. The respective Member States of the European Communities are by virtue of the Basic Law automatically considered safe third countries.

4. a) Guaranteed application of the Geneva Refugee Convention (GRC) and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), which is required by law (Article 16a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law) for designation as a safe third country, presupposes in particular that the state has become a party to the two conventions and that its legal system does not permit deportation of foreigners to states that allegedly practice persecution without first establishing whether such persons are faced with the threat of persecution within the meaning of Article 33 of the GRC or torture or inhuman or degrading punishment within the meaning of Article 3 of the European Human Rights Convention in that country.

   b) The legislature has a certain latitude in the choice of the investigative means it employs to obtain a factual basis for the purposes of designating countries as safe third countries. The assessment of the legislature must be reasonable.

Judgment of the Second Senate of 14 May 1996 on the basis of the oral hearing of 21, 22 and 23 November and 5 December 1995 - 2 BvR 1938, 2315/93 -

Facts:

The constitutional complaints concern exclusion of the possibility of invoking the fundamental right under Article 16a.1 of the Basic Law upon entry from a safe third country, which is governed by Article 16a.2 sentences 1 and 2 of the Basic Law and s. 26a.1 of the Asylum Procedure Act (Asylverfahrensgesetz - AsyVfG) in the version promulgated on 27 July 1993 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 1361, and in that connection also the provision governing immediate enforcement of measures to terminate the stay in the country (Article 16a.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law and s. 34a of the Asylum Procedure Act).

In response to the constitutional complaints of two persons whose applications for asylum were unsuccessful on the basis of these revisions of what is referred to as the "asylum compromise", the Federal Constitutional Court declared the provisions of the Basic Law and the Asylum Procedure Act cited above incompatible with the Basic Law.

Extract from the Grounds:

C.

The constitutional complaints are unfounded. s. 26a of the Asylum Procedure Act in conjunction with s. 18.2 no. 1, s. 31.4, s. 34a.1 and s. 34a.2 of the Asylum Procedure Act and the inclusion of Austria in Appendix I to s. 26a of the Asylum Procedure Act are compatible with the Basic Law. The decisions of the Federal Office (Bundesamt) and Border Protection Office (Grenzschutzamt) under challenge as well as the orders of the administrative courts ultimately provide no reason for objection on constitutional grounds.

I.

With the Act Amending the Basic Law of 28 June 1993, the amending legislature revised the fundamental right to asylum. This revision is, also to the extent that it is more restrictive as compared with the previous character of the fundamental right, to be viewed as a whole and to be taken as such as the basis for the construction and application of the details of the constitutional provision. The Basic Law also affords the amending legislature broad latitude as regards its power and responsibility in connection with the formulation and modification of fundamental rights. The legislature is also subject to no legal constraints as long as the limits of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law are not infringed and prescribes the standard for the Federal Constitutional Court.

With the reform of legislation governing asylum, the amending legislature created a basis for the achievement of an overall European agreement to guarantee refugees protection through an agreement under international law governing jurisdiction for examination of applications for asylum and mutual recognition of decisions regarding asylum in order to distribute the burden among the states participating in such a system (Article 16a.5 of the Basic Law). Notwithstanding such regulations at the level of international law, the legislature has taken into account the situation resulting from flows of refugees and migrants throughout the world in Article 16a.2 of the Basic Law and as a result departed from the previous approach to solving the problems associated with the accommodation of political refugees exclusively through regulation by national law. The legislature continues to assume that there is a need to afford protection against political persecution, but refers foreigners desiring asylum to the protection they can receive elsewhere in a safe third country.

1. Accordingly, a person arriving from a Member State of the European Communities or another third country in which application of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, - GRC - of 28 July 1951 (BGBl. 1953 II p. 560) and the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms - ECHR - of 4 November 1950 (BGBl. 1952 II p.953) is ensured, may not pursuant to Article 16a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law invoke the fundamental right to asylum guaranteed in paragraph 1 thereof. Third countries outside the European Communities are identified by federal law (Article 16a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law).

This clause is, where applicable, subordinate to agreements under international law within the meaning of Article 16a.5 of the Basic Law. ...

2. The concept of safe third countries adopted by the amending legislature restricts the sphere of operation of the fundamental right to asylum, which is still guaranteed under Article 16a.1 of the Basic Law. This approach involves drawing conclusions as regards a foreigner's need for protection from his itinerary: A person arriving from a safe third country within the meaning of Article 16a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is not in need of the protection of the fundamental right guaranteed under paragraph 1 in the Federal Republic of Germany since that person could have found protection from political persecution in that third country. Exclusion from the fundamental right to asylum is not dependent upon whether the foreigner can or should be returned to the third country. No asylum proceedings have taken place. The right to temporary residency granted in anticipation of protection under the fundamental right also does not apply. According to Article 16a.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law, measures to terminate residency may, by way of inference, be enforced independently of any legal remedy pursued against such measures in the cases covered by sentence 1.

3. The amending legislature considers that protection against political persecution (Article 16a.1 of the Basic Law) is ensured by the provision contained in Article 16a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, if a foreigner desiring protection can find refuge in another country in which the Geneva Refugee Convention is applied and in particular the prohibition of refoulement contained in Article 33 of the GRC is observed. In addition, the European Convention on Human Rights, and in particular its Article 3, must also be applicable in that third country; the Basic Law thereby takes into account the fluid transitions between acts of persecution that are of relevance to the right to asylum and inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment when referring refugees to the possibilities of protection in other countries (see also Article 16a.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law as well as today's judgment in the proceedings 2 BvR 1507 and 1508/93).

a) The amending legislature has itself defined the Member States of the European Communities as safe third countries in Article 16a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. It follows from the historical development of the legislation as well as from the goal that the amending legislature pursued with the third-country rule that the Member States are automatically safe countries by virtue of the Basic Law.

b) Article 16a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law empowers the legislature to designate other countries that fulfil the conditions of sentence 1 by a federal law that requires ratification by the Bundesrat. Such designation presupposes that application of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms is ensured in such states.

aa) This can be the case only if the states have become party to the two conventions. Since pursuant to its Article 1 A.2 the Geneva Refugee Convention was originally applicable only to refugees from events occurring before 1 January 1951 and the provision containing this time limit was in effect upon entry into force of Article I.2 of the Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees of 31 January 1967 (BGBl. 1969 II p. 1294), the states must also have become party to this protocol. Such states must also have accepted the control procedures that are provided for by the conventions and intended to ensure fulfilment of the obligations undertaken upon ratification of the conventions. This applies on the one hand in respect of the duty to cooperate with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees of the United Nations in Article 35 of the GRC. On the other hand, according to Article 25 of the European Human Rights Convention, anyone may address a petition regarding violation of the rights set forth in this convention to the European Commission of Human Rights.

bb) In addition, the institutions of the states must also be bound under the legal orders of such states to apply the conventions. This presupposes that the state may not under its legal system deport a foreigner to a state that allegedly practices persecution without establishing beforehand whether that foreigner is threatened with persecution within the meaning of Article 33 of the GRC or torture or inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment within the meaning of Article 3 of the European Human Rights Convention.

(1) In the context of substantive verification of refugee status, the states must be guided by the requirements of the prohibition of refoulement pursuant to Article 33 of the GFC in conjunction with the definition of the term refugee contained in Article 1 A.2 of the GFC. It is as a rule no longer possible to speak in terms of guaranteed application if groups of individuals are from the very outset not considered refugees on the basis of national law or on the basis of political orders, either because the Geneva Refugee Convention was signed only subject to regional qualification (see Article 1 B GRC and Article I.3 of the Protocol) or because - due to reasons of foreign policy deference, for example - refugees from certain countries are generally not granted refuge.

(2) Exclusion from the fundamental right to asylum that accompanies designation as a safe third country pursuant to Article 16a.2 of the Basic Law does not require that foreigners have access to a review procedure in that third country that essentially corresponds to the German asylum procedure. The legal and actual conditions in the third country must, however, be such that it is actually possible for foreigners seeking protection to petition for protection and thereby initiate an obligation on the part of a competent authority to make a decision in this regard after prior review (see also on this ss. 2.c) and d) of the Resolution of the Ministers of the Member States of the European Communities responsible for immigration on a harmonized approach to questions concerning host third countries of 30 November/1 December 1992, reprinted in ZDWF-Schriftenreihe no. 53 "Article 16a GG und seine Folgen," February 1993, pp. 152 and 153).

The Geneva Refugee Convention does not, however, prescribe a specific procedure for determining refugee status. It is also not possible to ascertain that a specific governmental practice has evolved in that regard that would have to be considered binding pursuant to Article 31.3.b of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 23 May 1969 (BGBl. 1985 II p. 926).

For example, the minimum standards for the procedure to determine refugee status adopted in the year 1977 by the Executive Committee of the UNHCR in Conclusion No. 8 (XXVIII) did not become binding under international law. However, the parties to an agreement under international law must generally act in good faith to achieve the purpose of the agreement. They may therefore not evade their duties under the Geneva Refugee Convention through de facto omission of a procedure to verify refugee status, especially since it is possible to determine whether deportation infringes the prohibition of refoulement contained in Article 33 of the GRC only through a procedure that has been in some manner formalized (see Goodwin-Gill, The Refugee in International Law, 1984, p.165 and 166 and 167; Ibid., in: Yearbook of the International Institutions of Humanitarian Law, 1985, 56 [60]; Hannum, Guide to International Human Rights Practice, second edition 1992, p. 221 and 222; see also BVerwGE 7, 333 [334]).

The existence of deadlines for application that deny foreigners access to the procedure if not met do not as such stand in the way of designation of a state as a safe third country. When deadlines for recognition of refugee status have not been met, a duty must in any case exist to determine whether the prohibition of refoulement contained in Article 33 of the GRC precludes such a measure in the specific case prior to deportation, directly or indirectly, to a state that allegedly practices persecution. The same applies if foreigners will no longer have access to a formal procedure in the third country after being returned to that country - for example, in view of the fact that no petition for protection was submitted during the initial stay in the third country and the deadline for submitting the application for that purpose has for that reason elapsed. The purpose of the third-country rule is to refer the parties affected to states that offer protection (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 12/4450, p. 20).

cc) A state that makes provision for a third-country rule (see on this Article 29.2 sentence 2 of the Schengen Implementation Agreement; Article 3.5 of the Dublin Agreement) may also be designated as a safe third country pursuant to Article 16a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. However, the state's legal system must not empower that state to deport foreigners to a country in which they would face the threat of further deportation to the country that allegedly practices persecution without determination of whether the prerequisites pursuant to Article 33 of the GRC and Article 3 of the European Human Rights Convention obtain or corresponding protection is actually guaranteed in that country (i.e., in the "fourth country") by means of a formal procedure. If a state (third country) considers that it has the right to deport refugees to yet another country although these prerequisites are not satisfied in that country, the application of the Geneva Refugee Convention is then not ensured in that third country. Pursuant to Article 33.1 of the GRC, refugees may not be expelled or returned "in any manner whatsoever" across the borders of territories in which they are faced with the threat of persecution. The prohibition of refoulement therefore precludes not only transfer directly to a state that practices persecution but also deportation or return to any country in which a threat exists of further deportation to the state that practices persecution. The expert Kälin explicitly confirmed this at the oral hearing (see also Zimmermann, Das neue Grundrecht auf Asyl [1994], p.171 and 172 with further references).

dd) The legislature is given independent responsibility for designating states as safe third countries through legislation that lends content to the fundamental right in accordance with the criteria set forth for this purpose in Article 16a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. As regards the actual determinations of fact required to answer the question as to whether the application of the two conventions is ensured, the legislature may regularly assume, in the case of a state that because of its legal system and general practice guarantees in principle compliance of its administration with the rule of law, that the institutions of that state will respect existing law and therefore also the two conventions. This is not the case only if regular failure to respect the two conventions - either in general or with respect to refugees from certain countries - must be obvious to the legislature.

The legislature is afforded a certain latitude in the choice of the investigative means it employs as regards its observations and closer investigation occasioned by justified reservations. The legislature remains within these bounds when it makes its decision on the basis of official information from national and - to the extent accessible - international institutions and takes into account investigative means otherwise at its disposal.

The legislature enjoys discretionary and decision-making latitude when evaluating the factual basis obtained in this manner against the standard presented immediately above for ensuring the application of the two conventions. The decision of the legislature must be reasonable.

5. Persons who enter the country from a safe third country within the meaning of Article 16a.2 of the Basic Law may not invoke paragraph 1 thereof. Such foreigners are therefore excluded from the sphere of operation of the fundamental right to asylum (see 2. above).

Article 16a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law excludes, by virtue of its wording, invocation of the fundamental right to asylum under Article 16a.1 of the Basic Law. If a foreigner is to be sent back or returned to a safe third country, the substantive rights upon which a foreigner can otherwise rely to contest deportation (in particular ss. 51.1 and 53 of the Aliens Act (Ausländergesetz - AuslG)) do not come into consideration for that person due to the substantive reach of Article 16a.2 of the Basic Law unless the concrete situations of danger described below (see e below) exist in the third country. On the other hand, the humanitarian and personal reasons that speak against enforcement of a deportation order and may lead to issuance of a toleration permit pursuant to s. 55 of the Aliens Act, are not affected.

a) The legislative content of Article 16a.2 of the Basic Law derives from the notion of legislative confirmation of safety in the third country that is intended by this provision of the Basic Law. The Member States of the European Communities are considered safe by virtue of the decision embodied in the Basic Law. Other countries may be designated as safe third countries by the legislature (Article 16a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law) on the basis of findings to the effect that application of the Geneva Refugee Convention and the European Convention on Human Rights is ensured.

II.

The revision of the fundamental right to asylum in Article 16a of the Basic Law does not violate the limits of Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. The amending legislature has also complied with the requirements of Article 79.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

1. a) Article 79.3 of the Basic Law prohibits amendments to the Basic Law that affect the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 of the Basic Law. This includes not only the principle of respect for and protection of human dignity anchored in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. The acknowledgement of inviolable and inalienable human rights as the basis of the human community, peace and justice contained in Article 1.2 of the Basic Law also becomes important in that regard; in conjunction with the reference to the following fundamental rights contained in Article 1.3 of the Basic Law, the guarantees of these rights are in principle immune to restriction since they are indispensable to the maintenance of an order in compliance with Articles 1.1 and 1.2 of the Basic Law. The fundamental elements of the principles of the rule of law and the social state expressed in Articles 20.1 and 20.3 of the Basic Law must also be respected. For all that, Article 79.3 of the Basic Law requires, however, only that the principles mentioned not be affected. It does not, on the other hand, prevent the legislature from adopting amendments to modify those aspects of these principles embodied in positive law for appropriate reasons (see BVerfGE 84, 90 [120 and 121]).

b) Like every provision of the Basic Law, the fundamental right to asylum lies in principle at the disposal of the legislature, which may amend the Basic Law (Article 79.1 sentence 1 and 79.2 of the Basic Law). The limit imposed upon the amending legislature by Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, according to which amendment of the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 of the Basic Law is inadmissible, is not violated by the fact that foreigners are not afforded protection against political persecution by a guarantee in the form of a fundamental right. The Federal Constitutional Court, has, however, stated in connection with the definition of the term "persons persecuted on political grounds" in Article 16.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (old version) that the fundamental right to asylum is based on the conviction, defined by respect for the inviolability of human dignity, to the effect that no state has the right to threaten or violate the body, life or personal freedom of an individual for reasons that lie exclusively in that individual's political convictions, fundamental choice of religion or characteristics beyond that individual's control (see BVerfGE 80, 315 [333]; see also BVerfGE 54, 341 [357]; 76, 143 [157 and 158]).

It cannot, however, be inferred from this that the fundamental right to asylum is included in the substantive content of the guarantee of Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. What the substantive content of that guarantee is and the consequences to be drawn from its content for the powers of the German state must be determined independently.

If therefore the amending legislature is not prevented from suspending the fundamental right to asylum as such, it follows implicitly that Article 16a.2 of the Basic Law, sentences 1 and 2 which retracts the sphere of operation of the fundamental right from the level of the individual, paragraph 3 which restricts the substantive content of the guarantee in respect of procedure, paragraph 2 sentence 3 and paragraph 4 which reformulates the guarantee of legal recourse of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law and finally paragraph 5 which creates a basis for pan-European regulation of protection of refugees through agreements under international law, remain within the limits of a permissible constitutional amendment.

c) Article 16a.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law contains a special clause pertaining to the procedure for termination of the stay in the country in cases of entry from a safe third country. This clause modifies Article 19.4 of the Basic Law. The question as to whether the principles set forth in Article 20 of the Basic Law make the principle of personal recourse to the courts under the rule of law, which is concretely formulated in Article 19.4 of the Basic Law, inviolate (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [157 et seq.]) and can remain open. Article 16a.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law does not in any case infringe such a principle. This applies in particular since foreigners are to be sure returned immediately to the safe third country without prior review by a further controlling instance, but this measure is preceded by legal confirmation of the guarantee of application of the Geneva Refugee Convention and the European Convention on Human Rights in the third country.

2. The requirement of Article 79.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law to the effect that a constitutional amendment - in this case modification of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law by Article 16a.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law - must be reflected in the text of the Basic Law itself, is satisfied through insertion of Article 16a.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law into the text of the Basic Law.

XVIII. The Right to Vote – Article 38 of the Basic Law

Some General Comments

Article 38 of the Basic Law covers the right to vote by stipulating how the Federal Parliament is to be elected, namely in general, direct, free, equal, and secret elections. Article 38 is not part of the catalog of rights listed in Articles 1 to 19 and in that sense not part of, to use the analogy to the USA, the German bill of rights. However, Article 93.1(4a), which deals with the adjudicatory powers of the German Constitutional Court and specifically its power to hear constitutional complaints from individuals, includes certain other rights stipulated in the Basic Law as also being rights pursuable by a constitutional complaint and hence equal to the rights as contained in the first 19 articles of the Basic Law. The right to vote in Article 38 of the Basic Law is one of these rights. The others are the right to resistance in Article 20.4, rights pertaining to citizenship and access to the civil service in Article 33, the judicial rights to one's lawful judge (Article 101.1), fair trial and nulla poena sine lege (Article 103) and habeas corpus (Article 104).

Article 38 has also played a pivotal role as a segue for constitutional complaints regarding the reach of the powers of the European Union. The right to vote in Article 38 of the Basic Law is elevated by Article 93.1(4a) of the Basic Law to the same status that the fundamental rights listed in the catalog of Articles 1-19 of the Basic Law possess because all of these rights are subjective rights, i.e. they are procedurally secured by the constitutional complaint procedure to the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court has consistently held that the right to vote in Article 38 of the Basic Law not only protects the voting act in the narrow sense, e.g. the secrecy of the ballot, the generality of voting eligibility and the equality of the vote, but that the right to vote also protects the role of the institution whose constitution is determined by the elections. As the Constitutional Court has consistently held, that means that the right to vote in Article 38 of the Basic Law can be violated if the Parliament loses core powers. This interpretation of Article 38 of the Basic Law opened the pathway for citizens to challenge the amendment to the European Union Treaties and European Union acts using the constitutional complaint procedure and thus allowed the Constitutional Court to play a major role in determining the role Germany can play in European integration and in shaping the European Union.[181]

"Exclusion from Voting Rights under Law Governing Custodianship and Care for Adults" BVerfG, 29.1.2019, 2 BvC 62/14, http://www.bverfg.de/e/cs20190129_2bvc006214en.html

Explanatory Annotation

The case dealt with the statutory exclusion under the Federal Electoral Act from the right to vote for two groups of people. The first group are people who are under permanent full guardianship as stipulated in § 1896 of the German Civil Code (GCC) because, for reason of a mental illness or a physical, mental, or psychological handicap, such a person cannot take care of his or her affairs. Under this heading, more than 81,000 persons were affected by the exclusion from voting in the 2013 federal elections.[182] The second group are people confined to a psychiatric hospital after having been found to be incapable of criminal responsibility under the relevant provisions of the Federal Criminal Code (§§ 20, 63).

For the first group, the Constitutional Court considered the exclusion unconstitutional because logical defects demonstrated that the exclusion of this group of people is discriminatory. The group of people excluded under § 1896 German Civil Code (GCC) includes only those for who a custodian has been appointed. It does not include people whose condition is exactly the same but who, while they were still able to, provided sufficient power of attorney to a family member or third party to effectively take on the same tasks for them. In other words, the issue was not that persons incapable of taking care of their affairs are excluded from voting but that the discriminatory effect with which that result was achieved.[183] Also, and for the same reason, the Court regarded the exclusion from voting as a discrimination based on disability prohibited by Article 3.3(2) of the Basic Law.[184]

The Constitutional Court took a similar approach with the same result concerning the exclusion from the right to vote for the second group of people. For this group, the Court pointed to the fact that the defects required at the time of the perpetration of a crime to escape culpability have nothing to do with the ability or not to take part in elections now and that the same is true for the various psychiatric pathologies that justify being confined to a mental institution.[185] The Court also pointed to the logical and therefore discriminatory contradiction that under the challenged law those found to be incapable of criminal culpability for defects at the time of the commission of the crime who were not confined to a mental institution would not lose their vote.[186]

It is also interesting to note that the Constitutional Court gave significant regard to scientific studies that had been conducted in Germany.[187] One interesting aspect brought to light by this study was that the number of people under permanent guardianship in Germany varies greatly between states, with Bavaria placing 26 times more people per 100,000 of the population into permanent guardianship than the city-state of Bremen.[188] Secondly, the Court also took into account the international legal situation under various international treaties applicable to the right to vote[189], namely the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 25), the European Convention on Human Rights (Article 3 of Protocol No. 1) and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (Article 29). The Constitutional Court took issue and disagreed with previous determinations of the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities according to which all exclusions of disabled persons violate that Convention.[190] This discussion is a further example of the importance attributed by the Constitutional Court to international law covering human rights protection but it also shows that the Court is not willing to follow findings made by institutions created under those treaties just because such findings exist if they are regarded as unpersuasive and if the institution created to interpret the provisions of the treaty, here the CRDP-Commission, is regarded as not having been granted the power to make determinative findings.

Headnotes:

1. The exclusion from voting rights does not rule out the ability to initiate electoral complaint proceedings (Wahlprüfungsverfahren) pursuant to § 48(1) of the Federal Constitutional Court Act if the complaint concerns this exclusion.

2. Where the complainant only asserts a violation of subjective rights in electoral complaint proceedings, it is not necessary to also demonstrate that electoral irregularities impacted the allocation of seats in Parliament (Mandatsrelevanz).

3. The exclusion from the right to vote may be justified under constitutional law if a certain group of persons must be considered not sufficiently capable of participating in the communication process between the people and state organs.

4. § 13 no. 2 of the Federal Elections Act fails to satisfy the constitutional requirements regarding statutory categorisation, since the group of persons affected by the exclusion from voting rights is determined in a manner that runs counter to the right to equality without sufficient factual reasons.

5. § 13 no. 3 of the Federal Elections Act is not suitable for identifying persons who are generally incapable of participating in the democratic communication process.

[Excerpt from Press Release no. 13/2019 of 21 February 2019]

§ 13 no. 2 of the Federal Elections Act (Bundeswahlgesetz - BWahlG) provides for the exclusion from voting rights of persons who are placed under full guardianship in cases where guardianship is not merely temporary following a preliminary injunction.

§ 13 no. 3 BWahlG excludes persons from exercising the right to vote who are confined in a psychiatric hospital pursuant to § 63 of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB), after having committed an offence in a state in which they were exempt from criminal responsibility within the meaning of § 20 StGB. Complainants nos. 1, 2 and 4 to 8 partly belong to the group of persons affected by § 13 no. 2 BWahlG, and partly to the group affected by § 13 no. 3 BWahlG, and, based on this fact, were not allowed to participate in the elections to the 18th German Bundestag on 22 September 2013. Following an unsuccessful complaint against the validity of the election lodged with the German Bundestag, they challenge their exclusion from voting rights in the electoral complaint (Wahlprüfungsbeschwerde) under review here, claiming a violation of the principle of universal suffrage (Grundsatz der Allgemeinheit der Wahl) under Art. 38(1) first sentence of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) and the prohibition of disadvantaging under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG.

[End of excerpt]

B.

In respect of complainants nos. 1, 2 and 4 to 8, the electoral complaint is admissible. In respect of complainant no. 3, however, it is inadmissible. [24]

I.

The Federal Constitutional Court's competence for complaints against decisions of the Bundestag in electoral complaint proceedings follows from Art. 93(1) no. 5 in conjunction with Art. 41(2) and (3) GG, § 18 of the Law on the Scrutiny of Elections (Wahlprüfungsgesetz - WahlPrüfG) and § 48 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG). […] [25]

In this respect, the Federal Constitutional Court is also competent to decide on the complainants' application to declare § 13 nos. 2 and 3 BWahlG void. In the context of electoral complaints, the Court not only reviews whether the competent electoral organs and the German Bundestag observed federal election law but also whether federal election law is compatible with the Constitution (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE 16, 130 <135 and 136>; 121, 266 <295>; 123, 39 <68>; 132, 39 <47 para. 22>). [26]

II.

Complainants nos. 1, 2 and 4 to 8 have legal ability to lodge a complaint despite their exclusion from voting. According to the wording of § 48(1) BVerfGG, only "individuals who are entitled to vote" may lodge an electoral complaint. However, this does not rule out the ability to lodge a complaint if the complaint concerns precisely the entitlement to vote, given that a review of voting rights in terms of substantive law would otherwise not be possible at all. Therefore, it must be presumed that the complainants are entitled to vote when assessing the admissibility of such complaints (cf. BVerfGE 132, 39 <44 para. 12, 46 para. 20>). The ability of complainant no. 3 to lodge a complaint is not in doubt, given that he was entitled to vote in the elections to the 18th German Bundestag. [27]

IV.

The electoral complaint has not become moot on the grounds that the 18th parliamentary term has ended. [35]

[…] [36-38]

C.

To the extent that the electoral complaint is admissible, it is well-founded. The exclusion from voting rights pursuant to § 13 nos. 2 and 3 BWahlG violates the principle of universal suffrage under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG and the prohibition of disadvantaging on the basis of disability under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG. Since § 13 nos. 2 and 3 BWahlG are unconstitutional, the complainants' exclusion from voting based on these provisions violates their rights. [39]

I.

Specific constitutional requirements relating to the permissibility of statutory exclusions from voting rights follow from the principle of universal suffrage under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG (see 1.) and the prohibition of disadvantaging on the basis of disability under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG (see 2.). These requirements are in conformity with the obligations of the Federal Republic of Germany under international and European law (see 3.). [40]

1. The principle of universal suffrage guarantees all citizens the right to vote and to stand for elections (see a). The legislature can only exercise the mandate, conferred on it in Art. 38(3) GG, to shape [the electoral system] in a way that restricts the principle of universal suffrage if there are reasons that are recognised as legitimate under the Constitution and that have at least the same weight as the principle of universal suffrage. In this respect, it is entitled to simplify and categorise (see b). [41]

   a) Like the principle of equal suffrage (Grundsatz der Gleichheit der Wahl), the principle of universal suffrage guarantees equality of citizens, as required by the principle of democracy, with regard to political self-determination (cf. BVerfGE 99, 1 <13>; 132, 39 <47 para. 24>). Their equal treatment in respect of their ability to vote and to stand for elections is an essential pillar of the state order (cf. BVerfGE 6, 84 <91>; 11, 351 <360>; 132, 39 <47 para. 24>). In its positive dimension, the principle of universal suffrage guarantees the entitlement of all citizens to vote and to stand for elections (cf. BVerfGE 36, 139 <141>; 58, 202 <205>; 132, 39 <47 para. 24>). It requires that anyone can generally exercise their right to vote in as equal a manner as possible (cf. BVerfGE 58, 202 <205>; 99, 69 <77 and 78>). In its negative dimension, it prohibits the unjustified exclusion from participating in elections of individual citizens (cf. BVerfGE 36, 139 <141>; 58, 202 <205>) as well as the exclusion of certain groups for political, economic or social reasons (cf. BVerfGE 15, 165 <166 and 167>; 36, 139 <141>; 58, 202 <205>). Like the principle of equal suffrage, the principle of universal suffrage must be understood as requiring strict and formal equality regarding eligibility for elections to the German Bundestag (cf. BVerfGE 28, 220 <225>; 36, 139 <141>; 129, 300 <319>; 132, 39 <47 para. 24>); within the scope of the principle of universal suffrage, which is a specific manifestation of the general guarantee of the right to equality, resorting to Art. 3(1) GG is ruled out (cf. BVerfGE 99, 1 <8 et seq.> […]). [42]

b) aa) The principle of universal suffrage is not subject to an absolute prohibition of differentiation. […] Differentiations regarding the right to vote or to stand for elections must always be justified by specific reasons that are recognised as legitimate under the Constitution and that have at least the same weight as the principle of universal suffrage (cf. BVerfGE 42, 312 <340 and 341>; 132, 39 <48 para. 25>; cf. regarding the principle of equal suffrage BVerfGE 95, 408 <418>; 120, 82 <107>; 129, 300 <320>; 130, 212 <227 and 228>), qualifying them as "compelling reasons" (cf. BVerfGE 1, 208 <248 and 249>; 95, 408 <418>; 121, 266 <297 and 298>). [43]

bb) Reasons that can justify restrictions of the principle of universal suffrage, and thus differentiations between voters, include in particular the objectives, pursued by way of democratic elections, of safeguarding the function of elections as integrative processes for the formation of the political will of the people (Integrationsfunktion der Wahl) and of guaranteeing the proper functioning of the parliament to be elected (cf. BVerfGE 95, 408 <418>; 120, 82 <107>; 129, 300 <320 and 321>; 132, 39 <50 para. 32>). The first objective encompasses the safeguarding of the function of elections as a communication process (cf. BVerfGE 132, 39 <50 para. 32>). [44]

Provided that democracy should not be limited to a mere formal link between those governing and those governed, it depends on free and open communication (cf. BVerfGE 132, 39 <50 para. 33> with further references). […] Otherwise, elections cannot develop the integrative effects assigned to them. Exclusions from the right to vote may thus be justified under constitutional law if a group of persons must be considered not sufficiently capable of participating in the communication process between the people and state organs (cf. BVerfGE 132, 39 <51 para. 34>). [45]

cc) It is generally incumbent upon the legislature to balance the principle of universal suffrage against conflicting constitutional interests (cf. BVerfGE 95, 408 <420>; 121, 266 <303>; 132, 39 <48 para. 26>). In this respect, the Federal Constitutional Court only assesses whether the limits of the narrow latitude of the legislature have been overstepped; it does not assess whether the legislature's solutions are expedient or legally and politically desirable (cf. BVerfGE 6, 84 <94>; 51, 222 <237 and 238>; 95, 408 <420>; 121, 266 <303 and 304>; 132, 39 <48 para. 27>). To justify restrictions of universal suffrage, differentiating arrangements must be suitable and necessary for pursuing their objectives (cf. BVerfGE 6, 84 <94>; 51, 222 <238>; 71, 81 <96>; 95, 408 <418>). The permissible extent of such restrictions also depends on how intense the interference with voting rights is (cf. BVerfGE 71, 81 <96>; 95, 408 <418>). The legislature must be guided by political reality, rather than abstract scenarios, regarding its assessments and evaluations (cf. BVerfGE 7, 63 <75>; 82, 322 <344>; 95, 408 <418>). A strict standard must be applied when assessing whether a restriction of voting rights is justified (cf. BVerfGE 120, 82 <106>; 129, 300 <317, 320>; 132, 39 <48 para. 25>). [46]

However, the legislature is entitled to simplify and categorise when setting out the entitlement to vote, in consideration of the limits to its latitude resulting from the significance of voting rights and the stringent notion of democratic equality (cf. BVerfGE 132, 39 <49 para. 28>). […] [47]

[…] In principle, the legislature can base [its legislation] on the typical case, and does not have to accommodate every particular constellation by enacting corresponding special provisions (cf. BVerfGE 82, 159 <185 and 186>; 96, 1 <6>; 145, 106 <146 para. 107>). However, statutory generalisations must have the broadest possible basis and include all groups concerned and matters to be regulated (cf. BVerfGE 122, 210 <232 and 233>; 126, 268 <279>; 133, 377 <412 para. 87>). In particular, the legislature must not opt for an atypical case as the model for statutory categorisations; rather, it must reflect reality by standardising the typical case (cf. BVerfGE 116, 164 <183>; 122, 210 <233>; 126, 268 <279>; 137, 350 <375 para. 66>; 145, 106 <146 para. 107>). Moreover, categorisations are only permissible if the hardship linked to them can only be avoided with difficulty (cf. BVerfGE 84, 348 <360>; 87, 234 <255 and 256>; 100, 59 <90>), merely affects a relatively small number of persons, and if the unequal treatment does not have great weight (cf. BVerfGE 63, 119 <128>; 84, 348 <360>; 100, 59 <90>; 143, 246 <379 para. 362>). Hardship clauses may be necessary to avoid intolerable burdens. Furthermore, the advantages arising from categorisation must be in adequate relation to the unequal treatment it necessarily entails (cf. BVerfGE 110, 274 <292>; 117, 1 <31>; 120, 1 <30>; 123, 1 <19>; 133, 377 <413 para. 88>; 145, 106 <146 para. 108>). [48]

2. In addition to the principle of universal suffrage, exclusions from voting rights must be measured against Art. 3(3) second sentence GG (see a), which prohibits disadvantaging of persons on the basis of disability (see b). Notably, this prohibition is not without limitations. Disadvantaging persons with disabilities, however, requires compelling reasons (see c). [49]

a) The principle of universal suffrage under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG and the prohibition of disadvantaging set out in Art. 3(3) second sentence GG, as a specific manifestation of the general guarantee of the right to equality, apply concurrently (see aa). This also applies to electoral complaint proceedings (see bb). [50]

[…] [51-53]

b) Art. 3(3) second sentence GG prohibits any disadvantaging on the basis of disability. The reasons for disability are irrelevant in this respect. Rather, it is decisive whether a person's ability to lead their lives individually and independently is impaired in the longer term. Persons with disabilities include mentally ill persons if they have a longer-term impairment affecting them in such a way that they are prevented from fully, effectively and equally participating in society (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <306 and 307> with reference to Art. 1(2) of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, CRPD). [54]

An exclusion by public authority of persons with disabilities from possibilities of development and participation amounts to disadvantaging within the meaning of Art. 3(3) second sentence GG if the exclusion is not adequately compensated by disability-specific support measures (cf. BVerfGE 96, 288 <303>; 99, 341 <357>; 128, 138 <156>). Accordingly, persons with disabilities are disadvantaged if state measures compound their situation compared to the situation of persons without disabilities. This is the case if they are denied possibilities of development and participation that are available to others (cf. BVerfGE 96, 288 <302 and 303>; 99, 341 <357>). Ultimately, any form of unequal treatment that places persons with disabilities at a disadvantage is prohibited (cf. Federal Constitutional Court, Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG, Orders of the Second Chamber of the First Senate of 24 March 2016 - 1 BvR 2012/13 -, juris, para. 11 and of 10 June 2016 - 1 BvR 742/16 -, juris, para. 10; see also BVerfGE 99, 341 <357>). This also includes indirect disadvantaging where the exclusion of persons with disabilities from possibilities of participation is not intended, but a typical incidental consequence of a measure taken by public authority […]. [55]

In addition to the prohibition of disadvantaging, Art. 3(3) second sentence GG also includes a mandate to support persons with disabilities. It grants a claim to equal participation within the limits of the financial, staff, factual and organisational resources available (cf. BVerfGE 96, 288 <308>). [56]

c) However, Art. 3(3) second sentence GG, too, is not absolute (cf. BVerfGE 99, 341 <357>). Disadvantaging persons with disabilities by law is only permissible if it is justified by compelling reasons (cf. BVerfGE 85, 191 <206 and 207>; 99, 341 <357>; additionally BVerfG, Order of the Second Chamber of the First Senate of 10 June 2016 - 1 BvR 742/16 -, juris, para. 10 […]) [57]

There is a compelling reason within the meaning set out above if persons, precisely because of their disability, lack certain intellectual or physical abilities that are indispensable for exercising a right. If persons lack the necessary mental capacity due to their disability, and if this cannot be remedied by suitable assistance systems, the exclusion of a person from a right requiring this capacity does not amount to discrimination on the basis of disability within the meaning of Art. 3(3) second sentence GG (cf. BVerfGE 99, 341 <357 […]). [58]

Other than that, unequal treatment on the basis of disability can only be justified by virtue of a balancing with conflicting constitutional law (cf. BVerfGE 92, 91 <109>; 114, 357 <364>) and on the basis of a strict proportionality test […]. In that regard, the unequal treatment must be suitable, necessary and appropriate for protecting another constitutional interest that is at least of equivalent weight. The legislature's latitude is narrow in this respect. Thus, in the present context, the requirements for justifying a restriction of the prohibition of disadvantaging persons with disabilities under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG correspond to the strict requirements for an interference with the principle of universal suffrage under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG. [59]

3. The standards set out above meet the obligations of the Federal Republic of Germany under international law. While the Basic Law must be interpreted in a manner that is open to international law (see a), the international law provisions that are relevant in relation to the challenged exclusions from voting rights do not give rise to requirements that go beyond the constitutional demands set out above (see b). [60]

a) Domestically, obligations arising from international treaties do not have constitutional rank (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <317>). The federal legislature approved the relevant provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) including its Optional Protocols through acts of parliament pursuant to Art. 59(2) GG […]. They thus have the rank of federal law in the German legal order (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 111, 307 <316 and 317>; 128, 326 <367>; 141, 1 <19 para. 45>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>; 148, 296 <127>). [61]

Nonetheless, these provisions have constitutional significance as guidelines for the interpretation of the content and scope of fundamental rights and rule-of-law principles of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 83, 119 <128>; 111, 307 <316 and 317, 329>; 120, 180 <200 and 201>; 128, 326 <367 and 368>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>; 148, 296 <128>). Their use as guidelines is a manifestation of the Basic Law's openness to international law - the Basic Law does not oppose the Federal Republic of Germany's involvement in international and supranational contexts and its further development, but rather requires and expects such involvement. As laid down in its preamble, the Basic Law seeks the Federal Republic of Germany's integration into the legal order of free and peaceful states as an equal partner (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <319>). Where possible, the Basic Law must be interpreted in such a way as to avoid a conflict with Germany's international law obligations (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <317 and 318>; 141, 1 <27 para. 65>). [62]

However, the reference to international law provisions as guidelines for interpretation does not aim to schematically align individual constitutional concepts in parallel to international law (cf. BVerfGE 137, 273 <320 and 321 para. 128>; 141, 1 <30 para. 72> with further references). Rather, also under an interpretation in a manner that is open to international law, similarities in the wording of legal provisions must not cover up differences that arise from the context of legal orders (cf. BVerfGE 148, 296 <131>). Furthermore, an interpretation of the Constitution in a manner that is open to international law may not exceed the recognised methods of interpretation of statutes and of the Constitution (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <329>; 128, 326 <371>; 141, 1 <30 para. 72>; BVerfGE 148, 296 <133>). To the extent that there is room for interpretation and assessments within the scope of recognised methods of interpretation, German courts are obliged to give precedence to an interpretation that is in accordance with international conventions and treaties. However, it is not contrary to the aim of openness to international law if international treaty law is not observed in exceptional cases, provided this is the only way to avert a violation of fundamental constitutional principles (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <319>; BVerfGE 148, 296 <133>). [63]

When invoking the ECHR as a guideline for interpretation, the Federal Constitutional Court takes into account decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) even if they do not concern the same subject matter. This follows from the function of the ECtHR's case-law, which - at least de facto - provides direction and guidance for interpreting the ECHR, also beyond the individual case at issue (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <320>; 128, 326 <368>; 148, 296 <129>). Therefore, the domestic impact of ECtHR decisions is not limited to the obligation to take them into account with regard to the specific circumstances they concern (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <328>; 112, 1 <25 and 26>; 148, 296 <129>). Invoking the ECtHR's case-law as a guideline for interpretation of constitutional law beyond individual cases serves to give effect to the guarantees of the ECHR in Germany as comprehensively as possible and may also help avoid violations of the Convention by the Federal Republic of Germany (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <369>; 148, 296 <130>). According to Art. 46 ECHR, the Contracting Parties have undertaken to abide by a final judgment of the ECtHR in any case to which they are parties (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <320>). However, beyond the scope of application of Art. 46 ECHR, the specific circumstances of the case must be given particular consideration to provide for contextualisation when invoking the ECtHR's case-law as a guideline (cf. BVerfGE 148, 296 <132>). [64]

While statements from committees or similar treaty bodies have significant weight, they are not binding on international or domestic courts (cf. BVerfGE 142, 313 <346 para. 90>; BVerfG, Judgment of the Second Senate of 24 July 2018 - 2 BvR 309/15 inter alia -, juris, para. 91). This also applies to the reports (Art. 39 CRPD), guidelines (Art. 35(3) CRPD) and recommendations (Art. 36(1) CRPD) concerning the interpretation of the provisions of the Convention and the legal situation in Germany issued by the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities pursuant to Art. 34 CRPD (cf. BVerfGE 142, 313 <345 and 346 para. 89>; BVerfG, Judgment of the Second Senate of 24 July 2018 - 2 BvR 309/15 inter alia -, juris, para. 91). The Committee has no mandate to issue binding interpretations of the text of the Convention. It is also not competent to further develop international conventions beyond the agreements and practices of the treaty parties (cf. Art. 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 23 May 1969, Federal Law Gazette, Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl II 1985 p. 939). In the context of an interpretation of domestic law that is open to international law, domestic courts should address the view of such treaty bodies; they do not, however, have to endorse it (cf. BVerfGE 142, 313 <346 and 347 para. 90>; see also - regarding decisions of international tribunals - BVerfGE 111, 307 <317 and 318>; 128, 326 <366 et seq., 370>; established case-law). [65]

b) The provisions of Art. 25 letter b ICCPR (see aa), Art. 29 letter a CRPD (see bb) and Art. 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention (see cc) do not require any modification of the constitutional standards for exclusions from voting rights set out above. [66]

aa) Art. 25 ICCPR does not go beyond the requirements for restricting the entitlement to vote under Art. 38(1) first sentence and Art. 3(3) second sentence GG, given that it does not contain an absolute prohibition of any exclusion from voting rights. The applicable parts of the provision read as follows: [67]

> Every citizen shall have the right and the opportunity, without any of the distinctions mentioned in article 2 and without unreasonable restrictions
>
>
> b) To vote and to be elected at genuine periodic elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret ballot, guaranteeing the free expression of the will of the electors;
> c) (…)

According to its wording, the provision thus protects voting rights against "unreasonable restrictions". The ICCPR's Human Rights Committee stated that it does not unreasonably restrict Art. 25 letter b ICCPR if the exercise of voting rights is restricted by a law on grounds that are objective and reasonable (cf. ICCPR Human Rights Committee, General Comment No. 25, 12 July 1996, UN Doc CCPR/C/21/Rev. 1/ Add. 7, paras. 4 and 10). At the same time, it expressly pointed out that Art. 29 letter a CRPD does not merit a different conclusion since this provision does not rule out exclusions from voting rights on grounds that are reasonable and objective either (cf. ICCPR Human Rights Committee, Concluding observations on the 3rd periodic report of Hong Kong, China, 29 April 2013, UN Doc CCPR/C/CHN-HKG/CO/3, para. 24; Concluding observations on the 3rd periodic report of Paraguay, 29 April 2013, UN Doc CCPR/C/PRY/CO/3, para. 11). This plausible interpretation of Art. 25 letter b ICCPR does not give rise to stricter standards than the standards laid down in Art. 38(1) first sentence GG and Art. 3(3) second sentence GG since the protection of constitutional interests of equal value always meets the requirement of an objective and reasonable ground. [68]

bb) Neither does Art. 29 letter a in conjunction with Art. 12(2) CRPD merit a modification of the constitutional standards set out above, in particular regarding Art. 3(3) second sentence GG. [69]

(1) Art. 29 letter a CRPD reads as follows: [70]

> States Parties shall guarantee to persons with disabilities political rights and the opportunity to enjoy them on an equal basis with others, and shall undertake:
>
> a) To ensure that persons with disabilities can effectively and fully participate in political and public life on an equal basis with others, directly or through freely chosen representatives, including the right and opportunity for persons with disabilities to vote and be elected, inter alia, by:
>
> i. Ensuring that voting procedures, facilities and materials are appropriate, accessible and easy to understand and use;
>
> ii. Protecting the right of persons with disabilities to vote by secret ballot in elections and public referendums without intimidation, and to stand for elections, to effectively hold office and perform all public functions at all levels of government, facilitating the use of assistive and new technologies where appropriate;
> iii. Guaranteeing the free expression of the will of persons with disabilities as electors and to this end, where necessary, at their request, allowing assistance in voting by a person of their own choice.

Neither a general prohibition of exclusions from voting rights nor a prohibition of exclusions specifically of persons with disabilities can be inferred from this provision. Exclusions from voting rights, which equally affect persons with disabilities and persons without disabilities, are not within the scope of application of the provision given that the provision guarantees persons with disabilities participation in public and political life, including the right to vote, "on an equal basis with others" [71]

Yet even if an exclusion from voting rights affects only or primarily persons with disabilities, an absolute prohibition of exclusions from voting rights cannot be inferred from Art. 29 letter a (iii) CRPD. According to the provision, States Parties to the CRPD shall guarantee the "free expression of the will" (French: libre expression de la volonté) of persons with disabilities as electors and, where necessary, allow assistance in voting by another person to this end. Accordingly, the provision is aimed at the non-discriminatory development of the free electoral will by persons with disabilities. However, this requires the ability to form and express an independent electoral will. Thus, the persons concerned must have the cognitive skills necessary to make a free and self-determined electoral decision […]. If, even when using all possible means of assistance, persons lack the ability to participate in the democratic communication process and to make a self-determined electoral decision on this basis, a corresponding exclusion from voting rights does not violate Art. 29 CRPD, even though the provision does not expressly address justifications for restricting voting rights of persons with disabilities […]. [72]

(2) Art. 12 CRPD does not merit a different conclusion. That provision reads as follows: [73]

> (2) States Parties shall recognize that persons with disabilities enjoy legal capacity on an equal basis with others in all aspects of life.
>
> (4) Parties shall ensure that all measures that relate to the exercise of legal capacity provide for appropriate and effective safeguards to prevent abuse in accordance with international human rights law. Such safeguards shall ensure that measures relating to the exercise of legal capacity respect the rights, will and preferences of the person, are free of conflict of interest and undue influence, are proportional and tailored to the person's circumstances, apply for the shortest time possible and are subject to regular review by a competent, independent and impartial authority or judicial body. The safeguards shall be proportional to the degree to which such measures affect the person's rights and interests.

Thus, voting rights are also within the provision's scope of protection. However, the recognition under Art. 12(2) CRPD of legal capacity of persons with disabilities on an equal basis with others is not absolute. This follows from the regulatory context of Art. 12(2) CRPD and Art. 12(4) CRPD, which specifically refers to measures restricting the exercise of legal capacity of the persons concerned. The Convention does not prohibit such measures in general; rather, it restricts their permissibility, including by obliging the States Parties to the Convention under Art. 12(4) CRPD to provide for appropriate safeguards protecting the persons concerned against conflicts of interests, abuse and disrespect of their rights, and to ensure proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <307>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>; BVerfG, Judgment of the Second Senate of 24 July 2018 - 2 BvR 309/15 inter alia -, juris, para. 90). In light of the above, the Court has already decided that the provisions of the Convention, although they aim to safeguard and strengthen the autonomy of persons with disabilities, do not generally prohibit measures that are carried out against those persons' natural will and which relate to their limited capability for self-determination due to illness (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <307>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>; BVerfG, Judgment of the Second Senate of 24 July 2018 - 2 BvR 309/15 inter alia -, juris, para. 90). The same must also apply to exclusions from voting rights specifically of persons with disabilities if such exclusions are tied to the inability to participate in the democratic discourse and the resulting inability to make a self-determined electoral decision. They do not violate Art. 12 CRPD if the requirements of Art. 12(4) are satisfied, that is if the respective arrangement is proportionate, tailored to the circumstances of the persons concerned, applies for the shortest time possible, is subject to regular review and if appropriate and effective safeguards to prevent abuse are in place. Within these limits, Art. 12 CRPD does not require an interpretation of Art. 29 letter a CRPD to the effect that it contains an absolute prohibition of any exclusion from voting rights of persons with disabilities […]. [74]

(3) Ultimately, the fact that the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities has a different legal view in this regard does not merit a different conclusion (see a). Neither is this view binding under constitutional law nor is it convincing in substance (see b). [75]

(a) In the Committee's opinion, full and effective participation of persons with disabilities requires the unlimited recognition of their legal capacity. According to the Committee, this is guaranteed by Art. 12(2) CRPD, which does not leave any scope for restrictions linked to a lack of decision-making ability. Accordingly, exclusions from voting rights cannot be justified by a lack of decision-making ability of persons with disabilities (cf. Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, General Comment No. 1, Article 12: Equal recognition before the law, 19 May 2014, UN Doc CRPD/C/GC/1, para. 12 et seq., 48). Given that, in the Committee's view, electoral rights of persons with disabilities can neither be restricted nor excluded (cf. Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Communication No. 4/2011, 20 September 2013, UN Doc CRPD/C/10/D/4/2011, para. 9.4), it considers exclusions from voting rights pursuant to § 13 nos. 2 and 3 BWahlG to be in breach of the Convention (cf. Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Concluding observations on the initial report of Germany, 13 May 2015, UN Doc CRPD/C/DEU/CO/1, paras. 53 and 54). This is also the legal view taken in a study of 21 December 2011 published by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on participation in political and public life by persons with disabilities (UN Doc A/HRC/19/36 […]). [76]

(b) However, the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities has no mandate to issue binding interpretations of the CRPD (cf. BVerfGE 142, 313 <346 and 347 para. 90>; BVerfG, Judgment of the Second Senate of 24 July 2018 - 2 BvR 309/15 inter alia -, juris, para. 91). Such a mandate could only be considered if the practice of the States Parties followed the Committee's view. Yet this is not the case, since only a clear minority of the States Parties to the CRPD has inclusive voting rights without any differentiations […]. Moreover, the view of the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities contradicts the position of the ICCPR Committee. Even though the ICCPR Committee expressly found that exclusions from voting rights can be justified by objective and reasonable grounds even in consideration of Art. 29 letter a CRPD (cf. ICCPR Human Rights Committee, Concluding observations on the 3rd periodic report of Hong Kong, China, 29 April 2013, UN Doc CCPR/C/ CHN-HKG/CO/3, para. 24; Concluding observations on the 3rd periodic report of Paraguay, 29 April 2013, UN Doc CCPR/C/PRY/ CO/3, para. 11), the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities did not address this finding. It also did not make any statement on the fact that France and Romania have issued declarations of interpretation regarding the CRPD according to which exclusions from voting rights are permissible within the scope of Art. 29 CRPD if the conditions of Art. 12(4) CRPD are observed […]. Above all, the legal view of the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities does not sufficiently take into account Art. 12(4) CRPD. The Committee only infers from Art. 12 CRPD the obligation of States Parties to create effective safeguards to guarantee persons with disabilities the actual exercise of their legal capacity. According to the Committee, the provision does not provide a basis for restrictions of legal capacity. This, however, fails to sufficiently accommodate the regulatory content of Art. 12(4) CRPD. The provision requires "appropriate and effective safeguards for all measures that relate to the exercise of legal capacity" to prevent abuse. Art. 12(4) second and third sentences CRPD then describes the conditions of safeguards that are in conformity with the Convention, particularly requiring the observation of the principle of proportionality. Thus, the provision clearly assumes that there is a possibility of taking measures that restrict the exercise of legal capacity if these conditions are observed (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <307>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>; BVerfG, Judgment of the Second Senate of 24 July 2018 - 2 BvR 309/15 inter alia -, juris, para. 90). [77]

(cc) Additional requirements for the permissibility of exclusions from voting rights under constitutional law also do not follow from Art. 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention, which reads as follows: [78]

> The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot, under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature.

According to the case-law of the ECtHR, which is competent to interpret the ECHR and its Protocols pursuant to Art. 32 ECHR, the right to free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot guaranteed by Art. 3 of Protocol No. 1 is not guaranteed without limitations. Rather, the Contracting States must be granted a wide margin of appreciation when shaping electoral law. However, restrictions of voting rights must serve a legitimate aim and observe the principle of proportionality (cf. ECtHR, Mathieu-Mohin and Clerfayt v. Belgium, Judgment of 2 March 1987, No. 9267/81, § 52; ECtHR <GC>, Hirst v. The United Kingdom <No. 2>, Judgment of 6 October 2005, No. 74025/01, § 62). [79]

If all prisoners are indiscriminately stripped of their voting rights, this amounts to a general, automatic and blanket restriction of voting rights, which exceeds the margin of appreciation of the Contracting States and is thus incompatible with Art. 3 of Protocol

No. 1 (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Hirst v. The United Kingdom <No. 2>, Judgment of 6 October 2005, No. 74025/01, § 82; see also ECtHR, Anchugov and Gladkov v. Russia, Judgment of 4 July 2013, No. 11157/04 and 15162/05, §§ 93 et seq.). According to the ECtHR, an individual judicial decision is generally suitable to guarantee the proportionality of voting rights restrictions. However, it cannot be assumed that a restriction of voting rights is disproportionate merely because it was not ordered by a judge (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Scoppola v. Italy <No. 3>, Judgment of 22 May 2012, No. 126/05, § 99). [80]

The ECtHR recognised that restricting participation in elections to persons capable of assessing the consequences of their decisions is a legitimate aim that can generally justify exclusions from voting rights (cf. ECtHR, Alajos Kiss v. Hungary, Judgment of 20 May 2010, No. 38832/06, § 38). Nonetheless, in a case in which the order of partial guardianship already led to an exclusion from voting rights, the ECtHR considered this arrangement a violation of the principle of proportionality. In this regard, the court referred to the CRPD, pointing out that the Contracting States' margin of appreciation for shaping electoral law was narrower in respect of groups of persons that had faced considerable discrimination in the past (cf. ECtHR, Alajos Kiss v. Hungary, Judgment of 20 May 2010, No. 38832/06, § 44). [81]

Overall, an absolute prohibition of exclusions from voting rights for persons with disabilities cannot be inferred from the ECtHR's case-law. The ECtHR's recognition of exclusions from voting rights that serve a legitimate aim and observe the principle of proportionality as well as the emphasis on the Contracting States' margin of appreciation in the context of Art. 3 of Protocol No. 1 do not entail stricter requirements than those applying to restrictions of voting rights under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG and Art. 3(3) second sentence GG. [83]

II.

Exclusions from voting rights of persons placed under full guardianship pursuant to § 13 no. 2 BWahlG (see 1.) and of criminal offenders confined in a psychiatric hospital for lack of criminal responsibility pursuant to § 13 no. 3 BWahlG (see 2.) are unconstitutional. [83]

1. The exclusion from voting rights of persons who have an appointed guardian to attend to all their affairs where this is not merely a temporary situation following a preliminary injunction (§ 13 no. 2 BWahlG) violates both the principle of universal suffrage under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG (see a) and the prohibition of disadvantaging on the basis of disability under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG (see b). [84]

a) § 13 no. 2 BWahlG restricts the principle of universal suffrage (see aa); yet this interference does not protect constitutional interests of equal value in a manner that sufficiently satisfies the constitutional requirements for statutory categorisations (see bb). [85]

aa) § 13 no. 2 BWahlG provides for the exclusion from voting rights of persons who have an appointed guardian to attend to all their affairs, thus affecting the guarantee that all citizens can equally exercise their right to vote (cf. BVerfGE 28, 220 <225>; 36, 139 <141>; 58, 202 <205>; 59, 119 <125>; 99, 69 <77 and 78>; 132, 39 <47 para. 24>). [86]

bb) This interference with the principle of universal suffrage is not justified. § 13 no. 2 BWahlG aims to protect a constitutional interest that is of the same value as universal suffrage (see 1).It is already doubtful whether the provision is at all suitable for achieving this aim (see 2). In any case, it violates the constitutional requirements regarding statutory criteria for categorisations given that it is designed in such a way that it is incompatible with the right to equality (see 3). [87]

(0) (a) By way of § 13 no. 2 BWahlG as amended on 12 September 1990, the legislature seeks to exclude persons from voting rights who lack the mental capacity to understand the nature and significance of elections; it thus seeks to safeguard the function of elections as integrative processes for the formation of the political will of the people. [88]

[…] [89-90]

(b) Other grounds that are recognised as legitimate under the Constitution and which could justify the interference with the principle of universal suffrage are not ascertainable. [91]

(aa) This applies in particular to the constitutional interest of protecting the integrity of elections against manipulation and abuse. […] [92]

(bb) Nor can the interference with the regulatory content of Art. 38(1) first sentence GG that is linked to exclusions from voting rights be legitimated by the submission that such exclusions on the basis of "mental ailments" were a "traditional restriction" of universal suffrage (see, however, BVerfGE 36, 139 <141 and 142>; 67, 146 <147>; see also Bavarian Constitutional Court, Bayerischer Verfassungsgerichtshof - BayVerfGH, Decision of 9 July 2002 - Vf. 9-VII-01 -, juris, para. 43 […]). Under the Constitution, tradition is not recognised as a legitimate ground […]. [93]

(2) § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is only suitable for achieving the aim of safeguarding the function of the election as an integrative process if the provision concerns a group of persons that is not sufficiently able to participate in the democratic communication process. Yet this is not the case here. [94]

(bb) Concerns in this regard arise from the fact that mental capacity and capacity for communication required to make a self-determined electoral decision are not assessed in the procedure to appoint a guardian pursuant to § 1896(1) first sentence of the Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch - BGB). […] The right to vote is a highly personal right; its exercise by a guardian is impermissible under constitutional law […], and appointment of a guardian thus cannot pertain to this right from the outset […]. Therefore, the ability to participate in the democratic formation of the political will is irrelevant for the assessment and the outcome of the procedure to appoint a guardian. […] [95]

In addition, the considerable regional differences in respect of exclusions from voting rights on the basis of guardianship must be considered when determining whether § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is suitable for identifying persons unable to participate in elections. […] [96]

(cc) The appointment of a guardian for all affairs is subject to strict statutory requirements. To appoint such a guardian, it is required to establish a need for full guardianship as well as the specific need that a guardian take care of all affairs of the person concerned [because their needs cannot be met by other means] […]. Appointing a guardian for all affairs can only be considered if an adult cannot attend to any of their own affairs due to illness or disability […]. [97]

[…] The total share of persons excluded from voting rights under § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is 1.3‰ of those who were entitled to vote in the 2013 Bundestag elections […]. [98]

The legislature's assumption that the appointment of a guardian for all affairs typically relates to cases in which persons lack the mental capacity required to participate in the democratic communication process is at least not implausible. [99]

(3) Ultimately, however, it is irrelevant whether § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is suitable for identifying persons who lack the mental capacity required to exercise their voting rights. This is because the provision fails to satisfy the constitutional requirements regarding statutory categorisation since the group of persons affected by the exclusion from voting rights pursuant to § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is determined in a manner that violates the right to equality without sufficient factual reasons. [100]

(a) § 13 no. 2 BWahlG provides for the exclusion from voting rights of persons who are not only unable to attend to their own affairs because of illness or disability, but who have also been placed under full guardianship for this reason. Yet the principle of necessity

(Erforderlichkeitsgrundsatz) that applies universally to guardianship law prohibits the appointment of a guardian if the need for guardianship of the person concerned can be met by other means […]. This is the case in particular if the person concerned has completed a lasting power of attorney or an advance directive or is still capable of completing them and if there is a person who is willing and suitable to perform this task and enjoys the trust of the person concerned […]. The same applies if the person concerned gets sufficient care from their family […] or otherwise […]. [101]

(b) If no guardian is actually appointed despite the need for full guardianship, § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is not applicable. […] [102]

(c) […] Thus, whether or not persons are deprived of their voting rights ultimately depends on whether a guardian is appointed based on the specific need for guardianship, or whether no such appointment is necessary. This circumstance, which is coincidental in practice, does not constitute a reason inherent in the matter which could justify the unequal treatment under electoral law of persons who are equally in need of guardianship (see also Constitutional Court of Austria, Österreichischer Verfassungsgerichtshof, Decision of 7 October 1987 - G 109/87 - para. 2.2.1, regarding the 1971 Regulations for National Council Elections). [103]

(d) In light of this, it cannot be asserted that the legislature ties its decision to a strictly formal criterion that is clear, simple to determine and particularly practical for organising elections (cf. on this BayVerfGH, Decision of 9 July 2002 - Vf. 9-VII-01 -, juris, para. 47). [104]

[…] The legislature must realistically base generalising provisions on the typical case (cf. BVerfGE 116, 164 <182 and 183>; 122, 210 <233>; 126, 268 <278>; 132, 39 <49 para. 29>; established case-law). Furthermore, the advantages arising from categorisation must be in adequate proportion to the unequal treatment linked to it (cf. BVerfGE 110, 274 <292>; 117, 1 <31>; 120, 1 <30>; 123, 1 <19>; 133, 377 <413 para. 88>; 137, 350 <375 para. 66>; 145, 106 <146 para. 108>). This requirement is only met if the hardship and injustices resulting from categorisation can only be avoided with difficulty, merely affect a relatively small number of persons and if the extent of unequal treatment is limited (cf. BVerfGE 63, 119 <128>; 84, 348 <360>; 133, 377 <413 para. 88>; 145, 106 <146 and 147 para. 108>). [105]

This is not the case here. In the 2013 Bundestag elections, a total of 81,220 persons under full guardianship was excluded from voting pursuant to § 13 no. 2 BWahlG […]. The share of persons under full guardianship in relation to the total number of persons who are incapable of attending to all their affairs cannot be established. The legislature did not address this issue (cf. Bundestag document, Bundestagsdrucksache

- BTDrucks 11/4528, pp. 188 and 189). It cannot be ruled out that the group of those in need of full guardianship who do not have an appointed guardian as this is not deemed necessary given their circumstances is not significantly smaller, or is even larger, than the group of those actually placed under full guardianship, who are excluded from exercising the right to vote. The interference with the right to equality is not minor, given that, due to their exclusion from voting rights, the persons concerned are permanently deprived of the most noble right conferred on citizens in a democratic state (cf. BVerfGE 1, 14 <33>). In light of this, claiming that there are no practical alternatives to § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is not sufficient for legitimising the disadvantaging of persons under full guardianship in relation to persons with a comparable need for guardianship [who do not have an appointed guardian]. [106]

b) In addition to violating the principle of universal suffrage, § 13 no. 2 BWahlG also violates the prohibition of disadvantaging on the basis of disability pursuant to Art. 3(3) second sentence GG given that the provision results in unfavourable treatment of persons with disabilities (see aa) which is not justified by compelling reasons (see bb). [107]

aa) The persons concerned are disadvantaged within the meaning of Art. 3(3) second sentence GG because the exclusion from voting rights pursuant to § 13 no. 2 BWahlG entails a restriction by public authority of the possibilities of development and participation of those affected by the provision (cf. BVerfGE 96, 288 <303>; 99, 341 <357>; 128, 138 <156>). [108]

This disadvantaging also occurs because of disability. According to its wording, § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is tied to the appointment of a guardian for all affairs. However, pursuant to § 1896(1) first sentence BGB, such an appointment requires a "mental illness or physical, mental or psychological disabilities". […] As these are impairments that do not only temporarily hinder the full and effective participation in society of the persons concerned on an equal basis with others (Art. 1(2) CRPD), "mental illnesses" as referred to in § 1896(1) first sentence BGB are covered by the concept of disability within the meaning of Art. 3(3) second sentence GG (cf. in this respect BVerfGE 96, 288 <301>; 99, 341 <356 and 357> […]). The exclusion from voting rights pursuant to § 13 no. 2 BWahlG thus only targets persons with disabilities. [109]

The objection that the exclusion from voting rights is not based on disability or illness, but on the resulting inability to decide one's own affairs […] does not merit a different assessment. Art. 3(3) second sentence GG also protects against indirect impairments. Ultimately, any form of unequal treatment that places persons with disabilities at a disadvantage is prohibited (cf. BVerfG, Orders of the Second Chamber of the First Senate of 24 March 2016 - 1 BvR 2012/13 -, juris, para. 11, and of 10 June 2016 - 1 BvR 742/16 -, juris, para. 10). [110]

bb) The interference with the prohibition of disadvantaging persons with disabilities under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG is not justified. To be justified, this interference would require a compelling reason; the specific design of the provision would have to take into consideration the constitutional requirements for statutory categorisation and would have to be imperative for accommodating the particular situation resulting from disability (cf. BVerfGE 99, 341 <357>), and for excluding persons from voting rights who are not sufficiently capable of participating in the democratic communication process due to their disability in order to safeguard the function of the election as an integrative process. These requirements are not satisfied: the provision determines the group of persons who are excluded from voting rights on the basis of lack of mental capacity resulting from their disability in a fragmentary manner and without sufficient factual reasons; this violates the right to equality. The fact that persons who do not have an appointed guardian merely because it is not necessary [due to their personal situation] retain their voting rights leads to a disadvantaging of those affected by § 13 no. 2 BWahlG that cannot be justified by reasons relating to the nature of voting rights. In that respect, the considerations set out with regard to Art. 38(1) first sentence GG apply accordingly to Art. 3(3) second sentence GG. [111]

2. § 13 no. 3 BWahlG also violates the constitutional requirements regarding the exclusion from voting rights. The exclusion from voting rights of persons who are confined in a psychiatric hospital based on an order issued pursuant to § 63 in conjunction with § 20 StGB is neither compatible with the principle of universal suffrage under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG (see a) nor with the prohibition of disadvantaging on the basis of disability under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG (see b). [112]

a) § 13 no. 3 BWahlG interferes with the regulatory content of the principle of universal suffrage (see aa), and this interference is not justified by compelling reasons (see bb). [113]

aa) The principle of universal suffrage guarantees that all citizens can equally exercise their right to vote (cf. BVerfGE 28, 220 <225>; 36, 139 <141>; 58, 202 <205>; 59, 119 <125>; 99, 69 <77 and 78>; 132, 39 <47 para. 24>). This guarantee is restricted when persons who are confined in a psychiatric hospital based on an order issued pursuant to § 63 in conjunction with § 20 StGB are excluded from voting rights pursuant to § 13 no. 3 BWahlG. [114]

bb) This interference with the principle of universal suffrage is not justified. § 13 no. 3 BWahlG is not suitable for identifying persons who are generally incapable of participating in the democratic communication process (see 1). Moreover, the provision arbitrarily disadvantages persons affected by the provision (see 2). [115]

(1) Regarding § 13 no. 3 BWahlG, too, the only compelling reason that might justify the interference with the scope of protection of Art. 38(1) first sentence GG is the aim of safeguarding the function of elections as integrative processes for the formation of the political will of the people. Thus, it would be necessary that the provision, by way of permissible statutory categorisation, concerns a group of persons that is not sufficiently capable of participating in the communication process between the people and state organs. This, however, is not the case. A relevant lack of the mental capacity required to exercise voting rights can neither be generally inferred from an exemption from criminal responsibility established for the time a crime was committed and from the illnesses underlying it pursuant to § 20 StGB (a), nor from the fact that the other requirements for ordering confinement in a psychiatric hospital pursuant to § 63 StGB are met (b). […]. [116]

(a) Under § 20 StGB, persons are exempt from criminal responsibility if they are incapable of appreciating the unlawfulness of their actions or of acting accordingly due to a pathological mental disorder, a profound consciousness disorder, mental deficiency or any other serious mental disorder. It is, however, not evident that the mental capacity required for exercising voting rights is typically lacking under these circumstances. [117]

[…] [118-122]

(aa) In addition, "exemption from criminal responsibility" within the meaning of § 20 StGB is not a permanent condition independent of a criminal offence, but only describes the mental condition of a person at the time they committed the offence […]. It is sufficient that mental capacity, or even just the capacity of control, which means the ability to act according to one's appreciation of the unlawfulness of a crime, are impaired at the time the crime is committed. § 20 StGB does not require a permanent impairment; the finding that a person is exempt from criminal responsibility only refers to the time of the actions relevant under criminal law. [123]

For instance, psychotic episodes or withdrawal syndrome with or without delirium are temporary phenomena which go into remission when treated adequately, and which thus cannot affect a lack of ability to make electoral decisions […]. This shows that it is not possible to infer from the finding that a person was exempt from criminal responsibility at the time a crime was committed that mental capacity to appreciate the nature and significance of elections is typically lacking. [124]

(b) To the extent that reference is made to the other constituent elements for ordering confinement in a psychiatric hospital pursuant to § 63 StGB for justification under constitutional law […], this does not lead to a different conclusion. [125]

(aa) [For ordering confinement,] § 63 StGB requires that persons exempt from criminal responsibility at the time they committed a crime can be expected to "commit serious unlawful acts in the future" as a consequence of their condition and that they therefore present a danger to the general public. Accordingly, these persons' mental or psychological health must be impaired for a longer time period also affecting the future. However, that does not alter the finding, set out above in relation to § 20 StGB, which also applies to this case, that the determination of illnesses underlying such impairments cannot justify the assumption that the person concerned generally lacks the ability to make electoral decisions. [126]

(bb) In addition, it follows from the case-law of the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof - BGH) that, for finding that a disorder persists after a crime was committed, it is material whether a person's professional or social ability to act has been restricted in everyday life, aside from the offences they have been charged with. However, it is sufficient for ordering confinement in a psychiatric hospital that the longer-term condition is such that even everyday events can trigger the acute and considerable impairment of criminal responsibility (cf. BGH, Judgment of 10 August 2005 - 2 StR 209/05 -, juris, para. 17; Judgment of 17 February 1999 - 2 StR 483/ 98 -, juris, para. 32). Yet if confinement can also be ordered in cases where criminal responsibility is not acutely impaired, but where it is merely possible that the impairment may be triggered by everyday events, it is even less possible to conclude on this basis that a person confined pursuant to § 63 in conjunction with § 20 StGB is incapable of participating in the political communication process and of making a self-determined electoral decision. [127]

(cc) Likewise, the reference to the danger confined persons pose to the general public […] does not merit a different assessment. […] This aspect is irrelevant for the ability of confined persons to make (electoral) decisions. According to the legislature's assessment, too, the danger posed by confined persons to the general public does not generally allow the conclusion that they lack the ability to make electoral decisions. This already follows from the fact that persons confined pursuant to § 63 in conjunction with § 21 StGB are excluded from the scope of application of § 13 no. 3 BWahlG […]. Also in cases of diminished criminal responsibility, in which confining persons in a psychiatric hospital pursuant to § 63 StGB requires that they pose a danger to the general public, this confinement does not impact their voting rights. [128]

(c) […] [129]

(2) In addition, § 13 no. 3 BWahlG violates the principle of universal suffrage because the provision leads to unequal treatment for which factual reasons are not discernible. Ultimately, the group of persons affected by the provision is determined arbitrarily, without sufficiently taking into consideration their ability to participate in the democratic communication process […]. [130]

Persons exempt from criminal responsibility retain their voting rights if confinement in a psychiatric hospital is not ordered merely because there is no risk that they will commit considerable criminal offences. Yet in those cases, it cannot be ruled out that mental capacity and ability to make electoral decisions are limited to an equivalent degree or even to a higher degree than the capacity of persons excluded from voting rights pursuant to § 13 no. 3 BWahlG. The same applies to persons who have no criminal record and are confined pursuant to the respective Land law provisions because they endanger themselves or others. In those cases, too, voting rights remain unaffected, even though the diagnosis may be comparable. In cases in which the competent court orders both confinement in a psychiatric hospital and imprisonment, and determines pursuant to § 67(2) StGB that all or part of the prison sentence be served before the confinement measure, the persons concerned in fact retain their voting rights during the prison sentence; they are only deprived of these rights as soon as their confinement in a psychiatric hospital begins although their mental capacity has not changed; a sound justification under electoral law in that regard is not discernible. If confinement in a psychiatric hospital is suspended pursuant to § 67b or § 67d(2) StGB, § 13 no. 3 BWahlG does not apply (anymore), given that the provision requires that the person concerned "is in" a psychiatric hospital. However, if the suspension is revoked pursuant to § 67g StGB, the persons concerned forfeit their voting rights once again. In this regard, the ability to vote is irrelevant for the decision on suspending confinement and revoking the suspension. Voting rights of persons exempt from criminal responsibility who are confined in a psychiatric hospital are also restored if these persons are subsequently transferred to an addiction treatment facility pursuant to § 67a StGB. If they are retransferred to a psychiatric hospital afterwards, however, they are deprived of their voting rights yet again. [131]

All this shows that the group of delinquent persons lacking the mental capacity required to exercise voting rights cannot be adequately determined by linking their exclusion from voting rights to confinement in a psychiatric hospital for lack of criminal responsibility; thus, the constitutional requirements regarding statutory criteria for categorisation are not satisfied. [132]

b) § 13 no. 3 BWahlG also violates the prohibition of disadvantaging on the basis of disability under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG. [133]

aa) The exclusion from voting rights pursuant to § 13 no. 3 BWahlG disadvantages the persons affected by the provision given that it deprives them of their essential democratic participation right. This disadvantaging also occurs because of disability within the meaning of Art. 3(3) second sentence GG given that exemption from criminal responsibility requires a physical, mental, psychological or sensory impairment, and the order of confinement in a psychiatric hospital additionally requires that the impairment persist for a longer time period […]. Therefore, only persons with disabilities are affected by the provision. [134]

bb) Given the insufficient justification of this interference, the above assessments regarding the interference with the principle of universal suffrage apply to this interference as well. There is no compelling reason for the disadvantaging by law of persons exempt from criminal responsibility who are confined in a psychiatric hospital. Such a reason is already ruled out because the provision is not suitable for identifying persons who typically lack the mental capacity required to participate in the democratic communication process. Moreover, the determination of the group of persons excluded from voting rights leads to arbitrary unequal treatment of persons whose mental or psychological health is equally impaired. [135]

III.

§ 13 no. 2 BWahlG is incompatible with Art. 38(1) first sentence GG and Art. 3(3) second sentence GG; § 13 no. 3 BWahlG is void. [136]

1. Incompatibility with the Basic Law generally renders the relevant provision void (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <404>). This also applies to electoral complaint proceedings, to which § 78 first sentence, § 95(3) second sentence BVerfGG apply accordingly (cf. BVerfGE 129, 300 <343>). [137]

The situation is different if declaring a provision void resulted in a situation which was even farther from the constitutional order than the situation prevailing until that point (cf. BVerfGE 99, 216 <243 and 244>; 119, 331 <382 and 383>; 125, 175 <256>; 132, 372 <394>). In addition, a law is generally not to be declared void if the violation of the Constitution results from a violation of the general guarantee of the right to equality. This is because it is for the legislature to decide how to remedy the violation of the right to equality. In those cases, the Federal Constitutional Court limits itself to declaring the provision that violates the right to equality incompatible with the Basic Law in order not to predetermine the legislature's decision (cf. BVerfGE 99, 280 <298>; 105, 73 <133>; 117, 1 <69>; 122, 210 <245>; 126, 400 <431>; 135, 238 <245 para. 24>). To the extent that it was found to be incompatible with the Basic Law, the provision may then no longer be applied by courts and administrative authorities (cf. BVerfGE 126, 400 <431>; 135, 238 <245 para. 24>). [138]

2. a) Based on these considerations, § 13 no. 2 BWahlG is declared incompatible with Art. 38(1) first sentence and Art. 3(3) second sentence GG. It is for the legislature to decide how to remedy the unconstitutional unequal treatment under electoral law of persons with an equal need for guardianship, while balancing the principle of universal suffrage and the aim of safeguarding the function of the election as an integrative process for the formation of the political will of the people. Reasons based on which it would be permissible to exceptionally declare that § 13 no. 2 BWahlG shall continue to apply (cf. in this regard BVerfGE 93, 121 <148>; 105, 73 <134>; 117, 1 <70>; 126, 400 <431 and 432>) are not ascertainable. [139]

b) § 13 no. 3 BWahlG is void because it violates Art. 38(1) first sentence and Art. 3(3) second sentence GG. The complete abolition of the exclusion from voting rights of persons exempt from criminal responsibility who are confined in a psychiatric hospital does not lead to a situation that is farther from the constitutional order than the current situation. Nor does the declaration of voidness curtail the legislature's latitude. In order to satisfy the principle of universal suffrage and the prohibition of discrimination under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG, new legislation regarding the exclusion from voting rights must not exclude persons who are confined in a psychiatric hospital based on an order issued pursuant to § 63 in conjunction with § 20 StGB given that a relevant lack of the mental capacity required to exercise voting rights cannot generally be inferred from this constituent element. [140]

IV.

Since complainants nos. 1, 2 and 4 to 8 were excluded from the 2013 Bundestag elections on the basis of § 13 nos. 2 and 3 BWahlG, their rights under Art. 38(1) first sentence GG, which are equivalent to fundamental rights, and their fundamental right under Art. 3(3) second sentence GG were violated. [141]

XIX. Germany and the European Union

1. Fundamental Rights Protection by the Federal Republic of Germany and the European Union

Explanatory Annotation

Fundamental rights protection in federal systems can be a complicated matter and the European Union (EU) has developed in many ways into a federal system even if it cannot be qualified as a federal state.[191] One way to conceive fundamental rights protection in a multi-level system of government is to segregate the various levels and ensure rights protection separately within the various levels of government. The consequence would be rights' protection on the federal level with regard to the exercise of federal authority and rights protection on the lower (regional, state or member state) level against government action attributable to authorities of this level. Such a system of "dual federalism" would ideally require a separation of jurisdiction and powers in such a way that all potential governmental action is attributable to one or the other level in order to indicate which rights' protection regime is applicable.[192]

This is in principle the approach to fundamental rights protection in the USA. Governmental action by state authorities, e.g. the police in California or the school administration in Kansas, is attributable to that state only and fundamental rights issues that might arise can in principle only arise under the respective bill of rights of California or Kansas. However, the US example also reveals the difficulties of this approach. If the respective state constitution or other legal order allows for egregious human rights violations it is very unsatisfactory if there are no remedies available at the federal level. In the USA this has led to important amendments to the US constitution.[193] The 13th amendment prohibits slavery in section 1 and extends that prohibition to "any place subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States. The 14th amendment to the Constitution expressly requires that the various states must not "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."[194]

194 Hence the debate whether "dual federalism" is at all possible and a good case can be made that it is not, at least not without modification. One can even make a good case that even the relationship between states and their law on the one hand and international law on the other, even if structured dualistically by the national constitution, is difficult to maintain in its pure form in today's complex, intertwined and globalized world. In the context of this study, the term is only used to describe a possible principle approach.

The other approach is more integrative and would extend the scope of the federal fundamental rights beyond just the actions of federal organs to cover the federal entity as a whole, i.e. the central level and the sub-entities. That is, for example, the approach taken in Germany under the Basic Law. Article 31 of the Basic Law states in simple words that federal law breaches the law of the Länder, i.e. the law of the lower entities. This means that whenever there is a conflict between federal law and the law of a lower entity, a Land, federal law will not only prevail, but the legal provision of the respective Land will be null and void.[195] Any and all legal provisions of the Länder must consequently be in conformity with the Basic Law in general and the fundamental rights provisions in particular.

The European Union, on the other hand, is not a federal state and whereas its law is also supreme and prevails over the law of its member states in case of conflict, the prevalence of the Union is only one of application and not one of validity. This means that when a member legal provision law, if applied in a given situation, would lead to an infringement of European Union law, Union law must prevail and the member state norm must not be applied. It would, however, remain valid for all other - purely domestic - situations where a conflict between the two norm sets would not arise. In the area of fundamental rights such conflicts of norms are easily perceivable. European Union legislation could, for example, on the national level be perceived to be in violation of domestic fundamental rights. Under the doctrine of the supremacy of European Union Law, this would not matter because Union law would have to prevail against all national law. However, this notion almost inherently requires that some form of fundamental rights protection exists on the European Union level so that Union action can at least be vetted accordingly on that level.

The problem was that the European Union, i.e. the European Economic Community as it was called from 1957 to 1993 or the European Community as it was called from 1993 to 2009, did not have a catalog of fundamental rights as part of its founding treaties. That is largely due to the fact that the member states when founding the European Economic Community in 1957 could simply not imagine that the process of integration would be so dynamic that the notion of the Community violating fundamental rights might actually arise.

However, the issue of the protection of fundamental rights arose nonetheless. It began with the question whether a person had to disclose his identity when intending to buy subsidized butter made available for the poor[196], and has since touched upon many fundamental rights ranging from human dignity to free speech and property rights.[197] In the light of the complete lack of 195 This prevalence of federal law is so entrenched that despite a number of amendments the state constitution of the Land Hesse of 1946 (preceding the Basic Law by three years) in Article 21 still provides for the possibility of sentencing someone to death for especially heinous crimes and nobody takes it seriously enough to engage in a revision because Article 102 of the Basic Law provides for the absolute abolishment of capital punishment and Article 21 is therefore null and void - as if it were not on the books at all.

197 It is beyond this study to trace the development of fundamental rights protection in the European Union in details. For more details see Ehlers, Dirk, Europäische Grundrechte und Grundfreiheiten, 2009 and Ehlers, Dirk (ed.), European Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, 2007. In the Ehlers collection, see Walter, Christian, History and Development of European Fundamental Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, p. 1 et seq. for an account of the historical development.

fundamental rights in the founding treaties, the European Court of Justice could only achieve the requisite protection by adapting the international law doctrine of the so-called general principles of law. General principles of international law are those inherent in all legal orders of the states comprising the international community and which can, therefore, be presumed to be relevant in interstate relationships as well. General principles of European Union law are those inherent in the legal orders of all member states of the European Union, which can therefore be presumed to be part of the European Union legal order as well. As all member states of the European Union protect fundamental rights in their domestic legal order, and are also member states of the European Convention on Human Rights, the European Court of Justice held that this creates an abstract catalog of fundamental rights that is relevant as primary European Union law, i.e. on the same level as treaty law. The fundamental rights so found then needed to be developed in the case-law of the Court much in the same fashion as written rights gain their concrete scope and significance not so much by the language in which they were drafted but by the interpretation of the courts applying them over the years.

This development at the European Union level came in conjunction with increasing pressure at the national level demanding fundamental rights protection at the European Union level as a prerequisite for acknowledging the supremacy of European Union law. The European Court of Justice had dogmatically construed the supremacy and prevalence of European Union law as independent from any domestic law, including constitutionally protected fundamental rights, but the German Constitutional Court had rather practically responded by maintaining that they will exercise jurisdiction of last resort to protect their fundamental rights standard should it become necessary.

This was the content of the famous "As long As" decision of the Constitutional Court. At issue in this case was a provision in a Regulation of European Community law, which constitutes a directly applicable legislative act. The Constitutional Court had already made it clear that constitutional complaints can only be lodged against acts of the German state and not acts of the European Community. However, the implementation or execution of such acts of the European Community by German officials, as was the case here with regard to the Regulation in question, constitutes such a national act. The Constitutional Court held that it would continue to exercise its power to assess such national acts in the light of the fundamental rights of the Basic Law. The consequence of such an assessment could, of course, be that the execution of the European Community's legal obligation is unconstitutional because the underlying European Community legal act is unconstitutional. In the case at issue the Constitutional Court found this not to be the case and hence the ultimate conflict between European Community law and the German Basic Law was avoided.

12 years later, the Court revisited the question again in the context of European Community regulations. In the meantime, the European Court of Justice had time to develop its approach to fundamental rights as part of the Community's general principles of law. The Court consequently held that it would no longer regard as admissible proceedings brought before it challenging the application of European Community law in Germany. However, this "moratorium" was to apply only "as long as" the European Court of Justice provided effective fundamental rights protection on a quality level comparable to that of the Basic Law. This was obviously a recognition of the European Court of Justice's work in the area of fundamental rights protection but it still fell short of unequivocally accepting the supremacy of European Union law reserving the right to "step in" if the Court ever came to the conclusion that the European Union level of fundamental rights protection was inadequate.

In the decision concerning the constitutionality of the Maastricht Treaty, the Court, by and large, confirmed this approach. However, it no longer restricted its approach to just supervise the acts of German authorities and stipulated that it continues to assert the power to protect fundamental rights in Germany against any act of supranational organizations regardless of whether such acts require implementation or execution. However, the Court also said that it would exercise fundamental rights protection cooperatively with the European Court of Justice and that could only mean that the principal relationship between the two legal orders has remained unchanged and that the Court continues to assert the right of last control in the fundamental rights area.[198]

In a later decision concerning the European Union's banana market and a new regulation concerning import quotas for so-called dollar-bananas from mainly Central American countries the Constitutional Court specified the requirements for exercising this reserved right.[199] Any applicant would have to show "in detail that the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law is not generally assured in the respective case. This requires a comparison of the protection of fundamental rights on the national and on the Community level […].[200] It is evident that it will be almost impossible for any applicant or submitting regular court to make such a claim as long as the European Court of Justice remains a credible and functioning judicial body.

The Treaty of Lisbon, which entered into force on 1 December 2009, impacted fundamental rights protection in the European Union by making the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union part of the Union's primary body of law by way of referring to it in Article 6 of the new European Union Treaty. Article 6.3 makes it clear that the general principles of European Union law as developed by the European Court of Justice retain their relevance so that a continuation of the European Court's jurisprudence can be expected, probably with an increasing shift away from the general principles to the provisions of the Charter. The new Treaty also empowered the European Union in Article 6.2 to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights and the coming into force of the 14th Protocol to the European Convention of Human Rights on 1 June 2010[201] has opened up the possibility of accession from the Convention's side as well. The complainants in the Lisbon case alleged, inter alia, violations of several fundamental rights. However the Court disagreed and confirmed its position as 198 The Court also added a second potential challenge to the supremacy of constitutional law in this Maastricht decision by stating that it will not recognize European Union ultra vires acts, i.e., European Union legal acts passed in excess of the powers transferred to the Union by way of the founding treaties even if the European Court of Justice should have determined that the alleged ultra vires act is soundly based on a relevant treaty norm. So far the Court has refrained from declaring any European Union act to be ultra vires.

summarized in the Banana market regulation case.[202] The German Court continues to assert the power of last resort but will not exercise this power as long as the European Court of Justice will effectively guarantee fundamental rights against European Union acts on a comparable level of quality.

a) Translation of the Solange I Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 37, 271*

Headnotes:

As long as the integration process has not progressed so far that Community law receives a catalogue of fundamental rights decided on by a Parliament and of settled validity, which is adequate in comparison with the catalogue of fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law, a reference by a court of the Federal Republic of Germany to the Federal Constitutional Court in judicial review proceedings, following the obtaining of a ruling of the European Court under Article 177 of the Treaty, is admissible and necessary if the German court regards the rule of Community law which is relevant to its decision as inapplicable in the interpretation given by the European Court, because and in so far as it conflicts with one of the fundamental rights of the Basic Law.

Order of the Second Senate of 29 May 1974 - 2 BvL 52/71 -

Facts:

A German import/export undertaking is making an application to the Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgericht) of Frankfurt/Main for annulment of a decision of the Einfuhr- und Vorratsstelle für Getreide und Futtermittel (EVSt), in which an export deposit of DM 17,026.47 was declared to be forfeited after the firm had only partially used an export licence granted to it for 20,000 tons of ground maize.

The decision is based on Article 12.1 of EEC Council Regulation 120/67, of 13 June 1967, and on Article 9 of EEC Commission Regulation 473/67, of 21 August 1967.

Article 12.1 of EEC Regulation 120/67 reads:

> '1. Imports into the Community or exports therefrom of any of the products listed in Article 1 shall be subject to the submission of an import or export licence which may be issued by member states to any applicant irrespective of the place of his establishment in the Community....

202 BVerfG, 2 BvE 2/08 of 30.6.2009, para. 189, http://www.bverfg.de/entscheidungen/es20090630_2bve000208en.html.

The issue of such licences shall be conditional on the lodging of a deposit guaranteeing that importation or exportation is effected during the period of validity of the licence; the deposit shall be forfeited in whole or in part if the transaction is not effected, or is only partially effected, within that period.'

Article 8 (2) of EEC Regulation 473/67 reads:

> '(2) Subject to Article 9 hereof, if the obligation to import or export has not been fulfilled during the period of validity of the licence, the deposit is forfeited ...'

Article 9 of EEC Regulation 473/67 reads:

> '(1) If the import or export is prevented within the period of validity of the licence by a circumstance which is to be regarded as force majeure, and if application is made for these circumstances to be taken into account, then: (a) in the cases listed in paragraph (2) (a)-(d) hereof, the obligation to import or export is extinguished, and the deposit is not forfeited.
>
> (b) in the cases listed in paragraph (2) (e)-(h) hereof, the period of validity of the licence is extended by the period of time which the competent authority deems necessary in consequence of this circumstance. On application, however, the competent authority may order that the obligation to import or export be extinguished and that the deposit be not forfeited.

2. The Administrative Court first obtained a preliminary ruling from the European Court of Justice under Article 177 of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (here inafter referred to for short as 'the Treaty') as to whether the rules cited from these regulations are lawful under the law of the European Economic Community. In the judgment of the European Court dated 17 December 1970 -- in Case 11/70 -- the legality of the disputed regulations is confirmed (likewise in the judgment of 10 March 1971 in Case 37/70).

The Administrative Court then stayed the proceedings by a decision of 24 November 1971 and requested the ruling of the Federal Constitutional Court under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law as to whether the obligation to export existing under European Community law and the associated duty to make an export deposit are compatible with the Basic Law and, if so, whether the rule that the deposit is to be released only in a case of force majeure is compatible with the Basic Law.

B. I.

The reference is admissible

1. An essential preliminary for this ruling is the closer, though not yet conclusive, determination of the relationship between the constitutional law of the Federal Republic of Germany and European Community law, which has come into being on the basis of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (hereinafter referred to as Community law). The present case demands only the clarification of the relationship between the guarantees of fundamental rights in the Basic Law and the rules of secondary Community law of the EEC, the execution of which is in the hands of administrative authorities in the Federal Republic of Germany. There is at the moment nothing to support the view that rules of the Treaty establishing the EEC that is, primary Community law, could be in conflict with provisions of the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany. It can equally remain open whether the same considerations apply to the relationship between the law of the Basic Law outside its catalogue of fundamental rights and Community law as applied according to the following reasoning, to the relationship between the guarantees of fundamental rights in the Basic Law and secondary Community law.

2. This Court in this respect in agreement with the law developed by the European Court of Justice adheres to its settled view that Community law is neither a component part of the national legal system nor international law, but forms an independent system of law flowing from an autonomous legal source (BVerfGE 22, 293 [296]; 31, 145 [173 seq.]); for the Community is not a state, in particular not a federal state, but 'a sui generis community in the process of progressive integration', an 'interstate institution' within the meaning of Article 24 (1) of the Basic Law.

It follows from this that, in principle, the two legal spheres stand independent of and side by side one another in their validity, and that, in particular, the competent Community organs, including the European Court of Justice, have to rule on the binding force, construction and observance of Community law, and the competent national organs on the binding force, construction and observance of the constitutional law of the Federal Republic of Germany. The European Court of Justice cannot with binding effect rule on whether a rule of Community law is compatible with the Basic Law, nor can the Federal Constitutional Court rule on whether, and with what implications, a rule of secondary Community law is compatible with primary Community law. This does not lead to any difficulties as long as the two systems of law do not come into conflict with one another in their substance. Therefore there grows forth from the special relationship which has arisen between the Community and its members by the establishment of the Community, first and foremost, the duty for the competent organs, in particular for the two courts charged with reviewing law the European Court of Justice and the Federal Constitutional Court to concern themselves in their decisions with the concordance of the two systems of law. Only in so far as this is unsuccessful can there arise the conflict which demands the drawing of conclusions from the relationship of principle between the two legal spheres set out above.

For, in this case, it is not enough simply to speak of the 'precedence' of Community law over national constitutional law in order to justify the conclusion that Community law must always prevail over national constitutional law because, otherwise, the Community would be put in question. Community law is just as little put in question when, exceptionally, Community law is not permitted to prevail over cogent (zwingendes) constitutional law, as international law is put in question by Article 25 of the Basic Law when it provides that the general rules of international law only take precedence over simple federal law, and as another (foreign) system of law is put in question when it is ousted by the public policy of the Federal Republic of Germany. The binding of the Federal Republic of Germany (and of all member states) by the Treaty is not, according to the meaning and spirit of the Treaties, one-sided, but also binds the Community which they establish to carry out its part in order to resolve the conflict here assumed, that is, to seek a system which is compatible with an entrenched precept of the constitutional law of the Federal Republic of Germany. Invoking such a conflict is, therefore, not in itself a violation of the Treaty, but sets in motion inside the European organs the Treaty mechanism which resolves the conflict on a political level.

3. Article 24 of the Basic Law deals with the transfer of sovereign rights to interstate institutions. This cannot be taken literally. Like every constitutional provision of a similar fundamental nature, Article 24 of the Basic Law must be-understood and construed in the overall context of the whole Basic Law. That is, it does not open the way to amending the basic structure of the Basic Law, which forms the basis of its identity, without a formal amendment to the Basic Law, that is it does not open any such way through the legislation of the interstate institution. Certainly, the competent Community organs can make law which the competent German constitutional organs could not make under the law of the Basic Law and which is nonetheless valid and is to be applied directly in the Federal Republic of Germany.

4. The part of the Basic Law dealing with fundamental rights is an inalienable, essential feature of the valid Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany and one which forms part of the constitutional structure of the Basic Law. Article 24 of the Basic Law does not, without reservation, allow it to be subjected to qualifications. In this, the present state of integration of the Community is of crucial importance. The Community still lacks a democratically legitimate Parliament directly elected by general suffrage which possesses legislative powers and to which the Community organs empowered to legislate are fully responsible on a political level; it still lacks, in particular, a codified catalogue of fundamental rights, the substance of which is reliably and unambiguously fixed for the future in the same way as the substance of the Basic Law and therefore allows a comparison and a decision as to whether, at the time in question, the Community law standard with regard to fundamental rights generally binding in the Community is adequate in the long-term, measured by the standard of the Basic Law with regard to fundamental rights (without prejudice to possible amendments) in such a way that there is no exceeding the limitation indicated, set by Article 24 of the Basic Law. As long as this legal certainty, which is not guaranteed merely by the decisions of the European Court of Justice, favourable though these have been to fundamental rights, is not achieved in the course of the further integration of the Community, the reservation derived from Article 24 of the Basic Law applies. What is involved is, therefore, a legal difficulty arising exclusively from the Community's continuing integration process, which is still in flux and which will end with the present transitional phase.

Provisionally, therefore, in the hypothetical case of a conflict between Community law and a part of national constitutional law or, more precisely, of the guarantees of fundamental rights in the Basic Law, there arises the question of which system of law takes precedence, that is, ousts the other. In this conflict of norms, the guarantee of fundamental rights in the Basic Law prevails as long as the competent organs of the Community have not removed the conflict of norms in accordance with the Treaty mechanism.

5. From the relationship between Basic Law and Community law outlined above, the following conclusions emerge with regard to the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice and of the Federal Constitutional Court.

a) In accordance with the Treaty rules on jurisdiction, the European Court of Justice has jurisdiction to rule on the legal validity of the norms of Community law (including the unwritten norms of Community law which it considers exist) and on their construction. It does not, however, decide incidental questions of national law of the Federal Republic of Germany (or in any other member state) with binding force for this State. Statements in the reasoning of its judgments that a particular aspect of a Community norm accords or is compatible in its substance with a constitutional rule of national law at this place, with a guarantee of fundamental rights in the Basic Law constitute non-binding obiter dicta.

   In the framework of this jurisdiction, the European Court determines the content of Community law with binding effect for all the member states. Accordingly, under the terms of Article 177 of the Treaty, the courts of the Federal Republic of Germany have to obtain the ruling of the European Court before they raise the question of the compatibility of the norm of Community law which is relevant to their decision with guarantees of fundamental rights in the Basic Law.

b) As emerges from the foregoing outline, the Federal Constitutional Court never rules on the validity or invalidity of a rule of Community law. At most, it can come to the conclusion that such a rule cannot be applied by the authorities or courts of the Federal Republic of Germany in so far as it conflicts with a rule of the Basic Law relating to fundamental rights. It can (just like, vice versa, the European Court) itself decide incidental questions of Community law in so far as the requirements of Article177 of the Treaty, which are also binding on the Federal Constitutional Court, are not present or a ruling of the European Court, binding under Community law on the Federal Constitutional Court, does not supervene.

6. Fundamental rights can be guaranteed by law in numerous ways and may accordingly enjoy numerous types of judicial protection. As its previous decisions show, the European Court also considers that it has jurisdiction by its decisions to protect fundamental rights in accordance with Community law. On the other hand, only the Federal Constitutional Court is entitled, within the framework of the powers granted to it in the Basic Law, to protect the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Basic Law. No other court can deprive it of this duty imposed by constitutional law. Thus, accordingly, in so far as citizens of the Federal Republic of Germany have a claim to judicial protection of their fundamental rights guaranteed in the Basic Law, their status cannot suffer any impairment merely because they are directly affected by legal acts of authorities or courts of the Federal Republic of Germany which are based on Community law. Otherwise, a perceptible gap in judicial protection might arise precisely for the most elementary status rights of the citizen. Moreover, no different considerations apply to the constitution of a community of states with a constitution based on freedom and democracy which is called into question than apply to a federal state with a constitution based on freedom and democracy: it does not harm the Community and its constitution based on freedom (and democracy), if and in so far as its members in their constitutions give stronger guarantees of the liberties of their citizens than does the Community.

7. In detail, judicial protection by the Federal Constitutional Court is measured exclusively according to the constitutional law of the Federal Republic of Germany and according to the more precise rules laid down in the Federal Constitutional Court Act.

a) In proceedings for judicial review on a reference by a court, it is always a question of examining a provision of a statute. Since the traditional distinction in national law between provisions of a formal statute and provisions of a regulation based on a formal statute is unknown to Community law, every provision of a Community regulation is a provision of a statute within the meaning of the rules of procedure for the Federal Constitutional Court.

b) An initial barrier to the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court emerges from the fact that it can only make the subject of its review acts of German State power, that is, decisions of the courts, administrative acts of the authorities and measures of the constitutional organs of the Federal Republic of Germany. For this reason, the Federal Constitutional Court regards as inadmissible a constitutional complaint by a citizen of the Federal Republic of Germany directly against a Community regulation (BVerfGE 22, 293 [297]).

c) If a Community regulation is implemented by an administrative authority of the Federal Republic of Germany or dealt with by a court in the Federal Republic of Germany, this is an exercise of German State power; and, in this process, the administrative authority and the courts are also bound to the constitutional law of the Federal Republic of Germany. According to the procedural law of the Federal Constitutional Court, if one disregards the constitutional complaint, which is only admissible after all other legal remedies are exhausted, the exception in s. 90.2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) hardly comes into consideration in a case involving the challenging of an administrative act based on a rule of Community law, the protection of fundamental rights is carried out by way of reference by the court concerned in so-called proceedings for judicial review of constitutionality before the Federal Constitutional Court. In view of the special features, outlined above, of the relationship between national constitutional law and Community law, these proceedings require some modifications, of the kind that have also been considered necessary in the past by the Federal Constitutional Court in other decided cases. Thus, for example, it has held in the framework of judicial review proceedings, that the existing legal position with regard to a constitutional application is not in keeping with the Basic Law; it has contented itself with holding that a particular set of regulations is incompatible with the provision on equality, without declaring the regulations void; it has declared a set of regulations brought into being by the Occupying Powers to be in conflict with the Basic Law and put the Federal Government under an obligation to make efforts to have them brought by the German legislator into harmony with the Basic Law; it has developed preventive judicial review in respect of ratification statutes. It lies in the nature of these previous decisions for the Federal Constitutional Court to restrict itself in cases like the present one to determining the inapplicability of a rule of Community law by the administrative authorities or courts of the Federal Republic of Germany in so far as it conflicts with a guarantee of fundamental rights in the Basic Law.

The concentration of this power of decision in the hands of the Federal Constitutional Court is not only necessary, from the point of view of constitutional law, for the same reason which has led to the Court's so called monopoly of rejection, but is also in the interests of the Community and of Community law. According to the underlying idea of Article 100.1 of the Basic Law, the Federal Constitutional Court's task is to prevent any German court from disregarding the intention of the legislature by failing to apply the statutes decided on by the legislature on the grounds that the court considers they violate the Basic Law (BVerfGE 1, 184 (197); 2, 124 [129]). National statutory law thereby received protection of its validity vis-a-vis courts which would deny it validity on constitutional grounds. The position is similar with the rule contained in Article 100.2 of the Basic Law, under which the advice of the Federal Constitutional Court must be sought in cases of doubt as to whether a general rule of international law creates rights and duties for the individual. Therefore the underlying idea of Article 100 requires that the validity of Community law should be protected from impairment in the Federal Republic of Germany in the same way as that of national law.

The result is: as long as the integration process has not progressed so far that Community law also receives a catalogue of fundamental rights decided on by a Parliament and of settled validity, which is adequate in comparison with the catalogue of fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law, a reference by a court in the Federal Republic of Germany to the Federal Constitutional Court in judicial review proceedings, following the obtaining of a ruling of the European Court under Article 177 of the Treaty, is admissible and necessary if the German court regards the rule of Community law which is relevant to its decision as inapplicable in the interpretation given by the European Court, because and in so far as it conflicts with one of the fundamental rights in the Basic Law.

II.

The First Senate has previously held that a measure taken by a foreign state is not subject to review by the Federal Constitutional Court, and that even a measure based on a military government statute and issued by a German authority 'by order of the military government' is not a measure taken by German public power and is therefore likewise removed from the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfGE 1, 10). For the same reason, it has held inadmissible a constitutional action aimed directly or indirectly at decisions of a supreme appellate court (BVerfGE 6, 15; 22, 91), and rejected as inadmissible, a constitutional action against a purely internal ecclesiastical measure (BVerfGE 18, 385). It has, moreover, held that the Federal Constitutional Court has no jurisdiction to examine German law (namely, an implementation statute in connection with the Kontrollratsgesetz (Control Council Act) for its compatibility with occupation law (BVerfGE 3, 368). Its judgment on this matter reads literally: 'The Basic Law and the Gesetz über das Federal Constitutional Court (Federal Constitutional Court Act) contain no general constitutional clause dealing with the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court. ... No particular jurisdiction to examine German law for its compatibility with occupation law is assigned to the Federal Constitutional Court. Federal constitutional law and the federal law applying in the framework of the Basic Law are the Federal Constitutional Court's only criteria for its examination. Its jurisdiction cannot be extended beyond the positive rules on its jurisdiction for reasons of legal policy' (BVerfGE 3, 368 [376]). In judicial review proceedings which concerned a provision of the 42nd Implementation Regulation to the Umstellungsgesetz (Currency Changeover Act), the First Senate has further held that the provision challenged is occupation law and occupation law cannot be examined for its compatibility with the Basic Law (BVerfGE 4, 45). This decision, however, is followed, after the coming into force of the Paris Treaty system, by the decisions in which occupational law is examined for its compatibility with the Basic Law, and the competent constitutional organs of the Federal Republic of Germany are charged with the duty of harmonising the content of the statute with the Basic Law after appropriate consultation with the Three Powers (BVerfGE 15, 337; 36, 146 (14 November 1973 1 BvR 719/69 Ehegesetz). Finally, in the decision of 18 October 1967 (BVerfGE 22, 293), as already mentioned, a constitutional action brought directly against regulations of the Council or Commission of the EEC is rejected as inadmissible because it is not directed against an act of the German public power bound by the Basic Law. In this context, it is stated: jurisdiction cannot be founded by the consideration that there is an urgent need for legal protection by a constitutional court because the possibilities offered in Community law are insufficient to guarantee adequate protection of the basic rights of the nationals of member states. Nor can the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court be extended, it says, by a necessity of legal policy, however urgent. After this follows the sentence: 'This is not a conclusive decision as to whether and to what extent the Federal Constitutional Court can measure Community law against the norms on fundamental rights in the Basic Law in the framework of proceedings admissibly brought to its cognizance. ...' This, it says, depends inter alia on 'whether and to what extent the Federal Republic of Germany was capable, in transferring sovereign rights under Article 24.1) of the Basic Law, of exempting the Community organs from being so bound (by fundamental rights)'.

III.

The challenged rule of Community law in the interpretation given by the European Court of Justice does not conflict with a guarantee of fundamental rights in the Basic Law, neither with Article 12 nor with Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

1. It must right away be observed that the forfeiture of the export deposit provided for in the system of licensing, coupled with security deposits for export and import of certain products and goods, cannot be regarded as an evil imposed by order of the state for reprehensible unlawful conduct, akin to a penalty or fine. Rather, this system has built into it a legal device known to the system of private law, which makes allowance for the character of risk transactions

(e.g., forward transactions, instalment transactions, transactions for recurrent delivery of goods, etc.). The making of an export deposit and the forfeiture of the security under the conditions agreed upon in the contract is not alien to such transactions. Even in the case of import and export of goods which fall under the system set up by the challenged rules, the businessman concerned knows what risk he is taking and is free to decide whether he wishes to enter into the contract or not on the terms in this case not agreed, but laid down by statute. All misgivings derived from the comparison with a sanction of criminal law or a sanction akin to one of criminal law therefore fail from the outset (see BVerfGE 9, 137 [144]).

2. The system contained in the challenged rules is not only appropriate in the present stage of development of the European Community, in which economic relations cannot function without planning and effective control, but is (still) indispensable and not replaceable by a different, similarly effective and simple and, on the other hand, market geared system.

3. So far as the basic freedom of trade and occupation (Article 12 of the Basic Law) is concerned, the principles developed in the judgment of 11 June 1958 (BVerfGE 7, 377 [397]) are also crucial here. The system of licensing of export and import transactions coupled with security deposits and forfeiture of the deposit affects the exercise of occupation, the limitation of which can be provided for by the legislator. But the legislator does not have a free hand to do this. What the legislator has introduced in this case is a 'pure system of rules on exercise of occupation or trade, which does not affect the freedom of choice of trade or occupation, but rather only determines in what manner members of a trade or occupation must in detail carry out their occupational activities'. Here, to a large extent, viewpoints of expediency can assert themselves; and it is to be assessed according to these viewpoints what impositions must be placed on the members of the trade or occupation in order to avert disadvantages and dangers for the general republic. In this respect, the protection of basic rights is restricted to averting statutory impositions which are in themselves unconstitutional because they are excessively burdensome and not exactable; apart from these exceptions, the impairment of occupational freedom in question does not affect the person entitled to the fundamental right too perceptibly since he is already engaged in the trade or occupation and his authorization to practise it is not affected' (BVerfGE 7, 377 [405 seq.]).

When this criterion is applied, the challenged system of rules does not conflict with Article 12 of the Basic Law. For, as the European Court of Justice has already stated in its decisions, there are carefully considered reasons in favour of this system, with a view to averting perceptible disadvantages for the EEC. In this case, what is involved is just as little an 'imposition in itself unconstitutional because it is excessively burdensome and not exactable' as in the - on this point comparable - case which was decided with the so called penalty payments judgment of 3 February 1959 (BVerfGE 9, 137); in that judgment, the Court did not even consider the question that Article 12 of the Basic Law might be violated (BVerfGE 9, 137 [146]).

4. In so far as making allowance for the principle of proportionality is required in the use of the formulations 'excessively burdensome' and not exactable, the following is to be noted in the case of the rules on the conditions for a forfeiture of the deposit: it is in keeping with the purpose of a security deposit that it is forfeited if the obligations laid down by the contract or by statute are not fulfilled, regardless of whether this is culpable or not culpable. The non-forfeiture of a security bond must accordingly remain an exception which does not cover all cases in which the person making the security deposit has acted without culpability, that is, has acted with the due caution of a businessman. The challenged rules classify the exception under the legal concept of force majeure, and the European Court has interpreted this concept, with binding effect, as meaning that, apart from the cases expressly referred to in the rules, it must be taken to include not only all cases of absolute impossibility of import or export, but also cases in which the import or export did not take place because of circumstances beyond the control of the importer or exporter, the consequences of which would, despite all reasonable precautions, only be avoidable at the cost of disproportionate losses. In particular, since the European Court adds that the elements of the concept formulated as 'precautions which would have had to be taken' and 'heaviness of the loss which ... he would have had to take on himself' are flexible, all this is another way of expressing the legal notion current in German law and contained within the constitutional principle of proportionality, that the person subjected to the obligation in cases of this kind can free himself from his obligation where there is a 'burden over and above the obligation entered into'.

5. Accordingly, Article 12 of the Basic Law does not pose any obstacle to the application of the challenged rules by the German authorities and courts in the present case. Apart from Article 12 of the Basic Law, Article 2.1 of the Basic Law does not, according to the settled case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, enter into consideration as a further independent criterion for examination (BVerfGE 9, 63 [73]; 9, 73 [77]; 9, 338 [343]; 10, 185 [199]; 21, 227 [234]; 23, 50 [55seq.]).

b) Translation of the Solange II Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 73, 339*

Headnotes:

1. a) The European Court of Justice is a 'statutory court' within the meaning of Article 101.1 of the Basic Law. It is a sovereign organ of judicature established by the Community Treaties, which, on the basis of and within the framework of a legally established jurisdiction and procedures, in principle, makes final decisions in a state of judicial independence on legal questions in accordance with legal rules and legal standards.

   b) The procedural law of the Federal Supreme Court meets the legal requirement of a free hearing, a procedure that affords an appropriate means of defence and a right to counsel of choice.

2. As long as the European Communities, in particular European Court case law, generally ensure effective protection of fundamental rights as against the sovereign powers of the Communities which is to be regarded as substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Constitution, and in so far as they generally safeguard the essential content of fundamental rights, the Federal Constitutional Court will no longer exercise its jurisdiction to decide on the applicability of secondary Community legislation cited as the legal basis for any acts of German courts or authorities within the sovereign jurisdiction of the Federal Republic of Germany, and it will no longer review such legislation by the standard of the fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law; references to the Court under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law for those purpose are therefore inadmissible.

Order of the Second Senate of 22 October 1986 - 2 BvR 197/83 -

Facts:

The appellant's business includes the importing of preserved mushrooms from non-European Community States into the Federal Republic; such imports are subject to Community regulations.

It applied in writing to the competent Federal Office for Food and Licence to import 1,000 tons of preserved mushrooms from Taiwan. The application was refused with reference to the provisions of Regulation 2107/74.

After unsuccessful review proceedings the appellant brought an action before the Frankfurt Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgericht) arguing that the continuation in force of Regulation 2107/74 beyond 1 July 1976, was not justified.

By its judgment of 25 July 1978, the Frankfurt Administrative Court dismissed the application as unfounded on the ground that the refusal of the licence had not been unlawful. In the court's view Regulation 2107/74 corresponded to the objectives specified in Article 39 of the EEC Treaty.

The appellant entered an interlocutory appeal against that judgment. In its decision of 25 March 1981 the Federal Supreme Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht) in response to the appellant's application suspended the proceedings and referred the question to the European Court whether Regulation 2107/74 of the Commission of 8 August 1974, laying down protective measures applicable to imports of preserved mushrooms, infringes the combined provisions of Article 7.1 of Regulation 1927/75 of the Council of 22 July 1975 concerning the system of trade with third countries in the market in products processed from fruit and vegetables and Article 2.2 of Council Regulation 1928/75 of 22 July 1975, laying down detailed rules for applying measures in the market in products processed from fruit and vegetables in so far as it was retained in force after 30 June 1976.

In answer to the question the Court ruled that: consideration of Commission Regulations Nos 1412/76 of 18 June 1976 and 2284/76 of 21 September 1976 has disclosed nothing which affects their validity.

d) In further proceedings before the Supreme Administrative Court, the appellant objected that there had been a breach of various constitutional rules and requested that the proceedings be suspended and that either the question whether Regulations 1412/76 and 2284/76 as interpreted by the Eurepean Court in its judgment of 6 May 1982 in Case

126/81 could be applied in the Federal Republic should be referred to the Federal Constitutional Court under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law or whether a fresh reference should be made to the European Court under Article 177.3 EEC.

In its judgment of 1 December 1982 (7 C 87.78), the Federal Supreme Administrative Court dismissed the appeal as unfounded. In its appeal on constitutional grounds the appellant claims that the judgment of the Federal Supreme Administrative Court disregarded its procedural and substantial rights under the Basic Law.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

The appeal on constitutional grounds is admissible but is not well founded.

I.

1. A finding of a breach of Article 100.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 177.3 ECC by the judgment at issue, presupposes that the Federal Administrative Court was obliged to make a fresh reference to the European Court in spite of the latter Court's preliminary ruling of 6 May 1982 made as a result of the order for a reference by the former court. The refusal of a reference based on such an obligation would conflict with Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law if the European Court was a statutory court within the limits of that provision and the refusal was based on arbitrary considerations.

a) The European Court is a statutory court in the meaning of Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law; this question, not hitherto decided by the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 29, 198 [207]) must be answered in the affirmative.

aa) In view of the extensive institutional guarantees which are present (see Articles 165, 168 and 188 EEC, Articles 2 et seq. and 17 et seq. of the Protocol on the Statute of the Court of Justice of the European Economic Community of 17 April 1957 [II BGBl.1146] and the Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 4 December 1974 in the codified version of 15 February [1982] O.J. C 39/91), there can be no doubt of the European Court's character as a court within the meaning of Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. The Court is a sovereign organ of judicature established by the Community Treaties which, on the basis and within the framework of a legally established jurisdiction and procedures, in principle, makes final decisions in a state of judicial independence on legal questions in accordance with legal rules and legal standards. Its members are subject to obligations of independence and impartiality; their legal status is so constituted by law as to offer guarantee of personal independence. The Court's procedural rules satisfy the due process requirement of a state subject to the rule of law; in particular they guarantee the right to be heard, opportunities for initiating and defending litigation which are appropriate to the subject matter of the proceedings, and freely chosen expert assistance (see also BVerfGE 59,63 [91 et seq.]).

bb) The European Court is not an institution of the Federal Republic of Germany but a common institution of the European Communities. The functional interlocking of the jurisdiction of the European Communities with those of the member states, together with the fact that the Community Treaties, by virtue of the instructions on the application of law given by the ratification legislation under Articles 24.1 and 59.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, and the subordinate law passed on the basis of the Treaties are part of the legal order which applies in the Federal Republic and have to be adhered to, interpreted and applied by its courts, give the European Court the character of a statutory court within the meaning of Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, in so far as the legislation ratifying the Community Treaties confers on the Court judicial functions contained therein. Those functions include in particular the Court's jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings under Article 177 ECC.

Article 177 ECC accords the Court of Justice the conclusive authority in relation to the courts of member states to make decisions on the interpretation of the Treaty and on the validity and interpretation of instruments of Community law derived therefrom, (BVerfGE 52, 187 [200]). That judicial monopoly for the European Court as regards the treaty (embodied for the purposes of Community law in Article 177 ECC) gives it the character, to the extent, of a statutory court within the limits of Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

This partly functional incorporation of the European Court into the jurisdictions of member states expresses the fact that the legal orders of member states and the legal order of the Community are not abruptly juxtaposed in a state of mutual insulation but are in numerous ways related to each other, interconnected and open to reciprocal effects (see e.g. Article 215.2 ECC and the reference therein to 'general principles common to the laws of the member states'). This becomes particularly clear in the allocation of jurisdiction under Article 177 oriented towards cooperation between the courts of member states and the European Court. In the interests of the Treaty objectives of integration, legal security and uniformity of application, it serves to bring about the most uniformly possible interpretation and application of Community law by all courts within the sphere of application of the ECC Treaty (see the European Court judgments in Hoffmann La Roche AG v. Centrafarm [107/76]).

cc) This conclusion is in harmony with the international law obligation on the Federal Republic of Germany arising under Article 5.1 EEC to take all appropriate measures to fulfil the obligations arising out of the EEC Treaty: in so far as they follow from Article 177 they are to be implemented by the courts and it is for the member states themselves to guarantee adherence to them. This objective is served in an especially apt way by the inclusion of the European Court, within the framework of its jurisdiction under Article 177 EEC, in the sphere of application of Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

dd) Classification of the European Court as a statutory court according to Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law in the matter of preliminary rulings under Article 177 ECC is not prevented by the fact that a reference under Article 177 constitutes an objective interim procedure in which the parties to the main action have no right of application of their own and which primarily serves the purpose of interpreting, implementing and reviewing the validity of Community law. An application to the European Court under Article 177 for a ruling forms part of uniform legal dispute, for the outcome of which the answering of the question referred to (in so far as relevant) is decisive. The right of an individual involved in the main action to demand implementation of the guarantees contained in Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also extends to the observation of the duty, established by Article 177 EEC, to institute proceedings for a ruling regardless of the legal nature of the proceedings and the rules which constitute its substance.

b) The Federal Administrative Court did not act arbitrarily in refusing in this case to make a fresh reference to the European Court.

aa) The European Court had already given a preliminary ruling in the same originating action following a reference by the Federal Administrative Court. The subject matter of its decision concerned the same legal issues, namely the validity of Commission Regulations 1412/76 of 18 June 1976 and 2284/76 of 21 September 1976, in respect of which the appellant demanded a fresh reference. The Federal Administrative Court was not obliged to refer the question a second time. Judgments made by the European Court in accordance with Article 177 EEC are binding on all courts of member states dealing with the same main action (European Court judgment in Milch, Fett und Eierkontor v. Hauptzollamt Saarbrücken [29/68]); in so far as they are relevant to the decisions of those courts they are to be used as a basis for deciding the main action. That follows from the meaning and purpose of Article 177 and 164 EEC (see BVerfGE 45, 142 [162]; 52, 187 [201]).

bb) There is an exception to such a binding effect according to the above mentioned judgment of the European Court in cases where its judgment lacks clarity. With regard to the European Court's preliminary ruling in the present action the Federal Supreme Administrative Court considered whether it was dealing which such a case. It answered the question in the negative. The view it took is in no way arbitrary.

cc) We are not concerned with deciding in the present case whether the basic binding effect of preliminary rulings of the European Court also ceases to apply if, after the ruling is given, new facts become known which might possibly lead to a different decision by the Court, or whether only the procedure for reapplication under Article 41 of the Statute of the Court would be relevant; the appellant has not alleged any such facts.

dd) It is not necessary for present purposes to decide whether under the provisions of Community law the possibility was open to the Supreme Administrative Court, having regard to any possible failure on the part of the European Court to take account of or adequately to appraise the submissions of the appellant in the Article 177 proceedings, to commence fresh reference proceedings from the viewpoint of the right to a legal hearing. In the judgment of the Supreme Administrative Court, which was in no way arbitrary, there were no factors which could give rise to the supposition that the European Court failed to direct its attention to the appellant's submission or to give it due consideration. The requisite conditions therefore do not exist for a fresh reference under Article 177, the refusal of which, in so far as it was permissible, or possibly even required, under the provisions of Community law, could constitute a breach of Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

c) On those grounds, at any rate, there is no question in the present proceedings, which involve an appeal on constitutional grounds, of a reference of the questions by the Federal Supreme Administrative Court to the European Court.

d) Furthermore, the Supreme Administrative Court did not contravene Article 101.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, by reason of its refusal to make a reference to the Constitutional Court under that Article in order to occasion the European Court to change its preliminary ruling by way of a reference by the Constitutional Court under Article 177. A reference to the Constitutional Court with that end in mind would have been inadmissible; the subject matter of proceedings under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law is the constitutionality of legislation and not of court judgments.

2. There was no contravention of Article 103.1 of the Basic Law.

a) The appellant's objection, that the European Court denied it the right to a legal hearing in the proceedings for a preliminary ruling and that for constitutional reasons it therefore could not bind the Supreme Administrative Court by its ruling, is inadmissible. The appellant is not alleging circumstances which would show that in its method of procedure in giving the preliminary ruling under Article 177 EEC, the European Court refused in general to accord the parties to the original proceedings a measure of legal hearing sufficient to satisfy the minimum rule of law requirements of due legal process and that it simply and generally disregarded or failed to take into account the guarantees in its statute and rules of procedure corresponding to those requirements. The infringement alleged by the appellant in this case, even if it should be true, does not allow that general conclusion to be drawn.

Only if there were that sort of general denial of a legal hearing on the part of the European Court could consideration be given, in view of the requirements of principle imposed by the Basic Law as a condition for the transfer of sovereign rights under Article 24.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 37, 271 [296]; 58, 1[28, 40]), to questioning the continued validity under the Basic Law of the Acts of Accession to the Community Treaties, and therefore the binding effect of preliminary rulings of the European Court, from the standpoint of infringement of the right to a legal hearing (see also II. 1 and 2 below).

b) The Supreme Administrative Court itself clearly took notice of the appellant's submissions and took them into account in reaching its decision; there is therefore no question of a contravention of Article 103.1 of the Basic Law. Nor was the court obliged for constitutional reasons, as explained, to provide the appellant with the legal hearing before the European Court which it was allegedly denied by making a fresh reference to the Court.

3. Article 19.4 of the Basic Law was not infringed by the judgment of the Federal Supreme Administrative Court:

a) Instruments incorporating judicial decisions of the kind here at issue do not fall within the term 'public powers' for the purposes of that Article (see BVerfGE 49, 329 [340 et seq.]).

b) Nor is the appeal on constitutional grounds well founded if it is understood in the sense that the appellant regards it as an infringement of Article 19.4 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, that remedies are not available from the German courts against judgments of the European Court in proceedings for a preliminary ruling under Article 177.

This Court has already held on several occasions that Article 19.4 of the Basic Law does not confer subsidiary jurisdiction on German courts or give them international competence to intervene against decisions of international courts (BVerfGE 58, 1 [28 et seq.] with further references); the same applies to decisions of the European Court.

c) Nor was there a breach of Article 19.4 sentence 1 of the Basic Law by reason of the Supreme Administrative Court considering itself bound by the preliminary ruling of the European Court.

aa) It is true that Article 19.4 sentence 1 of the Basic Law requires the provision of a legal system of recourse to the courts, which guarantees a comprehensive consideration of the factual and legal aspects of the subject matter of the proceedings, as well as a form of decision and means of implementing it appropriate to the particular demand for protection of rights, by an independent and impartial organ of judicature (BVerfGE 60, 253 [296 seq.]); disregarding possible circumstantial effects and the scope for appraisal, formulation or discretion on the part of the legislative or executive authority, this in principle, excludes any binding obligation on courts to adhere to factual or legal judgments of a particular case by other bodies. But this does not exclude an obligation provided for by legal rules to adhere to the decisions of other courts (see BVerfGE 65, 132 [137 et seq.]); because of its functional jurisdiction under Article 177 EEC, in respect of which there are no constitutional doubts, the same also applies to the binding effect of preliminary rulings of the European Court.

bb) The question whether there is sufficient provision for the protection of legal rights before the European Court could only be significant in relation to a possible infringement of Article 24.1 of the Basic Law by the Act of Accession to the EEC

Treaty if the constitutional principle of the rule of law, which has to be respected in the event of transfer of sovereign rights under Article 24.1, required a right of appeal to be given against preliminary rulings of the European Court.

This Court has consistently held that neither Article 19.4 nor Article 103.1 of the Basic Law nor the general principle of the rule of law requires there to be an additional recourse to domestic (German) courts of further instance (see BVerfGE 34, 1 [6]; 42, 243 [248]; 42, 252 [254]; 49, 329[343]; 54, 277 [291l]). From that viewpoint the present organization of the procedure for a preliminary ruling from the European Court does not fail to adhere to the restrictions laid down in the Basic Law on the transfer of sovereign rights.

II.

It cannot be held that the judgment of the Federal Administrative Court at issue infringed the appellant's fundamental rights under Articles 12.1 and 2.1 in conjunction with Article 20.3 of the Basic Law (principles of proportionality and legal certainty).

1. The appellant's complaints, that the European Court's ruling and Commission Regulations 1412/76 and 2284/76 as interpreted by that Court infringed the fundamental rights under the Basic Law and therefore ought not to have been applied by German authorities or courts during the period in question within the sphere to which the Basic Law applies, are inadmissible; a reference of the regulations to this Court by the Supreme Administrative Court under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law would have been inadmissible.

a) Article 24.1 of the Basic Law makes it possible to open up the legal system of the Federal Republic of Germany in such a way that the Federal Republic's exclusive claim to control in its sphere of sovereignty can be withdrawn and room can be given for the direct validity and application of a law from another source within that sphere of the sovereignty (see BVerfGE 37, 271 [280]; 58, 1 [28]; 59, 63 [90]). It is true that Article 24.1 of the Basic Law does not itself provide for the direct validity and application of the law established by the international institution, nor does it directly regulate the relationship between such law and domestic law (for example, the question of the priority of their respective application). Internal validity and application, as well as the possible internal priority of validity or application of international treaties (including those of the sort at issue here), do not follow directly from general international law. Current international law does not contain any general rule arising out of the agreed practice of states or undoubted legal acceptance to the effect that states are obliged to incorporate their treaties into their domestic law and to accord them thereunder priority of validity or application as against the national law. Internal priority of validity or application only arises by virtue of an application of law instruction to that effect under the national law, and that applies, too in the case of treaties, the content of which obliges the parties to provide for internal priority of validity or application. Article 24.1, however, makes it possible constitutionally for treaties which transfer sovereign rights to international institutions and the law established by such institutions to be accorded priority of validity and application as against the national law of the Federal Republic by the appropriate internal application of law instruction.

That is what took place in the case of the European Community Treaties and the law established on their basis by the Community organs by the passing of the Acts of Accession to the Treaties under Articles 24.1 and 59.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. From the application of law instruction of the Act of Accession to the EEC Treaty, which extends to Article 189.2 EEC, arises the immediate validity of the regulations of the Community for the Federal Republic and the precedence of their application over national law.

b) The power conferred by Article 24.1 of the Basic Law, however, is not without limits under constitutional law. The provision does not confer a power to surrender by way of ceding sovereign rights to international institutions the identity of the prevailing constitutional order of the Federal Republic by breaking into its basic framework, that is, into its very structure. That applies in particular to legislative instruments of the international institution which, perhaps as a result of a corresponding interpretation or development of the underlying treaty law, would undermine essential, structural parts of the Basic Law. An essential part which cannot be dispensed with and belongs to the basic framework of the constitutional order in force is constituted in any event by the legal principles underlying the provisions of the Basic Law on fundamental rights (see BVerfGE 37, 271 [279]; 58, 1 [30 seq.]). Article 24.1 of the Basic Law, subject to conditions, allows these legal principles to be treated according to context. In so far as sovereign power is accorded to an international institution within the meaning of Article 24.1 which is in a position within the sovereign sphere of the Federal Republic to encroach on the essential content of the fundamental rights recognized by the Basic Law, it is necessary, if that entails the removal of legal protection existing under the terms of the Basic Law, that instead, there should be a guarantee of the application of fundamental rights which in substance and effectiveness is essentially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law. As a general rule this will require a system of protection of individual rights by independent courts which are given adequate jurisdiction and, in particular, power to review and decide on factual and legal questions appropriate to the relevant claim to protection of rights, and by courts which reach their decisions on the basis of a proper procedure allowing the right to a legal hearing and providing for means of attack or defence appropriate to the subject matter of the dispute and for the availability of freely chosen expert assistance, and the decisions of which, if necessary, contain adequate and effective sanctions for the infringement of a fundamental right.

c) This Court explained in its judgment of 29 May 1974 (see BVerfGE 37, 271 [280 et seq.]) that, having regard to the state of integration which had been reached at that time, the standard of fundamental rights under Community law, generally binding within the European Communities, did not yet show the level of legal certainty for the Court to conclude that standard would permanently satisfy the fundamental rights standards of the Basic Law, without prejudice to possible modifications, in such a way that the limits imposed by Article 24.1 of the Basic Law on the application of derived Community law within the sovereign area of the Federal Republic would not be transgressed. It said that the Community still lacked a Parliament legitimized by direct democratic means and established by general suffrage, which possessed legislative powers and to which the Community institutions competent to issue legislation were politically fully responsible; in particular, the Community still lacked a codified catalogue of fundamental rights; European Court case law, as it then stood, did not by itself guarantee necessary legal certainty. So far as that legal certainty remained unachieved in the course of subsequent integration, the reservation derived from Article 24 remained in force. This Court accordingly held in the above mentioned judgment: as long as the integration process has not progressed so far that Community law also receives a catalogue of fundamental rights decided on by a parliament and of settled validity which is adequate in comparison with the catalogue of fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law, a reference by a court in the Federal Republic of Germany to the Federal Constitutional Court in judicial review proceedings after obtaining a ruling of the European Court under Article 177 of the Treaty is admissible and necessary if the German court regards that rule of Community law which is relevant to its decision in the interpretation given by the European Court to be inapplicable in the interpretation given by the European Court because and in so far as it conflicts with one of the fundamental rights in the Basic Law (BVerfGE 37, 271 [285]). In the case in question it held the reference under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law to be admissible but, in the circumstances, not to be well founded.

In its decision of 25 July 1979 (BVerfGE 52, 187 [202 seq.]), this Chamber expressly left open the question whether, or to what extent (having regard to political and legal developments which might take place in the meantime in European Community matters), the principles laid down in the judgment of 29 May 1974 could continue to claim unrestricted validity in relation to future reference of rules of derived Community law.

d) In the judgment of this Chamber a measure of protection of fundamental rights has been established in the meantime within the sovereign jurisdiction of the European Communities which in its conception, substance and manner of implementation is essentially comparable with the standards of fundamental rights provided for in the Basic Law. All the main institutions of the Community have since acknowledged in a legally significant manner that in the exercise of their powers and the pursuit of the objectives of the Community they will be guided as a legal duty by respect for fundamental rights, in particular as established by the constitutions of member states and by the European Convention on Human Rights. There are no decisive factors to lead one to conclude that the standard of fundamental rights which has been achieved under Community law is not adequately consolidated and is only of a transitory nature.

aa) This standard of fundamental rights has in the meantime, particularly through the decisions of the European Court, been formulated in content, consolidated and adequately guaranteed.

In the early years the European Court refused to investigate accusations by parties that decisions of the High Authority had infringed principles of German constitutional law and, in particular, Articles 2 and 12 of the Basic Law (Stork v. High Authority [1/58]); it stated that it had no authority to ensure respect for rules of domestic law in force in one or other member state, even if they involved principles of constitutional law, and explained that 'Community law as it arises under the European Coal and Steel Community Treaty does not contain any general principle, express or otherwise, guaranteeing the maintenance of vested rights (President etc. v. High Authority [36-38/59 and 40/59]). In the following period the European Court made it clear that the general principles of Community law, the maintenance of which it was bound to protect, included the fundamental rights of the individual (see Stauder v. City of Ulm [29/69]). It is true that in the Internationale Handelsgesellschaft case (Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [11/70]) it held that the validity of a Community measure or its effect within a particular member state could not be affected by an allegation that it ran counter to fundamental rights as formulated by the constitution of the member state or to the principles of its constitutional structure; it would still have to consider, however, whether an analogous guarantee under Community law had been disregarded, for the safeguarding of fundamental rights formed part of the general principles of law which the Court had to protect. Whilst the protection of such rights must be supported by the constitutional traditions of the member states, they must also operate within the structure and objectives of the Community.

The European Court took the essential step (from the viewpoint of the Basic Law) in its judgment in the Nold case (J. Nold KG v. E.C. Commission [4/73]), where it stated that in relation to the safeguarding of fundamental rights it had to start from the common constitutional tradition of the member states: 'it cannot therefore allow measures which are incompatible with fundamental rights recognized and guaranteed by the constitutions of those states'.

On the legal basis of the general principles of Community law thus defined and given that content, the European Court in the period that followed cited fundamental rights, as recognised in the constitutions of member states, as obligatory standards for reviewing measures of Community organs taken within their spheres of jurisdiction. Side by side with the express guarantees of liberties contained in the Community Treaties themselves (see e.g. Articles 7, 48 et seq., 59 et seq. and 67 et seq. EEC) the foreground was occupied naturally by the fundamental rights and freedom relating to economic activities, such as the right to property and freedom to pursue economic activities (see Nold [above]; Hauer v. Land Rheinland-Pfalz [44/79]). In addition to that it cited other basic rights, such as freedom of association, the general principle of equal treatment and the prohibition of arbitrary acts, religious freedom or the protection of the family, as standards of assessment (see Union Sydicale v. E.C. Council [175/73]; Ruckdeschel [117/76 and 16/77]).

The European Court has generally recognized and consistently applied in its decisions the principles, which follow from the rule of law, of the prohibition of excessive action and of proportionality as general legal principles in reaching a balance between the common interest objectives of the Community legal system and the safeguarding of the essential content of fundamental rights (More recent examples are the judgments in: Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [above]; Hauer [above]; Testa v. Bundesanstalt für Arbeit [41, 121 and 796/79]; Heijn [94/83]; Fearon v. Irish Land Commission [182/83]; Altole [240/83]; compare M. Hilf in EuGRZ 1985, 647 at 649). It has recognized the prohibition of retrospection as an emanation of the basic principle of legal certainty and has recognized the rule against double penalties (see Racke [98/78]; Regina v. Kent Kirk [63/83]; Boehringer [7/72]) and likewise the obligation under the rule of law to state reasons for individual decisions (see Intermills v. E:C: Commission [323/82]; Netherlands v. E:C: Commission [296 and 318/82]; M. Hilf, loc. cit on p. 650). In Johnston v. The Chief Constable of the Royalulster Constabulary (Case 222/84) the Court, having recourse to the constitutional traditions common to all member states and to Article 13 of the European Human Rights Convention, categorized the claim to effective judicial protection for the safeguarding of personal rights as a constituent part of the guarantees for fundamental rights under Community law. It regarded the duty to grant a legal hearing as an essential requirement of a fair procedural system (see Pecastaing v. Belgian State [98/79]).

For the purposes of defining under Community law the content and extent of fundamental rights, the Court has also referred to the European Human Rights Convention and its additional protocol (see Rutili (36/75)).

bb) The European Parliament, the Council and the Commission of the Community adopted the following joint declaration on 5 April 1977 (O.J. 1977, C 103/1):

The European Parliament, the Council and the Commission, Whereas the Treaties establishing the European Communities are based on the principle of respect for the law;

Whereas, as the Court of Justice has recognized, that law comprises, over and above the rules embodied in the Treaties and secondary Community legislation, the general principles of law and in particular the fundamental rights, principles and rights on which the constitutional law of the member states is based; Whereas, in particular, all the member states are Contracting Parties to the European Convention for the protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms signed in Rome on 4 November 1950, have adopted the following declaration:

1. The European Parliament, the Council and the Commission stress the prime importance they attach to the protection of fundamental rights, as derived in particular from the constitutions of the member states and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

2. In the exercise of their powers and in pursuance of the aims of the European Communities, they respect and will continue to respect these rights. The European council adopted a declaration on democracy on 7/8 April 1978; it reads as follows:

> The election of the Members of the Assembly by direct universal suffrage is an event of out-standing importance for the future of the European Communities and a vivid demonstration of the ideals of democracy shared by the people within them.

> The creation of the Communities, which is the foundation of ever closer union among the peoples of Europe called for in the Treaty of Rome, marked the determination of their founders to strengthen the protection of peace and freedom.
>
> The Heads of State and of Government confirm their will, as expressed in the Copenhagen Declaration the European identity, to ensure that the cherished values of their legal, political and moral order are respected and to safeguard the principles of representative democracy, of the rule of law, of social justice and of respect for human rights.
>
> The application of these principles implies a political system of pluralist democracy which guarantees both free expression of opinions within the constitutional organization of powers and the procedures necessary for the protection of human rights.
>
> The Heads of State and of Government associate themselves with the Joint Declaration by the Assembly, the Council and the Commission whereby these institutions expressed their determination to respect fundamental rights in pursuing the aims of the Communities.
>
> They solemnly declare that respect for and maintenance of representative democracy and human rights in each member state are essential elements of membership of the European Communities.

e) Compared with the standard of fundamental rights under the Basic Law it may be that the guarantees for the protection of such rights established thus far by the decisions of the European Court, since they have naturally been developed case by case, still contain gaps in so far as specific legal principles recognized by the Basic Law or the nature, content or extent of a fundamental right have not individually been the object of a judgment delivered by the Court. What is decisive, nevertheless, is the attitude of principle which the Court maintains at this stage towards the Community's obligations in respect of fundamental rights, to the incorporation of fundamental rights in Community law under legal rules and the legal connection of that law (to that extent) with the constitutions of member states and with the European Human Rights Convention, as is also the practical significance which has been achieved by the protection of fundamental rights in the meantime in the Court's application of Community law. Although the above mentioned declarations of the institutions of the European Community and of the European Council may lack the formal character of Treaty law and though the Community as such is not a party to the European Human Rights Convention, those instruments are both internal to the Community and of legal significance as regards the relationship of the Community with its member states: they testify formally to the agreed legal view of the states party to the Treaty and of the Community institutions with regard to the Community's obligation to guarantee fundamental rights as they result from the constitutions of the member states and, by virtue of being general legal principles, attain validity as primary Community law; by their unanimous testimony to an intention as regards the application of the Community

Treaties in practice, they are also of legal significance under international law for the definition of the content of the Treaties. The declarations also reinforce the European Court's jurisdiction and obligation to ensure the protection under Community law of these fundamental rights and the legal principles which they entail in accordance with its rules of procedure. Those rules of procedure, in relation to access to the Court, the given types of procedures, the powers of the Court to review and make decisions, the procedural principles and the effect of its decisions, are organized in a way which, in general, guarantees effective protection of fundamental rights which is to be regarded as substantially similar to the unconditional protection of fundamental rights under the Basic Law.

By virtue of the connection, through legal rules as explained above of the guarantees of fundamental rights contained in the constitutions of member states and in the European Human Rights Convention, with the general principles of Community law, the requirement of a catalogue of fundamental rights decreed by a Parliament, which was regarded as necessary by this Chamber in its judgment of 29 May, has also been satisfied in all, the circumstances. In the first place, since 1974 all the original member states of the Community (like those which acceded later) have acceded to the European Human Rights Convention, and their respective parliaments have approved their accession; in the second place, the common declaration of 5 April 1977, which was also adopted by the European Parliament, can be judged from the viewpoint of the requirement to be a sufficient parliamentary recognition of a formulated catalogue of effectively operating fundamental rights. Whilst this Chamber in its judgment of 29 May 1974, observed that the Community lacked a parliament legitimized by direct and democratic means and established by general suffrage which possessed legislative powers and to which the institutions competent to issue legislation were politically fully responsible, that was an element in the description of the state of integration as it appeared at that time; the basis for that finding was clearly the consideration that protection of fundamental rights has to begin as early as the stage of lawmaking and parliamentary responsibility provides a suitable protective arrangement for that purpose. There was no intention, however, of laying down a constitutional requirement that such a position must have prevailed before there could be any possibility of the withdrawal of the Federal Constitutional Court's jurisdiction over derived Community law in proceedings by way of review of legislation under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law.

Nor is it to be expected in view of the state of European Court case law achieved at the present stage that a decline in the standards of fundamental rights under Community law might result through the legal connection of Community law with the constitutions of member states to an extent that makes it impossible on constitutional grounds to regard a reasonable protection of fundamental rights as being generally available. In the first place, the Court is not obliged to determine the general principles of Community law according to the lowest common denominator derived from a comparison of the constitutions of member states, even if such deep differences between their Basic Laws exist at all or do arise in the future. It is to be expected rather that the European Court will strive to ensure the best possible development of any particular principle of fundamental rights in Community law. In the second place, the taking into account for legal purposes of the European Human Rights Convention, together with the now extensive case law of the European Court in favour of human rights, guarantees a minimum standard of substantive protection of fundamental rights which, in principle, satisfies the legal requirements of the Basic Law as such. That position is not altered by the fact that the Community as such is not a party to the European Human Rights Convention.

The fact that at Community level questions of a different nature arise in certain circumstances in connection with the regulation of fundamental rights or the practical definition of the extent to which they are protected does not, in general, impair the adequacy of the protection of fundamental rights provided by Community law from the point of view of the Basic Law. In regard especially to the objectives laid down in the Community treaties, which for their part are compatible with the Basic Law, questions of balance will arise in this connection involving Treaty and common interest objectives of the Community which will not arise, at least directly, in the same way at member state level. Furthermore, the fundamental rights safeguarded by the Basic Law take their place in a constitutional framework as a body of rules representing a unified purpose and are accordingly to be interpreted and applied in harmony and coordination with other legal interests conferred or recognized thereby. They include the belief, expressed in the preamble forms, of supranational cooperation made possible under Article 24.1. Under the Basic Law, therefore it is also possible to have legal provisions at Community level which protect fundamental rights in accordance with the objectives and special structures of the Community; the substantive content of the fundamental rights and, indeed, of human rights on the other hand is unconditional and must continue in existence in face of the sovereign powers of the Community as well. This Chamber holds that requirement to be adequately guaranteed in general at the present stage at Community level.

f) In view of those developments it must be held that, so long as the European Communities, in particular European Court case law, generally ensure effective protection of fundamental rights as against the sovereign powers of the Communities which is to be regarded as substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law, and in so far as they generally safeguard the essential content of fundamental rights, the Federal Constitutional Court will no longer exercise its jurisdiction to decide on the applicability of secondary Community legislation cited as the legal basis for any acts of German courts or authorities within the sovereign jurisdiction of the Federal Republic of Germany, and it will no longer review such legislation by the standard of the fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law; references to the Court under Article 100.1 for that purpose are therefore inadmissible.

g) The question must, therefore, remain unanswered whether the appellant is correct in its accusation that the disputed Commission regulations in the interpretation given by the European Court infringe its fundamental rights as recognized in Articles 12.1 and 2.1 in conjunction with Article 20.3 of the Basic Law. It does not appear either from the appellant's submissions or from the preliminary ruling of the European Court that the Court under its interpretation of the law is in general simply not prepared or not in a position to recognize or protect the fundamental rights claimed by the appellant and that, therefore, the degree of protection of such rights required by the Basic Law has in general clearly not been reached at the level of Community law. For those reasons the present case does not give any occasion to consider a review of the disputed Commission regulations in respect of their compatibility with fundamental rights under the Basic Law. A reference of the Commission regulations under Article 100.1 by the Federal Supreme Administrative Court in the main action would, therefore, have been inadmissible.

2. The appellant has not alleged, nor is there any evidence of any independent contravention by the judgment of the Federal Supreme Administrative Court of the constitutional rights which it claims would not be covered by the binding effects on that court of the European Court's preliminary ruling.

The recourse to the Federal Constitutional Court opposes Parliament's approval of the Treaty of Maastricht and the constitutional amendment to legalize Germany's membership in the European Union (Article 23 of the Basic Law) as well as to install a European Monetary Union (Article 88 of the Basic Law). The main interrelated but distinct issues of the claim are the expansion of the European Union competences and the potential existence of "absolute" limits to European integration.

German members of the European Parliament, belonging to the political party "Die Grünen" (The Green Party), and Manfred Brunner, a former high ranking official of the European Commission, lodged complaints of unconstitutionality with the Federal Constitutional Court.

The complainants claim that the amendments to the Basic Law and the law transforming the Treaty of Maastricht into national law violated the following: (1) the right to human dignity; (2) the right to free development of personality; (3) the right to form associations and societies; (4) the right to freely establish political parties; (5) the right to freely choose a trade, occupation or profession; (6) the right to property; (7) the right to elect deputies of the German Bundestag; (8) the right to constrain any person seeking to abolish the constitutional order of Germany.

2. b) The complainant argues that his fundamental rights were infringed because they are no longer guaranteed for Germany alone and by German state organs and therefore changed their content as they became European fundamental rights. This complaint is inadmissible, too. The openness of the Basic Law towards European Integration, which is already established in the preamble of the Basic Law and further regulated in Articles 23 and 24 of the Basic Law, has an impact on the possibility of encroachments upon fundamental rights. Those encroachments upon fundamental rights can also result from measures taken by the European organs. Thus, the protection of fundamental rights must be guaranteed throughout the territory where these measures apply; this especially widens the territorial scope of application of the fundamental liberties and the comparative perspective as regards the application of the rule of equality.

   This does not result in a substantial decrease in the standard of fundamental rights protection. The Federal Constitutional Court by its jurisdiction (see BVerfGE 37, 271 [280 seq.]; 73, 339 [376 seq.]) generally guarantees an effective protection of basic rights for the inhabitants of Germany, also against the sovereign powers of the Communities. It guarantees that this protection of basic rights will be accorded the same respect as the protection of indispensable basic right guarantees under the constitution. In particular the court provides a general safeguard of the essential content of the basic rights. The court thus guarantees this essential content as against the sovereign powers of the Community as well (see BVerfGE 73, 339 [386]).

Sovereign acts of the European Communities also affect the holders of fundamental rights in Germany, and thereby touch on the guarantees of the Constitution and the role of the Federal Constitutional Court, which is responsible for the protection of fundamental rights in Germany, not only against German state organs (contrary to BVerfGE 58, 1 [27]). Nevertheless the Federal Constitutional Court exercises its jurisdiction over the applicability of secondary Community Law in Germany in a "relationship of cooperation" with the European Court of Justice. In this relationship, the European Court of Justice guarantees the fundamental rights protection in each individual case for the whole area of the European Community, and the Federal Constitutional Court can therefore limit itself to the general guarantee of the indispensable fundamental rights standard (see BVerfGE 73, 339 [387]).

d) Translation of the Banana Market Organization Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 102, 147*

Headnotes:

1. Constitutional complaints and submissions by courts which assert that fundamental rights guaranteed in the Basic Law have been infringed by secondary European Community Law are inadmissible from the outset if their grounds do not state that the evolution of European law, including the rulings of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, has declined below the standard of fundamental rights required after the "Solange II" decision (BVerfGE 73, 339 [378 - 381]).

2. Therefore, the grounds for a submission or a constitutional complaint must state in detail that the protection of the fundamental rights unconditionally required by the Basic Law is not generally ensured in the respective case. This requires a comparison of the protection of fundamental rights on the national and on the Community level similar to the one made by the Federal Constitutional Court in the "Solange II" decision (BVerfGE 73, 339 [378 - 381]).

Order of the Second Senate of 7 June 2000 - 2 BvL 1/97 -

Facts:

The judicial referral concerns the question whether the application of the common organisation of the market in bananas of the European Community in the Federal Republic of Germany is constitutional. On 1 July 1993, the common organisation of the market in bananas (hereinafter: banana market organisation) entered into force pursuant to Article 33, sentence 2 of Council Regulation (EEC) No 404/93 of 13 February 1993 (OJ L 47, 25/02/1993, p. 1 - 11; hereinafter: Regulation 404/93), which, inter alia, discontinued the tariff quota granted in the Banana Protocol (Regulation 404/93, Article 21 [2]).

The regulation differentiates bananas according to their origin: First, "Community bananas" are produced within the European Community. Second, "ACP bananas" come from certain African, Caribbean and Pacific countries, which, as the so-called ACP countries, have for a long time been linked to the European Community by special multilateral agreements. In this context, a quota of bananas of a total weight of up to 857,000 tonnes is referred to as "traditional" ACP bananas (cf. Annex of Regulation 404/93), this quantity corresponding to the customary import quantity from ACP countries. Imports that exceed this quantity are referred to as "non-traditional" ACP bananas. Finally, "third country bananas" are neither from the Community nor from ACP countries. As regards price and quality, neither Community bananas nor ACP bananas can compete with third country bananas. The aim of the banana market organisation is to support the banana production within the Community and to ensure the duty-free sale of traditional ACP bananas without hindering the import of third country bananas and non-traditional ACP bananas (Regulation 404/93, recitals 2 et seq.).

To achieve this, compensatory aid arrangements for Community bananas were created (Regulation 404/93, Art 10 et seq.). Traditional ACP bananas - as all bananas produced outside the European Community - require an import licence (Regulation 404/93, Article 17), but are duty-free (Regulation 404/93, recital 12). Non-traditional ACP bananas and third country bananas may be imported, in the framework of a specified tariff quota, at low customs duty rates or duty-free. Beyond this quota, however, they are subject to high levies.

The plaintiffs of both original proceedings are 19 companies of the so-called Atlanta group. As banana importers, they engage in all steps of transport, ripening and marketing. 30 per cent of their sales are obtained from the marketing of bananas. After the entry into force of the banana market organisation, the plaintiffs were allotted a provisional quota quantity for the third quarter of 1993. Objections raised against the limitation this allotment placed on the quantities of imports were dismissed. In the legal action they brought against this limitation, the plaintiffs put forward, at first, that Regulation 404/93 infringes Community law. The Administrative Court submitted the question to the Court of Justice of the European Communities. At the same time, it granted the plaintiffs, by means of temporary relief, further import licences for the months of November and December 1993, at a customs duty rate of 100 ECU per tonne, which were, in case of the plaintiffs losing the case on the merits, to be offset against the reference quantities to which the plaintiffs were entitled according to Community law.

The submission is inadmissible.

II.

In its decision of 29 May 1974 - 2 BvL 52/71 (BVerfGE 37, 271 - "As long as ... Decision" [Solange I]), the competent Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court had, with reference to actual jurisdiction, come to the result that the integration process of the Community had not progressed so far that Community law also contained a codified catalogue of fundamental rights decided on by a Parliament and of settled validity, which was adequate in comparison with the catalogue of fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law. For this reason, the Senate regarded the reference by a court of the Federal Republic of Germany to the Federal Constitutional Court in constitutional review proceedings, following the obtaining of a ruling of the Court of Justice of the European Communities under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty, which was required at that time, as admissible and necessary if the German court regards the rule of Community law that is relevant to its decision as inapplicable in the interpretation given by the Court of Justice of the European Communities because and in so far as it conflicts with one of the fundamental rights of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 37, 271 [285]).

2 a) In its decision of 22 October 1986 - 2 BvR 197/83 (BVerfGE 73, 339 - [Solange II]), the Senate holds that a measure of protection of fundamental rights has been established in the meantime within the sovereign jurisdiction of the European Community which in its conception, substance and manner of implementation is essentially comparable with the standards of fundamental rights provided in the Basic Law, and that there are no decisive factors to lead one to conclude that the standard of fundamental rights which has been achieved under Community law is not adequately consolidated and only of a transitory nature (BVerfGE 73, 339 [378]).

On the basis of individual decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, the Senate made statements concerning the standard of fundamental rights, and holds that this standard, particularly through the decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, has been formulated in content, consolidated and adequately guaranteed (BVerfGE 73, 339 [378 - 381]). In this context, the Senate commented on the decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Communities concerning the fundamental rights and freedoms relating to economic activities, such as the right to property and the freedom to pursue economic activities (above, p. 380), but also on the freedom of association, on the general principle of equal treatment and the prohibition of arbitrary acts, religious freedom and the protection of the family, as well as on the principles, which follow from the rule of law, of the prohibition of excessive action and of proportionality as general legal principles in achieving a balance between the common interest objectives of the Community legal system, and on the safeguarding of the essential content of fundamental rights (above, p. 380).

In summary, the Senate made the following statement: As long as the European Communities, in particular European case law, generally ensure effective protection of fundamental rights as against the sovereign powers of the Communities which is to be regarded as substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law, and in so far as they generally safeguard the essential content of fundamental rights, the Federal Constitutional Court will no longer exercise its jurisdiction to decide on the applicability of secondary Community legislation cited as the legal basis for any acts of German courts or authorities within the sovereign jurisdiction of the Federal Republic of Germany, and it will no longer review such legislation by the standard of fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law. References (of rules of secondary Community law to the Federal Constitutional Court) under Article 100.1 of the Basic Law are therefore inadmissible (BVerfGE 73, 339 [387]).

b) In its Maastricht Decision (BVerfGE 89, 155), the Senate maintained this view. In this decision, the Senate stressed that the Federal Constitutional Court, through its jurisdiction, guarantees, in cooperation with the Court of Justice of the European Communities, that effective protection of fundamental rights for the residents of Germany will also be secured against the sovereign powers of the Communities and is generally to be regarded as substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law, and that in particular the Court provides a general safeguard of the essential contents of the fundamental rights. The Federal Constitutional Court thus guarantees this essential content against the sovereign powers of the Community as well (BVerfGE 89, 155 [174 - 175], with reference to BVerfGE 37, 271 [280 et seq.] and 73, 339 [376 - 377, 386]). Under the preconditions the Senate has formulated in BVerfGE 73, 339 - "Solange II" -, the Court of Justice of the European Communities is also competent for the protection of the fundamental rights of the citizens of the Federal Republic of Germany against acts done by the national (German) public authority on account of secondary Community law. The Federal Constitutional Court will only become active again in the framework of its jurisdiction should the Court of Justice of the European Communities depart from the standard of fundamental rights stated by the Senate in BVerfGE 73, 339 (378 - 381).

c) Article 23.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (inserted pursuant to the Law amending the Basic Law of 21 December 1992 - BGBl I, p. 2086 -) confirms this ruling. Pursuant to this law, the Federal Republic of Germany shall participate, with a view to establishing a united Europe, in the development of the European Union that is committed to democratic, social, and federal principles, to the rule of law, and to the principle of subsidiarity, and that guarantees a level of protection of fundamental rights essentially comparable to that afforded by the Basic Law. An identical protection in the different areas of fundamental rights afforded by European Community law and by the rulings of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, which are based on Community law, is not called for. The constitutional requirements are satisfied in accordance with the preconditions mentioned in BVerfGE 73, 339 (340, 387) if the rulings of the Court of Justice of the European Communities generally ensure effective protection of fundamental rights as against the sovereign powers of the Communities which is to be regarded as substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law, and in so far as they generally safeguard the essential content of fundamental rights.

d) Thus, constitutional complaints and submissions by courts are, also pursuant to the Senate decision in BVerfG 89, 155, inadmissible from the outset if their grounds do not state that the evolution of European law, including the rulings of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, has resulted in a decline below the required standard of fundamental rights after the "Solange II" decision (BVerfGE 73, 339 [378 - 381]). Therefore, the grounds for a submission by a national court of justice or of a constitutional complaint which puts forward an infringement by secondary European Community Law of the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Basic Law must state in detail that the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law is not generally assured in the respective case. This requires a comparison of the protection of fundamental rights on the national and on the Community level similar to the one made by the Federal Constitutional Court in BVerfGE 73, 339 (378 - 381).

2. Identity Review

Explanatory Annotation

As mentioned above, the right to vote in Article 38 of the Basic Law is elevated by Article 93.1(4a) of the Basic Law to the same status that the fundamental rights listed in the catalog of Articles 1-19 of the Basic Law possess because all of these rights are subjective rights, i.e. they are procedurally secured by the constitutional complaint procedure to the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court has consistently held that the right to vote not only protects the voting act in the narrow sense, e.g. the secrecy of the ballot, the generality of voting eligibility and the equality of the vote, but that the right to vote also protects the role of the institution whose constitution is determined by the elections. That means that the right to vote in Article 38 of the Basic Law can be violated if the Parliament loses core powers.

In the Lisbon decision on the constitutionality of the Treaty of Lisbon, the Constitutional Court added a further layer of protection from the perceived threat of encroachment of the EU into the constitutional space of its member state Germany, the so-called identity review.[203]

The "European Arrest Warrant" decision of the Constitutional Court provided the first opportunity to speak to the "identity review" in more detail. The case concerned the extradition to Italy of a US citizen arrested in Germany based on a European Arrest Warrant.[204] The person in question had been sentenced in absentia to a long prison term and claimed that extradition would violate the foundational principle of "nulla poena sine culpa", which includes the ability of a defendant to put forward his perspective of what happened before the deciding court because

Italian law would have prevented him from appealing the sentence on factual grounds. The GFCC concurred and held that his inability to do so would indeed have to be regarded as a violation of the Basic Law's foundational dignity clause in Article 1 and, hence Germany could not extradite.[205] The underlying EU legislation governing the European Arrest Warrant (the Framework Decision) limits the reasons the enforcing state can invoke against extradition requests and contains specific language concerning trials and convictions in absentia.[206] Article 4a(1)(c) of the Framework Decision requires that after a conviction in absentia a merit review of the original conviction must be possible and the Italian authorities had submitted information to show that this possibility existed. However, the Constitutional Court, unlike the "lower" courts[207], did not regard these assurances as sufficient to overcome its concerns regarding the principle of guilt and human dignity.[208] The guilt principle is deemed to be part of Germany's constitutional identity so that the de facto inability to apply for a review of the facts in the requesting state after conviction in absentia would be a violation of that principle and hence the European legislative act must not be applied. However, the Constitutional Court avoided an open challenge to the doctrine of EU supremacy by explaining that this result was not exclusively the consequence of applying German constitutional law. Instead, the proper construction of the EU legislation in question, i.e., the Framework decision, read together with the judicial guarantees of the EU-Charter of Fundamental Rights, would "obviously" yield the same result.[209] In other words, the Constitutional Court turned a possible conflict of EU law with German constitutional norms of the most distinguished kind (as part of the suite of norms shaping the German constitutional identity) into a celebration of the harmonious co-existence of norms built on the same values.[210]

209 Id. at para. 125. The obviousness of this application of EU law was important because it allowed the GFCC to circumvent having to submit the EU law part of the case to the ECJ under the preliminary ruling procedure. The ECJ's jurisdiction with regard to the interpretation of EU law does not have to be invoked if the meaning of the EU norms in question is clear and obvious ("acte clair").

Headnotes:

1. Article 23 of the Basic Law grants powers to take part in and develop a European Union designed as an association of sovereign states (Staatenverbund). The concept of Verbund covers a close long-term association of states which remain sovereign, a treaty-based association which exercises public authority, but whose fundamental order is subject to the decision-making power of the Member States and in which the peoples, i.e. the citizens, of the Member States remain the subjects of democratic legitimation.

2. a) In so far as the Member States elaborate treaty law in such a way as to allow treaty amendment without a ratification procedure, whilst preserving the application of the principle of conferral, a special responsibility is incumbent on the legislative bodies, in addition to the Federal Government, within the context of participation which in Germany has to comply internally with the requirements under Article 23.1 of the Basic Law (responsibility for integration) and which may be invoked in any proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court.

3. b) A law within the meaning of Article 23.1 second sentence of the Basic Law is not required, in so far as special bridging clauses are limited to subject areas which are already sufficiently defined by the Treaty of Lisbon. However, in such cases it is incumbent on the Bundestag and, in so far as legislative competences of the Länder are affected, the Bundesrat, to assert its responsibility for integration in another appropriate manner.

4. European unification on the basis of a treaty union of sovereign states may not be achieved in such a way that not sufficient space is left to the Member States for the political formation of economic, cultural and social living conditions. This applies in particular to areas which shape the citizens' living conditions, in particular the private sphere of their own responsibility and of political and social security, protected by fundamental rights, as well as to political decisions that rely especially on cultural, historical and linguistic perceptions and which develop within public discourse in the party political and parliamentary sphere of public politics.

5. The Federal Constitutional Court examines whether legal instruments of the European institutions and bodies keep within the boundaries of the sovereign powers accorded to them by way of conferral (see BVerfGE 58, 1 <30-31>; 75, 223 <235, 242>; 89, 155 <188>: see the latter two concerning legal instruments transgressing the limits), whilst adhering to the principle of subsidiarity under Community and Union law (Article 5.2 ECT; Article 5.1 second sentence and 5.3 of the Treaty on European Union in the version of the Treaty of Lisbon < Lisbon TEU >). Furthermore, the Federal Constitutional Court reviews whether the inviolable core content of the constitutional identity of the Basic Law pursuant to Article 23.1 third sentence in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law is respected (see BVerfGE 113, 273 <296>). The exercise of this review power, which is rooted in constitutional law, follows the principle of the Basic Law's openness towards European Law (Europarechtsfreundlichkeit), and it therefore also does not contradict the principle of sincere cooperation (Article 4.3 Lisbon TEU); otherwise, with progressing integration, the fundamental political and constitutional structures of sovereign Member States, which are recognised by Article 4.2 first sentence Lisbon TEU, cannot be safeguarded in any other way. In this respect, the guarantee of national constitutional identity under constitutional and under Union law go hand in hand in the European legal area.

Facts:

The subject of the Organstreit proceedings and constitutional complaints, which have been consolidated for joint adjudication, is the ratification of the Treaty of Lisbon amending the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, signed at Lisbon, 13 December 2007 (OJ no. C 306/1). The proceedings relate to the German Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon and - partly - the accompanying laws to the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon: The Act Amending the Basic Law (Articles 23, 45 and 93), which has already been promulgated, but not yet entered into force, and the Act Extending and Strengthening the Rights of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat in European Union Matters, which has been adopted, but not yet signed and promulgated. [1]

II.

1. The complainants in the constitutional complaint proceedings challenge the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon. In addition, the constitutional complaints of the complainants re III. and VI. concern the Act Amending the Basic Law (Articles 23, 45 and 93) as well as the Act Extending and Strengthening the Rights of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat in European Union Matters. [99]

a) The complainants concur in submitting that their right under Article 38 of the Basic Law is violated. They argue as follows: Article 38 of the Basic Law grants them, as Germans entitled to vote, the individual right to participate in the election to the German Bundestag, and thereby to take part in the legitimation of state authority on the federal level and to influence its exercise. The transfer of sovereign powers to the European Union that is effected in the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon encroaches upon this right because the legitimation and the exercise of state authority is withdrawn from their influence. The encroachment transgresses the boundaries of the powers granted with a view to European integration pursuant to Article 23.1 third sentence in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law and is therefore not justified. To the extent that it is inviolable pursuant to Article 79.3 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 20.1 and 20.2 of the Basic Law, the principle of democracy is infringed in two different respects: by the competences of the German Bundestag being undermined on the one hand and by a lack of democratic legitimation of the European Union on the other hand. [100]

B.

The constitutional complaints lodged against the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon are admissible to the extent that they challenge a violation of the principle of democracy, the loss of statehood of the Federal Republic of Germany and a violation of the principle of the social state on the basis of Article 38.1 first sentence of the Basic Law. The constitutional complaints re III. and VI. lodged against the accompanying laws are admissible to the extent that they are based on Article 38.1 first sentence of the Basic Law (I.). The application made in the Organstreit proceedings re II. is admissible to the extent that the applicant asserts a violation of the competences of the German Bundestag to decide on the deployment of the German armed forces (II.). In other respects, the constitutional complaints and the applications made in Organstreit proceedings are inadmissible. [167]

C.

I.

In so far as they are admissible, the constitutional complaints re III. and VI. are wellfounded in part. The Act Extending and Strengthening the Rights of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat in European Union Matters (Gesetz über die Ausweitung und Stärkung der Rechte des Bundestages und des Bundesrates in Angelegenheiten der Europäischen Union) does not contain the required provisions and is to that extent unconstitutional. In other respects, the constitutional complaints lodged and the application made in Organstreit proceedings by the applicant re II. are, to the extent that they are admissible, unfounded. Taking into account the provisos specified in the grounds, there are no decisive constitutional objections to the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon (Zustimmungsgesetz zum Vertrag von Lissabon) and the Act Amending the Basic Law (Articles 23, 45 and 93) (Gesetz zur Änderung des Grundgesetzes <Artikel 23, 45 und 93>). [207]

1. The standard of review of the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon is determined by the right to vote as a right that is equal to a fundamental right (Article 38.1 first sentence in conjunction with Article 93.1 no. 4a of the Basic Law). The right to vote establishes a right to democratic self-determination, to free and equal participation in the state authority exercised in Germany and to compliance with the principle of democracy including the respect of the constituent power of the people. In the present combination of procedural circumstances, the review of a violation of the right to vote also comprises encroachments on the principles which are codified in Article 79.3 of the Basic Law as the identity of the constitution (see BVerfGE 37, 271 <279>; 73, 339 <375>). [208]

a) Article 38.1 of the Basic Law guarantees every citizen entitled to vote the right to elect the Members of the German Bundestag. In general, free and equal elections of the Members of the German Bundestag the people of the Federation directly exercises its political will. As a general rule, it governs itself via a majority (Article 42.2 of the Basic Law) in the representative assembly which has come into being in this manner. From within the assembly, the Chancellor - and thus the Federal Government - is appointed; this is where the Chancellor is accountable. At the federal level of the state founded on the Basic Law as its constitution, the election of the Members of the German Bundestag is the source of state authority - which time and again newly emanates from the people in periodically repeated elections (Article 20.2 of the Basic Law). [209]

The right to vote is the citizens' most important individual right to democratic participation guaranteed by the Basic Law. In the state system that is shaped by the Basic Law, the election of the Members of the German Bundestag is of major importance. Without the free and equal election of the body that has a decisive influence on the government and the legislation of the Federation, the constitutive principle of personal freedom remains incomplete. Invoking the right to vote, the citizen can therefore claim the violation of democratic principles by means of a constitutional complaint (Article 38.1 first sentence, Article 20.1 and 20.2 of the Basic Law). The right to equal participation in democratic self-determination (democratic right of participation), to which every citizen is entitled, can also be violated by the organisation of state authority being changed in such a way that the will of the people can no longer effectively be shaped within the meaning of Article 20.2 of the Basic Law and citizens cannot rule according to the will of a majority. The principle of the representative rule of the people may be violated if in the structure of bodies established by the Basic Law, the rights of the Bundestag are considerably curtailed and thus a loss of substance occurs of the democratic freedom of action of the constitutional body which has directly come into being according to the principles of free and equal elections (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <171-172>). [210]

b) The citizens' right to determine in respect of persons and subjects, in freedom and equality by means of elections and other votes, public authority is the fundamental element of the principle of democracy. The right to free and equal participation in public authority is enshrined in human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law). It forms part of the principles of German constitutional law established as inviolable by Article 20.1 and 20.2 in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. [211]

aa) In so far as in the public sphere binding decisions, in particular as regards encroachments on fundamental rights, are taken for the citizen, these decisions must be founded on a freely formed majority will of the people. The order constituted by the Basic Law rests on the self-esteem and dignity of the individual in free determination. This order is power under the rule of law founded on the self-determination of the people in freedom and equality according to the will of the respective majority (see BVerfGE 2, 1 <12>). Consequently, citizens are not subject to an inescapable political power which they are fundamentally incapable of freely determining, with equal regard to persons and subject-matter. [212]

bb) Self-determination of the people according to the majority principle, achieved through elections and other votes, is constitutive of the state order as constituted by the Basic Law. It acts in the sphere of public, free opinion-forming and in the organised competition between political forces of accountable government and parliamentary opposition. The exercise of public authority is subject to the majority principle of regularly forming accountable government and an unhindered opposition, which has an opportunity to come into power. In particular, in electing the representative assembly of the people, or in the election of highest-ranking offices at government level, a generalised will of the majority with regard to persons or subjects must have an opportunity to express itself and decisions on political direction resulting from the elections must be possible. [213]

This central requirement of democracy may be achieved according to different models. According to German electoral law, constitutionally required representative parliamentary rule is achieved by reflecting the will of the electorate as proportionally as possible in the allocation of seats. A majority decision in Parliament represents at the same time the majority decision of the people. Every Member of Parliament is a representative of all the people and thus a member of an assembly of equals (Article 38.1 of the Basic Law) who have gained their mandate under conditions governed by equality. The Basic Law requires that every citizen be free and equal within the legal sense (i.e. equal before the law). For the requirement of democracy this means that every citizen with the right to vote based on age and who has not lost this active right is entitled to an equal part in the exercise of state authority (see BVerfGE 112, 118 <133-134>). The equality of the citizens entitled to vote must then continue to apply at further levels of the development of democratic opinion-forming, in particular as regards the status of a Member of Parliament. The status of a Member of Parliament therefore includes the right to equal participation in the process of parliamentary opinion-forming as guaranteed in Article 38.1 second sentence of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 43, 142 <149>; 70, 324 <354>; 80, 188 <218>; 96, 264 <278>; 112, 118 <133>). [214]

In presidential systems or under a first-past-the-post electoral system, the concrete elaboration of the central requirement of democracy may well be different. However, all systems of representative democracy have this in common: a will of the majority that has come about freely and taking due account of equality is formed, either in the constituency or in the assembly which has come into being proportionally, by the act of voting. The decision on political direction which is taken by the majority of voters is to be reflected in Parliament and in the government; the losing part remains visible as a political alternative and active in the sphere of free opinion-forming as well as in formal decision-making procedures, as an opposition that will, in subsequent elections, have an opportunity to become the majority. [215]

c) The principle of democracy may not be balanced against other legal interests; it is inviolable (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <182>). The constituent power of the Germans which gave itself the Basic Law wanted to set an insurmountable boundary to any future political development. Amendments to the Basic Law affecting the principles laid down in Article 1 and Article 20 of the Basic Law shall be inadmissible (Article 79.3 of the Basic Law). The so-called eternity guarantee even prevents a constitution amending legislature from disposing of the identity of the free constitutional order. The Basic Law thus not only presumes sovereign statehood for Germany but guarantees it. [216]

It may remain open whether, due to the universal nature of dignity, freedom and equality alone, this commitment even applies to the constituent power, i.e. to the case that the German people, in free self-determination, but in a continuity of legality to the rule of the Basic Law, gives itself a new constitution (see Isensee, in: Isensee/ Kirchhof, HStR VII, 1992, § 166, paras 61 et seq.; Moelle, Der Verfassungsbeschluss nach Art. 146 GG, 1996, pp. 73 et seq.; Stückrath, Art. 146 GG: Verfassungsablösung zwischen Legalität und Legitimität, 1997, pp. 240 et seq.; see also BVerfGE 89, 155 <180>). Within the order of the Basic Law, the structural principles of the state laid down in Article 20 of the Basic Law, i.e. democracy, the rule of law, the principle of the social state, the republic, the federal state, as well as the substance of elementary fundamental rights indispensable for the respect of human dignity are, in any case, not amenable to any amendment because of their fundamental quality. [217]

From the perspective of the principle of democracy, the violation of the constitutional identity codified in Article 79.3 of the Basic Law is at the same time an encroachment upon the constituent power of the people. In this respect, the constituent power has not granted the representatives and bodies of the people a mandate to dispose of the identity of the constitution. No constitutional body has been granted the power to amend the constitutional principles which are essential pursuant to Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. The Federal Constitutional Court monitors this. Through what is known as the eternity guarantee, the Basic Law reacts on the one hand to the historical experience of a creeping or abrupt erosion of the free substance of a democratic fundamental order. However, it makes clear on the other hand that the Constitution of the Germans, in accordance with the international development which has taken place in particular since the existence of the United Nations, has a universal foundation which cannot be amended by positive law. [218]

2. The elaboration of the principle of democracy by the Basic Law allows for the objective of integrating Germany into an international and European peace order. The new shape of political rule thereby made possible is not schematically subject to the requirements of a constitutional state applicable at national level and may therefore not be measured automatically against the concrete manifestations of the principle of democracy in a Contracting State or Member State. The empowerment to embark on European integration permits a different shaping of political opinion-forming than the one determined by the Basic Law for the German constitutional order. This applies as far as the limit of the inviolable constitutional identity (Article 79.3 of the Basic Law). The principle of democratic self-determination and of participation in public authority with due account being taken of equality remains unaffected also by the Basic Law's mandate of peace and integration and the constitutional principle of the openness towards international law (Völkerrechtsfreundlichkeit) (see BVerfGE 31, 58 <75-76>; 111, 307 <317>, 112, 1 <26>; Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGK 9, 174 <186>). [219]

a) The German constitution is directed towards opening the sovereign state order to peaceful cooperation of the nations and towards European integration. Neither pari passu integration into the European Union nor integration into peacekeeping systems such as the United Nations is tantamount to submission to alien powers. Instead, it is a voluntary, mutual pari passu commitment which secures peace and strengthens the possibilities of shaping policy by joint coordinated action. The Basic Law does not protect individual freedom, as the self-determination of the individual, with the objective of promoting uncommitted high-handedness and the ruthless enforcement of interests. The same applies to the sovereign right of self-determination of the political community. [220]

The constitutional state commits itself to other states with the same foundation of values of freedom and equal rights and which, like itself, make human dignity and the principles of equal entitlement to personal freedom the focal point of their legal order. Democratic constitutional states can only gain a formative influence on an increasingly mobile society, which is increasingly linked across borders, through sensible cooperation which takes account of their own interest as well as of their common interest. Only those who commit themselves because they realise the need for a peaceful balancing of interests and the possibilities provided by joint concepts gain the measure of possibilities of action required for any future ability to responsibly shape the conditions for a free society. The Basic Law takes account of this with its openness to European integration and to commitments under international law. [221]

b) After the experience of devastating wars, in particular between the European peoples, the Preamble of the Basic Law emphasises not only the moral basis of responsible self-determination but also the willingness to serve world peace as an equal partner in a united Europe. This willingness is lent concrete shape by the empowerments to integrate into the European Union (Article 23.1 of the Basic Law), to participate in intergovernmental institutions (Article 24.1 of the Basic Law) and to join systems of mutual collective security (Article 24.2 of the Basic Law) as well as by the ban on wars of aggression (Article 26 of the Basic Law). The Basic Law calls for the participation of Germany in international organisations, an order of mutual peaceful balancing of interests established between the states and organised co-existence in Europe. [222]

This understanding of sovereignty becomes visible in the objectives laid down in the Preamble. The Basic Law abandons a self-serving and self-glorifying concept of sovereign statehood and returns to a view of the state authority of the individual state which regards sovereignty as "freedom that is organised by international law and committed to it" (von Martitz, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, vol. I, 1888, p. 416). It breaks with all forms of political Machiavellianism and with a rigid concept of sovereignty which until the beginning of the 20th century regarded the right to wage war - even a war of aggression - as a right due to a sovereign state as a matter of course (see Starck, Der demokratische Verfassungsstaat, 1995, pp. 356-357; Randelzhofer, Use of Force, in: Bernhardt, Encyclopedia of Public International Law, vol. IV, 2000, pp. 1246 et seq.), even though the Conventions signed at the Hague

Peace Conference on 29 July 1899 initiated a gradual proscription of the use of force between states, whilst still preserving the ius ad bellum. [223]

In contrast, the Basic Law codifies the maintenance of peace and the overcoming of destructive antagonism between European states as outstanding political objectives of the Federal Republic of Germany. This means that sovereign statehood stands for a pacified area and the order guaranteed therein on the basis of individual freedom and collective self-determination. The state is neither a myth nor an end in itself but the historically grown and globally recognised form of organisation of a viable political community. [224]

The constitutional mandate to realise a united Europe, which follows from Article 23.1 of the Basic Law and its Preamble (see Schorkopf, Grundgesetz und Überstaatlichkeit, 2007, p. 247) means in particular for the German constitutional bodies that it is not left to their political discretion whether or not they participate in European integration. The Basic Law calls for European integration and an international peaceful order. Therefore, not only the principle of openness towards international law, but also the principle of openness towards European law (Europarechtsfreundlichkeit) applies. [225]

c) It is true that the Basic Law grants the legislature powers to engage in a farreaching transfer of sovereign powers to the European Union. However, the powers are granted under the condition that the sovereign statehood of a constitutional state is maintained on the basis of an integration programme according to the principle of conferral and respecting the Member States' constitutional identity, and that at the same time the Member States do not lose their ability to politically and socially shape living conditions on their own responsibility. [226]

aa) The objective of integration laid down for the German people by the Preamble and by Article 23.1 of the Basic Law does not say anything about the final character of the political organisation of Europe. In its Article 23, the Basic Law grants powers to participate in a supranational system of cooperation that promotes peace. This does not include the obligation to realise democratic self-determination on the supranational level in the exact forms prescribed by the Basic Law for the Federation and, via Article 28.1 first sentence of the Basic Law, also for the Länder (states); instead, it permits derogations from the organisational principles of democracy applying at national level which arise from the requirements of a European Union based on the principle of the equality of states and negotiated under the law of international treaties. [227]

Integration requires the willingness to joint action and the acceptance of autonomous common opinion-forming. However, integration into a free community neither requires submission removed from constitutional limitation and control nor the forgoing one's own identity. The Basic Law does not grant powers to bodies acting on behalf of Germany to abandon the right to self-determination of the German people in the form of Germany's sovereignty under international law by joining a federal state. Due to the irrevocable transfer of sovereignty to a new subject of legitimation that goes with it, this step is reserved to the directly declared will of the German people alone. [228]

bb) The current constitution shows a different way: it aims for Germany's integration pari passu into state systems of mutual security such as that of the United Nations or that of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO) and for Germany's participation in the European unification. Article 23.1 of the Basic Law like Article 24.1 of the Basic Law underlines that the Federal Republic of Germany takes part in the development of a European Union designed as an association of sovereign states (Staatenverbund) to which sovereign powers are transferred. The concept of Verbund covers a close long-term association of states which remain sovereign, a treaty-based association which exercises public authority, but whose fundamental order is subject to the decision-making power of the Member States and in which the peoples, i.e. the citizens, of the Member States, remain the subjects of democratic legitimation. [229]

This connection is made clear by Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law, which lays down a binding structure for Germany's participation in the development of the European Union. Pursuant to Article 23.1 third sentence of the Basic Law, the Basic Law can be adapted to the development of the European Union; at the same time, this possibility is set an ultimate limit by Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, to which the provision makes reference. The minimum standard protected by Article 79.3 of the Basic Law must not fail to be achieved even by Germany's integration into supranational structures. [230]

cc) The empowerment to transfer sovereign powers to the European Union or other intergovernmental institution permits a shift of political rule to international organisations. The empowerment to exercise supranational powers, however, comes from the Member States of such an institution. They therefore permanently remain the masters of the Treaties. In a functional sense, the source of Community authority, and of the European constitution that constitutes it, are the peoples of Europe with democratic constitutions in their states. The "Constitution of Europe", international treaty law or primary law, remains a derived fundamental order. It establishes a supranational autonomy which undoubtedly makes considerable inroads into everyday political life but is always limited factually. Here, autonomy can only be understood - as is usual regarding the law of self-government - as an autonomy to rule which is independent but derived, i.e. is granted by other legal entities. In contrast, sovereignty under international law and public law requires independence from an external will precisely for its constitutional foundations (see Carlo Schmid, Generalbericht in der Zweiten Sitzung des Plenums des Parlamentarischen Rates am 8 September 1948, in: Deutscher Bundestag/ Bundesarchiv, Der Parlamentarische Rat 1948-1949, Akten und Protokolle, vol. 9, 1996, p. 20-21). It is not decisive here whether an international organisation has legal personality, i.e. whether it for its part can enter into binding acts as a subject in international legal relations. What is decisive is how the fundamental legal relationship between the international organisation and the Member States and Contracting States which have created it and have vested it with legal personality is elaborated. [231]

In accordance with the powers granted with a view to European integration under Article 23.1 in conjunction with the Preamble, Article 20, Article 79.3 and Article 146 of the Basic Law, there can be no independent subject of legitimation for the authority of the European Union which would constitute itself, so to speak, on a higher level, without being derived from an external will, and thus of its own right. [232]

d) The Basic Law does not authorise the German state bodies to transfer sovereign powers in such a way that their exercise can independently establish other competences for the European Union. It prohibits the transfer of competence to decide on its own competence (Kompetenz-Kompetenz) (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <187-188, 192, 199>; see also BVerfGE 58, 1 <37>; 104, 151 <210>). Even a far-reaching process of independence of political rule for the European Union brought about by granting it steadily increased competences and by gradually overcoming existing unanimity requirements or so far prevailing rules of state equality can, from the perspective of German constitutional law, only occur as a result of the freedom of action of the self-determined people. According to the constitution, such integrational steps must be factually limited by the act of transfer and must, in principle, be revocable. For this reason, withdrawal from the European union of integration (Integrationsverband) may, regardless of a commitment for an unlimited period under an agreement, not be prevented by other Member States or by the autonomous authority of the Union. This is not a secession from a state union (Staatsverband), which is problematical under international law (Tomuschat, Secession and Self-Determination, in: Kohen, Secession - International Law Perspectives, 2006, pp. 23 et seq.), but merely the withdrawal from an association of sovereign states (Staatenverbund) which is founded on the principle of the reversible self-commitment. [233]

The principle of conferral is therefore not only a principle of European law (Article 5.1 ECT; Article 5.1 first sentence and 5.2 Lisbon TEU; see Kraußer, Das Prinzip begrenzter Ermächtigung im Gemeinschaftsrecht als Strukturprinzip des EWGVertrages, 1991); just like the European Union's obligation to respect the Member States' national identity (Article 6.3 TEU; Article 4.2 first sentence Lisbon TEU), it includes constitutional principles from the Member States. In this respect, the principle of conferral under European law and the duty, under European law, to respect identity, are the expression of the foundation of Union authority in the constitutional law of the Member States. [234]

The obligation under European law to respect the constituent power of the Member States as the masters of the Treaties corresponds to the non-transferable identity of the constitution (Article 79.3 of the Basic Law), which is not open to integration in this respect. Within the boundaries of its competences, the Federal Constitutional Court must review, where necessary, whether these principles are adhered to. [235]

e) The integration programme of the European Union must be sufficiently precise. In so far as the people itself is not directly called upon to decide, democratic legitimation can only be achieved by means of parliamentary responsibility (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <212>). A blanket empowerment for the exercise of public authority, in particular one which has a direct binding effect on the national legal system, may not be granted by the German constitutional bodies (see BVerfGE 58, 1 <37>; 89, 155 <183-184, 187>). In so far as the Member States elaborate treaty law in such a way as to allow treaty amendment without a ratification procedure solely or mainly by the institutions of the Union, albeit under the requirement of unanimity, whilst preserving the principle of conferral, a special responsibility is incumbent on the legislative bodies, in addition to the Federal Government, within the context of participation which in Germany, has to comply internally with the requirements under Article 23.1 of the Basic Law (responsibility for integration) and which may be invoked in any proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court. [236]

aa) Any integration into peacekeeping systems, in international or supranational organisations opens up the possibility for the institutions thus created to develop independently, and in doing so, to show a tendency of political self-enhancement, even, and particularly if, their bodies act according to their mandate. An Act that grants powers of integration, like the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon, can therefore, despite the principle of conferral, only outline a programme in whose boundaries a political development occurs which cannot be determined in advance in every respect. When striving for integration one must expect the institutions of the Union to form independent opinions. Therefore a tendency towards maintaining the acquis communautaire and to effectively interpreting powers along the lines of the US doctrine of implied powers (see also International Court of Justice, Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the United Nations, Advisory Opinion of 11 April 1949, ICJ Reports 1949, p. 174 <182 et seq.>) or the principle of effet utile under the law of international treaties (see on the good sense of this principle Gill, The League of Nations from 1929 to 1946, 1996; Rouyer-Hameray, Les compétences implicites des organisations internationales, 1962, p. 90 et seq.; especially as regards European law Pescatore, Monisme, dualisme et "effet utile" dans la jurisprudence de la Cour de justice de la Communauté européenne, in: Festschrift für Rodríguez Iglesias, 2003, pp. 329 et seq.; see on the corresponding development of the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Communities Höreth, Die Selbstautorisierung des Agenten, Der Europäische Gerichtshof im Vergleich zum US Supreme Court, 2008, pp. 320 et seq.) must be tolerated. This is part of the mandate of integration called for by the Basic Law. [237]

bb) Under the constitution, however, faith in the constructive force of the mechanism of integration cannot be unlimited. If in the process of European integration primary law is amended, or expansively interpreted by institutions, a constitutionally important tension will arise with the principle of conferral and with the individual Member State's constitutional responsibility for integration. If legislative or administrative competences are only transferred in an unspecified manner or with a view to further dynamic development, or if the institutions are permitted to re-define expansively, fill lacunae or factually extend competences, they risk transgressing the predetermined integration programme and acting beyond the powers granted to them. They are moving on a road at the end of which there is the power of disposition of their foundations laid down in the treaties, i.e. the competence of freely disposing of their competences. There is a risk of transgression of the constitutive principle of conferral and of the conceptual responsibility for integration incumbent upon Member States if institutions of the European Union can decide without restriction, without any outside control, however restrained and exceptional, how treaty law is to be interpreted. [238]

It is therefore constitutionally required not to agree dynamic treaty provisions with a blanket character or if they can still be interpreted in a manner that respects the national responsibility for integration, to establish, at any rate, suitable national safeguards for the effective exercise of such responsibility. Accordingly, the Act approving an international agreement and the national accompanying laws must therefore be capable of permitting European integration continuing to take place according to the principle of conferral without the possibility for the European Union of taking possession of Kompetenz-Kompetenz or to violate the Member States' constitutional identity, which is not open to integration, in this case, that of the Basic Law. For borderline cases of what is still constitutionally admissible, the German legislature must, where necessary, take precautions in its legislation accompanying approval to ensure that the responsibility for integration of the legislative bodies can sufficiently develop. [239]

Apart from this, it must be possible within the German jurisdiction to assert the responsibility for integration if obvious transgressions of the boundaries occur when the European Union claims competences - this has also been emphasised by the agents of the German Bundestag and of the Federal Government in the oral hearing - and to preserve the inviolable core content of the Basic Law's constitutional identity by means of a identity review (see BVerfGE 75, 223 <235, 242>; 89, 155 <188>; 113, 273 <296>). The Federal Constitutional Court has already opened up the way of the ultra vires review for this, which applies where Community and Union institutions transgress the boundaries of their competences. If legal protection cannot be obtained at the Union level, the Federal Constitutional Court examines whether legal instruments of the European institutions and bodies keep within the boundaries of the sovereign powers accorded to them by way of conferral (see BVerfGE 58, 1 <30-31>; 75, 223 <235, 242>; 89, 155 <188>: see the latter concerning legal instruments transgressing the limits) whilst adhering to the principle of subsidiarity under Community and Union law (Article 5.2 ECT; Article 5.1 second sentence and 5.3 Lisbon TEU). Furthermore, the Federal Constitutional Court reviews whether the inviolable core content of the constitutional identity of the Basic Law pursuant to Article 23.1 third sentence in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law is respected (see BVerfGE 113, 273 <296>). The exercise of this review power, which is rooted in constitutional law, follows the principle of the Basic Law's openness towards European Law (Europarechtsfreundlichkeit), and it therefore also does not contradict the principle of sincere cooperation (Article 4.3 Lisbon TEU); otherwise, with progressing integration, the fundamental political and constitutional structures of sovereign Member States, which are recognised by Article 4.2 first sentence Lisbon TEU, cannot be safeguarded in any other way. In this respect, the guarantee of national constitutional identity under constitutional and under Union law go hand in hand in the European legal area. The identity review makes it possible to examine whether due to the action of European institutions, the principles under Article 1 and Article 20 of the Basic Law, declared inviolable in Article 79.3 of the Basic Law, have been violated. This ensures that the primacy of application of Union law only applies by virtue and in the context of the constitutional empowerment that continues in effect. [240]

The ultra vires review as well as the identity review may result in Community law or, in future, Union law being declared inapplicable in Germany. To preserve the viability of the legal order of the Community, taking into account the legal concept expressed in Article 100.1 of the Basic Law, an application of constitutional law that is open to European law requires that the ultra vires review as well as the finding of a violation of constitutional identity is incumbent on the Federal Constitutional Court alone. It need not be decided here in which specific types of proceedings the Federal Constitutional Court's jurisdiction may be invoked for such review. Availing oneself to types of proceedings that already exist, i.e. the abstract review of statutes (Article 93.1 no. 2 of the Basic Law) and the concrete review of statutes (Article 100.1 of the Basic Law), Organstreit proceedings (Article 93.1 no. 1 of the Basic Law), disputes between the Federation and the Länder (Article 93.1 no. 3 of the Basic Law) and the constitutional complaint (Article 93.1 no. 4a of the Basic Law) may be considered. Also conceivable, however, is the creation by the legislature of an additional type of proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court that is especially tailored to ultra vires review and identity review to safeguard the obligation of German bodies not to apply in individual cases in Germany legal instruments of the European Union that transgress competences or that violate constitutional identity. [241]

If the treaty law determines the competences of the European Union in a manner that is fundamentally open to consent but if these competences may be further developed beyond the possibilities offered by an interpretation of the principle of effet utile or by an implicit filling of the lacunae in the competences which have been transferred, i.e. if heads of competence are only provided with a clear content by special legal instruments at Union level and if decision-making procedures can be autonomously changed there, Germany may only participate in this if it is ensured at national level that the constitutional requirements are complied with. The ratification of international treaties which regulate the political relations of the Federation (Article 59.2 of the Basic Law) generally guarantees the participation of the legislative bodies in sovereign decisions relating to foreign affairs (see BVerfGE 104, 151 <194>) and orders to apply at national level the international treaty law agreed by the executive (see BVerfGE 99, 145 <158>; Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court <Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE> 110, 363 <366>). [242]

As regards European integration, the special constitutional requirement of the enactment of a statute under Article 23.1 second sentence of the Basic Law applies, pursuant to which sovereign powers may only be transferred by a law and with the approval of the Bundesrat. To respect the responsibility for integration and to protect the constitutional structure, this constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute is to be interpreted in such a way that it covers any amendment of the texts that form the basis of European primary law. The legislative bodies of the Federation thus exercise their political responsibility, which is comparable to the ratification procedure, also in case of simplified revision procedures or lacunae-filling in the treaties, in the case of competence changes whose bases already exist but which require concretisation by further legal instruments, and in case of a change in provisions that concern decision-making procedures. Thus, legal protection that corresponds to the situation of ratification is ensured. [243]

3. The shape of the European Union must comply with democratic principles as regards the nature and the extent of the transfer of sovereign powers as well as with regard to the organisational and procedural elaboration of the Union authority acting autonomously (Article 23.1, Article 20.1 and 20.2 in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law). European integration may neither result in the system of democratic rule in Germany being undermined (a) nor may the supranational public authority as such fail to comply with fundamental democratic requirements (b). [244]

a) A permanent responsibility for integration is incumbent upon the German constitutional bodies. In the transfer of sovereign powers and the elaboration of the European decision-making procedures, it is aimed at ensuring that, seen overall, the political system of the Federal Republic of Germany as well as that of the European Union comply with democratic principles within the meaning of Article 20.1 and 20.2 in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. [245]

The election of the Members of the German Bundestag by the people fulfils its central role in the system of the federal and supranational intertwining of power only if the German Bundestag, which represents the people, and the Federal Government sustained by it, retain a formative influence on the political development in Germany. This is the case if the German Bundestag retains own responsibilities and competences of substantial political importance or if the Federal Government, which is answerable to it politically, is in a position to exert a decisive influence on European decision-making procedures (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <207>). [246]

aa) Inward federalisation and outward supranationalisation can open up new possibilities of civic participation. An increased cohesion of smaller or larger units and better opportunities for a peaceful balancing of interests between regions and states grow from them. Federal or supranational intertwining creates possibilities of action which otherwise would encounter practical or territorial limits, and facilitates the peaceful balancing of interests. At the same time, it makes it more difficult to create a will of the majority that can be asserted and that directly derives from the people (Article 20.2 first sentence of the Basic Law). The assignment of decisions to specific responsible actors becomes less transparent, with the result that citizens have difficulty in having their vote guided by tangible contexts of responsibility. The principle of democracy therefore sets content-related limits to the transfer of sovereign powers, limits which do not already result from the inalienability of the constituent power and of state sovereignty. [247]

bb) The safeguarding of sovereignty, demanded by the principle of democracy in the valid constitutional system prescribed by the Basic Law in a manner that is open to integration and to international law, does not mean that a pre-determined number or certain types of sovereign rights should remain in the hands of the state. The participation of Germany in the development of the European Union, which is permitted by Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law, also comprises a political union, in addition to the creation of an economic and monetary union. Political union means the joint exercise of public authority, including legislative authority, even reaching into the traditional core areas of the state's area of competence. This is rooted in the European idea of peace and unification especially when dealing with the coordination of cross-border aspects of life and when guaranteeing a single economic area and area of justice in which citizens of the Union can freely develop (Article 3.2 Lisbon TEU). [248]

cc) European unification on the basis of a treaty union of sovereign states may, however, not be achieved in such a way that not sufficient space is left to the Member States for the political formation of the economic, cultural and social living conditions. This applies in particular to areas which shape the citizens' living conditions, in particular the private sphere of their own responsibility and of political and social security, protected by fundamental rights, as well as to political decisions that rely especially on cultural, historical and linguistic perceptions and which develop in public discourse in the party political and parliamentary sphere of public politics. Essential areas of democratic formative action comprise, inter alia, citizenship, the civil and the military monopoly on the use of force, revenue and expenditure including external financing and all elements of encroachment that are decisive for the realisation of fundamental rights, above all in major encroachments on fundamental rights such as deprivation of liberty in the administration of criminal law or placement in an institution. These important areas also include cultural issues such as the disposition of language, the shaping of circumstances concerning the family and education, the ordering of the freedom of opinion, press and of association and the dealing with the profession of faith or ideology. [249]

dd) Democracy not only means respecting formal principles of organisation (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <185>) and not just a cooperative involvement of interest groups. Democracy first and foremost lives on, and in, a viable public opinion that concentrates on central acts of determination of political direction and the periodic allocation of highest-ranking political offices in the competition of government and opposition. Only this public opinion shows the alternatives for elections and other votes and continually calls them to mind also in decisions relating to individual issues in order that they may remain continuously present and effective in the political opinion-formation of the people via the parties, which are open to participation for all citizens, and in the public information area. To this extent, Article 38 and Article 20.1 and 20.2 of the Basic Law also protect the connection between political decisions on facts and the will of the majority constituted by elections, and the resulting dualism between government and opposition in a system of a multiplicity of competing parties and of observing and controlling formation of public opinion. [250]

Even if due to the great successes of European integration, a common European polity that engages in issue-related cooperation in the relevant areas of their respective states is visibly growing (see on this already BVerfGE 89, 155 <185>; Trenz, Europa in den Medien, Die europäische Integration im Spiegel nationaler Öffentlichkeit, 2005), it cannot be overlooked, however, that the public perception of factual issues and of political leaders remains connected to a considerable extent to patterns of identification related to the nation-state, language, history and culture. The principle of democracy as well as the principle of subsidiarity, which is also structurally required by Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law, therefore require factually to restrict the transfer and exercise of sovereign powers to the European Union in a predictable manner, particularly in central political areas of the space of personal development and the shaping of living conditions by social policy. In these areas, it is particularly necessary to draw the limit where the coordination of cross-border situations is factually required. [251]

Particularly sensitive for the ability of a constitutional state to democratically shape itself are decisions on substantive and formal criminal law (1), on the disposition of the monopoly on the use of force by the police within the state and by the military towards the exterior (2), fundamental fiscal decisions on public revenue and public expenditure, the latter being particularly motivated, inter alia, by social policy considerations (3), decisions on the shaping of living conditions in a social state (4) and decisions of particular cultural importance, for example on family law, the school and education system and on dealing with religious communities (5). [252]

(1) As regards the preconditions for criminal liability as well as the concepts of a fair and appropriate trial, the administration of criminal law depends on cultural processes of previous understanding that are historically grown and also determined by language, and on the alternatives which emerge in the process of deliberation which moves the respective public opinion (see on this Weigend, Strafrecht durch internationale Vereinbarungen - Verlust an nationaler Strafrechtskultur?, ZStW 1993, p. 774 <785>). The common characteristics in this regard, but also the differences, between the European nations is shown by the relevant case law of the European Court of Human Rights concerning procedural guarantees in criminal proceedings (see the contributions by Bank <chapter 11>; Grabenwarter/Pabel <chapter 14> and Kadelbach <chapter

15> in: Grote/Marauhn, EMRK/GG, 2006; Gollwitzer, Menschenrechte im Strafverfahren: MRK und IPBPR, 2005). The penalisation of social behaviour can, however, only partially be normatively derived from values and moral premises that are shared Europe-wide. Instead, the decision on punishable behaviour, on the ranking of legal interests and the meaning and the measure of the threat of punishment, is much more particularly left to the democratic decision-making process (see BVerfGE 120, 224 <241-242>). In this important area for fundamental rights any transfer of sovereign rights beyond intergovernmental cooperation may only lead to harmonisation for specific cross-border situations on restrictive conditions; in principle, substantial freedom of action must remain reserved to the Member States here (see BVerfGE 113, 273 <298-299>). [253]

(2) A similarly determined limit is drawn by the Basic Law as regards decisions on the deployment of the German Bundeswehr. Except in case of defence, the deployment of the Bundeswehr abroad is only permitted in systems of mutual collective security (Article 24.2 of the Basic Law), with specific deployment mandatorily depending on the approval of the German Bundestag (see BVerfGE 90, 286 <381-382>; 100, 266 <269>; 104, 151 <208>; 108, 34 <43>; 121, 135 <153-154>; established case law). The Bundeswehr is a "parliamentary army" (BVerfGE 90, 286 <382>), on whose deployment the representative body of the people must decide (see BVerfGE 90, 286 <383 et seq.>). The deployment of armed forces is of paramount importance for the individual legal standing of soldiers and of others affected by military action and involves danger of far-reaching implications. [254]

Even if the European Union were to be further developed into a peacekeeping regional system of mutual collective security within the meaning of Article 24.2 of the Basic Law, supranationalisation involving primacy of application with a view to the specific deployment of German armed forces would be inadmissible here because of the precept of peace and democracy, which precedes the integration authorisation of Article 23.1 of the Basic Law in this respect. The constitutive requirement of parliamentary approval for the deployment of the Bundeswehr abroad is not open to integration. This, however, does not raise an insurmountable obstacle under constitutional law to a technical integration of a European deployment of armed forces via joint general staffs, nor to the formation of joint forces or to agreement on and coordination of joint European weapons procurement. Only the decision on any specific deployment depends on the constitutive approval of the German Bundestag. [255]

(3) A transfer of the right of the Bundestag to adopt the budget and control its implementation by the government which would violate the principle of democracy and the right to elect the German Bundestag in its essential content would occur if the determination of the type and amount of the levies imposed on the citizen were supranationalised to a considerable extent. The German Bundestag must decide, in an accountable manner vis-à-vis the people, on the total amount of the burdens placed on citizens. The same applies correspondingly to essential state expenditure. In this area, the responsibility concerning social policy in particular is subject to the democratic decision-making process, which citizens want to influence through free and equal elections. Budget sovereignty is where political decisions are planned to combine economic burdens with benefits granted by the state. Therefore the parliamentary debate on the budget, including the extent of public debt, is regarded as a general debate on policy. Not every European or international obligation that has an effect on the budget endangers the viability of the Bundestag as the legislature responsible for approving the budget. The openness to legal and social order and to European integration which the Basic Law calls for, include an adaptation to parameters laid down and commitments made, which the legislature responsible for approving the budget must include in its own planning as factors which it cannot itself directly influence. What is decisive, however, is that the overall responsibility, with sufficient political discretion regarding revenue and expenditure, can still rest with the German Bundestag. [256]

(4) The principle of the social state establishes a duty on the part of the state to ensure a just social order (see BVerfGE 59, 231 <263>; 100, 271 <284>). The state must carry out this obligation on the basis of a broad discretion; for this reason, concrete constitutional obligations to act have only been derived from this principle in very few cases. The state must merely create the minimum conditions for its citizens to live in human dignity (see BVerfGE 82, 60 <80>; 110, 412 <445>). The principle of the social state sets the state a task, but it does not say anything about the means with which the task is to be accomplished in individual cases. [257]

The requirements under constitutional law as regards social integration or a "social union" are clearly limited. It is true that pursuant to Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law, Germany's participation in the process of integration depends, inter alia, on the European Union's commitment to social principles. Accordingly the Basic Law not only defensively safeguards social tasks for the German state union against supranational demands but aims at committing the European public authority to social responsibility in the spectrum of tasks transferred to it (see Heinig, Der Sozialstaat im Dienst der Freiheit, 2008, pp. 531 et seq.). The institutions of the European Union, however, are subject to the principle that the social state necessarily requires political and legal concretisation in order for it to have an effect. [258]

Accordingly, the essential decisions in social policy must be made by the German legislative bodies on their own responsibility. In particular the securing of the individual's livelihood, which is a responsibility of the state that is based not only on the principle of the social state but also on Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, must remain a primary task of the Member States, even if coordination which goes as far as gradual approximation is not ruled out. This corresponds to the legally and factually limited possibilities of the European Union to shape the structures of a social state. [259]

(5) Finally, democratic self-determination relies on the possibility to assert oneself in one's own cultural area, especially relevant in decisions made concerning the school and education system, family law, language, certain areas of media regulation, and the status of churches and religious and ideological communities. Those activities of the European Union that may be already observed in these areas intervene in society on a level that is the primary responsibility of the Member States and their component parts. The manner in which curricula and the content of education and, for example, the structure of a multi-track school system are organised, are fundamental policy decisions closely connected to the cultural roots and values of every state. Like the law on family relations and decisions on issues of language and the integration of the transcendental into public life, the manner in which school and education are organised particularly affects established rules and values rooted in specific historical traditions and experience. Here, democratic self-determination requires that a political community bound by such traditions and convictions remains the subject of democratic legitimation. [260]

b) The structure-securing clause of Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law restricts the objective of participation addressed in the determination of the objective of the state to a European Union which in its elementary structures complies with the core principles protected also from amendment by the constitution-amending legislature by Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. The development of the European Union in respect of a transfer of sovereign powers, institutions and decision-making procedures must correspond to democratic principles (Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law). The specific requirements placed on the democratic principles depend on the extent of the sovereign powers that have been transferred and on the degree of independence achieved by European decision-making procedures. [261]

aa) The constitutional requirements placed by the principle of democracy on the organisational structure and the decision-making procedures of the European Union depend on the extent to which sovereign responsibilities are transferred to the Union and the degree of political independence in the exercise of the sovereign powers transferred. Increased integration may be unconstitutional if the level of democratic legitimation is not commensurate with the extent and the importance of supranational power. As long as, and in so far as, the principle of conferral is adhered to in an association of sovereign states with clear elements of executive and governmental cooperation, the legitimation provided by national parliaments and governments complemented and sustained by the directly elected European Parliament is sufficient in principle (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <184>). [262]

If however, the threshold were crossed to a federal state and to the giving up of national sovereignty, this would require a free decision of the people in Germany beyond the present applicability of the Basic Law and the democratic requirements to be complied with would have to be fully consistent with the requirements for the democratic legitimation of a union of rule organised by a state. This level of legitimation could no longer be prescribed by national constitutional orders. [263]

A structural democratic deficit that would be unacceptable pursuant to Article 23 in conjunction with Article 79.3 of the Basic Law would exist if the extent of competences, the political freedom of action and the degree of independent opinionformation on the part of the institutions of the Union reached a level corresponding to the federal level in a federal state, i.e. a level analogous to that of a state, because for example the legislative competences, essential for democratic self-determination, were exercised mainly at Union level. If an imbalance between type and extent of the sovereign powers exercised and the degree of democratic legitimation arises in the course of the development of the European integration, it is for the Federal Republic of Germany because of its responsibility for integration, to endeavour to effect a change, and in the worst case, even to refuse further participation in the European Union. [264]

bb) To safeguard democratic principles, it may be necessary to clearly emphasise the principle of conferral in the treaties and in their application and interpretation, in order to maintain the balance of political forces of Europe between the Member States and the level of the Union as the precondition for the allocation of sovereign powers in the association. [265]

In order to comply with democratic principles on the part of the European Union, Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law, however does not demand "structural congruence" (see on this concept Kruse, Strukturelle Kongruenz und Homogenität, in: Mensch und Staat in Recht und Geschichte, Festschrift für Herbert Kraus, 1954, p. 112 <123>) or even the accordance of the institutional order of the European Union to the order prescribed by the principle of democracy of the Basic Law for the national level. What is required, however, is a democratic elaboration commensurate with the status and the function of the Union (see Hobe, Der offene Verfassungsstaat zwischen Souveränität und Interdependenz, 1998, p. 153; Pernice, in: Dreier, GG, vol. II, 2nd ed. 2006, Art. 23, para. 48; Rojahn, in: von Münch/Kunig, GG, vol. 2, 5th ed. 2001, Art. 23, para. 21; Röben, Außenverfassungsrecht, 2007, p. 321: "strukturelle Kompatibilität"). It follows from the sense and purpose of the structure-securing clause that the Basic Law's principle of democracy need not be realised at European level in the same way, something still called for in the 1950s and early 1960s for intergovernmental institutions within the meaning of Article 24.1 of the Basic Law (see for instance Kruse, loc cit., p. 112 <123>; Friauf, Zur Problematik rechtsstaatlicher und demokratischer Strukturelemente in zwischenstaatlichen Gemeinschaften, DVBl. 1964, p. 781 <786>). [266]

In principle, the principle of democracy is open to the requirements of a supranational organisation, not in order to adapt the normative content of its provisions to the respective factual situation of the organisation of political rule but to preserve the same effectiveness under changed circumstances (see BVerfGE 107, 59 <91>). Consequently, Article 23.1 first sentence of the Basic Law assumes that in the European Union, democratic principles cannot be realised in the same manner as in the Basic Law (see Bundestag printed paper 12/3338, p. 6). [267]

cc) In modern territorial states, the self-determination of a people is mainly realised in the election of bodies of a union of rule, which exercise public authority. The bodies must be created by the majority decision of the citizens, who can periodically influence the fundamental direction of policy in respect of persons and subjects. A free public opinion and a political opposition must be able to critically observe the major elements of the decision-making process and ascribe it correctly to those responsible, i.e. usually to a government (see Article 20.2 second sentence of the Basic Law; BVerfGE 89, 155 <185>; 97, 350 <369>; with a comparative law approach Cruz Villalón, Grundlagen und Grundzüge staatlichen Verfassungsrechts: Vergleich, in: von Bogdandy/Cruz Villalón/Huber, Handbuch Ius Publicum Europaeum, vol. I, 2007, § 13, paras 102 et seq., with further references). [268]

The practical manifestations of democracy lend concrete shape to these guidelines, account being taken of the principles of freedom and electoral equality either in a single parliamentary representative body which undertakes the task of forming a government like for example the United Kingdom, Germany, Belgium, Austria and Spain - or in a presidential system with the highest level of the executive power being directly elected in addition - like, for example in the United States, France, Poland and Bulgaria. The direct will of the people may be expressed by electing a (parliamentary) representation of the people or by electing the highest-ranking representative of the executive (President) as well as by majority decisions in referenda about factual issues. Presidential systems like the ones in the United States or in France are dualistically constituted representative democracies, while the United Kingdom or Germany have systems of monistic parliamentary representation. In Switzerland, on the other hand, parliamentary monism is complemented by strong plebiscitary elements, which also fulfil part of the functions of a parliamentary opposition (see Loewenstein, Verfassungslehre, 2nd ed. 1959, provided with a supplement 1969, pp. 67 et seq.; Sommermann, Demokratiekonzepte im Vergleich, in: Bauer/Huber/Sommermann, Demokratie in Europa, 2005, pp. 191 et seq.; Mastronardi, Verfassungslehre, Allgemeines Staatsrecht als Lehre vom guten und gerechten Staat, 2007, pp. 268-269). [269]

In a democracy, the people must be able to determine government and legislation in free and equal elections. This core content may be complemented by plebiscitary voting on factual issues; such voting could be made possible also in Germany by an amendment of the Basic Law. In a democracy, the decision of the people is the focal point of the formation and retention of political power: Every democratic government knows the fear of losing power by being voted out of office. In its judgment banning the Communist Party of Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court in 1956 described democracy as the procedurally regulated "battle for political power" that is waged to gain the majority. According to the Federal Constitutional Court, this battle is about the will of the actual majority of the people ascertained in carefully regulated procedures and preceded by a free discussion. It was regarded as constitutive of the democratic organisation of state authority that a majority "can always change", that a multiparty system and the right to "organised political opposition" exist (see BVerfGE 5, 85 <198-199>). [270]

The European Union itself acknowledges this democratic core concept as a general European constitutional tradition (see Article 3.1 of the Protocol to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 20 March 1952 <First Protocol to the ECHR> <Federal Law Gazette 2002 II p. 1072>; CSCE, Document of the Copenhagen Meeting of the Conference on the Human Dimension of the CSCE, EuGRZ 1990, pp. 239 et seq., para. 7) by placing corresponding structural requirements on the Member States and declaring their factual continued existence to be a precondition for participating in the European integration (Article 6.1 TEU; Article 2 Lisbon TEU; see already Presidency Conclusions of the Copenhagen European Council <21/22 June 1993>, Bulletin EU 6-1993, I.13; Agenda 2000, COM(97) 2000 final, vol. I, p. 52). Because and in so far as the European Union itself only exercises derived public authority, it need not fully comply with the requirements. At European level, the Council is not a second chamber as it would be in a federal state but the representative body of masters of the Treaties and accordingly, it is not constituted by proportional representation but according to the idea of the equality of states. As a representative body of the peoples directly elected by the citizens of the Union, the European Parliament is an additional independent source of democratic legitimation (see BVerfGE 89, 155 <184-185>). As a representative body of the peoples in a supranational community, characterised as such by a limited willingness to unite, it cannot, and need not, as regards its composition, comply with the requirements that arise at state level from the equal political right to vote of all citizens. The Commission also as a supranational, special body, also the Commission need not extensively fulfil the conditions of a government that is fully accountable either to Parliament or to the majority decision of the electorate because the Commission itself is not bound by the will of the electorate in a comparable manner. [271]

As long as European competences are ordered according to the principle of conferral in cooperatively shaped decision-making procedures, and taking into account state responsibility for integration, and as long as an equal balance between the competences of the Union and the competences of the states is retained, the democracy of the European Union cannot, and need not, be shaped in analogy to that of a state. Instead, the European Union is free to look for its own ways of reducing the democratic deficit by means of additional, novel forms of transparent or participative political decision-making procedures. It is true that the merely > deliberative participation of the citizens and of their societal organisations in the political rule - their direct involvement in the deliberations of the institutions with the power to take binding political decisions - cannot replace the legitimising connection based on elections and other votes. Such elements of participative democracy can, however, complement the legitimation of European public authority. This encompasses in particular forms of legitimation to which civic commitment can contribute in a more direct, more specialised and more profoundly issue-related manner, for example by providing the citizens of the Union and the societally relevant associations (Article 11.2 Lisbon TEU: "representative associations") with the possibility of expressing their views in an appropriate manner. Such forms of decentralised participation based on the division of labour and has a potential to increasing legitimacy for their part contribute to making the primary representative and democratic connection of legitimation more effective. [272]

II.

As specified in the grounds, the Treaty of Lisbon and the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon comply with the constitutional requirements as stated (1.). There are also no constitutional objections to the Act Amending the Basic Law (Articles 23, 45 and 93) (2.). The Act Extending and Strengthening the Rights of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat in European Union Matters does not comply with the requirements under Article 38.1 in conjunction with Article 23.1 of the Basic Law and must be re-drafted in accordance with constitutional requirements before the ratification of the treaty (3.). [273]

D.

Considering that the Act Approving the Treaty of Lisbon is compatible with the Basic Law only by taking into account the provisos specified in this decision and that the accompanying laws are unconstitutional in part, the complainants and applicants are to be reimbursed their necessary expenses in proportion to their success pursuant to § 34a.2 and 34a.3 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act. Accordingly, the complainant re III. is to be reimbursed one half, the complainants re IV. and VI., respectively, one fourth, and the complainants re V. and the applicant re II., respectively, one third of their necessary expenses of these proceedings. [420]

E.

The decision was reached unanimously as regards the result, by seven votes to one as regards the reasoning. [421]

b) Identity Review - European Arrest Warrent, BVerfG, 15 December 2015 - 2 BvR 2735/14, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20151215_2bvr273514en.html

Headnotes:

1. The Federal Constitutional Court, by means of the identity review, guarantees without reservations and in every individual case the protection of fundamental rights indispensable according to Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 in conjunction with Art. 79 sec. 3 and Art. 1 sec. 1 GG.

2. The strict requirements for activating the identity review are paralleled by stricter admissibility requirements for constitutional complaints that raise such an issue.

3. The principle of individual guilt is part of the constitutional identity. It must therefore be ensured that it is complied with in extraditions for the purpose of executing sentences that were rendered in the absence of the requested person during the trial.

4. German public authority must not assist other states in violating human dignity. The extent and the scope of the investigations, which German courts must conduct in order to ensure the respect of the principle of individual guilt, depend on the nature and the significance of the points submitted by the requested person that indicate that the proceedings in the requesting state fall below the minimum standards required by Art. 1 sec. 1 GG.

Facts:

A.

The constitutional complaint relates to the extradition[211] of the complainant to Italy on the basis of a European arrest warrant, which was issued for the purpose of executing a criminal sentence rendered against the complainant in his absence. [1]

I.

1. The complainant is a national of the United States of America. In 1992, by final judgment of the Florence Corte di Appello, he was sentenced in absence to a custodial sentence of 30 years for participating in a criminal organisation as well as importing and possessing cocaine. In 2014, he was arrested in Germany on the basis of an extradition request by the Italian Republic, which was based on a European arrest warrant issued in the same year by the Prosecutor General's Office of the Florence Corte di Appello. [2]

211 Translator's note: The term "extradition" is used in the translation of the Gesetz für die Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters - available in English at http://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/englisch_irg/index.html, translation provided by Prof. Dr. Michael Bohlander and Prof. Wolfgang Schomburg, - that transposes the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant into German law. The German term used in that Act is indeed "Auslieferung". The English-language version of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant uses the term "surrender", the German version the term "Übergabe". Therefore, in this order, in most cases the term "extradition" is used. However, this usually does not apply in cases where the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant is referred to.

a) By means of the European arrest warrant, the extradition of the complainant is requested to facilitate the execution of the custodial sentence imposed on him. The European arrest warrant indicates that the complainant was not personally served with the 1992 decision on which the judgment is based. In this regard, […] [3]

III.

In his constitutional complaint, the complainant claims a violation of his fundamental rights under Art. 1, Art. 2 sec. 1 and sec. 2 sentence 2, Art. 3 and Art. 103 sec. 1 GG, of his fundamental right to a fair trial (Art. 2 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 20 sec. 3 GG, Art. 6 sec. 3 ECHR), a violation of the minimum standards under international law, which are binding pursuant to Art. 25 GG, as well as a violation of Art. 6 sec. 3 ECHR. He claims that at no point in time was he aware of investigation proceedings or criminal proceedings being conducted against him in Italy. He further argues that there is no guarantee that after his extradition to Italy, he will be afforded the right to a trial in which the charges against him will be re-examined on fact and in law in his presence. [25]

According to the complainant, the Italian government did not provide a sufficient assurance[212] in this respect. He claims that the letter by the Florence Public Prosecutor General of 7 October 2014 does not have the necessary binding effect under international law. In his opinion, the Higher Regional Court was not entitled to replace the missing explicit assurance with its own assessment of the Florence Public Prosecutor General's letter of 7 October 2014; instead, it ought to have examined whether this assurance could be trusted with absolute certainty. According to the complainant, the court failed to avail itself of existing opportunities to obtain information, such as obtaining an expert opinion from the Max Planck Institute for Foreign and International Criminal Law. [26]

He further argues that the Florence Public Prosecutor General's letter does neither indicate the manner in which nor the court before which the proceedings will be conducted. He reasons that since Art. 175 CPP only affords reinstatement of the time limit for appeal, new taking of evidence is not guaranteed under the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure (Arts. 593 et seq. CPP). According to him, appellate proceedings are conducted solely on the basis of the case file; new evidence is only heard in exceptional cases, which would depend on the complainant being able to prove that he was not aware of the proceedings conducted against him in absence. Furthermore, in his opinion, it would be at the discretion of the judge whether to take new evidence. According to the complainant, the letter of the Italian Public Prosecutor General does not indicate that "retrial" is intended to mean a trial at first instance. [27]

212 Translator's note: diplomatic.

C.

The constitutional complaint is also well-founded. The challenged decision violates the complainant's right under Art. 1 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 and Art. 79 sec. 3 GG. [35]

I.

In general, sovereign acts of the European Union and acts of German public authority - to the extent that they are determined by Union law - are, due to the precedence of application of European Union Law (Anwendungsvorrang des Unionsrechts[213]), not to be measured against the standard of the fundamental rights enshrined in the Basic Law (1.). However, the precedence of application of European Union Law is limited by the constitutional principles that are beyond the reach of European integration (integrationsfest) pursuant to Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 in conjunction with Art. 79 sec. 3 GG (2.). This in particular encompasses the principles contained in Art. 1 GG, including the principle of individual guilt in criminal law, which is rooted in the guarantee of human dignity (3.). It has to be ensured that, also in applying the law of the European Union or legal provisions that originate from German public authority but that are determined by Union law, these principles are guaranteed in every individual case (4.). However, one can only claim a violation of this inalienable core of fundamental rights protection before the Federal Constitutional Court if one submits in a substantiated manner that the dignity of the person is in fact interfered with (5.). [36]

1. Pursuant to Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG, the Federal Republic of Germany participates in establishing and developing the European Union. Uniform application of its law is of central importance for the success of the European Union (cf. BVerfGE 73, 339 <368>; 123, 267 <399>; 126, 286 <301 and 302>). Without ensuring uniform application and effectiveness of its law, it would not be able to continue to exist as a legal community of currently 28 Member States (see, fundamentally, ECJ, Judgment of 15 July 1964, Costa/ENEL, 6/64, ECR 1964, p. 1251 <1269 et seq.>). In this respect, Art. 23 sec. 1 GG also assures that Union law is effective and will be enforced (cf. BVerfGE 126, 286 <302>). [37]

Therefore, through the authorisation to transfer sovereign powers to the European Union - an authorisation provided under Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG -, the Basic Law endorses the precedence of application accorded to Union law by the Acts of Assent to the Treaties. As a rule, the precedence of application of European Union Law also applies with regard to national constitutional law (cf. BVerfGE 129, 78 <100>), and, in conflict, as a rule, it results in national law being inapplicable in the specific case (cf. BVerfGE 126, 286 <301>). [38]

Based on Art. 23 sec. 1 GG, the legislature deciding on European integration matters not only may, generally and in all matters, exempt European Union institutions and agencies from being bound by the fundamental rights and other guarantees under the Basic Law, to the extent

213 Translator's note: in the German legal system, this signifies that, within the scope of application of Union law, as a rule, German law is not applied; however, it remains in force and continues to apply in cases that are not within the scope of application of Union law.

that they exercise public authority in Germany, but also German entities that execute law of the European Union (cf. Streinz, Bundesverfassungsgerichtlicher Grundrechtsschutz und Europäisches Gemeinschaftsrecht, 1989, pp. 247 et seq.). This in particular applies to the legislature at federal and at state level if they transpose secondary or tertiary law without possessing a leeway to design (Gestaltungsspielraum)[214] (cf. BVerfGE 118, 79 <95>; 122, 1 <20>). In contrast, the legal acts that are issued in using an existing leeway to design are amenable to scrutiny by the Federal Constitutional Court (cf. BVerfGE 122, 1 <20 and 21>; 129, 78 <90 and 91>). [39]

2. However, the precedence of application of European Union Law only applies insofar as the Basic Law and the Act of Assent permit or provide for the transfer of sovereign powers (cf. BVerfGE 73, 339 <375 and 376>; 89, 155 <190>; 123, 267 <348 et seq.>; 126, 286 <302>; 129, 78 <99>; 134, 366 <384 para. 26>). The national order giving effect to Union law at national level (Rechtsanwendungsbefehl), contained in the Act of Assent, may only be given within the framework of the applicable constitutional order (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <402>). Limits to opening German statehood - limits that apply beyond the specific design of the European integration agenda laid down in the Act of Assent - follow from the Basic Law's constitutional identity as stipulated in Art. 79 sec. 3 GG (a). This is compatible with the principle of sincere cooperation (Art. 4 sec. 3 TEU) (b) and is corroborated by the fact that the constitutional law of most Member States of the European Union contains similar limits (c). [40]

a) The scope of precedence of application of European Union Law is mainly limited by the Basic Law's constitutional identity that, according to Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 in conjunction with Art. 79 sec. 3 GG, is beyond the reach of both constitutional amendment and European integration (verfassungsänderungs-und integrationsfest) (aa). The constitutional identity is safeguarded by the identity review conducted by the Federal Constitutional Court. (bb). [41]

aa) To the extent that acts of an institution or an agency of the European Union have an effect that affects the constitutional identity protected by Art. 79 sec. 3 GG in conjunction with the principles laid down in Arts. 1 and 20 GG, they transgress the limits of open statehood set by the Basic Law. Such an act cannot be based on an authorisation under primary law, because the legislature deciding on European integration matters, despite acting with the majority required by Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 GG in conjunction with Art. 79 sec. 2 GG, cannot transfer sovereign powers to the European Union which, if exercised, would affect the constitutional identity protected by Art. 79 sec. 3 GG (cf. BVerfGE 113, 273 <296>; 123, 267 <348>; 134, 366 <384 para. 27>). Nor can it be based on initially constitutional conferrals that have supposedly evolved through a development of the law, because the institution or the agency of the European Union would thereby act ultra vires (cf. BVerfGE 134, 366 <384 para. 27>). [42]

214 Translator's note: In the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, such leeway is often referred to as "margin of appreciation".

bb) Within the framework of the identity review, one has to review whether the principles laid down as inalienable by Art. 79 sec. 3 GG are affected by an act of the European Union (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <344, 353 and 354>; 126, 286 <302>; 129, 78 <100>; 134, 366 <384 and 385 para. 27>). The result of such a review may be that in exceptional cases - as is the case with the "Solange" reservation ("as long as" reservation) (cf. BVerfGE 37, 271 <277 et seq.>; 73, 339 <387>; 102, 147 <161 et seq.>) or with the ultra vires review (BVerfGE 58, 1 <30 and 31>; 75, 223 <235, 242>; 89, 155 <188>; 123, 267 <353 et seq.>; 126, 286 <302 et seq.>; 134, 366 <382 et seq., paras. 23 et seq.>) -, Union law must be declared inapplicable in Germany. However, to prevent German authorities and courts from simply disregarding the Union law's claim to validity, the application of Art. 79 sec. 3 GG in a manner that is open to European law in order to protect the effectiveness of the Union legal order and that takes into account the legal concept expressed in Art. 100 sec. 1 GG require that finding a violation of the constitutional identity is reserved for the Federal Constitutional Court (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <354>). This is underlined by Art. 100 sec. 2 GG according to which in case of doubts whether a general rule of international law creates rights and duties for the individual, the court must refer the question to the Federal Constitutional Court (cf. BVerfGE 37, 271 <285>). An identity review may also be triggered by a constitutional complaint (Art. 93 sec. 1 no. 4a GG) (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <354 and 355). [43]

b) The identity review does not violate the principle of sincere cooperation within the meaning of Art. 4 sec. 3 TEU. It is rather inherent in the concept of Art. 4 sec. 2 sentence 1 TEU (cf., on taking into consideration the national identity, ECJ, Judgment of 2 July 1996, Commission v Luxembourg, C-473/93, ECR 1996, I-3207, para. 35; Judgment of 14 October 2004, Omega, C-36/02, ECR 2004, I-9609, paras. 31 et seq.; Judgment of 12 June 2014, Digibet and Albers, C-156/13, EU:C:2014:1756, para. 34) and corresponds to the special nature of the European Union. The European Union is an association of sovereign states (Staatenverbund), of constitutions (Verfassungsverbund[215]), of administrations (Verwaltungsverbund) and of courts (Rechtsprechungsverbund[216]). This structure is ultimately based on international treaties concluded between the Member States. As "masters of the treaties" (Herren der Verträge), Member States decide through national legal arrangements if and to what extent Union law is applicable and is accorded precedence in the respective national legal order (cf. BVerfGE 75, 223 <242>; 89, 155 <190>; 123, 267 <348 and 349, 381 et seq.>; 126, 286 <302 and 303>; 134, 366 <384 para. 26>). It is not decisive whether this rule - as in France (Art. 55 of the French Constitution), Austria (Federal Constitutional Act on the Accession of Austria to the European Union - Bundesverfassungsgesetz über den Beitritt Österreichs zur Europäischen Union, Federal Law Gazette of the Republic of Austria - BGBl für die Republik Österreich no. 744/ 1994) or Spain (Art. 96 sec. 1 of the Spanish 215 Translator's note: sometimes referred to as multilevel constitutionalism.

Constitution) - is expressly provided for in national constitutional law or - as in the United Kingdom - in the Act of Assent (European Communities Act 1972; cf. Court of Appeal, Macarthys v. Smith, <1981> 1 All ER 111 <120>; Macarthys v. Smith, <1979> 3 All ER 325 <329>; House of Lords, Garland v. British Rail Engineering, <1983> 2 All ER 402 <415>) or whether it is deduced from the Act of Assent by way of a systematic, a teleological, and a historical interpretation - as in Germany - or whether the precedence of European Union Law over national law is achieved by a case-by-case application of national law to individual cases - as in Italy (cf. Corte Costituzionale, Decision no. 170/1984, Granital, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift - EuGRZ 1985, p. 98). [44]

Therefore, if the Federal Constitutional Court, in exceptional cases and under narrowly defined conditions, declares an act of an institution or an agency of the European Union to be inapplicable in Germany, this does not contradict the Basic Law's openness to European law (Preamble, Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG) (cf. BVerfGE 37, 271 <280 et seq.>; 73, 339 <374 et seq.>; 75, 223 <235, 242>; 89, 155 <174 and 175>; 102, 147 <162 et seq.>; 123, 267 <354, 401>). [45]

This approach does not entail a substantial risk for the uniform application of Union law. On the one hand, violations of the principles of Art. 1 GG in particular, which are at issue here, will only occur rarely - for the reason alone that Art. 6 TEU, the Charter of Fundamental Rights and the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union generally ensure an effective protection of fundamental rights vis-à-vis acts of institutions, bodies and agencies of the European Union (cf., e.g., ECJ, Judgment of 9 November 2010, Schecke und Eifert, C-92/09 and C-93/09, ECR 2010, I-11063, paras. 43 et seq.; Judgment of 8 April 2014, Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger, C-293/12 and C-594/12, EU:C:2014:238, paras. 23 et seq.; Judgment of 13 May 2014, Google Spain and Google, C-131/12, EU:C:2014:317, paras. 42 et seq., 62 et seq., 89 et seq.; Judgment of 6 October 2015, Schrems, C-362/14, EU:C:2015:650, paras. 91 et seq.). On the other hand, the powers of review reserved to the Federal Constitutional Court are to be exercised with restraint and in a manner open to European law (cf. BVerfGE 126, 286 <303>). To the extent required, it will base its review of the European act in question on the interpretation of that act provided by the Court of Justice of the European Union in a preliminary ruling pursuant to Art. 267 sec. 3 TFEU (Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union). This does not only apply in the context of the ultra vires review, but also applies to declaring inapplicable an act of an institution, body or agency of the European Union in Germany, because it affects the constitutional identity protected by Art. 79 sec. 3 in conjunction with Art. 1 and 20 GG (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <353>; 126, 286 <304>; 134, 366 <385 para. 27>). [46]

c) The fact that the identity review conducted by the Federal Constitutional Court is compatible with Union law is in addition corroborated by the fact that, notwithstanding varieties in the details, the constitutional law of many other Member States of the European Union also contains provisions to protect the constitutional identity and to limit the transfer of sovereign powers to the European Union (cf. in this respect

BVerfGE 134, 366 <387 para. 30>). The vast majority of Constitutional Courts and Supreme Courts of the other Member States, within their respective jurisdiction, share the Federal Constitutional Court's view that the precedence (of application) of European Union law does not apply unrestrictedly, but that it is restricted by national (constitutional) law (cf. for the Kingdom of Denmark: Højesteret, Judgment of 6 April 1998 - I 361/1997 -, para. 9.8; for the Republic of Estonia: Riigikohus, Judgment of 12 July 2012 - 3-4-1-6-12 -, paras. 128, 223; for the French Republic: Conseil constitutionnel, Decision no. 2006-540 DC of 27 July 2006, 19th recital; Decision no. 2011-631 DC of 9 June 2011, 45th recital; Conseil d'État, Judgment of 8 February 2007, no. 287110 <Ass.>, Société Arcelor Atlantique et Lorraine, Europarecht - EuR 2008, p. 57 <60 and 61>; for Ireland: Supreme Court of Ireland, Crotty v. 3. The interests that are protected by the constitutional identity laid down in Art. 79 sec. 3 GG, interests that are also protected against interferences by public authority exercised supranationally, include the principles of Art. 1 GG, and thereby include the duty of all state authority to respect and protect human dignity (Art. 1 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG), but they also include the principle, enshrined in the guarantee of human dignity, that any punishment presupposes individual guilt (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <413>). [48]

4. The protected interests that, according to Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 in conjunction with Art. 79 sec. 3 GG, are beyond the reach of European integration must not be touched in individual cases (cf. BVerfGE 113, 273 <295 et seq.>; 123, 267 <344>; 126, 286 <302 and 303>; 129, 78 <100>; 129, 124 <177 et seq.>; 132, 195 <239 et seq. paras. 106 et seq.>; 134, 366 <384 et seq. paras. 27 et seq.>). This holds especially true with regard to Art. 1

sec. 1 GG. Human dignity constitutes the highest legal value within the constitutional order (cf. BVerfGE 27, 1 <6>; 30, 173 <193>; 32, 9 <108>; 117, 71 <89>). To respect and protect human dignity forms part of the foundational principles of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 45, 187 <227>; 131, 268 <286>; established jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court), principles which the Basic Law's "mandate to integrate" (Integrationsauftrag) and its openness to European law - characteristics of the Basic Law that have found their expression in the Preamble and in Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG - must also take into account (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <354>; 126, 286 <303>; 129, 124 <172>; 132, 287 <292 para. 11>). Against this backdrop, the Federal Constitutional Court, by means of the identity review, guarantees without reservations and in every individual case the protection of fundamental rights that is indispensable according to Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 in conjunction with Art. 79 sec. 3 and Art. 1 sec. 1 GG. [49]

5. The strict requirements for activating the identity review are paralleled by stricter admissibility requirements for constitutional complaints that raise such an issue. The complainant must substantiate in detail to what extent the guarantee of human dignity that is protected by Article 1 GG is violated in the individual case. [50]

II.

The challenged decision rendered by the Higher Regional Court transgresses the limits set by Art. 1 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 and Art. 79 sec. 3 GG. Executing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant affects the principle of individual guilt, a principle that is rooted in the guarantee of human dignity (Art. 1 sec. 1 GG) and in the principle of the rule of law (Art. 20 sec. 3 GG) and that forms part of the inalienable constitutional identity under the Basic Law (1.). This fact justifies and mandates a review of the Higher Regional Court's decision, a review according to the standards of the Basic Law, but limited to this protected interest, although the Higher Regional Court's decision is determined by Union law (2.). On the one hand, the requirements set by Union law, and by German law transposing it, on which the decision is based, comply with the requirements set by Art. 1 sec. 1 GG, as they guarantee the mandatory rights of the requested person in the context of extraditions for the purpose of executing sentences rendered in absence of the person concerned and as they do not only allow the courts that deal with the extradition to investigate appropriately, but they demand it (3.). On the other hand, however, in applying those provisions, the Higher Regional Court violated the principle of individual guilt and thereby violated the complainant's right under Art. 1 sec. 1 GG, because with regard to the interpretation of the dispositions of the Framework Decision and the Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters, its application of the law did not adequately take into account the significance and the scope of human dignity (4.). [51]

1. Art. 1 sec. 1 GG can be violated by executing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, because, in extraditing a person with the purpose of executing a sentence rendered in the absence of the requested person, one enforces, through criminal law, a reaction to socio-ethical misconduct, a reaction that is incompatible with the guarantee of human dignity and the rule of law (Rechtstaatsprinzip) unless the individual blameworthiness (individuelle Vorwerfbarkeit) of the person concerned has been determined by the competent court (a). Therefore, one must also ensure compliance with the minimum procedural rights of the accused guaranteed under the rule of law and aimed at establishing the true facts of the case, rights that are necessary to ensure the effectiveness of the substantive component of the principle of individual guilt, in the extradition procedure determined by Union law that is triggered by a European arrest warrant (b). [52]

a) Criminal law is based on the principle of individual guilt (BVerfGE 123, 267 <413>; 133, 168 <197 para. 53>). This principle governing the entire field of punitive action by the state is enshrined in the guarantee of dignity and responsibility for oneself (Eigenverantwortlichkeit) and in the rule of law (cf. BVerfGE 45, 187 <259 and 260>; 86, 288 <313>; 95, 96 <140>; 120, 224 <253 and 254>; 130, 1 <26>; 133, 168 <197 para. 53>). As the principle of individual guilt is founded on the guarantee of human dignity under Art. 1 sec. 1 GG, it forms part of the constitutional identity that is inalienable pursuant to Art. 79 sec. 3 GG, and that is also protected against interferences by public authority exercised supranationally (cf. BVerfGE 123, 267 <413>). Therefore, one must also ensure that it is complied with in extraditions for the purpose of executing sentences that were rendered in the absence of the requested person during the trial. [53]

aa) The principle of "No criminal sanction without guilt" ("Keine Strafe ohne Schuld" - "nulla poena sine culpa") presupposes the responsibility of the person, who can decide on his or her actions him or herself, and who, by virtue of his or her free will, can distinguish between right and wrong and act accordingly. The protection of human dignity is based on the idea of the human being as a spiritual and moral being who is predisposed to freely define and to develop him- or herself (cf. BVerfGE 45, 187 <227>; 123, 267 <413>; 133, 168 <197 para. 54>). Therefore, in the area of the administration of criminal justice, Art. 1 sec. 1 GG determines the concept of the nature of criminal sanctions and the relationship between guilt and atonement (cf. BVerfGE 95, 96 <140>) as well as the principle that any criminal sanction presupposes guilt (cf. BVerfGE 57, 250 <275>; 80, 367 <378>; 90, 145 <173>; 123, 267 <413>; 133, 168 <197 and 198 para. 54>). By way of criminal sanction, the offender is reproached of a socio-ethical misconduct (cf. BVerfGE 20, 323 <331>; 95, 96 <140>; 110, 1 <13>; 133, 168 <198 para. 54>). The judgment that a person's behaviour has been unworthy (Unwerturteil), which ensues from the criminal sanction, affects the person concerned with regard to his or her right to being valued and respected, a right that is rooted in human dignity (cf. BVerfGE 96, 245 <249>; 101, 275 <287>). Such a reaction by the state is incompatible with the guarantee of human dignity and the rule of law unless the individual blameworthiness of the person is determined (cf. BVerfGE 20, 323 <331>; 95, 96 <140>; 133, 168 <198 para. 54>). [54]

bb) As a consequence, the principle of individual guilt is at the same time a mandatory requirement under the principle of the rule of law. The rule of law is one of the fundamental principles under the Basic Law (BVerfGE 20, 323 <331>; 133, 168 <198 para. 55>). It ensures that freedoms can be exercised by affording legal certainty, by binding state authority to the law, and by protecting legitimate expectations (BVerfGE 95, 96 <130>). The principle of the rule of law also encompasses the claim for substantive justice as one of the guiding principles of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 7, 89 <92>; 7, 194 <196>; 45, 187 <246>; 74, 129 <152>; 122, 248 <272>) and comprises the principle of equality before the law as one of the fundamental postulates of justice (cf. BVerfGE 84, 90 <121>). In the field of criminal law, these objectives laid down by the principle of the rule of law are incorporated through the principle that there must not be punishment without guilt (BVerfGE 95, 96 <130 and 131>; 133, 168 <198 para. 55>). According to the idea of justice, the constituent elements of a criminal offence have to correspond adequately to the legal consequences envisaged (cf. BVerfGE 20, 323 <331>; 25, 269 <286>; 27, 18 <29>; 50, 205 <214 and 215>; 120, 224 <241>; established jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court). There has to be a just proportion between the punishment on the one hand and the gravity of the offence, and the guilt of the offender, on the other hand (cf. BVerfGE 20, 323 <331>; 45, 187 <228>; 50, 5 <12>; 73, 206 <253>; 86, 288 <313>; 96, 245 <249>; 109, 133 <171>; 110, 1 <13>; 120, 224 <254>; 133, 168 <198 para. 55>). In this sense, the criminal sanction is aimed at justly compensating guilt (cf. BVerfGE 45, 187 <253 and 254>; 109, 133 <173>; 120, 224 <253 and 254>; 133, 168 <198 para. 55>). [55]

b) The effectiveness of the principle of individual guilt is at risk if one does not ensure that the true facts of the case are established (aa). Meting out an appropriate criminal sanction, which also constitutes a socio-ethical reproach, presupposes that the court concerned takes into account the personality of the accused, and therefore, as a rule, that the accused is present at the trial. As a consequence, the principle of individual guilt mandates that minimum rights of the accused are guaranteed in criminal trials to ensure that the accused can present circumstances to the court, and have them reviewed, that might be exonerating or relevant for sentencing (bb). These guarantees must be complied with in extradition proceedings for the purpose of executing sentences rendered in the absence of the requested person in the trial (cc). [56]

aa) Establishing the true facts of the case, which is indispensable for realising the substantive component of the principle of individual guilt, is the central objective of criminal proceedings (cf. BVerfGE 57, 250 <275>; 118, 212 <231>; 122, 248 <270>; 130, 1 <26>; 133, 168 <199 para. 56>). It is the function of criminal proceedings to enforce the right of the state to inflict punishment (Strafanspruch des Staates) in a procedure provided for and governed by law (justizförmig) in order to protect legal interests of individuals and of the general public and to ensure that the fundamental rights of the person at risk of punishment are effectively protected. In criminal proceedings, one has to ensure that the dignity of the human being as a person acting on his or her own responsibility is complied with, as well as the principle derived from the rule of law that one may not impose a criminal sanction without guilt, and that corresponding measures under procedural law are provided (cf. BVerfGE 122, 248 <270>; 133, 168 <199 para. 56>). One has to establish, in accordance with the relevant procedural rules, that the offence was committed and that the offender was guilty (cf. BVerfGE 9, 167 <169>; 74, 358 <371>; 133, 168 <199 para. 56>). The offender is presumed innocent until his or her guilt is proven (cf. BVerfGE 35, 311 <320>; 74, 358 <371>; established jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court). [57]

bb) Criminal proceedings have the aim and the function of meting out a criminal sanction that is appropriate with regard to the offender and the offence. In the German legal sphere, a criminal sanction is much more than an interference with rights (Rechtseingriff) or harm (Übel) that bears upon the offender. One of the characteristic features of a criminal sanction, besides such interference or harm, is the blame (Tadel) or reproach that is expressed via the sentence. This is meant as a socioethical reproach or a specific moral disapproval. Under the Basic Law, a criminal sanction does not merely imply the reproach of a violation of the law, but the violation of the part of the law that has a more fundamental foundation, that is to say a socioethical one (cf. BVerfGE 25, 269 <286>; 90, 145 <200 - separate opinion>; 95, 96 <140>; 96, 10 <25>; 96, 245 <249>; 109, 133 <167>; 109, 190 <217>; 120, 224 <240>; 123, 267 <408>; cf., in comparison to a criminal sanction, the assessment of administrative sanctions in BVerfGE 42, 261 <263>; e.g., for just some examples from legal doctrine Weigend, in: Leipziger Kommentar, vol. 1, 12th edition 2007, Introduction para. 1; Radtke, in: MüKo, StGB, Preliminary remark concerning §§ 38 et seq., para. 14; idem, Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht - GA 2011, pp. 636 <646>; Roxin, Strafrecht AT, vol. 1, 4th ed. 2006, § 3 para. 46, p. 89). This implies, however, that a criminal sanction that does not comprehensively take into account the personality of the offender cannot be a criminal sanction that is appropriate with regard to the dignity of the accused. As a consequence, this presupposes, as a rule, that a court, in an oral hearing in the presence of the accused, gains an insight into the accused's personality, his motifs, his perspective on the offence, on the victim and the circumstances of the offence. It has to be ensured that the accused at least has the right to personally present circumstances to the court, in particular such of a justifying, excusing, or mitigating nature, the judge and the accused being face to face. This follows from the fact that if one reproaches someone of socio-ethical misconduct, this constitutes a reproach that bears upon the personality of the sentenced person (cf. BVerfGE 96, 245 <249>; 101, 275 <287>), a reproach affecting the person concerned with regard to his or her right to be valued and respected, a right that is rooted in human dignity. [58]

cc) The minimum guarantees of rights of the accused in criminal proceedings, guarantees that are mandated by the principle of individual guilt, must also be observed in decisions on the extradition of persons requested for the purpose of executing sentences rendered in the absence of the requested person at the trial (1). In this respect, German courts are under a responsibility to ensure that those guarantees will be observed ("Gewährleistungsverantwortung") by the requesting state (2). [59]

(1) In its established jurisprudence, the Federal Constitutional Court has taken the view that, in extraditing requested persons for the purpose of executing sentences rendered in their absence, one has to respect the inalienable constitutional principles (cf. BVerfGE 59, 280 <282 et seq.>; Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGK 3, 27 <32>; 3, 314 <317>; 6, 13 <18>; 6, 334 <341 and 342>; German Federal Constitutional Court, Bundesverfassungsgericht (BVerfG), Order of the First Chamber of the Second Senate of 17 November 1986 - 2 BvR 1255/86 -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift - NJW 1987, p. 830 <830>; Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 24 January 1991 - 2 BvR 1704/90 -, NJW 1991, pp. 1411 <1411>) or the indispensable constituents of the German public order (BVerfGE 63, 332 <338>) respectively. This is the reason why the Senate in the past had declared extraditions for the purpose of executing foreign sentences that were rendered in the absence of the requested person to be impermissible if the requested person had neither been informed about the proceedings, nor about their conclusion nor, after gaining knowledge of those facts, had had an actually effective possibility to use his or her right to be heard and to defend him- or herself effectively (cf. BVerfGE 63, 332 <338>; BVerfGK 3, 27 <32 and 33>; 3, 314 <318>; 6, 13 <18>; BVerfG, Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 24 January 1991 - 2 BvR 1704/90 -, NJW 1991, pp. 1411 <1411>). [60]

To achieve that the requesting state does not treat a requested person as a mere object of proceedings […] conducted by that state, the requested person must have the possibility to influence proceedings, to submit a statement with regard to the charges brought against him or her, to present exonerating circumstances and to have them reviewed and, if this is warranted, taken into account. [61]

(2) In this respect, the courts competent for extraditions also bear responsibility for the treatment of the requested person in the requesting state. While, as the rule, the German public authority's responsibility under fundamental rights ends where a foreign sovereign state determines the essential features of a course of events according to its own free will that is independent of the Federal Republic of Germany's, (cf. BVerfGE 66, 39 <56 et seq., 63 and 64>), German public authority must not assist other states in violating human dignity (cf. BVerfGE 59, 280 <282 and 283>; 60, 348 <355 et seq.>; 63, 332 <337 and 338>; 75, 1 <19>; 108, 129 <136 and 137>; 113, 154 <162 and 163>). [62]

Therefore, the court that decides on an extradition is under the obligation to investigate and establish the facts of the case, an obligation that also falls within the scope of Art. 1 sec. 1 GG. This applies notwithstanding the fact that the principle of mutual trust governs extraditions within Europe (b). [63]

(a) It is not possible to determine the content and the extent of the procedural obligation to investigate in judicial extradition proceedings in an abstract and general manner; they depend on the circumstances of the individual case. [64]

The facts that must be established by German courts in particular include what kind of treatment the requested person will have to expect in the requesting state. In assessing whether an extradition is permissible, as a rule, they must, ex officio, use those means of investigation available to them to establish whether constitutional law principles are violated as had been asserted by the requested persons; the person concerned is not under a burden of proof (cf. BVerfGE 8, 81 <84 and 85>; 52, 391 <406 and 407>; 63, 215 <225>; 64, 46 <59>; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 29 May 1996 - 2 BvR 66/96 -, EuGRZ 1996, pp. 324 <326>; Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 15 December 1996 - 2 BvR 2407/96 -, juris, para. 6; Order of the First Chamber of the Second Senate of 9 September 2000 - 2 BvR 1560/00 -, NJW 2001, pp. 3111 <3112>). [65]

The extent and the scope of the investigations, which the courts must conduct in order to ensure the respect of the principle of individual guilt, depend on the nature and the significance of the points submitted by the requested person that indicate that the proceedings in the requesting state fall below the minimum standards required by Art. 1 sec. 1 GG. The courts may use as evidence any means that, according to the rules of logic, to general or to scientific knowledge, are, or might be, suitable to convince themselves that facts that are essential for the decision exist and that the assessment or evaluation of facts is correct (cf. W.-R. Schenke, in: Kopp/Schenke, VwGO, 21th ed. 2015, § 98 para. 3; Lagodny, in: Schomburg/Lagodny/Hackner, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, 5th ed. 2012, § 30 para. 22). Furthermore, asking the requesting state to submit additional documents is another possibility (cf. § 30 sec. 1, § 78 sec. 1 IRG). It might also become necessary to request an expert legal opinion or official information (amtliche Auskunft). [66]

(b) This does not signify that German courts always have to review the reasons of an extradition request in detail. In particular within Europe, the principle of mutual trust applies in extradition proceedings. However, this trust can be shaken. The principles that govern extraditions based on international agreements (aa) can be applied by analogy to extraditions executing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant to the extent at issue in this case (bb). [67]

(aa) With regard to extraditions between Germany and other states, as a rule, the requesting state deserves trust that it will comply with the principles of the rule of law and the protection of human rights. This principle of mutual trust is to be applied as long as trust is not shaken due to pertinent facts (cf. BVerfGE 109, 13 <35 and 36>; 109, 38 <61>). Exceptions can only be justified in atypical cases (cf. BVerfGE 60, 348 <355 and 356>; 63, 197 <206>; 109, 13 <33>; 109, 38 <59>). [68]

The requested person is - as in asylum proceedings - under a burden of producing evidence that provide sufficient indications for the entities participating in the decision on the permissibility of the extradition to conduct further investigations (cf. BVerfGK 6, 334 <342>; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 29 May 1996 - 2 BvR 66/96 -, EuGRZ 1996, pp. 324 <326>). In particular, there may be cause for a review of whether the extradition and the case file it is based on meet the minimum standard of fundamental rights protection required under the Basic Law if an extradition has the purpose of executing a foreign sentence that was rendered in the absence of the requested person (cf. BVerfGE 59, 280 <282 et seq.>; 63, 332 <337>; BVerfGK 3, 27 <31 and 32>; 6, 13 <17>; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 24 January 1991 - 2 BvR 1704/90 -, NJW 1991, pp. 1411 <1411>). [69]

As a rule, an assurance [to the effect that this minimum standard will be guaranteed] that is given in extradition proceedings and that is binding under public international law is suitable to overcome potential concerns with regard to the permissibility of the extradition; this holds true unless it is to be expected that the assurance will not be complied with in the individual case (cf. BVerfGE 63, 215 <224>; 109, 38 <62>; BVerfGK 2, 165 <172 and 173>; 3, 159 <165>; 6, 13 <19>; 6, 334 <343>; 13, 128 <136>; 13, 557 <561>; 14, 372 <377>; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of the Second Chamber of the Second Senate of 9 December 2008 - 2 BvR 2386/08 -, juris, para. 16). [70]

The risk of a treatment contrary to human rights that is alleged by the requested person is not as such an obstacle to the extradition if its existence merely cannot be completely ruled out due to an incident that has become known and that happened in the past. Rather, there have to be reasonable grounds to believe that there is a risk of a treatment contrary to human rights (cf. BVerfGE 108, 129 <138>; BVerfG, Orders of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 22 June 1992 - 2 BvR 1901/91 -, juris, para. 4; of 31 May 1994 - 2 BvR 1193/93 -, NJW 1994, pp. 2883 <2884>; of 29 May 1996 - 2 BvR 66/96 -, EuGRZ 1996, pp. 324 <326>). There have to be convincing reasons to believe that there is a considerable probability that the requesting state will not observe the minimum standards required by public international law in the specific case. As a rule, the obligation to produce specific factual prima facie evidence can only be dispensed with if there is a continuous practice of gross, obvious or systematic violations of human rights in the requesting state. Extradition to states that have a continuous practice of widespread and systematic violations of human rights will usually result in a violation of fundamental principles of the German constitutional order being probable (cf. BVerfGE 108, 129 <138 and 139>; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of the First Chamber of the Second Senate of 15 October 2007 - 2 BvR 1680/ 07 -, Neue Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht - NVwZ 2008, pp. 71 <72>). [71]

(bb) As far as the protection of the principle of individual guilt is concerned, this also applies to extraditions that take place on the basis of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant. [72]

On the one hand, as a rule, one has to place particular trust in a Member State of the European Union with regard to its compliance with the principles of the rule of law and of human rights protection. The European Union professes respect for human dignity, freedom, democracy, equality, the rule of law and respect for human rights, including the rights of persons belonging to minorities (cf. Art. 2 TEU). Its Member States are all bound by the European Convention on Human Rights. Furthermore, they are bound by the guarantees under the Charter of Fundamental Rights when they are implementing Union law (cf. Art. 51 sec. 1 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union - CFR). Trust in the compliance with the principles of the rule of law and of human rights protection encompasses in particular the details given by the requesting Member State in the European arrest warrant. Therefore, in general, the court that is competent to decide on whether the extradition is permissible is not under an obligation to use all possibilities available to investigate whether, or to establish as a fact that, one can trust the requesting Member State to observe the principle of individual guilt. [73]

On the other hand, however, the principle of mutual trust is shaken if there are indications based on facts that the requirements indispensable for the protection of human dignity would not be complied with in the case of an extradition. In this respect, the court that decides on whether the extradition is permissible is under an obligation to investigate both the legal situation and legal practice of the requesting Member State if the person concerned has submitted sufficient indications that such investigations are warranted. The fact that the sentence that is to be executed by way of extradition was rendered in the absence of the requested person cannot be the sole reason for reviewing whether the extradition complies with the constitutional identity of the Basic Law. This is due to the fact that a Member State that requests an extradition for the purpose of executing a judicial decision that had been rendered in the absence of the requested person according to Art. 4a sec. 1of the Framework Decision, by duly completing the relevant form, at the same time states that the requested person either was actually aware of the scheduled trial and was informed that a decision might be handed down if he or she did not appear for the trial (cf. Art. 4a sec. 1 letter a of the Framework Decision), or that the requested person, being aware of the scheduled trial, was defended by a counsellor at the trial (cf. Art. 4a sec. 1 letter b of the Framework Decision), or that the requested person has the right to a retrial, or an appeal, in which the person has the right to participate and which allows the merits of the case, including fresh evidence, to be re-examined, and which may lead to the original decision being reversed; (cf. Art. 4a sec. 1 letters c and d of the Framework Decision). [74]

If, after conclusion of the investigations, the court becomes aware that the minimum standards mandated by the Basic Law will not be complied with by the requesting state, the court must not permit the extradition. [75]

2. To ensure compliance with the principle of individual guilt, which is beyond the reach of European integration, the Court is justified in conducting, and under an obligation to conduct, a review of the Higher Regional Court's decision, although that decision is determined by Union law, a review according to the standards of the Basic Law and that is limited to ensuring observance of the procedural minimum guarantees. As a rule, the Framework Decision is accorded precedence of application within the German legal order (a). According to the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, the Framework Decision exhaustively deals with extraditions of persons who were sentenced in absence (b). However, this does not relieve the Higher Regional Court of its obligation to ensure that the principles of Art. 1 sec. 1 GG, in its manifestation as principle of individual guilt, are also complied with in the context of extraditions based on a European arrest warrant (c.). [76]

a) The precedence of application of European Union Law also extends to Framework Decisions. In this regard, the principle that national law must be interpreted in conformity with Union law (Prinzip der unionsrechtskonformen Auslegung) requires the national courts, having regard to the entire national legal order and by applying the methods of interpretation that are recognised there, to do anything within their competence to ensure the full effectiveness of Union law and to achieve a result that is in conformity with the objective pursued with the Framework Decision (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 5 October 2004, Pfeiffer, C-397/01 to C-403/01, ECR 2004, I-8835, paras. 115 and 116; Judgment of 5 September 2012, Lopes Da Silva Jorge, C-42/11, EU:C:2012:517, para. 56). [77]

In substance, the Court of Justice has already held several times that national judicial authorities may only refuse to execute a European arrest warrant in the cases provided for by the Framework Decision (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 1 December 2008, Leymann and Pustovarov, C-388/08 PPU, ECR 2008, I-8993, para. 51; Judgment of 30 May 2013, F., C-168/13 PPU, EU:C:2013:358, para. 36 with further references). In the case Melloni, it emphasised that the effectiveness of the Framework Decision cannot be allowed to be undermined by a state invoking rules of national law; the same holds true even for law of constitutional status (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 26 February 2013, Melloni, C-399/11, EU:C:2013:107, para. 59). Until now, the Court [of Justice of the European Union] has not dealt with limits to interpreting national law in conformity with a Framework Decision (rahmenbeschlusskonforme Auslegung), although the Spanish Tribunal Constitucional had based its request for a preliminary ruling on the argument that extraditions for the purpose of executing sentences rendered in the absence of the requested person potentially violated the core content of a fair trial within the meaning of the Spanish Constitution, a violation that might affect human dignity (cf. ECJ, loc. cit., para. 20; subsequently, the Spanish Tribunal Constitucional, however, emphasised that if it were no longer possible to reconcile the law of the European Union in its further development with the Spanish Constitution, preserving the sovereignty of the Spanish people and the supremacy of the Constitution […] could lead[217] the Court, in a final instance, to solve the problems through the constitutional procedures envisaged; such was the content of its decision of 13 February 2014, STC 26/2014, Ground 3, HRLJ 2014, pp. 475 <478>). [78]

b) According to the case-law of the Court of Justice, Art. 4a of the Framework Decision exhaustively regulates which conditions may be set for an extradition to execute sentences rendered in absence of the requested person at the trial. [79]

Pursuant to Art. 1 sec. 2 of the Framework Decision, the Member States execute a European arrest warrant according to the principle of mutual recognition and according to the provisions of the Framework Decision. As a rule, they are under an obligation to execute a European arrest warrant, and they may only attach preconditions to its execution in those cases that are mentioned in Art. 3 to 5 of the Framework Decision (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 1 December 2008, Leymann and Pustovarov, C-388/08 PPU, ECR 2008, I-8993, para. 51; Judgment of 30 May 2013, F., C-168/13 PPU, EU:C:2013:358, para. 36 with further references). [80]

According to the Court of Justice, the execution of a European arrest warrant may - as envisaged in the 10th recital of the preamble to the Framework Decision - be suspended only in the event of a serious and persistent breach by one of the Member States of the principles set out in Art. 6 sec. 1 TEU, determined by the Council pursuant to Art. 7 sec. 1 TEU with the consequences set out in Art. 7 sec. 2 TEU (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 30 May 2013, F., C-168/13 PPU, EU:C:2013:358, para. 49). It further held that the principle of mutual recognition [of judgments handed down in another Member State] was based on mutual trust between Member States, in the fact that their respective national legal orders[218] are capable of providing an equivalent and effective protection of fundamental rights, recognised at European Union level, in particular, in the Charter of Fundamental Rights. It concluded that, therefore, the parties against which a European arrest warrant have been issued had to pursue legal remedies within the legal system of the Member State of origin if they wanted to challenge the lawfulness of prosecution, of the execution of the sentence, of imposing a custodial measure of prevention[219], or of the criminal trial that has led to imposing a custodial sentence or a custodial measure of prevention, (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 22 December 2010, Aguirre Zarraga, C-491/10 PPU, ECR 2010, I-14247, paras. 70 and 71). [81]

In the Melloni case, the Court of Justice decided specifically with regard to Art. 4a of the Framework Decision that the execution of an arrest warrant must not be made dependent on the condition that a sentence rendered in the issuing state in the absence of the accused is open to review (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 26 February 2013, Melloni, C-399/11, EU:C:2013:107, para. 46) if the person concerned is in one of the four situations provided for in that provision (cf. ECJ, loc. cit., para. 61). Furthermore, Art. 53 CFR does not allow Member States to make the surrender of a person convicted in absentia conditional upon the conviction being open to review in the issuing Member State (cf. ECJ, loc. cit., para. 64). [82]

c) These stipulations, however, do not relieve German authorities or courts of their obligation to ensure that the principles of Art. 1 sec. 1 GG are complied with in the context of extraditions executing a European arrest warrant (Art. 23 sec. 1 sentence 3 in conjunction with Art. 79 sec. 3 GG). Rather, they must ensure that in executing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant and the Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters, the minimum guarantees of the rights of the accused required by Art. 1 sec. 1 GG will also be observed in the requesting Member State, or - where this is impossible - refrain from extraditing the person concerned. To this extent, the principle of mutual trust that governs extraditions within Europe is limited by human dignity guaranteed under Art. 1 sec. 1 GG. It is to this extent, as well, that the court is under a constitutional obligation to conduct the investigations mentioned above. [83]

3. In the present context, however, there is no need for limiting the precedence of application of the Framework Decision by having recourse to Art. 79 sec. 3 GG in conjunction with Art. 1 sec. 1 GG because both the Framework Decision (a) and the Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters transposing it (b) require an interpretation that takes into account the minimum guarantees of the rights of the accused that are required by Art. 1 sec 1 GG in the context of an extradition. In this regard, the relevant standards of Union law satisfy the minimum guarantees of the rights of the accused that are mandated by the Basic Law to uphold the principle of individual guilt, which is beyond the reach of European integration. [84]

219 Translator's note: referred to as "detention order" in the Framework Decision; referred to as "custodial measure" in the translation of the German Criminal Code provided at https://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/englisch_stgb/index.html.

a) The obligation to execute a European arrest warrant is already limited under Union law (cf. Vogel, in: Grabitz/Hilf/Nettesheim, Das Recht der EU, vol. I, Art. 82 AEUV, para. 37 <March 2011>; Gaede, NJW 2013, pp. 1279 <1280>). The confidence between Member States, which, pursuant to recital 10 of the Preamble to the Framework Decision, is the basis of the mechanism of the European arrest warrant, can be shaken; in individual cases, considerable violations of fundamental rights can occur even if the respective national legal systems are, in principle, capable of providing an effective protection of fundamental rights that is equivalent to the protection provided under the Basic Law. Even according to Union law standards, a European arrest warrant is not to be executed if it does not meet the requirements stipulated by the Framework Decision (aa) or if the extradition would entail a violation of Union fundamental rights (bb). Also under a Union law perspective, the principle of mutual trust does not apply without limitations in this regard (cc), with the result that the denial of extradition on the basis of a European arrest warrant for the execution of a sentence rendered in the absence of the requested person can be justified under certain preconditions (dd). [85]

aa) Pursuant to Art. 4a sec. 1 of the Framework Decision, the executing judicial authority may refuse to execute a European arrest warrant issued for the purpose of executing a custodial sentence if certain preconditions are not met. [86]

Art. 4a sec. 1 letters a and b of the Framework Decision provides for an obligation to extradite a person for the execution of a decision rendered following a trial at which the person did not appear in person if the person actually received official information of the trial and was informed that a decision might be handed down if he or she did not appear for the trial, or if the person, being aware of the trial, was indeed represented by a defence counsel. These are cases in which the person, of his or her own free will, and unequivocally, waived his or her right to be personally present at the trial. [87]

In contrast, Art. 4a sec. 1 letters c and d of the Framework Decision covers scenarios in which the person concerned has the right to challenge the sentence via a legal remedy that allows the merits of the case[220], including fresh evidence, to be re-examined, and which may lead to the original decision being reversed. Thus, in these cases, the accused is offered the opportunity to have a court review the facts pertaining to the charges brought against him or her. This requires that the court competent for potential appeal or retrial proceedings also hear the accused; procedural law must enable this court to examine not only the law but also the facts pertaining to the charges brought against the accused. To the extent that Art. 4a sec. 1 letter d (i) of the Framework Decision prescribes a procedure that allows for[221] the merits of the case, including fresh evidence, to be re-examined, and which "may"[222] lead to the original decision being reversed, this provision does not provide for discretion of the courts dealing with such a case; rather, the term "may" used in Art. 4a sec. 1 letter d (i) of the Framework Decision serves to describe the powers of the court and signifies more or less "to be able to"[223]. More aptly, the English version mentions a "retrial, or an appeal, in which the person has the right to participate and which allows the merits of the case, including fresh evidence, to be re-examined", and the French version mentions a "nouvelle procédure de jugement ou (…) une procédure d'appel, à laquelle l'intéressé a le droit de participer et qui permet de réexaminer l'affaire sur le fond, en tenant compte des nouveaux éléments de preuve". [88]

This interpretation of Art. 4a sec. 1 letter d (i) of the Framework Decision corresponds to the intent of the European legislature as well. The provision was inserted in the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant by Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009 amending Framework Decisions 2002/584/ JHA, 2005/214/JHA, 2006/783/JHA, 2008/909/JHA and 2008/947/JHA, thereby enhancing the procedural rights of persons and fostering the application of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial (OJ EU no. L 81 of 27 March 2009, p. 24 - Framework Decision on decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned). Pursuant to Art. 1 sec. 1 of the Framework Decision, its objective was to enhance the procedural rights of persons subject to criminal proceedings, to facilitate judicial cooperation in criminal matters and, in particular, to improve mutual recognition of judicial decisions between Member States. Recital 11 of the Framework Decision on decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial reads: [89]

> Common solutions concerning grounds for non-recognition in the relevant existing Framework Decisions should take into account the diversity of situations with regard to the right of the person concerned to a retrial or an appeal. Such a retrial, or appeal, is aimed at guaranteeing the rights of the defence and is characterised by the following elements: the person concerned has the right to be present, the merits of the case, including fresh evidence are re-examined, and the proceedings can lead to the original decision being reversed.

The wording "the merits of the case, including fresh evidence are re-examined" shows that the Council obviously did not assume that the judge competent for the appeal or retrial had discretion, but rather that the person concerned had a right to the evidence presented by him or her for his or her exoneration to be examined or re-examined.

Teleological considerations corroborate this finding. If a court were allowed to refrain from re-examining the facts of the case against the will of the person sentenced in his or her absence, the court could frustrate a re-examination of the charges brought against that person. The defence would be deprived of the possibility to request the admission of new evidence in the retrial (cf. European Court of Human Rights - ECtHR, Jones v. The United Kingdom, decision of 9 September 2003, no. 30900/02; ECtHR <GC>, Sejdovic v. Italy, judgment of 1 March 2006, no. 56581/ 00, para. 85). The procedural possibility to challenge the judgment rendered in the absence of the person concerned would prove ineffective in this case (see also ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, para. 30; Medenica v. Switzerland, judgment of 14 June 2001, no. 20491/92, para. 55). [90]

bb) The fact that the Member States of the European Union are bound by the fundamental rights (1), that the Charter of Fundamental Rights guides the interpretation of secondary law (Ausstrahlungswirkung) (2), and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, which is relevant for determining the factual scope of Art. 4a sec. 1 of the Framework Decision, also argue in favour of this interpretation of Art. 4a sec. 1 letter d (i) of the Framework Decision (3). [91]

(1) Notwithstanding Art. 7 TEU, the Member States of the European Union may not assist each other in committing violations of human rights (Art. 6 sec. 1 TEU; cf. Munich Higher Regional Court, Order of 15 May 2013 - OLG Ausl 31 Ausl A 442/13 119/ 13> -, Der Strafverteidiger - StV 2013, pp. 710 <711>). When implementing Union law, they must respect the fundamental rights of the European Union (cf. Art. 51 sec. 1 CFR; ECJ, Judgment of 12 November 1969, Stauder, 29/69, ECR 1969, p. 419, para. 7; Judgment of 13 July 1989, Wachauf, 5/88, ECR 1989, p. 2609, para. 19; Judgment of 16 June 2005, Pupino, C-105/03, ECR 2005, I-5285, paras. 58 and 59). These are therefore also decisive for the interpretation (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 13 December 1983, Commission/Council, 218/82, ECR 1983, p. 4063, para. 15; Judgment of 16 June 2005, Pupino, C-105/ 03, ECR 2005, I-5285, paras. 58 et seq.) and the lawfulness (cf. Arts. 263, 267 sec. 1 letter b TFEU; Art. 51 sec. 1 CFR; ECJ, Judgment of 3 May 2007, Advocaten voor de Wereld, C-303/05, ECR 2007, I-3633, para. 45; Judgment of 26 February 2013, Melloni, C-399/11, EU:C:2013:107, paras. 48 et seq.) of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant. [92]

In this vein, Art. 1 sec. 3 of the Framework Decision explicitly states that the Framework Decision should not have the effect of modifying the obligation to respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in Article 6 TEU. Pursuant to recital 12, the Framework Decision respects fundamental rights and observes the principles recognised by Article 6 TEU and reflected in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, in particular Chapter VI thereof (sentence 1). Therefore, nothing in this Framework Decision may be interpreted as prohibiting refusal to surrender a person for whom a European arrest warrant has been issued when there are reasons to believe, on the basis of objective elements, that the said arrest warrant has been issued for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing a person on the grounds of his or her sex, race, religion, ethnic origin, nationality, language, political opinions or sexual orientation, or that that person's position may be prejudiced for any of these reasons (sentence 2).

Pursuant to recital 13, no person should be removed, expelled or extradited to a State where there is a serious risk that he or she would be subjected to the death penalty, torture or other inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. [93]

Against this backdrop, a European arrest warrant is not to be executed if this would conflict with the Charter of Fundamental Rights, which takes precedence over the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant (cf. Commission Document COM <2006> 8 final of 24 January 2006, p. 7 and COM <2011> 175 final of 11 April 2011, p. 7; Bundestag document, Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks 15/1718, p. 14; Bundesrat document, Bundesratsdrucksache - BRDrucks 70/06, p. 31; Opinions of: Advocate General Bot, delivered on 24 March 2009, Case C-123/08 - Wolzenburg, ECR 2009, I-9621, paras. 147 et seq,. and, delivered on 7 September 2010, Case C-261/09 - Mantello, ECR 2010, I-11477, paras. 87 and 88; of Advocate General Cruz Villalón, delivered on 6 July 2010, C-306/09 - I.B., ECR 2010, I-10341, paras. 43 and 44; of Advocate General Mengozzi, delivered on 20 March 2012, Case C-42/11 - Lopes da Silva Jorge, EU:C:2012:151, para. 28; of Advocate General Sharpston, delivered on 18 October 2012, Case C-396/11 - Radu, EU:C:2012:648, paras. 69 et seq.). [94]

This is confirmed by the legislative history of the Framework Decision. It is true that incompatibility of an extradition request with the fundamental principles of the Member State of execution or of the ordre public, which had been suggested as an additional ground for refusal, was not included in the text of the Framework Decision. However, the only reason why this proposal was not taken up was that Art. 1 sec. 3 of the Framework Decision as well as recitals 10, 12, 13 and 14 set out that the strict respect of the fundamental rights and individual freedoms as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and resulting from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States as general principles of the Union's law (Art. 6 sec. 2 TEU) must be ensured (cf. Council Document 14867/01 of 4 December 2001, p. 3). [95]

(2) With regard to extraditions for the execution of sentences rendered in the absence of the accused, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union mandates that also the court competent for potential appeal or retrial proceedings hear the accused; procedural law must enable that court to examine not only the law but also the facts pertaining to the charges brought against the accused. [96]

The right to an effective remedy is a general principle of Union law (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 15 May 1986, Johnston, 222/84, ECR 1986, p. 1651, para. 19; Explanations Relating to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, OJ EU no. C 303 of 14 December 2007, pp. 17 <29>). This also includes, as part of that guarantee, the right to be heard in the context of judicial proceedings under Art. 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights (cf. Mayer, in: Grabitz/Hilf/

Nettesheim, Das Recht der Europäischen Union, vol. I, following Art. 6 TEU, para. 369 <July 2010>). This right guarantees that the court decides about the application only after listening to the parties and assessing the evidence, and that it must give reasons for its decision (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 10 December 1998, Schröder and Thamann/Commission, C-221/97 P, ECR 1998, I-8255, para. 24). [97]

(3) Pursuant to Art. 52 sec. 3 sentence 1 CFR, in so far as the rights in the Charter correspond to rights guaranteed by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, they shall have the same meaning and scope as those laid down by the said Convention. Union law can provide more extensive protection (cf. Art. 52 sec. 3 sentence 2 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights); the level of protection provided by the Charter of Fundamental Rights may, however, not fall below that of the Convention. According to the Explanations Relating to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, Art. 47 sec. 2 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights corresponds to Art. 6 sec. 1 of the Convention and Art. 48 of the Charter to Art. 6 secs. 2 and 3 of the Convention (cf. Explanations Relating to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, OJ EU no. C 303 of 14 December 2007, p. 17 <30>). Against this backdrop, the guarantees of Article 6 ECHR, as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights, establish minimum guarantees also with regard to the Framework Decision, which may not fall below them. [98]

According to the European Convention on Human Rights, extradition is impermissible where "substantial grounds"[224] have been shown for believing that the person concerned, if extradited, faces a real risk[225] of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment (cf. ECtHR <Plenary>, Soering v. The United Kingdom, judgment of 7 July 1989, no. 14038/88, para. 91) or "risks suffering a flagrant denial of a fair trial"[226] (cf. ECtHR <Plenary>, Soering v. The United Kingdom, judgment of 7 July 1989, no. 14038/88, para. 113). [99]

In this regard, Art. 6 ECHR imposes on every national court an obligation to check whether the accused has had the opportunity to apprise himself of the proceedings against him (cf. ECtHR, Somogyi v. Italy, judgment of 18 May 2004, no. 67972/01, para. 72). Moreover, Art. 6 sec. 1 ECHR grants a right to a fair hearing and, in substance, the right to adversarial proceedings. Each party must in principle have the opportunity to adduce evidence and to comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed with a view to influencing the court's decision (cf. ECtHR, Mantovanelli v. France, judgment of 18 March 1997, no. 21497/93, para. 33). The court is under a duty to conduct a proper examination of the submissions, arguments and evidence adduced by the parties (cf. ECtHR, Van de Hurk v. The Netherlands, judgment of 19 April 1994, no. 16034/90, para. 59). With regard to criminal proceedings, this means that both the prosecution and the defence must be given the opportunity to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed and the evidence adduced by the other party (cf. ECtHR, Lietzow v. Germany, judgment of 13 February 2001, no. 24479/94, para. 44). [100]

For a fair trial, it is of capital importance that an accused should appear [at the trial] (cf. ECtHR, Poitrimol v. France, judgment of 23 November 1993, no. 14032/88, para. 35). This not only generally serves the purpose of ensuring the accused's right to a hearing but also gives the court the opportunity to verify the accuracy of his statements and to compare them with those of the victim and of the witnesses (cf. ECtHR, loc. cit., para. 35). Although not expressly mentioned in Art. 6 sec. 1 ECHR, the object and purpose of this right show that a person charged with a criminal offence is entitled to take part in the hearing (cf. ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, para. 27). Proceedings conducted in the absence of the accused can, however, be compatible with the Convention if the accused has waived both his or her right to be personally present at the trial and the right of defence, or if a court, after having heard the accused, re-examines both the facts and the law pertaining to the charges brought against the accused (cf. ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, paras. 29 and 30; Medenica v. Switzerland, judgment of 14 June 2001, no. 20491/92, para. 55). [101]

The presence of the defence - be it in the initial proceedings or upon retrial - is one of the essential requirements of Art. 6 ECHR. If in retrial proceedings the defence is allowed to participate in the proceedings before the court (of appeal) and to request the admission of new evidence, this entails the possibility of a fresh factual and legal determination of the criminal charge, so that the proceedings as a whole can be regarded as fair (cf. ECtHR, Jones v. The United Kingdom, decision of 9 September 2003, no. 30900/02; ECtHR <GC>, Sejdovic v. Italy, judgment of 1 March 2006, no. 56581/00, para. 85). Conversely, a court's refusal to reopen criminal proceedings which have been held in absentia will - notwithstanding the exceptions mentioned - as a rule, constitute an infringement of Article 6 or the principles embodied therein (cf. ECtHR, Stoichkov v. Bulgaria, judgment of 24 March 2005, no. 9808/02, para. 56). [102]

A remedy must be effective in this regard. A person charged with a criminal offence must therefore not be left with the burden of proving that he or she was not seeking to evade justice or that his or her absence was due to force majeure (cf. ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, para. 30). At the same time, the national authorities are at liberty to assess whether the accused showed good cause for his or her absence or whether there was anything in the case file to support a finding that the accused had been absent for reasons beyond his or her control (cf. ECtHR, Medenica v. Switzerland, judgment of 14 June 2001, no. 20491/92, para 57; ECtHR <GC>, Sejdovic v. Italy, judgment of 1 March 2006, no. 56581/00, para. 88). [103]

Neither the letter nor the spirit of Article 6 of the Convention prevents a person from waiving of his or her own free will, either expressly or tacitly, his or her right to a fair trial (cf. ECtHR, Kwiatkowska v. Italy, decision of 30 November 2000, no. 52868/99; Sejdovic v. Italy, judgment of 1 March 2006, no. 56581/00, para. 86). The waiver must, however, be unequivocal and satisfy certain minimum requirements (cf. ECtHR, Jones v. The United Kingdom, decision of 9 September 2003, no. 30900/02). Where a person charged with a criminal offence[227] who has not been notified[228] in person is, on an insufficient factual basis, considered to be a fugitive ("latitante"), this does not in any event justify the presumption that the person has of his or her own free will waived his or her right to appear at the trial and defend him- or herself (cf. ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, para. 28; ECtHR <GC>, Sejdovic v. Italy, judgment of 1 March 2006, no. 56581/00, para. 87). [104]

cc) The fact that the principle of mutual trust does not apply without limits even according to Union law at the same time signifies that the national judicial authorities, upon relevant indications, are authorised, and under an obligation under Union law, to review whether the requirements under the rule of law have been complied with, even if the European arrest warrant formally meets the requirements of the Framework Decision (cf. Böse, in: Grützner/Pötz/Kreß, Internationaler Rechtshilfeverkehr in Strafsachen, 3rd ed., before § 78 paras. 26, 35 <June 2012>). Thus, not only does Union law not stand in the way of investigating whether the national judicial authorities comply with the requirements under the rule of law guaranteed by the Charter of Fundamental Rights; Union law indeed demands such investigations. The European Commission is right in its view that the obligation to execute a European arrest warrant no longer applies where the executing judicial authority, taking into account all the circumstances of the case, is convinced that surrender would result in a breach of a requested person's fundamental rights (cf. Commission document COM <2011> 175 final of 11 April 2011, p. 7). Ensuing delays in the extradition procedures must be tolerated even if this runs counter to the objective of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant to speed up extradition (cf. recitals 1 and 5 of the Preamble to the Framework Decision). Correspondingly, the Framework Decision does not lay down

227 Translator's note: A literal translation of the German-language version of this order would be "the accused".

rigid time limits for the execution of a European arrest warrant (cf. Art. 17 sec. 2 <"should">, sec. 3 <"should">, sec. 4 <"specific cases">, sec. 7 <"in exceptional circumstances"> of the Framework Decision). [105]

According to recital 12, the Framework Decision allows Member States to apply their constitutional rules aimed at ensuring a lawful and fair trial (cf. ECJ, Judgment of 30 May 2013, F., C-168/13 PPU, EU:C:2013:358, para. 53). Apart from this, decisions on the execution of the European arrest warrant must be subject to adequate judicial review by the courts of the Member States (recital 8; cf. ECJ, Judgment of 30 May 2013, F., C-168/13 PPU, EU:C:2013:358, para. 46). Also from a Union law perspective, however, an effective judicial review within the meaning of Arts. 47, 52 sec. 3 CFR, Arts. 6, 13 ECHR presupposes that the court that decides about the extradition is able to conduct the relevant investigations as long as the extradition system established by the Framework Decision remains effective in practice (cf. ECJ, loc. cit., para. 53; with regard to the similar problem existing in asylum law: ECJ, Judgment of 21 December 2011, N. S., C-411/10 and C-493/10, ECJ 2011, I-13905, para. 94). [106]

dd) As a consequence, the requirements under Union law with regard to the execution of a European arrest warrant are not lower than those that are required by Art. 1 sec. 1 GG as minimum guarantees of the rights of the accused. It can therefore remain undecided whether and to what extent, in interpreting the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, one must have recourse to Art. 4 sec. 2 sentence 1 TEU, pursuant to which the European Union shall respect the national identities of its Member States, and the Framework Decision therefore must be interpreted taking into account the legal situation in the respective Member State (cf. v. Bogdandy/Schill, in: Grabitz/Hilf/Nettesheim, Das Recht der EU, vol. I, Art. 4 TEU para. 13 <Sept. 2013>). [107]

b) In this respect, the Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters that transposes the Framework Decision into German law also does not raise concerns with regard to the principle of individual guilt and its contents that are enshrined in the guarantee of human dignity. § 73 sentence 2 IRG provides that requests under Part VIII (Extradition and Transit between Member States of the European Union) shall not be permissible if compliance would violate the principles in Art. 6 TEU. Regardless of how this reference may be understood in detail, it does not, in any event, prevent the authorities and courts, when interpreting §§ 78 et seq. IRG, from taking into account the directives of Art. 1 sec. 1 GG (cf., for a general explanation, BVerfGE 7, 198 <205 et seq.>; 115, 320 <367>; established jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court). [108]

4. The challenged decision rendered by the Higher Regional Court does not entirely meet these requirements. The Higher Regional Court's assessment that the complainant's extradition is only permissible if he is provided with an effective legal remedy after his surrender is correct. However, the court failed to recognise the extent of its obligation to investigate and to establish the facts and thereby failed to recognise the significance and the scope of Art. 1 sec. 1 GG (a). The complainant asserted in a substantiated manner that the Italian procedural law did not provide him with the opportunity to have a new hearing of evidence at the appeals stage. The Higher Regional Court failed to sufficiently follow up on that issue. It contented itself with finding that a hearing of evidence in Italy was "in any case not impossible" ("jedenfalls nicht ausgeschlossen"). Its decision therefore violates the complainant's rights under Art. 1 sec. 1 GG (b). [109]

a) In executing the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant and the Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters, the courts have to ensure in every individual case that the rights of the requested person are safeguarded at least to the extent that the content of the rights is protected by Art. 1 sec. 1 GG. With regard to the principle of individual guilt enshrined in Art. 1 sec. 1 GG, this includes that a requested person who has been sentenced in his or her absence and who has not been informed about the trial and its conclusion will at least be provided with the real opportunity to defend himor herself effectively after having learned of the trial, in particular by presenting circumstances to the court that may exonerate him or her and by having them reviewed. The court that decides whether it is permissible to extradite the requested person is in this respect under an obligation to investigate the legal situation and the legal practice of the requesting state if the person concerned has submitted sufficient indications to warrant such investigations. The content and the extent of the investigations have to be determined in accordance with the indications submitted by the requested person that the procedure falls below the minimum standards guaranteed by human dignity. If, after completion of the investigation, it is established that the requesting state fails to comply with this minimum standard, the competent court must not declare the extradition to be permissible. [110]

b) The Italian Republic - as all other Member States of the European Union - is generally to be trusted to comply with the principles of the rule of law and the protection of human rights in extradition proceedings also. However, in the case at hand, questions have arisen that would have required further investigation of the facts. [111]

   As can be inferred from the European arrest warrant, the Florence Public Prosecutor General stated that the complainant was not personally served with the decision imposing the custodial sentence, but will be served with the decision without delay after his surrender. It further stated that the complainant is entitled to a retrial or appeal, in which he is allowed to participate and which allows the facts of the case, including fresh evidence, to be re-examined, and which may lead to the original decision being reversed. It hereby stated implicitly that the complainant will be provided the opportunity of a review of the facts and the law pertaining to the charges against him after having been heard by a court. Furthermore, the Florence Public Prosecutor General stated in its letter of 7 October 2014 that the complainant has the right, within 30 days, to apply for reinstatement into the time limit for appeal, and, without reservations, the right to defend himself. [112]

   However, in the case at hand, this was not sufficient to ensure compliance with the minimum standard of the rights of the accused prescribed by Art. 1 sec. 1 GG and thereby, with the complainant's status as a holder of rights in the criminal proceedings to be conducted in Italy. The complainant has submitted substantial indications that, notwithstanding the assurance provided by the Florence Public Prosecutor General, he is not afforded the real opportunity to defend himself effectively, in particular to submit and have examined circumstances that may exonerate him (aa). The Higher Regional Court's argument that it is sufficient that taking of new evidence in appellate proceedings is "in any case not impossible" is not suitable to overcome the concerns raised by the complainant (bb). Also with regard to other circumstances, there would have been reason for the Higher Regional Court to examine more closely whether the complainant, in a trial, will be granted the minimum rights of defence to which he is entitled (cc). [113]

aa) In his brief of 21 October 2014 to the Higher Regional Court, the complainant stated that he had been convicted in absence and without being aware of the conviction, and that he had not of his own free will and unequivocally waived his right to be present. He plausibly argued that reinstatement into the former procedural position afforded to him under Italian law would only result in his reinstatement into the time limit for appeal. Citing sources on Italian criminal procedural law in German, he further stated that due to the appellate court's limited competence for review, the late appeal possible under Italian law did not meet the requirements applicable if the right to be heard was granted at a later stage, because, as a rule, no new evidence would be heard in the appellate proceedings. In order to prove this, the complainant communicated the contents of Art. 603 CPP, as amended by the Act of 28 April 2014 and in the version governing the legal situation prior to the entry into force of that Act to the Higher Regional Court in Italian and German. [114]

It seems to follow from the wording of Art. 603 CPP that in appellate proceedings, there is generally no new hearing of evidence. According to section 3 of that Article, the court only orders a new hearing of evidence on its own accord if it considers this to be indispensable. If a party requests a hearing of evidence, the court orders such a hearing of evidence if it cannot decide on the basis of the case file (sec. 1), or if the new evidence did not come into existence or was discovered only after the first instance proceedings (sec. 2). Pursuant to a former version of Art. 603 sec. 4 CPP (1988), which, according to the complainant, was repealed only by the Act of 28 April 2014, the judge only orders a new hearing of evidence if the accused who was not present during the first-instance proceedings so requests and proves that he or she was not able to appear before the court either due to events of a coincidental nature, or force majeure, or because he or she was not aware of the summons, provided that this was not caused by his or her own fault, or he or she has not of his or her own free will refused to take cognisance of the trial. The complainant plausibly argued that sec. 4 CPP 1988 might apply to him. To support this he also referred to a decision ("Sentenza") of the Italian Corte di Cassazione of 17 July 2014 pursuant to which the old legal situation applied to appeals of convictions in absence of the person concerned rendered prior to the entry into force of the Act of 28 April 2014. He submitted the text of this decision to the Higher Regional Court. It is also not improbable that the old legal situation could in fact be applicable to the present case, because in his letter of 7 October 2014, the Florence Public Prosecutor General sent the text of Art. 175 CPP in the version applicable prior to the reform of criminal procedure that took place in 2014. The complainant also pointed this out to the Higher Regional Court. [115]

Based on the submissions made by the complainant, it is therefore to be feared that Italian law does not afford him the opportunity of a new hearing of evidence in appellate proceedings. If Art. 603 sec. 4 CPP 1988 applies, he would have to produce negative evidence that he was not able to appear before the court because of events of a coincidental nature, or force majeure, or because he was not aware of the summons, provided that this was not caused by his own fault or - if the summons was served by the court of first instance by delivery to the defence counsel - that he has not of his own free will refused to take cognisance of the trial. This wording corresponds to the one in Art. 175 CCP in the version in force until 2005. According to that Article, the accused could request reinstatement into the former procedural position in order to file an appeal if he or she proved that he or she had in fact not been aware of the summons, provided that this fact was not caused by his or her own fault, or, in case the default judgment had been served upon the defence counsel by hand delivery, the accused did not deliberately refuse to take cognisance of the trial (cf. Italienische Strafprozessordnung, Zweisprachige Ausgabe, Bauer/König/Kreuzer/Riz/Zanon, 1991). Since it is almost impossible to prove negative facts, the higher regional courts (cf. Berlin Court of Appeal, Kammergericht Berlin - KG, Order of 19 December 1991 - Ausl A 413/91 -, StV 1993, p. 207; Nuremberg Higher Regional Court, Oberlandesgericht - OLG, Order of 31 July 1997 - Ausl. 9/97 -, StV 1997, pp. 648 <649>; OLG Thuringia, Order of 2 February 1998 - Ausl 2/97 -, StV 1999, pp. 265 <267 and 268>; OLG Düsseldorf, Order of 27 August 1998 - 4 Ausl (A) 201/98 - 259 - 250/98 III -, StV 1999, pp. 270 <272>; OLG Karlsruhe, Order of 28 August 1998 - 1 AK 14/ 98 -, StV 1999, pp. 268 <270>; OLG Cologne, Order of 15 January 2003 - Ausl 913/ 01 -, juris, para. 38; OLG Karlsruhe, Order of 14 September 2004 - 1 AK 0/04 -, juris, para. 10; OLG Karlsruhe, Order of 14 September 2004 - 1 AK 6/04 -, StV 2004, pp. 547 <548>), the Federal Court of Justice (cf. Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Criminal Matters, Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen - BGHSt 47, 120 <126>) as well as the First Section and the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights (cf. ECtHR <First Section>, Sejdovic v. Italy, judgment of 10 November 2004, no. 56581/00, para. 40; ECtHR < GC>, Sejdovic v. Italy, judgment of 1 March 2006, no. 56581/00, paras. 103 et seq.) objected to the old version of Art. 175 CPP with regard to the protected interests at issue here. Already in 1985, in the case Colozza v. Italy, the European Court of Human Rights criticised that the legal remedy of "late appeal" under Italian law was not effective, because the appellate court could only decide on the merits of the case, as regards the factual and legal issues, if the person concerned was able to prove that he or she had not been seeking to evade justice (cf. ECtHR Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, para. 31) [116]

Even if Art. 603 CPP were applied as amended by the Act of 28 April 2014, is it likely that the complainant is not afforded the effective opportunity to defend himself. Pursuant to Art. 603 CPP, a hearing of evidence only takes place if the evidence has come into existence or was discovered after the first instance judgment (sec. 2), if the judge cannot decide on the basis of the case file (sec. 1), or if the judge considers hearing of evidence indispensable (sec. 3). The wording of Art. 603 CPP in the version on which the Higher Regional Court based its decision suggests that the court hearing the appeal has a wide margin of assessment (Beurteilungsspielraum) regarding the decision to have a new evidentiary hearing. It does, however, not impose an obligation on the appellate court to generally hear evidence upon request of the accused. In view of the unspecific wording of Art. 603 secs. 1 to 3 CPP, it is therefore unclear whether the obligation to establish the truth in criminal proceedings has been duly taken into account. [117]

The complainant's concerns regarding Italian appellate proceedings are corroborated by the fact that, in the past, several Higher Regional Courts refused to permit extraditions to Italy in cases in which the requested persons had been sentenced in their absence, arguing that under Italian law, there was, at the appeals stage, no new comprehensive judicial review of the decision on the merits (cf. OLG Frankfurt, 2 Ausl. 54/ 82, 2 September 1983, no. U 75, in: Eser/Lagodny/ Wilkitzki, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, Rechtsprechungssammlung 1949-1992, 2nd ed.1993, pp. 285 <288 and 289>; OLG Munich, OLG Ausl. 77/ 85, 26 June 1985, no. U 112, in: Eser/ Lagodny/Wilkitzki, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, Rechtsprechungssammlung 1949-1992, 2nd ed. 1993, pp. 412 <416>; KG Berlin, (4) Ausl. A. 277/85 (143/85), 24 March 1986, no. U 123, in: Eser/Lagodny/Wilkitzki, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, Rechtsprechungssammlung 1949-1992, 2nd ed. 1993, pp. 435 <438>; OLG Schleswig-Holstein, Order of 14 January 1994 - 1 Ausl 8/ 93 -, StV 1996, p. 102 <103>). These concerns are also shared in legal doctrine (cf. Schomburg/Hackner and Lagodny, both in: Schomburg/Lagodny/Gleß/Hackner, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, 5th ed. 2012, § 15 IRG para. 33e and § 73 IRG para. 86, respectively). [118]

bb) The Higher Regional Court was under an obligation to follow up on the substantiated and plausible objections made by the complainant. Its investigations have proven to be insufficient. [119]

The Higher Regional Court attempts to overcome the concerns raised by the complainant by arguing that a comprehensive review pertaining to the facts and the law of the conviction in absence in appellate proceedings in Italy where a new hearing of evidence is "in any case not impossible", is sufficient to safeguard the complainant's rights. However, this does not guarantee that the complainant, after becoming aware of the sentence rendered in his absence, is afforded the opportunity to defend himself effectively, in particular to present evidence exonerating him and have it extensively and exhaustively reviewed and, if necessary, taken into account. [120]

Nor is the argument very convincing that even if in Italian appellate proceedings, as a rule, there were no new hearing of evidence, such proceedings still constituted a legal remedy by which both the facts and the law are re-examined. It remains unclear how the issues of fact can be thoroughly examined without a hearing of evidence. Furthermore, the Higher Regional Court bases its view on a single source (Maiwald, Einführung in das italienische Strafrecht und Strafprozessrecht, 2009, p. 237). This source does not provide a detailed presentation of appeal proceedings under Italian criminal law. Rather, also this source points out that second-instance proceedings as a rule are decided based on the case file and no new hearing of evidence is conducted. How this fact can be reconciled with the fact that the issues of fact are [supposedly] re-examined is left uncommented. It does not follow from the source referred to that the merits of the decision rendered in absence will be thoroughly re-examined and that an unrestricted opportunity to newly hear evidence already heard in the firstinstance proceedings will be provided, as the Higher Regional Court assumes. [121]

Nor can the decision of the Higher Regional Court be based on the argument stated in its order of 27 November 2014 that in case of first-instance sentences rendered in absence there is no right to a retrial at a trial court, and that a new hearing before an appellate court is sufficient. The case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, which must also be taken into account for the interpretation of the fundamental rights of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 83, 119 <128>; 111, 307 <317>; 120, 180 <200 and 201>; 128, 326 <367 and 368>), clearly states that the court must re-examine the merits[229] of the charges against the convicted person after having heard that person (cf. ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, para. 29; Einhorn v. France, judgment of 16 October 2001 no. 71555/01, para. 33). Furthermore, the procedural resources of the Contracting State available in law and in practice must prove to be effective (cf. ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, judgment of 12 February 1985, no. 9024/80, para. 30; Medenica v. Switzerland, judgment of 14 June 2001, no. 20491/92, para. 55). As the Higher Regional Court correctly states, it follows from the judgment in the case Colozza v. Italy that in case of a judgment in absence rendered by a first-instance court there is no entitlement to a new first-instance trial. However, it cannot be inferred from the judgment that the person convicted in absentia who was not aware of the first-instance proceedings is, from the outset, not granted the right to a hearing of evidence. Rather, the European Court of Human Rights emphasises in its established case-law the right emanating from Art. 6 of the European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) to adduce evidence and to comment on all evidence or statements presented which are aimed at influencing the decision of the court (cf. ECtHR, Mantovanelli v. France, judgment of 18 March 1997, no. 21497/93, para. 33; Lietzow v. Germany, judgment of 13 February 2001, no. 24479/94, para. 44). [122]

229 Translator's note: The German-language version of this order emphasises that this refers to both the law and the facts.

In view of the above, in this respect, the opinion of the Higher Regional Court that it is sufficient if in Italian appellate proceedings on the merits the factual and legal issues of the conviction rendered in absence are thoroughly examined while a new hearing of evidence is "in any case not impossible", falls short of the relevant standards. [123]

cc) Considering the Higher Regional Court's obligation to investigate and establish the facts of the case, it must also be taken into account that in light of the objections by the European Court of Human Rights in the past and the large number of amendments to the Italian Codice Penale, for a German judge, it is difficult to have an overview of the legal situation in Italy. Nor did the statement of 7 October 2014 provided by the Florence Public Prosecutor General contribute substantially to clarify the situation. The Higher Regional Court requested the Italian judicial authorities to provide additional information on whether the complainant was in fact aware of the trial date and on his representation by counsel, or to give an assurance that, after his surrender, the complainant would, without reservation, be granted the right to a retrial in his presence in which the charge against him would be fully examined. Although he had not indicated in the European arrest warrant whether the complainant had personally appeared at the trial leading to his conviction, the Florence Public Prosecutor General did not provide additional information regarding the complainant's knowledge of the trial date and his representation by counsel. Nor did the Public Prosecutor General give an assurance that, after his surrender, the complainant would, without reservation, be granted the right to a retrial in his presence with full review of the charges against him. Despite the Higher Regional Court's specific request for information and assurance, the Public Prosecutor General merely indicated in abstract terms that, provided "the request were granted", a new trial against the convicted person would be held. The complainant was assured that his right of defence would be honoured without reservation; however, the extent of this right of defence remained unclear. [124]

The Editors

Jürgen Bröhmer is a Professor of Law at Murdoch University in Perth, Western Australia. He joined Murdoch University in 2012 as its Dean and served in this capacity until 2018. He came to Australia in 2006 to take up a professorial position at the University of New England, where he served as Head of the Law School from 2007 until his departure to Murdoch University. Professor Bröhmer's academic background is in Germany. He studied law at Mannheim University, did post-graduate work in European Union law at the Europa-Institute of Saarland University, where he remained at the Europa-Institute until moving to Australia in 2006, earning a doctoral degree (1995) and a post-doctoral habilitation (2002) on the way. His areas of expertise are German and comparative constitutional law, European Union and public international law. He has authored two and co-authored one monograph in these areas, edited several other books, and published widely in other outlets (details at www.jbroehmer.de). Professor Bröhmer is a fellow of the Australian Academy of Law.

Gisela Elsner is the Director of the Rule of Law Programme Asia of Konrad Adenauer Stiftung (KAS), based in Singapore. She has been working with KAS since 2006, in its Head Office in Berlin, directing the Department for Latin America and coordinating the worldwide Rule of Law work of KAS, after heading the Rule of Law Programme Latin America, at that time based in Montevideo, Uruguay, for five years. Before joining KAS, she worked as a Head of Programme at the Law Section of the Europa-Institut, Saarland University, in Saarbrücken/Germany. She received her German law degrees after studying at the Universities of Bonn, Hamburg and Saarbrücken, and also spent one year of her law studies in Toulouse, France.

Clauspeter Hill studied law at the University of Bonn, Germany and was in private practice for seven years as law firm partner in his home town. He has been working for KAS since 1996 in various capacities such as the representative in Vietnam, Thailand and as desk officer in the Asia Division of KAS Head Quarters. During his tenure as Director of the Rule of Law Programme Asia, he contributed papers on Constitutional Law in Vietnam as well as on the status of Human Rights protection in Southeast Asia. Besides, he edited a number of books on Constitutionalism and Administrative Law in this region. Currently, he serves as Deputy Head of the Departement for European and International Cooperation at KAS Head Quarters in Berlin, Germany.

Marc Spitzkatz studied law and was research assistant for public law at the University of Bonn, Germany. After the bar examination, he became a judge, first at Potsdam high court and then until present at Berlin high court. In between, from 2002 to 2006 he was posted in Beijing, China, where he trained Chinese judges and other lawyers. From 2011 to 2015, he served as director of the Rule of law Programme Asia for Konrad Adenauer Stiftung in Singapore. His publications include books on case studies as well as on decisions of the federal German constitutional court.
