The Book

The German Basic Law – the Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany – has been in force for 70 years now and it is the foundation of democratic statehood in Germany. The Basic Law's central core is the principle of the rule of law as expressed by the broader German concept of the "Rechtsstaatsprinzip". The protection of fundamental individual rights is one important cornerstone of this "Rechtsstaatsprinzip".

As guardian of the Basic Law, the Federal Constitutional Court has shaped these rights through interpretation by a large body of case law. Taking note of the growing interest among scholars not only in continental Europe but more so in the Common Law world, an extensive English translation of that jurisprudence is therefore very timely.

This volume features 68 cases in regard to the basic rights. A general introduction to the Basic Law and the doctrine of fundamental rights strives to provide some contextual background to enable readers to better understand the comprehensive jurisprudence. In addition, there are specific annotations to each decision or a set of decisions with background information on the individual case. The last chapter suggests additional material in English for further research.

The Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung (KAS)

KAS is a German political foundation closely associated with the Christian Democratic Union of Germany (CDU). At home as well as abroad, our civic education programmes aim at promoting liberty, peace and justice. We focus on consolidating democracy, on the unification of Europe and on international cooperation.

One of KAS' core pillars in the KAS Rule of Law Programme, which has a truly global dimension, with dedicated regional offices in Asia, Europe, Latin America, Sub-Saharan Africa and Middle East/Northern Africa. The Rule of Law Programme covers issues of law and legal policy, providing platforms for the exchange of knowledge and experience. This is aimed at fulfilling the foundation's long-term goal to contribute to the development and enhancement of an efficient legal system, based on the rule of law.

EDITORS' PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

The German Basic Law celebrates its 70th anniversary this year and we are extremely delighted to be able to present a new, updated edition of the "70 Years German Basic Law: The German Constitution and its Court".

The world is going through a phase of rapid change. Technological progress, climate change, globalization, the global refugee crises, the rise of China as well as the rise of social media and connected phenomena (from "fake news" to "echo chambers") are contributing to a situation where traditional, western-style liberal democracy and the rule of law are being profoundly challenged. Nationalism is on the rise, as are autocratic governments. The "illiberal democracy" has been touted even by western leaders.

The Basic Law itself came into effect 70 years ago in 1949 as a consequence and reaction to the complete breakdown of civilization and destruction that followed the coming to power of forces predicated on pursuing similar objectives and using similar language to spread hate and incite the population in a hate-trenched vision of "us against them". Similar language can be heard (again) today in many parts of the globe, spoken by religious zealots of all persuasions, white supremacists, and other racists, by nationalists and by those who attempt to create a poisonous brew from a mixture of all those traits.

The Basic Law has been and continues to be the legal document that defines the limits of what is acceptable in Germany and its civil society. That applies to the government in all its forms and the exercise of its powers, and it applies to those who are active politically in the widest sense of the word. The Federal Constitutional Court was established two years later in 1051. Its power of judicial review and a broad jurisdictional framework allow it to decide proceedings brought by individuals directly (constitutional complaints) as well as proceedings initiated by other constitutional institutions, federal states or groups of parliamentarians seeking to challenge the exercise of power by the state. Over the years it became the champion of the Basic Law, and through steady work the Court managed to accrue a level of authority matched by few judicial institutions around the globe. In the light of the challenges that lie before us - and the Basic Law - this authority will be necessary to defend the basic consensus that is reflected in the Basic Law and without which no piece of paper, however solemnly proclaimed, can do what it promises to do.

In its 2017 decision in response to the application to prohibit the far-right, extremist so-called National Democratic Party (see Chapter X in this collection), the Court reiterated its role as the institution which will ultimately have to find the right balance between defending freedom and allowing freedom to defend itself.

70 Years German Basic Law
The German Constitution and its Court

One challenge for constitutions, and as such for the Basic Law, lies in the conflict that they are supposed to reflect the foundational and enduring consensus of the political system they erect but that at the same time they must be able to react and adjust to new developments in society and demographic changes. Some of these developments can be very controversial and come about very quickly. The Federal Constitutional Court had its share of such change scenarios before it ranging from same-sex unions, to the rights of transgender people, to addressing in essence cultural conflicts arising from an increasing Muslim population in Germany bringing to the fore new conflicts between the wearing of the headscarf in schools and the religious neutrality necessary in compulsory public schools. Free speech is an issue that never goes away and rise of hate speech is one aspect in this regard.

In the future, the legitimacy of the judiciary as the guardian of constitutional principles will come under even greater pressure owing to the rapid growth of technology and new media. These innovations add a novel dimension to the never-ending paradox of change in constitutionalism. The technological advancements have the potential to test the nature and scope of our liberal, democratic political order and fundamental rights in multiple ways. The digital world that we rely on - the internet, social networks, artificial intelligence - creates opportunities for information collection, tracking movement, and instances to invade privacy. The Federal Constitutional Court has delivered about 20 decisions, which call into question practically all legislations that use surveillance technologies in policing, indicating the key role of the judiciary in maintaining the balance between security and individual freedom to privacy.

It is against this background that we are presenting this updated third edition of the "German Basic Law: The German Constitution and its Court". We hope that this edition can inform readers about the workings of the German Basic Law and its interpretation by the Federal Constitutional Court. We hope to be able to illustrate how important a functioning judiciary is in times of rapid social change. No legal document and no constitutional court can alone create a functioning state and a thriving civil society. But functioning institutions and a constitutional court able to persuade with the authority of its arguments are very important and for Germany have been and will continue to be crucial for its ability to master the challenges described above. All constitutions are rooted in their respective historical, social, economic, and political realities. It is rarely a good idea to merely copy from another constitution. However, knowledge about constitutional systems and approaches, i.e. comparative constitutional law, is a field of study that can help to find ways to deal with these challenges in a way that keeps our societies united and respects the autonomy of all members of society. We hope that this book can contribute in a small way to achieving this goal.

EDITORS' PREFACE TO THE FIRST AND SECOND EDITION

The German Basic Law has been in force for more than 60 years now and it is the foundation of democratic statehood in Germany. The Basic Law's central core is the principle of the rule of law as expressed by the broader German concept of the "Rechtsstaatsprinzip". The protection of fundamental individual rights is one important cornerstone of this "Rechtsstaatsprinzip".

The success story of the Basic Law can be traced to a number of factors. The institutional structure of Germany prescribed in the Basic Law and maintained after reunification has obviously proved its reliability. However, the fundamental rights guaranteed to individuals, some to all human beings, some to citizens of Germany only, and their interpretation and enforcement by the Federal Constitutional Court have been of utmost significance in turning the Basic Law from a technical instrument into an identity shaping national document.

The people in Germany have understood that the Basic Law is their constitution and that the fundamental rights protected there are their personal rights. They have also understood that this is not theoretical at all but that they can turn to the courts in general and to the Federal Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe in particular and have their rights effectively enforced against unjustified infringements by the legislative, executive or judicial branches of government.

The Constitutional Court has assumed its role as a true "guardian of the constitution" not only but especially in regard to fundamental rights protection and has earned the great respect of the German people. The Court was very successful at striking a fair balance between individual rights and the interests of society as a whole. Achieving this balance has never been an easy task and it has become more difficult after the attacks of 11 September 2001 in the USA and the renewed debate on the relationship between individual rights and liberties on the one hand and security on the other.

The procedural framework for the Federal Constitutional Court, most notably the constitutional complaints procedure, have allowed the Court to develop a specific, consistent and, after 60 years, a reliable dogmatic approach to fundamental rights interpretation and application. This has contributed to a remarkable interest in German constitutional theory and jurisprudence worldwide.

Countries in Latin America, Eastern Europe and Asia were keen to understand this approach in greater depth when they converted to real democracies based on the rule of law. In some cases Germany shares similar legal traditions and, above all, a common value system and legal ideals with those regions, for example the fact that the German legal system adheres to the civil law tradition of codified law.

But the German approach to constitutional law and fundamental rights protection is also interesting for common law countries. A written constitution constitutes codified law and requires statutory interpretation. But more importantly nowhere are the common and civil law legal traditions closer together than in the area of constitutional law where the decisions of the constitutional courts serve as precedents if not de jure than at least de facto. In the case of the German Constitutional Court the holding of a judgment can have the force of law and the Court can therefore assume a law making function quite similar to that of the highest courts in common law countries.

It is therefore not surprising that German constitutional law has become a field of growing interest to legal scholars, practitioners and officials involved in state reforms around the world. The work of American scholars, Donald P. Kommers and Russell Miller, "The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany" (3rd ed. to be published: Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2011) is one prime example and we would like to recommend it to anyone interested in these matters. Most of the cases of our collection are discussed in their volume.

Taking note of this increasing demand the Rule of Law Programme of the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung in Singapore took the initiative for this project of aiming to make some core decisions of the German Constitutional Court accessible to judges, lawyers and scholars who do not speak German and to put these judgments into an explanatory context. One of the important objectives promoted by the Asia branch of the Rule of Law programme is the concept of constitutionalism and the support for mechanisms to review the constitutionality of actions of other state organs. Safeguarding citizens' rights is a core element of such systems and therefore also of great significance for our programme.

This volume focuses on the case law of the German Constitutional Court in regard to the basic rights that are of utmost importance in German constitutional law. The general introduction to Basic Law and the doctrine of fundamental rights strives to provide some contextual background to enable readers to better understand the comprehensive jurisprudence. In addition, there are specific annotations to each decision or a set of decisions with background information on the individual case. We have also tried to suggest additional material in English where we could find useful and helpful sources.

Editors' Preface to the First and Second Edition

In selecting the decisions for this volume we tried to provide the most relevant cases. At times this means that some concepts are dealt with repeatedly. Usually, the Federal Constitutional Court has elaborated on the one or another aspect in greater detail and shaped the law more precisely case by case. The selection has also been guided, and limited to a certain extent, by the necessity to keep the book at a manageable size. We wanted to provide more than just head notes or short extracts from each decision. We are convinced that a comprehensive translation is more useful for readers who might not have broader knowledge of German constitutional law. Therefore, the facts of each case were summarized and only preliminary issues - such as the admissibility of a case - have been left out. If deemed important those aspects have been mentioned in the short explanations to each case or set of cases.

All cases are cited in the original German way "BVerfGE" as the court itself uses to refer to its decisions. This acronym literally means 'Federal Constitutional Court Decisions' followed by volume and page number where they were published in the official collection of cases of the Federal Constitutional Court (e.g. BVerfGE 45 [volume of official collection], 187 [page where case begins]).

Most of the decisions have been translated by Dr. Donna Elliott, LL.M. who is an Australian lawyer who has worked in Germany for many years and who has frequently been engaged as translator for the Federal Constitutional Court as well as the Federal Government. A number of translations were provided by courtesy of the Constitutional Court itself and can also be found on the Court's website (www.bverfg.de).

We are also very grateful to Donald P. Kommers, Sir Basil Markesinis, Robert E. Jonas and John D. Gorby for their generous permission to reprint decisions that were translated and published under their copyright in earlier publications. Last but not least we thank the Nomos Verlag for its generosity to use translations previously published in ['Decisions of the Bundesverfassungsgericht - Federal Constitutional Court - Federal Republic of Germany] (Vol. 1, 2 and 4, Baden-Baden 1993 - 2007)'. Whenever translations of other authors or publishers were used it has been indicated in detail.

A special word of thanks goes to Ms. Miriam Söhne who is the research associate at the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung office in Singapore. She translated two decisions on her own and amended translations of others where head notes or other important sections had not been translated before. Miriam and Ms. Jenny Chan, the executive assistant, were also extremely helpful in proof reading and compiling the whole manuscript. Mr. Martin Matasi, lawyer from Kenya and PhD-student at the University of New England, School of Law, has also helped in proofreading the introduction and the decision annotations and has also helped in pointing out improvements when the original draft became "too German" and therefore harder to understand for non-German lawyers.

The German Constitution and its Court

'Democracy is more than a parliamentary form of government. It is a philosophy of life (Weltanschauung) based on the appreciation of the dignity, the value and the inalienable rights of each individual human being. A true democracy must respect these rights and the value of each and every human being in all respects of political, economic and cultural life.' Those words by Konrad Adenauer[1] who was the President of the Parliamentary Council in 1948 - 1949 inspired all the members of that Council when drafting the Basic Law and have become the guiding principle of constitutional jurisprudence in Germany.

The editors hope that this book will contribute to a deeper understanding of German legal thinking in this respect. As always, any errors and causes for misunderstanding are to be blamed on us.

We dedicate this book to the many who have contributed to the success of the German Basic Law in many ways small and large and who have helped to shape a Germany that stands for the ideas of democracy, freedom and human rights.

Armidale / Singapore, October 2010 J. Bröhmer / C. Hill

1 Original German citation: "Demokratie ist mehr als eine parlamentarische Regierungsform, sie ist eine Weltanschauung, die wurzelt in der Auffassung von der Würde, dem Wert und den unveräußerlichen Rechten eines jeden einzelnen Menschen. Eine echte Demokratie muß diese unveräußerlichen Rechte und den Wert eines jeden einzelnen Menschen achten im staatlichen, im wirtschaftlichen und kulturellen Leben."

FOREWORD BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE GERMAN CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

Over the past decades, the interest in the jurisprudence of the German Federal Constitutional Court has increased considerably among academics and political actors from all over the world. This holds true not only for countries characterized by Continental-European law, but also for countries with an Anglo-American legal tradition. Independently hereof, in the course of reforms towards the rule of law in many developing countries and countries in transition - at least in those where English is a working language - a demand for translations of decisions of the German Federal Constitutional Court has arisen. Hence, I strongly appreciated the initiative of the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung to publish an English edition of landmark decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, when it was first brought to my attention. The success of the first two editions is reflected by the high demand for a new edition. Currently, this English edition stands alongside twelve other translated volumes in Spanish, Portuguese as well as various languages of South-Eastern Europe to name a few. The translation focuses on decisions pertaining to fundamental rights, which constitute an essential field of the Federal Constitutional Court's jurisprudence, and delineate the boundaries between the individual sphere and society and state. Simultaneously, fundamental rights play an important role for the participation of the citizen - as an individual or in a collective - in the democratic decision-making process. The Basic Law, whose 70th anniversary we celebrate this year, is a "living instrument" and this is mirrored in the selected decisions.

Constitutional law is influenced by the jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court more than any other field of German law. The text of the German Basic Law organizes the structure of the state as well as life in community and for this reason is phrased so as to cover an endless variety of cases. Its abstract norms are frequently substantiated by jurisprudence in case-related interpretation.

Another distinctive feature of the Federal Constitutional Court's jurisprudence is the range of subject matters of proceedings. Not only measures taken by the executive and decisions made by trial and appellate courts, but also statutes which are enacted in Parliament and disputes between government bodies, are subject to constitutional review. This circumstance inevitably establishes a certain proximity to the political arena and raises the question of the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court under the principle of the separation of powers. It should not be disregarded that the Federal Constitutional Court lays out the basic conditions within which the political leaders of the executive and the legislative operate. Seen in the context of its capacity to constitutionally affirm or reject acts of Parliament, one can argue that "the Federal Constitutional Court participates in government". This very strong connection between the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court and the other branches of government within the system of the separation of powers has been subject to frequent criticism. Nevertheless, the Federal Constitutional Court is a "real" court. It cannot act on its own initiative but only when called upon to do so. The basic legal principle summed up in the German adage "no plaintiff, no judge" also applies here. Furthermore, the Federal Constitutional Court decides only within the framework of statutorily predetermined procedures. Above all, the criteria the Federal Constitutional Court applies are always and exclusively found in current constitutional law, not in political, social or economic considerations of expediency. Constitutional norms in particular can often be relatively open and allow certain room for interpretation. The basic principle that constitutional jurisprudence is not political composition but legal actualization following juridical methods applies, despite a certain ambiguity and the difficulty of drawing a crystal-clear line in particular cases.

The function of the Federal Constitutional Court extends beyond the judicial review of statutes and the settlements of conflicts between the highest constitutional organs. In practice, the review of executive acts and court decisions in individual cases is particularly essential. This has substantive as well as procedural reasons. On the one hand, the fundamental rights of the Basic Law are not only guidelines for the legislative body, but apply directly to every administrative act and to every court decision. They basically constitute defensive rights against state interference. On the other hand, they also embody an objective system of values that must be considered in judicial interpretation and application of the law. Even in the context of the settlement of disputes between citizens, the constitutional values must be observed by the civil courts. For example, in custody disputes under family law, parental rights and the rights of protection for children (Art. 6 of the Basic Law) must be taken into account. This very important aspect of the effects of fundamental rights is founded in the landmark "Lüth-decision" (BVerfGE 7, 198 - in this collection). The practical task of the Federal Constitutional Court is set out by this fundamental idea in a significant way. It provides citizens the opportunity to defend against court decisions violating their fundamental rights by way of constitutional complaint (Verfassungsbeschwerde, see Art. 93(1) no. 4a of the Basic Law). Thus, the Federal Constitutional Court is not purely a "court for state matters" (Staatsgerichtshof).

Accordingly, constitutional complaints challenging trial and appellate court decisions form a large part of the Federal Constitutional Court's caseload. In addition to constitutional complaints, the Federal Constitutional Court has a variety of further competences (see § 13 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act in conjunction with Art. 93(1) of the Basic Law). In abstract judicial review proceedings (abstrakte Normenkontrolle, Art. 93(1) no. 2 of the Basic Law), the Court examines - upon application by either the federal or a Land (state) government or one third of the members of the Bundestag - federal and Land statutes with regard to their compatibility with the Basic Law. Furthermore, the Federal Constitutional Court decides disputes between constitutional organs (Organstreitverfahren, Art. 93(1) no. 1 of the Basic Law). Finally, specific judicial review (konkrete Normenkontrolle) can be requested of the Federal Constitutional Court by any trial or appellate court that questions the constitutionality of any applicable legislation (see Art. 100(1) of the Basic Law).

Foreword by the President of the German Constitutional Court

The Federal Constitutional Court is composed of two Senates (Senate), each consisting of eight Constitutional Court Justices. The distribution of cases between the two Senates depends on the type and subject matter of the proceedings. In case of diverging legal interpretations between the Senates, decisions are made by the Justices of both Senates together in the Plenary. Not all decisions require the involvement of all eight Justices of a Senate. Each Senate forms three Chambers (Kammern), which can decide a large number of constitutional complaints themselves as long as the central legal questions at issue have already been decided by a Senate.

Seventy years after its foundation, the Federal Republic of Germany is now embedded in an even larger number of agreements under international law, notably the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), the enforcement of which is incumbent upon the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, and the membership in the European Union, the law of which is watched over by the Court of Justice of the European Union. In the area of protection of fundamental rights, the Federal Constitutional Court and the Court of Justice of the European Union operate in separate systems. Thus, secondary legal acts of European law are scrutinized exclusively by European courts on the scale of European fundamental rights as long as the fundamental rights standard of European law is in essence equal to the standard of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 73, 339 - included in this collection). In contrast, an integrating approach applies with regard to the protection of the European Convention of Human Rights: the values expressed in the ECHR are to be incorporated into the interpretation of German law - including constitutional law (see BVerfGE 111, 307 - included in this collection). Both in applying European law and incorporating the human rights enshrined in the European Convention, the Federal Constitutional Court seeks a close dialogue with its relevant counterparts in Strasbourg and Luxembourg. That this dialogue also leaves room for critical tones is illustrated by more recent decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 140, 317 and BVerfGE 148, 296 - both included in this collection).

An enormous amount of constitutional findings concerning a great variety of questions has been developed in the described organizational framework between the state and the courts. These are the fruit of intensive arguments and not least the result of the courageous pursuit of justice by the parties to the proceedings. This selection provides a good opportunity to get to know the spectrum covered by case-law, to form an opinion based on the original argumentation of the Federal Constitutional Court and to explore potential transferability to constitutional constellations and issues in other countries.

To that end, I wish this new edition a great success!

CURRENT TEXT OF THE GERMAN BASIC LAW

Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany

Last amended on 28 March 2019

Preamble

Conscious of their responsibility before God and man, Inspired by the determination to promote world peace as an equal partner in a united Europe, the German people, in the exercise of their constituent power, have adopted this Basic Law. Germans in the Länder of Baden-Württemberg, Bavaria, Berlin, Brandenburg, Bremen, Hamburg, Hesse, Lower Saxony, Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, North Rhine-Westphalia, Rhineland-Palatinate, Saarland, Saxony, Saxony-Anhalt, Schleswig-Holstein and Thuringia have achieved the unity and freedom of Germany in free self-determination. This Basic Law thus applies to the entire German people.

I. Basic Rights

Article 1 [Human dignity – Human rights – Legally binding force of basic rights]

(1) Human dignity shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority.

(2) The German people therefore acknowledge inviolable and inalienable human rights as the basis of every community, of peace and of justice in the world.

(3) The following basic rights shall bind the legislature, the executive and the judiciary as directly applicable law.

Article 2 [Personal freedoms]

(1) Every person shall have the right to free development of his personality insofar as he does not violate the rights of others or offend against the constitutional order or the moral law.

(2) Every person shall have the right to life and physical integrity. Freedom of the person shall be inviolable. These rights may be interfered with only pursuant to a law.

Article 3 [Equality before the law]

(1) All persons shall be equal before the law.

(2) Men and women shall have equal rights. The state shall promote the actual implementation of equal rights for women and men and take steps to eliminate disadvantages that now exist.

(3) No person shall be favoured or disfavoured because of sex, parentage, race, language, homeland and origin, faith or religious or political opinions. No person shall be disfavoured because of disability.

Article 4 [Freedom of faith and conscience]

(1) Freedom of faith and of conscience and freedom to profess a religious or philosophical creed shall be inviolable. I. Basic Rights

(2) The undisturbed practice of religion shall be guaranteed.

(3) No person shall be compelled against his conscience to render military service involving the use of arms. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 5 [Freedom of expression, arts and sciences]

(1) Every person shall have the right freely to express and disseminate his opinions in speech, writing and pictures and to inform himself without hindrance from generally accessible sources. Freedom of the press and freedom of reporting by means of broadcasts and films shall be guaranteed. There shall be no censorship.

(2) These rights shall find their limits in the provisions of general laws, in provisions for the protection of young persons and in the right to personal honour.

(3) Arts and sciences, research and teaching shall be free. The freedom of teaching shall not release any person from allegiance to the constitution.

Article 6 [Marriage – Family – Children]

(1) Marriage and the family shall enjoy the special protection of the state.

(2) The care and upbringing of children is the natural right of parents and a duty primarily incumbent upon them. The state shall watch over them in the performance of this duty.

(3) Children may be separated from their families against the will of their parents or guardians only pursuant to a law and only if the parents or guardians fail in their duties or the children are otherwise in danger of serious neglect.

(4) Every mother shall be entitled to the protection and care of the community.

(5) Children born outside of marriage shall be provided by legislation with the same opportunities for physical and mental development and for their position in society as are enjoyed by those born within marriage.

Article 7 [School system]

(1) The entire school system shall be under the supervision of the state.

(2) Parents and guardians shall have the right to decide whether children shall receive religious instruction.

(3) Religious instruction shall form part of the regular curriculum in state schools, with the exception of non-denominational schools. Without prejudice to the state's right of supervision, religious instruction shall be given in accordance with the tenets of the religious community concerned. Teachers may not be obliged against their will to give religious instruction.

(4) The right to establish private schools shall be guaranteed. Private schools that serve as alternatives to state schools shall require the approval of the state and shall be subject to the laws of the Länder. Such approval shall be given when private schools are not inferior to the state schools in terms of their educational aims, their facilities or the professional training of their teaching staff and when segregation of pupils according to the means of their parents will not be encouraged thereby. Approval shall be withheld if the economic and legal position of the teaching staff is not adequately assured.

(5) A private elementary school shall be approved only if the education authority finds that it serves a special educational interest or if, on the application of parents or guardians, it is to be established as a denominational or interdenominational school or as a school based on a particular philosophy and no state elementary school of that type exists in the municipality.

(6) Preparatory schools shall remain abolished.

Article 8 [Freedom of assembly]

(1) All Germans shall have the right to assemble peacefully and unarmed without prior notification or permission.

(2) In the case of outdoor assemblies, this right may be restricted by or pursuant to a law.

Article 9 [Freedom of association]

(1) All Germans shall have the right to form societies and other associations.

(2) Associations whose aims or activities contravene the criminal laws or that are directed against the constitutional order or the concept of international understanding shall be prohibited.

(3) The right to form associations to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions shall be guaranteed to every individual and to every occupation or profession. Agreements that restrict or seek to impair this right shall be null and void; measures directed to this end shall be unlawful. Measures taken pursuant to Article 12a, to paragraphs (2) and (3) of Article 35, to paragraph (4) of Article 87a or to Article 91 may not be directed against industrial disputes engaged in by associations within the meaning of the first sentence of this paragraph in order to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions.

Article 10 [Privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications]

(1) The privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications shall be inviolable.

(2) Restrictions may be ordered only pursuant to a law. If the restriction serves to protect the free democratic basic order or the existence or security of the Federation or of a Land, the law may provide that the person affected shall not be informed of the restriction and that recourse to the courts shall be replaced by a review of the case by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the legislature.

Article 11 [Freedom of movement]

(1) All Germans shall have the right to move freely throughout the federal territory.

(2) This right may be restricted only by or pursuant to a law, and only in cases in which the absence of adequate means of support would result in a particular burden for the community, or in which such restriction is necessary to avert an imminent danger to the existence or the free democratic basic order of the Federation or of a Land, to combat the danger of an epidemic, to respond to a grave accident or natural disaster, to protect young persons from serious neglect or to prevent crime.

Article 12 [Occupational freedom]

(1) All Germans shall have the right freely to choose their occupation or profession, their place of work and their place of training. The practice of an occupation or profession may be regulated by or pursuant to a law.

(2) No person may be required to perform work of a particular kind except within the framework of a traditional duty of community service that applies generally and equally to all.

(3) Forced labour may be imposed only on persons deprived of their liberty by the judgment of a court.

Article 12a [Compulsory military and alternative civilian service]

(1) Men who have attained the age of eighteen may be required to serve in the Armed Forces, in the Federal Border Police, or in a civil defence organisation.

(2) Any person who, on grounds of conscience, refuses to render military service involving the use of arms may be required to perform alternative service. The duration of alternative service shall not exceed that of military service. Details shall be regulated by a law, which shall not interfere with the freedom to make a decision in accordance with the dictates of conscience and which shall also provide for the possibility of alternative service not connected with units of the Armed Forces or of the Federal Border Police.

(3) Persons liable to compulsory military service who are not called upon to render service pursuant to paragraph (1) or (2) of this Article may, when a state of defence is in effect, be assigned by or pursuant to a law to employment involving civilian services for defence purposes, including the protection of the civilian population; they may be assigned to public employment only for the purpose of discharging police functions or such other sovereign functions of public administration as can be discharged only by persons employed in the public service. The employment contemplated by the first sentence of this paragraph may include services within the Armed Forces, in the provision of military supplies or with public administrative authorities; assignments to employment connected with supplying and servicing the civilian population shall be permissible only to meet their basic requirements or to guarantee their safety.

(4) If, during a state of defence, the need for civilian services in the civilian health system or in stationary military hospitals cannot be met on a voluntary basis, women between the age of eighteen and fifty-five may be called upon to render such services by or pursuant to a law. Under no circumstances may they be required to render service involving the use of arms.

(5) Prior to the existence of a state of defence, assignments under paragraph (3) of this Article may be made only if the requirements of paragraph (1) of Article 80a are met. In preparation for the provision of services under paragraph (3) of this Article that demand special knowledge or skills, participation in training courses may be required by or pursuant to a law. In this case the first sentence of this paragraph shall not apply.

(6) If, during a state of defence, the need for workers in the areas specified in the second sentence of paragraph (3) of this Article cannot be met on a voluntary basis, the right of German citizens to abandon their occupation or place of employment may be restricted by or pursuant to a law in order to meet this need. Prior to the existence of a state of defence, the first sentence of paragraph (5) of this Article shall apply, mutatis mutandis.

Article 13 [Inviolability of the home]

(1) The home is inviolable.

(2) Searches may be authorised only by a judge or, when time is of the essence, by other authorities designated by the laws and may be carried out only in the manner therein prescribed.

(3) If particular facts justify the suspicion that any person has committed an especially serious crime specifically defined by a law, technical means of acoustical surveillance of any home in which the suspect is supposedly staying may be employed pursuant to judicial order for the purpose of prosecuting the offence, provided that alternative methods of investigating the matter would be disproportionately difficult or unproductive. The authorisation shall be for a limited time. The order shall be issued by a panel composed of three judges. When time is of the essence, it may also be issued by a single judge.

(4) To avert acute dangers to public safety, especially dangers to life or to the public, technical means of surveillance of the home may be employed only pursuant to judicial order. When time is of the essence, such measures may also be ordered by other authorities designated by a law; a judicial decision shall subsequently be obtained without delay.

(5) If technical means are contemplated solely for the protection of persons officially deployed in a home, the measure may be ordered by an authority designated by a law. The information thereby obtained may be otherwise used only for purposes of criminal prosecution or to avert danger and only if the legality of the measure has been previously determined by a judge; when time is of the essence, a judicial decision shall subsequently be obtained without delay.

(6) The Federal Government shall report to the Bundestag annually as to the employment of technical means pursuant to paragraph (3) and, within the jurisdiction of the Federation, pursuant to paragraph (4) and, insofar as judicial approval is required, pursuant to paragraph (5) of this Article. A panel elected by the Bundestag shall exercise parliamentary oversight on the basis of this report. A comparable parliamentary oversight shall be afforded by the Länder.

(7) Interferences and restrictions shall otherwise only be permissible to avert a danger to the public or to the life of an individual or, pursuant to a law, to confront an acute danger to public safety and order, in particular to relieve an accommodation shortage, to combat the danger of an epidemic or to protect young persons at risk.

Article 14 [Property – Inheritance – Expropriation]

(1) Property and the right of inheritance shall be guaranteed. Their content and limits shall be defined by the laws.

(2) Property entails obligations. Its use shall also serve the public good.

(3) Expropriation shall only be permissible for the public good. It may only be ordered by or pursuant to a law that determines the nature and extent of compensation. Such compensation shall be determined by establishing an equitable balance between the public interest and the interests of those affected. In case of dispute concerning the amount of compensation, recourse may be had to the ordinary courts.

Article 15 [Nationalisation]

Land, natural resources and means of production may, for the purpose of nationalisation, be transferred to public ownership or other forms of public enterprise by a law that determines the nature and extent of compensation. With respect to such compensation the third and fourth sentences of paragraph (3) of Article 14 shall apply, mutatis mutandis.

Article 16 [Citizenship – Extradition]

(1) No German may be deprived of his citizenship. Loss of citizenship may occur only pursuant to a law and, if it occurs against the will of the person affected, only if he does not become stateless as a result.

(2) No German may be extradited to a foreign country. The law may provide otherwise for extraditions to a member state of the European Union or to an international court, provided that the rule of law is observed.

Article 16a [Right of asylum]

(1) Persons persecuted on political grounds shall have the right of asylum.

(2) Paragraph (1) of this Article may not be invoked by a person who enters the federal territory from a member state of the European Communities or from another third state in which application of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms is assured. The states outside the European Communities to which the conditions referred to in the first sentence of this paragraph apply shall be specified by a law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. In the cases specified in the first sentence of this paragraph, measures to terminate an applicant's stay may be implemented without regard to any legal challenge that may have been instituted against them.

(3) By a law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat, states may be specified in which, on the basis of their laws, enforcement practices and general political conditions, it can be safely concluded that neither political persecution nor inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment exists. It shall be presumed that a foreigner from such a state is not persecuted, unless he presents evidence justifying the conclusion that, contrary to this presumption, he is persecuted on political grounds.

(4) In the cases specified by paragraph (3) of this Article and in other cases that are plainly unfounded or considered to be plainly unfounded, the implementation of measures to terminate an applicant's stay may be suspended by a court only if serious doubts exist as to their legality; the scope of review may be limited, and tardy objections may be disregarded. Details shall be determined by a law.

(5) Paragraphs (1) to (4) of this Article shall not preclude the conclusion of international agreements of member states of the European Communities with each other or with those third states which, with due regard for the obligations arising from the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, whose enforcement must be assured in the contracting states, adopt rules conferring jurisdiction to decide on applications for asylum, including the reciprocal recognition of asylum decisions.

Article 17 [Right of petition]

Every person shall have the right individually or jointly with others to address written requests or complaints to competent authorities and to the legislature.

Article 17a [Restriction of basic rights in specific instances]

(1) Laws regarding military and alternative service may provide that the basic right of members of the Armed Forces and of alternative service freely to express and disseminate their opinions in speech, writing and pictures (first clause of the first sentence of paragraph (1) of Article 5), the basic right of assembly (Article 8) and the right of petition (Article 17), insofar as it permits the submission of requests or complaints jointly with others, be restricted during their period of military or alternative service.

(2) Laws regarding defence, including protection of the civilian population, may provide for restriction of the basic rights of freedom of movement (Article 11) and inviolability of the home (Article 13).

Article 18 [Forfeiture of basic rights]

Whoever abuses the freedom of expression, in particular the freedom of the press (paragraph (1) of Article 5), the freedom of teaching (paragraph (3) of Article 5), the freedom of assembly (Article 8), the freedom of association (Article 9), the privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications (Article 10), the rights of property (Article 14) or the right of asylum (Article 16a) in order to combat the free democratic basic order shall forfeit these basic rights. This forfeiture and its extent shall be declared by the Federal Constitutional Court.

Article 19 [Restriction of basic rights – Legal remedies]

(1) Insofar as, under this Basic Law, a basic right may be restricted by or pursuant to a law, such law must apply generally and not merely to a single case. In addition, the law must specify the basic right affected and the Article in which it appears.

(2) In no case may the essence of a basic right be affected.

(3) The basic rights shall also apply to domestic legal persons to the extent that the nature of such rights permits.

(4) Should any person's rights be violated by public authority, he may have recourse to the courts. If no other jurisdiction has been established, recourse shall be to the ordinary courts. The second sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 10 shall not be affected by this paragraph.

II. The Federation and the Länder

Article 20 [Constitutional principles – Right of resistance]

(1) The Federal Republic of Germany is a democratic and social federal state.

(2) All state authority is derived from the people. It shall be exercised by the people through elections and other votes and through specific legislative, executive and judicial bodies.

(3) The legislature shall be bound by the constitutional order, the executive and the judiciary by law and justice.

(4) All Germans shall have the right to resist any person seeking to abolish this constitutional order if no other remedy is available.

Article 20a [Protection of the natural foundations of life and animals]

Mindful also of its responsibility towards future generations, the state shall protect the natural foundations of life and animals by legislation and, in accordance with law and justice, by executive and judicial action, all within the framework of the constitutional order.

Article 21 [Political parties]

(1) Political parties shall participate in the formation of the political will of the people. They may be freely established. Their internal organisation must conform to democratic principles. They must publicly account for their assets and for the sources and use of their funds.

(2) Parties that, by reason of their aims or the behaviour of their adherents, seek to undermine or abolish the free democratic basic order or to endanger the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany shall be unconstitutional. The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule on the question of unconstitutionality.

(3) Parties that, by reason of their aims or the behaviour of their adherents, seek to undermine or abolish the free II. The Federation and the Länder 28 democratic basic order or to endanger the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany shall be excluded from state financing. If such exclusion is determined, any favourable fiscal treatment of these parties and of payments made to those parties shall cease.

(4) The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule on the question of unconstitutionality within the meaning of paragraph (2) of this Article and on exclusion from state financing within the meaning of paragraph (3).

(5) Details shall be regulated by federal laws.

Article 22 [Federal capital – Federal flag]

(1) Berlin is the capital of the Federal Republic of Germany. The Federation shall be responsible for representing the nation as a whole in the capital. Details shall be regulated by federal law.

(2) The federal flag shall be black, red and gold.

Article 23 [European Union – Protection of basic rights – Principle of subsidiarity]

(1) With a view to establishing a united Europe, the Federal Republic of Germany shall participate in the development of the European Union that is committed to democratic, social and federal principles, to the rule of law and to the principle of subsidiarity and that guarantees a level of protection of basic rights essentially comparable to that afforded by this Basic Law. To this end the Federation may transfer sovereign powers by a law with the consent of the Bundesrat. The establishment of the European Union, as well as changes in its treaty foundations and comparable regulations that amend or supplement this Basic Law or make such amendments or supplements possible, shall be subject to paragraphs (2) and (3) of Article 79.

(1a) The Bundestag and the Bundesrat shall have the right to bring an action before the Court of Justice of the European II. The Federation and the Länder 29 Union to challenge a legislative act of the European Union for infringing the principle of subsidiarity. The Bundestag is obliged to initiate such an action at the request of one fourth of its Members. By a statute requiring the consent of the Bundesrat, exceptions to the first sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 42 and the first sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 52 may be authorised for the exercise of the rights granted to the Bundestag and the Bundesrat under the contractual foundations of the European Union.

(2) The Bundestag and, through the Bundesrat, the Länder shall participate in matters concerning the European Union. The Federal Government shall notify the Bundestag of such matters comprehensively and as early as possible.

(3) Before participating in legislative acts of the European Union, the Federal Government shall provide the Bundestag with an opportunity to state its position. The Federal Government shall take the position of the Bundestag into account during the negotiations. Details shall be regulated by a law.

(4) The Bundesrat shall participate in the decision-making process of the Federation insofar as it would have been competent to do so in a comparable domestic matter or insofar as the subject falls within the domestic competence of the Länder.

(5) Insofar as, in an area within the exclusive competence of the Federation, interests of the Länder are affected and in other matters, insofar as the Federation has legislative power, the Federal Government shall take the position of the Bundesrat into account. To the extent that the legislative powers of the Länder, the structure of Land authorities, or Land administrative procedures are primarily affected, the position of the Bundesrat shall receive prime consideration in the formation of the political will of the Federation; this process shall be consistent with the responsibility of the Federation for the nation as a whole. In matters that may result in increased expenditures or reduced revenues for the Federation, the consent of the Federal Government shall be required.

(6) When legislative powers exclusive to the Länder concerning matters of school education, culture or broadcasting are primarily affected, the exercise of the rights belonging to the Federal Republic of Germany as a member state of the European Union shall be delegated by the Federation to a representative of the Länder designated by the Bundesrat. These rights shall be exercised with the participation of, and in coordination with, the Federal Government; their exercise shall be consistent with the responsibility of the Federation for the nation as a whole.

(7) Details regarding paragraphs (4) to (6) of this Article shall be regulated by a law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 24 [Transfer of sovereign powers – System of collective security]

(1) The Federation may, by a law, transfer sovereign powers to international organisations.

(1a) Insofar as the Länder are competent to exercise state powers and to perform state functions, they may, with the consent of the Federal Government, transfer sovereign powers to transfrontier institutions in neighbouring regions.

(2) With a view to maintaining peace, the Federation may enter into a system of mutual collective security; in doing so it shall consent to such limitations upon its sovereign powers as will bring about and secure a lasting peace in Europe and among the nations of the world.

(3) For the settlement of disputes between states, the Federation shall accede to agreements providing for general, comprehensive and compulsory international arbitration.

Article 25 [Primacy of international law]

The general rules of international law shall be an integral part of federal law. They shall take precedence over the laws and directly create rights and duties for the inhabitants of the federal territory.

Article 26 [Securing international peace]

(1) Acts tending to and undertaken with intent to disturb the peaceful relations between nations, especially to prepare for a war of aggression, shall be unconstitutional. They shall be criminalised.

(2) Weapons designed for warfare may be manufactured, transported or marketed only with the permission of the Federal Government. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 27 [Merchant fleet]

All German merchant vessels shall constitute a unitary merchant fleet.

Article 28 [Land constitutions – Autonomy of municipalities]

(1) The constitutional order in the Länder must conform to the principles of a republican, democratic and social state governed by the rule of law within the meaning of this Basic Law. In each Land, county and municipality the people shall be represented by a body chosen in general, direct, free, equal and secret elections. In county and municipal elections, persons who possess the citizenship of any member state of the European Community are also eligible to vote and to be elected in accordance with European Community law. In municipalities a local assembly may take the place of an elected body.

(2) Municipalities must be guaranteed the right to regulate all local affairs on their own responsibility within the limits prescribed by the laws. Within the limits of their functions designated by a law, associations of municipalities shall also have the right of self-government in accordance with the laws. The guarantee of self-government shall extend to the bases of financial autonomy; these bases shall include the right of municipalities to a source of tax revenues based upon economic ability and the right to establish the rates at which these sources shall be taxed.

(3) The Federation shall guarantee that the constitutional order of the Länder conforms to the basic rights and to the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article.

Article 29 [New delimitation of the federal territory]

(1) The division of the federal territory into Länder may be revised to ensure that each Land be of a size and capacity to perform its functions effectively. Due regard shall be given in this connection to regional, historical and cultural ties, economic efficiency and the requirements of local and regional planning.

(2) Revisions of the existing division into Länder shall be effected by a federal law, which must be confirmed by referendum. The affected Länder shall be afforded an opportunity to be heard.

(3) The referendum shall be held in the Länder from whose territories or parts of territories a new Land or a Land with redefined boundaries is to be established (affected Länder). The question to be voted on is whether the affected Länder are to remain as they are or whether the new Land or the Land with redefined boundaries should be established. The proposal to establish a new Land or a Land with redefined boundaries shall take effect if the change is approved by a majority in the future territory of such Land and by a majority in the territories or parts of territories of an affected Land taken together whose affiliation with a Land is to be changed in the same way. The proposal shall not take effect if, within the territory of any of the affected Länder, a majority reject the change; however, such rejection shall be of no consequence if in any part of the territory whose affiliation with the affected Land is to be changed a two-thirds majority approves the change, unless it is rejected by a two-thirds majority in the territory of the affected Land as a whole.

(4) If, in any clearly defined and contiguous residential and economic area located in two or more Länder and having at least one million inhabitants, one tenth of those entitled to vote in Bundestag elections petition for the inclusion of that area in a single Land, a federal law shall specify within two years whether the change shall be made in accordance with paragraph (2) of this Article or that an advisory referendum shall be held in the affected Länder.

(5) The advisory referendum shall establish whether the changes the law proposes meet with the voters' approval. The law may put forward not more than two distinct proposals for consideration by the voters. If a majority approves a proposed change of the existing division into Länder, a federal law shall specify within two years whether the change shall be made in accordance with paragraph (2) of this Article. If a proposal is approved in accordance with the third and fourth sentences of paragraph (3) of this Article, a federal law providing for establishment of the proposed Land shall be enacted within two years after the advisory ballot, and confirmation by referendum shall no longer be required.

(6) A majority in a referendum or in an advisory referendum shall consist of a majority of the votes cast, provided that it amounts to at least one quarter of those entitled to vote in Bundestag elections. Other details concerning referendums, petitions and advisory referendums shall be regulated by a federal law, which may also provide that the same petition may not be filed more than once within a period of five years.

(7) Other changes concerning the territory of the Länder may be effected by agreements between the Länder concerned or by a federal law with the consent of the Bundesrat, if the territory that is to be the subject of the change has no more than 50,000 inhabitants. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat and of a majority of the Members of the Bundestag. The law must provide affected municipalities and counties with an opportunity to be heard.

(8) Länder may revise the division of their existing territory or parts of their territory by agreement without regard to the provisions of paragraphs (2) to (7) of this Article. Affected municipalities and counties shall be afforded an opportunity to be heard. The agreement shall require confirmation by referendum in each of the Länder concerned. If the revision affects only part of a Land's territory, the referendum may be confined to the areas affected; the second clause of the fifth sentence shall not apply. In a referendum under this paragraph a majority of the votes cast shall be decisive, provided it amounts to at least one quarter of those entitled to vote in Bundestag elections; details shall be regulated by a federal law. The agreement shall require the consent of the Bundestag.

Article 30 [Sovereign powers of the Länder]

Except as otherwise provided or permitted by this Basic Law, the exercise of state powers and the discharge of state functions is a matter for the Länder.

Article 31 [Supremacy of federal law]

Federal law shall take precedence over Land law.

Article 32 [Foreign relations]

(1) Relations with foreign states shall be conducted by the Federation.

(2) Before the conclusion of a treaty affecting the special circumstances of a Land, that Land shall be consulted in timely fashion.

(3) Insofar as the Länder have power to legislate, they may conclude treaties with foreign states with the consent of the Federal Government.

Article 33 [Equal citizenship – Public service]

(1) Every German shall have in every Land the same political rights and duties.

(2) Every German shall be equally eligible for any public office according to his aptitude, qualifications and professional achievements.

(3) Neither the enjoyment of civil and political rights nor eligibility for public office nor rights acquired in the public service shall be dependent upon religious affiliation. No one may be disadvantaged by reason of adherence or non-adherence to a particular religious denomination or philosophical creed.

(4) The exercise of sovereign authority on a regular basis shall, as a rule, be entrusted to members of the public service who stand in a relationship of service and loyalty defined by public law.

(5) The law governing the public service shall be regulated and developed with due regard to the traditional principles of the professional civil service.

Article 34 [Liability for violation of official duty]

If any person, in the exercise of a public office entrusted to him, violates his official duty to a third party, liability shall rest principally with the state or public body that employs him. In the event of intentional wrongdoing or gross negligence, the right of recourse against the individual officer shall be preserved. The ordinary courts shall not be closed to claims for compensation or indemnity.

Article 35 [Legal and administrative assistance and assistance during disasters]

(1) All federal and Land authorities shall render legal and administrative assistance to one another.

(2) In order to maintain or restore public security or order, a Land in particularly serious cases may call upon personnel and facilities of the Federal Border Police to assist its police when without such assistance the police could not fulfil their responsibilities, or could do so only with great difficulty. In order to respond to a grave accident or a natural disaster, a Land may call for the assistance of police forces of other Länder or of personnel and facilities of other administrative authorities, of the Armed Forces or of the Federal Border Police.

(3) If the natural disaster or accident endangers the territory of more than one Land, the Federal Government, insofar as is necessary to combat the danger, may instruct the Land governments to place police forces at the disposal of other Länder and may deploy units of the Federal Border Police or the Armed Forces to support the police. Measures taken by the Federal Government pursuant to the first sentence of this paragraph shall be rescinded at any time at the demand of the Bundesrat and in any event as soon as the danger is removed.

Article 36 [Personnel of federal authorities]

(1) Civil servants employed by the highest federal authorities shall be drawn from all Länder in appropriate proportion. Persons employed by other federal authorities shall, as a rule, be drawn from the Land in which they serve.

(2) Laws regarding military service shall also take into account both the division of the Federation into Länder and the regional loyalties of their people.

Article 37 [Federal execution]

(1) If a Land fails to comply with its obligations under this Basic Law or other federal laws, the Federal Government, with the consent of the Bundesrat, may take the necessary steps to compel the Land to comply with its duties.

(2) For the purpose of implementing such coercive measures, the Federal Government or its representative shall have the right to issue instructions to all Länder and their authorities.

III. The Bundestag

Article 38 [Elections]

(1) Members of the German Bundestag shall be elected in general, direct, free, equal and secret elections. They shall be representatives of the whole people, not bound by orders or instructions and responsible only to their conscience.

(2) Any person who has attained the age of eighteen shall be entitled to vote; any person who has attained the age of majority may be elected.

(3) Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 39 [Electoral term – Convening]

(1) Save the following provisions, the Bundestag shall be elected for four years. Its term shall end when a new Bundestag convenes. New elections shall be held no sooner than forty-six months and no later than forty-eight months after the electoral term begins. If the Bundestag is dissolved, new elections shall be held within sixty days.

(2) The Bundestag shall convene no later than the thirtieth day after the elections.

(3) The Bundestag shall determine when its sessions shall be adjourned and resumed. The President of the Bundestag may convene it at an earlier date. He shall be obliged to do so if one third of the Members, the Federal President or the Federal Chancellor so demand.

Article 40 [Presidency – Rules of procedure]

(1) The Bundestag shall elect its President, Vice-Presidents and secretaries. It shall adopt rules of procedure.

(2) The President shall exercise proprietary and police powers in the Bundestag building. No search or seizure may take place on the premises of the Bundestag without his permission.

Article 41 [Scrutiny of elections]

(1) Scrutiny of elections shall be the responsibility of the Bundestag. It shall also decide whether a Member has lost his seat.

(2) Complaints against such decisions of the Bundestag may be lodged with the Federal Constitutional Court.

(3) Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 42 [Public sittings – Majority decisions]

(1) Sittings of the Bundestag shall be public. On the motion of one tenth of its Members, or on the motion of the Federal Government, a decision to exclude the public may be taken by a two-thirds majority. The motion shall be voted upon at a sitting not open to the public.

(2) Decisions of the Bundestag shall require a majority of the votes cast unless this Basic Law otherwise provides. The rules of procedure may permit exceptions with respect to elections to be conducted by the Bundestag.

(3) Truthful reports of public sittings of the Bundestag and of its committees shall not give rise to any liability.

Article 43 [Right to require presence, right of access and right to be heard]

(1) The Bundestag and its committees may require the presence of any member of the Federal Government.

(2) The members of the Bundesrat and of the Federal Government as well as their representatives may attend all sittings of the Bundestag and meetings of its committees. They shall have the right to be heard at any time.

Article 44 [Committees of inquiry]

(1) The Bundestag shall have the right, and on the motion of one quarter of its Members the duty, to establish a committee of inquiry, which shall take the requisite evidence at public hearings. The public may be excluded.

(2) The rules of criminal procedure shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to the taking of evidence. The privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications shall not be affected.

(3) Courts and administrative authorities shall be required to provide legal and administrative assistance.

(4) The decisions of committees of inquiry shall not be subject to judicial review. The courts shall be free to evaluate and rule upon the facts that were the subject of the investigation.

Article 45 [Committee on the European Union]

The Bundestag shall appoint a Committee on European Union Affairs. It may authorise the committee to exercise the rights of the Bundestag under Article 23 vis-à-vis the Federal Government. It may also empower it to exercise the rights granted to the Bundestag under the contractual foundations of the European Union.

Article 45a [Committees on Foreign Affairs and Defence]

(1) The Bundestag shall appoint a Committee on Foreign Affairs and a Defence Committee.

(2) The Defence Committee shall also have the powers of a committee of inquiry. On the motion of one quarter of its members it shall have the duty to make a specific matter the subject of inquiry.

(3) Paragraph (1) of Article 44 shall not apply to defence matters.

Article 45b [Parliamentary Commissioner for the Armed Forces]

A Parliamentary Commissioner for the Armed Forces shall be appointed to safeguard basic rights and to assist the Bundestag in exercising parliamentary oversight. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 45c [Petitions Committee]

(1) The Bundestag shall appoint a Petitions Committee to deal with requests and complaints addressed to the Bundestag pursuant to Article 17.

(2) The powers of the Committee to consider complaints shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 45d Parliamentary Oversight Panel

(1) The Bundestag shall appoint a panel to oversee the intelligence activities of the Federation.

(2) Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 46 [Immunities of Members]

(1) At no time may a Member be subjected to court proceedings or disciplinary action or otherwise called to account outside the Bundestag for a vote cast or a remark made by him in the Bundestag or in any of its committees. This provision shall not apply to defamatory insults.

(2) A Member may not be called to account or arrested for a punishable offence without permission of the Bundestag unless he is apprehended while committing the offence or in the course of the following day.

(3) The permission of the Bundestag shall also be required for any other restriction of a Member's freedom of the person or for the initiation of proceedings against a Member under

(4) Any criminal proceedings or any proceedings under Article 18 against a Member and any detention or other restriction of the freedom of his person shall be suspended at the demand of the Bundestag.

Article 47 [Right of refusal to give evidence]

Members may refuse to give evidence concerning persons who have confided information to them in their capacity as Members of the Bundestag or to whom they have confided information in this capacity and to give evidence concerning this information itself. To the extent that this right of refusal to give evidence applies, no seizure of documents shall be permissible.

Article 48 [Candidature – Protection of membership – Remuneration]

(1) Every candidate for election to the Bundestag shall be entitled to the leave necessary for his election campaign.

(2) No one may be prevented from accepting or exercising the office of Member of the Bundestag. No one may be given notice of dismissal or discharged from employment on this ground.

(3) Members shall be entitled to remuneration adequate to ensure their independence. They shall be entitled to the free use of all publicly owned means of transport. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 49 [Repealed]

IV. The Bundesrat

Article 50 [Functions]

The Länder shall participate through the Bundesrat in the legislation and administration of the Federation and in matters concerning the European Union.

Article 51 [Composition – Weighted voting]

(1) The Bundesrat shall consist of members of the Land governments, which appoint and recall them. Other members of those governments may serve as alternates.

(2) Each Land shall have at least three votes; Länder with more than two million inhabitants shall have four, Länder with more than six million inhabitants five and Länder with more than seven million inhabitants six votes.

(3) Each Land may appoint as many members as it has votes. The votes of each Land may be cast only as a unit and only by Members present or their alternates.

Article 52 [President – Decisions – Rules of procedure]

(1) The Bundesrat shall elect its President for one year.

(2) The President shall convene the Bundesrat. He shall be obliged to do so if the delegates of at least two Länder or the Federal Government so demand.

(3) Decisions of the Bundesrat shall require at least a majority of its votes. It shall adopt rules of procedure. Its meetings shall be open to the public. The public may be excluded.

(3a) For matters concerning the European Union the Bundesrat may establish a Chamber for European Affairs, whose decisions shall be considered decisions of the Bundesrat; the number of votes to be uniformly cast by the Länder shall be determined by paragraph (2) of Article 51.

(4) Other members or representatives of Land governments may serve on committees of the Bundesrat.

Article 53 [Attendance of members of the Federal Government]

The members of the Federal Government shall have the right, and on demand the duty, to participate in meetings of the Bundesrat and of its committees. They shall have the right to be heard at any time. The Bundesrat shall be kept informed by the Federal Government with regard to the conduct of its affairs.

IVa. The Joint Committee

Article 53a [Composition – Rules of procedure]

(1) The Joint Committee shall consist of Members of the Bundestag and members of the Bundesrat; the Bundestag shall provide two thirds and the Bundesrat one third of the committee members. The Bundestag shall designate Members in proportion to the relative strength of the various parliamentary groups; they may not be members of the Federal Government. Each Land shall be represented by a Bundesrat member of its choice; these members shall not be bound by instructions. The establishment of the Joint Committee and its proceedings shall be regulated by rules of procedure to be adopted by the Bundestag and requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(2) The Federal Government shall inform the Joint Committee about its plans for a state of defence. The rights of the Bundestag and its committees under paragraph (1) of Article 43 shall not be affected by the provisions of this paragraph.

V. The Federal President

Article 54 [Election – Term of office]

(1) The Federal President shall be elected by the Federal Convention without debate. Any German who is entitled to vote in Bundestag elections and has attained the age of forty may be elected.

(2) The term of office of the Federal President shall be five years. Re-election for a consecutive term shall be permitted only once.

(3) The Federal Convention shall consist of the Members of the Bundestag and an equal number of members elected by the parliamentary assemblies of the Länder on the basis of proportional representation.

(4) The Federal Convention shall meet not later than thirty days before the term of office of the Federal President expires or, in the case of premature termination, not later than thirty days after that date. It shall be convened by the President of the Bundestag.

(5) After the expiry of an electoral term, the period specified in the first sentence of paragraph (4) of this Article shall begin when the Bundestag first convenes.

(6) The person receiving the votes of a majority of the members of the Federal Convention shall be elected. If, after two ballots, no candidate has obtained such a majority, the person who receives the largest number of votes on the next ballot shall be elected.

(7) Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 55 [Incompatibilities]

(1) The Federal President may not be a member of the government or of a legislative body of the Federation or of a Land.

(2) The Federal President may not hold any other salaried office or engage in any trade or profession or belong to the management or supervisory board of any enterprise conducted for profit.

Article 56 [Oath of office]

On assuming his office, the Federal President shall take the following oath before the assembled Members of the Bundestag and the Bundesrat:

> "I swear that I will dedicate my efforts to the well-being of the German people, promote their welfare, protect them from harm, uphold and defend the Basic Law and the laws of the Federation, perform my duties conscientiously and do justice to all. So help me God."

The oath may also be taken without religious affirmation.

Article 57 [Substitution]

If the Federal President is unable to perform his duties, or if his office falls prematurely vacant, the President of the Bundesrat shall exercise his powers.

Article 58 [Countersignature]

Orders and directions of the Federal President shall require for their validity the countersignature of the Federal Chancellor or of the competent Federal Minister. This provision shall not apply to the appointment or dismissal of the Federal Chancellor, the dissolution of the Bundestag under Article 63, or a request made under paragraph (3) of Article 69.

Article 59 [International representation of the Federation]

(1) The Federal President shall represent the Federation in international law. He shall conclude treaties with foreign states on behalf of the Federation. He shall accredit and receive envoys.

(2) Treaties that regulate the political relations of the Federation or relate to subjects of federal legislation shall require the consent or participation, in the form of a federal law, of the bodies responsible in such a case for the enactment of federal law. In the case of executive agreements the provisions concerning the federal administration shall apply, mutatis mutandis.

Article 59a [Repealed]

Article 60 [Appointment of civil servants – Pardon – Immunity]

(1) The Federal President shall appoint and dismiss federal judges, federal civil servants and commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the Armed Forces, except as may otherwise be provided by a law.

(2) He shall exercise the power to pardon offenders on behalf of the Federation in individual cases.

(3) He may delegate these powers to other authorities.

(4) Paragraphs (2) to (4) of Article 46 shall apply to the Federal President, mutatis mutandis.

Article 61 [Impeachment before the Federal Constitutional Court]

(1) The Bundestag or the Bundesrat may impeach the Federal President before the Federal Constitutional Court for wilful violation of this Basic Law or of any other federal law. The motion of impeachment must be supported by at least one quarter of the Members of the Bundestag or one quarter of the votes of the Bundesrat. The decision to impeach shall require a majority of two thirds of the Members of the Bundestag or of two thirds of the votes of the Bundesrat. The case for impeachment shall be presented before the Federal Constitutional Court by a person commissioned by the impeaching body.

(2) If the Federal Constitutional Court finds the Federal President guilty of a wilful violation of this Basic Law or of any other federal law, it may declare that he has forfeited his office. After the Federal President has been impeached, the Court may issue an interim order preventing him from exercising his functions.

VI. The Federal Government

Article 62 [Composition]

The Federal Government shall consist of the Federal Chancellor and the Federal Ministers.

Article 63 [Election of the Federal Chancellor]

(1) The Federal Chancellor shall be elected by the Bundestag without debate on the proposal of the Federal President.

(2) The person who receives the votes of a majority of the Members of the Bundestag shall be elected. The person elected shall be appointed by the Federal President.

(3) If the person proposed by the Federal President is not elected, the Bundestag may elect a Federal Chancellor within fourteen days after the ballot by the votes of more than one half of its Members.

(4) If no Federal Chancellor is elected within this period, a new election shall take place without delay, in which the person who receives the largest number of votes shall be elected. If the person elected receives the votes of a majority of the Members of the Bundestag, the Federal President must appoint him within seven days after the election. If the person elected does not receive such a majority, then within seven days the Federal President shall either appoint him or dissolve the Bundestag.

Article 64 [Appointment and dismissal of Federal Ministers – Oath of office]

(1) Federal Ministers shall be appointed and dismissed by the Federal President upon the proposal of the Federal Chancellor.

(2) On taking office the Federal Chancellor and the Federal Ministers shall take the oath provided for in Article 56 before the Bundestag.

Article 65 [Power to determine policy guidelines – Department and collegiate responsibility]

The Federal Chancellor shall determine and be responsible for the general guidelines of policy. Within these limits each Federal Minister shall conduct the affairs of his department independently and on his own responsibility. The Federal Government shall resolve differences of opinion between Federal Ministers. The Federal Chancellor shall conduct the proceedings of the Federal Government in accordance with rules of procedure adopted by the Government and approved by the Federal President.

Article 65a [Command of the Armed Forces]

(1) Command of the Armed Forces shall be vested in the Federal Minister of Defence.

(2) (Repealed)

Article 66 [Incompatibilities]

Neither the Federal Chancellor nor a Federal Minister may hold any other salaried office or engage in any trade or profession or belong to the management or, without the consent of the Bundestag, to the supervisory board of an enterprise conducted for profit.

Article 67 [Vote of no confidence]

(1) The Bundestag may express its lack of confidence in the Federal Chancellor only by electing a successor by the vote of a majority of its Members and requesting the Federal President to dismiss the Federal Chancellor. The Federal President must comply with the request and appoint the person elected.

(2) Forty-eight hours shall elapse between the motion and the election.

Article 68 [Vote of confidence]

(1) If a motion of the Federal Chancellor for a vote of confidence is not supported by the majority of the Members of the Bundestag, the Federal President, upon the proposal of the Federal Chancellor, may dissolve the Bundestag within twenty-one days. The right of dissolution shall lapse as soon as the Bundestag elects another Federal Chancellor by the vote of a majority of its Members.

(2) Forty-eight hours shall elapse between the motion and the vote.

Article 69 [Deputy Federal Chancellor – Term of office]

(1) The Federal Chancellor shall appoint a Federal Minister as his deputy.

(2) The tenure of office of the Federal Chancellor or of a Federal Minister shall end in any event when a new Bundestag convenes; the tenure of office of a Federal Minister shall also end on any other occasion on which the Federal Chancellor ceases to hold office.

(3) At the request of the Federal President the Federal Chancellor, or at the request of the Federal Chancellor or of the Federal President a Federal Minister, shall be obliged to continue to manage the affairs of his office until a successor is appointed.

VII. Legislative Powers of the Federation

Article 70 [Division of powers between the Federation and the Länder]

(1) The Länder shall have the right to legislate insofar as this Basic Law does not confer legislative power on the Federation.

(2) The division of authority between the Federation and the Länder shall be governed by the provisions of this Basic Law concerning exclusive and concurrent legislative powers.

Article 71 [Exclusive legislative power of the Federation]

On matters within the exclusive legislative power of the Federation, the Länder shall have power to legislate only when and to the extent that they are expressly authorised to do so by a federal law.

Article 72 [Concurrent legislative powers]

(1) On matters within the concurrent legislative power, the Länder shall have power to legislate so long as and to the extent that the Federation has not exercised its legislative power by enacting a law.

(2) The Federation shall have the right to legislate on matters falling within items 4, 7, 11, 13, 15, 19a, 20, 22, 25 and 26 of paragraph (1) of Article 74, if and to the extent that the establishment of equivalent living conditions throughout the federal territory or the maintenance of legal or economic unity renders federal regulation necessary in the national interest.

(3) If the Federation has made use of its power to legislate, the Länder may enact laws at variance with this legislation with respect to: 1. hunting (except for the law on hunting licences); 2. protection of nature and landscape management (except for the general principles governing the protection VII. Federal Legislation and Legislative Procedures 58 of nature, the law on protection of plant and animal species or the law on protection of marine life); 3. land distribution; 4. regional planning; 5. management of water resources (except for regulations related to materials or facilities); 6. admission to institutions of higher education and requirements for graduation in such institutions. Federal laws on these matters shall enter into force no earlier than six months following their promulgation unless otherwise provided with the consent of the Bundesrat. As for the relationship between federal law and law of the Länder, the latest law enacted shall take precedence with respect to matters within the scope of the first sentence.

(4) A federal law may provide that federal legislation which is no longer necessary within the meaning of paragraph (2) of this Article may be superseded by Land law.

Article 73 [Matters under exclusive legislative power of the Federation]

(1) The Federation shall have exclusive legislative power with respect to:

1. foreign affairs and defence, including protection of the civilian population;
2. citizenship in the Federation;
3. freedom of movement, passports, residency registration and identity cards, immigration, emigration and extradition;
4. currency, money and coinage, weights and measures, and the determination of standards of time;
5. the unity of the customs and trading area, treaties regarding commerce and navigation, the free movement of goods, and the exchange of goods and payments with foreign countries, including customs and border protection;

5a. safeguarding German cultural assets against removal from the country;

6. air transport;

6a. the operation of railways wholly or predominantly owned by the Federation (federal railways), the construction, maintenance and operation of railway lines belonging to federal railways and the levying of charges for the use of these lines;

7. postal and telecommunications services;
8. the legal relations of persons employed by the Federation and by federal corporations under public law;
9. industrial property rights, copyrights and publishing;

9a. protection by the Federal Criminal Police Office against the dangers of international terrorism when a threat transcends the boundary of one Land, when respons ibility is not clearly assignable to the police authorities of any particular Land or when the highest authority of an individual Land requests the assumption of federal responsibility;

10. cooperation between the Federation and the Länder concerning

    a) criminal police work,

    b) protection of the free democratic basic order, existence and security of the Federation or of a Land (protection of the constitution), and

    c) protection against activities within the federal territory which, by the use of force or preparations for the use of force, endanger the external interests of the Federal Republic of Germany, as well as the establishment of a Federal Criminal Police Office and international action to combat crime;

11. statistics for federal purposes;

12. the law on weapons and explosives;

13. benefits for persons disabled by war and for dependents of deceased war victims as well as assistance to former prisoners of war;

14. the production and utilisation of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, the construction and operation of facilities serving such purposes, protection against hazards arising from the release of nuclear energy or from ionising radiation, and the disposal of radioactive substances.

(2) Laws enacted pursuant to item 9a of paragraph (1) require the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 74 [Matters under concurrent legislative powers]

(1) Concurrent legislative power shall extend to the following matters:

1. civil law, criminal law, court organisation and procedure (except for the law governing pre-trial detention), the legal profession, notaries and the provision of legal advice;

2. registration of births, deaths and marriages;

3. the law of association;

4. the law relating to residence and establishment of foreign nationals;

4a. (repealed)

5. (repealed)

6. matters concerning refugees and expellees;

7. public welfare (except for the law on social care homes);

8. (repealed)

9. war damage and reparations;

10. war graves and graves of other victims of war or despotism;

11. the law relating to economic matters (mining, industry, energy, crafts, trades, commerce, banking, stock exchanges and private insurance), except for the law on shop closing hours, restaurants, amusement arcades, display of persons, trade fairs, exhibitions and markets;

12. labour law, including the organisation of enterprises, occupational health and safety and employment agencies, as well as social security, including unemployment insurance;

13. the regulation of educational and training grants and the promotion of research;

14. the law regarding expropriation, to the extent relevant to matters enumerated in Articles 73 and 74;

15. the transfer of land, natural resources and means of production to public ownership or other forms of public enterprise;

16. prevention of the abuse of economic power;

17. the promotion of agricultural production and forestry (except for the law on land consolidation), ensuring the adequacy of food supply, the importation and exportation of agricultural and forestry products, deep-sea and coastal fishing and coastal preservation;

18. urban real estate transactions, land law (except for laws regarding development fees), and the law on rental subsidies, subsidies for old debts, homebuilding loan premiums, miners' homebuilding and pit villages;

19. measures to combat human and animal diseases which pose a danger to the public or are communicable, admission to the medical profession and to ancillary professions or occupations, as well as the law on pharmacies, medicines, medical products, drugs, narcotics and poisons;

19a. the economic viability of hospitals and the regulation of hospital charges;

20. the law on food products including animals used in their production, the law on alcohol and tobacco, essential commodities and feedstuffs as well as protective measures in connection with the marketing of agricultural and forest seeds and seedlings, the protection of plants against diseases and pests, as well as the protection of animals;

21. maritime and coastal shipping, as well as navigational aids, inland navigation, meteorological services, sea routes and inland waterways used for general traffic;

22. road traffic, motor transport, construction and maintenance of long-distance highways, as well as the collection of tolls for the use of public highways by vehicles and the allocation of the revenue;

23. non-federal railways, except mountain railways;

24. waste disposal, air pollution control, and noise abatement (except for the protection from noise associated with human activity);

25. state liability;

26. medically assisted generation of human life, analysis and modification of genetic information as well as the regulation of organ, tissue and cell transplantation;

27. the statutory rights and duties of civil servants of the Länder, the municipalities and other corporations established under public law as well as of the judges in the Länder, except for their career regulations, remuneration and pensions;

28. hunting;

29. protection of nature and landscape management;

30. land distribution;

31. regional planning;

32. management of water resources;

33. admission to institutions of higher education and requirements for graduation in such institutions.

(2) Laws enacted pursuant to items 25 and 27 of paragraph (1) shall require the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 75 [Repealed]

Article 76 [Bills]

(1) Bills may be introduced in the Bundestag by the Federal Government, by the Bundesrat or from the floor of the Bundestag.

(2) Federal Government bills shall first be submitted to the Bundesrat. The Bundesrat shall be entitled to comment on such bills within six weeks. If for important reasons, especially with respect to the scope of the bill, the Bundesrat demands an extension, the period shall be increased to nine weeks. If in exceptional circumstances the Federal Government, on submitting a bill to the Bundesrat, declares it to be particularly urgent, it may submit the bill to the Bundestag after three weeks or, if the Bundesrat has demanded an extension pursuant to the third sentence of this paragraph, after six weeks, even if it has not yet received the Bundesrat's comments; upon receiving such comments, it shall transmit them to the Bundestag without delay. In the case of bills to amend this Basic Law or to transfer sovereign powers pursuant to Article 23 or 24, the comment period shall be nine weeks; the fourth sentence of this paragraph shall not apply.

(3) Bundesrat bills shall be submitted to the Bundestag by the Federal Government within six weeks. In submitting them the Federal Government shall state its own views. If for important reasons, especially with respect to the scope of the bill, the Federal Government demands an extension, the period shall be increased to nine weeks. If in exceptional circumstances the Bundesrat declares a bill to be particularly urgent, the period shall be three weeks or, if the Federal Government has demanded an extension pursuant to the third sentence of this paragraph, six weeks. In the case of bills to amend this Basic Law or to transfer sovereign powers pursuant to Article 23 or 24, the comment period shall be nine weeks; the fourth sentence of this paragraph shall not apply. The Bundestag shall consider and vote on bills within a reasonable time.

Article 77 [Legislative procedure – Mediation Committee]

(1) Federal laws shall be adopted by the Bundestag. After their adoption the President of the Bundestag shall forward them to the Bundesrat without delay.

(2) Within three weeks after receiving an adopted bill, the Bundesrat may demand that a committee for joint consideration of bills, composed of Members of the Bundestag and of the Bundesrat, be convened. The composition and proceedings of this committee shall be regulated by rules of procedure adopted by the Bundestag and requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. The members of the Bundesrat on this committee shall not be bound by instructions. When the consent of the Bundesrat is required for a bill to become law, the Bundestag and the Federal Government may likewise demand that such a committee be convened. Should the committee propose any amendment to the adopted bill, the Bundestag shall vote on it a second time.

(2a) Insofar as its consent is required for a bill to become law, the Bundesrat, if no request has been made pursuant to the first sentence of paragraph (2) of this Article or if the mediation proceeding has been completed without a proposal to amend the bill, shall vote on the bill within a reasonable time.

(3) Insofar as its consent is not required for a bill to become law, the Bundesrat, once proceedings under paragraph (2) of this Article are completed, may within two weeks object to a bill adopted by the Bundestag. The time for objection shall begin, in the case described in the last sentence of paragraph (2) of this Article, upon receipt of the bill as re-adopted by the Bundestag, and in all other cases upon receipt of a communication from the chairman of the committee provided for in paragraph (2) of this Article to the effect that the committee's proceedings have been concluded.

(4) If the objection is adopted by the majority of the votes of the Bundesrat, it may be rejected by a decision of the majority of the Members of the Bundestag. If the Bundesrat adopted the objection by a majority of at least two thirds of its votes, its rejection by the Bundestag shall require a two-thirds majority, including at least a majority of the Members of the Bundestag.

Article 78 [Passage of federal laws]

A bill adopted by the Bundestag shall become law if the Bundesrat consents to it or fails to make a demand pursuant to paragraph (2) of Article 77 or fails to enter an objection within the period stipulated in paragraph (3) of Article 77 or withdraws such an objection or if the objection is overridden by the Bundestag.

Article 79 [Amendment of the Basic Law]

(1) This Basic Law may be amended only by a law expressly amending or supplementing its text. In the case of an international treaty regarding a peace settlement, the preparation of a peace settlement or the phasing out of an occupation regime or designed to promote the defence of the Federal Republic, it shall be sufficient, for the purpose of making clear that the provisions of this Basic Law do not preclude the conclusion and entry into force of the treaty, to add language to the Basic Law that merely makes this clarification.

(2) Any such law shall be carried by two thirds of the Members of the Bundestag and two thirds of the votes of the Bundesrat.

(3) Amendments to this Basic Law affecting the division of the Federation into Länder, their participation in principle in the legislative process, or the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 shall be inadmissible.

Article 80 [Issuance of statutory instruments]

(1) The Federal Government, a Federal Minister or the Land governments may be authorised by a law to issue statutory instruments. The content, purpose and scope of the authority conferred shall be specified in the law. Each statutory instrument shall contain a statement of its legal basis. If the law provides that such authority may be further delegated, such subdelegation shall be effected by statutory instrument.

(2) Unless a federal law otherwise provides, the consent of the Bundesrat shall be required for statutory instruments issued by the Federal Government or a Federal Minister regarding fees or basic principles for the use of postal and telecommunication facilities, basic principles for levying of charges for the use of facilities of federal railways or the construction and operation of railways, as well as for statutory instruments issued pursuant to federal laws that require the consent of the Bundesrat or that are executed by the Länder on federal commission or in their own right.

(3) The Bundesrat may submit to the Federal Government drafts of statutory instruments that require its consent.

(4) Insofar as Land governments are authorised by or pursuant to federal laws to issue statutory instruments, the Länder shall also be entitled to regulate the matter by a law.

Article 80a [State of tension]

(1) If this Basic Law or a federal law regarding defence, including protection of the civilian population, provides that legal provisions may be applied only in accordance with this Article, their application, except when a state of defence has been declared, shall be permissible only after the Bundestag has determined that a state of tension exists or has specifically approved such application. The determination of a state of tension and specific approval in the cases mentioned in the first sentence of paragraph (5) and the second sentence of paragraph (6) of Article 12a shall require a two-thirds majority of the votes cast.

(2) Any measures taken pursuant to legal provisions by virtue of paragraph (1) of this Article shall be rescinded whenever the Bundestag so demands.

(3) Notwithstanding paragraph (1) of this Article, the application of such legal provisions shall also be permissible on the basis of and in accordance with a decision made by an international body within the framework of a treaty of alliance with the approval of the Federal Government. Any measures taken pursuant to this paragraph shall be rescinded whenever the Bundestag, by the vote of a majority of its Members, so demands.

Article 81 [Legislative emergency]

(1) If, in the circumstances described in Article 68, the Bundestag is not dissolved, the Federal President, at the request of the Federal Government and with the consent of the Bundesrat, may declare a state of legislative emergency with respect to a bill, if the Bundestag rejects the bill although the Federal Government has declared it to be urgent. The same shall apply if a bill has been rejected although the Federal Chancellor had combined it with a motion under Article 68.

(2) If, after a state of legislative emergency has been declared, the Bundestag again rejects the bill or adopts it in a version the Federal Government declares unacceptable, the bill shall be deemed to have become law to the extent that it receives the consent of the Bundesrat. The same shall apply if the Bundestag does not pass the bill within four weeks after it is reintroduced.

(3) During the term of office of a Federal Chancellor, any other bill rejected by the Bundestag may become law in accordance with paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article within a period of six months after the first declaration of a state of legislative emergency. After the expiry of this period, no further declaration of a state of legislative emergency may be made during the term of office of the same Federal Chancellor.

(4) This Basic Law may neither be amended nor abrogated nor suspended in whole or in part by a law enacted pursuant to paragraph (2) of this Article.

Article 82 [Certification – Promulgation – Entry into force]

(1) Laws enacted in accordance with the provisions of this Basic Law shall, after countersignature, be certified by the Federal President and promulgated in the Federal Law Gazette. Statutory instruments shall be certified by the authority that issues them and, unless a law otherwise provides, shall be promulgated in the Federal Law Gazette.

(2) Every law or statutory instrument shall specify the date on which it shall take effect. In the absence of such a provision, it shall take effect on the fourteenth day after the day on which the Federal Law Gazette containing it was published.

VIII. The Execution of Federal Laws and the Federal Administration

Article 83 [Execution by the Länder]

The Länder shall execute federal laws in their own right insofar as this Basic Law does not otherwise provide or permit.

Article 84 [Länder administration – Federal oversight]

(1) Where the Länder execute federal laws in their own right, they shall provide for the establishment of the requisite authorities and regulate their administrative procedures. If federal laws provide otherwise, the Länder may enact derogating regulations. If a Land has enacted a derogating regulation pursuant to the second sentence, subsequent federal statutory provisions regulating the organisation of authorities and their administrative procedure shall not be enacted until at least six months after their promulgation, provided that no other determination has been made with the consent of the Bundesrat. The third sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 72 shall apply, mutatis mutandis. In exceptional cases, owing to a special need for uniform federal legislation, the Federation may regulate the administrative procedure with no possibility of separate Land legislation. Such laws shall require the consent of the Bundesrat. Federal laws may not entrust municipalities and associations of municipalities with any tasks.

(2) The Federal Government, with the consent of the Bundesrat, may issue general administrative provisions.

(3) The Federal Government shall exercise oversight to ensure that the Länder execute federal laws in accordance with the law. For this purpose the Federal Government may send commissioners to the highest Land authorities and, with their consent or, where such consent is refused, with the consent of the Bundesrat, also to subordinate authorities.

(4) Should any deficiencies that the Federal Government has identified in the execution of federal laws in the Länder not be corrected, the Bundesrat, on application of the Federal Government or of the Land concerned, shall decide whether that Land has violated the law. The decision of the Bundesrat may be challenged in the Federal Constitutional Court.

(5) With a view to the execution of federal laws, the Federal Government may be authorised by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat to issue instructions in particular cases. They shall be addressed to the highest Land authorities unless the Federal Government considers the matter urgent.

Article 85 [Execution by the Länder on federal commission]

(1) Where the Länder execute federal laws on federal commission, establishment of the authorities shall remain the concern of the Länder, except insofar as federal laws enacted with the consent of the Bundesrat otherwise provide. Federal laws may not entrust municipalities and associations of municipalities with any tasks.

(2) The Federal Government, with the consent of the Bundesrat, may issue general administrative provisions. It may provide for the uniform training of civil servants and other salaried public employees. The heads of intermediate authorities shall be appointed with its approval.

(3) The Land authorities shall be subject to instructions from the competent highest federal authorities. Such instructions shall be addressed to the highest Land authorities unless the Federal Government considers the matter urgent. Implementation of the instructions shall be ensured by the highest Land authorities.

(4) Federal oversight shall extend to the legality and appropriateness of execution. For this purpose the Federal Government may require the submission of reports and documents and send commissioners to all authorities.

Article 86 [Federal administration]

Where the Federation executes laws through its own administrative authorities or through federal corporations or institutions established under public law, the Federal Government shall, insofar as the law in question makes no special stipulation, issue general administrative provisions. The Federal Government shall provide for the establishment of the authorities insofar as the law in question does not otherwise provide.

Article 87 [Matters]

(1) The foreign service, the federal financial administration and, in accordance with the provisions of Article 89, the administration of federal waterways and shipping shall be conducted by federal administrative authorities with their own administrative substructures. A federal law may establish Federal Border Police authorities and central offices for police information and communications, for the criminal police and for the compilation of data for purposes of protection of the constitution and of protection against activities within the federal territory which, through the use of force or acts preparatory to the use of force, endanger the external interests of the Federal Republic of Germany.

(2) Social insurance institutions whose jurisdiction extends beyond the territory of a single Land shall be administered as federal corporations under public law. Social insurance institutions whose jurisdiction extends beyond the territory of a single Land but not beyond that of three Länder shall, notwithstanding the first sentence of this paragraph, be administered as Land corporations under public law, if the Länder concerned have specified which Land shall exercise supervisory authority.

(3) In addition, autonomous federal higher authorities as well as new federal corporations and institutions under public law may be established by a federal law for matters on which the Federation has legislative power. When the Federation is confronted with new responsibilities with respect to matters on which it has legislative power, federal authorities at intermediate and lower levels may be established, with the consent of the Bundesrat and of a majority of the Members of the Bundestag, in cases of urgent need.

Article 87a [Armed Forces]

(1) The Federation shall establish Armed Forces for purposes of defence. Their numerical strength and general organisational structure must be shown in the budget.

(2) Apart from defence, the Armed Forces may be employed only to the extent expressly permitted by this Basic Law.

(3) During a state of defence or a state of tension the Armed Forces shall have the power to protect civilian property and to perform traffic control functions to the extent necessary to accomplish their defence mission. Moreover, during a state of defence or a state of tension, the Armed Forces may also be authorised to support police measures for the protection of civilian property; in this event the Armed Forces shall cooperate with the competent authorities.

(4) In order to avert an imminent danger to the existence or free democratic basic order of the Federation or of a Land, the Federal Government, if the conditions referred to in paragraph (2) of Article 91 obtain and forces of the police and the Federal Border Police are insufficient, may employ the Armed Forces to support the police and the Federal Border Police in protecting civilian property and in combating organised armed insurgents. Any such employment of the Armed Forces shall be discontinued if the Bundestag or the Bundesrat so demands.

Article 87b [Federal Defence Administration]

(1) The Federal Defence Administration shall be conducted as a federal administrative authority with its own administrative substructure. It shall have jurisdiction for personnel matters and direct responsibility for satisfaction of the procurement needs of the Armed Forces. Responsibilities connected with pensions for injured persons or with construction work may be assigned to the Federal Defence Administration only by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. Such consent shall also be required for any laws to the extent that they empower the Federal Defence Administration to interfere with rights of third parties; this requirement, however, shall not apply in the case of laws regarding personnel matters.

(2) In addition, federal laws concerning defence, including recruitment for military service and protection of the civilian population, may, with the consent of the Bundesrat, provide that they shall be executed, wholly or in part, either by federal administrative authorities with their own administrative substructures or by the Länder on federal commission. If such laws are executed by the Länder on federal commission, they may, with the consent of the Bundesrat, provide that the powers vested in the Federal Government or in the competent highest federal authorities pursuant to Article 85 be transferred wholly or in part to federal higher authorities; in this event the law may provide that such authorities shall not require the consent of the Bundesrat in issuing general administrative provisions pursuant to the first sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 85.

Article 87c [Production and utilisation of nuclear energy]

Laws enacted under item 14 of paragraph (1) of Article 73 may, with the consent of the Bundesrat, provide that they shall be executed by the Länder on federal commission.

Article 87d [Air transport administration]

(1) Air transport administration shall be conducted under federal administration. Air traffic control services may also be provided by foreign air traffic control organisations which are authorised in accordance with European Community law.

(2) By a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat, responsibilities for air transport administration may be delegated to the Länder acting on federal commission.

Article 87e [Rail transport administration]

(1) Rail transport with respect to federal railways shall be administered by federal authorities. Responsibilities for rail transport administration may be delegated by a federal law to the Länder acting in their own right.

(2) The Federation shall discharge rail transport administration responsibilities assigned to it by a federal law, above and beyond those regarding federal railways.

(3) Federal railways shall be operated as enterprises under private law. They shall remain the property of the Federation to the extent that their activities embrace the construction, maintenance and operation of the lines. The transfer of federal shares in these enterprises under the second sentence of this paragraph shall be effected pursuant to a law; the Federation shall retain a majority of the shares. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

(4) The Federation shall ensure that, in developing and maintaining the federal railway system as well as in offering services over this system, other than local passenger services, due account is taken of the interests and especially the transportation needs of the public. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

(5) Laws enacted pursuant to paragraphs (1) to (4) of this Article shall require the consent of the Bundesrat. The consent of the Bundesrat shall also be required for laws regarding the dissolution, merger or division of federal railway enterprises, the transfer of federal railway lines to third parties or the abandonment of such lines or affecting local passenger services.

Article 87f [Posts and telecommunications]

(1) In accordance with a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat, the Federation shall ensure the availability of adequate and appropriate postal and telecommunications services throughout the federal territory.

(2) Services within the meaning of paragraph (1) of this Article shall be provided as a matter of private enterprise by the firms succeeding to the special trust Deutsche Bundespost and by other private providers. Sovereign functions in the area of posts and telecommunications shall be discharged by federal administrative authorities.

(3) Notwithstanding the second sentence of paragraph (2) of this Article, the Federation, by means of a federal institution under public law, shall discharge particular responsibilities relating to the firms succeeding to the special trust Deutsche Bundespost as prescribed by a federal law.

Article 88 [The Federal Bank – The European Central Bank]

The Federation shall establish a note-issuing and currency bank as the Federal Bank. Within the framework of the European Union, its responsibilities and powers may be transferred to the European Central Bank, which is independent and committed to the overriding goal of assuring price stability.

Article 89 [Federal waterways – Administration of waterways]

(1) The Federation shall be the owner of the former Reich waterways.

(2) The Federation shall administer the federal waterways through its own authorities. It shall exercise those state functions relating to inland shipping which extend beyond the territory of a single Land, and those functions relating to maritime shipping, which are conferred on it by a law. Insofar as federal waterways lie within the territory of a single Land, the Federation on its application may delegate their administration to that Land on federal commission. If a waterway touches the territory of two or more Länder, the Federation may commission that Land which is designated by the affected Länder.

(3) In the administration, development and new construction of waterways, the requirements of land improvement and of water management shall be assured in agreement with the Länder.

Article 90 [Federal roads and motorways]

(1) The Federation shall remain the owner of the federal motorways and other federal trunk roads. This ownership shall be inalienable.

(2) The administration of the federal motorways shall be a matter for the federal administrative authorities. The Federation may make use of a company under private law to discharge its responsibilities. This company shall be in the inalienable ownership of the Federation. Third parties shall have no direct or indirect holding in the company and its subsidiaries. Third parties shall have no holdings in the framework of public-private partnerships in road networks comprising the entire federal motorway network or the entire network of other federal trunk roads in a Land or significant parts of these networks. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

(3) The Länder, or such self-governing corporate bodies as are competent under Land law, shall administer on federal commission the other federal trunk roads.

(4) At the request of a Land, the Federation may assume administrative responsibility for the other federal trunk roads insofar as they lie within the territory of that Land.

Article 91 [Internal emergency]

(1) In order to avert an imminent danger to the existence or free democratic basic order of the Federation or of a Land, a Land may call upon police forces of other Länder, or upon personnel and facilities of other administrative authorities and of the Federal Border Police.

(2) If the Land where such danger is imminent is not itself willing or able to combat the danger, the Federal Government may place the police in that Land and the police forces of other Länder under its own orders and deploy units of the Federal Border Police. Any such order shall be rescinded once the danger is removed or at any time on the demand of the Bundesrat. If the danger extends beyond the territory of a single Land, the Federal Government, insofar as is necessary to combat such danger, may issue instructions to the Land governments; the first and second sentences of this paragraph shall not be affected by this provision.

VIIIa. Joint Tasks

Article 91a [Joint tasks – Responsibility for expenditure]

(1) In the following areas the Federation shall participate in the discharge of responsibilities of the Länder, provided that such responsibilities are important to society as a whole and that federal participation is necessary for the improvement of living conditions (joint tasks):

1. improvement of regional economic structures;
2. improvement of the agrarian structure and of coastal preservation.

(2) Federal laws enacted with the consent of the Bundesrat shall specify the joint tasks as well as the details of coordination.

(3) In cases to which item 1 of paragraph (1) of this Article applies, the Federation shall finance one half of the expenditure in each Land. In cases to which item 2 of paragraph (1) of this Article applies, the Federation shall finance at least one half of the expenditure, and the proportion shall be the same for all Länder. Details shall be regulated by law. The provision of funds shall be subject to appropriation in the budgets of the Federation and the Länder.

Article 91b [Education programmes and promotion of research]

(1) The Federation and the Länder may cooperate on the basis of agreements in cases of supraregional importance in the promotion of sciences, research and teaching. Agreements primarily affecting institutions of higher education shall require the consent of all the Länder. This provision shall not apply to agreements regarding the construction of research facilities, including large scientific installations.

(2) The Federation and the Länder may mutually agree to cooperate for the assessment of the performance of education systems in international comparison and in drafting relevant reports and recommendations.

(3) The apportionment of costs shall be regulated in the pertinent agreement.

Article 91c [Information technology systems]

(1) The Federation and the Länder may cooperate in planning, constructing and operating information technology systems needed to discharge their responsibilities.

(2) The Federation and the Länder may agree to specify the standards and security requirements necessary for exchanges between their information technology systems. Agreements regarding the bases of cooperation under the first sentence may provide, for individual responsibilities determined by their content and scope, that detailed regulations be enacted with the consent of a qualified majority of the Federation and the Länder as laid down in the agreements. They require the consent of the Bundestag and the legislatures of the participating Länder; the right to withdraw from these agreements cannot be precluded. The agreements shall also regulate the sharing of costs.

(3) The Länder may also agree on the joint operation of information technology systems along with the establishment of installations for that purpose.

(4) To link the information networks of the Federation and the Länder, the Federation shall establish a connection network. Details regarding the establishment and the operation of the connection network shall be regulated by a federal law with the consent of the Bundesrat.

(5) Comprehensive access by means of information technology to the administrative services of the Federation and the Länder shall be regulated by a federal law with the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 91d [Comparison of performance]

With a view to ascertaining and improving the performance of their administrations, the Federation and the Länder may conduct comparative studies and publish the results thereof.

Article 91e [Cooperation in respect of basic support for persons seeking employment]

(1) In the execution of federal laws in the field of basic support for persons seeking employment, the Federation and the Länder or the municipalities and associations of municipalities responsible pursuant to Land law shall cooperate as a rule in joint institutions.

(2) The Federation may authorise a limited number of municipalities and associations of municipalities, at their request and with the consent of the highest Land authority, to discharge the tasks pursuant to paragraph (1) alone. In this case, the Federation shall bear the necessary expenditures including the administrative expenses for the tasks which are to be discharged by the Federation in the execution of laws pursuant to paragraph (1).

(3) Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

IX. The Judiciary

Article 92 [Court organisation]

The judicial power shall be vested in the judges; it shall be exercised by the Federal Constitutional Court, by the federal courts provided for in this Basic Law and by the courts of the Länder.

Article 93 [Jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court]

(1) The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule:

1. on the interpretation of this Basic Law in the event of disputes concerning the extent of the rights and duties of a supreme federal body or of other parties vested with rights of their own by this Basic Law or by the rules of procedure of a supreme federal body;

2. in the event of disagreements or doubts concerning the formal or substantive compatibility of federal law or Land law with this Basic Law or the compatibility of Land law with other federal law on application of the Federal Government, of a Land government or of one fourth of the Members of the Bundestag;

2a. in the event of disagreements as to whether a law meets the conditions set out in paragraph (2) of Article 72, on application of the Bundesrat or of the government or legislature of a Land;

3. in the event of disagreements concerning the rights and duties of the Federation and the Länder, especially in the execution of federal law by the Länder and in the exercise of federal oversight;

4. on other disputes involving public law between the Federation and the Länder, between different Länder or within a Land, unless there is recourse to another court;

4a. on constitutional complaints, which may be filed by any person alleging that one of his basic rights or one of his rights under paragraph (4) of Article 20 or under Article 33, 38, 101, 103 or 104 has been infringed by public authority;

4b. on constitutional complaints filed by municipalities or associations of municipalities on the ground that their right to self-government under Article 28 has been infringed by a law; in the case of infringement by a Land law, however, only if the law cannot be challenged in the constitutional court of the Land;

4c. on constitutional complaints filed by associations concerning their non-recognition as political parties for an election to the Bundestag;

5. in the other instances provided for in this Basic Law. (2) At the request of the Bundesrat, a Land government or the parliamentary assembly of a Land, the Federal Constitutional Court shall also rule whether, in cases falling under paragraph (4) of Article 72, the need for a regulation by federal law does not exist any longer or whether, in the cases referred to in item 1 of paragraph (2) of Article 125a, federal law could not be enacted any longer. The Court's determination that the need has ceased to exist or that federal law could no longer be enacted substitutes a federal law according to paragraph (4) of Article 72 or item 2 of paragraph (2) of Article 125a. A request under the first sentence is admissible only if a bill falling under paragraph (4) of Article 72 or the second sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 125a has been rejected by the German Bundestag or if it has not been considered and determined upon within one year or if a similar bill has been rejected by the Bundesrat.

(3) The Federal Constitutional Court shall also rule on such other matters as shall be assigned to it by a federal law.

Article 94 [Composition of the Federal Constitutional Court]

(1) The Federal Constitutional Court shall consist of federal judges and other members. Half the members of the Federal Constitutional Court shall be elected by the Bundestag and half by the Bundesrat. They may not be members of the Bundestag, of the Bundesrat, of the Federal Government or of any of the corresponding bodies of a Land.

(2) The organisation and procedure of the Federal Constitutional Court shall be regulated by a federal law, which shall specify in which instances its decisions shall have the force of law. The law may require that all other legal remedies be exhausted before a constitutional complaint may be filed and may provide for a separate proceeding to determine whether the complaint will be accepted for adjudication.

Article 95 [Supreme federal courts]

(1) The Federation shall establish the Federal Court of Justice, the Federal Administrative Court, the Federal Finance Court, the Federal Labour Court and the Federal Social Court as supreme courts of ordinary, administrative, financial, labour and social jurisdiction.

(2) The judges of each of these courts shall be chosen jointly by the competent Federal Minister and a committee for the selection of judges consisting of the competent Land ministers and an equal number of members elected by the Bundestag.

(3) A Joint Chamber of the courts specified in paragraph (1) of this Article shall be established to preserve the uniformity of decisions. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 96 [Other federal courts]

(1) The Federation may establish a federal court for matters concerning industrial property rights.

(2) The Federation may establish federal military criminal courts for the Armed Forces. These courts may exercise criminal jurisdiction only during a state of defence or over members of the Armed Forces serving abroad or on board warships. Details shall be regulated by a federal law. These courts shall be under the aegis of the Federal Minister of Justice. The judges officiating there as their primary occupation shall be persons qualified to hold judicial office.

(3) The supreme court of review from the courts designated in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article shall be the Federal Court of Justice.

(4) The Federation may establish federal courts for disciplinary proceedings against, and for proceedings on complaints by, persons in the federal public service.

(5) With the consent of the Bundesrat, a federal law may provide that courts of the Länder shall exercise federal jurisdiction over criminal proceedings in the following matters:

1. genocide;
2. crimes against humanity under international criminal law;
3. war crimes;
4. other acts tending to and undertaken with the intent to disturb the peaceful relations between nations (paragraph (1) of Article 26);
5. state security.

Article 97 [Judicial independence]

(1) Judges shall be independent and subject only to the law.

(2) Judges appointed permanently to positions as their primary occupation may be involuntarily dismissed, permanently or temporarily suspended, transferred or retired before the expiry of their term of office only by virtue of judicial decision and only for the reasons and in the manner specified by the laws. The legislature may set age limits for the retirement of judges appointed for life. In the event of changes in the structure of courts or in their districts, judges may be transferred to another court or removed from office, provided they retain their full salary.

Article 98 [Legal status of judges – Impeachment]

(1) The legal status of federal judges shall be regulated by a special federal law.

(2) If a federal judge infringes the principles of this Basic Law or the constitutional order of a Land in his official capacity or unofficially, the Federal Constitutional Court, upon application of the Bundestag, may by a two-thirds majority order that the judge be transferred or retired. In the case of an intentional infringement it may order his dismissal.

(3) The legal status of the judges in the Länder shall be regulated by special Land laws if item 27 of paragraph (1) of Article 74 does not otherwise provide.

(4) The Länder may provide that Land judges shall be chosen jointly by the Land Minister of Justice and a committee for the selection of judges.

(5) The Länder may enact provisions regarding Land judges that correspond with those of paragraph (2) of this Article. Existing Land constitutional law shall not be affected. The decision in cases of judicial impeachment shall rest with the Federal Constitutional Court.

Article 99 [Constitutional disputes within a Land]

A Land law may assign the adjudication of constitutional disputes within a Land to the Federal Constitutional Court and the final decision in matters involving the application of Land law to the supreme courts specified in paragraph (1) of Article 95.

Article 100 [Concrete judicial review]

(1) If a court concludes that a law on whose validity its decision depends is unconstitutional, the proceedings shall be stayed, and a decision shall be obtained from the Land court with jurisdiction over constitutional disputes where the constitution of a Land is held to be violated or from the Federal Constitutional Court where this Basic Law is held to be violated. This provision shall also apply where the Basic Law is held to be violated by Land law and where a Land law is held to be incompatible with a federal law.

(2) If, in the course of litigation, doubt exists whether a rule of international law is an integral part of federal law and whether it directly creates rights and duties for the individual (Article 25), the court shall obtain a decision from the Federal Constitutional Court.

(3) If the constitutional court of a Land, in interpreting this Basic Law, proposes to derogate from a decision of the Federal Constitutional Court or of the constitutional court of another Land, it shall obtain a decision from the Federal Constitutional Court.

Article 101 [Ban on extraordinary courts]

(1) Extraordinary courts shall not be allowed. No one may be removed from the jurisdiction of his lawful judge.

(2) Courts for particular fields of law may be established only by a law.

Article 102 [Abolition of capital punishment]

Capital punishment is abolished.

Article 103 [Fair trial]

(1) In the courts every person shall be entitled to a hearing in accordance with law.

(2) An act may be punished only if it was defined by a law as a criminal offence before the act was committed.

(3) No person may be punished for the same act more than once under the general criminal laws.

Article 104 [Deprivation of liberty]

(1) Liberty of the person may be restricted only pursuant to a formal law and only in compliance with the procedures prescribed therein. Persons in custody may not be subjected to mental or physical mistreatment.

(2) Only a judge may rule upon the permissibility or continuation of any deprivation of liberty. If such a deprivation is not based on a judicial order, a judicial decision shall be obtained without delay. The police may hold no one in custody on their own authority beyond the end of the day following that of the arrest. Details shall be regulated by a law.

(3) Any person provisionally detained on suspicion of having committed a criminal offence shall be brought before a judge no later than the day following that of his arrest; the judge shall inform him of the reasons for the arrest, examine him and give him an opportunity to raise objections. The judge shall, without delay, either issue a written arrest warrant setting forth the reasons therefor or order his release.

(4) A relative or a person enjoying the confidence of the person in custody shall be notified without delay of any judicial decision imposing or continuing a deprivation of liberty.

X. Finance

Article 104a [Apportionment of expenditures – Financial system – Liability]

(1) The Federation and the Länder shall separately finance the expenditures resulting from the discharge of their respective responsibilities insofar as this Basic Law does not otherwise provide.

(2) Where the Länder act on federal commission, the Federation shall finance the resulting expenditures.

(3) Federal laws providing for money grants to be administered by the Länder may provide that the Federation shall pay for such grants wholly or in part. If any such law provides that the Federation shall finance one half or more of the expenditure, it shall be executed by the Länder on federal commission.

(4) Federal laws that oblige the Länder to provide money grants, benefits in kind or comparable services to third parties and which are executed by the Länder in their own right or according to the second sentence of paragraph (3) on commission of the Federation shall require the consent of the Bundesrat if the expenditure resulting therefrom is to be borne by the Länder.

(5) The Federation and the Länder shall finance the administrative expenditures incurred by their respective authorities and shall be responsible to one another for ensuring proper administration. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(6) In accordance with the internal allocation of competencies and responsibilities, the Federation and the Länder shall bear the costs entailed by a violation of obligations incumbent on Germany under supranational or international law. In cases of financial corrections by the European Union with effect transcending one specific Land, the Federation and the Länder shall bear such costs at a ratio of 15 to 85. In such cases, the Länder as a whole shall be responsible in solidarity for 35 per cent of the total burden according to a general formula; 50 per cent of the total burden shall be borne by those Länder which have caused the encumbrance, adjusted to the size of the amount of the financial means received. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 104b [Financial assistance for investments]

(1) To the extent that this Basic Law confers on it the power to legislate, the Federation may grant the Länder financial assistance for particularly important investments by the Länder and municipalities (associations of municipalities) which are necessary to:

1. avert a disturbance of the overall economic equilibrium,
2. equalise differing economic capacities within the federal territory, or
3. promote economic growth.

By way of derogation from the first sentence, the Federation may grant financial assistance even outside its field of legislative powers in cases of natural disasters or exceptional emergency situations beyond governmental control and substantially harmful to the state's financial capacity.

(2) Details, especially with respect to the kinds of investments to be promoted, shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat or by an executive agreement based on the Federal Budget Act. The federal law or executive agreement may contain provisions on the shaping of the respective Land programmes for the use of the financial assistance. The criteria for the shaping of the Land programmes shall be specified in agreement with the affected Länder. To ensure that the funds are used for their intended purpose, the Federal Government may require the submission of reports and documents and conduct surveys of any authorities. The funds from the Federation shall be provided in addition to funds belonging to the Länder. The duration of the grants shall be limited, and the grants must be reviewed at regular intervals with respect to the manner in which they are used. The financial assistance must be designed with descending annual contributions.

(3) Upon request, the Bundestag, the Federal Government and the Bundesrat shall be informed about the implementation of such measures and the improvements reached.

Article 104c [Financial assistance for investments in municipal education infrastructure]

The Federation may grant the Länder financial assistance for investments of significance to the nation as a whole, and for special limited-term expenditures on the part of the Länder and municipalities (associations of municipalities) directly connected with such investments to improve the efficiency of municipal education infrastructure. The first three sentences and the fifth and sixth sentences of paragraph (2), as well as paragraph (3) of Article 104b, shall apply, mutatis mutandis. To ensure that the funds are used for their intended purpose, the Federal Government may require the submission of reports and, where circumstances so warrant, documents.

Article 104d [Financial assistance for investments in social housing]

The Federation may grant the Länder financial assistance for investments of significance to the nation as a whole on the part of the Länder and municipalities (associations of municipalities) in social housing. The first five sentences of paragraph (2), as well as paragraph (3) of Article 104b, shall apply, mutatis mutandis.

Article 105 [Distribution of powers regarding tax laws]

(1) The Federation shall have exclusive power to legislate with respect to customs duties and fiscal monopolies.

(2) The Federation shall have concurrent power to legislate with respect to all other taxes the revenue from which accrues to it wholly or in part or as to which the conditions provided for in paragraph (2) of Article 72 apply.

(2a) The Länder shall have power to legislate with regard to local taxes on consumption and expenditures so long and insofar as such taxes are not substantially similar to taxes regulated by federal law. They are empowered to determine the rate of the tax on acquisition of real estate.

(3) Federal laws relating to taxes the revenue from which accrues wholly or in part to the Länder or to municipalities (associations of municipalities) shall require the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 106 [Apportionment of tax revenue and yield of fiscal monopolies]

(1) The yield of fiscal monopolies and the revenue from the following taxes shall accrue to the Federation:

1. customs duties;
2. taxes on consumption insofar as they do not accrue to the Länder pursuant to paragraph (2), or jointly to the Federation and the Länder in accordance with paragraph (3) or to municipalities in accordance with paragraph (6) of this Article;
3. the road freight tax, motor vehicle tax, and other taxes on transactions related to motorised vehicles;
4. the taxes on capital transactions, insurance and bills of exchange;
5. non-recurring levies on property and equalisation of burdens levies;
6. income and corporation surtaxes;
7. levies imposed within the framework of the European Communities.

(2) Revenue from the following taxes shall accrue to the Länder:

1. the property tax;
2. the inheritance tax;

3. the motor vehicle tax;

4. such taxes on transactions as do not accrue to the Federation pursuant to paragraph (1) or jointly to the Federation and the Länder pursuant to paragraph (3) of this Article;

5. the beer tax;

6. the tax on gambling establishments.

(3) Revenue from income taxes, corporation taxes and turnover taxes shall accrue jointly to the Federation and the Länder (joint taxes) to the extent that the revenue from the income tax and the turnover tax is not allocated to municipalities pursuant to paragraphs (5) and (5a) of this Article. The Federation and the Länder shall share equally the revenues from income taxes and corporation taxes. The respective shares of the Federation and the Länder in the revenue from the turnover tax shall be determined by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. Such determination shall be based on the following principles:

1. The Federation and the Länder shall have an equal claim against current revenues to cover their necessary expenditures. The extent of such expenditures shall be determined with due regard to multi-year financial planning.

2. The financial requirements of the Federation and of the Länder shall be coordinated in such a way as to establish a fair balance, avoid excessive burdens on taxpayers and ensure uniformity of living standards throughout the federal territory. In determining the respective shares of the Federation and the Länder in the revenue from the turnover tax, reductions in revenue incurred by the Länder from 1 January 1996 because of the provisions made with respect to children in the income tax law shall also be taken into account. Details shall be regulated by the federal law enacted pursuant to the third sentence of this paragraph.

(4) The respective shares of the Federation and the Länder in the revenue from the turnover tax shall be apportioned anew whenever the ratio of revenues to expenditures of the Federation becomes substantially different from that of the Länder; reductions in revenue that are taken into account in determining the respective shares of revenue from the turnover tax under the fifth sentence of paragraph (3) of this Article shall not be considered in this regard. If a federal law imposes additional expenditures on or withdraws revenue from the Länder, the additional burden may be compensated for by federal grants pursuant to a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat, provided the additional burden is limited to a short period of time. This law shall establish the principles for calculating such grants and distributing them among the Länder.

(5) A share of the revenue from the income tax shall accrue to the municipalities, to be passed on by the Länder to their municipalities on the basis of the income taxes paid by their inhabitants. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. This law may provide that municipalities may establish supplementary or reduced rates with respect to their share of the tax.

(5a) From and after 1 January 1998, a share of the revenue from the turnover tax shall accrue to the municipalities. It shall be passed on by the Länder to their municipalities on the basis of a formula reflecting geographical and economic factors. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(6) Revenue from taxes on real property and trades shall accrue to the municipalities; revenue from local taxes on consumption and expenditures shall accrue to the municipalities or, as may be provided for by Land legislation, to associations of municipalities. Municipalities shall be authorised to establish the rates at which taxes on real property and trades are levied, within the framework of the laws. If there are no municipalities in a Land, revenue from taxes on real property and trades as well as from local taxes on consumption and expenditures shall accrue to the Land. The Federation and the Länder may participate, by virtue of an apportionment, in the revenue from the tax on trades. Details regarding such apportionment shall be regulated X. Finance 98 by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. In accordance with Land legislation, taxes on real property and trades as well as the municipalities' share of revenue from the income tax and the turnover tax may be taken as a basis for calculating the amount of apportionment.

(7) An overall percentage of the Land share of total revenue from joint taxes, to be determined by Land legislation, shall accrue to the municipalities or associations of municipalities. In all other respects Land legislation shall determine whether and to what extent revenue from Land taxes shall accrue to municipalities (associations of municipalities).

(8) If in individual Länder or municipalities (associations of municipalities) the Federation requires special facilities to be established that directly result in an increase of expenditure or in reductions in revenue (special burden) to these Länder or municipalities (associations of municipalities), the Federation shall grant the necessary compensation if and insofar as the Länder or municipalities (associations of municipalities) cannot reasonably be expected to bear the burden. In granting such compensation, due account shall be taken of indemnities paid by third parties and financial benefits accruing to these Länder or municipalities (associations of municipalities) as a result of the establishment of such facilities.

(9) For the purpose of this Article, revenues and expenditures of municipalities (associations of municipalities) shall also be deemed to be revenues and expenditures of the Länder.

Article 106a [Federal grants for local public transport]

Beginning on 1 January 1996 the Länder shall be entitled to an allocation of federal tax revenues for purposes of local public transport. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. Allocations made pursuant to the first sentence of this Article shall not be taken into account in determining the financial capacity of a Land under paragraph (2) of Article 107.

Article 106b [Länder share of motor vehicle tax]

As of 1 July 2009, following the transfer of the motor vehicle tax to the Federation, the Länder shall be entitled to a sum from the tax revenue of the Federation. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 107 [Distribution of tax revenue – Financial equalisation among the Länder – Supplementary grants]

(1) Revenue from Land taxes and the Land share of revenue from income and corporation taxes shall accrue to the individual Länder to the extent that such taxes are collected by finance authorities within their respective territories (local revenue). Details regarding the delimitation as well as the manner and scope of allotment of local revenue from corporation and wage taxes shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. This law may also provide for the delimitation and allotment of local revenue from other taxes. The Land share of revenue from the turnover tax shall accrue to the individual Länder on a per capita basis, unless otherwise provided in paragraph (2) of this Article.

(2) A federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat shall ensure a reasonable equalisation of the disparate financial capacities of the Länder, with due regard for the financial capacities and needs of municipalities (associations of municipalities). To this end, additions to and deductions from the financial capacity of the respective Länder shall be regulated in the allotment of their shares of revenue from the turnover tax. The conditions for granting additions and imposing reductions as well as the criteria governing the amount of these additions and deductions shall be specified in the law. For the purpose of measuring financial capacity, it shall be permissible to consider only part of the revenue from mining royalties. The law may also provide for grants to be made by the Federation to financially weak Länder from its own funds to assist them in meeting their general financial needs (supplementary grants). Irrespective of the criteria specified in the first to the third sentence of this paragraph, grants may also be made to such financially weak Länder whose municipalities (associations of municipalities) have a particularly low capacity to generate tax revenue (municipal tax-base grants) and, in addition, to such financially weak Länder whose shares of the support funds under Article 91b are lower than their per capita shares.

Article 108 [Financial administration of the Federation and the Länder – Financial courts]

(1) Customs duties, fiscal monopolies, taxes on consumption regulated by a federal law, including the turnover tax on imports, the motor vehicle tax and other transaction taxes related to motorised vehicles as from 1 July 2009 and charges imposed within the framework of the European Communities shall be administered by federal finance authorities. The organisation of these authorities shall be regulated by a federal law. Inasmuch as intermediate authorities have been established, their heads shall be appointed in consultation with the Land governments.

(2) All other taxes shall be administered by the financial authorities of the Länder. The organisation of these authorities and the uniform training of their civil servants may be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. Inasmuch as intermediate authorities have been established, their heads shall be appointed in agreement with the Federal Government.

(3) Where taxes accruing wholly or in part to the Federation are administered by revenue authorities of the Länder, those authorities shall act on federal commission. Paragraphs (3) and (4) of Article 85 shall apply, the Federal Minister of Finance acting in place of the Federal Government.

(4) Where and to the extent that execution of the tax laws will be substantially facilitated or improved thereby, a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat may provide for collaboration between federal and Land revenue authorities in matters of tax administration, for the administration of taxes enumerated in paragraph (1) of this Article by revenue authorities of the Länder or for the administration of other taxes by federal revenue authorities. The functions of Land revenue authorities in the administration of taxes whose revenue accrues exclusively to municipalities (associations of municipalities) may be delegated by the Länder to municipalities (associations of municipalities) wholly or in part. The federal law referred to in the first sentence of this paragraph may, with regard to collaboration between the Federation and Länder, provide that, with the consent of a majority specified in the law, rules for the execution of tax laws will become binding for all Länder.

(4a) A federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat may provide, in the case of the administration of taxes enumerated in paragraph (2), for collaboration between Land revenue authorities and for an inter-Land transfer of competence to Land revenue authorities of one or more Länder by agreement with the Länder concerned where and to the extent that execution of the tax laws will be substantially facilitated or improved thereby. The apportionment of costs may be regulated by a federal law.

(5) The procedures to be followed by federal revenue authorities shall be prescribed by a federal law. The procedures to be followed by Land revenue authorities or, as provided by the second sentence of paragraph (4) of this Article, by municipalities (associations of municipalities) may be prescribed by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(6) Financial jurisdiction shall be uniformly regulated by a federal law.

(7) The Federal Government may issue general administrative rules which, to the extent that administration is entrusted to Land revenue authorities or to municipalities (associations of municipalities), shall require the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 109 [Budget management in the Federation and the Länder]

(1) The Federation and the Länder shall be autonomous and independent of one another in the management of their respective budgets.

(2) The Federation and the Länder shall jointly discharge the obligations of the Federal Republic of Germany resulting from legal acts of the European Community for the maintenance of budgetary discipline pursuant to Article 104 of the Treaty Establishing the European Community and shall, within this framework, give due regard to the requirements of overall economic equilibrium.

(3) The budgets of the Federation and the Länder shall, in principle, be balanced without revenue from credits. The Federation and Länder may introduce rules intended to take into account, symmetrically in times of upswing and downswing, the effects of market developments that deviate from normal conditions, as well as exceptions for natural disasters or unusual emergency situations beyond governmental control and substantially harmful to the state's financial capacity. For such exceptional regimes, a corresponding amortisation plan must be adopted. Details for the budget of the Federation shall be governed by Article 115 with the proviso that the first sentence shall be deemed to be satisfied if revenue from credits does not exceed 0.35 per cent in relation to the nominal gross domestic product. The Länder themselves shall regulate details for the budgets within the framework of their constitutional powers, the proviso being that the first sentence shall only be deemed to be satisfied if no revenue from credits is admitted.

(4) A federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat may establish principles applicable to both the Federation and the Länder governing budgetary law, cyclically appropriate budgetary management and long-term financial planning.

(5) Sanctions imposed by the European Community on the basis of the provisions of Article 104 of the Treaty Establishing the European Community in the interest of maintaining budgetary discipline shall be borne by the Federation and the Länder at a ratio of 65 to 35 per cent. In solidarity, the Länder as a whole shall bear 35 per cent of the charges incumbent on the Länder according to the number of their inhabitants; 65 per cent of the charges incumbent on the Länder shall be borne by the Länder according to their degree of causation. Details shall be regulated by a federal law which shall require the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 109a [Budgetary emergencies]

(1) To avoid a budgetary emergency, a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat shall provide for:

1. the continuing supervision of budgetary management of the Federation and the Länder by a joint body (Stability Council),

2. the conditions and procedures for ascertaining the threat of a budgetary emergency,

3. the principles for the establishment and administration of programs for taking care of budgetary emergencies.

(2) From the year 2020, oversight of compliance with the provisions of paragraph (3) of Article 109 by the Federation and the Länder shall be entrusted to the Stability Council. This oversight shall be focused on the provisions and procedures regarding adherence to budgetary discipline from legal acts based on the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.

(3) The decisions of the Stability Council and the accompanying documents shall be published.

Article 110 [Federal budget]

(1) All revenues and expenditures of the Federation shall be included in the budget; in the case of federal enterprises and special trusts, only payments to or remittances from them need be included. The budget shall be balanced with respect to revenues and expenditures.

(2) The budget for one or more fiscal years shall be set forth in a law enacted before the beginning of the first year and making separate provision for each year. The law may provide that various parts of the budget apply to different periods of time, divided by fiscal years.

(3) Bills to comply with the first sentence of paragraph (2) of this Article as well as bills to amend the Budget Act or the budget itself shall be submitted simultaneously to the Bundesrat and to the Bundestag; the Bundesrat shall be entitled to comment on such bills within six weeks or, in the case of amending bills, within three weeks.

(4) The Budget Act may contain only such provisions as relate to federal revenues and expenditures and to the period for which it is enacted. The Budget Act may specify that its provisions shall expire only upon promulgation of the next Budget Act or, in the event of an authorisation pursuant to Article 115, at a later date.

Article 111 [Interim budget management]

(1) If, by the end of a fiscal year, the budget for the following year has not been adopted by a law, the Federal Government, until such law comes into force, may make all expenditures that are necessary:

(a) to maintain institutions established by a law and to carry out measures authorised by a law;

(b) to meet the legal obligations of the Federation;

(c) to continue construction projects, procurements and the provision of other benefits or services or to continue to make grants for these purposes, to the extent that amounts have already been appropriated in the budget of a previous year.

(2) To the extent that revenues based upon specific laws and derived from taxes or duties or other sources or the working capital reserves do not cover the expenditures referred to in paragraph (1) of this Article, the Federal Government may borrow the funds necessary to sustain current operations up to a maximum of one quarter of the total amount of the previous budget.

Article 112 [Extrabudgetary expenditures]

Expenditures in excess of budgetary appropriations or for purposes not contemplated by the budget shall require the consent of the Federal Minister of Finance. Such consent may be given only in the event of an unforeseen and unavoidable necessity. Details may be regulated by a federal law.

Article 113 [Increase of expenditures]

(1) Laws that increase the budget expenditures proposed by the Federal Government or entail or will bring about new expenditures shall require the consent of the Federal Government. This requirement shall also apply to laws that entail or will bring about decreases in revenue. The Federal Government may demand that the Bundestag postpone its vote on bills to this effect. In this event the Federal Government shall submit its comments to the Bundestag within six weeks.

(2) Within four weeks after the Bundestag has adopted such a law, the Federal Government may demand that it vote on the law a second time.

(3) If the bill has become law pursuant to Article 78, the Federal Government may withhold its consent only within six weeks and only after having initiated the procedure provided for in the third and fourth sentences of paragraph (1) or in paragraph (2) of this Article. Upon the expiry of this period such consent shall be deemed to have been given.

Article 114 [Submission and auditing of accounts]

(1) For the purpose of discharging the Federal Government, the Federal Minister of Finance shall submit annually to the Bundestag and to the Bundesrat an account for the preceding fiscal year of all revenues and expenditures as well as of assets and debts.

(2) The Federal Court of Audit, whose members shall enjoy judicial independence, shall audit the account and determine whether public finances have been properly and efficiently administered by the Federation. For the purpose of the audit pursuant to the first sentence of this paragraph, the Federal Court of Audit may also conduct surveys of authorities outside the federal administration; this shall also apply in cases in which the Federation allocates to the Länder ring-fenced financing for the performance of tasks incumbent on the Länder. It shall submit an annual report directly to the Bundestag and the Bundesrat as well as to the Federal Government. In other respects the powers of the Federal Court of Audit shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 115 [Limits of borrowing]

(1) The borrowing of funds and the assumption of surety obligations, guarantees or other commitments that may lead to expenditures in future fiscal years shall require authorisation by a federal law specifying or permitting computation of the amounts involved.

(2) Revenues and expenditures shall in principle be balanced without revenue from credits. This principle shall be satisfied when revenue obtained by the borrowing of funds does not exceed 0.35 per cent in relation to the nominal gross domestic product. In addition, when economic developments deviate from normal conditions, effects on the budget in periods of upswing and downswing must be taken into account symmetrically. Deviations of actual borrowing from the credit limits specified under the first to third sentences are to be recorded on a control account; debits exceeding the threshold of 1.5 per cent in relation to the nominal gross domestic product are to be reduced in accordance with the economic cycle. The regulation of details, especially the adjustment of revenue and expenditures with regard to financial transactions and the procedure for the calculation of the yearly limit on net borrowing, taking into account the economic cycle on the basis of a procedure for adjusting the cycle together with the control and balancing of deviations of actual borrowing from the credit limit, requires a federal law. In cases of natural catastrophes or unusual emergency situations beyond governmental control and substantially harmful to the state's financial capacity, these credit limits may be exceeded on the basis of a decision taken by a majority of the Members of the Bundestag. The decision must be combined with an amortisation plan. Repayment of the credits borrowed under the sixth sentence must be accomplished within an appropriate period of time.

Xa. State of Defence

Article 115a [Declaration of a state of defence]

(1) Any determination that the federal territory is under attack by armed force or imminently threatened with such an attack (state of defence) shall be made by the Bundestag with the consent of the Bundesrat. Such determination shall be made on application of the Federal Government and shall require a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, which shall include at least a majority of the Members of the Bundestag.

(2) If the situation imperatively calls for immediate action and if insurmountable obstacles prevent the timely convening of the Bundestag or the Bundestag cannot muster a quorum, the Joint Committee shall make this determination by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, which shall include at least a majority of its members.

(3) The determination shall be promulgated by the Federal President in the Federal Law Gazette pursuant to Article 82. If this cannot be done in time, promulgation shall be effected in another manner; the determination shall be printed in the Federal Law Gazette as soon as circumstances permit.

(4) If the federal territory is under attack by armed force, and if the competent federal authorities are not in a position at once to make the determination provided for in the first sentence of paragraph (1) of this Article, the determination shall be deemed to have been made and promulgated at the time the attack began. The Federal President shall announce that time as soon as circumstances permit.

(5) If the determination of a state of defence has been promulgated, and if the federal territory is under attack by armed force, the Federal President, with the consent of the Bundestag, may issue declarations under international law regarding the existence of the state of defence. Under the conditions specified in paragraph (2) of this Article, the Joint Committee shall act in place of the Bundestag.

Article 115b [Power of command of the Federal Chancellor]

Upon the promulgation of a state of defence the power of command over the Armed Forces shall pass to the Federal Chancellor.

Article 115c [Extension of the legislative powers of the Federation]

(1) The Federation shall have the right to legislate concurrently for a state of defence even with respect to matters within the legislative powers of the Länder. Such laws shall require the consent of the Bundesrat.

(2) To the extent required by circumstances during a state of defence, a federal law for a state of defence may:

1. make temporary provisions concerning compensation in the event of expropriation that deviate from the requirements of the second sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 14;

2. establish a time limit for deprivations of freedom different from that specified in the third sentence of paragraph (2) and the first sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 104, but not exceeding four days, for cases in which no judge has been able to act within the time limit that normally applies.

(3) To the extent necessary to repel an existing or imminently threatened attack, a federal law for a state of defence may, with the consent of the Bundesrat, regulate the administration and finances of the Federation and the Länder without regard to Titles VIII, VIIIa and X of this Basic Law, provided that the viability of the Länder, municipalities, and associations of municipalities, especially with respect to financial matters, is assured.

(4) Federal laws enacted pursuant to paragraph (1) or item 1 of paragraph (2) of this Article may, for the purpose of preparing for their enforcement, be applied even before a state of defence arises.

Article 115d [Urgent bills]

(1) During a state of defence the federal legislative process shall be governed by the provisions of paragraphs (2) and (3) of this Article without regard to the provisions of paragraph (2) of Article 76, the second sentence of paragraph (1) and paragraphs (2) to (4) of Article 77, Article 78 and paragraph (1) of Article 82.

(2) Federal Government bills that the Government designates as urgent shall be forwarded to the Bundesrat at the same time as they are submitted to the Bundestag. The Bundestag and the Bundesrat shall debate such bills in joint session without delay. Insofar as the consent of the Bundesrat is necessary for any such bill to become law, a majority of its votes shall be required. Details shall be regulated by rules of procedure adopted by the Bundestag and requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(3) The second sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 115a shall apply to the promulgation of such laws, mutatis mutandis.

Article 115e [Joint Committee]

(1) If, during a state of defence, the Joint Committee by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, which shall include at least a majority of its members, determines that insurmountable obstacles prevent the timely convening of the Bundestag or that the Bundestag cannot muster a quorum, the Joint Committee shall occupy the position of both the Bundestag and the Bundesrat and shall exercise their powers as a single body.

(2) This Basic Law may neither be amended nor abrogated nor suspended in whole or in part by a law enacted by the Joint Committee. The Joint Committee shall have no power to enact laws pursuant to the second sentence of paragraph (1) of Article 23, paragraph (1) of Article 24 or Article 29.

Article 115f [Use of Federal Border Police – Extended powers of instruction]

(1) During a state of defence the Federal Government, to the extent that circumstances require, may:

1. employ the Federal Border Police throughout the federal territory;

2. issue instructions not only to federal administrative authorities but also to Land governments and, if it deems the matter urgent, to Land authorities and may delegate this power to members of Land governments designated by it.

(2) The Bundestag, the Bundesrat and the Joint Committee shall be informed without delay of the measures taken in accordance with paragraph (1) of this Article.

Article 115g [Federal Constitutional Court]

Neither the constitutional status nor the performance of the constitutional functions of the Federal Constitutional Court or its judges may be impaired. The law governing the Federal Constitutional Court may be amended by a law enacted by the Joint Committee only insofar as the Federal Constitutional Court agrees is necessary to ensure that it can continue to perform its functions. Pending the enactment of such a law, the Federal Constitutional Court may take such measures as are necessary to this end. Determinations by the Federal Constitutional Court pursuant to the second and third sentences of this Article shall be made by a majority of the judges present.

Article 115h [Expiry of electoral terms and terms of office]

(1) Any electoral terms of the Bundestag or of parliamentary assemblies of the Länder that are due to expire during a state of defence shall end six months after the termination of the state of defence. A term of office of the Federal President that is due to expire during a state of defence and the exercise of his functions by the President of the Bundesrat in case of the premature vacancy of his office shall end nine months after the termination of the state of defence. The term of office of a member of the Federal Constitutional Court that is due to expire during a state of defence shall end six months after the termination of the state of defence.

(2) Should it be necessary for the Joint Committee to elect a new Federal Chancellor, it shall do so by the votes of a majority of its members; the Federal President shall propose a candidate to the Joint Committee. The Joint Committee may express its lack of confidence in the Federal Chancellor only by electing a successor by a twothirds majority of its members.

(3) The Bundestag shall not be dissolved while a state of defence exists.

Article 115i [Powers of the Land governments]

(1) If the competent federal bodies are not in a position to take the measures necessary to avert the danger, and if the situation imperatively calls for immediate independent action in particular areas of the federal territory, the Land governments or the authorities or representatives they designate shall be authorised, within their respective spheres of competence, to take the measures provided for in paragraph (1) of Article 115f.

(2) Any measures taken in accordance with paragraph (1) of this Article may be rescinded at any time by the Federal Government, or, with respect to Land authorities and subordinate federal authorities, by Minister-Presidents of the Länder.

Article 115k [Rank and duration of emergency provisions]

(1) Laws enacted in accordance with Articles 115c, 115e and 115g, as well as statutory instruments issued on the basis of such laws, shall suspend the operation of incompatible law so long as they are in effect. This provision shall not apply to earlier law enacted pursuant to Articles 115c, 115e or 115g.

(2) Laws adopted by the Joint Committee, as well as statutory instruments issued on the basis of such laws, shall cease to have effect no later than six months after the termination of a state of defence.

(3) Laws containing provisions that diverge from Articles 91a, 91b, 104a, 106 and 107 shall apply no longer than the end of the second fiscal year following the termination of a state of defence. After such termination they may, with the consent of the Bundesrat, be amended by a federal law so as to revert to the provisions of Titles VIIIa and X.

Article 115l [Repeal of emergency measures – Conclusion of peace]

(1) The Bundestag, with the consent of the Bundesrat, may at any time repeal laws enacted by the Joint Committee. The Bundesrat may demand that the Bundestag reach a decision on this question. Any measures taken by the Joint Committee or by the Federal Government to avert a danger shall be rescinded if the Bundestag and the Bundesrat so decide.

(2) The Bundestag, with the consent of the Bundesrat, may at any time, by a decision to be promulgated by the Federal President, declare a state of defence terminated. The Bundesrat may demand that the Bundestag reach a decision on this question. A state of defence shall be declared terminated without delay if the conditions for determining it no longer exist.

(3) The conclusion of peace shall be determined by a federal law.

XI. Transitional and Concluding Provisions

Article 116 [Definition of "German" – Restoration of citizenship]

(1) Unless otherwise provided by a law, a German within the meaning of this Basic Law is a person who possesses German citizenship or who has been admitted to the territory of the German Reich within the boundaries of 31 December 1937 as a refugee or expellee of German ethnic origin or as the spouse or descendant of such person.

(2) Former German citizens who, between 30 January 1933 and 8 May 1945, were deprived of their citizenship on political, racial or religious grounds and their descendants shall, on application, have their citizenship restored. They shall be deemed never to have been deprived of their citizenship if they have established their domicile in Germany after 8 May 1945 and have not expressed a contrary intention.

Article 117 [Suspended entry into force of two basic rights]

(1) Law which is inconsistent with paragraph (2) of Article 3 of this Basic Law shall remain in force until adapted to that provision, but not beyond 31 March 1953.

(2) Laws that restrict freedom of movement in view of the present accommodation shortage shall remain in force until repealed by a federal law.

Article 118 [New delimitation of Baden and Württemberg]

The division of the territory comprising Baden, Württemberg-Baden and Württemberg-Hohenzollern into Länder may be revised, without regard to the provisions of Article 29, by agreement between the Länder concerned. If no agreement is reached, the revision shall be effected by a federal law, which shall provide for an advisory referendum.

Article 118a [New delimitation of Berlin and Brandenburg]

The division of the territory comprising Berlin and Brandenburg into Länder may be revised, without regard to the provisions of Article 29, by agreement between the two Länder with the participation of their inhabitants who are entitled to vote.

Article 119 [Refugees and expellees]

In matters relating to refugees and expellees, especially as regards their distribution among the Länder, the Federal Government, with the consent of the Bundesrat, may issue statutory instruments having the force of law, pending settlement of the matter by a federal law. In this connection the Federal Government may be authorised to issue individual instructions in particular cases. Unless time is of the essence, such instructions shall be addressed to the highest Land authorities.

Article 120 [Occupation costs – Burdens resulting from the war]

(1) The Federation shall finance the expenditures for occupation costs and other internal and external burdens resulting from the war, as regulated in detail by federal laws. To the extent that these war burdens were regulated by federal laws on or before 1 October 1969, the Federation and the Länder shall finance such expenditures in the proportion established by such federal laws. Insofar as expenditures for such of these war burdens as neither have been nor will be regulated by federal laws were met on or before 1 October 1965 by Länder, municipalities (associations of municipalities) or other entities performing functions of the Länder or municipalities, the Federation shall not be obliged to finance them even after that date. The Federation shall be responsible for subsidies towards meeting the costs of social security, including unemployment insurance and public assistance to the unemployed. The distribution of war burdens between the Federation and the Länder prescribed by this paragraph shall not be construed to affect any law regarding claims for compensation for consequences of the war.

(2) Revenue shall pass to the Federation at the time it assumes responsibility for the expenditures referred to in this Article.

Article 120a [Equalisation of burdens]

(1) Laws implementing the equalisation of burdens may, with the consent of the Bundesrat, provide that, with respect to equalisation payments, they shall be executed partly by the Federation and partly by the Länder acting on federal commission and that the relevant powers vested in the Federal Government and the competent highest federal authorities by virtue of Article 85 shall be wholly or partly delegated to the Federal Equalisation of Burdens Office. In exercising these powers, the Federal Equalisation of Burdens Office shall not require the consent of the Bundesrat; except in urgent cases, its instructions shall be given to the highest Land authorities (Land Equalisation of Burdens Offices).

(2) The second sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 87 shall not be affected by this provision.

Article 121 [Definition of "majority of the members"]

Within the meaning of this Basic Law, a majority of the Members of the Bundestag and a majority of the members of the Federal Convention shall be a majority of the number of their members specified by a law.

Article 122 [Date of transmission of legislative powers]

(1) From the date on which the Bundestag first convenes, laws shall be enacted only by the legislative bodies recognised by this Basic Law.

(2) Legislative bodies and institutions participating in the legislative process in an advisory capacity whose competence expires by virtue of paragraph (1) of this Article shall be dissolved as of that date.

Article 123 [Continued applicability of pre-existing law]

(1) Law in force before the Bundestag first convenes shall remain in force insofar as it does not conflict with this Basic Law.

(2) Subject to all rights and objections of interested parties, treaties concluded by the German Reich concerning matters within the legislative competence of the Länder under this Basic Law shall remain in force, provided they are and continue to be valid under general principles of law, until new treaties are concluded by the authorities competent under this Basic Law or until they are in some other way terminated pursuant to their provisions.

Article 124 [Continued applicability of law within the scope of exclusive legislative power]

Law regarding matters subject to the exclusive legislative power of the Federation shall become federal law in the area in which it applies.

Article 125 [Continued applicability of law within the scope of concurrent legislative power]

Law regarding matters subject to the concurrent legislative power of the Federation shall become federal law in the area in which it applies:

1. insofar as it applies uniformly within one or more occupation zones;
2. insofar as it is law by which former Reich law has been amended since 8 May 1945.

Article 125a [Continued applicability of federal law – Replacement by Land law]

(1) Law that was enacted as federal law but that, by virtue of the amendment of paragraph (1) of Article 74, the insertion of the seventh sentence of paragraph (1) of Article 84, of the second sentence of paragraph (1) of Article 85 or of the second sentence of paragraph (2a) of Article 105 or because of the repeal of Articles 74a, 75 or the second sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 98, could no longer be enacted as federal law shall remain in force as federal law. It may be superseded by Land law.

(2) Law that was enacted pursuant to paragraph (2) of Article 72 as it stood up to 15 November 1994 but which, because of the amendment of paragraph (2) of Article 72, could no longer be enacted as federal law shall remain in force as federal law. A federal law may provide that it may be superseded by Land law.

(3) Law that has been enacted as Land law but which, because of the amendment of Article 73, could not be enacted any longer as Land law shall continue in force as Land law. It may be superseded by federal law.

Article 125b [Continued applicability of framework laws – Deviation power of the Länder]

(1) Law that was enacted pursuant to Article 75 as it stood up to 1 September 2006 and which could be enacted as federal law even after this date shall remain in force as federal law. The powers and duties of the Länder to legislate shall, in this regard, remain unaffected. In the areas referred to in the first sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 72 the Länder may enact regulations that deviate from this law; however, in those areas covered by items 2, 5 and 6 of the first sentence of Article 72 the Länder may do so only if and insofar as the Federation has made use of its power to legislate after 1 September 2006, in those areas covered by items 2 and 5 beginning at the latest on 1 January 2010, in cases under item 6 beginning at the latest on 1 August 2008.

(2) The Länder may enact regulations derogating from federal regulations enacted pursuant to paragraph (1) of Article 84 as it stood up to 1 September 2006; up to 31 December 2008, however, they may derogate from regulations on administrative procedure only if, after 1 September 2006, regulations on administrative procedure in the relevant federal law have been amended.

(1) Law that was enacted by virtue of paragraph (2) of Article 91a in conjunction with item 1 of paragraph (1) as it stood up to 1 September 2006 shall continue in force until 31 December 2006.

(2) The rules enacted in the areas of municipal transport financing and promotion of social housing by virtue of paragraph (4) of Article 104a as it stood up to 1 September 2006 shall remain in force until 31 December 2006. The rules enacted on municipal transport financing for special programmes pursuant to paragraph (1) of section 6 of the Municipal Transport Infrastructure Financing Act, as well as the other rules enacted by the Act of 20 December 2001 governing the Federal Financing of Seaports in Bremen, Hamburg, Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, Lower Saxony and Schleswig-Holstein under paragraph (4) of Article 104a of the Basic Law as it stood up to 1 September 2006 shall continue in force until their repeal. Amendment of the Municipal Transport Infrastructure Financing Act shall be permissible. The fourth sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 104b shall apply, mutatis mutandis. The other rules enacted in accordance with paragraph (4) of Article 104a of the Basic Law as it stood up to 1 September 2006 shall continue in force until 31 December 2019, provided no earlier repeal has been or is determined.

(3) The fifth sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 104b shall apply for the first time to regulations that enter into force after 31 December 2019.

Article 126 [Determination about continued applicability of law as federal law]

Disagreements concerning the continued applicability of law as federal law shall be resolved by the Federal Constitutional Court.

Article 127 [Extension of law to the French zone and to Berlin]

Within one year after promulgation of this Basic Law the Federal Government, with the consent of the governments of the Länder concerned, may extend to the Länder of Baden, Greater Berlin, Rhineland-Palatinate and Württemberg-Hohenzollern any law of the Administration of the Combined Economic Area, insofar as it remains in force as federal law under Article 124 or 125.

Article 128 [Continued authority to issue instructions]

Insofar as law that remains in force grants authority to issue instructions within the meaning of paragraph (5) of Article 84, this authority shall remain in existence until a law otherwise provides.

Article 129 [Continued authority to issue legal acts]

(1) Insofar as legal provisions that remain in force as federal law grant authority to issue statutory instruments or general administrative rules or to make administrative decisions in individual cases, such powers shall pass to the authorities that henceforth have competence over the subject matter. In cases of doubt the Federal Government shall decide in agreement with the Bundesrat; such decisions shall be published.

(2) Insofar as legal provisions that remain in force as Land law grant such authority, it shall be exercised by the authorities competent under Land law.

(3) Insofar as legal provisions within the meaning of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article grant authority to amend or supplement the provisions themselves or to issue legal provisions that have the force of laws, such authority shall be deemed to have expired.

(4) The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to legal provisions that refer to provisions no longer in force or to institutions no longer in existence.

Article 130 [Transfer of existing administrative institutions]

(1) Administrative agencies and other institutions that serve the public administration or the administration of justice and are not based on Land law or on agreements between Länder, as well as the Administrative Union of South West German Railways and the Administrative Council for Postal and Telecommunications Services for the French Occupation Zone, shall be placed under the control of the Federal Government. The Federal Government, with the consent of the Bundesrat, shall provide for their transfer, dissolution or liquidation.

(2) The supreme disciplinary authority for the personnel of these administrative bodies and institutions shall be the competent Federal Minister.

(3) Corporations and institutions under public law not directly subordinate to a Land nor based on agreements between Länder shall be under the supervision of the competent highest federal authority.

Article 131 [Persons formerly in the public service]

The legal relations of persons, including refugees and expellees, who on 8 May 1945 were employed in the public service, have left the service for reasons other than those recognised by civil service regulations or collective bargaining agreements and have not yet been reinstated or are employed in positions that do not correspond to those they previously held shall be regulated by a federal law. The same shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to persons, including refugees and expellees, who on 8 May 1945 were entitled to pensions and related benefits and who for reasons other than those recognised by civil service regulations or collective bargaining agreements no longer receive any such pension or related benefits. Until the pertinent federal law takes effect, no legal claims may be made, unless Land law otherwise provides.

Article 132 [Retirement of civil servants]

(1) Civil servants and judges who enjoy life tenure when this Basic Law takes effect may, within six months after the Bundestag first convenes, be retired, suspended or transferred to lower-salaried positions if they lack the personal or professional aptitude for their present positions. This provision shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to salaried public employees other than civil servants or judges whose employment cannot be terminated at will. In the case of salaried employees whose employment may be terminated at will, notice periods longer than those set by collective bargaining agreements may be rescinded within the same period.

(2) The preceding provision shall not apply to members of the public service who are unaffected by the provisions regarding "Liberation from National Socialism and Militarism" or who are recognised victims of National Socialism, save on important personal grounds.

(3) Persons affected may have recourse to the courts in accordance with paragraph (4) of Article 19.

(4) Details shall be specified by a statutory instrument issued by the Federal Government with the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 133 [Succession to the Administration of the Combined Economic Area]

The Federation shall succeed to the rights and duties of the Administration of the Combined Economic Area.

Article 134 [Succession to Reich assets]

(1) Reich assets shall, in principle, become federal assets.

(2) Insofar as such assets were originally intended to be used principally for administrative tasks not entrusted to the Federation under this Basic Law, they shall be transferred without compensation to the authorities now entrusted with such tasks, and to the extent that such assets are now being used, not merely temporarily, for administrative tasks that under this Basic Law are now performed by the Länder, they shall be transferred to the Länder. The Federation may also transfer other assets to the Länder.

(3) Assets that were placed at the disposal of the Reich without compensation by Länder or municipalities (associations of municipalities) shall revert to those Länder or municipalities (associations of municipalities) insofar as the Federation does not require them for its own administrative purposes.

(4) Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 135 [Assets in case of territorial changes between the Länder]

(1) If, after 8 May 1945 and before the effective date of this Basic Law, an area has passed from one Land to another, the Land to which the area now belongs shall be entitled to the assets of the Land to which it previously belonged that are located in that area.

(2) The assets of Länder or of other corporations or institutions established under public law that no longer exist, insofar as they were originally intended to be used principally for administrative tasks or are now being so used, not merely temporarily, shall pass to the Land, corporation or institution that now performs those tasks.

(3) Real property of Länder that no longer exist, including appurtenances, shall pass to the Land within which it is located, insofar as it is not among the assets already referred to in paragraph (1) of this Article.

(4) Insofar as an overriding interest of the Federation or the particular interest of a region requires, a federal law may depart from the rules prescribed by paragraphs (1) to (3) of this Article.

(5) In all other respects, the succession to and disposition of assets, insofar as it has not been effected before 1 January 1952 by agreement between the affected Länder or corporations or institutions established under public law, shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(6) Holdings of the former Land of Prussia in enterprises established under private law shall pass to the Federation. Details shall be regulated by a federal law, which may also depart from this provision.

(7) Insofar as assets that, on the effective date of this Basic Law, would devolve upon a Land or a corporation or institution established under public law pursuant to paragraphs (1) to (3) of this Article have been disposed of by or pursuant to a Land law or in any other manner by the party thus entitled, the transfer of assets shall be deemed to have taken place before such disposition.

Article 135a [Old debts]

(1) Federal legislation enacted pursuant to paragraph (4) of Article 134 or paragraph (5) of Article 135 may also provide that the following debts shall not be discharged, or that they shall be discharged only in part:

1. debts of the Reich, of the former Land of Prussia, or of such other corporations and institutions established under public law as no longer exist;

2. such debts of the Federation or of corporations and institutions established under public law as are connected with the transfer of assets pursuant to Article 89, 90, 134 or 135 and such debts of these bodies as arise from measures taken by the bodies designated in item 1;

3. such debts of the Länder or municipalities (associations of municipalities) as have arisen from measures taken by them before 1 August 1945 within the framework of administrative functions incumbent upon or delegated by the Reich to comply with orders of the occupying powers or to terminate a state of emergency resulting from the war.

(2) Paragraph (1) of this Article shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to debts of the German Democratic Republic or its institutions as well as to debts of the Federation or other corporations and institutions established under public law that are connected with the transfer of assets of the German Democratic Republic to the Federation, Länder or municipalities, and to debts arising from measures taken by the German Democratic Republic or its institutions.

Article 136 [First convening of the Bundesrat]

(1) The Bundesrat shall convene for the first time on the day on which the Bundestag first convenes.

(2) Until the election of the first Federal President, his powers shall be exercised by the President of the Bundesrat. He shall not have authority to dissolve the Bundestag.

Article 137 [Right of state employees to stand for election]

(1) The right of civil servants, other salaried public employees, professional or volunteer members of the Armed Forces and judges to stand for election in the Federation, in the Länder or in the municipalities may be restricted by a law.

(2) The election of the first Bundestag, of the first Federal Convention and of the first Federal President shall be governed by an electoral law to be enacted by the Parliamentary Council.

(3) Until the Federal Constitutional Court is established, its authority under paragraph (2) of Article 41 shall be exercised by the German High Court for the Combined Economic Area, which shall make determinations in accordance with its procedural rules.

Article 138 [South German notaries]

Changes in the rules governing the notarial profession as it now exists in the Länder of Baden, Bavaria, Württemberg-Baden and Württemberg-Hohenzollern shall require the consent of the governments of these Länder.

Article 139 [Continued applicability of denazification provisions]

The legal provisions enacted for the "Liberation of the German People from National Socialism and Militarism" shall not be affected by the provisions of this Basic Law.

Article 140 [Law of religious denominations]

The provisions of Articles 136, 137, 138, 139 and 141 of the German Constitution of 11 August 1919 shall be an integral part of this Basic Law.

Article 141 ["Bremen Clause"]

The first sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 7 shall not apply in any Land in which Land law otherwise provided on 1 January 1949.

Article 142 [Reservation in favour of basic rights in Land constitutions]

Notwithstanding Article 31, provisions of Land constitutions shall also remain in force insofar as they guarantee basic rights in conformity with Articles 1 to 18 of this Basic Law.

Article 142a [Repealed]

Article 143 [Duration of derogations from the Basic Law]

(1) The law in the territory specified in Article 3 of the Unification Treaty may derogate from provisions of this Basic Law for a period extending no later than 31 December 1992 insofar and so long as disparate circumstances make full compliance impossible. Derogations may not violate paragraph (2) of Article 19 and must be compatible with the principles specified in paragraph (3) of Article 79.

(2) Derogations from Titles II, VIII, VIIIa, IX, X and XI shall be permissible for a period extending to no later than 31 December 1995.

(3) Independently of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article, Article 41 of the Unification Treaty and the rules for its implementation shall also remain in effect insofar as they provide for the irreversibility of acts interfering with property rights in the territory specified in Article 3 of this Treaty.

Article 143a [Exclusive legislative power concerning federal railways]

(1) The Federation shall have exclusive power to legislate with respect to all matters arising from the transformation of federal railways administered by the Federation into business enterprises. Paragraph (5) of Article 87e shall apply, mutatis mutandis. Civil servants employed by federal railways may be assigned by a law to render services to federal railways established under private law without prejudice to their legal status or the responsibility of their employer.

(2) Laws enacted pursuant to paragraph (1) of this Article shall be executed by the Federation.

(3) The Federation shall continue to be responsible for local passenger services of the former federal railways until 31 December 1995. The same shall apply to the corresponding functions of rail transport administration. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 143b [Transformation of the Deutsche Bundespost]

(1) The special trust Deutsche Bundespost shall be transformed into enterprises under private law in accordance with a federal law. The Federation shall have exclusive power to legislate with respect to all matters arising from this transformation.

(2) The exclusive rights of the Federation existing before the transformation may be transferred by a federal law for a transitional period to the enterprises that succeed to the Deutsche Bundespost Postdienst and to the Deutsche Bundespost Telekom. The Federation may not surrender its majority interest in the enterprise that succeeds to the Deutsche Bundespost Postdienst until at least five years after the law takes effect. To do so shall require a federal law with the consent of the Bundesrat.

(3) Federal civil servants employed by the Deutsche Bundespost shall be given positions in the private enterprises that succeed to it, without prejudice to their legal status or the responsibility of their employer. The enterprises shall exercise the employer's authority. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 143c [Compensation for the cessation of joint tasks]

(1) From 1 January 2007 until 31 December 2019, the Länder shall be entitled to receive annual payments from the federal budget as compensation for losing the Federation's financial contributions resulting from the abolition of the joint tasks of extension and construction of institutions of higher education, including university hospitals and educational planning, as well as for losing financial assistance for the improvement of municipal traffic infrastructure and for the promotion of social housing. Until 31 December 2013, these amounts are to be determined by averaging the financial share of the Federation for the years 2000 to 2008.

(2) Until 31 December 2013, the payments pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be distributed among the Länder in the form of:

1. fixed annual payments the amounts of which shall be determined according to the average share of each Land during the period 2000 to 2003;

2. payments earmarked for the functional area of the former joint financing.

(3) Until the end of 2013, the Federation and the Länder shall review the extent to which the financing allotted to individual Länder pursuant to paragraph (1) is still appropriate and necessary for the discharge of their tasks. Beginning on 1 January 2014, the earmarking pursuant to item 2 of paragraph (2) of the financial means allotted under paragraph (1) shall cease; the earmarking for the volume of the means for investment purposes shall remain unchanged. Agreements resulting from Solidarity Pact II shall remain unaffected.

(4) Details shall be regulated by a federal law which shall require the consent of the Bundesrat.

Article 143d [Transitional provisions relating to consolidation assistance]

(1) Articles 109 and 115 in the version in force until 31 July 2009 shall apply for the last time to the 2010 budget. Articles 109 and 115 in the version in force as from 1 August 2009 shall apply for the first time to the 2011 budget; debit authorisations existing on 31 December 2010 for special trusts already established shall remain unaffected. In the period from 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2019, the Länder may, in accordance with their applicable legal regulations, derogate from the provisions of paragraph (3) of Article 109. The budgets of the Länder are to be planned in such a way that the 2020 budget fulfils the requirements of the fifth sentence of paragraph (3) of Article 109. In the period from 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2015, the Federation may derogate from the provisions of the second sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 115. The reduction of the existing deficits should begin with the 2011 budget. The annual budgets are to be planned in such a way that the 2016 budget satisfies the requirement of the second sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 115; details shall be regulated by federal law.

(2) As assistance for compliance with the provisions of paragraph (3) of Article 109 after 1 January 2020, the Länder of Berlin, Bremen, Saarland, Saxony-Anhalt and Schleswig-Holstein may receive, for the period 2011 to 2019, consolidation assistance from the federal budget in the global amount of 800 million euros annually. The respective amounts are 300 million euros for Bremen, 260 million euros for Saarland and 80 million euros each for Berlin, Saxony-Anhalt, and Schleswig-Holstein. The assistance payments shall be allocated on the basis of an administrative agreement under the terms of a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. These grants require a complete reduction of financial deficits by the end of 2020. The details, especially the annual steps to be taken to reduce financial deficits and the supervision of the reduction of financial deficits by the Stability Council, along with theconsequences entailed in case of failure to carry out the step-by-step reduction, shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat and by an administrative agreement. Consolidation assistance shall not be granted concurrently with redevelopment assistance awarded on the grounds of an extreme budgetary emergency.

(3) The financial burden resulting from the granting of the consolidation assistance shall be borne equally by the Federation and the Länder, to be financed from their share of revenue from the turnover tax. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(4) As assistance for future autonomous compliance with the provisions of paragraph (3) of Article 109, the Länder of Bremen and Saarland may receive redevelopment assistance from the federal budget in the global amount of 800 million euros annually from 1 January 2020. To this end, the Länder shall adopt measures to reduce excessive debts and to strengthen their economic and financial capacity. Details shall be regulated by a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat. This redevelopment assistance shall not be granted concurrently with redevelopment assistance awarded on the grounds of an extreme budgetary emergency.

Article 143e [Federal motorways, transformation of commissioned administration]

(1) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (2) of Article 90, the federal motorways shall be administered on federal commission by the Länder or such self-governing bodies as are competent under Land law until no later than 31 December 2020. The Federation shall regulate the transformation from commissioned administration to federal administration under paragraphs (2) and (4) of Article 90 by means of a federal law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

(2) At the request of a Land, to be made by 31 December 2018, the Federation, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (2) of Article 90, shall assume administrative responsibility for the other federal trunk roads, insofar as they lie within the territory of that Land, with effect from 1 January 2021.

(3) By a federal law with the consent of the Bundesrat, it may be regulated that a Land, upon application, takes over, on commission of the Federation, the function of administering plan approval and planning permission for the construction and alteration of federal motorways and other federal trunk roads for which the Federation has assumed administrative responsibility under paragraph (4) of Article 90 or paragraph (2) of Article 143e and on what conditions this function may be transferred back.

Article 143f [Financial relations within the federal system of government]

Article 143d, the Act regulating Revenue Sharing between the Federation and the Länder (Financial Equalisation Act) and other laws enacted on the basis of paragraph (2) of Article 107 as it stands from 1 January 2020 shall expire if, after 31 December 2030, the Federal Government, the Bundestag or at least three Länder acting jointly have requested negotiations on a restructuring of financial relations within the federal system of government and, when five years have elapsed since the Federal President was notified of the negotiation request made by the Federal Government, the Bundestag or the Länder, no statutory restructuring of financial relations within the federal system of government has entered into force. The expiry date shall be published in the Federal Law Gazette.

Article 143g [Continued applicability of Article 107]

For the regulation of the distribution of tax revenue, of financial equalisation between Länder and of federal supplementary grants, Article 107 as it stood until the entry into force of the Basic Law Amendment Act of 13 July 2017 shall continue to be applied until 31 December 2019.

Article 144 [Ratification of the Basic Law – Berlin]

(1) This Basic Law shall require ratification by the parliaments of two thirds of the German Länder in which it is initially to apply.

(2) Insofar as the application of this Basic Law is subject to restrictions in any Land listed in Article 23 or in any part thereof, such Land or part thereof shall have the right to send representatives to the Bundestag in accordance with Article 38 and to the Bundesrat in accordance with Article 50.

Article 145 [Entry into force of the Basic Law]

(1) The Parliamentary Council, with the participation of the members for Greater Berlin, shall confirm the ratification of this Basic Law in public session and shall certify and promulgate it.

(2) This Basic Law shall take effect at the end of the day on which it is promulgated.

(3) It shall be published in the Federal Law Gazette.

Article 146 [Duration of the Basic Law]

This Basic Law, which, since the achievement of the unity and freedom of Germany, applies to the entire German people, shall cease to apply on the day on which a constitution freely adopted by the German people takes effect.

Appendix to the Basic Law

Extracts from the German Constitution of August 11, 1919 [Weimar Constitution]

Religion and Religious Societies

Article 136

(1) Civil and political rights and duties shall be neither dependent upon nor restricted by the exercise of religious freedom.

(2) Enjoyment of civil and political rights and eligibility for public office shall be independent of religious affiliation.

(3) No person shall be required to disclose his religious convictions. The authorities shall have the right to inquire into a person's membership of a religious society only to the extent that rights or duties depend upon it or that a statistical survey mandated by a law so requires.

(4) No person may be compelled to perform any religious act or ceremony, to participate in religious exercises or to take a religious form of oath.

Article 137

(1) There shall be no state church.

(2) The freedom to form religious societies shall be guaranteed. The union of religious societies within the territory of the Reich shall be subject to no restrictions.

(3) Religious societies shall regulate and administer their affairs independently within the limits of the law that applies to all. They shall confer their offices without the participation of the state or the civil community.

(4) Religious societies shall acquire legal capacity according to the general provisions of civil law.

(5) Religious societies shall remain corporations under public law insofar as they have enjoyed that status in the past. Other religious societies shall be granted the same rights upon application, if their constitution and the number of their members give assurance of their permanency. If two or more religious societies established under public law unite into a single organisation, it too shall be a corporation under public law.

(6) Religious societies that are corporations under public law shall be entitled to levy taxes on the basis of the civil taxation lists in accordance with Land law.

(7) Associations whose purpose is to foster a philosophical creed shall have the same status as religious societies.

(8) Such further regulation as may be required for the implementation of these provisions shall be a matter for Land legislation.

Article 138

(1) Rights of religious societies to public subsidies on the basis of a law, contract or special grant shall be redeemed by legislation of the Länder. The principles governing such redemption shall be established by the Reich.

(2) Property rights and other rights of religious societies or associations in their institutions, foundations and other assets intended for purposes of worship, education or charity shall be guaranteed.

Article 139

Sunday and holidays recognised by the state shall remain protected by law as days of rest from work and of spiritual improvement.

Article 141

To the extent that a need exists for religious services and pastoral work in the army, in hospitals, in prisons or in other public institutions, religious societies shall be permitted to provide them, but without compulsion of any kind.

INTRODUCTION TO GERMAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND THE DOCTRINE OF BASIC RIGHTS

By Jürgen Bröhmer

I. Introduction

1. Brief Historical Context

When on 23 May 1949, the Basic Law of the new Federal Republic of Germany came into effect the new country still lay largely in ruins. The ruins were not only of bricks and mortar. Perhaps more importantly, there was the complete moral devastation the country had experienced between 1933 and 1945. How was it possible that a proud nation, the home of countless thinkers, scientists and artists, a country with one of the most educated general populations at the time became one of the most barbaric nations the world ever had to endure? To create a governmental order that safeguards future generations from unrestrained rampages of evil was the primary goal of the 61 fathers and four mothers of the Basic Law. Much if not all that happens and has happened in Germany, from subsequent constitutional reforms to the terror years of the Red Army Faction, from Germany's reunification in 1990 to Germany's participation in the development of the European Union, from the federal structure of Germany to the special role of its Constitutional Court can only be understood against the historical background of the annihilation brought onto others and self between 1933 and 1945. The Basic Law is the child of this catastrophe.

The Basic Law is also a child of the Allied Powers and the occupational power exercised by them in Germany after the end of World War II in 1945. Soon it became clear that the emerging cold war between the western powers, i.e., the USA, United Kingdom, and France on the one side and the Soviet Union on the other would make any solution for Germany as a whole, impossible for the time being. As a result, the western powers, together with Germany's neighboring countries, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg held a conference in London in 1948.[1] This conference brought about the Frankfurt Documents which contained some ground rules for a new post-war constitution for what was to become West Germany in 1949, the institutional framework for its adoption including the prescription of a constitutional assembly as well as principles for the relationship of the new state to be formed and the western allied powers.

The German Constitution and its Court

The Parliamentary Council was the constitutional assembly created based on the allied blueprint communicated in the Frankfurt Documents. It met for the first time in the old University City of Bonn on the banks of the Rhine River on 1 September 1948.[2] Under the Chairmanship of Konrad Adenauer[3], soon to become Chancellor of the Federal Republic and to remain in office for just over 14 years, 65 members altogether, 61 men and four women[4], elected to the Council by the parliaments of the 11 Länder (states) which were to become part of the new West-German federation and had already previously been established, and representing the political spectrum from the communist left to the national right with a solid majority for the large center-left and center-right parties[5] came together to draft the new Basic Law in less than nine months. The Basic Law was not the result of a grassroots' democratic movement in Germany. It was drafted under the close supervision of the western Allies by a group of dignitaries and experts; the broader public couldn't have cared much less at the time.[6]

The drafters did not at all intend this document to be lasting. To the contrary, they went to great length to emphasize the fact that it was merely to guide a transitional, and in that sense unwanted regime to overcome the emerging new geopolitical reality of a Germany divided by the cold war. The absence of any direct democratic legitimization of the new constitutional order and its very name - Basic Law rather than 'constitution' - together with the express stipulation of its transitional character in the original Preamble[7] and in Article 146[8] were deliberate steps taken to communicate this provisional character.

However, provisional as the document was intended to be it was from the beginning a constitution heavily drawn on the lessons to be learned from the failure of the first republican and democratic constitution of Germany, the Weimar Constitution of 1919, and from the unprecedented disregard for human dignity, life and freedom shown in the twelve years between 1933 and 1945. At the beginning, like a beacon of light and hope, stood and stand Articles 1 to 19 containing a catalogue of fundamental rights of freedoms and defining parameters and limits for governmental intervention in those rights and freedoms, guarded by Article 20.3 and the fundamental difference between law and justice expressed therein, by Article 79.3, which disallows any and all changes to the fundamental core principals of the Basic Law and by Article 20.4 which grants all Germans the ultima ratio right to resistance against those who might wish to overthrow this order.

5 The Christian-Democratic Union and the Social-Democratic Party held 27 seats each for a combined total 54 of the 65 seats. These two parties remained as dominant political forces. However, for several years now and growing there appeasr to be a trend that the electoral support for these two parties is slipping considerably; for the Social Democrats this is happening in dramatic fashion and not only in Germany. At the time of writing even the combined weight of these two parties could not create a majority in Parliament anymore.

6 The new Republic started with 40% of the population being indifferent to the Basic Law and only 21% interested in the new Constitution and in 1955 more than half of the population did not know about the Basic Law, see Voränder, Hans, Die Deutschen und ihre Verfassung, Aus Politik und Zeitgeschichte (APuZ) 18-19/ 2009, p. 8 at 9, http://www.bpb.de/apuz/32021/die-deutschen-und-ihre-verfassung (last accessed 15.9.2019).

2. Principal Structure of the Basic Law

The principal content and structure of the Basic Law largely follows what might be expected from a constitutional document. A preamble preludes followed by the first chapter "Basic Rights" extending from Article 1 through to Article 19 and complemented by procedural guarantees in Articles 101 to 104.

Article 1 is the foundation norm insofar as all basic rights and freedoms have a core that can and must be traced to human dignity and hence to an understanding of the human being that precedes the law and regards individual rights not as something bestowed upon men and women in an act of benevolent largesse by other human beings but as an inherent quality of all human beings. However, it does so without suggesting any explanation for this assumption of human dignity, leaving it to those governed by the Basic Law to come to their own conclusions, be they .law oriented or more technocratic reduced to ideas of social contracts or the like.[9]

The second chapter (Articles 20 - 37) contains a bouquet of norms under the somewhat misleading title "The Federation and the Länder" to do with the foundation, objectives, and purposes of the state, its relationship to international law, its participation in the development of the European Union and its internal federal structure. Article 20 is one of the core foundational norms of the Basic Law. Article 21 describes the role of political parties in the democratic process. Article 22 stipulates the colors of the German flag and, after a recent amendment, that Berlin is the capital city. Article 23 was introduced in the wake of the Maastricht Treaty on the European Union and addressed Germany's participation in the development of the European Union and some internal federal problems arising from membership in this highly integrated supranational organization. Article 24 regulates the transfer of sovereign power to international organizations outside the European Union and, for example, governs Germany's membership and collaboration in organizations of collective security such as NATO[10] and the United Nations.[11] Article 25 stipulates the precedence of norms of customary international law over domestic statutory - but not constitutional - law. Article 26 forbids any engaging in or preparation for military aggression or other action intended at disturbing international peace. Article 27 deals with the merchant fleet. Article 28 requires the constituent states to be organized in accordance with fundamental principles of democracy and the rule of law and guarantees a meaningful standard of municipal self-government. Article 29 is one of the longest provisions of the Basic Law and prescribes detailed procedures for internal territorial restructures such as amalgamations of Länder or redrawing of internal borders. Article 30 stipulates the principle of enumerated powers. The federal authorities may only exercise those powers specifically assigned to them by the Basic Law and all residual powers rest with the Länder. This principle is repeated for the exercise of legislative power in Article 70. The refreshingly short and precise Article 31 stipulates the precedence of federal law over the law of the Länder. Article 32 deals with foreign affairs assigning the principal functions in this respect to the central level but leaving some powers for the Länder as well. Article 33 stipulates the equal citizenship rights for all German citizens regardless of what constituent Land they live in, demands that all citizens have equal access to public office in the civil service (to be read in conjunction with Article 36) and guarantees the independent and impartial function of the civil service. Article 34 deals with state liability for wrongful acts and Article 35 regulates legal and administrative assistance in the case of natural disasters or threats to public security. The provision currently restricts any assistance of the military forces to natural disasters which has led to calls for amending it to allow for a greater internal role of the military, for example in the case of a major terrorist attack. Article 37 gives the Federation the power to enforce the Basic Law in the Länder should a Land fail to comply with it. The provision has never been used.

The next five chapters deal with the organs of the state, their composition, principal powers, and task and other specific issues pertaining to them.

Articles 38 to 48 are concerned with the Federal Parliament, the Bundestag.[12] The electoral principles - general, direct, free, equal and secret elections - and the status of the deputies as independent representatives of the whole people (and not their party) and their remuneration are addressed in Articles 38 and 48[13]; the electoral term is governed by Article 39 and election oversight by Article 41. Several articles address the Committee structure of the Bundestag and other powers such as the power to summon members of the government. The Bundestag legislates its own rules of procedure, which address in detail its procedures and the rights of the individual deputies, the parliamentary groups and factions, the Committees, the conduct of hearings, debates and question times and other related issues.

Articles 50 to 53 deal with the Federal Chamber, the Bundesrat[14], an institution that allows the Länder a high degree of co-decision powers in the federal legislative process (Article 50). The Länder are represented in the Bundesrat by members of their executive branches (governments) and voting is weighted according to the size of the respective Land (Article 52).

14 See https://www.bundesrat.de/EN/homepage/homepage-node.html (last accessed 15.9.2019).

Article 53a regulates the Joint Committee, a conference committee of Bundestag and Bundesrat to deal with cases of legislative deadlock, i.e., bills that were successfully passed in one house but could not muster a majority in the other and therefore require compromise negotiations.

Articles 54 to 61 spell out the status and relatively minor powers of the Federal President, the formal Head of State. Articles 62 to 69 do the same for the Federal Government, which consists of the Federal Chancellor, currently Angela Merkel of the Christian-Democratic Union, and the various government ministers (Article 62).[15] Germany is a parliamentary democracy; hence, the Chancellor is elected by the Parliament (Bundestag, Article 63). The Basic Law affords a constitutional leadership role to the Chancellor in deciding the principles of the political agenda of the Federal Government (Article 65) but in practice much depends on the political strength of the various players in the political arena. The Bundestag may elect a new chancellor by a constructive vote of no-confidence (Article 67) at any time.[16] The pathways for dissolution of the Bundestag and new elections outside the regular electoral term are much more restricted (Articles 67 and 68).

Chapter VII of the Basic Law deals with the legislative process and legislative powers of the federal parliament. The principal norm reflecting the underlying principle of enumerated powers is repeated in Article 70. The distribution of legislative powers between the Federation and its constituent Länder has been the subject of significant constitutional reform and reallocation recently.[17] The Basic Law distinguishes between exclusive legislative powers of the Federation and concurring powers, where the power to legislate resides with the constituent Länder until and insofar as these powers are or have been taken up by the Federation. Both sets of powers are governed by extensive sets of subject matter catalogs attributing specific powers to the federal level (Article 73 for exclusive powers, Article 74 for concurring powers). Articles 76 to 82 stipulate the details of the legislative procedure beginning with the introduction of a bill (Article 76.1) to the final signature of the Federal President (Article 82).

Articles 83 to 91 of Chapter VIII address the issues of administration and implementation of federal law. Legislative and administrative powers are treated differently in the Basic Law. From the perspective of the Federation, possessing the legislative power is not tantamount to possessing the power to administer, implement, and execute the legislation. The principal of 16 As opposed to a destructive vote of no confidence. In a constructive no confidence vote, a majority must be found that is willing to elect a new chancellor whereas in a destructive no confidence vote the majority must only agree to oust the present government or head of government without electing a new one.

17 Amendments to the Basic Law as a result of stage 1 of the federalism reform effort came into force in 2006. For more background see Stecker, Christian, The effects of federalism reform on the legislative process in Germany, 26/5 Regional & Federal Studies 2016, 603, https://doi.org/10.1080/13597566.2016.1236334; see also http://webarchiv.bundestag.de/archive/2008/0506/htdocs_e/parliament/bodies/federalism1/index.html (Stage I of the reforms). Stage II of the constitutional reforms was concerned with the financial relationship between the Federation and the Länder, see Heinz, Dominic, Federal Reform II in Germany, 2/2 Perspectives on Federalism 2010 (Centro Studi Sul Federalismo), http://on-federalism.eu/attachments/071_download.pdf (last accessed 15.9.2019).

enumerated powers governs this field as well and the Länder hold all administrative powers unless otherwise stipulated in the Basic Law in general and in the provisions of Chapter VIII in particular (Article 83 and, for example, Articles 87 to 87f).

Chapter IX (Articles 92 to 104) is concerned with the judicial power of the Federal Republic. The judicial power is vested in independent (Article 97) judges and federal and state courts (Article 92). Article 95 names the five supreme federal courts for general civil and criminal, labor, administrative, welfare, and tax matters. Articles 93 and 94 deal with the jurisdiction and composition of the Federal Constitutional Court. The Court has shaped the constitutional reality of the Federal Republic to a degree that can hardly be overestimated. Its role as the guardian of the Basic Law in general and for the fundamental rights and freedoms in particular can only be described as a blessing for the country, notwithstanding the occasional aberration or even fundamental mistake inherent in any human activity.

Chapter X (Articles 104a to 115) contains the financial constitution of the Federal Republic, i.e., provisions concerning income (taxes and distribution of tax income) and expenditure (budget and debt). The complexity of these issues and their political significance is illustrated by the fact that these provisions are very long, very complicated, not overly well-drafted, and often unbefitting of a constitution. This notwithstanding, it is these provisions that have largely defined the special strand of German federalism and have ensured that the constituent Länder and their independent role has not been overtaken to the same degree by the power of the federal purse as can be observed in other large federal systems such for example the USA and Australia. One important question in this regard is the control and limitation of public debt. Despite the relative lack of success in trying to control and limit public debt by legal means the German constitutional legislator has just recently amended the relevant Article 115 of the Basic Law intending to limit the amount of deficit spending in the budget process.[18]

Chapter Xa (Articles 115a to 115l) was included into the Basic Law in 1968 - after great controversy and student revolts - and addresses the state of war and the effects these will have on the running of the government.

The final Chapter XI contains an assortment of transitional and concluding provisions reaching from the definition of German citizenship (Article 116) to the integration of some norms of the Weimar Constitution of 1919 about the relationship between state and churches. Finally, Article 146 provides that the Basic Law can be replaced at any time by a new constitution adopted freely by the German people.

18 57th Amendment to the Basic Law of 29.7.2009, Official Journal of the Federal Republic of Germany (BGBl.), Part I, p. 2248 (2009).

II. The Basic Law's Fundamental Norms and State Objectives

1. The Preamble of the Basic Law

The Preamble is part of the Basic Law, therefore subject to amendment and has been amended, namely in 1990 to replace all references to reunification and the transitional character of the Basic Law after completion of German unity in 1990.[19] It has normative character[20] mainly concerning the nomination of state objectives of which the successfully achieved reunification of Germany was one. The other two pivotal state objectives of the Federal Republic are "the promotion of world peace" in which the Federal Republic is to engage as "an equal partner in a united Europe", thus requiring the Federal Republic to play a positive role in the - undefined development of this united Europe. Both of these goals had and have direct impacts on the interpretation of subsequent norms of the Basic Law.[21]

2. Article 1 of the Basic Law - More than Human Dignity

Article 1 of the Basic Law is a cornerstone of the Basic Law in general and the anchor provision for its system of fundamental rights protection. Commencing with the stipulation of the inviolability of human dignity and commanding state authority to actively protect it is a deliberate contrast and consequence from the terror years of the Nazi regime and from a perceived shortcoming of the Weimar Constitution that preceded that regime, which mentioned human dignity in a rather peripheral manner. The core message is the primacy of the individual over the state. The state as the embodiment of human community is there to serve the individual members of the community and thus the community as a whole and not the other way around. The supreme concept of human dignity, as inherently vague as it is, together with the reference to "justice" in Article 20.3 of the Basic Law, could, from a common law perspective, be regarded as a kind of incorporation of natural law in the codification that constitutes the Basic Law.

Notwithstanding the great significance of the protection of human dignity both as the anchor provision and pivot of fundamental rights protection, its practical relevance has been reduced by the fact that no violation of human dignity is conceivable that would not also violate one of the more specific fundamental rights spelled out in the Basic Law. The protection of human dignity in Article 1 Basic Law is in that sense not legally necessary to achieve comprehensive fundamental rights protection and the lack of a similar clause in the European Convention of Human Rights illustrates this impressively. However, the example of the European Convention[22] as well as many other - domestic and international treaties also illustrate impressively that the protection of fundamental rights is only comprehensible against the backdrop of a specific understanding of the role and status of the individual human being and the abstract concept of human dignity is the embodiment of that understanding.

Article 1.2 adds to the dignity protection by linking it to the programmatic declaration and recognition of human rights protection as the foundation of any human community and as a foundation for peace and justice. Human rights protect the individual and secure a sphere of individual autonomy against the state. That said, the Basic Law does not pair community and state on the one hand and human rights, on the other hand, antagonistically against each other. By contrast, human rights protection is regarded as an inherent and indispensable precondition for communal peace and justice.

Article 1.3 is a key norm in its own right because it clarifies that all fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law are directly applicable and justiciable "hard-law" obligations for all state authority. The fundamental rights of the Basic Law directly limit the exercise of executive, legislative, and judicial power. The possibility of judicial review for acts of parliament is an indirect consequence that has found its direct expression in the role afforded to the Constitutional Court in Article 93 of the Basic Law.

The stipulation of the legislative, executive and judicial authority as addressees of the obligations flowing from fundamental rights of freedoms also clarifies that these rights do not directly obligate private individuals. The primary function of fundamental rights is the defense of individual autonomy vis-à-vis the state and not the limitation of individual autonomy vis-à-vis other individuals. However, the fundamental rights of the basic law do have considerable effect between private parties - so-called indirect third party effect - because of their objective function as a determining guide for the interpretation of private (civil) law norms. Such norms, especially the generic legal terms used, for example, in the German Civil Code, must be interpreted in the light of the fundamental rights of the Basic Law. That has consequences for example in damage cases for defamation because the incriminated speech might be protected under the free speech guarantee.

3. Article 20 of the Basic Law - Core Principles

Article 20 is the central foundational norm defining the status of the German Federation. Article 20.1 describes and prescribes what kind of state Germany is and must be - a democratic, social, and federal republic. Article 20.3 adds to these attributes the rule of law as a fourth one by making it clear that any legislative action must be constitutional and any actions of the executive branch and the judiciary are bound by the constitution and the statutory and other law in effect at the time.

However, Article 20.3, again in direct consequence of the experiences of the Nazi dictatorship, also stipulates that state action is not only bound and determined by positive law but also by the meta-positivist notion of justice. Not everything that is legal is just as legal norms can be drafted to allow for or even demand to commit the most heinous crimes perceivable. Legality and legitimacy are different concepts. In the case of the order established by the Basic Law that conflict could only eventuate if forces had succeeded in usurping this order and at least practically rendering it ineffective. That would have to include, for example, eliminating effective access to the courts and the Constitutional Court in particular. Should such a constitutional crisis occur Article 20.4 expressly provides for a right to resistance for all Germans, including armed resistance should that prove to be necessary.

Article 20.2 elaborates on the democratic principle adopted for the Federal Republic of Germany. The people are the sovereign but they exercise their sovereignty in the form of indirect parliamentary democracy by way of elections and delegate the exercise of authority to the various organs and institutions of the state, the Federal Parliament (Bundestag) being the most significant. All state action must be traceable to the people as the sovereign, acting through Parliament to which everybody else is directly or indirectly accountable and which in turn answers to the people. Section 2 also makes it clear that the Basic Law's notion of democracy is not one of direct democracy where the people can directly legislate and circumvent parliament. The absence of practically all elements of direct democracy, though more the rule than the exception around the world at least concerning central rather than local or regional affairs[23], has been criticized by some as a weakness of the Basic Law. However, the proponents of more direct democracy elements in the Basic Law have so far not found sufficient support.[24]

The rule of law,[25] as described in Article 20.3, is an abstract principle with many practical emanations. The supremacy of law (and justice) and of the Basic Law over all other domestic law is only one albeit a very important one. Of immense practical significance is the notion that for law to rule any state action must be determined by the law and hence any state action must have an identifiable base in the law. All individuals must have access to the courts to be able to have their legal rights assessed by an independent judicial body. One consequence of this is that any action by public authorities limiting the rights of individuals is only legally possible if provided for in the law. From the perspective of the citizen everything is legal unless prohibited by law. From the perspective of state authority any action by state authority is illegal unless specifically authorized by law.

Another emanation of the rule of law is that legal norms must be formulated with sufficient clarity so that those at whom they are addressed can understand what is required of them. This is, of course, a difficult proposition in times of complex and highly abstract tax and social systems. It should be kept in mind that from the perspective of the separation of powers, any

24 Some member states of the European Union either have at least the constitutional possibility or are outright required to hold public referenda on some issues, the development of European integration by way of new treaties being one example. The fact that such referenda took place in a number of member states, for example on the Draft Constitutional Treaty of the European Union, has also prompted demands for such an option in Germany where the Basic Law as it stands today does not allow for referenda and would have to be amended accordingly. The more recent developments after the Brexit referendum in the UK show that referendums can have a very divisive effect. Among EU member states referenda are not infrequent with 46 EU-related referenda between 1972 and 2017, see Beach, Derek, Referendums in the European Union, Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics, 26.2.2018, https://oxfordre.com/politics/view/10.1093/acrefore/9780190228637.001.0001/acrefore-9780190228637-e-503 (last accessed 15.9.2019).

25 The English term "rule of law" can only rudimentarily convey the full scope of the meaning of the German term "Rechtsstaat".

imprecision in law-making always expands the role of the judiciary as the branch of government responsible for the interpretation of norms. Sufficient clarity is especially important in the area of criminal law where sanctions for violations are inherently harsh (e.g., fines or even deprivation of liberty). A further aspect of the rule of law is the prohibition of retroactive laws. Norms, whether criminal law norms or, for example, tax laws, can only be adhered to when people can know about them. Norms that have not even been passed at the time of the conduct in question can therefore not be applied to this conduct.[26]

Of pivotal importance in the context of the rule of law is the principle of proportionality, which for all practical purposes dominates the fundamental rights protection regime under the Basic Law. The principle of proportionality involves the application of a three-pronged test to all state action. Firstly, state action must be able to reach the objective for which it is undertaken. Secondly, any state action must not go beyond what is necessary to achieve this goal effectively. And finally, on the third level, state authority must not pursue even otherwise legitimate objectives if the price for achieving them in terms of rights restrictions is disproportionate to the objective pursued. Bluntly spoken, the police must never shoot the thief even if it means that the thief gets away.

The social state principle in Article 20.1 demands that the government strives to achieve a just social order[27], without defining or even giving any guidance as to what a just social order might be. It follows that governmental authority has a wide margin of appreciation in the pursuit of this goal. However, the state must provide the bare fundamental necessities for every human being.[28] That would certainly include a place to sleep, something to eat, and access to fundamental health care. The increasing, albeit on a very low scale, the number of homeless or otherwise destitute people in Germany shows that law and reality can and do collide. Legally there is no room for involuntary homelessness.

The attribute 'Republic' only requires that Germany must not be a monarchy, not even a constitutionally organized democratic monarchy. The republican attribute is owed to the historical developments at the end of and after World War I and has no practical relevance today, as there are no noticeable or even remotely significant monarchical tendencies visible in Germany.

One open question is whether Article 20 protects only the attributes of statehood mentioned above or whether the sovereign statehood of the Federal Republic of Germany itself is also protected. That question is relevant because of Germany's participation in the European Union. Whereas the European Union has not yet developed into a federal state commanding sovereignty externally and internally, such a development is not inconceivable. If Article 20 as such also protected sovereign statehood such a European federal state with Germany as a constitutive element could not be achieved for Germany by way of amending the Basic Law. It follows that 26 The Constitutional Court has interpreted Article 103.2 of the Basic Law restrictively to prohibit the application of criminal norms to behavior not directly covered by them but applicable in the form of an analogy, see BVerfGE 92, 1 (14 et seq.).

for Germany this step of European integration would require the activation of the "pouvoir constituant", i.e., the constitution-making power of the German people rather than the amending power of the two chambers of Parliament.[29]

4. Article 23 of the Basic Law - European Union

The so-called "Europe-Article" 23 was introduced into the Basic Law in 1992 in the context of the founding of the European Union by the Treaty of Maastricht and after the previous and unrelated Article 23 had become obsolete in the wake of German reunification and had been struck out of the Basic Law. Until the introduction of the new Article 23, German participation in international cooperation and integration, including the transfer of sovereign powers to inter and supranational bodies (for example, European Communities, United Nations, NATO) had to be conducted based on the very generally formulated Article 24 Basic Law. With Article 23 the very special and indeed unique case of the European Union and Germany's integration into this supranational organization was given a special foundation in the Basic Law, providing a constitutional framework for the ongoing dynamic process of European integration by formulating objectives and limitations and by balancing the federal interests involved, i.e. those of the federation vis-à-vis the constituent Länder, in a legally binding way.

Article 23.1 links the participation of Germany in the process of European unity to the core principles of the German state (Article 20.1 of the Basic Law): democracy, rule of law, federalism and social welfare and adds to it the principle of subsidiarity, which speaks to the division of powers between the European Union and its member states and limits the exercise of the powers attributed to the European Union unless certain conditions are met.[30] This creates a delicate relationship between the international law aspects of European integration, the fact that this integration process has created a deeply integrated union of law and classical notions of state sovereignty. Potential conflict over the power of the last word on the scope and extent of sovereign powers transferred to the Union - does the power of the last word still lie within the member states and their constitutional courts or with the European Union and the European Court of Justice - are still lingering but have so far not led to outright conflict between the European Union and its member states.

Under the new Treaty of Lisbon[31] and protocols pertaining to the rights of national Parliaments and the application of the principle of subsidiarity, the national Parliaments will enjoy direct participation rights in the decision-making process of the European Union. The Treaty of Lisbon will also trigger the coming into effect of a new Article 23.1a empowering both houses of Parliament, Bundestag, and Bundesrat, to institute proceedings before the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg claiming a violation of the principle of subsidiarity. The new Article 23.1a even obligates the Bundestag to do so if a minority of 25 percent wish to proceed in this manner. The new addition to Article 23 reflects the concerns of (some) member states over a significant loss of jurisdiction to the European Union. The loss is inherently more relevant for the legislative branch because it is by and large legislative power that is ceded to the European Union and because the executive branches retain at least some power by being represented in the Council of Ministers on the European level.

Articles 23.2 to 23.8 of the Basic Law deal with the participation of both Houses of Parliament in the formation of the German positions to be taken on the European level. These participation rights reach from information and consultation by the government to various degrees of how the views, especially of the federal chamber of Parliament, the Bundesrat with its Länder-representatives, have to be taken into account. The scope extends from merely taking note of the views of Bundestag and/or Bundesrat all the way to shifting the representation of Germany in the Council of Ministers of the European Union away from the Federal Government to a representative appointed by the federal chamber, the Bundesrat, if the legislative matter at issue at the European Union falls under a subject-matter which internally constitutes an exclusive power of the Länder.

5. Eternity Clause, End and New Beginning, Articles 79.3 and 146 of the Basic Law

The "eternity clause" in Article 79.3 and the "termination-clause" in Article 146 are rather peculiar features of the Basic Law. Constitutions usually do not contain clauses defining their own end and one might even argue that such a clause is superfluous anyway because who and what is to stop the pouvoir constituant, the constitution-making power of the people, to replace the existing constitution with a new one?[32]

In the case of the Basic Law, the fact that such a provision came into the constitution and remained there has historical reasons. Originally, Article 146 was an expression of the transitional character of the Basic Law as a provisional constitutional order to bridge the gap until German reunification. When the time for reunification came in 1989/1990 Article 146 and its concept of building a new unified Germany on the basis of a new constitution had to compete with a second option provided for by the Basic Law in the original Article 23,[33] which allowed for the accession of "other parts" of Germany to the Federal Republic thus extending the territorial scope of the existing Basic Law. It was the (old) Article 23 option under which German reunification took place in 1990. The former German Democratic Republic acceded to the Federal Republic and 32 There are examples of constitutions that, though not defining their end, address the question of fundamental revisions as opposed to partial revisions or amendments, see for example, Article 44.3 of the Austrian Federal Constitutional Statute, http://www.verfassungen.at/indexheute.htm, Article 193 of the Federal Constitution of the Swiss Confederation, http://www.verfassungen.ch/verf99-i.htm (last accessed 15.9.2019).

33 The original Article 23 read: "For the time being this Basic Law will be effective in the territories of the Länder Baden, Bayern, Bremen, Greater Berlin, Hamburg Hessen, Lower Saxony, North-Rhine Westphalia, Rhineland-Palatinate, Schleswig-Holstein, Württemberg-Baden und Württemberg-Hohenzollern. It shall enter into force in other parts of Germany upon their accession." [translation by author].

was at the same time restructured into five new Länder, which became Länder of the Federal Republic.[34] However, the debate continued whether the option of relegitimizing the constitution and providing space to incorporate into the constitution more of the East-German history - whatever that might have been in constitutional terms - should be dropped altogether and Article 146 removed or whether that option should remain. The compromise reached was that the Basic Law should remain in place largely unchanged but that Article 146 would also be retained to leave open the option of broader constitutional reform debate at a later stage.[35]

Article 79 of the Basic Law deals with the amendment of the constitution, defining the requirements for affording constitutional change. Article 79.2 requires qualified two-third majorities in both Houses of Parliament, the Bundestag (lower house) and the Bundesrat (Federal Council of constituent Länder).

Article 79.1 demands that the Basic Law can only be amended by changing its wordings, by changing the language in one or more of its provisions, adding new provisions or striking out existing ones. By contrast, amending regular statutory law by way of a qualified majority cannot change the constitutional order. This ensures that constitutional law is concentrated in one constitutional document, rather than being spread out over the whole body of law and that such amendments are and remain transparent.[36]

Article 79.3 is often referred to as the 'eternity clause' because it stipulates that the federal character of the nation, including the participation of the Länder in the federal legislative process and the fundamental principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 are not subject to amendments. The principles referred to are the protection of human dignity in Article 1 and, following from that, the dignity-related core of the fundamental rights protected in Articles 2 to 19 of the Basic Law. The principles laid down in Article 20 are the fundamental core characteristics of the German state established under the Basic Law:

- A republican form of state (as opposed to a constitutional monarchy),
- A democratic form of government where all exercise of state authority is linked to and legitimized by representatives freely elected at regular intervals,

35 See Article 5 "Future Amendments to the Constitution" of the Unification Treaty, id.: "The Governments of the two Contracting Parties recommend to the legislative bodies of the united Germany that within two years they should deal with the questions regarding amendments or additions to the Basic Law as raised in connection with German unification, in particular […] - with the question of applying Article 146 of the Basic Law and of holding a referendum in this context."

36 As is the case for example in Austria, where the Constitution is not codified in a single document and constitutional amendments can be found in numerous other statutes and as was the case in the preceding Weimar Constitution of 1919 in Germany as well.

- The principal character of Germany as a social (welfare) state securing access to a bare minimum of resources to satisfy fundamental needs for housing, clothing, and food relative to the general standard of living,[37] and
- Rule of law, a broad concept consisting of various sub-concepts such as the absolute supremacy of the Constitution which guides and restricts the exercise of power by the legislative, executive and judicial branch of government, the supremacy of acts of parliament, which are binding on the executive and judicial branches, the requirement of a statutory law foundation for the exercise of any and all governmental authority thus ensuring the involvement of the directly elected parliament and democratically legitimizing all exercise of governmental power, the principal separation of powers in a legislative, executive and judicial branch, the guarantee of access to independent courts for legal protection against the exercise of any and all governmental power and the notion of limited government which can exercise its powers only subject to judicially enforceable fundamental rights and guarantees (as spelled out in Articles 1-19 of the Basic Law) which protect individuals and secure a core level of personal autonomy against infraction by the democratic majority.

In its recent decision concerning the constitutionality of the Lisbon Treaty reforming the European Union, of which Germany is a member state, the German Constitutional Court addressed the possible relationship between Article 146 and Article 79.3 of the Basic Law. In Article 79.3 the question is whether German sovereign statehood as such is also part of the eternity clause and hence not subject to the amending power of Parliament. If that were the case, Parliament could not ratify future treaties that would develop the European Union into a federal state. Concerning Article 146 the question has been raised whether even the constitution-making power (pouvoir constituant) is subject to the eternity clause of Article 79.3, which, if answered in the affirmative, would make Germany's participation in a European federal state legally impossible and in effect require a revolutionary act. The decision by the German Constitutional Court contains obiter dicta indicating that such a development would indeed be barred by Article 79.3 but that this provision might not extend to Article 146 and hence the creation of a European federal state remains legally possible from a German constitutional law perspective, albeit only by way of creating a new constitution and not by amending the existing Basic Law.[38]

37 The social state principle has found its statutory expression in § 1 of Book XII of the General Social Code (Sozialgesetzbuch): "It is the objective of social aid [Sozialhilfe] to enable those entitled to it to lead their lives in a manner which is consistent with human dignity. […]" [translation by the author; German version available at http://bundesrecht.juris.de/sgb_12/, last accessed 15.9.2019].

III. The Fundamental Rights and Freedoms Guaranteed by the Basic Law

1. Introduction and Overview

The fundamental rights guaranteed and protected by the Basic Law are the central pillar of Germany's constitutional order. Their significance for the development of Germany after the war is a direct result of the despotic regime that preceded the free and democratic Germany of 1949 and that significance was reinforced when the communist dictatorship broke down in the former East-Germany in 1989 and the country was unified under the Basic Law in 1990.

The framers placed the catalog of fundamental rights intentionally at the beginning of the Basic Law in Articles 1 to 19. The rights protected there include the general nomenclature of fundamental civil and political rights, similar to the ones found in international human rights treaties, ranging from the protection of life, limb, and liberty in Article 2 sec. 2, religious freedom in Article 4, free speech and freedom of assembly and demonstration in Articles 5 and 8, freedom of association in Article 9 and the protection of property against expropriation and other forms of taking in Article 14 to more context-oriented rights such as commercial and professional freedom in Article 12, school and education in Article 7, family and children in Article 6, equality in Article 3, asylum in Article 16 or the peculiar and subsidiary general freedom for everyone to do whatever one wants to do without infringing upon the rights of others in Article 2.1.

However, fundamental rights are not only found in Articles 1 to 19 of the Basic Law. Other more special fundamental guarantees are contained in the chapter on the judiciary and deal with the right to a lawful judge in Article 101.1[39], specific procedural guarantees in case of arrest and detention in Article 104 and the guarantee of a fair trial in Article 103.

The Basic Law did not take up the notion of social, economic, or cultural rights as they can be found in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights[40] or the European Social Charter.[41] The Basic Law does not guarantee, for example, the right to work, the right to fair remuneration or the right to an adequate standard of living. The reason for this lies in the fact that such rights are very difficult to enforce. By and large political and civil rights spell out limitations for the exercise of governmental authority, i.e., they order the government not to act in a certain way. Where they go beyond this and require positive action, the actions required will be fairly easy to determine. The protection of social rights, on the other hand, is much more difficult and complicated because one often does not know what action is required to achieve the goal. What a government must do to guarantee a right to work is generally contested and part of the democratic discourse. Some think it might require more government intervention in the form of higher taxation or regulation, and others believe the opposite to be the case. Rights to an adequate standard of living require a certain distribution of resources, but the right does not tell governments how to achieve that. Social rights are therefore always in danger of becoming or at least being regarded as programmatic expressions rather than enforceable hard law. Social justice is no less important than civil and political freedoms and the danger does not lie in the goals pursued by social rights. However, there is a risk that the relativity and complexity of social rights might be transferred into the field of political rights as well and that these rights will then be watered down as a result.

39 The right to a lawful judge ensures that the allocation of cases to courts, tribunals and judges must be such that the relevant dispositions are in place before the act that gives rise to the case are committed so that no subsequent interference, such as allocating certain criminal cases to "favourable" judges, is possible.

The Basic Law's fundamental rights chapter does, however, contain Article 15, which stipulates that "land, natural resources, and means of production may for the purpose of socialization be transferred to public ownership or other forms of public enterprise by a law that determines the nature and extent of compensation." This norm is a reflection of the economic neutrality of the Basic Law. In 1949 it was by no means clear whether a social market economy would prove to be a successful formula or whether more socialistic or even communist ideas would prevail. As far as economic organization was concerned and in sharp contrast to the individual rights protection afforded, the Basic Law did not want to decide this issue one way or another.

Finally, there is the fundamental right of citizens to participate in general and free elections as guaranteed by Article 38 of the Basic Law for any citizen[42] who has attained the age of 18 years. This right has gained perhaps surprising significance because the Federal Constitutional Court has construed this right as not only guaranteeing an election process as such but also as guaranteeing that the entity to be elected, in this case the Federal Parliament (Bundestag), actually has retained sufficient powers to ensure that the elections are democratically meaningful. The Court has used this interpretation of Article 38 to set limits to the extent of legislative powers Germany can transfer to the European Union.[43]

2. Fundamental Rights: How do they work?

Fundamental rights of the Basic Law are not absolute. Restrictions and limitations of rights are therefore possible and must be possible. In fact, in the field of human rights, there is only one guarantee to which no legal exception exists, and that is the prohibition of torture.[44]

42 Only citizens are entitled to participate in federal and state elections, not foreigners regardless of how long they have lived in Germany and regardless of their specific legal status as residents. The Federal Constitutional Court has held that democratic legitimacy can only flow from elections if the right to vote is limited to citizens, BVerfGE 83, 60 (81). This does not apply to local, municipal elections where at least citizens of the European Union must be allowed to participate actively and passively and to elections for the European Parliament. See Article 20.2(b) TEU, (available at https://eur-lex.europa.eu/collection/eu-law/treaties/treaties-force.html).

43 BVerfG, 2 BvE 2/08 of 30.6.2009, http://www.bverfg.de/e/es20090630_2bve000208en.html (last accessed 15.9.2019).

44 See, for example, Article 3 ECHR, https://www.coe.int/en/web/conventions/full-list/-/conventions/treaty/005; Article 2 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT). Article 2.2 CAT specifically states that "[n]o exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture", CAT text available at https://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/CAT.aspx (last accessed 15.9.2019).

However, the prohibition of torture does not exist as such in the Basic Law. It is part of Article 2.2, which protects the health and physical integrity of persons. Obviously conduct amounting to torture would fall under this provision and could never be justified but it is also evident that the health and physical integrity of a person extends beyond torturous conduct and would, for example, also come into play when a policeman uses the baton against an individual, or when firearms are used, etc. and it is equally obvious that such actions must be legally possible under certain circumstances. How then can it be determined, by those responsible for such actions, by the courts exercising their adjudicatory function and, finally, by the Federal Constitutional Court[45] whether fundamental rights and guarantees of the Basic Law were breached? The principal dogmatic approach to this problem is the 'scope-limitation, counter-limitation' test.

a. The determination of the Scope of a Fundamental Right

The first step in this test is to determine under which right(s) or guarantee(s) the impugned activity might fall. Thus, the use of the baton by the police, will prima facie fall within the ambit of Article 2.2 because this norm addresses, among other things, the health and physical integrity of persons. If the baton was used in the context of a demonstration or assembly, Article 8 might also be relevant as this provision protects the right to assemble and demonstrate. An issue might even arise under the free speech clause in Article 5 of the Basic Law. Having thus prima facie identified the relevant topics for the legal analysis of the conduct in question, the next step is to identify and define the exact scope of the rights and guarantees so identified. In other words what follows now is an act of statutory interpretation, i.e., of identifying the concrete meaning of the abstract language in which the various rights identified are formulated in the Basic Law. The result will be a definition of the "personal and subject-matter" scope of the right in question as it pertains to the case constellation at issue.

b. The Determination of an Infringement of a Fundamental Right

After this exercise, a determination will have to be made as to whether the factual conduct at issue, for example, the use of the baton against the person, infringed on one or more of the rights identified as potentially relevant. That will be the case if the action in question reduces the scope of the right in question as properly construed using the tools of statutory interpretation. Being hit by a police baton will necessarily result in pain and therefore affect the health of an individual and his or her physical integrity. It follows that in this example the beating constitutes an infringement of Article 2.2. Whether one could also determine an infringement of the freedom to demonstrate (Article 8 of the Basic Law) will depend on the circumstances. If the victim had been a demonstrator the answer would be "yes"; if the victim had been somebody who happened to be at the venue only coincidentally the answer would have to be "no".

45 And, as will be shown below, subsequently perhaps even by the European Court on Human Rights (ECtHR) in Strasbourg.

c. Defining the Scope of Possible Limitations and Justifications for Infringements of Fundamental Rights

The next step after having determined scope and infringement is to look at the possible limitations of the infringed right. The question here is whether the limitation can be justified. Most rights and guarantees in the Basic Law contain specific language about possible limitations. The scope of those possible limitations to the rights in question must again be determined by applying the tool of statutory interpretation. Article 2.2, for example, stipulates that the right to physical integrity is not absolute and can be regulated and restricted by law. It follows from this language that, to pick up the above example again, the use of the baton against an individual must be authorized by statutory law. The Federal Constitutional Court has consistently held that only Parliament itself, and not the executive by way of delegated legislation, can and must legislate the necessary statutory law based on which infringement of rights may be justified.

Other fundamental rights provisions contain more detailed or more restricted limitation clauses. The language on possible restrictions of free speech in Article 5.2 of the Basic Law provides an illustrating example. Some rights provisions contain no limitation language at all. The freedom of religion in Article 4.1 of the Basic Law is one such example. The absence of limiting language, however, does not mean that these rights are absolute and grant unrestricted liberty. This would be nonsensical. Nobody has the right to pray in the middle of a four-lane highway during rush hour and if somebody claimed this under the freedom of religion clause the freedom could be restricted on account of "inherent constitutional limitations", i.e., limitations that flow from other rights or legal positions protected by the Basic Law.

d. Applying Counter-Limitations to the Scope of Justified Limitations of Fundamental Rights - The Principle of Proportionality

The next and last step in the exercise of determining the constitutionality of potential rights restrictions is concerned with limiting the scope of the potential rights restrictions (counter-limitations). The core, but not the only tool in this exercise, is the application of the principle of proportionality. The proportionality test itself consists of three subtests.

The first one is the principle of utility or effectiveness whereby it must be established that the exercise of governmental authority which led to the limitation of a fundamental right can achieve the goal the government set out to achieve. Whereas the government will have a margin of appreciation in the determination of what measures might work to achieve a certain objective, the exercise of this discretion is subject to judicial scrutiny.

The second sub-test is the principle of least impact. It requires the government to select from the catalog of potentially possible and effective measures the one that, while being equally effective, will have the least impact on the individual rights of those affected by the measure. If, for example, a demonstration threatens to cause violent clashes with counter-demonstrators, a prohibition of the demonstration could solve the problem. However, the authorities would have to consider, for example, prescribing a different venue to separate the parties before they could prohibit the demonstration, as this would have a lesser impact on the freedom of demonstration but still avoid the violence.

The third and final sub-test is the principle of reasonableness or proportionality in the narrow sense. It stipulates that some otherwise lawful means just cannot be pursued if the only means of achieving the otherwise lawful goal is obtainable only at too high a price. The police cannot stop the shoplifter by shooting him even if this is the only means to stop the theft.

The courts in general and the Federal Constitutional Court in particular will apply these tests in all cases in which an individual contests a limitation placed on his or her fundamental right.

3. Functions of Fundamental Rights

The fundamental rights of the Basic Law have several functions, an understanding of which will also shed some light on how the fundamental rights work.

a. The Traditional "Defence-Function" - Protecting Individual Autonomy

The traditional, and arguably still the most significant function of fundamental rights is the "defense-function". Fundamental rights defend against the intrusion of governmental authority into the sphere of individual autonomy protected by them. In other words, fundamental rights create a protective wall around the individual to secure a space of individual liberty. That space is amorphous and its extent is determined on a case-by-case basis as shown above. The defense-function of fundamental rights reigns in governmental authority: state authority can go this far but no further.

This has two major implications. First, if fundamental rights restrict the exercise of governmental authority, then they cannot be instrumentalized against other individuals. And indeed, the fundamental rights of the Basic Law are, in principle directed against public authority only and not against private individuals. An individual may invoke his or her right to free speech against the government but not against the neighbor. The government will have to tolerate a demonstration on public streets but the house-owner does not have to tolerate a demonstration on his or her front lawn.

The second implication following from the defense-function is that fundamental rights are minority rights. However, this is not about ethnic or religious or other such minorities. It is about any minority in a political sense. It is about those who have lost the political argument and protects them against majority rule. In the so-called 'war against terror', the political majority of the day might favor security over individual rights. However, the proponents of individual rights will have to succumb to the majority only insofar as limitations of individual rights are legally possible. The majority cannot legally go beyond whatever the defined scope of personal autonomy is under the fundamental rights regime.

Fundamental rights are a limitation of democratic majority rule. It is for this very reason that societies heavily based on concepts such as parliamentary sovereignty or where the concept of democracy is primarily understood as democratically legitimized majority rule, such as the United Kingdom, Australia, or even the USA[46], often have difficulties with the concept of 46 The United Kingdom has no written constitution and hence no constitutional catalogue of fundamental rights. However, the European Convention on Human Rights has taken on a similar function in the UK after its incorporation into domestic law by the Human Rights Act 1998, http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1998/42/contents (last accessed 15.9.2019). Australia has a constitution and a Court with the power of judicial review but no catalogue of rights. The US has both and a Supreme Court which has asserted the rights of judicial review.

fundamental rights protection and the role of a powerful court in this context. However, to limit the concept of democracy to majority rule falls short. The protection of the minorities of the day (of all types, political, ethnic, religious or otherwise) is part and parcel of democratic rule because the inherent limitation of governmental power as achieved by fundamental rights regimes is one important pillar of democratic legitimization, the electoral process and majority rule being the other. Both pillars are necessary to support the democratic system of government of the Basic Law.[47]

b. The Objective Function

The objective function of fundamental rights addresses a consequence of the fact that fundamental rights of the Basic Law are primarily defensive rights against government intrusion. Does this mean that fundamental rights play no role whatsoever in private relationships? The answer to that narrower question is "no" and the objective function is the vehicle to transport effects of fundamental rights protection into the sphere of private relationships. The main instrument to achieve this is statutory interpretation. Private relationships are governed by the Civil Code, which contains provisions for contractual obligations and liabilities flowing, for example, from the law of torts or unjust enrichment. The relevant provisions in the Civil Code are framed in abstract legal terms and require legal interpretation as do all legal norms. The objective function of fundamental rights requires that fundamental rights implications are a constitutive part of that interpretative effort, i.e., that these private law norms, which provide the framework for the relationship of private individuals, must be interpreted in the light of fundamental rights and in conformity with them. The objective function of fundamental rights is, in other words, a vehicle for achieving indirect third party effect to fundamental rights.

The leading Lüth decision of the Constitutional Court[48] amply illustrates the workings of this objective function. Mr. Lüth had, in his capacity as a private citizen, publicly called for a boycott of a movie shown in German cinemas on account of the movie director's past racist propaganda work for the Nazi regime. The production firm of the movie feared economic loss from this call to boycott the movie and sought and was granted an injunction based on a norm in the Civil Code that prohibits the intentional and malicious infliction of economic loss on another individual. The term malicious, of course, requires interpretation and the Constitutional Court held that this interpretation would have to take into account the enormous significance of the free speech guarantee in Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. At issue was a controversy and so long as this controversy was conducted by voicing opinions and using the power of persuasion, as opposed to, for example, the use of a dominant market position or other means of extortion, it was protected by the free speech guarantee and the respective private law provisions invoked in this case had to be interpreted restrictively to comply with the Basic Law.

47 It is a different question whether that protection of the minority of the day necessarily requires a constitutional catalogue as in a bill of rights. That protection can also be afforded in other ways in a relatively sufficient manner. Australia is an example for that.

48 BVerfGE 7, 198 - translation of the decision in this book.

c. The Duty to Protect

The third function of fundamental rights is the duty to protect. It means that fundamental rights do not only tell the government what not to do; they can also constitute an obligation for the government to take action. The right to life is an illustrative example. The defensive function of that right limits governmental action that poses a risk to an individual's life. The duty to protect, on the other hand, requires governmental action to protect individuals against life-threatening behavior. Providing an appropriate legal order with criminal sanctions for the taking of life is one example. Whereas that might sound trivial as all legal orders will punish homicide and similar crimes, it may well play a role when it comes to the negligent taking of life or even to the protection of unborn life. The decisions of the German Constitutional Court in the abortion cases are prime examples.[49] The Court stipulated that the duty to protect flowing from Article 2.2 of the Basic Law would bar the government from legalizing abortion and demand that some protective system be put into place, for example counseling and support services that could persuade the mother to opt pro-life.

The duty to protect comes into play in trilateral constellations involving two colliding rights and the government as a potential mediator. In abortion scenarios, it is usually the right of the mother to self-determination and the right of the unborn. The duty to protect defines the legal minimum of protection for the unborn that the government must undertake. The defensive function of the self-determination rights of the mother describes the legal maximum the government can engage in to protect the unborn. The space between the minimum and the maximum defines the margin of appreciation the government has in this balancing act.

The duty to protect is potentially problematic because fundamental freedoms become the legal basis for the restriction of freedoms. The protection of personality rights could, for example, lead to significant restrictions to free speech, the problem of delineating free speech from defamation has been controversial not only in Germany but in many jurisdictions. The German Constitutional Court has so far been successful in keeping a check on governmental duties to protect. The defensive function is and must be the prime function of fundamental rights.

d. Participatory Function and Entitlements

The main difference between traditional, liberal defense rights and social rights is the direct connection to resources that is inherent to social rights. The traditional defensive function of political rights is cost neutral. Insofar as they prohibit the government from taking certain actions, they might even save money. The prosecution of certain opinions demands resources, tolerating opinions costs nothing.

However, that distinction between social rights and traditional liberal rights does not always apply. There are some traditional rights, which require the allocation of resources. The right of access to court and fair trial require the availability of a functioning judicial system with a sufficient number of judges and judicial administrative staff. The prohibition of torture and inhuman treatment requires certain minimum standards for prisons and other institutions where people are confined in the care of the government.

49 BVerfGE 39, 1 and 88, 205, translations of the decisions in this book.

Other rights have an indirect connection to resources. Property rights are relevant only for those who own property. The freedom of the press is, ignoring the possibility of leaflets, only relevant for those who have the capital to operate a newspaper and the freedom to broadcast electronically usually requires significant resources as well. Do the respective rights of the Basic Law create an obligation for the government to provide the respective resources?

As a matter of principle, the rights protected by the Basic Law do not grant entitlements in the narrow sense. Nobody can demand from the government the money to run a newspaper. However, the Constitutional Court has construed the freedom to broadcast as including and guaranteeing the existence of a public broadcasting system which must be financed in such a way that it can fulfill its role as a guarantor of plurality in the electronic media sector.[50] It follows from the protection of human dignity, Article 1.1, in conjunction with the duty to protect the health of those living in Germany and in conjunction with the fundamental requirement of the Basic Law that Germany is a social welfare state that the existential minimum of food, clothing and housing must be provided.[51]

The Court has also held that the de facto state monopoly on university education necessitates a corresponding equal participation right derived from Article 12 of the Basic Law for access to universities if the educational requirements are met and subject only to the available capacity.[52]

However, direct or indirect entitlements remain an exception. The allocation of resources cannot be subjected to a rights' regime unless one is willing to risk the effectiveness of this regime. Experience shows that the protection of rights becomes very difficult if resources are required. Not only because the resources might not be available or the allocation of the resources to the specific cause might not find acceptance but also because any investment will take time to become effective making the violation of that right systemic. The danger is that rights become very relative concepts. It is for that reason that the Basic Law has remained very reluctant in construing the fundamental rights of the Basic Law as entitlement rights and has left the decisions over the allocation of financial resources to the democratic process.

4. The Relationship between the German Basic Law and the European Systems for the Protection of Fundamental Rights

a. Overview

Fundamental human rights protection in Germany is not merely a national affair but has increasingly become an international or even supranational issue. Germany is a signatory to the international treaties that make up the international 'bill of rights', most prominently the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the Optional Protocol to the ICCPR providing for an individual complaints procedure to the Human Rights Committee and thus turning the objective guarantees of the ICCPR into subjective rights pursuable by any individual.[53] However, the international embedding of fundamental rights protection in Europe in general and in Germany, in particular, goes much further.

50 BVerfGE 90, 107.

51 Cf. BVerfGE 91, 93 (115); 99, 216 (256 ff.).

52 BVerfGE 33, 303.

b. The European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)

This is particularly due to the fact of Germany's membership, together with 46 other European nations, in the European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR).[54] The ECHR was signed in 1950, came into force in 1953 and underwent a major reform in 1998 with the coming into force of the 11th Protocol.[55] The major effect of this Protocol was to abolish the previous two-tier system of a Human Rights Commission with only quasi-judicial functions and a non-permanent Court with optional jurisdiction and to replace it with a permanent European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) with compulsory jurisdiction. The ECtHR's sole task is to adjudicate and interpret the ECHR. Article 46 ECHR stipulates that decisions of the ECtHR are binding on the member states and the Committee of Ministers supervises their execution.[56] The ECtHR may only deal with the matter after all domestic remedies have been exhausted and in the case of Germany that means that the German Federal Constitutional Court must have rendered a decision before the ECtHR can attend to the matter. Between 1959 and 2018 the ECtHR issued 340 judgments in cases involving Germany of which 195 judgments found at least one violation of a provision in the ECHR[57] - despite the fact that all of these cases had already undergone the scrutiny of the domestic court system including the Federal Constitutional Court. This demonstrates the significance of this extra layer of international human rights protection in Germany and beyond.

c. The European Union

(1) General Principles of European Union Law

The coming into force of the new Lisbon Treaty on 1 December 2009 also had an effect on human rights protection in Europe. The original foundation treaties of the European Communities and the European Union did not contain a catalogue of fundamental rights. This gap was subsequently overcome by the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) in Luxembourg who developed fundamental rights under the concept of unwritten general principles of European Union law based on the fact that such rights are shared by all member states of the European Union in their domestic constitutional law and legal systems and that all member states of the European Union are also member states of the European Convention of Human Rights.[58] This concept of unwritten general principles of law is now enshrined in Article 6.3 of the TEU.

(2) Treaty of Lisbon and Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

However, in addition to the general principles of law the Treaty of Lisbon also created Article 6.1 TEU providing that the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union of 7 December 2000[59], which back then had been adopted as "soft law" only, will now have the "same value as the treaties" and will hence become part of the primary law of the European Union. This has given new impetus to the question of whom the European Union fundamental rights are addressed to and how their scope is to be delineated from domestic fundamental rights protection. Article 51 of the Charter stipulates that:

> "[T]he provisions of this Charter are addressed to the institutions, bodies, offices and agencies of the Union with due regard for the principle of subsidiarity and to the Member States only when they are implementing Union law."

This clarifies that the European Union fundamental rights are not an overarching catalogue of rights guiding and superior to the domestic rights regimes but that the European Union rights are meant to limit the exercise of European Union authority and are meant to limit the Member States only insofar as they are exercising European Union powers by implementing European Union law.

In addition, Article 6.2 TEU the Treaty of Lisbon finally created the authority for the European Union to "accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms". This opens up the possibility for the European Union to become a member of the European Convention on Human Rights. The Council of Europe on its side has created the same possibility in the 14th Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights[60], which specifically provides for the European Union to become a member of the ECHR.[61] However, accession has not yet been achieved. The draft Accession Agreement of the EU to the ECHR between the 47 Member States of the Council of Europe and the EU was finalized on 5 April 2013. However, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) in an opinion of 18.12.2014 identified shortcomings in the draft accession agreement, not least the relationship between its powers of judicial review and that of the European Court of Human Right (ECtHR).[62] The accession process is continuing but will probably take some time to complete.[63]

(3) Fundamental Rights Protection and Supremacy of European Union Law in Germany

The relationship between the European Union and Germany is somewhat more complicated. European Union law is supreme to the law of the member states. The supremacy of European Union law extends to domestic constitutional law as well. The European Court of Justice (ECJ) has consistently held that the member states of the European Union cannot invoke their domestic law, constitutional or otherwise, against legal norms of the European Union, i.e., against statutory provisions legislated at the European level in so-called regulations or directives or norms contained in decisions by relevant European authorities. Member states are therefore barred, from the perspective of the European Union, to render ineffective European Union law on account of a violation of their domestic fundamental rights. European Union law must measure up only to European Union fundamental rights and the ECHR but not to domestic fundamental rights. However, the German Constitutional Court has never fully accepted this approach. It has consistently held that the final responsibility for the protection of fundamental rights lies with itself. This potential jurisdictional conflict has never manifested itself because the German Constitutional Court has also consistently held that it will exercise this function in cooperation with the European Court of Justice and that, in practice, for the German Court to assume this role would require for a potential plaintiff to show that the European Court of Justice no longer adequately protects fundamental rights and that this would have to be demonstrated not just for the case in question but as a "general and evident" trend of continuous delinquency.[64]

IV. The Interpretation of the Basic Law and the Role of the Federal Constitutional Court

The provisions of the Basic Law in general and the fundamental rights provision do not explain themselves. Like all norms, and perhaps even more so, they require interpretation, i.e., their meaning is to be construed to make it applicable to the specific case constellation or constitutional law question at issue. In the case of fundamental rights that applies, as explained above, to the construction of the scope of freedom, the construction of the possible limitations and the construction of the possible counter-limitations.

1. Grammatical Interpretation

The interpretation of the Basic Law, by and large, follows the general rules of interpretation, which can be found in many jurisdictions. The starting point for interpretation is the objective meaning of the words used, also referred to as grammatical interpretation. However, that usually does not yield the decisive result, which is why the legal profession is not made up of linguists.

2. Systematic Interpretation

The second and third steps beyond grammatical interpretation are often the decisive steps for elucidating the precise meaning of the abstract constitutional norm. The second step is referred to as systematic interpretation and requires that in order to determine the specific meaning of a (constitutional) norm, it must be read with a view to its systematic context. This means looking for identical or similar terms in other provisions of the Basic Law in neighboring sections, within the chapter and within the text as a whole.

3. Teleological Interpretation

The third step is referred to as teleological interpretation, which means interpreting a norm according to the object or purpose that the norm objectively appears to have. The attribute 'objective' denotes one of the major differences between the interpretation of the Basic Law and the interpretation of constitutional norms in other jurisdictions, for example, in the USA or Australia. The subjective will of the drafters of the constitution and, in the case of subsequent amendments, of the two Houses of Parliament plays a very small role in this exercise. The subjective will of the drafters will only be of relevance to confirm the result achieved by the other means of interpretation or to resolve any interpretative difficulties that remain after the application of the other means of interpretation.[65]

65 See, for example, BVerfG, 2 BvR 1520/01 of 30.3.2004, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20040330_2bvr152001.html, para.94 et seq. (last accessed 15.9.2019).

4. "Living Constitution"

Another major difference in the approach to interpretation lies in the fact that the Federal Constitutional Court, and this is as such not disputed in the legal or political community, interprets the Basic Law as a "living Constitution" rather than as a static document.[66] Hence, not only does the will of the drafters of the Constitution play little role in the determination of the actual meaning of the normative language, the meaning of the same language can change substantially over time.

The meaning of equality in Article 3 of the Basic Law illustrates this vividly. The principal obligation under the non-discrimination rule is to treat all things that are equal equally and to differentiate between all things that are not equal. The application of Article 3 therefore requires that comparison groups are formed and objective reasons are identified for treating the comparison groups differently. Children, for example, are different from adults and it is therefore not only possible to discriminate against children but actually mandated because children must be protected. Hence their access to employment is severely limited, and, depending on age, even prohibited. The type of work they can do is limited and their freedoms can be limited with regard to such things as going to the pub, drinking alcohol or watching certain movies. Women are also different from men in some respects. However, in both examples the perception of the scope of discrimination that can be constitutionally justified has dramatically changed over the last decades. Especially women are treated much "more equal" today as was the case 20, 30 or 40 years ago even though the principal nondiscrimination provision in Article 3.1 of the Basic Law has not fundamentally changed. What has changed, however and fortunately, is the perception of the comparison groups; male and female, and the social evaluation of objective criteria that differentiate the sexes.[67]

5. Conflict of Norms

Fundamental rights protection often involves conflict between two or more fundamental rights. One of the functions of fundamental rights as shown above is the duty of the state to protect the legal sphere of people within their jurisdiction. It follows that the exercise of a freedom, e.g., to demonstrate, can and will frequently collide with the rights of others, e.g., to move freely on the road or to have open access to their store. Sometimes this conflict can culminate in a life and death matter in one person. That is the case when the right to life, if extended to the unborn fetus as under Article 2.2 of the Basic Law, collides with the right of the mother to self-determination, privacy, health or even her own life. Such constellations are 66 The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) consistently interpretes the ECHR in this evolutive dynamic fashion, see, for example, Appl. No. 18030/11, 8.11.2016, Magyar Helsinki Bizottság v. Hungary, paras. 120-122, 138-148 and, very instructively, the Concurring Opinion of Judges Sicilianos and Raimondi, http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-167828 (last accessed 15.9.2019). This approach to constitutional interpretation is very controversial especially in the US where the late Justice Antonin Scalia was a forceful proponent of a restrictive originalist view.

67 Perhaps the two most prominent areas where attitutional changes in society resulted in changes of what is commonly perceived as discrimination. One was in the area of military service of women (in combat units) and the other in marriage equality between same-sex and heterosexual partners.

common and marked by the fact that they involve trilateral constellations rather than just the bilateral relationship between state and subject. The arrest of a person by the police is a purely bilateral issue between the government and the arrested person and subject to the defensive function of the respective fundamental right. When fundamental rights conflict there are always at least three parties involved: the government exercising state authority through the executive, legislative or judicial branch, the person asserting a right and the person asserting that the exercise of that right would unduly infringe on his or her rights.

The balancing exercise required to solve such rights' conflicts falls to the courts and especially to the Federal Constitutional Court. One parameter used in this balancing act is the notion of "practical concordance". It means that in such situations, the courts will strive for solutions that grant the greatest possible effect for all rights involved in the conflict.[68]

The Constitutional Court takes a very flexible approach to constellations where more than one fundamental right might be involved. To identify the right against which state action is to be measured is important because rights differ in the scope of possible limitations. However, the Court's doctrine developed in the context of free speech (Article 5 Basic Law) of interpreting the scope of possible limitations of rights in the light of the significance of the right in question has led to a dogmatically lamentable but practically acceptable flexibility in this regard. One could not maintain the position, for example, that possible limitations of rights containing no limitation clause (e.g., Article 4 Basic Law) under the doctrine of constitutionally immanent limitations, are per se more difficult or more restricted in scope than limitations of rights which do contain limitation clauses.

The most important constellation in which the identification of the correct right has played a role has been in the context of free speech (Article 5.1) and freedom of the arts in Article 5.3 of the Basic Law. Whereas free speech can be restricted within the parameters of Article 5.2, albeit only with great care under the Constitutional Court's consistent doctrine of the fundamental significance of free speech, the freedom of the arts is one of those rights that contain no limitation clause and can therefore only be restricted to safeguard other constitutionally protected legal interest should there be a conflict. An example for such a conflict is the Mephisto case where the Court had to balance post-mortem personality rights of an actor who had ruthlessly pursued his career during the Nazi regime, which, after his death, became the blueprint for a highly critical novel by the author Klaus Mann. The surviving son of the depicted actor sought to stop the sale of the book and was successful on account of a violation of the personality rights of his deceased father.[69]

68 The concept of "practical concordance" was developed by the constitutional scholar Konrad Hesse, see Konrad Hesse, Grundzüge des Verfassungsrechts der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, 20. Aufl., Heidelberg 1999, para. 317 et seq.

V. The Procedural Context for Fundamental Rights Protection under the Basic Law

1. Overview

The protection of fundamental rights in Germany under the Basic Law is not only a task of the Federal Constitutional Court or the judiciary for that matter. Article 1.3 makes it abundantly clear that the fundamental rights of the Basic Law "bind the legislature, the executive and the judiciary as directly applicable law". Hence all state authority is under an obligation to observe the freedoms and guarantees afforded by the Basic Law.

The role of the judiciary, however, is somewhat more pronounced as it falls mainly to the judiciary to exercise oversight and control the behavior of the other two branches and most notably of the executive branch.[70] This task falls to all courts but by nature the general and special administrative courts will be at the forefront of this and the Federal Constitutional Court is the main player in this area.

2. Procedural Framework - The Jurisdiction of the Bundesverfassungsgericht

The jurisdiction of the BVerfG is enumerated in the Grundgesetz (Article 93 GG) and, with more detail, in the Federal Constitutional Court Act.[71] There are several different procedures with varying admissibility requirements, especially concerning standing, that can be brought to the BVerfG.[72]

3. Judicial Review

The BVerfG has the full power of judicial review. This means that the court has the power to quash any parliamentary statute on account of its unconstitutionality. Judicial review proceedings can be brought to the BVerfG as principal or as incidental judicial review. Principal judicial review comes as abstract or concrete judicial review.[73]

The abstractness is a result of the fact that there is not a concrete case or dispute at issue in which the constitutionality of a norm arises as an incidental question. Rather, the constitutionality of a statute, respectively of one or more norms within a statute is the sole judicial matter brought to the court.[74] Such abstract judicial review proceedings can only be brought by 70 Mainly but again not exclusively; Parliament, for example, can and must exercise that oversight by acting to amend legislation if it finds that the executive has gone overboard.

71 Act on the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG, https://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/englisch_bverfgg/englisch_bverfgg.html (last accessed 15.9.2019).

72 Altogether there are 19 different procedures, which can be brought to the Court. All are enumerated in Section13 BVerfGG, id.

73 Article 93 Abs. 1 No. 2 of the Basic Law, ss. 13 No. 6, 76-79 BVerfGG.

74 The BVerfG's power to judicial review is not limited to these two procedures of "principal norm control", i.e. where the constitutionality of a norm is the subject-matter of the case. The constitutional complaints procedure or any other procedure may also lead to incidental judicial review of parliamentary laws, i.e. where the constitutionality of a norm appears as an incidental question.

the federal government, a state government or by joint application of one-fourth of the deputies of the first chamber of parliament (Bundestag).[75] If the constitutionality of a norm is challenged on the grounds of the federation having the power to legislate, the proceeding can also be brought by the second chamber of parliament, the Bundesrat and by a state parliament.[76]

The second possibility for judicial review is referred to as a concrete judicial review of the constitutionality of a norm.[77] The concreteness arises from the fact that in these proceedings the constitutionality of a norm arises as the decisive question in regular court proceedings. However, regular courts do not possess the power to declare an act of Parliament unconstitutional.[78] If a regular court comes to the conclusion that such an unconstitutionality exists and the decision of the concrete case is contingent on this unconstitutionality, the court must interrupt proceedings, prepare an opinion outlining in detail why it is convinced of the unconstitutionality of the norm and submit this opinion to the Constitutional Court who will then review the constitutionality of the norm in question. After that has happened, the regular court will then decide its case based on the decision rendered by the Constitutional Court.

4. Constitutional Complaints Procedure

Arguably, the most important procedure the BVerfG has to deal with is the constitutional complaints procedure (Verfassungsbeschwerde).[79] The constitutional complaints procedure is by far the most numerous type of procedure brought before the court. In the year 2018 alone, 5678 constitutional complaints were brought to the court. Since 1951 almost 230,000 constitutional complaints have been lodged with the Court. The success rate for constitutional complaints is very low. In 2018, the BVerfG rendered a decision in 5853 constitutional complaints. Only 98 were successful (1.67%). In the past decade, the success rate for constitutional complaints has always been below 3%.[80]

Constitutional complaints can be brought to the BVerfG only after regular judicial remedies have been exhausted.[81] That means that the BVerfG will only deal with constitutional complaints after the 'regular' courts, through all available appeals, have rendered a decision in the matter. The filter effect of this so-called subsidiarity of the Constitutional Complaint procedure partly explains the low success rate. There is also no cost attached to bringing such a case to the BVerfG and hence parties have little to lose and risk only a relatively modest frivolous procedure fee in a worst-case scenario. Representation by a lawyer is only required if a hearing is necessary, which can be waived by the parties.

VI. Challenges and Outlook

The Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany has undoubtedly been a major success story. It has guided the Republic on its difficult path from tyranny into a modern democratic state. It has weathered any and all storms along the way, from the NATO and rearmament debates in the early 1950's, to the student unrest around the Vietnam war and the inclusion of state of emergency provisions into the Basic Law in the 1960's, to the attempts of the terrorists of the Red Army Fraction to specifically strike at the heart of the Basic Law in the 1970's, to the stationing of nuclear missiles in the 1980's. And when German reunification became a reality and the reason for the provisional name "Basic Law" became history, the vast majority of Germans did not want to engage in the adoption of a new constitution as Article 146 had envisaged for just this case preferring rather to stick with the Basic Law that had served the Federal Republic so well.

However, no linguistic text, however carefully drafted, can by itself determine the shape of society. It requires functioning institutions and the people in these institutions have to administer and implement the constitutional text in the light of the spirit of the text, based on a general and profound conviction of individual liberty and freedom. It is an interdependent trilateral coalition of the constitutional text, functioning institutions and responsible people, which together shaped and shape the German state and society. The institutions and the people need the scaffolding of the Basic Law as much as the Basic Law needs the people to be dedicated to its principal ideas of freedom, tolerance, and responsibility. Today, these pillars of a liberal society are under attack - not only in Germany but in Germany as well. The scourge of nationalism, intolerance, and (religious and other) fascism is becoming ever more apparent. The enemies of freedom are pushing to become mainstream again.

Liberty, freedom, tolerance are never achieved. They have to be actively defended in an ongoing dynamic process. The threat posed by global terror, whatever its causes might be, creates constant pressure on any society based on ideas of liberty and tolerance. Social and demographic change, perceived threats to identity, economic and social pressures, loss of perspective, and opportunity will remain as constant challenges. The future success of the Basic Law will depend on how the trilateral coalition of constitutional text and scaffolding, institutional efficacy and a strong consensus based on liberty and tolerance can stand together to deal with these challenges.

Direct or Indirect Third-Party Effect of Fundamental Rights?

"(Football) Stadium Ban"

Explanatory Annotation

Football violence is a problem in much of the football world, sometimes more, sometimes less. In Germany, and almost everywhere else, (professional) football is organized in football leagues and clubs which are all private associations or corporations. The spectators buy tickets and in doing so, enter into contractual relations with the event organizer. As a matter of principle, such standard contractual relationships are not directly affected by the fundamental rights of the Basic Law. In other words, private individuals are not the direct addressees of fundamental rights. That, however, is not to say that the private or contractual sphere in which individuals and corporations operate is entirely a space devoid of any fundamental rights' influence. Contractual relationships are governed by the private (civil) law framework constituted in Germany largely but not exclusively by the German Civil Code (GCC).[1] The GCC contains clauses of a general nature using very abstract language to, for example, include such concepts as "good faith" (§ 242 GCC) or "public policy" as a determinant liability for intentional actions causing harm to others (§ 826 GCC). The German Constitutional Court has consistently held that the fundamental rights of the Basic Law enter the world of private law relationships through the interpretation of these clauses.[2]

In the decision here at issue, a young supporter of the Bayern Munich Football Club became embroiled in an altercation after the end of the match with supporters of the opposing football club of MSV Duisburg leading to personal injury and property damage. The Duisburg football club acting with and for the peak German Football Association and the German Football league issued a countrywide stadium ban for the young Munich supporter. The criminal charges independently pursued by German authorities against the supporter were discontinued under § 153.1 of the German Criminal Procedure Code[3] as minor misdemeanors. The countrywide stadium ban imposed by the private law associations, however, remained in place. The banned Munich supporter challenged the stadium ban but lost in all instances, thus opening the gate for a constitutional review by the Constitutional Court.

It should be noted that the Constitutional Court is not a court of appeal. It does not review the interpretation of statutory or other non-constitutional law. It has jurisdiction only to ensure that the provisions of the Basic Law are adequately considered by the other courts, for example, when interpreting general clauses of the GCC.

The applicant had argued that in the light of the fact that the criminal proceedings did not produce any determination of wrong-doing on his part, the ban imposed could not be justified and would, therefore, have to be considered arbitrary. Given the significance of football for social life, the applicant claimed that the ban violates his general freedom of action (i.e., to do as one pleases as long as it does not infringe on the rights of others or is otherwise prohibited by law) guaranteed in Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

The Constitutional Court took the opportunity to make some interesting remarks on the scope of the horizontal effect of the fundamental rights protected by the Basic Law in the context of private law relationships. The stadium ban dispensed by the football club, football association, and football league has its basis in private law and as such, is based on general provisions in the GCC speaking towards the property owner's right to enforce house rules (§§ 862, 1004 GCC). These property rights are, in essence, private law expressions of concrete legal positions and interests protected by the fundamental right of the protection of private property contained in Article 14 of the Basic Law.[4] In other words, the horizontal or third party effect attributed to fundamental rights in the Basic Law can be construed as a conflict of competing emanations of fundamental rights protected by the Basic Law and shining into a private law relationship, which is primarily governed by contract or property law. Looking at the relationship between the football fan and the event organizer through that prism, the latter's property rights conflict with a potential right of the supporter "to do as he pleases." However, and that is an important point of clarification, the Constitutional Court rejected the notion that the broad and subsidiary freedom "to do as one pleases" ("general freedom of action") could be molded into a legal interest precise and strong enough to stand against the property rights of the clubs and peak bodies mediating them. The principal asymmetry between the free individual and the state, where the latter always requires a justification to limit freedom, does not exist in private law, where the subjects oppose each other as legal equals. The general freedom of action which in essence is the legal basis and a reflection of that asymmetry can only be used to interfere in a private law relationship in exceptional circumstances, which the Constitutional Court failed to see in this case[5] (but which could, of course, always be construed by the Court, thus leaving a "backdoor" for the Court to step in if necessary).

The second point the Constitutional Court made is about the equality guarantee in Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. Constitutional equality protections, as constitutional prohibitions against discrimination, have always been very controversial as the traditional private law freedom to contract was always regarded as the free choice of contractual partners without being forced to disclose why one chooses to contract with one but not the other. That makes perfect sense when choosing a VW car over a Toyota or when buying a ticket to see Arsenal FC play at home against the Tottenham Hotspurs even if the sole reason for the choice is that one dislikes anything Japanese (or German in the reverse case) or one would never spend a penny that could flow into the pockets of the Spurs because one simply "hates" the Spurs. This is even true if the dislike centers around criteria otherwise fully and even legally unacceptable grounds, e.g., not buying a car from a specific car maker because their CEO is of a certain race, ethnicity or gender. That said, if the utility or a bank were not to contract with a person merely because that person is black or a woman, matters change profoundly. But where does the legal difference lie between the two scenarios? Why is it legally ok to be hateful in the one instance but unacceptable to be hateful in the other scenario? One important element might be the power matrix at play between the parties. If on the one side there is a quasimonopoly and on the other side an existential need to contract, one can make a case that there needs to be interference in the freedom to contract to protect the institutionally weaker side. But what about such basic situations as a landlord and tenant relationship? What if the landlord as a matter of principle does not rent to black families or perhaps just not to families with kids regardless of race, religion, or ethnicity? The legal order could not just stand by and perhaps hide behind potential evidentiary difficulties.[6]

This case does not concern the particularly sensitive issues of race, ethnicity, religion, or gender. But the Constitutional Court nonetheless spoke to the equality clause of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. It did so in a quite peculiar way. First, it stipulated that Article 3.1 of the Basic Law is in principle not conducive to espouse horizontal effects in private law relationships. The Court stated rather forcefully that "in principle, all persons have the freedom to choose – according to their personal preferences – when, with whom and under what circumstances they want to enter into contracts, and how they want to make use of their property in this context."[7] Then it went on to say that this could be different under specific circumstances and that such circumstances are present in this case. The Court pointed to the fact that such soccer games are open to the public at large and that a unilateral ban on one person has a considerable effect on that person's ability to participate in social life. The Court concludes that, therefore the event organizers cannot refuse entrance to a person without reason. The impact on the ability of social life as part of the considerations that have to be made to balance the rights and interests of the 6 See Schulze, Reiner, non-Discrimination in European Private Law, 2011, for a profound discussion of some of these issues by various authors. The underlying difficulties are amply illustrated in the scenario underlying the wedding cake decision of the US-Supreme Court. parties has its footing in the "public good"- clause which qualifies property protection in Article 14.2 of the Basic Law. The Constitutional Courts even points to the right to take part in cultural life under Article 15.1(a) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (ICESCR).[8] The Constitutional Court also explains the foremost procedural consequences of this construction. Stadium Operators must make reasonable efforts to investigate the facts, and they must hear persons before subjecting them to bans.[9] Finally, the Court finished up by saying that the challenged court decisions, in particular the final appeal judgment rendered by the German Supreme Court (Bundesgerichtshof, BGH) upholding the ban did indeed give proper recognition to the constitutional framework and this despite the fact that they did not mention the equality clause of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law at all as long as the relevant considerations can be deduced from the judgment.[10] The Constitutional Court considered it sufficient to rely on the fact that the prosecution authorities had commenced criminal investigations and such a commencement requires a solid factual basis. And the Court stressed that given the mass appeal of such sporting events, obligations on the clubs and associations must not be overly burdensome.[11]

Indeed, one could ask why the Constitutional Court applied so much effort to write about horizontal effect in ways not even raised by the parties and in a manner that does not lead to "overly strict standards" for addressees to adhere to. The answer could lie in the broader context of the underlying scenarios. The distinction between the public and the private is growing increasingly tenuous. In a 2011 decision concerning Frankfurt Airport, the applicants had challenged an "airport ban" imposed on them after they had been stopped by airport security and Federal Police from approaching staff and visitors of the Airport in protest of deportation of aliens.[12] Frankfurt Airport is operated by the Fraport Corporation, a publicly traded multinational business. The actions taken against the small group of protesters were based on private law provisions concerning the rights of property owners. These are, as explained above, a reflection of the property rights protected by Article 14 of the Basic Law. The protesters themselves from their perspective were using free speech and freedom of assembly and demonstration guarantees protected in Articles 5.1 and 8 of the Basic Law. However, the Constitutional Court did not accept this juxtaposition in the Fraport decision. The reason was that just over 50% of the Fraport shares are held by the state of Hesse and a private law entity that operates as the utility for the City of Frankfurt.[13] In other words, two public entities have a controlling majority stake in Fraport. The Constitutional Court reemphasized that the state cannot get out of obligations arising from fundamental rights of the Basic Law by discharging functions under cover of a private law entity. That had already been accepted for undertakings wholly owned by the state and the Court now explicitly extended the reach of fundamental rights of the Basic Law to private corporations partially owned by the state if the ownership extends beyond 50%. It must be emphasized that in such cases the fundamental rights of the Basic Law do not only obligate the state entities as shareholders but the corporation itself.[14] Having thus established that in this case the shareholder structure required that, with regard to fundamental rights, the Fraport corporation must be treated as a state and not as a private entity, the issue of horizontal effect of rights was no longer relevant. It is noteworthy that the Court made it a point to state nonetheless, that this difference in how fundamental rights impact legal relationship – directly if brought against a state actor, indirectly, i.e., horizontally, if brought up in private party relationships – does not mean that the scope and reach of the fundamental rights in question is different, i.e. of lesser impact when invoked in the context of private law relationships. In other words, the impact of fundamental rights can be just as strong on a private actor as it is on state actors.[15]This obiter dictum can only be understood as an attempt to communicate the position of the Constitutional Court that public and private remain two different things but that in regard to the exercise of fundamental rights the focus is on the balance between the exercise of the right in question and any opposing legal interests and that this balancing act is not at all or at least not in any special way determined by the organizational framework under which the actors operate.[16]

Translation of "Football Stadium Ban" decision, BVerfG, 11.4.2018, 1 BvR 3080/09, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20180411_1bvr308009en.html

Headnotes:

1. Even in conjunction with the doctrine of the indirect horizontal effects of fundamental rights (mittelbare Drittwirkung), Article 3(1) of the Basic Law does not give rise to an objective constitutional principle according to which legal relationships between private actors would be generally subject to equality guarantees. In principle, all persons have the freedom to choose - according to their own preferences - when, with whom and under what circumstances they want to enter into contracts.

2. Under specific circumstances, however, equality requirements relating to relationships between private actors may derive from Article 3(1) of the Basic Law. Article 3(1) of the Basic Law does have horizontal effects, inter alia, where private actors exercise their right to enforce house rules (Hausrecht) under private law to exclude individual persons from events organised, of the private actors' own volition, for large audiences to the effect that admission is granted without distinguishing between individual persons, and where such exclusion has a considerable impact on the ability of the persons concerned to participate in social life. Event organisers may not use their discretionary powers to exclude specific persons from such events without factual reasons.

16 The problem of private property and free speech or assembly was at issue in the decision of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in the case of Appleby and others v. the United Kingdom, Appl. No. 44306/98, 6.5.2003, http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-61080, where the ECtHR denied the claim that exercising the communication rights guaranteed in Article 10 (free speech) and 11 (freedom of assembly and association) of the ECHR could only be effectively exercised in the privately-owned shopping mall in the town center. The ECtHR made extensive reference to US and Canadian case-law in this regard, see paras. 25-32.

3. Imposing a stadium ban is not contingent upon proving that the person in question has committed a criminal offence; rather, it is sufficient to demonstrate that factual indications give rise to concerns that the affected persons will cause future disturbances. Before a ban is imposed, the persons concerned must, in principle, be heard; they may request that reasons be given for the stadium ban, to allow for legal recourse.

Facts:

The constitutional complaint concerns a nationwide stadium ban imposed on the complainant by a football club [the defendant in the initial proceedings]. [1]

I.

[Excerpt from press release no.29/2018 of 27 April 2018]

In 2006, the complainant, a then sixteen-year-old fan of the football club FC Bayern Munich, attended a football match against MSV Duisburg in the opposing team's stadium. After the end of the match, verbal and physical altercations involving a group of FC Bayern Munich fans, among them the complainant, and fans of MSV Duisburg resulted in personal injury and damage to property. Subsequently, approximately 50 persons, including the complainant, were placed in police custody for the purposes of establishing their identities. The public prosecution office opened investigation proceedings on suspicion of rioting charges against the complainant. Following this, MSV Duisburg imposed a ban on the complainant at the suggestion of the local chief of police, prohibiting him from entering any stadium in Germany until June 2008. In this respect, MSV Duisburg acted as agent on behalf of the German Football Association (Deutscher Fußball-Bund e.V. - DFB), the League Association (Ligaverband) as well as all Bundesliga football clubs, as the clubs have mandated each other as agents with the authority to impose such stadium bans, to exercise the owner's right to enforce house rules and to enforce bans on entering the grounds of their respective football venues. In imposing the stadium ban, MSV Duisburg invoked its right to enforce house rules and the DFB's "Guidelines on Stadium Bans" in the version valid at the time. The criminal investigation proceedings were discontinued on the grounds that the charges were classified as misdemeanours involving only minor personal guilt pursuant to § 153(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung - StPO). Nonetheless, MSV Duisburg decided, without having heard the complainant, that the stadium ban be kept in place. FC Bayern Munich subsequently expelled the complainant from the club and cancelled his annual membership pass.

The complainant brought an action requesting that the nationwide stadium ban be lifted. After the initial application filed by the complainant had been rendered moot, the complainant modified his application in the appeal proceedings to an application seeking a declaration that the stadium ban had been unlawful. The initial action and the appeal on points of fact and law, as well as the appeal on points of law before the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof), were unsuccessful.

6. With his constitutional complaint, the complainant claims a violation of his fundamental rights, contending that he was banned from entering stadiums on the basis of a mere suspicion without viable justification or reasons. The complainant argues that in light of the paramount significance of football for social life and the importance attached to it by the general public and society, the stadium ban was not merely in breach of ordinary law but also violated his fundamental rights. In this respect, the complainant invokes Art. 2(1) in conjunction with Art. 20(3) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) and his general right of personality deriving from Art. 2(1) in conjunction with Art. 1(1) GG. [19]

B.

II.

The constitutional complaint is unfounded. The challenged decisions do sufficiently take into account the principle that fundamental rights permeate private law (Ausstrahlungswirkung). [30]

1. The standard of review applicable to the challenged decisions under constitutional law is informed by the doctrine of the indirect horizontal effects of fundamental rights (mittelbare Drittwirkung der Grundrechte). [31]

a) The challenged decisions concern a legal dispute between private actors relating to the scope of rights of ownership and possession vis-à-vis third parties under private law. According to the established case-law of the Court, fundamental rights may have a bearing on such disputes by way of indirect horizontal effects (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198 <205 and 206>; 42, 143 <148>; 89, 214 <229>; 103, 89 <100>; 137, 273 <313 para. 109>; established case-law). Fundamental rights do not generally create direct obligations between private actors. They do, however, permeate legal relationships under private law; it is thus incumbent upon the regular courts to give effect to fundamental rights in the interpretation of ordinary law, in particular by means of general clauses contained in private law provisions and legal concepts that are not precisely defined in statutory law. These effects are rooted in the decisions on constitutional values (verfassungsrechtliche Wertentscheidungen) enshrined in fundamental rights, which permeate private law in terms of "guiding principles" (cf. BVerfGE 73, 261 <269>; 81, 242 <254>; 89, 214 <229>; 112, 332 <352>); accordingly, the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court has referred to the fundamental rights as an "objective order of constitutional values" (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198 <205 and 206>; 25, 256 <263>; 33, 1 <12>). In this context, the fundamental rights do not serve the purpose of consistently keeping freedom-restricting interferences to a minimum; rather, they are to be developed as fundamental values informing the balancing of the freedoms of equally entitled rights holders. The freedom afforded one right holder must be reconciled with the freedom afforded another. For this purpose, it is necessary to assess conflicting fundamental rights positions in terms of how they interact, and to strike a balance in accordance with the principle of practical concordance (praktische Konkordanz), which requires that the fundamental rights of all persons concerned be given effect to the broadest possible extent (cf. BVerfGE 129, 78 <101 and 102>; 134, 204 <223 para. 68>; 142, 74 <101 para. 82>; established case-law). [32]

In this regard, the extent to which fundamental rights indirectly permeate private law depends on the circumstances of the individual case. In order to sufficiently lend effect to the constitutional values enshrined in fundamental rights, it is imperative that a balance be sought between the spheres of freedom of the various rights holders. Decisive factors may include the inevitable consequences resulting from certain situations, the disparity between opposing parties, the importance attached to certain services in society, or the social position of power held by one of the parties (cf. BVerfGE 89, 214 <232 et seq.>; 128, 226 <249 and 250>). [33]

2. The challenged decisions are based on §§ 862, 1004 of the Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch - BGB) with regard to determining the scope of the right to enforce house rules under private law on the part of stadium operators vis-à-vis football fans seeking access. In this context, constitutional law requires that the guarantee of private property under Art. 14(1) GG and the protection against arbitrary unequal treatment under Art. 3(1) GG be taken into consideration. [35]

a) The defendant in the initial proceedings invokes the right to enforce house rules in its capacity as a stadium operator. This right is protected under the guarantee of private property in Art. 14(1) GG. §§ 862, 1004 BGB [...] and the right to enforce house rules deriving from ownership and possession under private law lend shape to the constitutional guarantee of private property in the area of private law. In this respect, the rights of stadium operators must be interpreted in civil proceedings in a manner that takes into account the content of the freedom of property pursuant to Art. 14(1) GG. [36]

b) In the case at hand, the complainant cannot invoke the general freedom of action (allgemeine Handlungsfreiheit) guaranteed in Art. 2(1) GG against the right of ownership of the defendant in the initial proceedings. The general freedom of action provides a defensive right vis-à-vis the state that can be invoked against any unjustified prohibitions, especially on the grounds of disproportionality; as such, it is also applicable to bans [imposed by the state] restricting stadium access during football matches. This is a manifestation of the asymmetry of the rule of law, under which citizens are free, in principle, whereas the state is subject to limitations and held accountable when interfering with this freedom (cf. BVerfGE 128, 226 <244 and 245>). However, the constitutional guarantee of the general freedom of action does not encompass a similarly general constitutionally enshrined value which would ensure that in every private law dispute, the unspecified freedom to engage in any kind of self-determined conduct would guide the interpretation of private law, by way of indirect horizontal effects. To this end, the freedom to engage in any conduct one subjectively pleases - in this case to attend a football match -, based on the general freedom of action, cannot generally be invoked to restrict the ownership rights of private actors organising certain events. [37]

In specific situations, however, the protection provided under Art. 2(1) GG may extend into private law relations. This applies, for instance, in certain typical case categories where a particularly heavy burden is imposed, or where one contracting party is placed at a structural disadvantage (cf. BVerfGE 89, 214 <232>). Moreover, in individual cases, Art. 2(1) GG may serve as a catch-all fundamental right (Auffanggrundrecht) (cf. BVerfGE 85, 214 <217 et seq.>). The constitutional complaint at hand does not fall within any of these specific categories in which the general freedom of action would have to be indirectly taken into consideration as a decision on values enshrined in the Constitution. […] The central issue in the current proceedings is that the complainant was treated unequally compared to persons that were granted access to the stadium. […] [38]

c) In the current proceedings, the general requirement of equal treatment under Art. 3(1) GG must be considered opposite the stadium operator's right of ownership under Art. 14(1) GG. [39]

Yet Art. 3(1) GG does not give rise to an objective constitutional principle according to which legal relationships between private actors would be generally subject to equality guarantees. Requirements to that effect cannot be derived from the doctrine of indirect horizontal effects, either. In principle, all persons have the freedom to choose - according to their own preferences - when, with whom and under what circumstances they want to enter into contracts, and how they want to make use of their property in this context. This freedom is further shaped and variously restricted through statutory law and in particular through private law; in this regard, it can also be subject to specific requirements arising under constitutional law. In contrast, no general principle according to which legal relationships between private actors would generally be subject to equality guarantees follows from Article 3(1) of the Basic Law even when read in conjunction with the doctrine of indirect horizontal effects. It is not within the scope of the current proceedings to decide whether stricter standards could be derived from specific equality rights such as Art. 3(2) and (3) GG. [40]

However, under specific circumstances, equality requirements relating to relationships between private actors may arise from Art. 3(1) GG. The nationwide stadium ban in dispute constitutes such a circumstance. The indirect horizontal effect of the requirement of equal treatment comes into play here because the stadium ban imposes - based on the right to enforce house rules - a one-sided exclusion from events, which the organisers, of their own volition, had opened up to a large audience without distinguishing between individual persons, and this ban has a considerable impact on the ability of the persons concerned to participate in social life. By undertaking to organise such events, private actors also take on a special legal responsibility under constitutional law. They may not use their discretionary powers, which here result from the right to enforce house rules - in other cases they might potentially arise from a monopoly or a position of structural advantage -, to exclude specific persons from such events without factual reasons. In this case, the constitutional recognition of ownership as an absolute right in rem and the resulting one-sided discretionary powers of the owner to enforce house rules must be balanced - in light of the principle that property entails a social responsibility for the public good (Sozialbindung des Eigentums) (Art. 14(2) GG) - against the principle, which is binding upon the regular courts, that the guarantee of equal treatment permeates private law. [41]

Factually, this also lends effect to the right to take part in cultural life pursuant to Art. 15(1)(a) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (entry into force on 3 January 1976, UNTS vol. 993, p. 3, Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl] II p. 428; regarding sporting events open to everyone cf. Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment No. 21 [2009], 43rd session, UN Doc E/C.12/GC/21, paras. 13 and 16). [42]

3. When reviewing a stadium ban issued on the basis of the right to enforce house rules under private law, it is primarily incumbent upon the civil courts to resolve the conflict between ownership rights and the principle of equal treatment. The courts are afforded a wide margin of assessment in this respect. The Federal Constitutional Court intervenes only in the event of manifest errors of interpretation that are based on a fundamentally incorrect understanding of the significance of the relevant fundamental right (cf. BVerfGE 34, 269 <279 and 280>; 85, 248 <257 and 258>; 110, 226 <270>; established case-law). In this respect, it is irrelevant whether the civil courts directly invoke fundamental rights in their decision or, alternatively, give effect to these values by way of considerations rooted in ordinary law in conjunction with the established principles of interpretation under private law, thereby leaving the legal order more open for further development. What matters is that, ultimately, the values enshrined in fundamental rights are sufficiently taken into account. [44]

a) Consequently, the civil courts must ensure, in light of the principle of equal treatment, that stadium bans are not arbitrarily imposed, but are based on factual reasons. In particular, the courts are called upon to further specify how to achieve the necessary balancing with ownership rights in light of the factual circumstances under which stadium bans are imposed, the intended effects of the bans as well as the responsibility of the persons concerned. It is not objectionable under constitutional law if courts already consider it to be a sufficient factual reason justifying a stadium ban if there are well-founded concerns that a person poses a risk of future disturbances. In this context, evidence of previous criminal conduct or unlawful behaviour is not a necessary prerequisite, given that stadium operators have a legitimate interest in ensuring undisturbed football matches and are responsible for the safety of athletes and the public. It is sufficient to demonstrate that the concerns regarding future disturbances caused by the persons affected by the measures are supported by specific and proven facts of sufficient weight. This in line with other areas of private law that allow sanctions to be imposed when there are reasonable grounds for suspicion. […] [45]

b) The requirement that stadium bans be based on factual reasons gives rise to procedural requirements. In particular, stadium operators must make reasonable efforts to investigate the facts of the case. This includes, at least in principle, that the persons concerned be given a hearing prior to the imposition of a stadium ban. Furthermore, reasons for the decision must be provided upon request in order to enable the persons concerned to seek legal recourse. [46]

Recognising such procedural guarantees does not conflict with the nature of private law disputes. It is true that there is no basis for recognising such guarantees in private law relations where the parties freely determine their mutual contractual obligations. Where it is clear from the outset that decisions in the domain of private law do not come into conflict with the protected rights of third parties, and where these decisions can be made without regard to the concerns of the other party, it is not necessary, at least not generally, to put in place such procedural guarantees. The situation is different, however, insofar as the legal relationship between the parties is permeated by the principle of equal treatment deriving from fundamental rights, and it requires that the denial of a service be based on justifying reasons. When decisions made on the basis of house rules have a factually punitive effect, thus requiring that the persons concerned be given viable reasons, certain basic standards must be met: the persons concerned must be given the opportunity to address the allegations against them and, in submitting their view, to exercise their rights in a timely manner. This does not rule out that the decision may initially be taken without a hearing in certain justifiable cases; the person concerned may then be heard at a later date. […] [47]

In this respect, it is again primarily incumbent upon the regular courts to further specify the relevant requirements. […] In this context, the courts must take into consideration the largescale nature of major sporting events, the specific threats posed by violent fan groups and the interests of those banned from entering stadiums. [48]

4. Based on these considerations, the challenged decisions by the regular courts are not objectionable. The relevant subject of review is the decision of the Federal Court of Justice [in the proceedings of appeal on points of law], which affirms, by way of final decision, the previous decisions rendered by the courts of first instance and appeal. [49]

a) The Federal Court of Justice finds the stadium ban imposed on the complainant to be lawful on the grounds that it was based on a factual reason. The relevant considerations satisfy the constitutional requirements pertaining to the horizontal effects of Art. 3(1) GG. [50]

aa) In its reasoning, the Federal Court of Justice does not endorse the view that event organisers could take the decision on whether to impose a stadium ban at their free discretion; instead, the Federal Court of Justice requires that such bans be based on factual reasons. According to Federal Court of Justice's reasoning, the risk of possible future disturbances at sporting events constitutes such a factual reason. It further states that the assertion of such a risk must not be based on subjective concerns, but on objective facts. [51]

These considerations satisfy the constitutional requirements set out above. The Federal Court of Justice affirms the complainant's right not to be subject to arbitrary decisions, which derives from the values enshrined in Art. 3(1) GG and which must also be given effect in the private law relationship underlying the case at hand; subsequently, it weighs this right against the stadium operator's right to organise football matches in its stadium in accordance with its own ideas and, in particular, in accordance with the safety measures for which the stadium operator is responsible. In this respect, the Federal Court of Justice submits that "no overly strict standards" should be applied when assessing whether concerns regarding a risk of disturbances are justified; in light of the unique nature of major sporting events, elaborated upon by the court, this approach is within the margin of appreciation afforded regular courts. [52]

bb) The challenged decisions are consistent with the arguments put forward by the stadium operators in finding that the factual reason justifying the original stadium ban was the initiation of investigation proceedings by the public prosecution office which had not yet been concluded at the time. By law, investigation proceedings may only be initiated where there is a fact-based initial suspicion (Anfangsverdacht). Given that event organisers generally do not dispose of any better evidentiary means, they may rely on the assessment of the security authorities where investigations are still ongoing. In this context, the Federal Court of Justice also confirms that Art. 4(3) of the DFB Guidelines on Stadium Bans (Stadionverbots-Richtlinie - SVRL) is compatible with the law and, as an internal league regulation, provides a reasonable guiding standard. [53]

This assessment is not objectionable under constitutional law. As it explicitly states, the Federal Court of Justice does not relieve event organisers of the duty to examine the plausibility of the allegations against the person concerned, so that criminal proceedings initiated in a manifestly arbitrary manner or based on incorrect factual assumptions can be ruled out. However, it is not unreasonable to let stadium operators rely on the assessment of the public prosecution office or of the police while investigation proceedings are still pending. As the stadium operators have a legitimate interest in taking measures as early as possible in order to ensure safety, it cannot be asked of them to await the conclusion of the investigations before taking action. [54]

cc) Furthermore, the Federal Court of Justice holds that the subsequent discontinuation of the investigation proceedings did not suppress the factual reason for the stadium ban. While it could not be presumed, once the proceedings were discontinued pursuant to § 153 StPO, that the complainant himself had committed any criminal offence, the circumstances that had not only given rise to the initial suspicion of criminal conduct resulting in the investigation proceedings, but also to concerns that the complainant may cause further disturbances in the future, still persisted despite the fact that the criminal investigations were discontinued. The complainant knowingly frequented groups prone to violence that had indeed committed considerable acts of violence. […] [55]

The Federal Court of Justice did not err in considering this to be a factual reason for justifying the stadium ban. In this respect, the court did not accept at face value that the investigation proceedings could continue to provide a justification for the stadium ban even after they had been discontinued. Rather, the court upheld the stadium ban based on findings that, taken on their own, would suffice to establish a justified concern that the complainant would cause future disturbances, irrespective of the discontinuation of the criminal investigation proceedings. In contrast to the internal league regulation in the former version of § 6(1) SVRL, the decision to impose a stadium ban was, in particular, neither contingent on a reversal of the burden of proof nor solely based on the assertion that the complainant had failed to prove his innocence. Rather, the stadium ban was based on an independent assessment of the circumstances giving rise to the concern [that the complainant was likely to cause further disturbances] - which also appears to be the standard set out in the currently applicable DFB Guidelines on Stadium Bans (cf. § 7(2) SVRL, version dated July 2014). For the rest, the fact that stadium operators base their decisions on unified guidelines further ensures that stadium bans observe uniform standards, promoting objectivity. [56]

b) As regards the procedural requirements, the constitutional complaint is also unsuccessful. [57]

[...] At least for the future, the now updated Guidelines on Stadium Bans provide that the person concerned has a right to be heard and that, as a rule, this must take place before a stadium ban is imposed (cf. § 6(1) SVRL). Likewise, based on a reasonable interpretation of the Guidelines, decisions issuing a stadium ban must provide reasons, at least in cases where the decision is under review (cf. § 7(2) SVRL). With regard to the specific stadium ban at issue, which has by now expired, the complainant did for that matter have the opportunity in the proceedings before the civil courts to at least retroactively address the reasons put forward for the stadium ban and to be heard in this regard. [58]

II. Human Dignity - Article 1 of the Basic Law

a) Life Imprisonment, BVerfGE 45, 187

Explanatory Annotation

Article 102 of the Basic Law prohibits the death penalty absolutely and with no exception in times of peace or war. The German Criminal Code's[17] most severe sanction is imprisonment for life. This sanction is prescribed for the most heinous of crimes reaching from qualified forms of homicide (e.g. "murder" as defined in ss. 211, 212, and other crimes causing the death of victims, see ss. 176b, 178, 239a, 251, 306c, 307, 308, 309, 316a, 316c Criminal Code), to preparation of a war of aggression (s. 80), and qualified forms of treason (ss. 81, 94, 100). It is also prescribed as a sanction for certain international crimes such as genocide, crimes against humanity, and certain war crimes under the Code of Crimes Against International Law introduced in 2002.[18]

Life imprisonment, as the term suggests, could mean imprisonment until death. That raises two issues in the context of human dignity. The first one is connected to the understanding of human dignity itself. The understanding of human dignity as the core of a number of specialized and specified rights deriving from it in essence means that all of the rights guaranteed by the Basic Law have a dignity core. One of these rights is the freedom of movement in Article 2.2. That right is obviously severely limited if one is sentenced to a prison term. However, if one is sentenced to imprisonment for life, and if that were indeed to mean imprisonment until death, the right of freedom of movement would in fact be reduced to naught. This is incompatible with the notion of Article 1.1 of the Basic Law that every human being, including heinous criminals, partake in the protection of human dignity, that this dignity must be protected and that human dignity cannot be reduced to naught.

The Constitutional Court therefore stipulated in this decision that imprisonment for life cannot be construed as meaning imprisonment until death. Every human being must retain the possibility of regaining his or her freedom and this "freedom perspective" must be more than just the vague hope for clemency or an executive pardon at some time in the future. In practice this means that after 15 years of imprisonment, prisoners must either be released on probation (ss. 57a and 57b Criminal Code) or review processes must be in place that guarantee a periodic review of the prisoner's status and his potential for being released on probation.

The second issue raised by the imprisonment for life case if construed as imprisonment until death, has to do with Article 19.2 of the Basic Law which states that "[i]n no case may the essence of a basic right be affected". Article 19.2 requires that whereas certain limitations of rights can be justified, some rest of the right must always remain and a right cannot be "limited away" in totality. Construing life imprisonment as imprisonment until death would totally eliminate the right to freedom. The connection of Article 19.2 to the dignity core of all rights is evident.

There is one case where this "dignity core" approach is more difficult to establish. There are undoubtedly instances in which the police can use deadly force, e.g. in hostage-taking constellations if killing the hostage-taker appears to be the only way to save the hostages. One could argue that this necessarily takes away the hostage-takers right of life and nothing remains of this right. From a dignity perspective, however, it is important to note that the actor in these situations will always have some control over the situation. A hostage-taker, for example, can give up and release the hostages. It is up to him or her to stop and withdraw from the criminal act. The hostage taker is a main actor, a subject of the unfolding events and not just a mere object of government action and hence his dignity is not affected. However, from the perspective of the right to life and Article 19.2 things are more complicated and one will either have to construe this as an exception to the "untouchable core" principle or one will have to construe the right beyond just its individual component and argue that the killing affects only one person whereas the right of life of all the others remains unaffected.

Translation of the Life Imprisonment Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 45, 187*

Headnotes:

1. Life imprisonment for murder (s. 211 of the Criminal Code) is, in compliance with the following headnotes, compatible with the Basic Law.

2. As according to the status quo of scientific findings, it cannot be proven that the execution of the lifelong imprisonment is indispensably resulting in irreparable damages of a person's psychical or physical health and therefore establishing an infringement of human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law). This is if life imprisonment is executed in compliance with the penal law and considering the present practice of granting pardons.

3. A humane execution of the life imprisonment can only be assured if the sentenced criminal has a principally attainable option to regain freedom at a later point in time. The possibility of being granted a pardon is not sufficient; rather, the principle of the rule of law demands a statutory provision, determining the requirements for the suspension of an execution of life imprisonment and the applicable procedure.

4. It is not contrary to the Basic Law if the 'wantonly cruel' killing of a human being and the killing of a human being, to conceal another crime' are qualified as murder according to s. 211.2 of the Criminal Code. But this assumption requires the provision to be subject to a restrictive interpretation, in compliance with the principle of proportionality.

Order of the First Senate of 21 June 1977 - 1 BvL 14/76 -

* Translation by Miriam Söhne; © Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung.

Facts:

This case has its origin as a District Court case in the town of Verden. The defendant Detlev R. was a policeman and drug dealer. One of his customers, the substance-abuser Guenter L., blackmailed the defendant and demanded free drugs. Detlev R. pretended to go along and scheduled a visit at Guenter L.'s house. The defendant actually provided Guenter L. with the demanded drugs, but while the latter was busy preparing an injection, Detlev R. fatally shot him in the head three times at close range.

The case is before the Federal Constitutional Court due to a referral from the Verden District Court. The reason for the deferral was that the Verden court deemed the murder and the manslaughter statutes, ss. 211 and 212, respectively, of the Criminal Code in the revised version of 1969, incompatible with the human dignity clause of Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. The murder and the manslaughter statute both provide for life imprisonment in extreme cases-such as homicide to satisfy sexual urges, homicide as a result of greed, homicide to conceal another crime, extreme homicides in general, et cetera. The Verden court argued in detail that life imprisonment can be shown to destroy human beings within about twenty years. The District Court outlined how such long prison terms turn people into spiritual and physical wrecks. It concluded that the permanent exclusion of the criminal from society will destroy him psychologically and therefore the legislator violated its duty to respect human dignity as commanded by Article 1.1 of the Basic Law when it passed ss. 211 and 212 of the Criminal Code. The question was whether statutes which allow for life imprisonment in certain extreme cases of homicide are compatible with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law which commands that the state has the duty to respect and protect human dignity.

Extract from the Grounds:

C. I.

A sentence of life imprisonment represents an extraordinary severe infringement of a person's basic rights. In the catalogue of penalties, this punishment is the most invasive of the inviolable right to personal freedom under Article 2.2 of the Basic Law.

In implementing this penalty, the state not only limits the basic right guaranteed by article 2.2 of the Basic Law but it also implicates numerous other rights guaranteed by the Basic Law, depending on the individual case. The constitutional matter in question is therefore of considerable gravity and importance.

Indeed, the right of personal freedom under Article 2.2 of the Basic Law may be limited by a statutory act of Parliament. Parliament's freedom to enact legislation, however, is limited by the constitution in numerous respects.

In exercising its powers the legislature must take account of both the inviolability of human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law) which is the highest value in the constitutional order, as well as other constitutional principles, especially the principle of equality (Article 3.1 of the Basic Law), the rule of law, and the social state (Article 20.1 of the Basic Law).

Since the freedom of the individual is already such a highly important object of legal protection that it may only be limited on truly compelling grounds (BVerfGE 22, 180 [219]), any lifelong deprivation requires special scrutiny by the criterion of proportionality.

II.

1. Respect and protection of human dignity are among the constitutional principles of the Basic law. The free human personality and human dignity represent the highest legal values within the constitutional order (see BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]; 27, 1 [6]; 30, 173 [193]; 32, 98 [108]). The state in all its forms has the duty to respect and to protect the dignity of human beings.

This is based on the conception of man as a spiritual-moral being endowed to determine and develop hisself. This freedom, within the meaning of the Basic Law, is not one of an isolated and self-regarding individual, but rather it is the freedom of an individual that is related to the community and bound by it (see BVerfGE 33, 303 [334]). Due to the fact that the individual is bound by the community, the freedom cannot be in principle unlimited. The individual must allow those limitations of his freedom to act that the legislator deems bearable and necessary, in particular factual circumstances for the nourishment and support of the communal living with each other; however, the autonomy of the individual must be protected (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [20] - "Eavesdropping"). This means, also, that within the community each individual must be recognized, as a matter of principle, as a member with equal rights and a value of his own. The sentence "the human being must always remain the end of itself" has unlimited validity in all areas of the law; for the dignity of man as a person, which can never be taken away consists particularly therein, that he remains recognized as a person who bears responsibility for himself.

In the area of criminal law in which the highest demands to the maintenance of justice are posed, Article 1.1 of the Basic Law determines the understanding of the nature of penal sanctions and the relation between guilt and atonement. The fundamental principle nulla poena sine culpa has the rank of a constitutional norm (BVerfGE 20, 323 [331]). Every penal sanction must bear a just relation to the severity of the offence and the guilt of the offender (BVerfGE 6, 389 [439]; 9, 167 [169]; 20, 323 [331]; 25, 269 [285 seq.]). The command to respect human dignity means in particular that cruel, inhuman and degrading punishments are not permitted (BVerfGE 1, 332 [348]; 6, 389 [439]). The offender may not be turned into a mere object of the state's fight against crime under violation of his constitutionally protected right to social worth and respect (BVerfGE 28, 389 [391]). The fundamental prerequisites of individual and social existence of men must be preserved. From Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, in conjunction with the social state principle, one can, and this is particularly true in the execution of criminal punishments, derive the duty of the state to allow everyone at least that minimum level of existence at which human dignity is conceived. It would be inconsistent with human dignity perceived in this way if the state were to claim the right to forcefully strip a human of his freedom without the person having at least the possibility to ever regain freedom.

In the course of the discussion one must never loose sight of this principle: The dignity of the human being is something indispensable. The recognition of what is necessary to comply with the command to respect human dignity is, however, inseparable from the historical development.

The history of criminal law clearly shows that most cruel punishments were always replaced by milder punishments. The progress, away from more raw towards more humane, away from more simple towards more differentiated forms of punishment, has continued, and the path future progress will take, becomes visible. The judgment on what is necessary for the maintenance of human dignity can therefore only rest on present understanding and claim no right to timeless validity.

2. If these standards are used in assessing nature and effect of life imprisonment, one reaches the conclusion that no violation of Article 1.1 of the Basic Law is before the court.

c) With such a factual background, the constitutional review must exercise restraint (BVerfGE 37, 104 [118]; 43, 291 [347]). It is true that the Federal Constitutional Court has the duty to protect the basic rights against infringements from the legislator. Therefore, the court is in its review not bound by the legal understanding of the legislator. However, if assessments and actual judgments by the legislator are of importance for the constitutional review, then the court may, as a matter of principle, only overrule those which are possible to disproof. It seems apprehendable, however, that, even in cases where serious interferences with basic rights are under review, uncertainties in the evaluation of facts are to be resolved to the burden of the holder of the basic right. When the Federal Constitutional Court nevertheless denied finding a violation of the inviolability of the dignity of man as guaranteed by Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, that decision was mainly due to the following reasons:

aa) Life imprisonment finds its constitutionally necessary complement in a sensible execution of treatment. Penal institutions are obliged, even in the cases of life imprisonment, to promote the rehabilitation of the inmates, to maintain their ability and willingness to function as human beings and to offset damaging consequences caused by the loss of freedom and thereby especially preventing them from all deforming alterations of personality. These obligations for the execution of the penal sanctions are based on the Constitution. They can be derived from the inviolability of the dignity of man as guaranteed by Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. If these obligations are adequately complied with by the penal institutions, then those institutions substantially contribute to counter, for instance, the threat of changing personalities of inmates.

As of today, the execution of criminal penalties in the Federal Republic of Germany has already been more than a mere execution to incapacitate. Rather, the authorities have attempted to achieve an execution with treatment aimed at the reintegration of the offenders into society. This is consistent with former decisions by the Federal Constitutional Court on issues of the execution of criminal penalties. The court on several occasions has maintained that rehabilitation is constitutionally required in any community that puts human dignity at its centre and that it is committed to the principle of social justice. The prisoner's interest in reintegration into society flows from Article 1.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. The condemned criminal must be given the chance to re-enter society after having atoned for his crime (BVerfGE 35, 202 [235 seq.] - Lebach; 36, 174 [188]). The state is obliged within the realm of the possible to take all legal measures that are useful and necessary to achieve this goal.

If one assumes that even the criminal sentenced to life imprisonment must principally be granted a possibility to regain his freedom, then he must also have a right to be prepared to re-enter the society, even if he will only after a long period of atonement for his crime have the possibility to be obliged to handle a life in freedom (BVerfGE 40, 276 [284]). Even in such cases, the execution of the penalty can establish the prerequisites for a later release and ease the convict's reintegration into society.

bb) Empirical data shows that the full serving of a life imprisonment sentence is a rare exception. The criminals sentenced to life imprisonment, except in a few cases in which the predictions of social reintegration are negative and for reasons of public safety a continued execution of the sentence is necessary, are most often being released on parole. The probability of an occurrence of serious alterations of inmates' personalities is significantly limited by this practice. A summary study of the parole administration in the states shows, that over a period of thirty years, of the 702 inmates with lifetime sentences, who were released, very few (48) were released before 10 years and also very few were released after the extreme length of up to thirty years (27). The vast majority of parole releases happens between the 15th and the 25th year of the sentence.

4. a) The assessment of the constitutionality of life imprisonment especially with references to Article 1.1 of the Basic Law and the principle of the rule of law (Rechtsstaatsprinzip) shows that a humane execution of life imprisonment is possible only when the prisoner is given a concrete and realistically attainable chance to regain freedom at a later point in time; the state strikes at the very core of human dignity if it treats the prisoner without regard to the development of his personality and strips him of any hope of regaining his freedom. In order to assure the perspective to regain freedom at some point in the future, which is the prerequisite for rendering life imprisonment bearable according to the court's understanding of human dignity, in a manner which meets constitutional requirements, the current legal provisions relating to the granting of pardons are not sufficient.

b) A basically new trend became evident in the Ministry of Justice's 1974 draft of the fifteenth amendment to the Criminal Code. This draft provides that the execution of the penal sanction of life imprisonment can be suspended under parole with the consent of the inmate after an adequate part of the sentence has passed - the draft proposes 12 to 15 years - and one can justify to test whether the convict will cease to commit crimes. A review board shall then decide on the prisoner's release. This decision shall apparently be subject to the approval of a superior appellate court. The preface to the draft states that under certain conditions it should still be possible to enforce life imprisonment. Life imprisonment is the most invasive punishment in the current catalogue of penalties and should still be imposed, if necessary to protect the common good. As long as it is necessary to protect the common good, the state should not only impose such sentences but also carry them out. However, experience shows that the execution of life imprisonment to its full term is not always necessary to protect the common good. With regard to murder, the crime for which a sentence of life imprisonment is most often imposed, there are a significant number of offenders who in all probability will not repeat that crime. In these cases, where a positive social prognosis can be set up, life imprisonment can hardly be justified. Moreover, the finding that the long, continuous lack of freedom is an extraordinary physical and psychological burden that could result in a substantial detriment to the prisoner's personality provides a good reason for introducing a possibility of release. Additionally, a sentence of life imprisonment cannot be enforced humanely if from the outset the prisoner is denied any and every possibility of returning to freedom. Indeed, it has hardly been the rule up to now to require the prisoner to serve out his life sentence. Yet, an individual and case-by-case decision on whether a prisoner can be granted parole is not a satisfactory solution. Leading state officials rightly noted in their resolution of March 16, 1972 that it cannot be a satisfactory solution to correct the law in force by implementing a uniform practice of granting pardons.

IV.

The legislature does not infringe the constitutional requirement of sensible and appropriate punishment if it decides to impose life imprisonment for most offensive acts of killing (BVerfGE 28, 386 [391]).

c) The imposition of a life sentence does not contradict the constitutionally-based concept of rehabilitation, given the practice of granting pardons and current legislation concerning the suspension of punishments. The murderer sentenced to life usually does have a chance to be released after serving a certain period of time.

But for the criminal who remains a threat to society, the goal of rehabilitation may never be fulfilled. It is the particular personal circumstances of the criminal which may rule out successful rehabilitation rather then the sentence of life imprisonment itself.

V.

Article 1.1 and Article 2.1 together with the principle of the rule of law require that the elements of crime and its consequences must be harmonised in a reasonable way, in compliance with the idea of justice (see BVerfGE 20, 323 [331]; 25, 269 [286]; 27, 18 [29]). Therefore, the threatened punishment must be tailored in due consideration of the severity of the crime and the culpability of the offender.

In this context especially, the question arises whether the principle of proportionality may require a penalty other than life imprisonment for "murders of wanton cruelty" or for cases of murder "to conceal another crime". The issue is particularly relevant here because, with the exception of murder (s. 211 of the Criminal Code) and genocide (s. 220a.1 no. 1 of the Criminal Code), the legislature usually granted a range of punishment to the applicable court. Within this range it may ascertain the extent of punishment in a concrete case, according to the criteria concerning the award of punishment, named in s. 46 of the Criminal Code.

Under specific circumstances, the application of s. 211 of the Criminal Code might indeed result in an undue burden to the offender. But the senate is of the opinion that this is not the case as far as the killing under consideration is concerned. However, the criterion of an undue burden might still apply to cases where the offence was not specifically condemnable.

b) Aviation Security Act, BVerfGE 115, 118

Explanatory Annotation

The decision concerning the Aviation Security Act is one of several dealing with legislative efforts concentrating on security in the aftermath of the 9/11-attacks in New York and Washington, D.C. in 2001. Under the Basic Law any and all executive action requires a statutory legal basis if and insofar as such action has the potential to infringe upon a person's rights as guaranteed by the Basic Law. However, there was no such statutory authority to shoot down an aircraft if that was the only way to stop this aircraft from being used as a weapon against structures on the ground thus potentially threatening the lives of many. The new Aviation Security Act[19] intended to fill this perceived gap but was immediately challenged in constitutional complaint proceedings before the Constitutional Court. The Court struck down the statute on two main grounds.

First, the Court saw no constitutional authority for the use of the armed forces within the territory of the Republic. The use of the armed forces, i.e. the military, is tightly regulated by the Basic Law and restricted to the defence of the Republic from armed attacks and to extraterritorial military activities as part of collective self-defence organizations such as NATO or the United Nations. Domestic deployments and missions are only possible under Article 35.2 and 35.3 of the Basic Law to assist state police forces in their response to "grave accidents" and "natural disasters". The Court limited this assistance to measures the police forces could take themselves and the shooting down of an aircraft is not one of those measures.

Second, and despite the fact that the Act was already unconstitutional for lack of constitutional authority, the Court also addressed the fundamental rights aspect. The shooting down of a passenger aircraft with "innocent" passengers on board is obviously relevant under the right to life and human dignity guarantees of Articles 1.1 and 2.2 of the Basic Law. The shooting down of a passenger aircraft would inherently reduce the innocent passengers on board to mere objects of this decision, devoid of any and all rights, procedural or otherwise. The orders to shoot down would be tantamount to the order to sacrifice their lives for the protection of other lives. It would inherently mean that state authority values some lives, those on the ground, higher than those in the plane. The Court was not persuaded by and regarded as a purely fictional construct the argument that those who board a passenger aircraft (after 9/11) are familiar with this risk and have implicitly consented to be shot down. The Court also dismissed the argument that the airplane passengers are dead anyway because if not shot down they will almost certainly die when crashed into the target. In a human dignity context the fallacy of this argument is evident as it would require state authority to make a judgment on the value of life based on an estimate of the remaining life span and these decisions would have to be reached within a very small time span and under inherent insecurity of the precise facts.

It is only consequent that these considerations could not apply to an airplane solely occupied by terrorists. In this case the individuals on board are not merely helpless pawns but subjects controlling the unfolding events.

Headnotes:

1. Article 35.2 sentence 2 and 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) directly grants the Federation the right to issue regulations that provide the details concerning the deployment of the armed forces for the control of natural disasters and in the case of especially grave accidents in accordance with these provisions and concerning the cooperation with the Länder (states) affected. The concept of an "especially grave accident" within the meaning of Article 35.2, sentence 2 of the Basic Law also comprises events in which a disaster can be expected to happen with near certainty.

2. Article 35.2, sentence 2 and 35.3, sentence 1 of the Basic Law does not permit the Federation to order missions of the armed forces with specifically military weapons for the control of natural disasters and in the case of especially grave accidents.

3. The armed forces' authorisation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act (Luftsicherheitsgesetz - LuftSiG) to shoot down by the direct use of armed force an aircraft that is intended to be used against human lives is incompatible with the right to life under Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the guarantee of human dignity under Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to the extent that it affects persons on board the aircraft who are not participants in the crime.

Judgment of the First Senate of 15 February 2006 on the basis of the oral hearing of 9 November 2005 - 1 BvR 357/05 -

Facts:

The constitutional complaint challenges the armed forces' authorisation by the Aviation Security Act to shoot down, by the direct use of armed force, aircraft that are intended to be used as weapons in crimes against human lives.

The incidents on 11 September 2001 and 5 January 2003 caused a large number of measures aimed at preventing unlawful interference with civil aviation, at improving the security of civil aviation as a whole and at protecting it, in doing so, also from dangers that are imminent where aircraft are taken command of by people who want to abuse them for objectives that are unrelated to air traffic.

On 16 December 2002, the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union adopted Regulation (EC) No. 2320/2002 - amended by Regulation (EC) No. 849/2004 of 29 April 2004 (Official Journal of the European Communities (OJ) L 158 of 30 April 2004, p. 1) - Regulation (EC) No. 2320/2002 establishing common rules in the field of civil aviation security (OJ L 355 of 30 December 2002, p. 1). In the Federal Republic of Germany, factual as well as legal measures have been taken whose intended objectives are to increase the security of air traffic and to protect it from attacks.

Since 1 October 2003, a "National Air Security Centre" (Nationales Lage- und Führungszentrum "Sicherheit im Luftraum"), which has been established in Kalkar on the Lower Rhine, has been operational. It is intended to ensure coordinated, swift cooperation of all authorities of the Federation and the Länder in charge of questions of aviation security as a central information hub in order to guarantee security in the German air space. In the National Air Security Centre, members of the Federal Armed Forces, the Federal Police and the Deutsche Flugsicherung (German Air Navigation Services) survey the air space. The main function of the centre is to avert dangers that emanate from so-called renegade planes, which are civil aircraft that have been taken command of by people who want to abuse them as weapons for a targeted crash. Once an aircraft has been classified as a renegade, - be it by NATO or be it by the National Air Security Centre itself, - the responsibility for the measures required for averting such danger in the German air space rests with the competent authorities of the Federal Republic of Germany.

With their constitutional complaint, the complainants directly challenge the Aviation Security Act because, as they argue, it permits the state to intentionally kill persons who have not become perpetrators but victims of a crime. The complainants put forward that s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, which under the conditions specified in the law authorises to shoot down aircraft, violates their rights under Article 1.1, Article 2.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with Article 19.2 of the Basic Law.

C.

The constitutional complaint is also well-founded. s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is incompatible with Article 2.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with Article 87a.2 and Article 35.2 and 35.3 and in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, and is void.

I.

Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law guarantees the right to life as a liberty right (see BVerfGE 89, 120 [130]). With this right, the biological and physical existence of every human being is protected against encroachments by the state from the point in time of its coming into being until the human being's death, independently of the individual's circumstances of life and of his or her physical state and state of mind. Every human life as such has the same value (see BVerfGE 39, 1 [59]). Although it constitutes an ultimate value within the order of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 39, 1 [42]; 46, 160 [164]; 49, 24 [53]), also this right is nevertheless subject to the constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute pursuant to Article 2.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law. Also the fundamental right to life can therefore be encroached upon on the basis of a formal Act of Parliament (see BVerfGE 22, 180 [219]). The precondition for this is, however, that the Act in question meets the requirements of the Basic Law in every respect. It must be adopted in accordance with the legislative competences, it must leave the essence of the fundamental right unaffected pursuant to Article 19.2 of the Basic Law, and it may also not contradict the fundamental decisions of the constitution in any other respect.

II.

The challenged provision of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act does not live up to these standards.

1. It encroaches upon the scope of protection of the fundamental right to life, which is guaranteed by Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, of the crew and of the passengers of an aircraft affected by an operation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act and also of those who want to use the plane against the lives of people in the sense of this provision. Recourse to the authorisation to use direct armed force against an aircraft pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act will virtually always result in its crash. The consequence of the crash, in turn, will with near certainty be the death, and consequently the destruction of the lives, of all people on board the aircraft.

2. No constitutional justification can be adduced for such an encroachment. Under formal aspects already, s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act cannot be based on a legislative competence of the Federation (a). Apart from this, the provision also infringes Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law as regards substance to the extent that it not only affects those who want to abuse the aircraft as a weapon but also persons who are not responsible for causing the major aerial incident presumed under s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act (b).

a) The Federation lacks the legislative competence to enact the challenged regulation.

aa) S. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is part of the provisions in Part 3 of the Aviation Security Act. This part has the title "Support and Administrative Assistance by the Armed Forces" and thereby makes it evident that their deployment as it is regulated in ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act does not primarily constitute the performance of an autonomous function of the Federation but assistance, "in the context of the exercise of police power" and of the "support of the police forces of the Länder" (s. 13.1 of the Aviation Security Act), with a function that is incumbent on the Länder. This assistance is rendered, as s. 13 of the Aviation Security Act specifies in its subsections 1 to 3, along the lines of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law on the one hand and of Article 35.3 of the Basic Law on the other hand. Because these Articles incontestably form part of those regulations of the Basic Law which within the meaning of Article 87a.2 of the Basic Law explicitly permit the use of the armed forces outside defence (see Bundestag document V/2873, p. 2 under B in conjunction with pp. 9-10; on Article 35.3 of the Basic Law, see also BVerfGE 90, 286 [386, 387]), s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, just like the other regulations of Part 3 of the Act, is not about defence, also within the meaning of the provision under Article 73 no. 1 of the Basic Law, which establishes the corresponding competences (a different opinion is advanced in the reasoning of the draft bill on the new regulation of aviation security functions, Bundestag document 15/2361, p. 14, and also for instance in Federal Administrative Court, Die Öffentliche Verwaltung - DÖV 1973, p. 490 [492]). Also the sector of the protection of the civil population, which is included in the competence title "Defence", is therefore not pertinent.

S. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act can also not be based on the legislative competence of the Federation for air traffic pursuant to Article 73 no. 6 of the Basic Law. It need not be decided here whether the Federation could, in the framework of Article 73 no. 6 of the Basic Law, take over functions in the context of police power to a greater extent than it does so far. According to the design of the law, ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act are about support of the Länder in the context of their police power. It is the objective of the regulation to determine the procedures in the area of the Federation and as regards the co-operation with the Länder and to determine the operational equipment of the armed forces for the case of the armed forces being placed at the disposal of the police forces of the Länder to support them in the averting of dangers that are caused by a major aerial incident. Consequently, they are implementing regulations for the deployment of the armed forces under the circumstances of Article 35.2 sentences 2 and 3 of the Basic Law. The legislative competence of the Federation for this does not result from Article 73 no. 6 of the Basic Law (stated also in the Federal Government's reasoning for the bill; see Bundestag document 15/2361, p. 14). Instead, the competence for regulations of the Federation which determine details concerning the deployment of its armed forces, in cooperation with the Länder involved, to deal with a regional or interregional emergency situation, directly follows from Article 35.2 sentences 2 and 3 of the Basic Law itself.

bb) However, s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is not covered by this area of competence of the Federation because the provision cannot be reconciled with the framework provided by the Basic Law of constitutional law relating to the armed forces.

aaa) The armed forces, whose deployment is regulated by ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act, are established by the Federation for defence purposes pursuant to Article 87a.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Pursuant to Article 87a.2 of the Basic Law, they may only be employed for other purposes ("Apart from defence") to the extent explicitly permitted by the Basic Law. This regulation, which has been created in the course of the incorporation of the emergency constitution into the Basic Law by the Seventeenth Act to Amend the Basic Law of 24 June 1968 (Gesetz zur Änderung des Grundgesetzes, Federal Law Gazette I p. 709) is intended to prevent that for the deployment of the armed forces as a means of the executive power, "unwritten … competences" are derived "from the nature of things" (statement by the Bundestag Committee on Legal Affairs in its Written report on the draft of an emergency constitution, Bundestag document V/2873, p. 13). What is decisive for the interpretation and application of Article 87a.2 of the Basic Law is therefore the objective to limit the possibilities for an deployment of the Federal Armed Forces within the domestic territory by the precept of strict faithfulness to the wording of the statute (see BVerfGE 90, 286 [356, 357]).

bbb) This objective also determines the interpretation and application of the regulations by which, within the meaning of Article 87a.2 of the Basic Law, the deployment of the armed forces for purposes other than defence is explicitly provided in the Basic Law. They comprise, as has already been mentioned, the authorisations in Article 35.2 sentences 2 and 3 of the Basic Law, on the basis of which ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act are intended to serve the control of major aerial incidents and of the dangers connected with them. In the case of a regional emergency situation pursuant to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the Land affected can, inter alia, request the assistance of forces and facilities of the armed forces to deal with the natural disaster or the especially grave accident. In the case of an interregional emergency situation, which endangers an area larger than a Land, no such request is necessary pursuant to Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Instead, the Federal Government can in this case employ units of the armed forces of its own accord to support the police forces of the Länder, apart from units of the Federal Border Guard, which by an Act of 21 June 2005 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 1818) has been renamed Federal Police, to the extent that this is necessary for effectively dealing with the emergency situation.

ccc) The authorisation of the armed forces under s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act to use direct armed force against an aircraft is not in harmony with these regulations.

(1) Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law rules out the use of direct armed force in the case of a regional emergency situation.

(a) It is not constitutionally objectionable, however, that s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, as results from the connection of the provision with s. 13.1 and s. 14.1 of the Aviation Security Act, pursues the objective to prevent, by the use of police force, the occurrence of an especially grave accident pursuant to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law which is imminent as a present danger as a consequence of a major aerial incident.

(aa) What is understood as an especially grave accident within the meaning of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law - and with this, also within the meaning of ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act - is, in general, the occurrence of a damage of major extent which - such as a grave air or railway accident, a power failure with effects on essential sectors of the services of general interest, or an accident in a nuclear power plant - especially affects the public due to its significance and which is caused by human wrongdoing or technical deficiencies (along this line, see already Part A no. 3 of the Guideline of the Federal Minister of Defence for Assistance by the German Armed Forces in the Case of Natural Disasters or Especially Grave Accidents and in the Context of Emergency Assistance (Richtlinie des Bundesministers der Verteidigung über Hilfeleistungen der Bundeswehr bei Naturkatastrophen oder besonders schweren Unglücksfällen und im Rahmen der dringenden Nothilfe) of 8 November 1988, Ministerialblatt des Bundesministers für Verteidigung - VMBl p. 279). This understanding of the concept of an especially grave accident, which is constitutionally unobjectionable, also comprises events such as the ones that are at issue here.

(bb) The fact that the crash of the aircraft against which the measure pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is directed is meant to be caused intentionally does not run counter to the application of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

According to general usage, also an event whose occurrence is due to human intention can easily be understood as being an accident. Grounds to suppose that Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, in derogation of this, is intended to be restricted to accidents that have been caused unintentionally or negligently, so that it is not meant to include incidents that are based on intention, can be inferred neither from the wording of the provision nor from the materials relating to the Act (see Bundestag document V/1879, pp. 22 et seq.; V/2873, pp. 9-10). The meaning and purpose of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, which is to make effective disaster control possible also through the deployment of the armed forces (see Bundestag document V/1879, pp. 23-24) also speak in favour of interpreting the concept of "accident" broadly. For a long time state practice therefore has been rightly assuming that also occurrences of damages that are caused intentionally by third parties are to be regarded as especially grave accidents (see, respectively, nos. 3 of the Order of the Federal Minister of Defence on Assistance by the German Armed Forces in the Case of Natural Disasters or Especially Grave Accidents and in the Context of Emergency Assistance (Erlass des Bundesministers der Verteidigung über Hilfeleistungen der Bundeswehr bei Naturkatastrophen bzw. besonders schweren Unglücksfällen und dringende Nothilfe) of 22 May 1973, Ministerialblatt des Bundesministers für Verteidigung p. 313, and of the corresponding guideline of 17 December 1977, Ministerialblatt des Bundesministers für Verteidigung 1978 p. 86).

(cc) It is also constitutionally unobjectionable that the operation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is intended to be ordered and carried out at a point in time in which a major aerial incident within the meaning of s. 13.1 of the Aviation Security Act has already happened, its consequence, however, the especially grave accident itself which is supposed to be prevented by the direct use of armed force (see s. 14.1 of the Aviation Security Act), has not yet occurred. Article 35.2, sentence 2 of the Basic Law does not require the especially grave accident, for the control of which the armed forces are intended to be employed, to have already happened. By contrast, the concept of an emergency situation also comprises events in which a disaster can be expected to happen with near certainty.

It cannot be inferred from Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law that the armed forces' deployment for assistance is intended to be different in the case of natural disasters and especially grave accidents as regards the beginning of the deployment. As regards natural disasters, however, it is generally assumed in conformity with the Federal Minister of Defence's guideline for assistance (see Part A no. 2 of the Guideline of 8 November 1988) that this concept also comprises situations of imminent danger (see for example Bauer, in: Dreier, Grundgesetz, vol. II, 1998, Article 35, marginal no. 24; Gubelt, in: von Münch/Kunig, GrundgesetzKommentar, vol. 2, 4th/5th ed. 2001, Article 35, marginal no. 25; von Danwitz, in: v. Mangoldt/Klein/Starck, Kommentar zum Grundgesetz, 5th ed., vol. 2, 2005, Article 35, marginal no. 70), which means that it also covers situations of danger in which the damaging event that is imminent in the respective case can be expected to occur with near certainty if the situations of danger are not counteracted in time. For especially grave accidents, nothing different can apply for the sole reason that there cannot always be a clear-cut dividing line between them and natural disasters and because also here, the transition between a danger that is still imminent and the occurrence of the damage which has already happened can be fluid in the individual case. The meaning and purpose of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, which is to enable the Federation to render effective assistance in the sphere of activity of the Länder, speaks in favour of treating both causes of disasters in the same manner as regards the aspect of time, i.e. not to wait, in both cases, until the development of the danger that results in the occurrence of the damage has come to a close.

The fact that pursuant to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law the request for armed forces and their deployment is made "to render assistance" "in the case of" a natural disaster and "in the case of" an especially grave accident, does not forcibly suggest the assumption that the occurrence of the respective damage must have already occurred. The sense of the wording of the regulation equally admits of an interpretation to the effect that assistance can already be requested and rendered when it becomes apparent that in all probability, a case of damage will occur soon, i.e. if a present danger within the meaning of police law exists. This is perceptibly the assumption made under Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, which, going back to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, extends the Federal Government's competences for the case that the natural disaster or the accident "endangers" the area of more than one Land. As is the case here with an interregional emergency situation, the existence of a present danger is to be regarded as sufficient for the deployment of the armed forces also in a regional emergency situation pursuant to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

The Guidelines of the Federal Minister of Defence for Assistance by the German Armed Forces in the Case of Natural Disasters or Especially Grave Accidents and in the Context of Emergency Assistance have therefore rightly been assuming for a long time already that the armed forces may be employed not only "in cases of interregional endangerment" pursuant to Article 35.3 of the Basic Law, but also "in cases of regional endangerment" pursuant to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (thus most recently Part A no. 4 of the Guideline of 8 November 1988). This necessarily rules out the assumption that the especially grave accident must have already happened.

(b) The reason why an operation involving the direct use of armed force against an aircraft does not respect the boundaries of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is, however, that this provision does not permit an operational mission of the armed forces with specifically military weapons for the control of natural disasters or in the case of especially grave accidents.

(aa) The "assistance" referred to in Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is rendered to the Länder to enable them to effectively fulfil the function, which is incumbent on them, to deal with natural disasters or especially grave accidents. This is correctly assumed also by s. 13.1 of the Aviation Security Act, pursuant to which the deployment of the armed forces is intended to support the Länder, in the context of the exercise of police power, in preventing the occurrence of an especially grave accident to the extent that this is necessary for effectively dealing with such danger. Because the assistance is oriented towards this function which falls under the area of competence of the police authorities of the Länder, which according to the reasoning of the Act is not supposed to be encroached upon by ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act (see Bundestag document 15/2361,

p. 20 on s. 13), this also necessarily determines the kind of resources that can be used where the armed forces are employed for rendering assistance. They cannot be of a kind which is completely different, with regard to its quality, from those which are originally at the disposal of the Länder police forces for performing their duties. This means that when the armed forces are employed "to render assistance" upon the request of a Land pursuant to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, they can use the weapons that the law of the respective Land provides for its police forces. In contrast to this, military implements of combat, for instance the on-board weapons of a fighter aircraft which are required for measures pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, may not be used.

(bb) This understanding of the provision, which is imposed by the wording and by the meaning and purpose of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, is confirmed by the place of this provision in the legal system and by its legislative history. Pursuant to the draft of an emergency constitution presented by the Federal Government, the regional emergency situation within the meaning of Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law was originally intended to be regulated in Article 91 of the Basic Law together with the so-called domestic state of emergency (see Bundestag document V/1879, p. 3). It was the objective of the proposal to constitutionally legitimise the deployment of the armed forces within the domestic territory vis-à-vis the citizens and in view of the Basic Law's allocation of competences also for the case of regional disaster response (see Bundestag document V/1879, p. 23 on Article 91.1). What was intended pursuant to the explicit wording of the intended regulation was, however, that the armed forces can only be made available "as police forces". Thus, the Federal Government intended to ensure that the armed forces can be employed for police functions alone, and only with the competences provided under police law vis-à-vis the citizens (see Bundestag document V/1879, p. 23 on Article 91.2). This includes the statement that the use of specific military weapons should be ruled out where the armed forces are employed in the sphere of activity of the Länder.

Admittedly, the restrictive wording of an deployment of the armed forces "as police forces" has not been incorporated into the subsequent text of the constitution; it has been left out on the suggestion of the Bundestag's Committee on Legal Affairs to regulate assistance for the benefit of the Länder in the case of an emergency situation due to a disaster in Article 35.2 and 35.3 of the Basic Law and the assistance of the Länder in dealing with domestic states of emergency in Article 87a.4 and Article 91 of the Basic Law, i.e. in different factual contexts (on this, see Bundestag document V/2873, p. 2 under B, p. 9 on s. 1 no. 2c). This, however, did not pursue the objective to extend the objects regarded as admissible equipment of the armed forces to include weapons that are typical of the military (see also Cl. Arndt, Deutsches Verwaltungsblatt - DVBl 1968, p. 729 [730]).

On the contrary: With the provision proposed by it, which the constitution-amending legislature has later on made its own to this extent, the Committee intended to raise the threshold of the deployment of the military as an armed force in comparison with the draft presented by the government and to permit the armed deployment of the Federal Armed Forces only for combating militarily armed insurgents pursuant to Article 87a.4 of the Basic Law (see Bundestag document V/2873, p. 2 under B). This finds its visible expression in the fact that the provision on the deployment of the armed forces in a regional emergency situation has been incorporated into Part II of the Basic Law, which concerns the Federation and the Länder, and not into Part VIII, which also regulates the deployment of the armed forces in a war. According to the ideas of the constitution-creating legislature, their deployment for "assistance" pursuant to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law was explicitly intended to be restricted to enabling the Federal Armed Forces to perform the police functions, and to exercise their authorisation to take coercive police measures, which arise in the context of a regional emergency situation, for instance to block off endangered property and to perform traffic control (see Bundestag document V/2873, p. 10 on Article 35.2; on the constitutional-policy background of the North German flood disaster in 1962. See also the statements made by Senator Ruhnau (Hamburg, SPD) in the 3rd public information meeting of the Committees on Legal Affairs and on Internal Affairs of the 5th German Bundestag on 30 November 1967, Minutes, p. 8, and by Deputy Schmidt (Hamburg, SPD) in the 175th Session of the 5th German Bundestag on 16 May 1968, Stenographic Record, p. 9444).

(2) S. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is also incompatible with the regulation about interregional emergency situations under Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

(a) In this context, however, the fact that the direct use of armed force against an aircraft pursuant to s. 14.3 in conjunction with s. 13.1 of the Aviation Security Act occurs as a consequence of an action which has been started intentionally by those who want to use the aircraft against human lives is also constitutionally unobjectionable. For the reasons given with regard to Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (see above under C II 2 a bb ccc (1) (a)), such an incident, which has been caused intentionally, can be regarded as an especially grave accident within the meaning of Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. As results from the element "endangered", the fact that not all of its consequences have occurred yet, but that instead, events are still moving towards disaster, does also not rule out the application of Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Where it is that the endangerment occurs, and whether consequently the requirement of an interregional endangerment has been met, is the question in each individual case. That such endangerment concerns more than one Land if the requirements of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act are met is at any rate possible; according to the legislature's assessment of the situation (see Bundestag document 15/2361, pp. 20, 21, on s. 13 respectively) and according to the opinions submitted by the Bundestag and the Federal Government this is rather the rule.

(b) However, s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act meets with constitutional objections already because the deployment of the armed forces which is admissible pursuant to this provision does, in accordance with s. 13.3 of the Aviation Security Act, not always require a decision about the mission which is taken by the Federal Government before the mission.

Pursuant to Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, only the Federal Government is explicitly authorised to order the deployment of the armed forces in the case of an interregional emergency situation. Pursuant to Article 62 of the Basic Law, the Federal Government consists of the Federal Chancellor and the Federal Ministers. It is a collegial body. If the competence for deciding about the deployment of the armed forces for the purpose of interregional disaster response is reserved to the Federal Government, Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law consequently requires a decision of the collegial body (see Article 80.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law - BVerfGE 91, 148 [165, 166]). The competence for taking decisions that rests with the Federal Government as a whole is also a more powerful safeguard of the interests of the Länder, which are deeply affected by the deployment of the armed forces in their sphere of competence without this having been previously requested by the endangered Länder (see BVerfGE 26, 338 [397]).

S. 13.3 of the Aviation Security Act lives up to this only in its sentence 1, pursuant to which the decision about a mission pursuant to Article 35.3 of the Basic Law shall be taken by the Federal Government in consultation with the Länder affected. Sentences 2 and 3, however, provide that the Federal Minister of Defence, or in the event of the Minister of Defence having to be represented, the member of the Federal Government who is authorised to represent the Minister, shall decide if a decision of the Federal Government is not possible in time; in such case, which, in the opinion of the legislature, will be the rule (see Bundestag document 15/2361, p. 21 on s. 13), the decision of the Federal Government is to be brought about subsequently without delay. Pursuant to this provision, the Federal Government will not only in exceptional cases but regularly be substituted by individual government ministers when it comes to deciding on the deployment of the armed forces in interregional emergency situations. In view of Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, this can also not be justified by the special urgency of the decision. Instead, the fact that generally, the time available in the area of application of s. 13.3 of the Aviation Security Act will only be very short shows particularly clearly that as a general rule, it will not be possible to deal with measures of the kind regulated in s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act in the manner that is provided under Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

(c) Moreover, the boundaries of constitutional law relating to the armed forces under Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law have been overstepped above all because also in the case of an interregional emergency situation, a mission of the armed forces with typically military weapons is constitutionally impermissible.

Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law differs from Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law only in two aspects. Firstly, Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law requires the existence of a danger which threatens the territory of more than one Land. Secondly, regarding the interregional nature of the emergency situation, the initiative for effectively dealing with this situation is shifted to the Federal Government, and its competences to support the police forces of the Länder are extended; the Federal Government can, inter alia, employ units of the armed forces of its own accord. What is not provided, however, is that in such a mission, the armed forces can use specifically military weapons which are needed for an operation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act. Instead, the wording of Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, which permits the deployment of the armed forces only "to support" the police forces of the Länder, i.e. again only to perform a Land function, and the purpose of the regulation of mere support of the Länder by the Federation, which becomes apparent from this, rule out a mission with weapons that are typical of the military in the light of Article 87a.2 of the Basic Law also when it comes to dealing with interregional emergency situations.

This is confirmed by the legislative history of Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law to the extent that as regards this provision, the constitution-amending legislature did not see any reason for regulating the deployment of the armed forces and their equipment in a different manner than in Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. After it had been expressed with regard to this provision that in the context of an deployment for assistance in favour of the Länder also the performance of police functions that arise in such a mission is intended to be permitted, the corresponding statement concerning Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law obviously was so much a matter of course that the materials relating to the Act could do without any remarks on this (see Bundestag document V/2873, p. 10 on Article 35.2 and 35.3). This is understandable regarding the purposes of deployment "to render assistance" in Article 35.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law and "to support" in Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, which in general usage are essentially equal in meaning (on this, see also Cl. Arndt, loc. cit.). Also the Federal Minister of Defence's assistance guidelines of 8 November 1988 assume quite naturally in Part A no. 5 in conjunction with no. 4 and in Part C no. 16 that the powers as well as the nature and the extent of the Federal Armed Forces' assistance in the cases regulated by Article 35.2 sentence 2 and those regulated by Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law do not differ from each other. The Guidelines also do not provide missions of the armed forces with specifically military weapons of the kind assumed in s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act for the support of the police forces of the Länder pursuant to Article 35.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

b) Regarding the guarantee of human dignity enshrined in Article 1.1. of the Basic Law (aa), over and above this, s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is not in harmony with Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law also as regards substance to the extent that it permits the armed forces to shoot down aircraft with human beings on board who have become victims of an attack on the security of air traffic pursuant to s. 1 of the Aviation Security Act (bb). The provision is constitutionally unobjectionable as concerns substance (cc) only to the extent that the operation provided by s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is aimed at a pilotless aircraft or exclusively against the person or persons to whom such an attack can be attributed.

aa) The fundamental right to life guaranteed by Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is subject to the requirement of the specific enactment of a statute pursuant to Article 2.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law (see also above under C I). The Act, however, that restricts the fundamental right must in its turn be regarded in the light of the fundamental right and of the guarantee of human dignity under Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, which is closely linked with it. Human life is the vital basis of human dignity as the essential constitutive principle, and as the supreme value, of the constitution (see BVerfGE 39, 1 [42]; 72, 105 [115]; 109, 279 [311]). All human beings possess this dignity as persons, irrespective of their qualities, their physical or mental state, their achievements and their social status (see BVerfGE 87, 209 [228]; 96, 375 [399]). It cannot be taken away from any human being. What can be violated, however, is the claim to respect which results from it (see BVerfGE 87, 209 [228]). This applies irrespective, inter alia, of the probable duration of the individual human life (see BVerfGE 30, 173 [194] on the human being's claim to respect of his or her dignity even after death).

In view of this relation between the right to life and human dignity, the state is prohibited, on the one hand, from encroaching upon the fundamental right to life by measures of its own, thereby violating the ban on the disregard of human dignity. On the other hand, the state is also obliged to protect every human life. This duty of protection demands of the state and its bodies to shield and to promote the life of every individual, which means above all to also protect it from unlawful attacks, and interference, by third parties (see BVerfGE 39, 1 [42]; 46, 160 [164]; 56, 54 [73]). Also this duty of protection has its foundations in Article 1.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, which explicitly obliges the state to respect and protect human dignity (see BVerfGE 46, 160 [164]; 49, 89 [142]; 88, 203 [251]).

What this obligation means in concrete terms for state action cannot be definitely determined once and for all (see BVerfGE 45, 187 [229]; 96, 375 [399, 400]). Article 1.1 of the Basic Law protects the individual human being not only against humiliation, branding, persecution, outlawing and similar actions by third parties or by the state itself (see BVerfGE 1, 97 [104]; 107, 275 [284]; 109, 279 [312]). Taking as a starting point the idea of the constitution-creating legislature that it is part of the nature of human beings to exercise self-determination in freedom and to freely develop themselves, and that the individual can claim, in principle, to be recognised in society as a member with equal rights and with a value of his or her own (see BVerfGE 45, 187 [227, 228]), the obligation to respect and protect human dignity generally precludes making a human being a mere object of the state (see BVerfGE 27, 1 [6]); 45, 187 [228]; 96, 375 [399]). What is thus absolutely prohibited is any treatment of a human being by public authority which fundamentally calls into question his or her quality of a subject, his or her status as a legal entity (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [26]; 87, 209 [228]; 96, 375 [399]) by its lack of respect of the value which is due to every human being for his or her own sake, by virtue of his or her being a person (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [26]; 109, 279 [312, 313]). When it is that such a treatment occurs must be stated in concrete terms in the individual case in view of the specific situation in which a conflict can arise (see BVerfGE 30, 1 [25]; 109, 279 [311]).

bb) According to these standards, s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is also incompatible with Article 2.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to the extent that the shooting down of an aircraft affects people who, as its crew and passengers, have not exerted any influence on the occurrence of the non-warlike aerial incident assumed under s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act.

aaa) In the situation in which these persons are at the moment in which the order to use direct armed force against the aircraft involved in the aerial incident pursuant to s. 14.4 sentence 1 of the Aviation Security Act is made, it must be possible, pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, to assume with certainty that the aircraft is intended to be used against human lives. As has been stated in the reasoning for the Act, the aircraft must have been converted into an assault weapon by those who have brought it under their command (see Bundestag document 15/2361, p. 20 on s. 13.1); the aircraft itself must be used by the perpetrators in a targeted manner as a weapon for the crime, not merely as an auxiliary means for committing the crime, against the lives of people who stay in the area in which the aircraft is intended to crash (see Bundestag document 15/2361, p. 21 on s. 14.3), In such an extreme situation, which is, moreover, characterised by the cramped conditions of an aircraft in flight, the passengers and the crew are typically in a desperate situation. They can no longer influence the circumstances of their lives independently from others in a self-determined manner.

This makes them objects not only of the perpetrators of the crime. Also the state which in such a situation resorts to the measure provided by s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act treats them as mere objects of its rescue operation for the protection of others. The desperateness and inescapability which characterise the situation of the people on board the aircraft who are affected as victims also exist vis-à-vis those who order and execute the shooting down of the aircraft. Due to the circumstances, which cannot be controlled by them in any way, the crew and the passengers of the plane cannot escape this state action but are helpless and defenceless in the face of it with the consequence that they are shot down in a targeted manner together with the aircraft and as result of this will be killed with near certainty. Such a treatment ignores the status of the persons affected as subjects endowed with dignity and inalienable rights. By their killing being used as a means to save others, they are treated as objects and at the same time deprived of their rights; with their lives being disposed of unilaterally by the state, the persons on board the aircraft, who, as victims, are themselves in need of protection, are denied the value which is due to a human being for his or her own sake.

bbb) In addition, this happens under circumstances in which it cannot be expected that at the moment in which pursuant to s. 14.4 sentence 1 of the Aviation Security Act a decision concerning an operation under s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is taken, there is always a complete picture of the factual situation and that the factual situation can always be assessed correctly. One also cannot rule out the possibility that the course of events will be such that it is no longer required to carry out the operation. According to the findings that the Senate has gained from the written opinions submitted in the proceedings and from the statements made in the oral hearing, it cannot be assumed that the factual prerequisites for ordering and carrying out such an operation can always be established with the certainty required for this.

(1) In particular the Cockpit Association has pointed out that depending on the circumstances, establishing that a major aerial incident within the meaning of s. 13.1 of the Aviation Security Act has occurred and that such incident constitutes the danger of an especially grave accident is already fraught with great uncertainties. According to the Cockpit Association, such establishment can only rarely be made with certainty. The critical point in the assessment of the situation was said to be to what extent the possibly affected crew of the plane is still able to communicate the attempt at, or the success of, hijacking an aircraft to the decision-makers on the ground. If this was not possible, the factual basis was said to be tainted with the stigma of a misinterpretation from the very beginning.

Also the findings that are supposed to be gained from reconnaissance measures and checks pursuant to s. 15.1 of the Aviation Security Act are, in the opinion of the Cockpit Association, vague at best, even with ideal weather conditions. In the opinion of the Cockpit Association, there are limits to the approach of interceptors to an aircraft that has become conspicuous in view of the dangers involved. For this reason, the possibility of making out the situation and the events on board of such an aircraft is, according to the Cockpit Association, limited even if there is visual contact, which, moreover, is often difficult to establish. Under these circumstances, the assessment of the motivation and the objectives of the hijackers of an aircraft that is made on the basis of the facts ascertained were said to probably remain, as a general rule, speculative to the very end. Consequently, the danger concerning the application of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act was said to be that the order to shoot down the aircraft was made too early on an uncertain factual basis if, within the time slot available, which as a general rule is extremely narrow, armed force was at all supposed to be used in a timely manner with prospects of success and without disproportionately endangering people who are not participants in the crime. For such a mission to be effective, it was said to have to be accepted from the very beginning that the operation was possibly not required at all. In other words, reactions would probably often have to be excessive.

(2) In the proceedings, no indications have arisen for assuming that this assessment could be based on unrealistic, and thus unfounded, assumptions. On the contrary, also the Independent Flight Attendant Organisation UFO has plausibly stated that the decision to be taken by the Federal Minister of Defence or by the Minister's deputy pursuant to s. 14.4 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act must be made on the basis of information most of which is uncertain. Due to the complicated and error-prone channels of communication between the cabin crew and the cockpit on board an aircraft that is involved in an aerial incident on the one hand and between the cockpit and the decision-makers on the ground on the other hand, and with a view to the fact that the situation on board the aircraft can change within minutes or even seconds, it was said to be virtually impossible for those on the ground who must decide under extreme time pressure to reliably assess whether the requirements of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act are met. It was put forward that as a general rule, the decision would have to be taken on the basis of a suspicion only and not on the basis of established facts.

This appraisal appears convincing to the Senate not least because the complicated decision-making system, which depends on a large number of decision-makers and persons concerned, that must have been gone through pursuant to ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation

Security Act until an operation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security can be carried out, will require considerable time in the case of an emergency. In view of the fact that the overflight area of the Federal Republic of Germany is relatively small, this means that there is not only enormous time pressure on decision-making but also the danger of premature decisions.

ccc) Even if in the area of police power, insecurities concerning forecasts often cannot be completely avoided, it is absolutely inconceivable under the applicability of Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to intentionally kill persons such as the crew and the passengers of a hijacked plane, who are in a situation that is hopeless for them, on the basis of a statutory authorisation which even accepts such imponderabilities if necessary. It need not be decided here how a shooting down that is performed all the same, and an order relating to it, would have to be assessed under criminal law (on this, and on cases with comparable combinations of circumstances see, for instance, Decisions of the Supreme Court of Justice for the British Zone in Criminal Matters (Entscheidungen des Obersten Gerichtshofs für die Britische Zone in Strafsachen - OGHSt) 1, 321 [331 et seq., 335 et seq.]; 2, 117 [120 et seq.]; Roxin, Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil, vol. I, 3rd ed. 1997, pp. 888-889; Erb, in: Münchener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, vol. 1, 2003, s. 34, marginal nos. 117 et seq.; Rudolphi, in: Systematischer Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, vol. I, Allgemeiner Teil, Vor s. 19, marginal no. 8 [as at April 2003]; Kühl, Strafgesetzbuch, 25th ed. 2004, Vor s. 32, marginal no. 31; Tröndle/Fischer, Strafgesetzbuch, 52nd ed. 2004, Vor s. 32, marginal no. 15, s. 34, marginal no. 23; Hilgendorf, in: Blaschke/Förster/Lumpp/Schmidt, Sicherheit statt Freiheit?, 2005, p. 107 [130]). What is solely decisive for the constitutional appraisal is that the legislature may not, by establishing a statutory authorisation for intervention, give authority to perform operations of the nature regulated in s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act vis-à-vis people who are not participants in the crime and may not in this manner qualify such operations as legal and thus permit them. As missions of the armed forces of a non-warlike nature, they are incompatible with the right to life and the obligation of the state to respect and protect human dignity.

(1) Therefore it cannot be assumed - differently from arguments that are advanced sometimes - that someone boarding an aircraft as a crew member or as a passenger will presumably consent to it being shot down, and thus consenting to his or her own killing, in the case of the aircraft becoming involved in an aerial incident within the meaning of s. 13.1 of the Aviation Security Act which results in a measure averting the danger pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act. Such an assumption lacks any realistic grounds and is no more than an unrealistic fiction.

(2) Also the assessment that the persons who are on board a plane that is intended to be used against other people's lives, within the meaning of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, are doomed anyway, cannot remove its nature of an infringement of their right to dignity from the killing of innocent people in a situation that is desperate for them which an operation performed pursuant to this provisions as a general rule involves. Human life and human dignity enjoy the same constitutional protection regardless of the duration of the physical existence of the individual human being (see above under C I, II 2 b aa). Whoever denies this or calls this into question denies those who, such as the victims of a hijacking, are in a desperate situation that offers no alternative to them, precisely the respect which is due to them for the sake of their human dignity (see above under C II 2 b aa, bb aaa).

In addition, uncertainties as regards the factual situation exist here as well. These uncertainties, which characterise the assessment of the situation in the area of application of ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act in general (see above under C II 2 b bb bbb), necessarily also influence the prediction of how long people who are on board a plane which has been converted into an assault weapon will live, and whether there is still a chance of rescuing them. As a general rule, it will therefore not be possible to make a reliable statement about these people's lives being "lost anyway already".

(3) The assumption that anyone who is held on board an aircraft under the command of persons who intend to use the aircraft as a weapon of a crime against other people's lives within the meaning of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act has become part of a weapon and must bear being treated as such also does not justify a different assessment. This opinion expresses in a virtually undisguised manner that the victims of such an incident are no longer perceived as human beings but as part of an object, a view by which they themselves become objects. This cannot be reconciled with the Basic Law's concept of the human being and with the idea of the human being as a creature whose nature it is to exercise self-determination in freedom (see BVerfGE 45, 187 [227]), and who therefore may not be made a mere object of state action.

(4) The idea that the individual is obliged to sacrifice his or her life in the interest of the state as a whole in case of need if this is the only possible way of protecting the legally constituted body politic from attacks which are aimed at its breakdown and destruction (for instance Enders, in: Berliner Kommentar zum Grundgesetz, vol. 1, Article 1, marginal no. 93 (as of July 2005)) also does not lead to a different result. In this context, the Senate need not decide whether, and should the occasion arise, under which circumstances such a duty of taking responsibility, in solidarity, over and above the mechanisms of protection provided in the emergency constitution can be derived from the Basic Law. For in the area of application of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act the issue is not averting attacks aimed at abolishing the body politic and at eliminating the state's legal and constitutional system.

SS. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act serve to prevent, in the context of police power, the occurrence of especially grave accidents within the meaning of Article 35.2 sentences 2 and 3 of the Basic Law. As appears from the reasoning of the Act, such accidents can be politically motivated but can also be caused by criminals or by mentally confused persons acting on their own (see Bundestag document 15/2361, p. 14). As the incorporation of ss. 13 et seq. of the Aviation Security Act into the system of disaster control pursuant to Article 35.2 sentences 2 and 3 of the Basic Law shows, incidents are assumed which are not aimed at calling into question the state and its continued existence even where they are caused by political motives in the individual case. Under these circumstances, there is no room to assume a duty to intervene within the meaning that has been explained.

(5) Finally, s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act also cannot be justified by invoking the state's duty to protect those against whose lives the aircraft that is abused as a weapon for a crime within the meaning of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, is intended to be used.

In complying with such duties of protection, the state and its bodies have a broad margin of assessment, valuation and organisation (see BVerfGE 77, 170 [214]; 79, 174 [202]; 92, 26 [46]). Unlike the fundamental rights in their function as subjective rights of defence against the state, the state's duties to protect which result from the objective contents of the fundamental rights are, in principle, not defined (see BVerfGE 96, 56 [64]). How the state bodies comply with such duties of protection is to be decided, as a matter of principle, by themselves on their own responsibility (see BVerfGE 46, 160 [164]; 96, 56 [64]). This also applies to their duty to protect human life. It is true that especially as regards this protected interest, in cases with a particular combination of circumstances, if effective protection of life cannot be achieved otherwise, the possibilities of choosing the means of complying with the duty of protection can be restricted to the choice of one particular means (see BVerfGE 46, 160 [164, 165]). The choice, however, can only be between means, the use of which is in harmony with the constitution.

This is not the case with s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act. What the ordering and the carrying out of the direct use of force against an aircraft pursuant to this provision leaves out of account is that, also the victims of an attack who are held in the aircraft are entitled to their lives being protected by the state. Not only are they denied this protection by the state, the state itself even encroaches on the lives of these defenceless people. Thus any procedure pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act disregards, as has been explained, these people's positions as subjects in a manner that is incompatible with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law and disregards the ban on killing that results from it for the state. The fact that this procedure is intended to serve, to protect and to preserve other people's lives does not alter this.

cc) S. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is, however, compatible with Article 2.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to the extent that the direct use of armed force is aimed at a pilotless aircraft or exclusively at persons who want to use the aircraft as a weapon of crime against the lives of people on the ground.

aaa) To this extent the guarantee of human dignity under Article 1.1 of the Basic Law is not contrary to the ordering and carrying out of an operation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act. This goes without saying in operations against pilotless aircraft but also applies in other case. Whoever, such as those who want to abuse an aircraft as a weapon to destroy human lives, unlawfully attacks the legal interests of others is not fundamentally called into question as regards his or her quality as a subject by being made the mere object of state action (see above under C II 2 b aa) where the state, complying with its duty of protection, defends itself against the unlawful attack and tries to avert it, complying with its duty of protection vis-à-vis those whose lives are intended to be annihilated. On the contrary, it exactly corresponds to the attacker's position as a subject if the consequences of his or her self-determined conduct are attributed to him or her personally, and if the attacker is held responsible for the events that he or she started. The attacker's right to respect of the dignity that is inherent also to him or her is therefore not impaired.

This is also not altered by the uncertainties which can arise in the examination of whether the prerequisites for ordering and carrying out of an operation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act are actually met (see above under C II 2 b bb bbb). In nature of the cases discussed here, these insecurities are not comparable to those that will have to be assumed, as a general rule, where there are, apart from the offenders also crew members and passengers on board the aircraft. If those who have the aircraft under their command do not intend to use it as a weapon, if therefore the corresponding suspicion is unfounded, they can, on the occasion of the early measures carried out pursuant to s. 15.1 and s. 14.1 of the Aviation Security Act, for instance on account of the threat to use armed force or on account of a warning shot, easily show by cooperating, for instance by changing course or by landing the aircraft, that no danger emanates from them. The specific difficulties that can arise as regards communication between the cabin crew, which is possibly threatened by offenders, and the cockpit, and between the cockpit and the decision-makers on the ground, do not exist here. In such cases, it is therefore easier to ascertain with sufficient reliability and also in a timely manner that an aircraft is intended to be abused as a weapon for a targeted crash.

If no indications exist that there are people on board an aircraft that has become conspicuous who are not participants in the crime, remaining uncertainties - for example as regards the underlying motives of the aerial incident - refer to a course of events that has been started, and can be averted, by those against whom the measure averting danger pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is exclusively directed. Imponderabilities in this context are therefore attributable to the offenders' sphere of responsibility.

bbb) To the extent that it is only applied vis-à-vis persons on board an aircraft who want to use it as a weapon against human lives, the regulation under s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act also lives up to the requirements of the principle of proportionality.

(1) The provision serves the objective of saving human lives. With regard to the ultimate value that human life has in the Basic Law's constitutional order (see above under C I), this is a regulatory purpose of such weight that it can justify the serious encroachment upon the right to life of the offenders on board the aircraft.

(2) S. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is not absolutely unsuitable for achieving this purpose of protection because it cannot be ruled out that this purpose is promoted in an individual case by a measure pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act (see BVerfGE 30, 292 [316]; 90, 145 [172]; 110, 141 [164]). Regardless of the uncertainties concerning the assessment and prediction of the situation that have been described (see above under C II 2 b bb bbb), situations are conceivable in which it can be reliably ascertained that the only people on board an aircraft which is involved in an aerial incident are offenders participating in such incident, and in which it can also be assumed with sufficient certainty that a mission pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act will not have consequences that are detrimental to the lives of people on the ground. Whether such a factual situation exists depends on the assessment of the situation in the individual case. If such assessment results in the safe judgment that there are only offenders on board the aircraft and in the prediction that the shooting down of the aircraft can avert the danger from the people on the ground who are threatened by the plane, the success that is intended to be achieved by s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act is furthered. Therefore the suitability of this provision for the purpose that is intended with it cannot be generally denied.

(3) In such a case also, the requirement of the necessity of the provision for achieving the objective is met because no equally effective means is apparent that does not impair the offenders' right to life at all, or impairs it less (see BVerfGE 30, 292 [316]; 90, 145 [172]; 110, 141 [164]).

Especially in ss. 5 to 12 of the Aviation Security Act, the legislature has taken a whole package of measures, all of which are intended to serve protection from attacks on the security of air traffic, in particular from hijackings, acts of sabotage and terrorist attacks within the meaning of s. 1 of the Aviation Security Act (for further details, see above under A I 2 b bb aaa (1)). In spite of this, the legislature has regarded it as necessary to enact, with ss. 13 to 15 of the Aviation Security Act, regulations with special authorisations for intervention and protective measures for the case that on account of a major aerial incident, the occurrence of an especially grave accident within the meaning of Article 35.2 sentence 2 or 35.3 of the Basic Law must be feared, regulations that even include the authorisation to use, as the ultima ratio, direct armed force against an aircraft under the conditions specified in s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act. This is based on the irrefutable assessment that experience has shown that also the extensive precautions pursuant to ss. 5 to 11 of the Aviation Security Act, as well as the extension of the pilots' functions and competences by s. 12 of the Aviation Security Act cannot provide absolutely reliable protection against the misuse of aircraft for criminal purposes. Nothing different can apply to other conceivable protective measures.

(4) Finally, the authorisation to use direct armed force against an aircraft on board of which there are only people who want to abuse it within the meaning of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, is also proportional in the narrower sense. According to the result of the overall weighing up between the seriousness of the encroachment upon fundamental rights that it involves and the weight of the legal interests that are to be protected (see on this BVerfGE 90, 145 [173]; 104, 337 [349]; 110, 141 [165]), the shooting down of such an aircraft is an appropriate measure of averting danger which is reasonable for the persons affected if there is certainty about the elements of the offence.

(a) However, the encroachment upon fundamental rights carries much weight because the execution of the operation pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act will with near certainty result in the death of the people on board the plane. But under the combination of circumstances that is assumed here, it is these people themselves who, as offenders, have brought about the necessity of state intervention, and that they can avert such intervention at any time by refraining from realising their criminal plan. It is the people who have the aircraft under their command who determine not only the course of events on board, but also on the ground in a decisive manner. Their killing can only take place if it can be established with certainty that they will use the aircraft that is under their control to kill people, and if they keep to their plan even though they are aware of the danger to their lives that this involves for them. This reduces the gravity of the encroachment upon their fundamental rights.

On the other hand, those in the target area of the intended plane crash whose lives are intended to be protected by the measure of intervention under s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act by which the state complies with its duty of protection, as a general rule do not have the possibility of averting the attack that is planned against them and in particular, of escaping it.

(b) What must also be kept in mind, however, is that the application of s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act will possibly affect not only extremely dangerous installations on the ground but will possibly also kill people who are staying in areas in which, in all probability, the wreckage of the aircraft that is shot down by the use of armed force will come down. The state is constitutionally obliged to protect also the lives - and the health - of these people. In a decision pursuant to s. 14.4 sentence 1 of the Aviation Security Act, this cannot be left out of account.

This aspect, however, does not concern the continued existence in law of the regulation under s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, but its application in the individual case. Pursuant to the opinions submitted in the proceedings, the application is intended to be refrained from anyway if it must be assumed with certainty that people on the ground would suffer damage or even lose their lives by plane wreckage falling down on densely populated areas. Concerning the question whether the provision also meets the proportionality requirements of constitutional law, it is sufficient to establish that combinations of circumstances are conceivable in which the direct use of armed force against an aircraft which only has attackers on air traffic on board can avert the danger to the lives of those against whom the aircraft is intended to be used as the weapon for the crime without the shooting down of the aircraft encroaching at the same time upon the lives of others. As has been set out (see above under C II 2 b cc bbb (2)), this is the case. This makes s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act also proportional in the narrower sense to the extent that it permits the direct use of armed force against a pilotless aircraft or against an aircraft which only has attackers on board.

ccc) The ban under Article 19.2 of the Basic Law on affecting the essence of a fundamental right does also not rule out such a measure against this group of persons. In view of the extremely exceptional situation that is assumed by

s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act, the essence of the fundamental right to life remains unaffected in the case assumed here by the encroachment upon the fundamental right that this provision involves as long as important interests of protection of third parties legitimise the encroachment and as long as the principle of proportionality is respected (see BVerfGE 22, 180 [219, 220]; 109, 133 [156]). According to the statements made above, both conditions are met (see under C II 2 b cc bbb).

III.

Because the Federation lacks legislative competence for s. 14.3 of the Aviation Security Act in the first place, the regulation does not continue in force also to the extent that the direct use of armed force against an aircraft can be justified under substantive constitutional law. The regulation is completely unconstitutional and consequently, it is void pursuant to s. 95.3 sentence 1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG). Under the circumstances, there is no room for merely stating the incompatibility of the challenged regulation with the Basic Law.

The decision about the costs is based on s. 34a.2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act.

III. Free Development of Personality and the Protection of Physical Integrity and Personal Liberty - Article 2 of the Basic Law

1. Article 2.1 - Free Development of Personality

a) Elfes, BVerfGE 6, 32

Explanatory Annotation

This decision is one of the fundamental decisions of the Constitutional Court that has shaped the liberal character of the Basic Law. At issue was the refusal of a passport for an outspoken critic of the policies of the government at the time pertaining to the reorganization of military forces and the question of reunification of Germany.

The Court held that the freedom to leave the country to travel abroad is not part of the freedom of movement guarantee of Article 11 of the Basic Law, which it saw as limited to free movement within the territory of the Federal Republic. This raised the question of whether the freedom to travel abroad was unprotected under the Basic Law or whether it fell within the scope of Article 2.1 and its somewhat cryptic guarantee that "every person shall have the right to free development of his personality insofar as he does not violate the rights of others or offend against the constitutional order or the moral law." A literal interpretation of "free development of personality" could lead to a narrow understanding of personality as a basket-term for those essential elements, which define the human as a spiritual-moral being. This narrow understanding of the norm would essentially have protected the dignity core of a human being. However, and herein lies the significance of the decision, the Court did not follow this narrow interpretation. Instead it chose a broad interpretation based on the original formulation for this provision in the drafting stage of the Basic Law, according to which "every person is free to do or not to do what he wishes" (as long as the rights of others or the constitutional order are not infringed upon), a formulation that was not abandoned because of its meaning but only because it was perceived as too ordinary an expression for this document.

Article 2.1, in other words, became an all encompassing "fall-back" right to protect against any state action infringing on the personal sphere. As broad as its protective scope is, as broad are its possible limitations. The fall-back right of Article 2.1 can be limited by any state action for which proportionate statutory authority exists.

The broad construction of the provision provoked the question why the Court construed a right, the scope of which is largely defined by the legislature. The Court's answer to this question is another central aspect of this decision. The Court held that Article 2.1 in its broad meaning could only be restricted on the basis of a statute which conforms to any aspect of the Basic Law, including formal aspects such as legislative procedure and sufficient power base for the federal or state legislature and substantive aspects, i.e. mainly the principle of proportionality.

The consequences of this interpretation of Article 2.1 are immense: Not only did the Court create a broad fall-back right against any and all state activity impacting on a person. The Court's interpretation of the limitation clause made it possible for individuals to raise any and all legality issues against statutory provisions infringing on personal freedom in the constitutional complaint procedure. It strengthened the Court's power to exercise constitutional oversight over any and all state action if only one individual was willing to bring a constitutional complaint. And finally, the Court's decision underscored the pivotal importance of the principle of proportionality in the fundamental rights' protection system of the Basic Law, a principle which the Court interprets and applies and which gives the Court broad license for the exercise of its role as the final constitutional arbitrator.

Translation of the Elfes Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 6, 32*

1. Article 11 of the Basic Law does not cover the right to travel.
2. The right to travel, as deriving from the general freedom of action, is guaranteed, within the limits of the Constitutional order, by Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.
3. Constitutional order in terms of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law is the constitutional state law, i.e. every legal norm that conforms procedurally and substantively to the constitution.
4. Everyone can bring a Constitutional complaint to the Federal Constitutional court, claiming a norm restricting his or her general freedom of action not to be part of the Constitutional order.

Order of the Second Senate of 16 January 1957 - 1 BvR 253/56 -

Facts:

The complainant, an active member of the Christian Democratic Union (CDU), was elected to the North Rhine-Westphalia parliament in 1947. He was also a leading spokesman of a radical right wing organization vehemently opposed to the Federal Republic's policies toward military defence and German reunification. He had participated in a number of conferences and demonstrations at home and abroad in which he sharply criticized these policies and for which he was refused a passport to travel abroad. Claiming that the state had violated his freedom of movement under Article 11 of the basic Law, he filed a constitutional complaint against judicial decisions sustaining the denial of his passport.

The constitutional complaint is rejected

I.

1. The complainant contends that s. 7.1 of the Passport Act of March 4, 1952, is null and void because the right to travel abroad, allegedly based on Article 11 of the Basic Law, is impermissibly limited. That is not so. The Passport Act provision reads: "A passport must be refused if facts justify the supposition that (a) the applicant threatens the internal or external security or other vital interests of the Federal Republic of Germany or one of the German states. ..."

Article 11.1 of the Basic Law guarantees freedom of movement "throughout the federal territory." This text clearly does not protect a fundamental right to travel outside the federal territory. What is more, the original history of the provision does not provide any support for such an interpretation. …

The fundamental right to freedom of movement may be limited only by the express provisions of Article 11.2. Article 11.2 states: "This right may be restricted only by or pursuant to a law ... or in which such restriction is necessary to avert an imminent danger to the existence of the free democratic basic order of the federation or a state, to combat the danger of epidemics, to deal with natural disasters or particularly grave accidents, to protect young people from neglect, or to prevent crime." In providing for these limitations, the framers obviously had in mind freedom of movement within the country; Article 11.2 of the Basic Law makes no mention of traditional and relevant limitations on travel outside the country. Many countries (including free democracies) have long denied passports for reasons of state security. Similar restrictions, enforced in Germany since World War I, were carried over essentially unaltered into the Passport Act of 1952. If the framers had desired to incorporate a fundamental right to foreign travel into Article 11, they would not have forgotten to consider the long historical practice of withholding passports on the ground of state security. They clearly did not intend to guarantee freedom to travel abroad in Article 11.

Yet, freedom to travel abroad is not without some degree of constitutional protection as derivative of the basic right to general freedom of action.

2. In its ruling of July 20, 1954 (BVerfGE 4, 7 [15 seq.]), the Federal Constitutional Court did not decide whether the free development of one's personality includes freedom of action in the widest sense possible, or whether Article 2.1 of the Basic Law is limited to the protection of a minimum amount of this right to freedom of action without which an individual would be unable to develop himself as a spiritual-moral person.

a) The term "free development of personality" cannot simply mean development within that central area of personality that essentially defines a human person as a spiritual-moral being, i.e., the Kernbereichstheorie, for it is inconceivable how development within this core area could offend the moral code, the rights of others, or even the constitutional order of a free democracy. Rather, the limitations imposed on the individual as a member of the political community show that the freedom of action in Article 2.1 of the Basic Law is to be broadly construed.

To be sure, the solemn formulation of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law was an inducement to see it in the light of Article 1 and to infer therefrom that its purpose was to embody the Basic Law's image of man. Yet nothing else is suggested other than that Article 1 is a fundamental constitutional principle which, like all the provisions of the Basic Law, informs the meaning of Article 2.1. Legally speaking, it represents a separate, individual basic right that guarantees a person's general right to freedom of action. Linguistic rather than legal considerations prompted the framers to substitute the current language for the original proposal, which read, "Every person is free to do or not to do what he wishes" (see v. Mangoldt, Parlamentarischer Rat, 42. session, p. 533) Apparently, the fact that the constitutional order is also mentioned in the second half of the sentence among the permissible limitations on the citizen's development of personality contributed to the theory that Article 2.1 intended to protect only a limited core area of personality. In the effort to uniformly interpret this term, i.e., "constitutional order", which appears in other provisions of the Constitution, the constitutional order was viewed as a more restrictive concept than the concept of a legal order that conforms to the Constitution. Thus one felt compelled to conclude that the Constitution should protect only a core sphere of personality, and not one's right to freedom of action.

In addition to the general right to freedom of action secured by Article 2.1, the Basic Law employs specific fundamental tights to protect man's self-determination in certain areas of life that were historically subject to encroachment by public authority. These constitutional provisions contain graduated reservation clauses that limit the extent to which the legislature may encroach upon a given basic right. The individual may invoke Article 2.1 in the face of an encroachment upon his freedom by public authority to the extent that fundamental rights do not specifically protect such special areas of life. There was no need for a general reservation clause here because the extent to which encroachments are possible by the state is easily ascertained from the restriction the constitutional order imposes upon the development of personality.

In other contexts (e.g., Article 9 of the Basic Law), the concept of the constitutional order can be limited to certain elementary principles of the Constitution (see BGHSt 7, 222 [227]; 9, 285 [286]).

Within the context of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, "constitutional order" refers to the "general legal order, i.e. all norms conforming to the substantive and procedural provisions of the Constitution."

c) Legal scholars often held that the basic right of Article 2.1 will prove hollow if it is put under such a broad limitation because it could be restricted by any act of Parliament. They overlook the fact that legislative power is subject to more stringent constitutional restrictions than under the Weimar Constitution of 1919.... The legislature at that time could modify or alter constitutional rights at will.

The Basic Law, on the other hand, erected a value oriented order that limits public authority. This order guarantees the independence, self-determination, and dignity of man within the political community (BVerfGE 2, 1 [12 seq.]; 5, 85 [204 seq.]). The highest principles of this order of values are protected against constitutional change (Articles 1, 20, 79.3 of the Basic Law).

Laws are not constitutional merely because they have been passed in conformity with procedural provisions. This refers to the Weimar Constitution's adherence to the positivistic theory of constitutional law. See the section in Chapter I on structures and principles of the Basic Law for a discussion of Begriffsjurisprudenz. They must be substantively compatible with the highest values of a free and democratic order - i.e., the constitutional order of values - and must also conform to unwritten fundamental constitutional principles as well as the fundamental decisions of the Basic Law, in particular the principles of the rule of law and the social welfare state. Above all, laws must not violate a person's dignity which represents the highest value of the Basic Law; nor may they restrict a person's spiritual, political, or economic freedom in a way that would erode the essence of personhood. This follows from the constitutional protection afforded to each citizen's sphere of private development; that is, that ultimately inviolable area of human freedom insulated against any intrusion by public authority.

3. Even if the right to leave the country does not specifically belong to the concept of freedom of movement as protected by Article 11, it nevertheless is guaranteed by Article 2.1, within the limits of the constitutional order (i.e., the legal order that conforms to the Constitution) as a manifestation of the general right to freedom of action. Whether or not the passport law is part of the constitutional order as defined here remains to be decided. The answer is yes.

a) The Passport Act requires all Germans crossing a foreign border to have a passport-in itself a substantial formal limitation on foreign travel. Because the law, however, by unanimous interpretation confers a legal right to a passport, it preserves the principle of free foreign travel. It does so by permitting the denial of a passport only under specified conditions. Thus the act is cognizant of the fundamental requirements of Article 2.1.

b) S. 7 of the Passport Act clearly sets forth the grounds for denying a passport. The provision at issue here is unobjectionable to the extent that it permits denial of a passport on the basis of an internal or external threat to the security of the Federal Republic of Germany. Objections might be raised to the extent that the provision allows the apprehension of a threat to "other vital interests" to suffice for the denial of a passport. The application of such a substantively indeterminate standard could, of course, lead to an abuse of discretion on the part of passport authorities.

But that has not occurred here.

b) Riding in Forests, BVerfGE 80, 137

Explanatory Annotation

In this 1989 decision the Court confirmed its broad interpretation of the right to free development of one's personality as the right to do as one pleases, as long rights of others are not negatively affected. At issue were provisions restricting horseback riding in forests to trails and roads marked accordingly. Justice Grimm, in a forceful dissenting opinion, argued that Article 2.1 should not be afforded the broad meaning developed in the Elfes case. Unlike Elfes, where the important freedom to travel abroad was at issue and the question whether that freedom was to be constitutionally protected at all, the dissent saw no comparable legal position requiring constitutional oversight in this case. Fundamental rights should not be trivialized and they should not provide an avenue for opening up judicial review of legislation across the board when such norm review was generally procedurally limited and in principle not open for individuals. The majority, however, upheld its decision in Elfes and, for the time being, the question on the scope of Article 2.1 can be regarded as constitutionally settled.[20]

Headnotes:

1. When constitutional complaint proceedings indirectly relate to the establishment of whether a provision of Land law is compatible with (ordinary) federal law, the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG) must interpret the Land law itself and is in that respect not restricted to a constitutional review of the interpretation of the (ordinary) court.

2. A provision of Land law that in principle allows riding in forests only on private roads and paths that are identified as bridleways is compatible with s. 14 of the Federal Forest Act (Bundeswaldgesetz - BWaldG) of 2 May 1975 (Federal Law Gazette (Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.) I p. 1037) and is not in violation of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

Order of the First Senate of 6 June 1989 - 1 BvR 921/85:

Facts:

S. 14 of the Federal Forest Act allows everyone access to forests for recreational purposes. Under s. 14.1 sentence 2 of the Federal Forest Act, riding in forests is allowed only on roads and paths. The regulation of details is left to the Länder (s. 14.2 sentence 1 of the Federal Forest Act), which may under certain circumstances restrict access to or any other use of forests. S. 27 of the Federal Nature Conservation Act (Bundesnaturschutzgesetz - BnatSchG) contains a similar provision that pertains to roads and paths on farmland. With s. 50.2 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act (Landschaftsgesetz - LG) of 26 June 1980 (Bavarian Law Gazette [Bayerisches Gesetz und Verordnungsblatt - GVBl.]. p. 734), the Land of North RhineWestphalia adopted a provision that, inter alia, restricts riding in forests to private roads and paths identified as bridleways in accordance with the provisions of the Highway Code (Straßenverkehrsordnung - StVO). The complainant petitioned the administration courts without success to find, inter alia, that he could use the paths under dispute in a specific forested area as a rider without being bound by the Landscape Act.

The constitutional complaint challenging the court decisions and indirectly also s. 50.2 sentence 2 of the Landscape Act was dismissed.

Extract from the Grounds:

C. I.

The fundamental right of the complainant under Article 2.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) is not infringed by the challenged decisions and the underlying provision of s. 50.2 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act of 1980.

1. a) On the basis of the principles established in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, Article 2.1 of the Basic Law guarantees general freedom of action in a comprehensive sense (established case law since BVerfGE 6, 32 [36]; more recently, for example: BVerfGE 74, 129 [151]; 75, 108 [154, 155]).

   Accordingly, protection is afforded not only to a limited area of the development of a person's personality, but rather to every form of human activity without regard to the importance of the activity for the development of a person's personality (see, for example, the decision of a pre-review committee in BVerfGE 54, 143 [146] - Feeding Pigeons [Taubenfütten]).

   However, except for a core area of private conduct of life that enjoys absolute protection and is removed from the sphere of influence of public authority (BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]), general freedom of action is guaranteed only within the constraints of the second half of the sentence constituting Article 2.1 of the Basic Law and is therefore in particular subject to the constitutional (legal) order (BVerfGE 6, 32 [37, 38]; 74, 129 [152]).

When an act of a public authority that affects freedom of action is based on a provision of law, a constitutional complaint invoking Article 2.1 of the Basic Law may be filed to seek review for the purposes of establishing whether such provision inheres to the constitutional order, that is, whether it is in form and substance compatible with the articles of the Basic Law (established case law since BVerfGE 6, 32).

This involves not only a substantive assessment of the provision of law in respect of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, but also an examination of its compatibility with the Basic Law otherwise. As a result, it is also necessary in particular to establish whether the law is in compliance with provisions governing constitutional jurisdiction (BVerfGE 11, 105 [110]; 29, 402 [408]; 75, 108 [146, 149]).

In the case of Land legislation, it is also necessary to examine in addition to the jurisdictional issues involved in view of Article 31 of the Basic Law whether the substance of the Land law is in compliance with federal law (enacted in turn in compliance with jurisdictional requirements) and also with federal framework legislation (BVerfGE 51, 77 [89, 90, 95, 96]; see also BVerfGE 7, 111 [118, 119]).

In terms of substance, the principle of proportionality provides the standard for establishing the extent to which general freedom of action may be restricted (BVerfGE 17, 306 [314]; 55, 159 [165]; 75, 108 [154, 155]). In the event an existing right is subsequently set aside, the protection of legitimate expectations required by the principle of the rule of law must be preserved (BVerfGE 74, 129 [152]).

In addition, it is necessary to satisfy the requirements that derive (see also on this BVerfGE 6, 32 [42]; 20, 150 [157, 158]) from the constitutional necessity for the enactment of a specific statute (BVerfGE 49, 89 [126, 127]).

b) Reservations in respect of the above case law of the Federal Constitutional Court have been and are still being raised in the literature (see, for example, Hesse, Grundzüge des Verfassungsrechts der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, 16th ed., marginal nos. 426 et seq.; extensive references from the past in Scholz, AöR 100 [1975], pp. 80 et seq.). They are directed in particular against the unrestricted inclusion of all forms of human activity in the area protected by the fundamental rights, which as compared with other areas protected by fundamental rights results in protection "in excess of the system of values" (see Scholz, op. cit., pp. 8283, with further references), but on the other hand deprives the fundamental right of substance due to the broad possibility of restriction inherent in the expansion of the scope of protection (Hesse, op. cit., marginal no. 426).

The restriction of the scope of protection afforded by Article 2.1 of the Basic Law that is advocated could in the present case become important since it is doubtful that riding on private forest paths can be subsumed under development of personality as understood in the narrower sense.

There is, however, no justification for restriction of the scope of protection afforded by Article 2.1 of the Basic Law in deviation from previous case law. Not only the history of the development of the fundamental right would stand in the way of such restriction (see BVerfGE 6, 32 [3940]). In addition to the above rights of freedom, comprehensive protection of the freedom of human activity also fulfils a valuable function in terms of preserving freedom since the fundamental right guarantees protection of substantial weight despite the broad possibilities for restriction under the above standards. Any attempt at a normative restriction of the scope of protection would therefore result in a loss of freedom for citizens that may not be imposed, if for no other reason than because other fundamental rights have a scope of protection that is narrower and of distinct quality and because no compelling reasons for such a loss are otherwise apparent. Limitation, for example, to a guarantee for a narrower, personal sphere of life, even if not restricted to purely intellectual and moral development, or on the basis of similar criteria would, moreover, be accompanied by difficult problems of differentiation that would in practice defy satisfactory resolution.

2. As a form of human activity, riding does fall within the scope of protection of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, but does not belong to the core area of private conduct of life. It is therefore in principle not exempt from statutory restriction. The provision contained in s. 50.2 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act of 1980 that is indirectly challenged, restricts in a manner that is compatible with the Basic Law; the right to ride in forests.

The provision, which is a statute under Land law, does not conflict with the provisions of federal law contained in s. 14 of the Federal Forest Act and s. 27 of the Federal Nature Conservation Act.

a) In deciding this matter, the Federal Constitutional Court is not limited to a review of the interpretation of the provisions of federal law by the ordinary courts in the initial proceedings on the basis of the principles that have been established for the purposes of review by the constitutional court of the application of ordinary law in decisions of the courts (see BVerfGE 18, 85 [92, 93]).

The effect of these principles would be that the review of the validity of the provision under Land law, which must be included in the decision indirectly, could be carried out only to a limited extent. If in a subsequent case an ordinary court were to interpret the federal rule differently, which - as long as the Federal Constitutional Court has not itself rendered a decision as regards the interpretation - it cannot be prohibited from doing, the provision under Land law would then have to be measured again - possibly with different results - against this interpretation. This would defeat the purpose of a judicial review, even if only an indirect one. A decision as to whether a provision under Land law is valid or not must be conclusive; as a result, the standard of review - in this case the substance of the federal provision - must be established. The Federal Constitutional Court has accordingly itself consistently interpreted federal laws as provided for under Article 100.1 sentence 2 (2nd alternative) of the Basic Law in connection with the review of Land law to determine compliance with federal law (BVerfGE 25, 142 [149 et seq.]; 66, 270 [282 et seq.]; 66, 291 [307 et seq.]). No objective reason is evident that would warrant proceeding otherwise in the case of an interlocutory judicial review.

Accordingly, in the case of constitutional complaint proceedings the Federal Constitutional Court must therefore also interpret the federal provision in order to establish the standard of review when the compatibility of a provision under Land law with a federal provision is to be reviewed indirectly (see also BVerfGE 51, 77 [90 et seq., in particular p. 92]).

b) The wording of s. 14 of the Federal Forest Act could be understood to mean that access to forests is already allowed in principle by subsection 1 sentence 1 of this provision and that - according to subsection 2 - the Länder may restrict this principle by law only for good reason. The same would have to apply as regards riding, if riding were to be subsumed under access. However, even if riding were to be considered to fall under "other type of use" within the meaning of s. 14.2 sentence 2 of the Federal Forest Act, this would in principle not change anything in the end. "Equivalence" with other types of use within the meaning of s. 14.2 sentence 2 of the Federal Forest Act would then apply not only to allowance on principle, but also as regards the right of the Länder to make provision for exceptions. It could, to be sure, not logically be construed to mean that regulation of all types of use would have to be completely identical, if other types of use are even included in the first place. As far as their methodology is concerned, provisions governing use on foot and those governing other types of use would, however, have to correspond to one another.

However, such an interpretation of s. 14 of the Federal Forest Act - which is not compelled by the wording of the provision - can be excluded in view of the nature of the provision as framework legislation and its historical development.

aa) S. 14 of the Federal Forest Act contains no legal provisions that are directly binding upon the public; moreover, the provisions address exclusively the Länder, which must themselves enact the appropriate public laws.

This is not inconsistent with the fact that the term "framework provisions" contained in Article 75 of the Basic Law is not to be construed in this narrower technical sense since the federal legislature may also enact individual, directly applicable provisions in the exercise of the powers it is granted, therein in addition to guidelines for the legislatures of the Länder (see BVerfGE 4, 115 [130]).

The fact that the provision contained in s. 14.1 of the Federal Forest Act is itself also intended only as a guideline for the legislatures of the Länder is also again underscored by the wording of s. 14.2 sentence 1 of the Federal Forest Act, which stipulates that the Länder are to regulate the details. If the substantive content of s. 14.1 of the Federal Forest Act had been intended as directly applicable law, it would have to have been formulated to stipulate that the Länder may enact complementary provisions.

cc) The nature of a framework provision is such as to indicate in the case of doubt that it is intended to be filled out and that the legislative power of the Länder is not to be restricted any more than is compellingly required by the wording of the framework provision (see BVerfGE 25, 142 [152]; 67, 1 [12]). According to this rule of interpretation, s. 14.1 sentence 2 of the Federal Forest Act in conjunction with s. 2 sentence 1 of the provision is to be understood to mean that the legislatures of the Länder may allow riding in forests only on roads and paths, but may themselves provide the details within this framework. In the case of a provision that restricts riding within the prescribed framework, legislatures must be sure to respect the aspects enumerated for this purpose in s. 14.2 sentence 2 of the Federal Forest Act since the provision also constitutes a guideline for the legislatures in this regard. It is on the other hand not possible to infer the existence of a specific mandatory methodology in the framework, in particular in the sense of a system of rules and exceptions. It therefore also does not preclude a provision that serves to separate recreational riders and others seeking recreation and assigns riders to special bridleways to protect persons visiting the forest, as was provided for by s. 50.2 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act of 1980.

3. The provision contained in s. 50.2 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act of 1980 also meets the standards that derive directly from the Basic Law in respect of restriction of the general freedom of action under Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

a) The provision under challenge is compatible with the principle of proportionality.

It is intended to achieve consistent separation of "recreational traffic" in forests by assigning riders on the one hand and others seeking recreation (in particular those on foot and bicyclists) on the other hand to separate paths. As the Land government submitted, what the legislature primarily wanted to achieve with this provision was to avoid the dangers and other inconveniences that result for those seeking recreation on foot, from encounters with horses and the de-compaction of the floor of the forest associated with riding. This was intended to achieve a purpose that is not only in the public interest and legitimate under constitutional law, but can also be justified directly under Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. By attempting to achieve orderly coexistence of various forms of activity that fall under the category of general freedom of action through the separation of riders and others seeking recreation, the legislature undertook a responsibility that is grounded in the fundamental right itself and prescribed in Article 2.1 of the Basic Law by the reference to the rights of others.

It cannot be established that the legislature has succumbed to any obvious error of judgment in pursuing this objective. It was able to rely upon experience gained while the predecessor provision was in force. In this context, the Land government has plausibly set forth, that encounters with horses cause many persons seeking recreation to feel threatened and that persons on foot could be exposed to situations involving serious dangers due to riders, especially on narrower forest paths. Ultimately, the complainant himself concedes this by assuming the existence of conflicts of interest between riders and others seeking recreation in the vicinity of major metropolitan centres. His claim to the effect that most people seeking recreation enjoy seeing horses being ridden in the country cannot in any case apply to situations involving encounters at close quarters.

The provision is obviously suitable for achieving the desired purpose of protection. The fact that riders are assigned to separate paths precludes from the very start the use of the same forest paths by both persons on foot and riders and as a result the concomitant dangers and inconveniences for persons on foot as well.

The separation of riders and other "recreational traffic" in forests also satisfies the dictate of exigency. The Federal Constitutional Court may consequently limit itself to a review of the alternatives that are enumerated by the complainant and other alternatives discussed among experts for the purposes of establishing whether they could make it possible to achieve the desired goal in a manner that is not only simpler and equally effective, but also involves less tangible restriction of fundamental rights (BVerfGE 77, 84 [109]).

More moderate means of achieving in a comparably effective manner the twofold goal pursued (protection of persons on foot against the danger posed by animals and maintenance of paths in a condition suitable for hiking) are neither set forth by the complainant nor otherwise apparent.

Finally, the provision is in the narrower sense, proportionate. It is of special importance in this context that the two classes whose competing interests in the use of forests that the law is intended to reconcile, namely, persons on foot and riders, be able to rely equally upon Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. In separating recreational traffic, the legislature had to regulate the competing claims to the use of the existing network of paths in a manner that does justice to the interests of all parties involved. The fact that the legislature effected this separation by setting bridleways apart from the total number of available private forest paths and not, the other way around, by setting apart special paths for persons on foot cannot be objected to. In view of the smaller number of riders as compared with that of persons on foot and the greater effect on the ground of the latter, this cannot be considered a failure on the part of the legislature to achieve the equitable reconciliation of interests with which it is charged. This applies all the more so since the landscape authorities are explicitly charged under s. 50.7 of the Landscape Act of 1980 to make provision for an adequate and suitable network of bridleways.

b) The provision under challenge satisfies the requirements that arise from the constitutional necessity for the enactment of a specific statute.

Under the doctrine that binds the administration to the law, a provision that restricts freedom of action may not be so unspecific as to leave prohibition of an activity to the discretion of the administration with, for practical purposes, no possibility for review (see BVerfGE 6, 32 [42 et seq.]).

The Federal Constitutional Court elaborated on this doctrine in its judgment on the Collection Act (Sammlungsgesetz - SammlG) (BVerfGE 20, 150), stating that the legislature may, to be sure, regulate the exercise of allowed activities by adopting a negative statute that makes provision for authorization of otherwise prohibited activities (BVerfGE, op. cit., 154 et seq.).

It must, however, according to the Court, then specify conditions for the issuance of such authorization and upon compliance with such conditions extend a legal right to such approval to the holder of the fundamental right, for it must itself define the legal sphere within the scope of the exercise of the fundamental right that is exposed to governmental intervention and may not leave this to the discretion of administrative authorities (BVerfGE, op. cit., 155, [157, 158]).

In that regard, the doctrine that binds the administration to the law is affected from the point of view of the constitutional necessity for the enactment of a specific statute (see BVerfGE 49, 89 [126, 127]).

The provision under challenge does not, in any case within the meaning established by the Federal Constitutional Court, fall under the term "negative statute that makes provision for authorization," which the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht) also used in the initial proceedings concerning the provision contained in s. 50.2 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act of 1980. It would not, however, be possible to achieve the goal of separation of recreational traffic, which would be legitimate under constitutional law, through a negative statute that makes provision for authorization. Classification of the individual paths presupposes in each case the existence of a decision based on regulatory policy that is not already concretely predetermined by law and entails no obligation to grant a legal right to assignment of specific paths to riders. The decision as to which forest paths in particular are to be made available as bridleways in the context of regulation of all recreational traffic is pursuant to s. 50.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with s. 50.7 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act of 1980 ultimately an act of governmental (road) planning. The legislature of the Land has therefore adopted an approach to the regulation of riding in forests that has already become common practice in the case of legislation governing other specific activities involving freedom of movement - such as, for example, vehicular traffic. Such acts of planning cannot be predetermined by law by means of catalogue of conditions. However, the duty to balance competing interests in the area of planning does provide an objective standard that permits the achievement of an equitable reconciliation of the interests of the general public and the private concerns of the respective property owners as a function of concrete circumstances. As a result, that which applies to the planning of other travelling ways such as public roads applies equally in respect of the duty of the landscape authorities to plan and implement a network of bridleways as explicitly prescribed by s. 50.1 sentence 1 of the Landscape Act of 1980 (see on this BVerfGE 79, 174 [198, 199]).

In deciding which private forest ways are to be identified as bridleways and consequently, in compliance with the idea behind the law, closed to persons on foot, the responsible authorities involved must deal with a multitude of legitimate interests.

At the very least, not only the interest of riders in as large a network of bridleways as possible and the countervailing interest of persons on foot, but also the interest of property owners in the maintenance and undisturbed use of their own ways will regularly be affected and presently require reconciliation. The objective importance of each of these individual interests may vary from case to case.

The resolution of such conflicts lies beyond the reach of detailed regulation by law. This can also not be required from the point of view of the constitutional necessity for the enactment of a specific statute. For this doctrine may not be allowed to oblige the legislature to renounce a provision that it considers (and may so consider) appropriate for the purposes of achieving a goal that is legitimate under the Basic Law (see also BVerfGE 58, 300 [346]).

c) The provision under challenge is also not the subject of any reservations of a constitutional nature as regards the protection of legitimate expectations. The legislature also has in principle the power to further narrow existing limitations of general freedom of action within the bounds of proportionality. The predecessor provision of the Landscape Act, which in principle allowed riding on forest roads and ways, was in force for only five years. It was preceded by a regulation that in principle prohibited riding in forests (s. 4.e of the Land Forest Act of 1969). Before that time, no right to ride in forests had been granted by statute, nor is there evidence of any customary right to ride in forests that either the federal or Land legislature could have revoked under their respective authority (see also Bavarian Constitutional Court [Bayerischer Verfassungsgerichtshof - BayVfGH] 28, 107 [120] with further references).

In view of the inconveniences that result from mixed recreational traffic that includes riders, it was necessary to anticipate that the legislature might be moved by the experience gained under the law of 1975 to modify the provision again at the expense of riders. If for no other reason, riders could not rely on the continued existence of this provision because of the brief period during which riders were legally allowed to use all forest ways. Furthermore, the reasons that lend the provision under challenge legitimacy under constitutional law would also suffice to override any protection of legitimate expectations that might have been required.

c) Census Act, BVerfGE 65, 1

Explanatory Annotation

The intention to conduct a census in 1983 in order to collect framework data for planning purposes concerning personal, work and business related information and about living conditions was at issue in this decision. In absence of a specific right protecting against the collection and use of such data the Court resorted to the fall-back right of Article 2.1 as construed in the Elfes-decision.

Using the broad construction of the right of free development of one's personality whereby any state action affecting individuals in a negative way by reducing the sphere of individual freedom must be measured against Article 2.1 the Court went on to develop the right to informational self-determination. Under this new right, which the Court also explicitly linked to the human dignity clause in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, personal data is linked to the individual from whom it is taken and the release and use of such data must in principle be consented to by that individual. The Court argued that data collection and usage in the age of computer technology has a very different and potentially threatening dimension because such data collections could be used to comprehensively map individual behaviour without any influence of individuals to even know what data is collected about them and how it is, will or might be used in the future.

Infringements of this right are, of course, possible and as the Court had developed in the Elfes-decision, there is actually a broad scope for such infringements, however, only on the basis of statutory authority that is in compliance with the Basic Law in all respects, conforms to the principle of proportionality and contains organizational and procedural safeguards against the misuse of the data. The census statute of 1983, albeit unanimously passed by Parliament, did not fulfil these requirements.

This new right has played a crucial role in many other decisions of the Court, for example with regard to the "genetic fingerprint", i.e. the analysis and storage of DNA for identification purposes in criminal proceedings[21], or GPS surveillance in the context of organized crime and terrorism.[22]

Headnotes:

1. Given the context of modern data processing, the protection of individuals against unlimited collection, storage, use and transfer of their personal data is subsumed under the general right of personality governed by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG). In that regard, this fundamental right guarantees in principle the power of individuals to make their own decisions as regards the disclosure and use of their personal data.

2. Restrictions of this right to "informational self-determination" are permissible only in the case of an overriding general public interest. Such restrictions must have a constitutional basis that satisfies the requirement of legal certainty in keeping with the rule of law. The legislature must ensure that its statutory regulations respect the principle of proportionality. The legislature must also make provision for organizational and procedural precautions that preclude the threat of violation of the right of personality.

3. As regards the constitutional requirements to be satisfied by such restrictions, it is necessary to distinguish between personal data that are collected and processed in personalized, non-anonymous form and data intended for statistical purposes.

   In the case of data collected for statistical purposes, it is not possible to require the existence of a narrowly defined, concrete purpose for the collection of such data. However, the collection and processing of information must be accompanied by appropriate restrictions within the information system to compensate for the absence of such a concrete purpose.

4. The survey program of the 1983 Census Act (Volkszählungsgesetz - VZG) (s. 2 nos. 1 to 7 and ss. 3 to 5) does not entail registration and classification of personal data that would be incompatible with human dignity; it therefore also satisfies the requirements of legal certainty and proportionality. Nonetheless, procedural precautions are required in connection with the execution and organization of the collection of such data in order to preserve the right to informational self-determination.

5. The provisions governing the transfer of data (including for the purposes of crosschecks with population registers) contained in s. 9.1 to 3 of the 1983 Census Act violate the general right of personality. The transfer of data for scientific purposes (s. 9.4 of the 1983 Census Act) is compatible with the Basic Law.

Judgment of the First Senate of 15 December 1983, on the basis of the oral hearing of 18 and 19 October 1983 - 1 BvL 209, 269, 362, 420, 440 and 484/83:

Facts:

The 1983 Census Act of 25 March 1982 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 369) made provision for a general census of the population, employment, housing and places of employment for statistical purposes in the spring of 1983. The declared purpose of the Act was to obtain information on the most recent state of the population, its geographic distribution and its composition in terms of demographic and social characteristics as well as on the economic activity of the population through the surveys to be carried out, which information provides the indispensable basis for decisions made by the Federation, the Länder and municipalities in the areas of social and economic policy. The previous census had been taken in the year 1970. The 1983 Census Act defined in detail the data to be collected and the respondents, and s. 9 made provision, among other things, for the possibility of crosschecking the data collected with municipalities and federal and Land authorities for specific purposes having to do with administrative enforcement.

In response to numerous constitutional complaints lodged directly against the 1983 Census Act, the Federal Constitutional Court found the Act to be essentially in compliance with the Basic Law; the Court declared in particular those provisions void that govern crosschecks with population registers and the power to transfer data for the purposes of administrative enforcement.

Extract from the Grounds:

B. II.

To the extent that the complainants were themselves personally affected by the 1983 Census Act, theirs is an immediate and current concern.

However, according to the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, an immediate concern is lacking if the implementation of the provision under challenge requires a separate act of enforcement on the part of the administration. The reason for this is that such an act of enforcement will as a rule encroach on the legal sphere of the citizen first; legal recourse that may be taken against such encroachment also permits review of the constitutionality of the law applied (BVerfGE 58, 81 [104]; see BVerfGE 59, 1 [17]; 60, 360 [369 and 370].

Implementation of the 1983 Census Act necessarily involved requests to furnish information; only through such requests could the legal sphere of the complainants be affected (See s. 5.2 of the 1983 Census Act). The way to legal recourse against this enforcement measure before the administrative courts would have been opened. This does not, however, constitute an obstacle to the admissibility of the constitutional complaints.

The Federal Constitutional Court has, in cases involving special circumstances affirmed by way of exception, the admissibility of constitutional complaints lodged directly against a law before an act of enforcement was ordered when that law would force the parties affected to make decisions that cannot be rectified later or would cause them to take measures that they can then no longer reverse after enforcement of the law (see BVerfGE 60, 360 [372]). The constitutional complaints lodged directly against the 1983 Census Act are also admissible by way of exception before the act of enforcement is ordered.

Enforcement of this Act was intended to affect the entire population within a very short period of time. The questionnaires were to be distributed starting on 18 April 1983 and then collected by early May 1983. A period of only about two weeks would therefore have been available to obtain injunctive relief before the administrative courts. The courts would not have been able to address the issue in this limited period of time in such a manner as to make it possible for the Federal Constitutional Court to expect substantive preliminary review from them. Nevertheless, a constitutional complaint against negative decisions in proceedings pursuant to s. 80.5, s. 123 and s. 146.1 of the Code of Administrative Court Procedure (Verwaltungsgerichtsordnung - VwGO) would have been admissible (see BVerfGE 51, 130 [138 et seq.]; 53, 30 [49, 52]; 54, 173 [190]). In any case, after the request to furnish information was contested through recourse to the administrative courts, a decision from the Federal Constitutional Court would have been conceivable prior to exhaustion of such legal remedies pursuant to s. 90.2 sentence 2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) (See BVerfGE 59, 1 [19 and 20]). The Federal Constitutional Court would then, however, have had to deal with numerous, possibly contradictory, decisions of the administrative courts. The fact that some courts had granted the parties affected injunctive relief, but others not, could also have resulted in the possibility of legal uncertainty. Under these circumstances, the subsidiarity principle, according to which the public is in principle initially referred to the specialized courts, would have achieved the exact opposite of what is intended: it would no longer have served to relieve the Federal Constitutional Court and leave to it the review of cases of the specialized courts, but would have put it under especially great time pressure to make decisions on this subject matter. Given this situation, the complainants had the right, by way of exception, to challenge the law directly with their constitutional complaint.

C.

The constitutional complaints are - to the extent admissible - in part founded.

II.

The primary standard of review is the general right of personality, which is protected by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

1. a) The worth and dignity of individuals, who through free self-determination function as members of a free society, lie at the core of the constitutional order. In addition to specific guarantees of freedom, the general right of personality guaranteed in Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, which can also become important precisely in view of modern developments and the concomitant new threats to the personality, serves to protect that worth and dignity (see BVerfGE 54, 148 [153]). Previous concrete treatment in the case law does not conclusively describe the content of the right of personality. This right also subsumes - as has already been suggested in the BVerfGE 54, 148 [155] decision in extension of previous decisions (see BVerfGE 27, 1 [6]; 27, 344 [350 and 351]; 32, 373 [379]; 35, 202 [229]; 44, 353 [372 and 373]). - the right of individuals that follows from this idea of self-determination to decide in principle themselves when and within what limits personal matters are disclosed (see also BVerfGE 56, 37 [41 et seq.]; 63, 131 [142 and 143]).

   Given the current and future state of automated data processing, this right merits a special measure of protection. It is especially threatened since it is no longer necessary to consult manually assembled files and dossiers for the purposes of decision making processes, as was the case previously; to the contrary, it is today technically possible, with the help of automated data processing, to store indefinitely and retrieve at any time, in a matter of seconds and without regard to distance, specific information on the personal or material circumstances of individuals whose identity is known or can be ascertained (personal data (see s. 2.1 of the Federal Data Protection Act (Bundesdatenschutzgesetz - BDSG)). This information can also be combined - especially if integrated information systems are set up - with other collections of data to assemble a partial or essentially complete personality profile without giving the party affected an adequate opportunity to control the accuracy or the use of that profile. As a result, the possibilities for consultation and manipulation have expanded to a previously unknown extent, which can affect the conduct of the individual because of the mere psychological pressure of public access.

However, personal self-determination also presupposes - even in the context of modern information processing technologies - that individuals are to be afforded the freedom to decide whether to engage in or desist from certain activities, including the possibility of actually conducting themselves in accordance with their decisions. The freedom of individuals to make plans or decisions in reliance on their personal powers of self-determination may be significantly inhibited if they cannot with sufficient certainty determine what information on them is known in certain areas of their social sphere and in some measure appraise the extent of knowledge in the possession of possible interlocutors. A social order in which individuals can no longer ascertain who knows what about them and when and a legal order that makes this possible would not be compatible with the right to informational self-determination. A person who is uncertain as to whether unusual behaviour is being taken note of at all times and the information permanently stored, used or transferred to others will attempt to avoid standing out through such behaviour. Persons who assume, for example, that attendance of an assembly or participation in a citizens' interest group will be officially recorded and that this could expose them to risks will possibly waive exercise of their corresponding fundamental rights (Articles 8 and 9 of the Basic Law). This would not only restrict the possibilities for personal development of those individuals but also be detrimental to the public good since self-determination is an elementary prerequisite for the functioning of a free democratic society predicated on the freedom of action and participation of its members.

From this follows that free development of personality presupposes, in the context of modern data processing, protection of individuals against the unrestricted collection, storage, use and transfer of their personal data. This protection is therefore subsumed under the fundamental right contained in Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. In that regard, the fundamental right guarantees in principle the power of individuals to make their own decisions as regards the disclosure and use of their personal data.

b) The guarantee of this right to "informational self-determination" is not entirely unrestricted. Individuals have no right in the sense of absolute, unrestricted control over their data; they are after all human persons who develop within the social community and are dependent upon communication. Information, even if related to individual persons, represents a reflection of societal reality that cannot be exclusively assigned solely to the parties affected. The Basic Law, as has been emphasized several times in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, embodies in negotiating the tension between the individual and the community a decision in favour of civic participation and civic responsibility (see BVerfGE 4, 7 [15]; 8, 274 [329]; 27, 1 [7]; 27, 344 [351 and 352]; 33, 303 [334]; 50, 290 [353]; 56, 37 [49]).

Individuals must therefore in principle accept restrictions on their right to informational self-determination in the overriding general public interest.

According to Article 2.1 of the Basic Law - as is also correctly recognized in s. 6.1 of the Federal Statistics Act (Bundesstatistikgesetz - BStatG) - these restrictions require a (constitutionally) legal basis from which the prerequisites for and the scope of the restrictions clearly follow and can be recognized by the public and which therefore satisfies the requirement of legal certainty in keeping with the rule of law (BVerfGE 45, 400 [420] with further references). The legislature must in its statutory regulations respect the principle of proportionality. This principle, which enjoys constitutional status, follows from the nature of the fundamental rights themselves, which, as an expression of the general right of the public to freedom from interference by the state, may be restricted by the public powers in any given case only insofar as indispensable for the protection of public interests (BVerfGE 19, 342 [348]; established case law). In view of the threats described above that arise from the use of automated data processing, the legislature must more than was the case previously, adopt organizational and procedural precautions that work counter to the threat of violation of the right of personality (see BVerfGE 53, 30 [65]; 63, 131 [143]).

2. The constitutional complaints provide no occasion for an exhaustive discussion of the right to informational self-determination. The only issue to be decided relates to the reach of this right in the case of governmental actions that require that individuals furnish personal data. It is not possible in such cases to limit consideration exclusively to the nature of the information. The usefulness and possible uses of the information are what are of decisive importance. This depends on the one hand upon the purpose served by the survey and on the other hand upon the possibilities for processing and collating information inherent in information technology. This is what makes it possible for data that are in and of themselves of no significance to take on new importance; in that respect, "unimportant" data no longer exist in the context of automated data processing.

Accordingly, the extent to which information is sensitive cannot depend exclusively upon whether it concerns intimate matters. Indeed, knowledge of the context in which data are used is necessary to establish the importance of data for the purposes of legislation governing the right to personality. Only after it has been clearly established, what the purpose is for requiring that data be furnished and what possibilities exist for collation and use of such data, is it possible to address the question as to the admissibility of restriction of the right to informational self-determination. In this context, it is necessary to distinguish between personal data that are collected and processed in personalized, non-anonymized form (see under (a)) and data intended for statistical purposes (see under (b)).

a) It has been acknowledged up to now that compulsory collection of personal data without restriction is not permissible, in particular if such data are to be used for the purposes of administrative enforcement (for example, in connection with taxation or allocation of social benefits). In that respect, the legislature has made provision for various measures to protect the parties affected that go in the direction required by the Basic Law (see, for example, provisions of the data protection laws of the Federation and the Länder; ss. 30, 31 of the Fiscal Code (Abgabenordnung - AO); s. 35 of the First Book of the Social Code (Sozialgesetzbuch I - SGB I) in conjunction with ss. 67 to 86 of the Social Code X). The extent to which the right to informational self-determination and in that connection the principle of proportionality and the duty to take procedural precautions compel the legislature to make such provision on constitutional grounds depends on the nature, scope and conceivable uses of the collected data and the danger of abuse (see BVerfGE 49, 89 [142]; 53, 30 [61]).

An overriding general public interest will regularly exist exclusively in data of concern to society, to the exclusion of unreasonable, intimate information and self-incrimination. On the basis of the state of knowledge and experience from the past, the following measures in particular would seem important:

Compulsory disclosure of personal data presupposes that the legislature has specifically and precisely defined the intended area of use and that the information is suitable and required for that purpose. The collection of non-anonymized data to be stored for purposes that are not or have not yet been specified would not be compatible with this. All governmental entities that collect personal data to fulfil their duties will have to restrict themselves to the minimum required to achieve the specified purpose.

The use of the data is limited to the purpose specified by law. If for no other reason than because of the dangers associated with automated data processing, protection is required against unauthorized use - including protection against such use by other governmental entities - through a prohibition on the transfer and use of such data. Mandatory information, disclosure and deletion constitute further procedural precautions.

Due to the lack of transparency of the storage and use of data for the public in the context of automated data processing as well as in the interest of anticipatory legal protection in the form of timely precautions, the involvement of independent data protection officers is of significant importance for effective protection of the right to informational self-determination.

b) The collection and processing of data for statistical purposes involve unique aspects that may not be ignored in the context of constitutional scrutiny.

aa) Statistics are of significant importance for governmental policy that is subject to the principles and guidelines of the Basic Law. If economic and social progress is not to be taken as the result of inevitable fate but as a permanent goal, comprehensive, continuous and constantly updated information on economic, ecological and social developments is necessary. It is possible to create the basis for action that is indispensable for governmental policy that is aligned with the principle of the social state only with a knowledge of the relevant data and the possibility of using such information for statistical purposes with the help of the opportunities presented by automated data processing (see BVerfGE 27, 1 [9]).

In the case of surveys for statistical purposes, it is not possible to require that the purpose for which the data are collected be narrowly and concretely defined. It lies in the nature of statistics that data are intended to be used for a wide variety of different purposes after collection and that these purposes cannot be defined from the outset; accordingly, there is a need to store such data.

bb) If the variety of possibilities for the use and collation of data cannot therefore be determined in advance in the case of statistics because of the very nature of the situation, the collection and processing of information within the information system must be accompanied by appropriate restrictions to compensate for this. Clearly defined conditions must be created for processing to ensure that individuals do not become mere data subjects in the context of the automated collection and processing of the information pertaining to their person. Both the absence of a connection with a specific purpose that can be recognized and verified at all times and the multifunctional use of data, reinforce the tendencies that are to be checked and restricted by data-protection legislation, which represents the concrete manifestation of the constitutionally guaranteed right to informational self-determination. Precisely because there is from the outset an absence of purposive limits that restrict the data set, population censuses are likely to entail the danger of invasive registration and classification of individuals that has already been emphasized in the micro census decision (Mikrozensus-Beschluß) (see BVerfGE 27, 1 [6]). For that reason, the collection and processing of data for statistical purposes must be subjected to special requirements intended to protect the right of personality of respondents.

Notwithstanding the multinational nature of the collection and processing of data for statistical purposes, it is a prerequisite that this be done exclusively to support the fulfilment of public duties. Here too, not just any information may be required. Even in the case of the collection of individual data that are required for statistical purposes, the legislature must, when it imposes a duty to furnish information, determine in particular whether the collection of such information could entail the danger of social categorization (for example, in respect of substance addiction, criminal record, mental illness or social marginality) of the party affected and whether the purpose of the survey could not also be achieved by means of an anonymized investigation. This is, for example, likely to be the case of those aspects of the collection of data governed by s. 2 no. 8 of the 1983 Census Act, according to which the population and employment census in the institutional area includes information on the status of respondents as inmates or employees or relatives of employees. The collection of such data is intended to provide information on the population of institutions (Bundestag document (Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks.), 9/451, p. 9). Such a goal can - apart from the danger of social stigmatization - also be achieved without reference to specific individuals. It would suffice to have the head of the institution provide figures on the population as of the date of the census, broken down according to the criteria listed in s. 2 no. 8 of the 1983 Census Act without any reference to individual persons. Collection of the personal data mentioned under s. 2 no. 8 of the 1983 Census Act would for that reason constitute from the outset a violation of the right of personality protected by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

Special precautions are required as regards the execution and organization of the collection and processing of data in order to preserve the right to informational self-determination since information can be more easily assigned to individuals during the collection phase - and to some extent also during storage; at the same time, rules are required for deletion of information that is required for secondary purposes (identifying characteristics) and would facilitate de-anonymization such as names, addresses, identification numbers and lists of census takers (see also s. 11.7 sentence 1 of the Federal Statistics Act).

Regulations that ensure effective protection against access from outside are of especial importance in the case of surveys carried out for statistical purposes. Strict confidentiality of the individual data collected for statistical purposes is indispensable for the purposes of protection of the right to informational self-determination - and to be sure also during the collection process - as long as a link to a person exists or can be created (confidentiality of statistics); the same applies as regards the necessity of (effective) anonymization at the earliest possible time together with precautions to prevent de-anonymization.

Governmental entities are allowed access to information required for planning purposes only in the case of hermetic isolation of statistics through anonymization of data and confidential treatment of data as long as they still relate to a person; same is required by the right to informational self-determination and must be guaranteed by law. Only under this condition can and may the public be expected to provide the mandatory information. If the transfer of personal data that are collected for statistical purposes were to be allowed against the will or without the knowledge of the parties affected, this would not only impermissibly restrict the constitutionally guaranteed right to informational self-determination but also jeopardize official statistics, which are provided for under the Basic Law itself in Article 73 no. 11 and therefore merit protection. The highest possible degree of accuracy and truthfulness in the data collected is necessary to ensure the functional viability of official statistics. This can be achieved only if respondents have the necessary confidence in the protection of data collected for statistical purposes against access from outside, without which it is not possible to create a willingness on the part of the public to provide truthful information (as already correctly justified in the Federal Government's draft of the 1950 Census Act; see Bundestag document I/982, p. 20 on s. 10).

Governmental practice that does not involve an effort to foster such confidence through disclosure of the data processing procedure and strict protection against access to information from outside would in the longer term lead to diminishing willingness to cooperate since a lack of trust would otherwise result. Since governmental compulsion can be of only limited effectiveness, governmental action that ignores the interests of the public will at best prove effective over the short term; in the long run, it will result in a decrease in the scope and accuracy of the information (Bundestag document I/982, loc. cit.). Since the constant increase in the complexity of the environment that is typical of highly industrialized societies can be deciphered and rendered amenable to targeted governmental measures only with the help of reliable statistics, any threat to official statistics will in the end jeopardize an important prerequisite for governmental policy in the social area. If responsibility for "planning" can therefore be guaranteed only through hermetic isolation of statistics against access from outside, the principle of confidentiality and anonymization of data at the earliest possible time is not only required by the Basic Law for the protection of the right to informational self-determination of the individual but is also of constitutive importance for the statistics themselves.

cc) If the requirements discussed above are taken into account in an effective manner, there can be no misgivings on the basis of current knowledge and experience as regards the collection of data exclusively for statistical purposes on constitutional grounds. It is not possible to ascertain that the right of personality of individuals could be compromised if the collected data are made available to other governmental bodies or other agencies after anonymization or processing for statistical purposes (see s. 11.5 and s. 11.6 of the Census Act).

Any transfer (disclosure) of data that have been neither anonymized nor processed for statistical use and are therefore still personalized data raises special problems. Surveys conducted for statistical purposes also include personalized information on individual citizens that are not required for statistical purposes and - which the surveyed public must be able to assume - serve only to facilitate the survey process. All of this information may, to be sure be made available to other parties by virtue of explicit legal authority to the extent and insofar as this occurs for the purposes of statistical processing by other public authorities and the right of personality has been reliably protected by taking the required precautions, in particular as regards the confidentiality of statistics and the requirement of early anonymization, as well as through organizational and procedural means as in the case of the Statistical Offices of the Federation and the Länder. The act of making data collected for statistical purposes that have not been anonymized or statistically processed, available for the purposes of administrative enforcement may on the other hand improperly infringe the right to informational self-determination (see also C IV 1 below).

III.

The survey program of the 1983 Census Act essentially satisfies the constitutional requirements presented above. In that regard, the subject matter under review covers, with the exception of the question as to qualification as an inmate of an institution or member of the personnel of an institution (s. 2 no. 8 in conjunction with s. 5.1 no. 1 second half of the sentence), ss. 2 to 4 in conjunction with s. 5.1 of the Census Act. These provisions are compatible with the general right of personality under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law on condition that the legislature complement the legislation to compensate for heretofore lacking organizational and procedural rules to preserve the fundamental right, thereby ensuring compliance with the constitutional requirements to be satisfied by a total survey of the nature of the 1983 census.

c) The survey program of the 1983 Census Act also satisfies, to the extent relevant to the matter under review, the principle of proportionality. A measure to achieve the intended purpose must therefore be suitable and necessary; the intensity of the attendant action may not be disproportionate to the importance of the matter and the compromises imposed upon the public (see BVerfGE 27, 344 [352 and 353]; established case law).

The 1983 Census Act is intended to provide the state with information required for future planning and actions. As a prerequisite for making it possible to plan governmental activities (see BVerfGE 27, 1 [7]), the 1983 census serves a purpose that is obviously intended to fulfil legitimate duties of the state.

Through the use of a census in the form of a total census (exhaustive census) and the catalogue of questions of s. 2 no 1 to 7 and ss. 3 and 4 of the 1983 Census Act, the Federal Republic of Germany has fulfilled its obligation arising from the Directive of the Council of the European Communities of 22 November 1973 on the synchronization of general population censuses - 73/403/EWG (OJ no. L 347 of 17 December 1973, p. 50). The survey method and program are suitable and necessary for achieving the intended purpose and represent a reasonable imposition on respondents.

IV.

1. Data collected for statistical purposes that have not yet been anonymized and are therefore still personalized may - as has already been set forth (C II b cc above) - be made available to other parties by virtue of explicit legal authority to the extent and insofar as this occurs for the purposes of statistical processing by other public authorities and if the right of personality has been reliably protected by taking the required precautions, in particular as regards the confidentiality of statistics and the requirement of anonymization as in the case of the Statistical Offices of the Federation and the Länder. If on the other hand personalized, non-anonymized data collected for statistical purposes and intended for such purposes by the statutory regulation are transferred to other parties for the purposes of administrative enforcement (improper use) in compliance with the law, this would constitute improper infringement of the right to informational self-determination. The question may remain open as to whether there would be any objection to direct transmission of such data in general and even if the legislature were to explicitly make provision for such transmission on the grounds of incompatibility with the principle of separation of statistics and enforcement. There is also no need for a conclusive discussion as to whether simultaneous collection of personal data for statistical purposes, which is in and of itself allowed, and collection of personal data for the purposes of administrative enforcement, which is in and of itself allowed, would be permissible if different forms were used (combined survey). Both the direct transfer of data collected for statistical purposes as well as the use of combined surveys would constitute a source of misgivings since the combination of two different purposes with different requirements would cause considerable uncertainty on the part of the public in view of the lack of transparency of the possibilities permitted by automated data processing, thereby threatening the reliability of the information and its suitability for statistical purposes. It is also necessary to take into account the different requirements that have to be satisfied: For example, the confidential nature of statistics, the requirement of anonymization and the prohibition of discrimination, apply to the collection and exploitation of data for statistical purposes; this does not apply, or not in the same manner, as regards the collection of data for the purposes of administrative enforcement; whereas identification data (for example, name and address) serve only to facilitate processing in the case of statistics, they do as a rule constitute essential elements of data collected for the purposes of administrative enforcement. In this case, the investigative organization that is designed for the collection of data for statistical purposes is also used to collect data for other purposes that would hardly justify such an organization on their own. It would also be necessary to take into account that judicial process can differ depending on which of the two types of data collection is used.

A regulatory measure intended to achieve both goals nonetheless is in any case unsuitable for achieving the intended purposes and therefore in violation of the Basic Law if it combines aspects that are basically incompatible. In such a case, the combination of statistical purposes with purposes of administrative enforcement in a census may result not only in a lack of clarity and obscurity in the statute, but also makes the statute disproportionate. Unlike the situation in the case of the collection of data for exclusively statistical purposes, it is essential that the data be transmitted for a narrowly defined, concrete purpose in this case (C II 2 (a) above). In addition, the requirement of legal certainty is of especial importance. The public must be able to clearly recognize from the statutory regulation that data are not being used exclusively for statistical purposes, the concrete purposes of administrative enforcement for which the personal data are intended and required and that the use of the data will remain limited to such purposes and the respondent shielded against self-incrimination.

2. The combination of the census conducted for statistical purposes and cross-checks with the population register pursuant to s. 9.1 of the 1983 Census Act does not satisfy the constitutional requirements.

d) Data Collection - BVerfGE 120, 274

Explanatory Annotation

In 2008 the Court extended the right to informational self-determination contained in Article 2.1 to include the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems.[23] At issue was the question whether and under what conditions "constitution protection agencies", in essence domestic secret police with narrow jurisdiction, have the power to secretly hack into computer systems of suspects in order to search and retrieve relevant information. The Court erected several procedural and substantial safeguards. One of the problems in this context lies in the fact that such measures are by definition secretive and the person affected by such measures, if they are to make sense, will not know about them and will therefore be unable to obtain judicial protection. Any such measures can only be undertaken if authorized by a judge in order to secure judicial oversight before the measures are invoked. In addition, the necessary statutory authority for such measures must contain provisions for the immediate deletion of and the prohibition to use in any way irrelevant personal and private data.

Translation of the Data Collection Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 120, 274

Headnotes:

1. The general right of personality (Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG)) encompasses the fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems.

2. The secret infiltration of an information technology system by means of which the use of the system can be monitored and its storage media can be read, is constitutionally only permissible if factual indications exist of a concrete danger to a predominantly important legal interest. Predominantly important are the life, limb and freedom of the individual or such interests of the public a threat to which affects the basis or continued existence of the state or the basis of human existence. The measure can already be justified even if it cannot yet be ascertained with sufficient probability that the danger will arise in the near future insofar as certain facts indicate a danger posed to the predominantly important legal interest by specific individuals in the individual case.

3. The secret infiltration of an information technology system is in principle to be placed under the reservation of a judicial order. The statute granting powers to perform such an encroachment must contain precautions in order to protect the core area of private life.

4. Insofar as empowerment is restricted to a state measure by means of which the contents and circumstances of ongoing telecommunication are collected in the computer network, or the data related thereto is evaluated, the encroachment is to be measured against Article 10.1 of the Basic Law alone.

5. If the state obtains knowledge of the contents of Internet communication by the channel technically provided therefore, this shall only constitute an encroachment on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law, if the state agency is not authorised to obtain such knowledge by those involved in the communication.

6. If the state obtains knowledge of communication contents which are publicly accessible on the Internet, or if it participates in publicly accessible communication processes, in principle it does not encroach on fundamental rights.

Judgment of the First Senate of 27 February 2008 on the basis of the oral hearing of 10 October 2007 - 1 BvR 370, 595/07:

Facts:

The subject matter of the constitutional complaints are the provisions of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act regulating, firstly, the powers of the constitution protection authority regarding various instances of data collection, in particular from information technology systems, and secondly, the handling of the data collected.

The impugned provisions were largely inserted or amended by the Act Amending the Act on the Protection of the Constitution in North Rhine-Westphalia of 20 December 2006 (Law and Ordinance Gazette of North Rhine-Westphalia, p. 620).

Both constitutional complaints complain of the unconstitutionality of s. 5.2 no. 11 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act. This provision empowers the Constitution protection authority to carry out two types of investigative measures: Firstly, secret monitoring and other reconnaissance of the Internet (alternative 1), and secondly secret access to information technology systems (alternative 2).

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

Insofar as they are admissible, the constitutional complaints are largely well-founded. s. 5.2 no. 11 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act is unconstitutional and null and void in the second alternative listed there (I.). The same applies to the first alternative of this provision (II.). As a result of the nullity, the complaints addressed against s. 5.3 and s. 17 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act are disposed of (III.). By contrast, there are no constitutional objections (IV.) against s. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act.

I.

S. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, which regulates secret access to information technology systems, violates the general right of personality (Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law) in its particular manifestation as a fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems.

This manifestation of the general right of personality protects against encroachment on information technology systems, insofar as the protection is not guaranteed by other fundamental rights, such as in particular Article 10 or Article 13 of the Basic Law, as well as by the right to informational self-determination (1). In the instant case, the encroachments are not constitutionally justified: s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act does not comply with the principle of the clarity of provisions (2 a), the requirements of the principle of proportionality are not met (2 b) and the provision does not contain any sufficient precautions to protect the core area of private life (2 c). The impugned provision is null and void (2 d). There is no need for an additional review against other fundamental rights (2 e).

1. S. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act grants powers to encroach on the general right of personality in its special manifestation as a fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems; it enters the field besides the other concrete forms of this fundamental right, such as the right to informational self-determination, as well as the guarantee of freedom contained in Article 10 and Article 13 of the Basic Law, insofar as these do not guarantee any or sufficient protection.

a) The general right of personality guarantee elements of the personality which are not the subject matter of the special guarantee of freedom contained in the Basic Law, but which are not inferior to these in their constituting significance for the personality (see BVerfGE 99, 185 [193]; 114, 339 [346]). Such a loophole closing guarantee is needed in particular in order to counter new types of endangerment which may occur in the course of scientific and technical progress or changed circumstances (see BVerfGE 54, 148 [153]; 65, 1 [41]; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2465]). The assignment of a concrete legal protection claim regarding the various aspects of the right of personality conforms above all to the type of danger to the personality (see BVerfGE 101, 361 [380]; 106, 28 [39]).

b) The use of information technology has taken on a significance for the personality and the development of the individual which could not have been predicted. Modern information technology provides the individual with new possibilities, whilst at the same time entailing new types of endangerment of personality. …

cc) The increasing spread of networked information technology systems entails for the individual new endangerments of personality, in addition to new possibilities for the development of the personality.

(1) Such endangerments emerge from the fact that complex information technology systems such as personal computers open up a broad spectrum of use possibilities, all of which are associated with the creation, processing and storage of data. This is not only data which computer users create or store deliberately. In the context of the data processing process, information technology systems also create by themselves large quantities of further data which can be evaluated as to the user's conduct and characteristics in the same way as data stored by the user. As a consequence, a large amount of data can be accessed in the working memory and on the storage media of such systems relating to the personal circumstances, social contacts and activities of the user. If this data is collected and evaluated by third parties, this can be highly illuminating as to the personality of the user, and may even make it possible to form a profile (see on the personality endangerments resulting from such conclusions BVerfGE 65, 1 [42]).

(2) These risks are exacerbated in a variety of ways in a networked system, in particular one which is connected to the Internet. Firstly, the expansion of the facilities offered by networking leads to a situation in which an even greater number and diversity of data is created, processed and stored in comparison to a stand alone system. This includes communication contents, as well as data relating to network communication. Wide ranging knowledge of the personality of the user can be obtained by storing and evaluating such data on the conduct of the users in the network.

Above all, however, the networking of the system opens to third parties a technical access facility which can be used in order to spy on or manipulate data kept on the system. The individual cannot detect such access at all in some cases, or at least can only prevent it to a restricted degree. Information technology systems have now reached such a degree of complexity that effective social or technical self-protection leads to considerable difficulties and may be beyond the ability of at least the average user. Technical self-protection may also entail considerable effort or result in the loss of the functionality of the protected system. Many possibilities of self-protection - such as encryption or the concealment of sensitive data - are also largely ineffective if third parties have been able to infiltrate the system on which the data has been stored. Finally, it is not possible, in view of the speed of the development of information technology, to reliably forecast the technical means which users may have to protect themselves in future.

c) A need for protection that is relevant from the fundamental rights perspective emerges from the significance of the use of information technology systems for the development of the personality and from endangerments of the personality linked with this use. The individual relies on the state respecting the expectations of the integrity and confidentiality of such systems which are justified with regard to the unhindered development of the personality. The fundamental rights guarantees contained in Article 10 and Article 13 of the Basic Law, like those manifestations of the general right of personality previously developed in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, do not adequately take account of the need for protection arising as a consequence of the development of information technology.

aa) The guarantee of the secrecy of telecommunication according to Article 10.1 of the Basic Law protects the non-physical transmission of information to individual recipients with the aid of telecommunication traffic (see BVerfGE 67, 157 [172]; 106, 28 [35, 36]), but not the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems.

(1) The protection of Article 10.1 of the Basic Law covers telecommunication, regardless of the method of transmission (cable or broadcast, analogue or digital transmission) and the form of expression (speech, pictures, sound, symbols or other data) which are used

(see BVerfGE 106, 28 [36]; 115, 166 [182]). The scope of protection of the secrecy of telecommunication accordingly also covers the communication services of the Internet (see re e-mails BVerfGE 113, 348 [383]). What is more, not only the contents of the telecommunication are protected against knowledge being obtained of them, but also their circumstances. This includes in particular whether, when and how frequently telecommunication traffic has taken place or has been attempted between which persons or telecommunication facilities (see BVerfGE 67, 157 [172]; 85, 386 [396]; 100, 313 [358]; 107, 299 [312, 313]). In this context, the confidentiality of telecommunication encounters both old and new endangerments of personality emerging from the increased significance of information technology for the development of the individual.

Insofar as an empowerment is restricted to a state measure by means of which the contents and circumstances of the ongoing telecommunication are collected in the computer network, or the data related thereto is evaluated, the encroachment is to be measured against Article 10.1 of the Basic Law alone. The scope of protection of this fundamental right is affected here regardless of whether in technical terms the measure targets the transmission channel or the terminal used for telecommunication (see BVerfGE 106, 28 [37, 38]; 115, 166 [186, 187]). This also applies in principle if the terminal is a networked complex information technology system the use of which for telecommunication is only one among several types of use.

(2) The fundamental rights protection provided by Article 10.1 of the Basic Law however does not cover the contents and circumstances of the telecommunication stored subsequent to completion of the communication in the sphere of a subscriber, insofar as he or she can take their own protective precautions against secret data access. The specific dangers of spatially distanced communication which are to be averted by secrecy of telecommunication do not then continue to apply to such data (see BVerfGE 115, 166 [183 et seq.]).

(3) The protection effected by secrecy of telecommunication likewise does not apply if a state agency monitors the use of an information technology system as such or searches the storage media of the system. As to the collection of contents or circumstances outside the ongoing telecommunication, an encroachment on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law does not apply even if a telecommunication connection is used for transmission of the data collected to the evaluating authority, as is the case for instance with online access to stored data (see Germann, Gefahrenabwehr und Strafverfolgung im Internet, 2000, p. 497; Rux, Juristenzei-tung 2007, p. 285 [292]).

(4) Insofar as the secret access to an information technology system serves to collect data also where Article 10.1 of the Basic Law does not provide protection against access, a loop-hole in protection exists which is to be closed by the general right of personality in its manifestation as a protection of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems.

If a complex information technology system is technically infiltrated in order to perform telecommunication surveillance ("source telecommunication surveillance"), the infiltration overcomes the critical hurdle to spying on the system as a whole. The endangerment thereby brought about goes far beyond what is entailed by the mere surveillance of ongoing telecommunication. In particular, the data stored on personal computers which does not relate to the use of the system for telecommunication can also be obtained. For instance, the conduct in using a personal computer for personal purposes, the frequency of accessing certain services, in particular also the contents of files created or - insofar as the infiltrated information technology system also controls appliances in households - the conduct in the personal dwelling can be discovered.

According to information from the experts heard in the oral hearing, moreover, it may happen that, data is collected following infiltration which is unrelated to the ongoing telecommunication, even if this is not intended. As a result - and in contradistinction to what is usually the case with traditional network based telecommunication surveillance - there is always a risk for the person concerned that further personal information is collected over and above the contents and circumstances of telecommunication. The specific endangerments of personality which this brings about cannot be countered or cannot be sufficiently countered by Article 10.1 of the Basic Law.

Article 10.1 of the Basic Law is by contrast the sole fundamental right related standard for the evaluation of an empowerment to engage in "source telecommunication surveillance" if the surveillance is restricted exclusively to data emanating from an ongoing telecommunication process. This must be ensured by technical precautions and legal instructions.

bb) Also the guarantee of the inviolability of the home granted by Article 13.1 of the Basic Law guarantees an elementary space to the individual with regard to his or her human dignity, as well as in the interest of the development of his or her personality, which may be encroached upon only under the special preconditions of Article 13.2 to 13.7 of the Basic Law, but leaves loopholes as regards access to information technology systems.

The interests protected by this fundamental right are constituted by the spatial sphere in which private life takes place (see BVerfGE 89, 1 [12]; 103, 142 [150, 151]). In addition to private dwellings, company and business premises are also within the scope of protection of Article 13 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 32, 54 [69 et seq.]; 44, 353 [371]; 76, 83 [88]; 96, 44 [51]). The fundamental rights protection is not restricted here to the prevention of physical penetration of the dwelling. Measures by means of which state agencies use special aids to obtain an impression of events within the dwelling which are removed from the natural perception from outside the protected area are also to be regarded as an encroachment on Article 13 of the Basic Law. This includes not only acoustic or optical monitoring of dwellings (see BVerfGE 109, 279 [309, 327]), but also for instance the measurement of electromagnetic radiation with which the use of an information technology system in the dwelling can be monitored. This can also concern a system which operates offline.

Over and above this, a state measure which is connected to secret technical access to an information technology system may be measured against Article 13.1 of the Basic Law, for instance if and insofar as staff of the investigation authority seek access to premises that are protected as a dwelling in order to physically manipulate an information technology system there. A further case of the application of Article 13.1 of the Basic Law is the infiltration of an information technology system in a dwelling in order to monitor certain events within the dwelling by using it, for instance by using peripherals connected to the system, such as a microphone or a camera.

Article 13.1 of the Basic Law does not however confer on the individual any across-the-board protection regardless of the access modalities against the infiltration of his or her information technology system, even if this system is located in a dwelling (see for instance Beulke/Meininghaus, Der Strafverteidiger - StV 2007, p. 63 [64]; Gercke, Computer und Recht 2007, p. 245 [250]; Schlegel, Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht 2007, p. 648 [654 et seq.]; other views for instance Buermeyer, Höchstrichterliche Rechtsprechung im Strafrecht 2007, p. 392 [395 et seq.]; Rux, Juristenzeitung 2007, p. 285 [292 et seq.]; Schaar/Landwehr, Kommunikation & Recht 2007, p. 202 [204]). The encroachment may take place regardless of location, so that space oriented protection is unable to avert the specific endangerment of the information technology system. Insofar as the infiltration uses the connection of the computer concerned to form a computer network, it leaves spatial privacy provided by delimitation of the dwelling unaffected. The location of the system is in many cases of no interest for the investigation measure, and frequently will not be recognisable even for the authority. This applies in particular to mobile information technology systems such as laptops, Personal Digital Assistants (PDAs) or mobile telephones.

Article 13.1 of the Basic Law also does not provide protection against the collection, facilitated by infiltration of the system, of data found in the working memory or on the storage media of an information technology system located in a dwelling (see on the parallel relationship of home searches and seizure BVerfGE 113, 29 [45]).

cc) The manifestations of the general right of personality, in particular the guarantees of the protection of privacy, and of the right to informational self-determination, previously recognised in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, also do not comply sufficiently with the special need for protection of the user of information technology systems.

(1) In its manifestation as protection of privacy, the general right of personality of the individual guarantees a spatially and thematically specified area which is to remain, in principle, free of undesired inspection (see BVerfGE 27, 344 [350 et seq.]; 44, 353 [372, 373]; 90, 255 [260]; 101, 361 [382, 383]). The need for protection of the user of an information technology system is however not solely restricted to data to be allotted to his or her privacy. Such an attribution also frequently depends on the context in which the data came about and into which it is brought by linking with other data. In many cases, the data itself does not reveal what significance it has for the person concerned and which it may gain by inclusion in other contexts. The consequence of this is that, inevitably, not only private data is collected by the infiltration of the system, but access to all data is facilitated, so that a comprehensive picture of the user of the system may emerge.

(2) The right to informational self-determination goes beyond the protection of privacy. It confers on the individual, in principle, the power to determine for himself or herself the disclosure and use of his or her personal data (see BVerfGE 65, 1 [43]; 84, 192 [194]). It supports and expands the protection of freedom of conduct and privacy in terms of fundamental rights by already making it start at the level of endangerment of the personality. Such an endangerment situation can already arise in the run-up to concrete threats to specific legal interests, in particular if personal information can be used and linked in a manner which the person concerned can neither detect nor prevent. The extent of protection of the right to informational self-determination is not restricted here to information which is already sensitive by its nature and hence already protected by fundamental rights. Depending on the purpose of access and the existing processing and linking facilities, the use of personal data which per se has only little information content can also have an impact on the privacy and freedom of conduct of the person concerned in terms of fundamental rights (see Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2466]).

However, the right to informational self-determination does not fully consider elements of personality endangerments which emerge from the fact that the individual relies on the use of information technology systems for his or her personality development, and in such instances entrusts personal data to the system or inevitably provides such data already by using the system. A third party accessing such a system can obtain data stocks which are potentially extremely large and revealing without having to rely on further data collection and data processing measures. In its severity for the personality of the person concerned, such access goes beyond individual data collections against which the right to informational self-determination provides protection.

d) Insofar as no adequate protection exists against endangerments of the personality emerging from the individual relying on the use of information technology systems for his or her personality development, the general right of personality accounts for the need for protection in its loophole filling function over and above its manifestations recognised thus far by virtue of the fact that it guarantees the integrity and confidentiality of information technology systems. In the same way as the right to informational self-determination, this right is based on Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law; it protects the personal and private life of the subjects of the fundamental rights against access by the state in the area of information technology also insofar as the state has access to the information technology system as a whole, and not only to individual communication events or stored data.

aa) However, not all information technology systems which are able to create, process or store personal data require the special protection of a separate guarantee of personality rights. Insofar as such a system by its technical construction only contains data with a partial connection to a certain area of life of the person concerned - for instance non-networked electronic control systems in household appliances -, state access to the existing data is no different in qualitative terms than other data collections. In such a case, the protection of the right to informational self-determination is sufficient to guarantee the justified interests of the person concerned in confidentiality.

The fundamental right to the guarantee of the integrity and confidentiality of information technology systems is to be applied, by contrast, if the empowerment to encroach covers systems which alone or in their technical networking can contain personal data of the person concerned to such a degree and in such a diversity that access to the system facilitates insight into significant parts of the life of a person or indeed provides a revealing picture of the personality. Such a possibility applies for instance to access to personal computers, regardless of whether they are installed in a fixed location or are operated while on the move. It is possible as a rule to conclude not only as regards use for private purposes, but also with business use, possible characteristics or preferences from the usage pattern. Specific fundamental right related protection also covers for instance mobile telephones or electronic assistants which have a large number of functions and can collect and store many kinds of personal data.

bb) What is first of all protected by the fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems is the interest of the user in ensuring that the data which are created, processed and stored by the information technology system that is covered by its scope of protection remain confidential. An encroachment on this fundamental right is also to be presumed to have taken place if the integrity of the protected information technology system is affected by the system being accessed such that its performance, functions and storage contents can be used by third parties; the crucial technical hurdle for spying, surveillance or manipulation of the system has then been overcome.

(1) The general right of personality in the manifestation dealt with here in particular provides protection against secret access, by means of which the data available on the system can be spied on in its entirety or in major parts. The fundamental right related protection covers both the data stored in the working memory and also that which is temporarily or permanently kept on the storage media of the system. The fundamental right also protects against data collection using means which are technically independent of the data processing events of the information technology system in question, but the subject matter of which is these data processing events. This is for instance the case with use of so-called hardware keyloggers or in measuring the electromagnetic radiation from monitors or keyboards.

(2) The fundamental right related protection of the expectation of confidentiality and integrity exists regardless of whether access to the information technology system can be achieved easily or only with considerable effort. An expectation of confidentiality and integrity to be recognised from the fundamental rights perspective however only exists insofar as the person concerned uses the information technology system as his or her own, and hence may presume according to the circumstances that he or she alone or together with others entitled to use it disposes of the information technology system in a self-determined manner. Insofar as the use of the personal information technology system takes place via information technology systems which are at the disposal of others, the protection of the user also covers this.

2. The fundamental right to the guarantee of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems is not unrestricted. Encroachments may be justified both for preventive purposes, and for criminal prosecution. The individual must only accept such restrictions of his or her right which are based on a statutory foundation that is constitutional. This is missing in the empowerment of the constitution protection authority to carry out preventive measures to be reviewed in the instant case.

a) The impugned provision does not meet the principle of the clarity of provisions and determinedness of provisions.

aa) The principle of determinedness finds its basis in the principle of the rule of law (Article 20 and Article 28.1 of the Basic Law) also with regard to the general right of personality in its various manifestations (see BVerfGE 110, 33 [53, 57, 70]; 112, 284 [301]; 113, 348 [375]; 115, 320 [365]). It is to ensure that the democratically legitimised parliamentary legislature itself takes the essential decisions on encroachments on fundamental rights and the extent of the encroachments, that the Government and the administration find steering and restricting action standards in the statute, and that the courts can carry out judicial review. Furthermore, the clarity and determinedness of the provision ensure that the person concerned can realise the legal situation and can adjust to possible burdensome measures (see BVerfGE 110, 33 [52 et seq.]; 113, 348 [375 et seq.]). The parliamentary legislature must determine the occasion, purpose and limits of the encroachment in a manner that is sufficiently area specific, precise and clear in terms of its wording (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [359, 360, 372]; 110, 33 [53]; 113, 348 [375]; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2466]).

bb) According to these standards, s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act does not satisfy the principle of the clarity of provisions and determinedness of provisions insofar as the factual preconditions of the regulated measures cannot be sufficiently derived from the statute.

(1) The preconditions for measures according to s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act can be determined via two legislative referrals. Firstly, s. 5.2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act refers in general terms to s. 7.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, which in turn refers to s. 3.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act. Accordingly, the deployment of intelligence service means are permissible if information relevant to the protection of the constitution can be obtained by these means. Secondly,

s. 5.2 no. 11, sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act refers to the more stringent preconditions of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law for a case in which a measure according to s. 5.2 no. 11 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act encroaches on the secrecy of correspondence, post and telecommunications or is equivalent to such encroachment in terms of its nature and grievousness.

(2) It is not compatible with the principle of the clarity of provisions and determinedness of provisions that s. 5.2 no. 11, sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act makes the reference to the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law contingent on whether a measure encroaches on Article 10 of the Basic Law. The answer to the question of which fundamental rights are encroached on by investigation measures taken by the constitution protection authority can require complex assessments and evaluations. They are first and foremost incumbent on the legislature. It cannot avoid its task of giving concrete form to the relevant fundamental rights by means of corresponding statutory precautions by passing on the decision on how this fundamental right is to be concretised and implemented to a statute executing administration through a mere factual reference to a possibly relevant fundamental right. Such "escape clause" legislative technique does not comply with the principle of determinedness in a provision such as s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, which provides for new types of investigation measures which are intended to react to recent technological developments.

The breach of the principle of the clarity of provisions is made even more profound by the addition contained in s. 5.2 no.11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act that the reference to the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law also applies if an investigation measure is equivalent by its "nature and grievousness" to an encroachment on Article 10 of the Basic Law. Hence, the factual preconditions of regulated access are made contingent upon an evaluating comparison being carried out between this access and a measure which would have to be regarded as an encroachment on a specific fundamental right. s. 5.2 no.11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act does not contain any standards for this comparison. If the factual preconditions cannot be adequately specified by merely referring to a specific fundamental right, this certainly applies to a provision which provides for such a comparison of the regulated measure on which there is no further statutory instruction with an encroachment on a specific fundamental right.

(3) The reference to the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law in s. 5.2 no.11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act also does not comply with the principle of the clarity of provisions and of the determinedness of provisions insofar as the range of the reference is not regulated with an adequate level of determinedness.

S. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act refers to the "preconditions" of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law. The provision hence largely leaves unclear the parts of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law to which the reference is intended to be made. It does not reveal whether only the substantive encroachment threshold regulated in s. 3 of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law is to be understood by the preconditions of this Act, or whether further provisions are also intended to be referred to. For instance, the procedural rules contained in ss. 9 et seq. of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law could also be included among the preconditions for an encroachment according to this statute. It would at least be conceivable to further refer to both the substantive encroachment thresholds and also to all procedural precautions of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law, as has been proposed by the Government of the Land North Rhine-Westphalia. Accordingly, the provisions on dealing with collected data contained in s. 4 of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law and the provisions of ss. 14 et seq. of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law on parliamentary control would also be covered, although these provisions contain regulations which are not to be complied with until after an encroachment has taken place, and hence linguistically can hardly be counted among the preconditions for encroachment.

It is not evident that the undetermined version of the Act is due to particular legislative difficulties. The legislature could easily have listed in the referring provision those provisions of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law to which the reference was intended to be made.

b) S. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act also does not comply with the principle of proportionality. The latter demands that an encroachment on fundamental rights should serve a legitimate purpose and be suitable, necessary and appropriate as a means to this end (see BVerfGE 109, 279 [335 et seq.]; 115, 320 [345]; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2468]; established case law).

aa) The data collections provided for in the impugned provision serve the constitution protection authority in the performance of its tasks according to s. 3.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, and hence serve to secure, in the run-up to concrete dangers, the free democratic fundamental order, the continued existence of the Federation and of the Länder, as well as certain interests of the Federal Republic directed at international relations. Here, according to the reasoning of the Act, one of the goals pursued in particular with the revision of the Constitutional Protection Act was to ensure an effective fight against terrorism by the constitution protection authority in view of new risks, in particular connected with Internet communication (see Landtag document 14/2211, p. 1). However, the area of application of the revision is not restricted to the fight against terrorism, either explicitly or as a consequence of the systematic context. The provision requires a justification for its entire area of application.

The security of the state as a power securing peace and order which has a constitutional structure, and the security which it is to provide for the population against dangers to life, limb and freedom are constitutional values ranking equally with other high value interests (see BVerfGE 49, 24 [5657]; 115, 320 [346]). The duty to protect has its foundation both in Article 2.2 sentence 1 and in Article 1.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 115, 118 [152]). The state complies with its constitutional mandate by countering dangers from terrorist or other activities. The increased use of electronic or digital means of communication and their penetration into almost all areas of life makes it more difficult for the constitution protection authority to perform its tasks effectively. Also, modern information technology offers extremist and terrorist groups many possibilities to establish and maintain contacts, as well as to plan and prepare, as well as to commit criminal offences. Legislative measures opening up information technology for state investigations in particular are to be seen against the background of the shift from traditional forms of communication to electronic message traffic and the possibilities to encrypt or conceal files (see on criminal prosecution BVerfGE 115, 166 [193]).

bb) Secret access to information technology systems is suitable to serve these purposes. It expands the possibilities available to the constitution protection authority for reconnaissance of threat situations. The legislature is granted considerable latitude in the evaluation of suitability (see BVerfGE 77, 84 [106]; 90, 145 [173]; 109, 279 [336]). It is not evident that this latitude has been exceeded here.

cc) Secret access to information technology systems also does not violate the principle of necessity. In the context of its prerogative of assessment, the legislature may presume that no path which is equally effective, but less burdensome for the person concerned, exists to collect the data that is available on such systems.

dd) S. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act however does not comply with the principle of appropriateness in the narrower sense.

This principle requires that the gravity of the encroachment, in an overall evaluation, may not be disproportionate to the gravity of the reasons justifying it (see BVerfGE 90, 145 [173]; 109, 279 [349 et seq.]; 113, 348 [382]; established case law). The legislature must appropriately attribute the individual interest encroached on by an encroachment on fundamental rights to the general interests served by the encroachment. A review carried out according to these standards can lead to a situation in which means may not be used to implement general interests because the impairments of fundamental rights emanating from it are more weighty than the interests to be implemented (see BVerfGE 115, 320 [345, 346]; Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2469]).

S. 5.2 no.11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act does not comply with this. The measures provided for in this norm entail encroachments on fundamental rights which are so intensive that they are disproportionate to the public investigation interest emerging from the regulated occasion for the encroachment. What is more, there is a need for supplementary procedural requirements in order to account for the interests of the person concerned protected by fundamental rights; these are also missing.

(ee) Insofar as data is collected which provides information on the communication of the person concerned with third parties, the intensity of the encroachment on fundamental rights is further increased by virtue of the fact that the possibility for the citizen to participate in telecommunication without being monitored - also within the public good - is restricted (see on the collection of connection data BVerfGE 115, 166 [187 et seq.]). Collection of such data indirectly impairs the freedom of the citizen because he or she may be prevented from engaging in uninhibited individual communication by fear of surveillance, even if surveillance does not take place until after the fact. What is more, such data collection shows in this respect a considerable spread, which increases the gravity of the encroachment, given that data collection of necessity covers communication partners of the target person, i.e. third parties, without it being necessary for the preconditions for such access to apply to these persons (see on telecommunication surveillance BVerfGE 113, 348 [382, 383]; furthermore BVerfGE 34, 238 [247]; 107, 299 [321]).

(b) The gravity of the encroachment on fundamental rights is particularly severe if - as provided for by the impugned provision - secret technical infiltration facilitates the longer-term surveillance of the use of the system and the ongoing collection of the data in question.

(4) In view of its intensity, the encroachment on fundamental rights lying in secret access to an information technology system in the context of a preventive goal only satisfies the principle of appropriateness if certain facts indicate a danger posed to a predominantly important legal interest in the individual case, even if it cannot yet be ascertained with sufficient probability that the danger will arise in the near future. What is more, the statute granting powers to perform such an encroachment must ensure the protection of the fundamental rights of the person concerned also by means of suitable procedural precautions.

(a) In the tension between the obligation incumbent on the state to protect legal interests and the interest of the individual in respect for his or her rights as guaranteed by the constitution, the task of the legislature includes in an abstract form achieving compensation between the conflicting interests (see BVerfGE 109, 279 [350]). This may lead to a situation in which certain intensive encroachments on fundamental rights may be provided only to protect certain legal interests, and only from certain suspicion or danger levels onwards. The obligations incumbent on the state to protect other legal interests also come up against their limits in the prohibition of inappropriate encroachments on fundamental rights (see BVerfGE 115, 320 [358]). Corresponding encroachment thresholds are to be guaranteed by a statutory provision (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [383, 384]; 109, 279 [350 et seq.]; 115, 320 [346]).

(b) A highly intensive encroachment on fundamental rights can already be disproportionate as such if the statutorily regulated occasion for the encroachment does not show sufficient gravity. Insofar as the relevant statute serves to avert certain dangers, as is the case for the Constitution Protection Act under s. 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, it is the rank and the nature of the endangerment of protected interests referred to in the respective provision which is relevant to the gravity of the occasion for encroachment (see BVerfGE 115, 320 [360, 361]).

If the protected interests as such standing behind an empowerment to encroach are sufficiently prevalent to justify encroachments on fundamental rights of the regulated type, the principle of proportionality gives rise to constitutional requirements being placed on the factual preconditions of the encroachment. In this respect, the legislature has to maintain a balance between the nature and intensity of the impairment of fundamental rights on the one hand and the factual elements constituting an entitlement to encroachment on the other hand (see BVerfGE 100, 313 [392 et seq.]). The requirements as to the degree of probability and the factual basis of the prognosis must be proportionate to the nature and gravity of the impairment of fundamental rights. Even with the greatest weight of the threatening legal interest in encroachment, it is not possible to forgo the requirement of sufficient probability of occurrence. It must also be guaranteed as a precondition for a grave encroachment on fundamental rights that presumptions and conclusions have a starting point in fact which has a concrete outline (see BVerfGE 113, 348 [386]; 115, 320 [360, 361]).

(c) The principle of proportionality restricts a statutory provision granting powers to effect secret access to information technology systems initially insofar as special requirements exist as to the occasion for the encroachment. The latter consists here of risk aversion in the context of the tasks of the constitution protection authority according to s. 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act.

(d) Furthermore, empowerment to effect secret access to information technology systems must be linked with suitable statutory precautions in order to secure the interests of the person concerned under procedural law. If a norm provides for secret investigation activities on the part of the state which - as here - affect particularly protected zones of privacy or demonstrate a particularly high intensity of encroachment, the weight of the encroachment on fundamental rights is to be accounted for by suitable procedural precautions (see Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2471], with further references). In particular, access is in principle to be placed under the reservation of a judicial order.

(5) According to these standards, the impugned provision does not meet the constitutional requirements.

(a) According to s. 5.2 in conjunction with s. 7.1 no. 1 and s. 3.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, preconditions for the deployment of intelligence service means by the constitution protection authority are only factual indications of the presumption that information on anti-constitutional activities can be obtained by these means. This is not a sufficient substantive encroachment threshold, either as to the factual preconditions for the encroachment, or to the weight of legal interests to be protected. Also, there is no provision for a prior examination by an independent body, so that the constitutionally-required procedural security is lacking.

(b) These shortcomings do not cease to apply if the reference contained in s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act to the detailed preconditions according to the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law, is included in the examination despite its undeterminedness, and, in the broad interpretation of the Government of the Land North Rhine-Westphalia, is understood to refer to all formal and substantive precautions of this Act. s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act does not restrict secret access to an information technology system to telecommunication surveillance, the preconditions for which are regulated by s. 3.1 of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law, but facilitates such access in principle to obtain all available data. Neither the regulation of the encroachment threshold, nor the procedural requirements of the encroachment elements provided for in s. 3.1 of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law, meet the constitutional requirements.

c) Finally, there are no adequate statutory precautions to avoid encroachments on the absolutely protected core area of private life by measures according to s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act.

aa) Secret surveillance measures carried out by state agencies must respect an inviolable core area of private life, the protection of which emerges from Article 1.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]; 27, 1 [6]; 32, 373 [378, 379]; 34, 238 [245]; 80, 367 [373]; 109, 279 [313]; 113, 348 [390]). Even overriding interests of the public cannot justify encroachment on it (see BVerfGE 34, 238 [245]; 109, 279 [313]). The development of the personality in the core area of private life includes the possibility to express inner events such as perceptions and feelings, as well as considerations, views and experiences of a highly personal nature, without fear that state agencies may have access to them (see BVerfGE 109, 279 [314]).

In the context of secret access to an information technology system, the danger exists that the state agency might collect personal data which is to be attributed to the core area. For instance, the person concerned may use the system to establish and store files with highly personal contents, such as diary like records or private film or sound documents. Such files can enjoy absolute protection, as can for instance written embodiments of highly personal experiences (on this see BVerfGE 80, 367 [373 et seq.]; 109, 279 [319]). Secondly, insofar as it is used for telecommunication purposes, the system can be used to transmit contents which can equally fall within the core area. This applies not only to speech telephony, but for instance also to telecommunication using e-mail or other Internet communication services (see BVerfGE 113, 348 [390]). The absolutely protected data can be collected with different types of access, such as with the inspection of storage media, just as with the surveillance of ongoing Internet communication or indeed with full surveillance of the use of the target system.

bb) In the event of secret access to the information technology system of the person concerned, there is a need for special statutory precautions protecting the core area of private life.

To manage their personal matters, and for use in telecommunication also with close persons, citizens increasingly use complex information technology systems which offer them development possibilities in the highly personal sphere. In view of this, an investigation measure such as access to an information technology system, using which the data available on the target system can be comprehensively collected, entails in comparison to other surveillance measures - such as the use of the Global Positioning System as a tool of technical monitoring (see on this BVerfGE 112, 304 [318]) - an increased danger of data being collected which have highly personal contents.

Because of the secrecy of access, the person concerned has no opportunity himself or herself to endeavour to ensure prior to or during the investigative measure that the investigating state agency respects the core area of his or her private life. This complete loss of control is to be countered by special provisions which provide protection against the danger of a violation of the core area through suitable procedural precautions.

cc) The constitutional requirements as to the concrete structure of the protection of the core area can differ depending on the nature of the collection of the information and the information collected by it.

A statutory empowerment to carry out a surveillance measure which may affect the core area of private life must ensure as far as possible that no data is collected which relates to the core area. If - as with secret access to an information technology system - it is practically unavoidable to obtain information before its reference to the core area can be evaluated, sufficient protection must be ensured in the evaluation phase. In particular, data that is found and collected which refers to the core area must be deleted without delay and its exploitation must be ruled out (see BVerfGE 109, 279 [318]; 113, 348 [391, 392]).

dd) The Constitution Protection Act does not contain the required provisions protecting the core area. Nothing else emerges if the reference in s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act to the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law is included despite its undeterminedness. This statute also does not contain precautions to protect the core area of private life.

In contradistinction to the view taken by the Government of the Land North Rhine-Westphalia, s. 4.1 of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law may not even be referred to if the reference of s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act is understood broadly such that it covers this provision. s. 4.1 of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law only regulates that collected data is to be deleted which are not or are no longer needed, and hence regulates the general principle of necessity. The provision by contrast does not contain any special standards for the collection, viewing and deletion of data which can show a connection to the core area. The principle of necessity cannot be equated with constitutionally-required respect for the core area of private life. The core area is rather in particular not amenable to being qualified by contrary investigation interests, as was explicitly introduced by the application of the principle of necessity (see BVerfGE 109, 279 [314]).

d) The violation of the general right of personality in its manifestation as providing protection of the confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems (Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law) leads to the nullity of s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act.

e) In view of this, there is no longer any need to review the degree to which measures permitted by the provision also violate other fundamental rights or the principle of specifying the fundamental right which is restricted as contained in Article 19.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

II.

The empowerment to secret reconnaissance of the Internet contained in s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act violates the secrecy of telecommunication guaranteed by Article 10.1 of the Basic Law. Measures according to this provision can in certain cases constitute an encroachment on this fundamental right which is constitutionally not justified (1); Article 19.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is also violated (2). Its unconstitutionality makes the provision null and void (3). The constitution protection authority may however continue to carry out measures of Internet reconnaissance insofar as these are not to be regarded as encroachments on fundamental rights (4).

1. The secret reconnaissance of the Internet regulated in s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act covers measures by means of which the constitution protection authority obtains knowledge of the contents of Internet communication via the channel technically provided therefor, in other words for instance by calling up a Web site on the World Wide Web using a Web browser (see above A I 1 a). In certain cases, this can encroach on the secrecy of telecommunication. Such an encroachment is constitutionally not justified by the impugned provision.

a) The area protected by Article 10.1 of the Basic Law covers the ongoing telecommunication carried out using an information technology system that is connected to the Internet (see above I 1 c, aa (1)). However, this fundamental right only protects the confidence of the individual that knowledge of the telecommunication in which he or she is involved is not being obtained by third parties. By contrast, the confidence of the communication partners in one another is not the subject matter of the fundamental rights protection. If a state investigation measure does not focus on unauthorised access to telecommunication, but on the disappointment of the personal trust in the communication partner, this does not constitute an encroachment on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 106, 28 [37, 38]). The state's obtaining knowledge of the contents of telecommunication is hence only to be measured against the secrecy of telecommunication if a state agency monitors a telecommunication relationship from outside without itself being an addressee of the communication. By contrast, the fundamental right does not provide protection against a state agency itself establishing a telecommunication relationship with a subject of fundamental rights.

If a state agency obtains knowledge of the contents of telecommunication conducted via the communication services of the Internet via the channel technically provided therefor, this shall only constitute an encroachment on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law if the state agency is not authorised to do so by those involved in the communication. Since the secrecy of telecommunication does not protect the mutual personal trust of those involved in communication, the state agency is already authorised to collect the communication contents if only one of several participants has permitted it such access voluntarily.

The secret reconnaissance of the Internet accordingly encroaches on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law if the constitution protection authority monitors secured communication contents by using access keys which it collected without authorisation or against the will of those involved in the communications. This is the case for instance if a password collected using key-logging is used in order to gain access to an e-mail inbox or to a closed chatroom.

By contrast, an encroachment on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law is to be denied if for instance a participant of a closed chatroom has voluntarily provided the person acting for the constitution protection authority with his or her access, and as a consequence the authority uses this access. Encroachment on the secrecy of telecommunication certainly does not apply if the authority collects generally accessible contents, for instance by viewing open discussion fora or Web sites which are not password protected.

b) The encroachments on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law facilitated by s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act are constitutionally not justified. The impugned provision does not meet the constitutional requirements as to empowerments to effect such encroachments.

aa) S. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act does not comply with the principle of the clarity of provisions and determinedness of provisions since the preconditions for encroachment are not sufficiently precisely regulated because of the undeterminedness of subsection 2 of this provision (see above C I 2 a, bb).

bb) The impugned provision is furthermore not in compliance with the principle of appropriateness in the narrower sense insofar as it is to be measured against Article 10.1 of the Basic Law.

The encroachment on the secrecy of telecommunication is grievous. On the basis of the impugned provision, the constitution protection authority may access communication contents which may be sensitive in nature, and which may provide insight into the personal matters and habits of the person concerned. It is not only the one who gave rise to the surveillance measure who is concerned. The encroachment can rather show a certain spread if information is obtained not only on the communication conduct of the party against whom the measure is addressed, but also on his or her communication partners. The secrecy of access increases the intensity of the encroachment. Additionally, because of the broad wording of the preconditions for encroachment contained in s. 7.1 no. 1 in conjunction with s. 3.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, persons may also be monitored who have not given rise to the occasion for the encroachment.

Such a grievous encroachment on fundamental rights, even if the weight of the goals of protection of the constitution is taken into account, is in principle at least, also conditional on the provision of a qualified substantive encroachment threshold (see re criminal law investigations BVerfGE 107, 299 [321]). This is not the case here. Rather, s. 7.1 no. 1 in conjunction with s. 3.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act permits intelligence service measures to a considerable degree in the run-up to concrete endangerment without regard to the grievousness of the potential violation of legal interests, and also towards third parties. Such a broad empowerment to effect an encroachment is not compatible with the principle of proportionality.

cc) The Constitution Protection Act does not contain any precaution to protect the core area of private life in connection with encroachments according to s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act. Such provisions are however required insofar as a state agency is empowered to collect the contents of telecommunication by encroaching on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 113, 348 [390 et seq.]).

2. Finally, s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, insofar as the provision grants powers to effect encroachments on Article 10.1 of the Basic Law, does not comply with the principle of specifying the fundamental right restricted contained in Article 19.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

According to Article 19.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, a statute must specify the fundamental right which is restricted by this statute or this Act, stating the relevant Article. The function of the principle of specifying the fundamental right restricted is to provide a warning and an occasion for reflection (see BVerfGE 64, 72 [79, 80]). Specifying the encroachment contained in the wording of the Act is intended to ensure that the legislature only provides for encroachments of which it is aware as such, and with regard to which it accounts to itself as to their impact on the fundamental rights concerned (see BVerfGE 5, 13 [16]; 85, 386 [404]). The fact of explicit specifying also makes it easier to clarify the necessity and the extent of the intended encroachment on fundamental rights in the public debate. By contrast, it is not sufficient for the legislature to have been aware of the encroachment on fundamental rights if this has not been reflected in the text of the Act (see BVerfGE 113, 348 [366, 367]).

The impugned provision does not comply with the principle of specifying the fundamental right restricted with regard to Article 10.1 of the Basic Law. In contradistinction to the view taken by the Government of the Land North Rhine-Westphalia, the impugned provision does not meet the requirements simply because s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 2 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act may indicate by referring to the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law that the legislature has considered an encroachment on the secrecy of telecommunication to be possible. The principle of specifying the fundamental right restricted is only accounted for if the fundamental right is explicitly named in the text of the Act as being restricted. Moreover, in view of the fact that s. 5.2 no. 11 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act contains two different empowerments to encroach, it by no means emerges from the statute with sufficient clarity for which of them the legislature at least anticipated the possibility of an encroachment on Article 10 of the Basic Law.

3. The violation of s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act against Article 10.1 and Article 19.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law leads to the nullity of the provision.

4. The nullity of the empowerment however does not lead to a situation in which measures of Internet reconnaissance are in principle denied to the authority, insofar as these do not encroach on fundamental rights.

Insofar as it does not fall under Article 10.1 of the Basic Law, the secret reconnaissance of the Internet in particular does not always encroach on the general right of personality guaranteed by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

a) The confidentiality and integrity of information technology systems guaranteed by the general right of personality is not affected by measures of Internet reconnaissance since measures according to s. 5.2 no. 11 sentence 1 alternative 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act are restricted to data which the owner of the system has provided for Internet communication - for instance the operator of a Web server - using the channel technically provided therefor. The person concerned himself or herself has opened his or her system by technical terms for such data collections. He or she cannot rely on these not being carried out.

b) At least as a rule, an encroachment on Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law is also to be denied in its manifestation as a right to informational self-determination.

III.

Since s. 5.2 no. 11 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act is null and void as a whole, the complaints submitted against s. 5.3 and s. 17 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act are disposed of. Insofar as the complainants' complaints are admissible, the unconstitutionality of the impugned provisions is claimed only with regard to measures according to the provision that is null and void.

IV.

S. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act is compatible with the Basic Law insofar as its area of application was expanded to cover activities within the meaning of s. 3.1 no. 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act. In particular, this provision does not violate Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

1. The collection of account contents and account movements provided in s. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act encroaches on the general right of personality in its manifestation as a right to informational self-determination.

Such account information can be significant for the protection of the personality of the person concerned, and is protected by the fundamental right. According to the current habits, most payment transactions which go beyond the cash transactions of daily life are carried out via accounts. If information is deliberately compiled on the contents of the accounts of a specific person, this makes it possible to view the assets and the social contacts of the person concerned, insofar as these show a financial dimension - for instance via subscriptions or maintenance payments. Some account content data, such as the amount of payments connected with consumption dependent recurring obligations, can also permit further conclusions to be drawn as to the conduct of the person concerned (see Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochen-schrift 2007, p. 2464 [2466]).

The measures provided in s. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act encroach on the right to informational self-determination. It is not a matter here of whether the content of the impugned provision is limited to a power of the constitution protection authority to address a request for information to a financial institution, or whether it implicitly imposes an obligation on the respective financial institution to provide information. In either case, the provision empowers the authority to undertake data collection exercises which as such already bring about an encroachment on fundamental rights.

2. The encroachments on fundamental rights provided in s. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act are however constitutionally justified for investigations in view of activities within the meaning of s. 3.1 no. 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act. In particular, the impugned provision complies with the principle of proportionality in this respect.

a) Because of the expansion of the area of application of the provision, the measures regulated in s. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act also serve the purpose of reconnaissance of the financing channels and of the financial circumstances and intertwinings in connection with activities within the meaning of s. 3.1 no. 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act. This is a legitimate goal of protection of the constitution.

The provision in its expanded version is suited to reach this goal. It is also necessary for it. No equally effective means is evident to achieve reconnaissance of bank transactions with a view to activities within the meaning of s. 3.1 no. 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act that is less burdening for the person concerned.

b) S. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act also satisfies the principle of appropriateness in the narrower sense.

aa) The provision empowers the constitution protection authority to effect encroachments on fundamental rights.

Information on account contents and account movements can be sensitive data. Accessing of such data of such persons concerned, who are protected by fundamental rights, can considerably impairs their interests. The collection of such information has hence as a rule an increased weight from the fundamental rights perspective (see Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2470]). The intensity of the encroachment is also increased by virtue of its secrecy. According to s. 5a.3 sentence 11 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, the financial institution which provides the information may not notify the person concerned of the request for information and of the data transmitted. Finally, the person concerned may incur disadvantages since the financial institution holding the account of necessity hears of the data collection and may draw unfavourable conclusions on an individual concerned on the basis of such knowledge (see Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 13 June 2007 - 1 BvR 1550/03 et al. -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2007, p. 2464 [2469]).

bb) The public interests pursued with s. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act are however so weighty that they are not disproportionate to the encroachments on fundamental rights that are regulated in the provision.

(1) The statute links the obtaining of knowledge on the account contents and account movements to factual preconditions which adequately accommodate the significance of the encroachment on fundamental rights for the person concerned.

S. 5a.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act makes the collection contingent on an element of endangerment that is qualified both as to the legal interests concerned, and as to the factual basis of the encroachment. There must be factual indications of grievous dangers to the interests protected contained in s. 3.1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act. The term "grievous danger" refers - as in s. 8a.2 of the Federal Constitution Protection Act (Bundesverfassungsschutzgesetz - BVerfSchG) (see on this Bundestag document (Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks) 16/2921, p. 14), which has identical wording in this respect - to an increased intensity of the threat to legal interests. The factual basis of the encroachments is additionally qualified by the requirement of factual indications of a grievous danger. It is not sufficient for the regulated data collection to be useful in general terms for the performance of the task of the constitution protection authority. Rather, indications must exist of a situation in which the protected interests are under threat in concrete terms.

With its two-fold qualification, the encroachment threshold meets the requirements of the general right of personality. No further restrictions of the factual preconditions of the encroachment are constitutionally required.

(2) The impugned provision also takes account of the grievousness of the regulated encroachment on fundamental rights by means of suitable procedural precautions.

For instance, data collection according to s. 5a.3 sentence 3 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act requires an order from the Minister of the Interior, which is to be requested by the head of the Constitution Protection Department or his or her deputy. The encroachment on fundamental rights lying in the collection of account contents and account movements is not so grievous that ex ante control by a neutral body is constitutionally required per se. The intra-authority control provided however serves to secure the interests of the person concerned in the preparatory phase of data collection, and hence contributes to the proportionality of the encroachment. What is more, additional ex-post control by the G 10 Commission is provided for according to s. 5a.3 sentences 4 to 8 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act, which equally serves the protection of the interests of the persons concerned that are protected by fundamental rights.

S. 5a.3 sentence 9 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act in conjunction with s. 4 of the Act on the Implementation of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law contains standards for the processing and transmission of the collected data, in particular meeting the requirements of necessity and of the limitation principle.

S. 5a.3 sentence 11 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution Protection Act in conjunction with s. 5 of the Act on the Implementation of the Act re Article 10 of the Basic Law, finally, provides for notification of the person concerned as soon as a risk to the purpose of the restriction can be ruled out. By these means, the person concerned is largely enabled to pursue his or her interests at least ex-post.

2. Article 2.2 - Life, Limb and Liberty

The Right to Life: The Abortion Decisions, BVerfGE 39, 1, BVerfGE 88, 203

Explanatory Annotation

The German Constitutional Court addressed the issue of termination of pregnancy twice in two fundamental judgments. The main issue in the first judgment of 1974 was the question of whether the general legalization of abortion in the first 12 weeks of the pregnancy as provided for in the relevant criminal law reform act was constitutional. This question had arisen in the broader context of liberal reforms, which, in Germany, were the result of complex socio-political changes in the society. The student revolts of the late 1960s, the change from a conservative government to a social-democratic/liberal coalition government are examples for this trend and similar developments internationally also provided support. The epochal decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Roe v Wade of 1973 is one prime example.

The second decision of 1992 is, on the one hand, the continuation of the old struggle between those strictly opposed to abortion and those with more balancing views in the light of the empirical developments since the first decision in 1974. The second decision of the Constitutional Court of 1992, on the other hand, also reflects the German reunification of 1990 and the fact that the two Germanys had significantly different laws pertaining to the question of abortion. Former communist East-Germany had in effect liberalized abortion in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy whereas former West-Germany operated under the more complex and less liberal legal regime established as a consequence of the Court's first decision in 1974. The Unification Treaty[24] demanded in Article 31.4 that the abortion problem be addressed by the legislature until the end of 1992. The outcome of this reform process was the object of constitutional scrutiny in the second decision of 1992.

In substance, both decisions of the Court follow the same red line. The unborn life, the foetus, partakes in the right of life guarantee of Article 2.2 of the Basic Law and possesses human dignity as guaranteed in Article 1.1. Having thus decided that under the Basic Law, life in the sense of Article 2.2 begins at conception (or, to be more precise, with nidation, i.e. the implantation of the fertilized ovum in the endometrium of the uterus[25]) it is obvious that any legislative solution that would make this life dependent on the free will of another person, even if that other person is the mother, is not possible. The result was that the general liberalization of abortion in the first 12 weeks, as was intended under the West-German reform law of 1974 and as was the case under the East-German law (and in many other jurisdictions) was unconstitutional.

The consequence in West-Germany after 1974 was new legislation that maintained the illegality of abortion as a matter of principle but allowed for certain exceptions, the so-called 'indications', such as a significant danger to the life and health of the mother, rape, but also the eugenic indication, i.e. substantial genetic or other defects of the child and the most controversial 'social indication', which allowed for termination of the pregnancy if the mother was caught up in an 'emergency situation' and hence could not cope with the pregnancy and the child. These indications had by and large led to a situation at least akin to a general liberalization of abortion in the first part of the pregnancy and hence had given rise to much controversy, which influenced the post-reunification reform legislation and led to the second decision.

The second pillar of both decisions is the strong emphasis on the duty of the state to protect life. The Court held that it does not suffice that the state refrain from taking or interfering with life. Governmental authority must go beyond this and is obligated to actively protect life in its legal order. In the first decision the court had already held that this protection does not necessarily require criminalizing abortion and that criminal law as a protective means can be a last resort but that any means of protection must be effective.

In the second decision the Court had to deal with the reform law of 1992, which had replaced the 'indication' scheme with a counselling scheme under which abortion had to be preceded by defined counselling efforts designed to reinforce in the mother the will to carry out the pregnancy. The Court made it clear that the counselling framework must be such that the pregnant woman in her conflict situation can be offered concrete help to cope with the pregnancy and the child. This includes assistance when looking for accommodation, child-care and in continuing the education of the mother-to-be. The detail in which the Court described the elements of this counselling effort are striking and from the perspective of other jurisdictions one could well ask whether it is for a court of law to go into such detail. The Court also re-emphazed that abortion must retain the mark of an illegal activity even if the choice is not to sanction it criminally. Consequently abortion it could not be covered by the public health insurance system. It could, however, be covered by the subsidiary general welfare scheme for those qualifying.

Both decisions amply illustrate the pain the Court went through in order to find a balance between the right to life of the unborn and the right of the mother to self-determination. At times the decisions are not always practical and full of symbolism but they are always markedly different to the solution found, for example, by the United States Supreme Court in Roe v Wade. The US Constitution does not contain a right to life - but an implied right to privacy - and the function of fundamental rights, as creating a state duty to protect is also rather foreign to the US legal system. Different legal frameworks do not necessarily, but did in this instance, yield very different results.

Headnotes:

1. The life which is developing itself in the womb of the mother is an independent legal value which enjoys the protection of the constitution (Article 2.2 sentence 1, Article 1.1 of the Basic Law). The State's duty to protect forbids not only direct state attacks against life developing itself, but also requires the state to protect and foster this life.

2. The obligation of the state to protect the life developing itself exists, even against the mother.

3. The protection of life of the child en ventre sa mere takes precedence as a matter of principle for the entire duration of the pregnancy over the right of the pregnant woman to self-determination and may not be placed in question for any particular time.

4. The legislature may express the legal condemnation of the interruption of pregnancy required by the Basic Law through measures other than the threat of punishment. The decisive factor is whether the totality of the measures serving the protection of the unborn life guarantees an actual protection which in fact corresponds to the importance of the legal value to be guaranteed. In the extreme case, if the protection required by the constitution cannot be realized in any other manner, the legislature is obligated to employ the criminal law to secure the life developing itself.

5. A continuation of the pregnancy is not to be exacted (legally) if the termination is necessary to avert from the pregnant woman a danger to her life or the danger of a serious impairment of her health. Beyond that the legislature is at liberty to designate as non-exactable other extraordinary burdens for the pregnant woman which are of similar gravity and, in these cases, to leave the interruption of pregnancy free of punishment.

6. The Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law of the 18th of June, 1974, (Federal Law Reporter I, p. 1297) has not in the required extent done justice to the constitutional obligation to protect prenatal life.

Order of the First Senate of 25 February 1975 - 1 BvF 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6/74 -

Facts:

The subject matter of the proceeding is the question whether the so-called regulation of terms of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law according to which termination of pregnancy remains free of punishment during the first twelve weeks after conception under certain conditions is consistent with the Basic Law.

The Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law (5 CLRS) of June 18, 1974 (Federal Law Reporter I, p. 1297) has regulated punishability of the interruption of pregnancy in a new manner. SS. 218 to 220 have been replaced by provisions which vis-a-vis the previous state of the law contain primarily the following alterations

As a matter of principle, anyone who interrupts a pregnancy more than 13 days after conception shall be punished (s. 218.1). An abortion performed by a physician, however, with the consent of the pregnant woman is not punishable under s. 218 if not more than twelve weeks have elapsed since conception (s. 218a - Regulation of Terms.). Furthermore, an interruption of pregnancy performed by a physician with the consent of the pregnant woman after the expiration of the twelve week period is not punishable under s. 218 if the abortion is indicated, according to the judgment of medical science, to avert from the pregnant woman either a danger to her life or the danger of a serious impairment of the condition of her health to the extent that these dangers cannot be averted in a fashion which is otherwise exactable (s. 218b, No. 1- Medical Indication). Furthermore, abortion is not punishable if compelling reasons demand the assumption that the child, because of an hereditary disposition or harmful influences before birth, will suffer impairment to its health which cannot be alleviated and which are so weighty that the continuation of the pregnancy cannot be demanded of the pregnant woman, and not more than 22 weeks have elapsed since conception (s. 218b no. 2 - Eugenical Indication). Anyone who interrupts a pregnancy without the pregnant woman first having received social and medical counselling at a counselling centre or from a physician shall be punished (s. 218c). Even so an individual makes himself liable to punishment if he interrupts a pregnancy after the expiration of twelve weeks from conception without a competent counselling centre having previously certified that the prerequisites of s. 218b (Medical or Eugenic Indications) have been met (s. 219). The pregnant woman herself shall not be punished either under s. 218 or under s. 219.

B.

The Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law did not need the concurrence of the Federal Council.

1. The statute, in Articles 6 and 7, alters, it is true, the Order of Criminal Procedure and the Introductory Statute to the Criminal Code which, for their part, were passed with the concurrence of the Federal Council. This reason by itself, however, does not necessitate concurrence (BVerfGE 37, 363). Further, the statute alters no statutory provisions, which, for their part, were in need of concurrence.

2. The Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law itself contains no provisions which under Article 84.1, or any other provision of the Basic Law require concurrence. Neither s. 218 nor s. 219 of the Criminal Code regulates the establishment of authorities or administrative procedure. Rather, they merely establish the substantive legal prerequisites of non-punishable interruption of pregnancy. This is also true, insofar as s. 218c.1 no. 1 of the Criminal Code, requires that the pregnant woman, before the abortion, present herself to an authorized counselling centre and describe the object of the counselling. The setting up and establishment of counselling centres as well as the decreeing of administrative provisions for procedures to be followed by these centres are completely relegated to the federal states. For the same reasons s. 219 of the Criminal Code does not create a need for concurrence of the Federal Council by requiring the verification of the substantive prerequisites by "an authorized centre" before performing an abortion indicated under s. 218b.

3. The petitioning-state governments cannot be followed in concluding that concurrence is necessary insofar as they refer to the legal principle established in the decision of June 25, 1974, according to which an amendatory statute required the concurrence of the Federal Council "if, through the alteration of substantive legal norms, provisions regarding the administrative procedures which are not expressly altered experience an essentially different meaning and scope in a construction which is oriented to the purpose of the statute" (BVerfGE 37, 363, Fourth Guiding Principle and 383). The actual prerequisites for a direct application of this guiding principle are unquestionably not present here. Whether a continued extension of this legal principle in the sense proposed by the government of the federal state of Rhineland-Pfalz could come into consideration at all is uncertain. Even according to this view of the law, no requirement for concurrence for the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law arises since an even greater latitude to structure remains with the federal states under the substantive provisions for the administrative regulations incumbent upon them.

4. Finally, no requirement for concurrence can be inferred from the close connection of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law with the Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform which, with the content given it by the Federal Parliament, is viewed as needing concurrence. Regardless of that, the Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform has not yet taken effect. The legislature is not prevented as a matter of principle in the exercise of its legislative freedom from dividing a statutory plan into several individual statutes. The Federal Constitutional Court has, up to this time, proceeded upon the principle that such divisions were permissible (cf. BVerfGE 34, 9 [28]; 37, 363 [382]). In the decision (BVerfGE 24, 184, [199 seq.]) -Apostille--the Court left unanswered the question whether there are constitutional limits to the authority and where these limits are to be found. In any event, such limits are not transgressed in this case. The Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law and the planned Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform were indeed voted upon consecutively. However, they must not necessarily be considered a statutory and technical unity. The first named statute contains in essence only criminal law and criminal procedure. In contrast, the Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform contains social and labour law measures. The independence in content of the Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform from the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law obviously results from the fact that the Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform, according to its very wording, would be applicable to all of the proposed solutions for the new regulation of pregnancy termination, namely the "term solution" as well as the three indication solutions.

I.

1. Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law also protects the life developing itself in the womb of the mother as an intrinsic legal value.

a) The express incorporation into the Basic Law of the self-evident right to life - in contrast to the Weimar Constitution - may be explained principally as a reaction to the "destruction of life unworthy of life," to the "final solution" and "liquidations," which were carried out by the National Socialistic Regime as measures of state. Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, just as it contains the abolition of the death penalty in Article 102, includes "a declaration of the fundamental worth of human life and of a concept of the state which stands, in emphatic contrast to the philosophies of a political regime to which the individual life meant little and which therefore practiced limitless abuse with its presumed right over life and death of the citizen" (BVerfGE 18, 112 [117]).

b) In construing Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, one should begin with its language: "Everyone has a right to life. . ." Life, in the sense of historical existence of a human individual, exists according to definite biological-physiological knowledge, in any case, from the 14th day after conception (nidation, individuation) (cf. on this point the statements of Hinrichsen before the Special Committee for the Reform of the Criminal Law, Sixth Election Period, 74th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 2142 seq.). The process of development which has begun at that point is a continuing process which exhibits no sharp demarcation and does not allow a precise division of the various steps of development of the human life. The process does not end even with birth; the phenomena of consciousness which are specific to the human personality, for example, appear for the first time a rather long time after birth. Therefore, the protection of Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law cannot be limited either to the "completed" human being after birth or to the child about to be born which is independently capable of living. The right to life is guaranteed to everyone who "lives"; no distinction can be made here between various stages of the life developing itself before birth, or between unborn and born life. "Everyone" in the sense of Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is "everyone living"; expressed in another way: every life possessing human individuality; "everyone" also includes the yet unborn human being.

c) In opposition to the objection that "everyone" commonly denotes, both in everyday language as well as in legal language, a "completed" person and that a strict interpretation of the language speaks therefore against the inclusion of the unborn life within the effective area of Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, it should be emphasized that, in any case, the sense and purpose of this provision of the Basic Law requires that the protection of life should also be extended to the life developing itself. The security of human existence against encroachments by the state would be incomplete if it did not also embrace the prior step of "completed life," unborn life.

This extensive interpretation corresponds to the principle established in the opinions of the Federal Constitutional Court, "according to which, in doubtful cases, that interpretation is to be selected which develops to the highest degree the judicial effectiveness of the fundamental legal norm" (BVerfGE 32, 54 [71]; 6, 55 [72]).

d) In support of this result the legislative history of Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law may be adduced here. After the German Party (DP) had made repeated moves to make explicit reference to "germinating life" in connection with the right to life and bodily inviolability (Federal Council Press 11.48 - 298 and 12.48 - 398), the Parliamentary Council deliberated on this circle of problems for the first time in its Committee for Fundamental Questions, the 32nd session, held on January 11, 1949. In the discussion of the question, "whether a provision should be incorporated into the Basic Law which would forbid medical operations which do not serve health," Representative Dr. Heuss (FDP) explained, without encountering opposition, that compulsory sterilization and abortion in connection with the right to life were at issue. The Main Committee of the Parliamentary Council in its 42nd session on January 18, 1949, thoroughly dealt with, during the second reading on fundamental rights (proceedings of the Chief Committee of the Parliamentary Council, Stenographic Reports, p. 529 seq.), the question of the inclusion of developing life in the protection of the constitution. Parliamentary Representative Dr. Seebohm (DP) proposed to add both of the following sentences to Article 1.1 of the Basic Law as it existed at that time: "Germinating life is protected" and "the death penalty is abolished." At the least, he continued, one must expressly enter into the record that germinating life is explicitly included in the right to life and bodily inviolability, if another interpretation is possible. Parliamentary Representative Dr. Weber explained in the name of the CDU/CSU that her faction, when it intercedes for the right to life, means life simply; and, in the faction's view, germinating life, and above all, the defence of germinating life is contained in the right (bc. cit., p. 534). Dr. Heuss (FDP) agreed with Dr. Weber that the concept of life also embraces developing life; however, matters should not be placed in the constitution, which are regulated in the criminal law. As a consequence, he considered both the mention of germinating life as well as the death penalty as a special question to be superfluous (bc. cit., p. 535)." After the unopposed explanations according to which germinating life is embraced in the right to life and bodily inviolability," Dr. Seebohm desired to withdraw his motion (bc. cit., p. 535). However Parliamentary Representative Dr. Greve (SPD) declared: "I must explicitly say here, for the record, that at the least as far as I am concerned, I do not understand the right of germinating life to be within the right to life. I would also like on behalf of my friends, at least for the great majority of them, to deliver a clarification of like content in order to establish for the minutes that the Main Committee of the Parliamentary Council in its entirety does not adopt the standpoint which my colleague Dr. Seebohm just expressed." The motion of Dr. Seebohm was presented once again at that point but was indeed rejected by eleven votes to seven (bc. cit., p. 535). In the written report of the Main Committee (page 7), however, Parliamentary Representative Dr. von Mangoldt (CDU) explained with regard to Article 2 of the Basic Law: "With the guaranteeing of the right to life, germinating life should also be protected. The motions introduced by the German Party in the Main Committee to attach a particular sentence about the protection of germinating life did not attain a majority only because, according to the view prevailing in the Committee, the value to be protected was already secured through the present version. The plenary Parliamentary Council concurred in Article 2.2 of the Basic Law on May 6, 1949, in the second reading, there being two votes in opposition. At the third reading on May 8, 1949, both Parliamentary Representatives Dr. Seebohm as well as Dr. Weber stated that, according to their conception, Article 2.2 of the Basic Law would also include germinating life within the protection of this fundamental right (proceedings of the Parliamentary Council, Stenographic Reports, p. 218, 223). The comments of both speakers stood without opposition. The history of the origin of Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law suggests that the formulation "everyone has the right to life" should also include "germinating" life. In any case, even less can be concluded from the materials on behalf of the contrary point of view. On the other hand, no evidence is found in the legislative history for answering the question whether unborn life must be protected by the criminal law.

e) Furthermore, in the deliberations on the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law there was unity regarding the value of protecting unborn life, although, to be sure, the constitutional structure of the problem has not been treated definitively. In the report of the Special Committee for the Reform of the Criminal Law on the statutory draft introduced by the Factions of the SPD and FPD, inter alia, it was stated on this point: The legal value of unborn life is to be respected in principle equally with that of born life. This determination is self-evident for the stage in which unborn life would also be capable of independent life outside of the mother's womb. The determination, however, is already justified for the earlier stage of development which begins approximately 14 days after conception, as, among others, Hinrichsen convincingly established in the public hearing (AP, VI, p. 2142 et seq.). … Therefore, it is impermissible to deny the existence of unborn life from the end of nidation on or to contemplate it merely with indifference. The question debated in the literature whether, and if the occasion arises, to what extent the Basic Law should include unborn life in its protection, need not be answered at this point. In any case, if one disregards the extreme ideas of individual groups, the concept of unborn life as a legal value of high rank corresponds to the general public's understanding of the law. This understanding of the law also lies at the basis of this draft. (Federal Parliamentary Press, 7/198 1, new, p. 5) Nearly of the same tenor are, to an extent, the committee reports regarding the remaining drafts (Federal Parliamentary Press, 7/1982, p. 5, Federal Parliamentary Press, 7/1983, p. 5, Federal Parliamentary Press, 7/1984, new, p. 4).

2. The duty of the state to protect every human life may therefore be directly deduced from Article 2.2 sentence 1, of the Basic Law. In addition to that, the duty also results from the explicit provision of Article 1.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law since developing life participates in the protection which Article 1.1 of the Basic Law guarantees to human dignity. Where human life exists, human dignity is present to it; it is not decisive that the bearer of this dignity himself is conscious of it and knows personally how to preserve it. The potential faculties present in the human being from the beginning suffice to establish human dignity.

3. On the other hand, the question disputed in the present proceeding as well as in judicial opinions and in scientific literature, whether the one about to be born himself is a bearer of the fundamental right or, on account of a lesser capacity to possess legal and fundamental rights, is "only" protected in his right to life by the objective norms of the constitution, need not be decided here. According to the constant judicial utterances of the Federal Constitutional Court, the fundamental legal norms contain not only subjective rights of defence of the individual against the state but embody, at the same time, an objective ordering of values, which is valid as a constitutionally fundamental decision for all areas of the law and which provides direction and impetus for legislation, administration, and judicial opinions (BVerfGE 7, 198 [205]--Lueth--; 35, 79 [114]--High School Decisions--for further sources). Whether and, if so, to what extent the state is obligated by the constitution to legal protection of developing life can therefore be concluded from the objective-legal content of the fundamental legal norms.

II.

1. The duty of the state to protect is comprehensive. It forbids not only self-evidently direct state attacks on the life developing itself but also requires the state to take a position protecting and promoting this life, that is to say, it must, above all, preserve it even against illegal attacks by others. It is for the individual areas of the legal order, each according to its special function, to effectuate this requirement. The degree of seriousness with which the state must take its obligation to protect increases as the rank of the legal value in question increases in importance within the order of values of the Basic Law. Human life represents, within the order of the Basic Law, an ultimate value, the particulars of which need not be established; it is the living foundation of human dignity and the prerequisite for all other fundamental rights.

2. The obligation of the state to take the life developing itself under protection exists, as a matter of principle, even against the mother. Without doubt, the natural connection of unborn life with that of the mother establishes an especially unique relationship, for which there is no parallel in other circumstances of life. Pregnancy belongs to the sphere of intimacy of the woman, the protection of which is constitutionally guaranteed through Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. Were the embryo to be considered only as a part of the maternal organism the interruption of pregnancy would remain in the area of the private structuring of one's life, where the legislature is forbidden to encroach (BVerfGE 6, 32 [41] ; 6, 389 [433] ; 27, 344 [350] ; 32, 373 [379]). Since, however, the one about to be born is an independent human being who stands under the protection of the constitution, there is a social dimension to the interruption of pregnancy which makes it amenable to and in need of regulation by the state. The right of the woman to the free development of her personality, which has as its content the freedom of behaviour in a comprehensive sense and accordingly embraces the personal responsibility of the woman to decide against parenthood and the responsibilities flowing from it, can also, it is true, likewise demand recognition and protection. This right, however, is not guaranteed without limits - the rights of others, the constitutional order, and the moral law limit it. A priori, this right can never include the authorization to intrude upon the protected sphere of right of another without justifying reason or much less to destroy that sphere along with the life itself; this is even less so, if, according to the nature of the case, a special responsibility exists precisely for this life. A compromise which guarantees the protection of the life of the one about to be born and permits the pregnant woman the freedom of abortion is not possible since the interruption of pregnancy always means the destruction of the unborn life. In the required balancing, "both constitutional values are to be viewed in their relationship to human dignity, the centre of the value system of the constitution" (BVerfGE 35, 202 [225]). A decision oriented to Article 1, Paragraph 1, of the Basic Law must come down in favour of the precedence of the protection of life for the child en ventre sa mere over the right of the pregnant woman to self-determination. Regarding many opportunities for development of personality, she can be adversely affected through pregnancy, birth and the education of her children. On the other hand, the unborn life is destroyed through the interruption of pregnancy. According to the principle of the balance which preserves most of competing constitutionally protected positions in view of the fundamental idea of Article 19.2 of the Basic Law; precedence must be given to the protection of the life of the child about to be born. This precedence exists as a matter of principle for the entire duration of pregnancy and may not be placed in question for any particular time. The opinion expressed in the Federal Parliament during the third deliberation on the Statute to Reform the Criminal Law, the effect of which is to propose the precedence for a particular time "of the right to self-determination of the woman which flows from human dignity vis-a-vis all others, including the child's right to life" (German Federal Parliament, Seventh Election Period, 96th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 6492), is not reconcilable with the value ordering of the Basic Law.

3. From this point, the fundamental attitude of the legal order which is required by the constitution with regard to the interruption of pregnancy becomes clear: the legal order may not make the woman's right to self-determination the sole guideline of its rulemaking. The state must proceed, as a matter of principle, from a duty to carry the pregnancy to term and therefore to view, as a matter of principle, its interruption as an injustice. The condemnation of abortion must be clearly expressed in the legal order. The false impression must be avoided that the interruption of pregnancy is the same social process as, for example, approaching a physician for healing an illness or indeed a legally irrelevant alternative for the prevention of conception. The state may not abdicate its responsibility even through the recognition of a "legally free area," by which the state abstains from the value judgment and abandons this judgment to the decision of the individual to be made on the basis of his own sense of responsibility.

III.

How the state fulfils its obligation for an effective protection of developing life is, in the first instance, to be decided by the legislature. It determines which measures of protection are required and which serve the purpose of guaranteeing an effective protection of life.

1. In this connection the guiding principle of the precedence of prevention over repression is also valid particularly for the protection of unborn life (BVerfGE 30, 336 [350]). It is therefore the task of the state to employ, in the first instance, social, political, and welfare means for securing developing life. What can happen here and how the assistance measures are to be structured in their particulars is largely left to the legislature and is generally beyond judgment by the Constitutional Court. Moreover, the primary concern is to strengthen readiness of the expectant mother to accept the pregnancy as her own responsibility and to bring the child en ventre sa mere to full life. Regardless of how the state fulfils its obligation to protect, it should not be forgotten that the developing life itself is entrusted by nature in the first place to the protection of the mother. To reawaken and, if required, to strengthen the maternal duty to protect, where it is lost, should be the principal goal of the endeavours of the state for the protection of life. Of course, the possibilities for the legislature to influence are limited. Measures introduced by the legislature are frequently only indirect and effective only after completion of the time-consuming process of comprehensive education and the alteration in the attitudes and philosophies of society achieved thereby.

2. The question of the extent to which the state is obligated under the constitution to employ, even for the protection of unborn life, the criminal law, the sharpest weapon standing at its disposal, cannot be answered by the simplified posing of the question whether the state must punish certain acts. A total consideration is necessary which, on the one hand, takes into account the worth of the injured legal value and the extent of the social harm of the injurious act - in comparison with other acts which socio-ethically are perhaps similarly assessed and which are subject to punishment - and which, on the other hand, takes into account the traditional legal regulation of this area of life as well as the development of concepts of the role of the criminal law in modern society; and, finally, does not leave out of consideration the practical effectiveness of criminal sanctions and the possibility of their replacement through other legal sanctions. The legislature is not obligated, as a matter of principle, to employ the same penal measures for the protection of the unborn life as it considers required and expedient for born-life. As a look at legal history shows, this was never the case in the application of penal sanctions and is also true for the situation in the law up to the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law.

a) The task of criminal law from the beginning has been to protect the elementary values of community life. That the life of every individual human being is among the most important legal values has been established above. The interruption of pregnancy irrevocably destroys an existing human life. Abortion is an act of killing; this is most clearly shown by the fact that the relevant penal sanction, even in the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Laws, contained in the section "Felonies and Misdemeanors against Life" and, in the previous criminal law, was designated the "Killing of the Child en ventre sa mere." The description now common, "interruption of pregnancy," cannot camouflage this fact. No legal regulation can pass over the fact that this act offends against the fundamental inviolability and indisposability of human life protected by Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. From this point of view, the employment of penal law for the requital of "acts of abortion" is to be seen as legitimate without a doubt; it is valid law in most cultural states - under prerequisites of various kinds - and especially corresponds to the German legal tradition. Therefore, it follows that the law cannot dispense with clearly labelling this procedure as "unjust."

b) Punishment, however, can never be an end in itself. Its employment is in principle, subject to the decision of the legislature. The legislature is not prohibited, in consideration of the points of view set out above, from expressing the legal condemnation of abortion required by the Basic Law in ways other than the threat of punishment. The decisive factor is whether the totality of the measures serving the protection of the unborn life, whether they are in civil law or in public law, especially of a social-legal or of a penal nature, guarantees an actual protection corresponding to the importance of the legal value to be secured. In the extreme case, namely, if the protection required by the constitution can be achieved in no other way, the lawgiver can be obligated to employ the means of the penal law for the protection of developing life. The penal norm represents, to a certain extent, the "ultimate reason" in the armory of the legislature. According to the principle of proportionality, a principle of the just state, which prevails for the whole of the public law, including constitutional law, the legislature may make use of this means only cautiously and with restraint. However, this final means must also be employed, if an effective protection of life cannot be achieved in any other way. The worth and the importance of the legal value to be protected, demand this. It is not a question of an "absolute" duty to punish but rather one of a "relative" duty to use the penal sanction, which grows out of the insight into the inadequacy of all other means. On the other hand, the objection that a political duty to punish can never be deduced from a norm of the Basic Law which guarantees freedom, is not decisive. If the state is obligated by a fundamental norm which determines value to protect an especially important legal value effectively even against the attacks of third parties, measures will often be unavoidable which touch upon the areas of freedom of other bearers of fundamental rights. In this respect, the legal situation in the employment of social-legal or civil law means is not fundamentally different than the enactment of a penal norm. Differences exist, perhaps, with respect to the intensity of the required interference. In any case, the legislature must resolve the conflict which arises from this situation through a balancing of both of the fundamental values or areas of freedom which are in opposition to each other according to the standard of the ordering of values in the Basic Law and in consideration of the constitutional principle of proportionality. If one were to deny that there was any duty to employ the means of the criminal law, the protection of life which is to be guaranteed would be essentially restricted. The seriousness of the sanction threatened for the destruction is to correspond to the worth of the legal value threatened with destruction. The elementary value of human life requires criminal law punishment for its destruction.

3. The obligation of the state to protect the developing life exists, as shown, against the mother as well. Here, however, the employment of the criminal law may give rise to special problems which result from the unique situation of the pregnant woman. The incisive effects of a pregnancy on the physical and emotional condition of the woman are immediately evident and need not be set forth in greater detail. They often mean a considerable change of the total conduct of life and a limitation of the possibilities for personal development. This burden is not always and not completely balanced by a woman finding new fulfilment in her task as mother and by the claim a pregnant woman has upon the assistance of the community (Article 6.4 of the Basic Law). In individual cases, difficult, even life-threatening situations of conflict may arise. The right to life of the unborn can lead to a burdening of the woman which essentially goes beyond that normally associated with pregnancy. The result is the question of enforceability, or, in other words, the question of whether the state, even in such cases, may compel the bearing of the child to term with the means of the criminal law. Respect for the unborn life and the right of the woman not to be compelled to sacrifice the values in her own life in excess of an exactable measure in the interest of respecting this legal value are in conflict with each other. In such a situation of conflict which, in general, does not allow an unequivocal moral judgment and in which the decision for an interruption of pregnancy can attain the rank of a decision of conscience worthy of consideration, the legislature is obligated to exercise special restraint. If, in these cases, it views the conduct of the pregnant woman as not deserving punishment and forgoes the use of penal sanctions, the result, at any rate, is to be constitutionally accepted as a balancing incumbent upon the legislature.

In determining the content of the criterion of non-exactability, circumstances, however, must be excluded which do not seriously burden the obligated party, since they represent the normal situation with which everyone must cope. Rather, circumstances of considerable weight must be present which render the fulfilment of the duty of the one affected extraordinarily more difficult, so that fulfilment cannot be expected from him in fairness. These circumstances are especially present if the one affected by fulfilling the duty is thrown into serious inner conflicts. The solution of such conflicts by criminal penalty does not appear in general to be appropriate (BVerfGE 32, 98 [109] - Gesundbeter), since it applies external compulsion where respect for the sphere of personality of the human being demands full inner freedom of decision.

A continuation of the pregnancy appears to be non-exactable especially when it is proven that the interruption is required "to avert" from the pregnant woman "a danger for her life or the danger of a grave impairment of her condition of health" (s. 218b no. 1 of the Criminal Code in the version of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law). In this case her own "right to life and physical integrity" (Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law) is at stake, the sacrifice of which cannot be expected of her for the unborn life. Beyond that, the legislature has a free hand to leave the interruption of the pregnancy free of punishment in the case of other extraordinary burdens for the pregnant woman, which, from the point of view of non-exactability, are as weighty as those referred to in s. 218b no. 1. In this category can be counted, especially, the cases of the eugenic (cf. s. 218b no. 2 of the Criminal Code), ethical (criminological), and of the social or emergency indication for abortion which were contained in the draft proposed by the Federal Government in the sixth election period of the Federal Parliament and were discussed both in the public debate as well as in the course of the legislative proceedings. During the deliberations of the Special Committee for the Reform of the Criminal Law (Seventh Election Period, 25th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 1470 et seq.), the representative of the Federal Government explained in detail and with convincing reasons why, in these four cases of indication, the bearing of the child to term does not appear to be exactable. The decisive viewpoint is that in all of these cases another interest equally worthy of protection, from the standpoint of the constitution, asserts its validity with such urgency that the state's legal order cannot require that the pregnant woman must, under all circumstances, concede precedence to the right of the unborn. Also, the indication arising from general emergency (social indication) can be integrated here. Finally, the general social situation of the pregnant woman and her family can produce conflicts of such difficulty that, beyond a definite measure, a sacrifice by the pregnant woman in favour of the unborn life cannot be compelled with the means of the criminal law. In regulating this case, the legislature must so formulate the elements of the indication which is to remain free of punishment that the gravity of the social conflict presupposed will be clearly recognizable and, considered from the point of view of non-exactability, the congruence of this indication with the other cases of indication remains guaranteed. If the legislature removes genuine cases of conflict of this kind from the protection of the Criminal law, it does not violate its duty to protect life. Even in these cases the state may not be content merely to examine, and if the occasion arises, to certify that the statutory prerequisites for an abortion free of punishment are present. Rather, the state will also be expected to offer counselling and assistance with the goal of reminding pregnant women of the fundamental duty to respect the right to life of the unborn, to encourage her to continue the pregnancy and - especially in cases of social need - to support her through practical measures of assistance. In all other cases the interruption of pregnancy remains a wrong, deserving punishment since, in these cases, the destruction of a value of the law of the highest rank is subjected to the unrestricted pleasure of another and is not motivated by an emergency. If the legislature wants to dispense (even in this case) with criminal law punishment, this would be compatible with the requirement of protecting Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, only on the condition that another equally effective legal sanction stands at its command, which would clearly bring out the unjust character of the act (the condemnation by the legal order) and likewise prevent the interruption of pregnancy as effectively as a penal provision.

D.

If the challenged regulation of terms of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law is examined according to these standards, the result is that the statute does not do justice, to the extent required, to the obligation to protect developing life effectively which is derived from Article 2.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

I.

The constitutional requirement to protect developing life is directed in the first instance to the legislature. The duty is incumbent on the Federal Constitutional Court, however, to determine, in the exercise of the function allotted to it by the Basic Law, whether the legislature has fulfilled this requirement. Indeed, the Court must carefully observe the discretion of the legislature which belongs to it in evaluating the factual conditions which lie at the basis of its formation of norms, which discretion is fitting for the required prognosis and choice of means. The court may not put itself in the place of the legislature; it is, however, its task to examine carefully whether the legislature, in the framework of the possibilities standing at its disposal, has done what is necessary to avert dangers from the legal value to be protected. This is also fundamentally true for the question whether the legislature is obligated to utilize its sharpest means, the criminal law, in which case the examination can extend beyond the individual modalities of punishment.

II.

It is generally recognized that the previous s. 218 of the Criminal Code, precisely because it threatened punishment without distinction for nearly all cases of the interruption of pregnancy, has, as a result, only insufficiently protected developing life. The insight that there are cases in which the penal sanction is not appropriate has finally led to the point that cases actually deserving of punishment are no longer prosecuted with the necessary vigor. In addition, with respect to this offence, there is, in the nature of the case, the frequently difficult clarification of the factual situation. Certainly, the statistics on the incidence of illegal abortion differ greatly and it may hardly be possible to ascertain reliable data on this point through empirical investigations. In any case, the number of the illegal interruptions of pregnancy in the Federal Republic was high. The existence of a general penal norm may have contributed to that, since the state had neglected to employ other adequate measures for the protection of developing life. The legislature, in the final version of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law, proceeded from the guiding consideration of the primacy of preventive measures over repressive sanctions, in this regard, the motions of the factions of the SPD and FDP for resolution which were accepted by the Federal Parliament in connection with the enactment of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law Federal Parliamentary Press, 7/2042). The statute is based upon the idea that developing life would be better protected through individual counselling of the pregnant woman than through a threat of punishment, which would remove the one determined upon the abortion from every possible means of influence, which from a criminological point of view would be mistaken and, in addition, has proven itself without effect. On this basis the legislature has reached the decision to abandon the criminal penalty entirely for the first twelve weeks of pregnancy under definite prerequisites and, in its place, to introduce the preventive counselling and instruction (ss. 218a and 218c). It is constitutionally permissible and to be approved if the legislature attempts to fulfil its duty to improve protection of unborn life through preventive measures, including counselling to strengthen the personal responsibility of the woman. The regulation in question, however, encounters decisive constitutional problems in several respects:

1. The legal condemnation of the interruption of pregnancy required by the constitution must clearly appear in the legal order existing under the constitution. Therefore, as shown, only those cases can be excepted in which the continuation of the pregnancy is not exactable from the woman in consideration of the value decision made in Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. This absolute condemnation is not expressed in the provisions of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law with regard to the interruption of pregnancy during the first twelve weeks because the statute leaves unclear whether an interruption of pregnancy which is not "indicated" is legal or illegal after the repeal of the criminal penalty through s. 218a of the Criminal Code. This is true without reference to the fact that s. 218a of the Criminal Code presents itself technically as the creation of an exception to the general penal provision of s. 218 of the Criminal Code. It is also true, independent of the view one should take in this question whether the provision factually restricts s. 218 of the Criminal Code or whether it creates a legally justifying reason or finally has as its content only a basis for excluding guilt or punishment. With the unbiased reader of the statute the impression must arise that s. 218a completely removes, through the absolute repeal of punishability, the legal condemnation - without consideration of the reasons - and legally allows the interruption of pregnancy under the prerequisites listed therein. The elements of s. 218 of the Criminal Code recede into the background since by far most interruptions of pregnancy, experience shows, are performed in the first twelve weeks - over nine out of ten cases according to the statements of the representative of the government (bc. cit., p. 1472). The picture which results is of a nearly complete decriminalization of the interruption of pregnancy (see also Roxin in: J. Baumann, editor, "The Proscription of Abortion, L s. 218, p. 185). Also in no other provision of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law is the notion expressed that the interruption of pregnancy which is not indicated in the first twelve weeks will be legally condemned for the future. Even Article 2 of the statute, according to which no one in principle is obligated to participate in an interruption of pregnancy, mentions nothing about the legality or illegality of such a measure; this provision aims in the first place at making allowance for the freedom of conscience of the individual and at protecting the freedom of the ethical conviction of one who sees himself faced with the question whether he can and should actively participate in an interruption of pregnancy which is free of punishment in conformity with s. 218a of the Criminal Code. A look at the proposed regulations in the Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform for the area of social law further compels the conclusion that in the case of an interruption of pregnancy in the first twelve weeks, a procedure is involved which is apparently legally unobjectionable and which therefore should be socio-legally promoted and facilitated. Legal claims under statutes for social services presuppose that the elements, upon the fulfilment of which the services are guaranteed, do not represent a legally-prohibited (condemned) act. The proposed regulation, as a whole, can therefore only be interpreted to mean that an interruption of pregnancy performed by a physician in the first twelve weeks of pregnancy is not illegal and therefore should be allowed (under law). The Federal Government also proposed this concept in the statutory bill introduced in the sixth election period of the German Federal Parliament; there, in the commentary to Article 1, one reads as follows (Federal Parliamentary Press, VI/3434, p. 9): Although the legislature may trust in other areas that a repeal of penal prohibitions will not be understood as legal approbation of the behaviour previously punishable, special points are to be considered in the new regulation of the interruption of pregnancy: the term solution can only fulfil the public health task expected of it, if every interruption of pregnancy during the first three months appears as legally approved. The operation must be performed within the framework of general medical care. The contract for medical treatment must be effective. Not least, because of the inapplicability of ss. 134-138 of the Civil Code, these and other circumstances can only be interpreted in the sense that the legal order recognizes the operation, before the expiration of the three month period, in every case as a normal social process. The representative of the Government expressed himself similarly before the Special Committee for Criminal Law Reform (Seventh Election Period, 25th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 1473): It is important to keep this much in mind: medical interruption of pregnancy during the first trimester of pregnancy is, within the framework of the regulation of terms, not contrary to law; it is permitted. Only in this way can its integration into the system of the penal law - with freedom from punishment even for the participants (exception of emergency service) - be justified and only in such a way can the civil law implications - the validity of the contract for treatment in spite of s. 134 -, the promotion of the procedure through public health measures and, above all else, the social insurance planned in the Statute to Supplement the Criminal Law Reform, be established.

2. A formal statutory condemnation of the interruption of pregnancy would, furthermore, not suffice because a woman determined upon abortion, would disregard it. The legislature which passed the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law has replaced the penal norm with a counselling system in s. 218c of the Criminal Code on the judgment that positive measures to protect developing life are also required for an interruption of pregnancy performed by a physician with the consent of the pregnant woman. Through the complete repeal of punishability, however, a gap in the protection has resulted which completely destroys the security of the developing life in a not insignificant number of cases by handing this life over to the completely unrestricted power of disposition of the woman. There are many women who have previously decided upon an interruption of pregnancy without having a reason which is worthy of esteem within the value order of the constitution and who are not accessible to a counselling such as s. 218c.1, proposes. These women find themselves neither in material distress nor in a grave situation of emotional conflict. They decline pregnancy because they are not willing to take on the renunciation and the natural motherly duties bound up with it. They have serious reasons for their conduct with respect to the developing life; there are, however, no reasons which can endure against the command to protect human life. For these women, pregnancy is exactable in line with the principles reiterated above. The behaviour even of this group of women, legitimatized by law through the absence of a constitutionally important motive for the interruption of pregnancy, is fully covered under s. 218a of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law. The life developing itself is abandoned without protection to their arbitrary decision. The objection against this is that women not subject to influence understand best from experience how to avoid punishment so that the penal sanction is often ineffective. Furthermore, the legislature is confronted with the dilemma that preventive counselling and repressive threat of punishment in their life protecting effect are necessarily partially exclusive: the penal sanction of the indication solution would, in truth, through its deterrent effect prevent unmotivated interruptions of pregnancy to an extent not exactly ascertainable. At the same time, according to this objection, the threat of punishment, by discouraging counselling of women susceptible of influence, impedes saving life in other cases because it is precisely women, in whose cases the prerequisites of an indication are absent and, beyond that, also those who do not trust the result of a procedure to determine an indication who will, in the face of the penal threat, carefully keep the pregnancy secret and who to a large extent withdraw themselves from helpful influence available through counselling centres and surroundings. On the basis of such an analysis, there could not be a defence of unborn life which was free of gaps. The legislature, so this objection continues, would have no other choice than to weigh off life against life, namely the life which through a definite regulation of the abortion question could probably be saved against the life which would probably be sacrificed on account of the same regulation, since the penal sanction would not only protect but at the same time destroy unborn life. Thus, since no solution would unequivocally better serve the protection of the individual life, the legislature would not have transgressed its constitutionally drawn boundaries with the regulation of terms.

a) To begin with, this concept does not do justice to the essence and the function of the penal law. The penal norm directs itself fundamentally to all subjects of the law and obligates them in like manner. It is true that public prosecutors practically never succeed in administering punishment to all those who have broken the criminal law. The unknown incidence is variously high for the various offences. It is uncontested that the unknown incidence of acts of abortion is especially high. On the other hand, the general preventive function of the criminal law ought not be forgotten. If one views as the task of the criminal law the protection of especially important legal values and elementary values of the community, a great importance accrues to its function. Just as important as the observable reaction in an individual case is the long range effect of a penal norm which in its principal normative content ("abortion is punishable") has existed for a very long time. No doubt, the mere existence of such a penal sanction has influence on the conceptions of value and the manner of behaviour of the populace (cf. the report of the Special Committee for the Criminal Law Reform, Federal Parliamentary Press, 7/1981 new p. 10). The consciousness of legal consequences which follows from its transgression creates a threshold which many recoil from crossing. An opposite effect will result if, through a general repeal of punishability, even doubtlessly punishable behaviour is declared to be legally free from objection. This must confuse the concepts of "right" and "wrong," dominant in the populace. The purely theoretical announcement that the interruption of pregnancy is "tolerated," but not "approved," must remain without effect as long as no legal sanction is recognizable which clearly segregates the justified cases of abortion from the reprehensible. If the threat of punishment disappears in its entirety, the impression will arise of necessity in the consciousness of the citizens of the state that in all cases the interruption of pregnancy is legally allowed and, therefore, even from a socio-ethical point of view, is no longer to be condemned. The "dangerous inference of moral permissibility from a legal absence of sanction" (Engisch, "In the Quest for Justice", 1971, p. 104) is too near not to be drawn by a large number of those subject to the law. Also corresponding to this is the view of the Federal Government in the commentary to the draft of the statute introduced in the sixth election period of the German Federal Parliament (Federal Parliamentary Press, VI/3434, p. 9): The term solution would lead to the disappearance of the general awareness of the worthiness of protection of unborn life during the first three months of pregnancy. It would lend support to the view that the interruption of pregnancy, in any case in the early stage of pregnancy, is as subject to the unrestricted right of disposition of the pregnant woman as the prevention of pregnancy. Such a view is not compatible with the constitutional classification of values.

b) The weighing in bulk of life against life which leads to the allowance of the destruction of a supposedly smaller number in the interest of the preservation of an allegedly larger number is not reconcilable with the obligation of an individual protection of each single concrete life. In the judicial opinions of the Federal Constitutional Court the principle has been developed that the unconstitutionality of a statutory provision, which in its structure and actual effect prejudices a definite circle of persons, may not be refuted with the showing that this provision or other regulations of the statute favour another circle of persons. The emphasis of the general tendency of the statute as a whole to favour legal protection is even less adequate for this purpose. This principle (cf. BVerfGE 12, 151 [168]; 15, 328 [333]; 18, 97 [108]; 32, 260 [269]) is valid in special measure for the highest personal legal value, "life." The protection of the individual life may not be abandoned for the reason that a goal of saving other lives, in itself worthy of respect, is pursued. Every human life - the life first developing itself as well - is as such equally valuable and can not therefore be subjected to a discriminatory evaluation, no matter how shaded, or indeed to a balancing on the basis of statistics. In the basic legal political conception of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law a concept, which cannot be followed, of the function of a constitutional statute is recognizable. The legal protection for the concrete individual human life required by the constitution is pushed into the background in favour of a more "socio-technical" use of the statute as an intended action of the legislature for the achievement of a definitely desired socio-political goal, the "containing of the abortion epidemic." The legislature may, however, not merely have a goal in view, be it ever so worthy of pursuit; it must be aware that every step on the way to the goal must be justified before the constitution and its indispensable postulates. The fundamental legal protection in individual cases may not be sacrificed to the efficiency of the regulation as a whole. The statute is not only an instrument to steer social processes according to sociological judgments and prognoses but is also the enduring expression of socio-ethical - and as a consequence - legal evaluation of human acts; it should say what is right and wrong for the individual.

c) A dependable factual foundation is lacking for "a total accounting" - which is to be rejected on principle. A sufficient basis is lacking for the conclusion that the number of interruptions of pregnancy in the future will be significantly less than with the previous statutory regulation. Rather, the representative of the government has come to the conclusion before the Special Committee for Criminal Law Reform (Seventh Election Period, 25th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 1451), on the basis of detailed considerations and comparisons, that after the introduction of the regulation of terms into the Federal Republic a 40% increase of the total number of legal and illegal abortions should be expected. This calculation, to be sure, was brought into doubt by Professor Dr. Jürgens, who was heard in the oral proceedings. The available statistics from other countries, however, especially from England after the Abortion Act of 1967 went into effect (cf. the statement in the report of the Committee on the Working of the Abortion Act - Lane Report) and from the German Democratic Republic (East Germany) after the decreeing of the statute on the interruption of pregnancy of March 9, 1972 (cf. Journal of German Physicians, 1974, p. 2765), allow no certain conclusion that there will be a substantial decline in abortions. Experiments, however, are not permissible considering the great worth of the legal value to be protected. The representatives of all parties in the Special Committee for the Reform of the Criminal Law, however, declined systematically to apply statistics regarding abortion from other countries to the Federal German Republic (Seventh Election Period, 20th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 1286 et seq.). The effects of varying social structures, mentalities, religious affiliations and modes of behaviour hardly permit such calculations. Even if one takes into account all of the peculiarities of the relationships in the Federal Republic of Germany only in favour of the regulation of terms, an increase in abortions is to be counted on because - as shown - the mere existence of the penal norm of s. 218 of the Criminal Code has exerted influence on the value conceptions and manner of behaviour of the populace. It is important that as a consequence of punishability the opportunity to obtain an abortion generally or indeed lege artis has up to this time been considerably limited (for, among other things, financial reasons). That even a mere quantitive strengthening of the protection for life could result from the term solution, is, in any case, not evident.

3. The counselling and instruction of the pregnant woman provided under s. 218c.1 of the Criminal Code cannot, considered by itself, be viewed as suitable to effectuate a of the pregnancy. The measures proposed in this provision fall short of the concepts of the Alternative Draft of the 16 criminal law scholars, upon which the conception of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law is, after all, largely based. The counselling centres provided for in Article 105.1 no. 2, of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law should themselves have the means to afford financial, social, and family assistance. Furthermore, they should provide to the pregnant woman and her relatives, emotional care through suitable co-workers and work intensively for the continuation of the pregnancy (cf. for particulars, above, p. 11 et seq.). So to equip the counselling centres, in the sense of this or similar suggestions, so that they are able to arrange direct assistance, would come much nearer the mark, since according to the report of the Special Committee for the Reform of the Criminal Law (Printed Materials of the Federal Parliament, 7/1981, new, p. 7, with evidentiary support from the hearings) the unfavourable living situation, the impossibility of caring for a child while pursuing an education or working as well as economic need and special material reasons, and, especially in the case of single mothers, anxiety about social sanctions are supposed to be among the most frequently given causes and motives for the desire for the interruption of pregnancy. On the other hand, the counselling centres will give instruction about "the public and private assistance available for pregnant women, mothers, and children," "especially regarding assistance which facilitates the continuation of the pregnancy and alleviates the situation of mother and child." This could be interpreted to mean that the counselling centres should only inform, without exerting influence directed to the motivational process. Whether the neutral description of the task of the counselling centres may be attributed to the opinion advocated in the Special Committee for the Reform of the Criminal Law that the pregnant woman should not be influenced in her decision through the counselling (Representative von Schiler, FDP, Seventh Election Period, 25th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 1473) can remain an open question. If a protective effect in favour of developing life is to accrue to the counselling, it will depend, in any case, decisively upon such an exertion of influence. s. 218c.1, Nos. i and 2, to be sure, allow the interpretation that counselling and instruction should motivate the pregnant woman to carry the pregnancy to term. The report of the Special Committee is probably to be understood in this sense (Printed Materials of the Federal Parliament, 7/1981 new, p. 16); accordingly, the counselling should take into account the total circumstances of life of the pregnant woman and follow up personally and individually, not by telephone or by distributing printed materials (cf. also the previously mentioned resolution of the Federal Parliament, Printed Materials of the Federal Parliament, 7/2042). Even if one might consider it thinkable that counselling of this kind could exercise a definite effect in the sense of an aversion from the decision for abortion, its structure, in particular, exhibits in any case deficiencies which do not allow the expectation of an effective protection of developing life.

a) The instruction about the public and private assistance available for pregnant women, mothers and children, according to s. 218c.1 no. 1, can also be undertaken by any physician. Social law and social reality are, however, very difficult for the technically-trained person to comprehend. A reliable instruction regarding the demands and possibilities in the individual case cannot be expected from a physician, especially since individual inquiries regarding need are frequently required (e.g., for assistance with rent or social assistance). Physicians are neither qualified for such counselling activity by their professional training nor do they generally have the time required for individual counselling.

b) It is especially questionable that the instruction about social assistance can be undertaken by the same physician who will perform the interruption of pregnancy. Through this provision the medical counselling under s. 218c.1 no. 2, which itself falls within the realm of medical competence will be devalued. The counselling should be structured in conformity with the views of the Special Committee for the Reform of the Criminal Law as follows: Therefore, what is meant is counselling regarding the nature of the operation and its possible consequences for health. That the counselling may however not be limited to this purely medical aspect is emphasized through the conscious choice of the term by a physician. Rather the counselling as far as possible and appropriate must speak to the present and future total situation of the pregnant woman to the extent that she can be affected by the interruption of pregnancy and, at the same time, correspond to the other task of the physician, which is to work for the protection of the unborn life. The physician must, therefore, make it clear to the pregnant woman that human life is destroyed by the operation and explain its stage of development. Experience shows, as confirmed in the public hearing, for example, by Pross (AP, VI, p. 2255, 2256) and Rolinski (AP, VI, p. 2221) that in this respect many women do not have clear ideas and that this circumstance, if they later learn it, is frequently the occasion for burdening doubts and questionings of conscience. Accordingly, the counselling must be directed to preventing this kind of conflict situation. An explanation, in the manner proposed here, which has the required constitutional goal of working for a continuation of the pregnancy cannot be expected from the physician who has been sought out by the pregnant woman precisely for the purpose of performing the interruption of pregnancy. Since, according to the result of the previous inquiries and according to the position statements of representative medical professional panels, it must be assumed that the majority of physicians decline to perform interruptions of pregnancy which are not indicated, only those physicians will make themselves available who either see in the interruption of pregnancy a money-making business or who are inclined to comply with every wish of a woman for interruption of pregnancy because they see in it merely a manifestation of the right to self-determination or a means to the emancipation of women. In both cases, an influence by the physician on the pregnant woman for the continuation of the pregnancy is highly improbable. The experiences in England show this. There the indication (very broadly conceived) must be determined by any two physicians of the patient's choosing. This has led to the result that almost every desired abortion is carried out by private physicians specializing in such activity. The appearance of professional agents who guide women to these private clinics is an especially unfortunate by-product which is very difficult to avoid (cf. Lane Report, Vol. 1, No. 436 and 452).

c) Furthermore, the prospects for success are poor since the interruption of pregnancy can immediately follow the instruction and counselling. A serious exchange with the pregnant woman and others involved in which the arguments in the counselling are contrasted with hers is not to be expected under these circumstances. The alternative formulation proposed by the Federal Ministry of Justice to the Special Committee for Criminal Law Reform for s. 218c provided as a consequence that the interruption of pregnancy could first be performed after a minimum of three days had elapsed after the instruction about available assistance (s. 218.1 no. 1) (Special Committee, Seventh Election Period, 30th Session, Stenographic Reports, p. 1659). In conformity with a report of the Special Committee, however, "a waiting period, enforced by the criminal law, between the counselling and the operation ... was rejected. This could in individual cases bring with it unreasonable difficulties for the pregnant woman according to her place of residence and her personal situation, with the consequence that the pregnant woman will dispense with the counselling." (Printed Materials of Federal Parliament, 7/1981 new, p. 17). For the woman decided upon an interruption of pregnancy it is only necessary to find an obliging physician. Since he may undertake the social as well as the medical counselling and finally even carry out the operation, a serious attempt to dissuade the pregnant woman from her decision is not to be expected from him.

III.

In summary, the following observations should be made on the constitutional adjudication of the regulation of terms encountered in the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law:

That interruptions of pregnancy are neither legally condemned nor subject to punishment is not compatible with the duty incumbent upon the legislature to protect life, if the interruptions are the result of reasons which are not recognized in the value order of the Basic Law. Indeed, the limiting of punishability would not be constitutionally objectionable if it were combined with other measures which would be able to compensate, at least in their effect, for the disappearance of criminal protection. That is however - as shown - obviously not the case. The parliamentary discussions about the reform of the Abortion Law have indeed deepened the insight that it is the principal task of the state to prevent the killing of unborn life through enlightenment about the prevention of pregnancy on the one hand as well as through effective promotional measures in society and through a general alteration of social concepts on the other. Neither the assistance of the kind presently offered and guaranteed nor the counselling provided in the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law are, however, able to replace the individual protection of life which a penal norm fundamentally provides even today in those cases in which no reason for the interruption of pregnancy exists which is worthy of consideration according to the value order of the Basic Law. If the legislature regards the previously undifferentiated threat of punishment for the interruption of pregnancy as a questionable means for the protection of life, it is not thereby released from the obligation to undertake the attempt to achieve a better protection of life through a differentiated penal regulation by subjecting the same cases to punishment in which the interruption of pregnancy is to be condemned on constitutional grounds. A clear distinction of this group of cases in contrast to other cases in which the continuation of the pregnancy is not exactable from the woman will strengthen the power of the penal norm to develop a legal awareness. He who generally recognizes the precedence of the protection of life over the claim of the woman for an unrestricted structuring of her life will not be able to dispute the unjust nature of the act in those cases not covered by a particular indication. If the state not only declares that these cases are punishable but also prosecutes and punishes them in legal practice, this will be perceived in the legal consciousness of the community neither as unjust nor as antisocial. The passionate discussion of the abortion problematic may provide occasion for the fear that in a segment of the population the value of unborn life is no longer fully recognized. This, however, does not give the legislature a right to acquiesce. It rather must make a sincere effort through a differentiation of the penal sanction to achieve a more effective protection of life and formulate a regulation which will be supported by the general legal consciousness.

IV.

The regulation encountered in the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law at times is defended with the argument that in other democratic countries of the Western World in recent times the penal provisions regulating the interruption of pregnancy have been "liberalized" or "modernized" in a similar or an even more extensive fashion; this would be, as the argument goes, an indication that the new regulation corresponds, in any case, to the general development of theories in this area and is not inconsistent with fundamental socio-ethical and legal principles. These considerations cannot influence the decision to be made here. Disregarding the fact that all of these foreign laws in their respective countries are sharply controverted, the legal standards which are applicable there for the acts of the legislature are essentially different from those of the Federal Republic of Germany. Underlying the Basic Law are principles for the structuring of the state that may be understood only in light of the historical experience and the spiritual-moral confrontation with the previous system of National Socialism. In opposition to the omnipotence of the totalitarian state which claimed for itself limitless dominion over all areas of social life and which, in the prosecution of its goals of state, consideration for the life of the individual fundamentally meant nothing, the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany has erected an order bound together by values which places the individual human being and his dignity at the focal point of all of its ordinances. At its basis lies the concept, as the Federal Constitutional Court previously pronounced (BVerfGE 2, 1 [12]), that human beings possess an inherent worth as individuals in order of creation which uncompromisingly demands unconditional respect for the life of every individual human being, even for the apparently socially "worthless," and which therefore excludes the destruction of such life without legally justifiable grounds. This fundamental constitutional decision determines the structure and the interpretation of the entire legal order. Even the legislature is bound by it; considerations of socio-political expediency, even necessities of state, cannot overcome this constitutional limitation (Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, 1, 14 36). Even a general change of the viewpoints dominant in the populace on this subject - if such a change could be established at all - would change nothing. The Federal Constitutional Court which is charged by the constitution with overseeing the observance of its fundamental principles by all organs of the state and, if necessary, with giving them effect, can orient its decisions only on those principles to the development of which this Court has decisively contributed in its judicial utterances. Therefore, no adverse judgment is being passed about other legal orders "which have not had these experiences with a system of injustice and which, on the basis of an historical development which has taken a different course and other political conditions and fundamental views of the philosophy of state, have not made such a decision for themselves" (BVerfGE 18, 112 [117]).

E.

On the basis of these considerations, s. 218a of the Criminal Code in the version of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law is inconsistent with Article 2.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to the extent that it excepts interruption of pregnancy from punishability if no reasons are present which, according to the present opinion, have standing under the ordering of values of the Basic Law. Within this framework, the nullity of the provision is to be determined. It is a matter for the legislature to distinguish in greater detail the cases of indicated interruption of pregnancy from those not indicated. In the interest of legal clarity, until a valid statutory regulation goes into effect, it appeared necessary, under s. 35 of the Statute for the Federal Constitutional Court, to issue a directive, the contents of which are obvious from the tenor of this judgment.

There is no occasion to declare further provisions of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law to be invalid.

Extracts from the Dissenting Opinion of Justice Rupp von Brunneck and Justice Dr. Simon

The life of each individual human being is self-evidently a central value of the legal order. It is uncontested that the constitutional duty to protect this life also includes its preliminary stages before birth. The debates in Parliament and before the Federal Constitutional Court dealt not with the "whether" but rather only the "how" of this protection. This decision is a matter of legislative responsibility. Under no circumstances can the duty of the state to prescribe punishment for abortion in every stage of pregnancy be derived from the constitution. The legislature should be able to determine the regulations for counselling and the term solution as well as for the indications solution. A contrary construction of the constitution is not compatible with the liberal character of the fundamental legal norms and shifts the competence to decide, to a material extent, onto the Federal Constitutional Court (A). In the judgment on the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law, the majority neglects the uniqueness of abortion in relation to other risks of life (B.I.1. = p. 671 et seq.). It insufficiently appreciates the social problematic previously found by the legislature as well as the aims of urgent reform (B.I.2. p. 673 et seq.). Because each solution remains patchwork, it is not constitutionally objectionable that the German legislature - in consonance with the reforms in other western civilized states (B.III. = p. 683 et seq.) - has given priority to social-political measures over largely ineffective penal sanctions (B.I.3.-5. - p. 675 et seq.). The constitution nowhere requires a legal "condemnation" of behaviour not morally respectable without consideration of its actual protective effect (B.II. = p. 681 et seq.).

b) Translation of the Abortion II Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 88, 203

Headnotes:

1. The Basic Law imposes a duty on the state to protect human life, even the unborn human life. This duty flows from Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. Its content and - based on this - its extent are further determined by Article 2.2 of the Basic Law. Human dignity inheres already in the unborn human life. The state law has to set the stage for its development, respectively for a right to life for the unborn. This right exists without regard of the mother's acceptance of the unborn child.

2. The duty to protect the unborn human life relates to the individual life, not only to human life in general.

3. There is a duty to protect the unborn life, against its mother as well. Such a protection is only possible if the legislator generally bans her from an interruption of pregnancy, therewith imposing an "in principle" statutory duty on her to carry the child to term. The general ban from interruption of pregnancy and the "in principle" duty to carry the child to term are two intrinsically tied aspects of the protection required under constitutional law.

4. There must be an "in principle" ban from the interruption of pregnancy for its entire duration because it must be regarded as in principle legally wrong (Confirmation of BVerfGE 39, 1 [44]). The right to life of the unborn child must not, although just for a limited period of time, be given over to the legally unbound decision of a third party, even if it is the mother.

5. The extent of the duty to protect the unborn human life is to be determined with regard to the importance and vulnerability of the object of legal protection on the one hand and conflicting legal interests on the other hand. As conflicting legal interest regarding the right to life of the unborn child there is to consider the pregnant woman's right to life and to physical integrity (Article 2.2 of the Basic Law) as well as her right to personality. All these rights of the pregnant woman are based on her right to human dignity. But for the killing of the unborn child that goes along with the interruption of pregnancy, the pregnant woman cannot rely on a legal position under Article 4.1 of the Basic Law.

6. To comply with its duty to protect the unborn life, the state has to take sufficient normative and de facto action leading to an adequate and efficient protection while considering conflicting legal interests (prohibition of insufficient means). Therefore a concept of protection is required combining pre-emptive and repressive elements of protection.

7. The woman's basic rights do not justify to generally suspend her duty to carry the child to term, even if it is just for a certain period of time. But the woman's basic rights lead to the effect that under certain exceptional circumstances it might be permissible or in some cases even required, not to impose such a statutory duty. It is up to the legislator to determine these exceptional cases with full details, according to the criterion of unreasonableness. Therefore there must be given burdens, that require such an extent of sacrifice, that the woman cannot be expected to accept them (Confirmation of BVerfGE 39, 1 [48 seq.]).

8. The prohibition of insufficient means does not allow for abstaining from the means of criminal law and its protective effects for human life.

9. The state's duty to protect also includes the protection from threats for the unborn human life, emanating from influences exerted by members of the pregnant woman's family or of her social environment. It also includes the protection from threats emanating from the present and foreseeable living conditions of the woman and her family, countervailing her willingness to carry the child to term.

10. Furthermore the duty to protect obliges the state to maintain and to foster the public awareness of the unborn human life's right to be protected.

11. The legislature may express the legal condemnation of the interruption of pregnancy required by the Basic Law through measures other than the threat of punishment, depending on whether there is a medical indication, which has to be determined by a third party. Constitutional law allows for a concept of protection that in the early stages of an unwanted pregnancy focuses on a counselling programme for the pregnant woman to make her carry the child to term.

12. Such a counselling programme requires a regulatory framework that provides for beneficial premises, encouraging the woman to act for the benefit of the unborn life. The state bears the full responsibility for its implementation.

13. The state's duty to protect requires the medical attendance to secure the protection of the unborn life although the necessary medical attendance is primarily arranged for in the woman's interest.

14. To legally classify the existence of a child as a cause of damage is out of the question under constitutional law (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law - GG). This implication not to take the obligation to support a child as damage.

15. Interruptions of pregnancy that are executed according to the counselling programme, without diagnosis of an indication, may not be declared as being justified (not contrary to law). As an indispensable legal requirement an exception from a legal provision can only have inherent justifying effects, if the state determines the incident of its preconditions.

16. The Basic Law does not allow for granting a legal claim to payment against the compulsory health insurance for an interruption of pregnancy that is not proved to be legal. In contrast the granting of social aid for abortions that are not punishable and that are executed according to the counselling programme is in accordance to constitutional law where there is a need for pecuniary help. This is also true for continued payment.

17. The principle that the federal states have the power to organize the implementation of Federal laws has to apply without exemptions if a regulation of Federal law only provides for a state's task that is to perform by the federal states without making detailed arrangements that could be executed by the administration.

Order of the Second Senate of 28 May 1993 - 2 BvF 2/90 and 4, 5/92 -

Facts:

The matter submitted for judicial review is primarily the question whether several different criminal, social-insurance related and organizational regulations concerning the interruption of pregnancy comply with the state's duty under constitutional law to protect the unborn human life. The provisions are either part of the new regulations in the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law and in the Statute supplementing the Reform of the Criminal Law or part of the statute for the benefit of pregnant women and family benefits that was passed for reunified Germany just after the reunion. The new regulations in the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law and in the Statute supplementing the reform of the Criminal Law were initiated by the Federal Constitutional Court's judgment of 25th February 1975 (BVerfGE 39, 1).

According to the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law of 18th May 1976 anyone who interrupts a pregnancy after the 13th day following conception shall be punished (s. 218.1, 3 sentence 1, s. 219d of the Criminal Code, old version).

But within a fixed time limit the interruption of pregnancy is not punishable if it is performed by a physician with the consent of the pregnant woman and if, according to the judgment of medical science, the interruption is indicated to avoid specific extra legal emergencies for the pregnant woman (medical indications for the interruption of pregnancy).

Furthermore, although the interruption of pregnancy is not indicated, the pregnant woman is not punishable if a physician performs the abortion within 22 weeks after conception and after undergoing counselling in terms of s. 218b of the Criminal Code (StGB), old version (s. 218.3 sentence 2 of the Criminal Code, old version).

If these conditions are not fulfilled, however, the court may abandon the woman's penalty provided she was in a specific trouble at the time of the surgical intervention (s. 218.3 sentence 3 of the Criminal Code, old version).

If so, only the consulted physician will be punished. To the physician, however, stricter rules apply: A physician who interrupts a pregnancy shall be punished if he or she performs the abortion without making sure that the pregnant woman has received social and medical counselling at a counselling centre and by a physician, at least 3 days before the abortion. He or she is also punishable for interruption of pregnancy without counselling, if there is a medical indication for the abortion. Furthermore, even if there is a medical indication, anyone is punishable for interruption of pregnancy if the indication is not confirmed in writing by a second physician (s. 219 of the Criminal Code, old version).

Social and medical counselling may also be done by the physician who speaks out on the indication; the medical counselling may also be done by the physician performing the abortion. The pregnant woman is not punishable under ss. 218b, 219 of the Criminal Code, old version.

The Statute supplementing the Reform of the Criminal Law of 28th August 1975 (BGBl. I p. 2289) aims to support the reform efforts of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Criminal Law by accompanying socio-political measures (see BTDrucks. 7/376 p. 1). It is following an initiative of the social democratic faction and the liberal faction (BTDrucks. 7/376), resuming a government draft of 1972 (BTDrucks. 104/72). The draft i.a. provides for financial compensation from the compulsory health insurance in case of an interruption of pregnancy, if it is performed by a physician.

(The explanations given in paragraph I. list the core statements of the Abortion I decision (BVerfGE 39, 1). For details it is referred to this decision, see p. 185-188.

II.

After all, the legislature may express the legal condemnation of the interruption of pregnancy required by the Basic Law through measures other than the threat of punishment, depending on whether there is a medical indication, which has to be determined by a third party. Constitutional law allows for descending to a concept of protection that, in the early stages of pregnancy in case that unwanted, focuses on consulting service for the pregnant woman to make her carry the child to term.

The legislator's change in protection concept regarding the statute for the benefit of pregnant women and family benefits was tenable.

4. To pay tribute to a pregnant woman, the state is allowed to try to convince her of not abdicating from her responsibility towards the child other than by threat of punishment. The state is allowed to rather, use the means of individual counselling, appealing to her responsibility towards the unborn child, financial and social support, including providing the information needed.

The legislator may assume that it is rather prejudicial to achieving this aim, if a third party is asked to evaluate the woman's motivation for regarding the birth giving as being unacceptable.

5. If the legislator leaves the final decision on whether an interruption of pregnancy should be performed to the women who undergo the counselling and if the legislator provides for the possibility of medical attendance, should the situation arise, he may arguably demand of the pregnant woman to undergo the counselling and to reveal her motivations.

III.

If the legislator, in compliance with his duty to protect, changes his protection concept to a counselling programme, protection for the unborn human life primarily results from pre-emptive measures, i.e. counselling with the objective to convince the pregnant woman to carry the pregnancy to term.

The counselling concept aims at strengthening the woman's sense of responsibility. This is because in the end it is the woman who decides on whether the interruption of pregnancy will be performed and therefore she is the primarily responsible person, although her family and her social environment as well as her physician bear a certain responsibility, too (ultimate responsibility). Therefore, some basic conditions have to be fulfilled, in order to encourage the woman to decide in favour of the unborn life.

If there is no medical indication, which is required for an interruption of pregnancy, it is only on these conditions that the consulting programme can be considered to protect the unborn life (1.). But it is not acceptable to declare interruptions of pregnancy that are not medically indicated to be justifiable (not contrary to law), if they were performed by a physician on demand of the pregnant woman, after counselling and within the first twelve weeks of pregnancy (2.). However, the legislator is not obliged to follow the general prohibition of interruption of pregnancy without exception. If the counselling programme's effectiveness requires so, he may exclude certain circumstances (3.).

2. The implementation of the counselling concept aims at making sure that a woman does not face legal sanctions if she, after undergoing mandatory counselling, asks for an interruption of pregnancy and if this interruption is performed by a physician within the first twelve weeks of pregnancy, even if there is no medical indication. This statutory effect can only occur, if the legislator excludes those cases from the elements of crime under s. 218 of the Criminal Code; they may not be declared to be justified (not illegal).

a) If the constitution only allows for an interruption of pregnancy under specific exceptional circumstances, criminal law cannot provide a wider range of circumstances under which an interruption of pregnancy is considered to be allowed. The state law has to confirm and to clarify the prohibition of interruption of pregnancy under constitutional law.

b) Interruptions of pregnancy that are executed according to the counselling programme, without diagnosis of an indication, may not be declared as being justified (not contrary to law). As an indispensable legal requirement an exception from a legal provision can only have inherent justifying effects, if the state requires the incident of its preconditions to be determined, whether by the court or by a third party in whom the state may trust and whose decision is subject to a certain public control.

   The legislator must not declare the interruption of pregnancy to be justified if he cannot provide for regulations of medical indication. The legislator's counselling concept does not allow for the recognition of a general emergency as a medical indication because doing so could hinder the counselling's effectiveness. This is why in those cases a justification is not possible.

   cc) The protective effects of the counselling programme do not depend on whether the woman's demand after counselling justifies an interruption of pregnancy. There is no evidence that the counselling can be effective only if the woman is assured that an interruption of pregnancy after undergoing the counselling will be legally approved.

> To the contrary, it would undermine the objective of the counselling to protect unborn life if the legal order would approve of every demand for an interruption of pregnancy in any event. This is because the counselling could not strengthen the woman's responsibility, if her decision in favour of an interruption after counselling was approved in any event.

3. To declare the interruption of pregnancy not to be punishable under certain conditions, allows to uphold the in principle prohibition of an interruption of pregnancy in the other areas of law.

At this, the counselling concept requires to provide such conditions that do not prevent the woman from being willing to accept the counselling that aims at protecting a life, from revealing her conflict and from responsibly contributing to a solution in a responsible manner.

This is why the woman must face a law that makes the acceptance of counselling preferable, to avoiding it and switching to illegality. Beyond the decision to make the interruption of pregnancy not punishable, the legislator must assure that emergency assistance by a third party in favour of the unborn child is not justifiable, if it aims to undermine the woman's and the physician's action. The woman must also be enabled to conclude a contract with a physician for an interruption of pregnancy that is classed as binding (see D.V.6.). Furthermore she needs legal protection against an eventual need to reveal the matter of her interruption of pregnancy and the reasons for it, leading to an infringement of her right to personality (see E.V.3.b and 4.b).

4. After all, the counselling programme makes an interruption of pregnancy, chosen by the woman after undergoing the counselling, illegal. The counselling concept cannot provide the woman with a legal justification as considering her being in an emergency situation because this would contradict its protection concept. This is just and reasonable and does not make the woman a bare object of the counselling concept. The counselling concept takes the woman serious as an acting person. It tries to persuade her of protecting the unborn life and expects her to exhibit responsible cooperation. It provides for conditions that attach much value to the legal position of the woman (see above, 3.). These conditions avoid any legal prejudice that could prevent the woman from undergoing the counselling and conversation with the doctor. It is only beyond these conditions that the "in principle" prohibition of an interruption of pregnancy must apply. That means, for example, that for those interruptions of pregnancy which are performed in accordance with the counselling programme, cannot be granted all those legal benefits that can be granted for legal abortions.

IV.

If the legislator chooses the counselling concept, the duty to protect the unborn human life also implicates certain limits for him concerning the legal organization of the counselling programme (see above III.1.a). This programme is of special importance for the protection of human life because its main focus lay on preventive protection. This is why the legislator, in light of the prohibition of insufficient means, must provide for effective and sufficient regulations to make a woman who is considering an interruption of pregnancy carry her child to term.

Those provisions must be imposed for the subject matter of the counselling (1), its performance (2.) and its organization, including the participating persons (3). It is only under these conditions that the legislator may assume the counselling programme to be of protecting effect for life.

1. As regards to the content of the counselling, the legislator may assume that counselling can only be effective in protecting the unborn life, if it is not focused on results. In order to succeed, the counselling must aim at gaining the woman's cooperation in search of a solution. This also justifies the desistance from forcing the woman to discuss and to co-operate or from committing her to identify herself for the counselling.

The counselling is to encourage and not to intimidate the woman; to inspire her with sympathy and not to teach her; to strengthen the woman's responsibility and not to dominate her. This makes high demands on the counselling programme and the persons implementing it. Therefore it requires respective statutory provisions.

a) If the pregnant woman's responsibility for the unborn life is to be the basis of a conscientious decision, the woman must be aware of this responsibility she bears due to the counselling concept. In doing so she must appreciate the unborn child's right to life that it is entitled to, even against its mother. That means, the woman must be aware that even in the early stages of pregnancy, the unborn life is specially protected by the state law. Consequently the woman must be aware that the state law only allows for considering an interruption of pregnancy under exceptional circumstances. This is if the woman faces heavy and exceptional burdens, exceeding the sacrificial limit. The consultant must assure his or herself of this awareness and must explain possible misconceptions in an understandable way.

b) Science has developed methods for assisting in conflict resolution; those are also practiced. A concept that aims at guaranteeing the protection of the unborn human life in the first twelve weeks of pregnancy primarily by means of counselling, cannot do without it. This is why every counselling must be aimed at holding a conversation whereby applying the methods of counselling. As a first precondition, consultants must have the respective skills and a sufficient amount of time for every pregnant woman. Furthermore, from the very beginning counselling is only possible, if the pregnant woman communicates to the consultant her reasons for considering an interruption of pregnancy.

   Although the nature of counselling excludes the enforcement of the pregnant woman's willingness to communicate and to cooperate for a counselling that aims to meet the goal of protecting life, it is indispensable to reveal the reasons for considering an interruption of pregnancy.

   To ask this of a pregnant woman does not lead to a counselling process that is focused on results. Neither does it depreciate the woman's responsibility. The crucial point is that the counselling concept dispenses from medical indications to be determined by a third party in order to verify and evaluate the woman's reasons for the interruption. It also dispenses from sanctioning the woman's decision against the child if it is taken after undergoing the counselling. If in context of such a concept the counselling is meant to make the woman disclose her reasons for the interruption, this is just based on the assumption that the pregnant woman bears a responsibility and that she is able to make a conscientious decision.

c) To comply with the duty to protect the unborn life, counselling must include information about possible social and other supporting measures provided by the state. Furthermore, for claiming these benefits the woman must get the most effective support. This also applies to third parties, for example churches or foundations providing any means to protect life. Only in doing so, it can be guaranteed that all aid especially reaches those women who need it most, fostering their willingness to carry the child to term.

d) The counselling programme would not provide a sufficient solution to its task if it did not take into consideration those persons associated with the pregnant woman in particular the father of the unborn child and the parents of an underage pregnant person who are in charge of supporting her and could possibly influence her decision for or against the child.

This is why each consultant has to clarify whether it seems appropriate to consult the father, other family members or persons of trust and whether the pregnant woman can be convinced to do so.

But, in case that from the outset the pregnant woman is accompanied by such an associated person, it is necessary to check whether this person must be expected to take influence on the pregnant woman in a damaging way. This would make it necessary to ask the pregnant woman to undergo the counselling again without any company.

e) The interruption of pregnancy must not immediately follow the education and the counselling. In many cases the woman might only be able to deal with the issues of counselling after a certain period of time. The woman must be given the opportunity to talk to her persons of trust about the decision. This is if the decision is to be taken in a responsible manner (see BVerfGE 39, 1 [64]).

3. If the state seeks to protect the unborn human life by means of a counselling programme, it bears the full responsibility for its implementation. It is on the state to assure an appropriate range of consulting programmes, and it must not leave it to any private organization to uncoordinatedly implement it, pursuant to any religious, ideological or political objective.

V.

The protection concept of a counselling programme also regards the physician, who is liable to the woman for advice and support from the medical perspective. The physician must not just perform an interruption of pregnancy but has to bear the responsibility for his action. He is bound to the protection of health and life. This is why he must not straight away assist in an interruption of pregnancy.

1. In particular the statutory provisions applying to a physician performing an interruption of pregnancy can begin with the physician's general duties in performing a surgical intervention. But his general duties of raising an indication, of education and counselling are to adapt to the characteristics of an interruption of pregnancy according to the counselling programme.

On the other hand, in order to protect the unborn life there must be limits to medical examination and information. This is to meet the danger of sexual choice that is disapproved by the constitution. This is why in the early stages of pregnancy the gender of the child must not become known to anyone else but the physician and his staff, unless the information was medically indicated.

c) As responsible medical action is legally bound to the protection of the unborn life, the physician must take into consideration, under which circumstances the state law considers an interruption of pregnancy not to be illegal.

Therefore it needs a medical report on the woman's situation, in compliance with law, that can serve as a basis for the exchange with the woman and for the physician's own decision. In doing so, the physician must inform the woman on the decisive aspects determining his decision.

2b) If the physician considers the abortion to be justifiable from the medical point of view, he must be able to assist in it without the threat of punishment. If he considers the abortion not to be justifiable from the medical perspective he is obliged to refuse his assistance according to his general duties. But sanctions for the infringement of those duties are hard to enforce in legal practice. The constitutional duty to protect the unborn life does not require to employ criminal law in case of an infringement.

To comply with the duty to protect it seems to be sufficient but also necessary, that the mentioned commitment and its enforcement is regulated in the medical code of conduct; this must happen irrespective of any criminal sanction.

6. The duty of the State to protect the unborn life does not require that contracts are classed as non-binding which were concluded with physicians and hospitals for interruptions of pregnancy which are not punishable under the (new) counselling programme. The program rather requires that the mutual tie of obligations between physician and patient take the form of a legal relationship so that all obligations are fulfilled for valid legal reasons. Irrespective of any specific contractual consequences, ss. 134, 138 of the Civil Code are inapplicable. Doctors and hospitals only take part in abortions on the basis of a valid contract which safeguards their claim for payment and outlines their duties. It is in particular the doctor's duty towards the unborn child and the patient's health which needs contractual safeguards. As a consequence, faulty performance of the duties to provide counselling and treatment must in principle be able to trigger contractual and tortious sanctions.

However, in the light of the Constitution this result needs to be differentiated. A civil law sanction for faulty performance of the contract or for tortious infringement of the patient's physical integrity is basically necessary; this entails not only the duty to pay back any wasted fees, but also the duty to compensate for damage under the provisions of ss. 823, 847 of the Civil Code, including compensation for pain and suffering resulting from a failed abortion or from the birth of a incapacitated child. But as a result of Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, the child's existence cannot legally be classified as a damage. The duty of all public bodies to respect every human being for its own sake prohibits maintenance for a child to be classified as a damage. In the light of this fact, the case law of the civil courts on liability for medical mistakes in counselling or in performing failed abortions needs to be reconsidered (see for abortion BGHZ 86, 240 et seq.; 89, 95 et seq.; BGH NJW 1985, 671 et seq.; VersR 1985, 1068 et seq.; VersR 1986, 869 et seq.; VersR 1988, 155 et seq.; NJW 1992, 1556 et seq.; for sterilisations see BGHZ 76, 249 et seq.; 76, 259 et seq.; BGH NJW 1984, 2625 et seq.). However, the doctor's duty to pay damages to the child for damage caused in the course of an unskillfully attempted and thus failed abortion remains unaffected (see BGHZ 58, 48 [49 et seq.]; BGH NJW 1989, 1538 [1539]).

VI.

The state's duty to protect the unborn life also includes the protection from threats for the unborn human life, emanating from influences exerted by third parties such as members of the pregnant woman's family or of her social environment (see above, I.2 and III.1.b).

This gains special importance in the case of descending to a concept of protection that in the early stages of an unwanted pregnancy focuses on a counselling programme for the pregnant woman to make her carry the child to term.

1. This concept's effectiveness particularly requires the woman's protection against any unreasonable demands, leading to difficulties for the woman or imposing pressure upon her to interrupt the pregnancy. Such influences are also able to undo the counselling's success if the persons of her social environment press the woman even harder to make her interrupt the pregnancy, referring to impunity and the woman's responsibility, whereby abdicating from their own responsibility.

2. a) Thus, it would not comply with a counselling concept aiming at the protection of the unborn life, just to call upon the respective persons' responsibility. Rather one needs to work towards new statutory provisions or towards the implementation of existing norms guaranteeing the framework conditions to ask for the family's responsibility as well as for the social environment's consideration (see above I.3.a).

b) Furthermore there is an indispensable requirement for certain commands and prohibitions for family members under penalty of law. On the one hand these commands and prohibitions need to aim at ensuring that the respective persons give the necessary and reasonable support to the woman, at least if the denial was condemnable. On the other hand they need to aim at preventing these persons from pressing the woman to interrupt the pregnancy. Thereby the criminal liability may depend on whether an interruption of pregnancy was performed or not. Provisions of this kind would link to considerations of s. 201 of the 1962 Draft Statute to Reform the Criminal Law (see BRDrucks. 200/62 p. 45).

Using these criterions to check the questioned provisions of the statute for the benefit of pregnant women and family benefits, it turns out that by descending to a counselling concept for the first twelve weeks of pregnancy, which is acceptable in principle, the statute does not sufficiently comply with its duty to effectively protect the unborn life, emanating from Article 1.1, in conjunction with Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. In contrast, the concerns about legal competence that were raised over particular regulations are only partly convincing as regards s. 4 of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Penal Law.

1. S. 218a.1 of the Criminal Code (new version) that states that abortions performed by a physician on demand of the pregnant woman after undergoing a counselling according to s. 219 of the Criminal Code (new version) and within the first twelve weeks of pregnancy are not "illegal", does not comply with the duty to protect the unborn human life (Article 1.1 Basic Law, in conjunction with Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law) and is null and void. …

2. If s. 218a.1 of the Criminal Code (new version) establishes a general justification for interruptions of pregnancy, its requirements in respect of content do not comply with the constitutional standards (see above D.I.2.c) bb)). A justification of an interruption of pregnancy can only be possible, if a specified emergency occurs - which has to be determined. The emergency must be so severe, that the pregnant woman cannot be expected to carry the child to term, comparable to cases of medical, embryopathical or criminal indication. S. 218a.1 of the Criminal Code (new version) does not require such an emergency. …

II.

S. 219 of the Criminal Code (new version) does not comply with the requirements of the unborn human life's protection (Article 1.1, Article 2.1 of the Basic Law); therefore it is contradicting the Basic Law and is void.

The counselling is of fundamental importance within the protection concept of the statute. The legislator must organize the counselling as a public duty in a way that the state can assume full responsibility for its implementation (see above D.IV.3.). In doing so the legislator must regulate the aim and the content of the counselling as well as the procedure to be observed in compliance with the principles derived from the constitution (see above D.IV.1. and 2.). Given the importance of the object of legal protection and given the high level of its endangerment at the time when the pregnant woman is considering an interruption of pregnancy and when she is therefore frequenting a counselling service, the legislator must regulate task and implementation of the counselling in a clear and coherent way enabling to understand the law without needing explanations.

1. The regulation for a pregnant woman's counselling in case of an emergency or conflict situation (s. 219 of the Criminal Code, new version) is already insufficient under constitutional law because the counselling which is conceptually required and which aims to protect the life is not guaranteed by sufficient public competences and duties as regards the organization and surveillance of the counselling institution; based on this regulation the state cannot comply with its responsibility for offering such counselling institutions that leave one with the expectation of effectiveness according to its aim and content.

2. With this in mind there is no need to finally decide on whether the provisions of s. 219 of the Criminal Code (new version) on aim, content and implementation of the counselling bear up against a control of constitutionality. However, considering that there is a need for a new statutory law anyway, the new provision must be conceptualized in a way that it is clear and coherent by itself. It must be possible to apply it without needing further explanations, so that it complies with all the constitutional requirements from the state's duty to protect as stated under D.IV.1.and 2.

d) S. 219.1 sentence 3 of the Criminal Code (new version) describes the decision that the woman has to take after undergoing the counselling as a "matter of conscience". The legislator thereby obviously seeks to refer to a phrasing by the Federal constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 39, 1 [48]), stating that the decision in favour of an interruption of pregnancy may be considered a conscientious decision that has to be respected. However, the woman who decides in favour of an interruption of pregnancy after undergoing the counselling cannot claim an infringement of her basic right emanating from Article 4.1 of the Basic Law for the involved killing of the unborn child. To meet the requirements by constitutional law the statute can only mean a conscientiously taken and therefore estimable decision. This is to be clarified accordingly.

III.

Irrespective of the lack of constitutionality in s. 218a.1 and s. 219 of the Criminal Code (new version), the regulation in the statute for the benefit of pregnant women and family benefits concerning interruptions of pregnancy according to the counselling concept do not comply with the duty to protect the unborn human life. This is because the legislator failed to determine the special commitments of the woman and her family to the necessary extent (see D.VI.2.) and failed to put it under the threat of punishment. The legislator has to catch up on the missing regulations together when doing the readjustment that became necessary after the invalidation of s. 218a.1, 219 of the Criminal Code (new version).

IV.

Article 15 no. 2 of the Statute for the benefit of pregnant women and family benefits is contradicting Article 1.1, in conjunction with Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law and is therefore void as far as the provision in Article 4 of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Penal Law concerning the Federal Statistics on interruptions of pregnancy is nullified thereby.

1. a) The legislator does not fulfil his duty to protect the unborn human life only by enacting a law regulating interruptions of pregnancy, aiming at this kind of protection and being appropriate to guarantee the degree of protection required by the Basic Law, according to his estimation which is acceptable from the constitutional law perspective.

   Rather, because of his duty to protect he remains responsible for the effectiveness of the law in terms of ensuring reasonable and by itself effective protection against interruptions of pregnancies, taking into consideration other legal interests. …

   He must therefore frequently and appropriately reassure himself, whether the law really has the expected protective effects or whether deficits can be noticed, in terms of the concept or its implementation, leading to an infringement of the prohibition of insufficient means (see BVerfGE 56, 54 [82 seq.]). One opportunity is a frequent report to the government. The duty to monitor exists as well and even more precisely after a change in the protection concept.

2. According to this constitutional standard, the abolition of the previous provision on the Federal Statistics in Article 4 of the Fifth Statute to Reform the Penal Law is not incompatible with the duty to protect the unborn human life.

Indeed constitutional law did not require the legislator to retain the previous provision on the Federal Statistics unchanged. But he is denied to delete it without replacement. This deletion is void. A new regulation is necessary to comply with the duty to protect yet because the scope of the regulation does not reach out to the new Federal states, where previously it was only applicable because of an interim order of the senate (BVerfGE 86, 390 seq.).

V.

The provision of s. 24b of the Fifth Code of Social Law is compatible with the Basic Law (1. and 2. a). But it would contradict the Basic Law to grant a legal claim for benefits from the compulsory health insurance for the performance of an interruption of pregnancy which was not proved to be legal before in a way that meets the above-stated constitutional requirements (2.b.). In contrast the granting of social aid for abortions that are not sconced and that are executed according to the counselling programme is compatible with constitutional law where there is a need for pecuniary help. The same is true for continuous payment of wages (3. and 4.). The duty under constitutional law to protect the unborn human life does not conflict with the granting of financial benefits from the social health insurance for an interruption of pregnancy because of the general indication of an emergency according to the previous law. If it was compatible with constitutional law on other aspects to grant benefits from the social insurance even if the interruption of pregnancy was based on s. 218a. 2 no. 3 of the Criminal Code (old version), does not need to be decided on (5.).

b) If the legality of the interruption of pregnancy is not proven, the duty under constitutional law to protect life prohibits an interpretation of s. 24b of the Fifth Code of Social Law (SGB V) that allows for the granting of benefits from the social insurance if these benefits are equal to those granted for legal abortions. The state under the rule of law may only pay for an act of killing if the killing is legal and if the state insured itself of its legality in a way that is complying with standards of reliability under the rule of law.

cc) According to the protection concept of the counselling programme the pregnant woman, after undergoing a social and medical counselling, bears the responsibility of whether a punishable interruption of pregnancy takes place or not. But the counselling programme does not require the acceptance of this responsibility by social law. It does not require to grant the same social benefits to women going through with a non-criminal interruption on the conditions of the counselling programme as to those for whom a medical, embryopatical or criminal indication, i. e. a justification has been notified.

dd) The granting of social benefits for interruptions of pregnancy that are not punishable, indeed but that are not proven to be legal is contradicting the state's duty to protect the unborn human life because it would also damage people's general awareness of an unborn child having a right to life even against its mother and the awareness that an interruption of pregnancy is wrong in principle.

c) After all, the constitution forbids the granting of benefits from the social insurance for the medical performance of an illegal interruption of pregnancy and the medical aftertreatment provided there were no complications.

3. a) After all the state is in principle prohibited by constitutional law from fostering interruptions of pregnancy that are not proven to be legal by granting social benefits or by setting laws granting a claim for benefits against a third party. The state is only allowed under constitutional law to breach this principle, as far as this is required by the concept for the protection of the unborn human life for its effectiveness. This is the case if only the performance of an interruption of pregnancy by a physician is in question.

If the state law requires the consultation of a doctor, on the one hand to protect the pregnant woman's health and on the other hand to protect the unborn child, this must not fail because of a lack of financial means. In this case the state must not be prevented from providing these means by itself.

b) It is up to the legislator to provide regulations on how and under which circumstances the state should in case of the woman's need take over the costs, in case the concept of protection of the counselling programme requires so. …

4. In the law of wage continuation it is not required to exclude those interruptions of pregnancy which are excluded from the elements of crime in s. 218 of the Criminal Code (new version), from the duty to indemnify.

It does not contradict the duty to protect unborn human life under constitutional law, if those principles of employment law are interpreted in a way that a duty of wage continuation also exists, if the unemployability is consequence of an interruption of pregnancy under the counselling programme; under constitutional law it is not objectionable to also consider those cases of unemployability to be through no fault of her own, according to s. 1.2 of the German Law on Continuation of Payments for Employees on Medical Leave (LFZG).

5. a) The duty under constitutional law to protect Life does not prevent the legislator from granting benefits from the compulsory health insurance for an interruption of pregnancy that is not illegal, as it is stated in s. 24b of the Fifth Code of Social Law, following s. 200f RVO. This also applies to the regulations in ss. 218a seq. of the Criminal Code (old version), which are applicable until 15 June 1993 (see II.1. of the ruling).

Extracts from the dissenting opinion of Vice President Judge Mahrenholz and Judge Sommer

As for the Senate it is also out of question for us that there exists a state's duty to protect the unborn human life from its very beginning. We share the senate's opinion that the duty to protect does not prevent the legislator from changing to a protection concept that focuses on the counselling of the pregnant woman, abstaining from a threat of punishment determined by indication and from determining the elements of an indication.

But we are of the opinion that in fact the final responsibility of the woman for an interruption in the early stages of pregnancy, that is generally recognized by the senate as a last statutory means if the woman underwent counselling, is necessary to comply with the woman's basic rights and the duty to protect is therefore limited (I.).

In our opinion an effective protection for the unborn life in the counselling programme just calls for a normative clarification on the admissible and non-admissible elements of an interruption of pregnancy; thereby the Basic Law at least allows for a justification of the abortion after undergoing a counselling (II.). From this it follows that s. 218a.1 of the Criminal Code is in compliance with the constitution and that benefits from the compulsory health insurance for interruptions of pregnancy are not to be excluded from s. 24b of the Fifth Code of Social Law (III.)

According to the senate's opinion, for the whole duration of the pregnancy the woman is bound to carry the child to term. After undergoing a counselling this duty only ends, if there is a justification by statutory law, complying with the criterion of unreasonableness (see judgment, D.I.2.c). We don't agree to this statement. Regarding the triangle given by constitutional law, comprising the woman, the prenatal life and the state, the duty to protect, deriving from the basic law, only calls upon the state, not directly upon the woman. Duties, imposed by statutory law of the state in order to protect the prenatal life, must at the same time consider the basic rights of the woman.

Every statutory provision regulating the interruption of pregnancy therefore does not only need to be in accordance with Article 2.2, in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, but it also needs to comply with the woman's right to protection of and respect for her human dignity (Article 1.1 Basic Law), her right to physical integrity (Article 2.2 of the Basic Law) and her right to personality (Article 2.1 of the Basic Law) (see judgment, D.I.2.b).

Irrespective of the submissions under I. in our opinion the Basic Law does not demand to refuse any justification (as for the question of criminal law), if the unreasonableness of the demand to carry the pregnancy to term was not confirmed by a third party.

The senate is of the opinion that the provision of s. 218a.1 of the Criminal Code (new version) as a justification is unconstitutional, because it neither requires a situation of emergency or conflict making it unreasonable for the woman to carry the child to term nor does it further determine such a situation. Nor it makes the determination of justification by a third party a precondition (see judgment, E.I.2.). According to our submissions under I and II, we hold that s. 218a.1 of the Criminal Code (new version) is compatible with the constitution.

In our opinion payments by the social insurance for interruptions of pregnancy that are performed by a physician within the first twelve weeks after conception are not contradicting the Basic Law. However we don't consider the legislator to be constitutionally bound to include legal interruptions of pregnancy that are not medically indicated but performed by a physician, in the list of services covered by the compulsory health insurance. But if he does so, what is suitable considering the protection of the woman's health, he is required to assure the equal allocation of benefits of the community based on the principle of mutual solidarity, organized in the health insurance. Distinctions must be justified.

We would not be able to follow the majority of the senate's opinion that s. 24b of the Fifth Code of Social Law is not applicable to interruptions of pregnancy after counselling, even if those interruptions of pregnancy were not justifiable (what is the case according to the judgment). For as much as this we agree with the dissenting opinion of our colleague Böckenförde.

Against the leading submissions of the senate to involve the physician in the protection concept of the counselling programme (see judgment, D.V.) we object in two points.

1. In our opinion, against the senate's view, the duty under constitutional law to protect does not require the legislator to put the infringement of the doctor's duties in context of an abortion or the previous counselling and education under the sanction of punishment.

2. The subjects of the action do not provide a reason for the senate's submissions in the judgment, stating that the obligation to support a child can never considered to be a damage (see judgment, D.V.6.). They are an obiter dictum and moreover lack the necessary examination of the submissions by the 6th Civil Senate of the Federal Court of Justice, stating under which specified circumstances one may consider something to be a damage (BGHZ 76, 249 [253 seq.]; BGH, NJW 1984, 2625 seq.).

I cannot agree with the explanations in the judgment that benefits from the social insurance for such abortions (in the following: counselled abortions) are excluded by constitutional law (under E.V.2.b), partially anticipated in D.III.1.c). To decide on this is up to the legislator.

Thereby it is not the point that such benefits are demanded by the constitution - they are certainly not -, but whether such benefits are constitutionally forbidden from the very beginning.

2. For the law of social insurance that is subsequent law in this case, the question arises how to deal with this entity of counseled abortions regarding the granting of insurance benefits.

The senate assumes that it is a requirement under the constitutional duty to protect the unborn human life, to consider every such abortion because it is not proved to be legal and its legality cannot be proven, must be considered not justified and therefore as a tort and must be excluded from benefits of the social insurance. Such an exclusion might be a possible result of legislative action. But it cannot be derived from the constitutional duty to protect the unborn human life or any other constitutional provision, that it is a compulsory demand of the constitution, making every other solution an infringement of the constitution.

3. However, the objections against the senate's opinion do not mean that the constitution requires the financing of counseled abortions.

This would contradict the principle rightly emphasized by the senate that illegal abortions must not be directly or indirectly financed by the state because of the protecting effects for the unborn life.

The decisive action taken by the senate was, from a constitutional point of view, the descent to a protection concept of counselling. This descent seems to be generally acceptable in light of the constitutionally demanded protection for the unborn life. The reason is that the state's duty to protect aims at ensuring an effective protection of the unborn life by implementing normative rules and de facto measures. Therefore it is not sufficient, if there is indeed a regulation at normative level, aiming at a closed and stringent protection of the unborn life but this regulation is on for whatever reasons failing to be implemented into a de facto effective protection also for the individual human life. The reasons for that are explained in the judgment.

But if this way is considered to be acceptable to meet the state's duty to protect the unborn life - regardless of the necessary requirements for its particular form, - it must on the one hand be accepted in its needs and conditions of efficiency, thereby striking the balance with other legal positions and aspects. …

c) Physical Restraints on Patients - BVerfG, 24.7.2018, 2 BvR BVerfG, 24.7.2018, 2 BvR 309/15, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20180724_2bvr030915en.html

Explanatory Annotation

This decision of the Constitutional Court deals with the scope of the habeas corpus guarantees of Article 2.2 and 104.1 and 104.2 of the Basic Law. The first article generally protects personal liberty, i.e., the freedom of movement as the freedom to move away from where one currently is. Article 104 of the Basic Law complements Article 2.2 by providing a detailed procedural framework for the deprivation of liberty, e.g. and among other things, making any deprivation of liberty beyond "midnight of the next day" (for a theoretical maximum of 48 hours) subject to a court order (Article 104.2 of the Basic Law). The context here, however, is not criminal law or procedure. Instead, the habeas corpus issue raised by the applicants in the two joined cases before the Constitutional Court revolve around persons confined in a psychiatric hospital under a valid court order and, while there, being physically restrained by the use of five-and seven-point restraints respectively. In one case, this restraint had a statutory legal base, which, however, authorized the medical doctors of the institution to order such restraints under certain circumstances. The second applicant had been kept fully restrained (both legs and arms, chest, torso and head) for eight hours in a psychiatric hospital after having been found by the police highly intoxicated and after having been diagnosed as potentially suicidal. The legal basis for this was the general necessity clause of § 34 of the German Criminal Code.[26]

26 § 34 of the German Criminal Code reads: "A person who, faced with an imminent danger to life, limb, freedom, honour, property or another legal interest which cannot otherwise be averted, commits an act to avert the danger from himself or another, does not act unlawfully, if, upon weighing the conflicting interests, in particular the affected legal interests and the degree of the danger facing them, the protected interest substantially outweighs the one interfered with. This shall apply only if and to the extent that the act committed is an adequate means to avert the danger." English text of German Criminal Code available at https://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/englisch_stgb/ (last accessed on 20.8.2019).

The Constitutional Court found a violation of Articles 2.2 and 104.1, 104.2 of the Basic Law in both instances. The main significance lies in the finding that the physical restraining of patients for more than just a short time constitutes as separate act of deprivation of freedom of such magnitude that it cannot be regarded as covered by the legal act authorizing institutionalizing in a psychiatric hospital and that therefore a specific legal basis for such restraints must be present (Article 104.1 of the Basic Law), which must spell out the conditions of the specific measures in a precise manner[27] and also adhere to the stipulated in Article 104.2 that such acts require a judicial decision, i.e., a decision by an independent judge authorizing the restraint[28]. The procedural framework set by the Constitutional Court for the legislative acts governing the authorization of such restraining measure and the judicial decision on which they are contingent is very strict. The Court recognized that in these instances procedural requirements ranging from full and comprehensive documentation of the measures to ensure subsequent legal protection and the proportionality of the measures[29], complementary authorization by a doctor and a one-to-one supervision by medical staff[30] to the adequate staffing of the judiciary to have judges available to exercise judicial oversight in a meaningful way[31] are the cornerstone of keeping such severe restraining measures under check and guard given that the circumstances are marked by an inherent lack of transparency and the affected individual is under total control of the medical institution and out of sight. The Constitutional Court also spent great care in ascertaining that the requirements defined by the Court are in full compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights and the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.[32]

Headnotes:

1. a) The use of physical restraints on patients constitutes an interference with their fundamental right to freedom of the person (Art. 2(2) second sentence in conjunction with Art. 104 of the Basic Law).

   b) Both the use of five-point and seven-point restraints that goes beyond mere short-term application constitutes a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Art. 104(2) of the Basic Law that is not covered by a judicial order of confinement in a psychiatric hospital. A short-term application can generally be presumed where it is foreseeable that the measure will not last longer than approximately half an hour.

4. Pursuant to § 35 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG), the following is ordered:

a) In the Land Baden-Württemberg, physical restraint measures on persons confined under public law in psychiatric hospitals remain permissible until 30 June 2019 pursuant to § 25 of the Baden-Württemberg Act regarding Assistance and Protective Measures for Persons with Mental Illnesses.

b) In the Free State of Bavaria, physical restraint measures on persons confined under public law in psychiatric hospitals remain permissible until 30 June 2019 to the extent that they are indispensable to avert an immediate and serious danger posed by the persons concerned to themselves or to significant legal interests of others.

c) The following applies with regard to both Länder: The use of fivepoint or seven-point restraints is subject to the requirement that a judicial decision be obtained pursuant to Article 104(2) first sentence of the Basic Law, unless the restraints are only applied for a short period of time, where it is foreseeable that the measure will not last longer than approximately half an hour. After any such physical restraint measure has ended, the persons concerned must always be informed about the possibility of seeking a subsequent judicial review of the measure.

Facts:

The constitutional complaints, combined for joint decision, concern the constitutional requirements regarding the ordering of the use of physical restraints on persons confined under public law in psychiatric hospitals. In particular, they raise the question whether the use of physical restraints - strapping the persons concerned, who are on their back, to a hospital bed by using a special type of straps in order to largely or completely restrict their ability to move - constitutes a deprivation of liberty (Freiheitsentziehung) that requires a judicial decision (Richtervorbehalt). [1]

[Excerpt from press release no. 62/2018]

[I.] Regarding constitutional complaint 2 BvR 309/15, the person concerned was confined in a closed psychiatric hospital and subjected to a five-point restraint - i.e. strapped to a hospital bed, with restraints securing all limbs and the stomach - based on repeated doctors' orders over the course of several days. The complainant, the guardian ad litem (Verfahrenspfleger) of the confined person, directly challenges the local court order authorising the use of physical restraints, and indirectly challenges § 25(3) of the Baden-Württemberg Act regarding Assistance and Protective Measures for Persons with Mental Illnesses (Baden-Württembergisches Gesetz über Hilfen und Schutzmaßnahmen bei psychischen Krankheiten - PsychKHG BW), on which the court order was based.

[II.] Regarding constitutional complaint 2 BvR 502/16, the complainant was subjected to a seven-point restraint - i.e. strapped to a hospital bed, with restraints securing both arms, both legs, the stomach, chest and forehead -; the use of restraints was ordered by a doctor, lasted for eight hours, and took place while the complainant was confined in a psychiatric hospital for the duration of approximately twelve hours altogether. The Bavarian Confinement Act (Bayerisches Unterbringungsgesetz - BayUnterbrG), which served as the legal basis for the temporary confinement of the complainant, does not contain specific provisions providing legal authorisation for ordering the use of physical restraints. The complainant took legal action against the Free State of Bavaria, seeking material damages and damages for personal suffering in relation to injuries caused by the physical restraint measure. The action was unsuccessful. His constitutional complaint challenges the decisions rendered in the liability proceedings against the state (Amtshaftungsverfahren).

II.

1. The constitutional complaint in proceedings 2 BvR 309/15, lodged by complainant no. I in his own name and in the name of the person concerned, directly challenges the order of the Ludwigsburg Local Court (Amtsgericht) of 4 February 2015, and indirectly challenges § 25(3) of the Baden-Württemberg Act regarding Assistance and Protective Measures for Persons with Mental Illnesses. The complainant essentially claims a violation of Art. 2(2) second sentence in conjunction with Art. 104(1) and (2) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) and Art. 3(1) GG. [14]

[…] [15-16]

2. Complainant no. II claims that the challenged judgments of the Munich I Regional Court (Landgericht) of 27 May 2015 and of the Munich Higher Regional Court (Oberlandesgericht) of 4 February 2016 violate his fundamental rights and rights equivalent to fundamental rights (grundrechtsgleiche Rechte) under Art. 1(1) and (3), Art. 2(1) and (2) second sentence, Art. 20(3) and Art. 104(1) and (2) GG. [17]

C.

With regard to the challenged decision of the Munich I Regional Court, the constitutional complaint of complainant no. II is inadmissible. For the rest, the constitutional complaints are admissible. [50]

I.

The constitutional complaint in proceedings 2 BvR 309/15 is not inadmissible because, based on a reasonable interpretation, complainant no. I has lodged the constitutional complaint in his own name for the person concerned (1.), or because the person concerned was discharged from hospital after the constitutional complaint was lodged (2.). [51]

1. In his capacity as guardian ad litem in the confinement proceedings, complainant no. I is entitled to exercise, in his own name, rights of person concerned no. I, including for the purposes of constitutional complaint proceedings, as a procedural party by virtue of his office (Partei kraft Amtes). [52]

a) Constitutional complaint proceedings are, in principle, only admissible where complainants assert their own rights in their own name (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE 10, 229 <230>; 21, 139 <143>; 27, 326 <333>; 51, 405 <409>; 65, 182 <190>). However, it is established that in exceptional cases, rights on behalf of others can be asserted in one's own name also in constitutional complaint proceedings (cf. BVerfGE 10, 229 <230>; 21, 139 <143>; 27, 326 <333>; 51, 405 <409>; 65, 182 <190>). This holds true, in particular, in cases where otherwise there would be a risk that judicial decisions could never be challenged by means of a constitutional complaint (cf. BVerfGE 77, 263 <269>). [53]

Due to the serious mental illness of person concerned no. I, such a risk is ascertainable in the present case. [54]

[…] [55-57]

2. The fact that the order authorising the use of physical restraints was rendered moot when person concerned no. I was discharged from hospital does not cancel the recognised legal interest in bringing constitutional complaint proceedings (Rechtsschutzbedürfnis). [58]

The admissibility of a constitutional complaint requires that there is a recognised legal interest in seeking a reversal of the challenged act of public authority or, at the very least, a finding of unconstitutionality (cf. BVerfGE 81, 138 <140>). The recognised legal interest must persist at the time when the Federal Constitutional Court renders its decision (cf. BVerfGE 21, 139 <143>; 30, 54 <58>; 33, 247 <253>; 50, 244 <247>; 56, 99 <106>; 72, 1 <5>; 81, 138 <140>). This is the case where a serious interference with fundamental rights results in severe detriment and the direct impact of the challenged act of public authority is limited to such a short period of time that it would hardly be feasible, given the regular course of proceedings, to obtain a timely decision from the Federal Constitutional Court (cf. BVerfGE 81, 138 <140 and 141>; 107, 299 <311>; 110, 77 <85 and 86>; 117, 244 <268>; 146, 294 <309 para. 24>; established case-law). Otherwise, the protection of fundamental rights of the person concerned would be unreasonably curtailed (cf. BVerfGE 34, 165 <180>; 41, 29 <43>; 49, 24 <51 and 52>; 81, 138 <141>). Serious interferences with fundamental rights are, most notably, interferences - like the deprivation of liberty challenged in the present proceedings - for which the Basic Law itself directly provides for the requirement of a judicial decision, in this case under Art. 104(2) GG (cf. BVerfGE 96, 27 <40>; 104, 220 <233>). The use of physical restraints, which, by its nature, will often already be terminated before a judicial review can take place, amounts to such a serious interference with fundamental rights. [59]

To the extent that the constitutional complaints are admissible, they are well-founded. [62]

The challenged decisions violate the fundamental rights of person concerned no. I and of complainant no. II under Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) and (2) GG. In proceedings 2 BvR 309/15, § 25 PsychKHG BW does not satisfy the requirements of Art. 104(1) first sentence GG to the extent that it does not provide for an obligation to inform the persons concerned about the possibility of seeking a subsequent judicial review of the physical restraint measures. In proceedings 2 BvR 502/16, a statutory basis for the use of physical restraints and functionally equivalent measures is lacking altogether, contrary to the relevant requirement under Art. 104(1) GG. Moreover, in both proceedings, the physical restraint measures at issue constitute deprivations of liberty within the meaning of Art. 104(2) GG, yet the respective Land laws fail to specify a requirement that a judicial decision be obtained, as required under constitutional law. [63]

I.

The use of physical restraints on patients constitutes an interference with their fundamental right to freedom of the person (Art. 2(2) second sentence in conjunction with Art. 104 GG) (1.). Both five-point and seven-point restraint measures that go beyond mere short-term application constitute a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Art. 104(2) GG (2.). This also applies in cases where the persons concerned are already subject to a deprivation of liberty by way of confinement in a psychiatric hospital (3.). [64]

1. Art. 2(2) second sentence GG states that freedom of the person is "inviolable". This fundamental constitutional decision enshrines the right to freedom as a particularly high-ranking legal interest; interferences can only be justified by important reasons (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <322>; 29, 312 <316>; 105, 239 <247>). This right protects the actual physical freedom of movement, as provided for in the existing general legal order, against state interference (cf. BVerfGE 94, 166 <198>; 96, 10 <21>), that means against arrest, detention or similar measures that entail direct coercion (cf. BVerfGE 22, 21 <26>; 105, 239 <247>). [65]

An interference with the personal (physical) freedom is contingent only upon the actual, natural will of the person concerned (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <309 and 310>). Lack of mental capacity does not preclude the protection of Art. 2(2) GG (cf. BVerfGE 58, 208 <224>; 128, 282 <301>); this protection is also guaranteed to persons with mental illnesses and persons who lack full legal capacity (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <309>; 58, 208 <224>). Mentally ill persons, in particular, often perceive restrictions of their liberty, the necessity of which cannot be conveyed to them, as especially threatening (cf. BVerfG, Order of the Second Chamber of the Second Senate of 10 June 2015 - 2 BvR 1967/12 -, juris, paras. 16 and 17). [66]

2. a) Art. 2(2) second sentence GG protects against both restrictions of liberty (freiheitsbeschränkende Maßnahme; Art. 104(1) GG) and deprivations of liberty (freiheitsentziehende Maßnahme; Art. 104(2) GG); the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court distinguishes between the two types of measures based on the intensity of the interference (cf. BVerfGE 105, 239 <248>). An act constitutes a restriction of liberty if someone is prevented by public authority, against their will, from going to a place, or staying at a place, which would otherwise be (factually and legally) accessible to them (cf. BVerfGE 94, 166 <198>; 105, 239 <248>). An act constitutes a deprivation of liberty, the most serious form of liberty restriction, (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <323>) if it cancels the freedom of movement - that would generally exist under the relevant factual and legal circumstances - in every respect (cf. BVerfGE 94, 166 <198>; 105, 239 <248>). Deprivation of liberty is characterised by the particular weight of the interference as well as by the duration of the measure, which goes beyond mere short-term application (cf. BVerfGE 105, 239 <250>; BVerfG, Order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 21 May 2004 - 2 BvR 715/04 -, juris, para. 20; Order of the First Chamber of the First Senate of 8 March 2011 - 1 BvR 47/05, juris, para. 26; […]). [67]

b) At least the use of five-point or seven-point restraints, which entails that all limbs of the person concerned are strapped to a bed, constitutes a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Art. 104(2) GG, unless it is only applied for a short period of time. A short-term application can generally be presumed where it is foreseeable that the measure will not last longer than approximately half an hour. In the event that the person concerned is strapped to the bed by way of five-point or seven-point restraints, their freedom of movement is completely cancelled, taking away the remaining freedom to move within the closed psychiatric ward - or at least within the respective patient room -, a freedom that had still been available while they were confined in a psychiatric hospital. This type of physical restraint is imposed to keep the persons concerned in their hospital beds, completely unable to move. [68]

3. Where all limbs are physically restrained, and not merely for a short period of time, this qualifies as a separate act of deprivation of liberty due to the particular weight of the interference, even if the person concerned is already subjected to an ongoing deprivation of liberty; this type of restraint thus requires a separate judicial decision under Art. 104(2) first sentence GG. In the context of enforcing a confinement, the judicial order authorising the deprivation of liberty in the form of confinement does, in principle, cover disciplinary measures such as detention (cf. BVerfG, Order of the Second Chamber of the Second Senate of 8 July 1993 - 2 BvR 213/93 -, juris, para. 10) as well as special safety measures such as the confinement in a smaller restricted area within the institution; by resorting to stricter means, these measures merely change the manner in which the deprivation of liberty already imposed is enforced (cf. BVerfGE 130, 76 <111>; Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGK 2, 318 <323>). [69]

However, compared to those measures, both five-point and seven-point restraints constitute interferences of such weight that they are not covered by the judicial order of confinement; and it is hence justified to qualify them as separate acts of deprivation of liberty (cf. Federal Court of Justice, Bundesgerichtshof - BGH, Order of 15 September 2010 - XII ZB 383/10 -, juris, para. 27; Order of 12 September 2012 - XII ZB 543/11 -, juris, para. 14; […]). When these types of physical restraints are used, the freedom of movement of the persons concerned is completely cancelled in every respect. As a result, the freedom of movement is curtailed beyond the restrictions resulting from the confinement in a closed institution, i.e. the restriction of movements to the premises of the institution where the person is confined. [70]

In the case of five-point or seven-point restraints, the particular intensity of the interference furthermore follows from the fact that the persons concerned experience an intentional interference with their freedom of movement as all the more threatening, the more the relevant situation makes them feel helpless and powerless (regarding coercive medical treatment cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <302 and 303>). In addition, interferences that take place during confinement will often affect persons who, due to their psychological constitution, will be particularly sensitive to measures disregarding their will (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <302 and 303>). Furthermore, the persons concerned are completely dependent on timely assistance provided by care staff to deal with their bodily needs. Compared to other coercive measures, they therefore generally perceive the use of physical restraints as particularly harmful […]. In addition, even if restraints are applied correctly, there is a risk that the persons concerned suffer damage to their health, such as deep vein thrombosis or pulmonary embolism, due to the prolonged immobilisation […]. [71]

II.

The legislature may, in principle, permit serious interferences with fundamental rights such as the use of physical restraints (1.).Yet the fundamental right to freedom of the person, in conjunction with the principle of proportionality, gives rise to strict requirements regarding the justification of such interferences: the statutory basis for the interference (Art. 104(1) GG) must be sufficiently specific (2.) and satisfy the relevant substantive (3.) and procedural requirements (4.) in order to protect the fundamental rights of confined persons. These requirements are in line with the relevant provisions of international law, in particular with the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) (5.). [72]

1. a) Freedom of the person is such a high-ranking legal interest that interferences with it are only permissible for particularly weighty reasons (cf. BVerfGE 22, 180 <219>; 45, 187 <223>; 130, 372 <388>; established case-law). The restriction of this freedom must thus always be subjected to a strict review based on the principle of proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 58, 208 <224>; 128, 326 <372>). This applies in particular to preventive interferences that do not serve the purpose of retribution in terms of criminal justice. Such interferences are generally only permissible if they are necessary for the protection of others or the general public (cf. BVerfGE 90, 145 <172>; 109, 133 <157>; 128, 326 <372 and 373>). [73]

   b) However, the protection of the persons concerned themselves may also justify a restriction of freedom of the person. The fundamental right to life and physical integrity not only affords individuals a subjective right against state interferences with these legal interests. It also constitutes an objective decision on values enshrined in the Constitution that gives rise to duties of protection on the part of the state. Accordingly, the state is obliged to protect and promote the individual's right to life (cf. BVerfGE 39, 1 <42>; 46, 160 <164>; 90, 145 <195>; 115, 320 <346>; 142, 313 <337 para. 69>).

Art. 2(2) first sentence GG also provides protection against impairments of physical integrity and health (cf. BVerfGE 56, 54 <78>; 121, 317 <356>; 142, 313 <337 para. 69>). It is for the legislature to decide on a concept of protection and to implement it through legislation; even where the legislature is obliged to take measures to protect a legal interest, it still enjoys, in principle, a margin of appreciation and evaluation as well as a leeway to design (cf. BVerfGE 96, 56 <64>; 121, 317 <356>; 133, 59 <76 para. 45>; 142, 313 <337 para. 70>). The duty of care incumbent upon the state and society may thus include the authority to confine persons with mental illnesses in a closed institution against their will, and to physically restrain them, if this is absolutely necessary to avert imminent and serious damage to their health; this applies where persons with mental illnesses are, due to their condition and the resulting lack of mental capacity, not able to comprehend the seriousness of their illness and the necessity of treatment, or if their illness prevents them from accepting treatment despite their understanding of the situation (regarding confinement cf. BVerfGK 11, 323 <329>). [74]

c) According to these standards, the use of physical restraints on confined persons may be justified to avert imminent and serious damage to the health of the persons concerned themselves or other persons such as care staff or doctors. [75]

2. Under Art. 104(1) first sentence GG, restrictions of the freedom guaranteed by Art. 2(2) second sentence GG require a formal statutory provision and must observe the formal requirements set out therein (cf. BVerfGE 58, 208 <220>; 105, 239 <247>). The formal guarantees of Art. 104 GG are inextricably linked to the substantive guarantee of freedom under Art. 2(2) second sentence GG (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <322>; 58, 208 <220>; 105, 239 <247>). [76]

a) The general requirement under the rule of law (Art. 20(3) GG) that legal provisions be sufficiently specific already entails that the legislature must make provisions as specific as possible with regard to the particular nature of the subject matter to be regulated and in consideration of the legislative objective pursued (cf. BVerfGE 49, 168 <181>; 59, 104 <114>; 78, 205 <212>; 103, 332 <384>; 134, 141 <184 para. 126>; 143, 38 <60 and 61 paras. 55 et seq.>). […] [77]

b) Art. 104(1) first sentence GG sets out more detailed standards regarding the requirement of legal specificity deriving from the principle of the rule of law and reinforces the requirement of a statutory provision already contained in Art. 2(2) third sentence GG (cf. BVerfGE 29, 183 <195>; 134, 33 <81 para. 111>). In particular, the constitutional provision obliges the legislature to specify, in a sufficiently clear manner, the cases in which a deprivation of liberty is to be permissible. Deprivations of liberty must be regulated in a predictable manner that allows for evaluation and review (cf. BVerfGE 29, 183 <196>; 109, 133 <188>; 131, 268 <306>; 134, 33 <81 para. 111>). In this regard, it must be taken into account that the interference with the fundamental right under Art. 2(2) second sentence GG resulting from preventive deprivations of liberty is as serious as the interference resulting from prison sentences (cf. BVerfGE 134, 33 <81 para. 111>). To this extent, the requirement of specificity provided for under Art. 104(1) GG is comparable to the one in Art. 103(2) GG (cf. BVerfGE 29, 183 <196>; 78, 374 <383>; 96, 68 <97>; 131, 268 <306>; 134, 33 <81 para. 111>). [79]

3. The principle of proportionality gives rise to substantive requirements regarding the content of the relevant statutory basis. Physical restraints may only be used as an ultima ratio where less restrictive means are not available (anymore) (regarding coercive medical treatment cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <309> with further references). In this respect, it must be taken into account that placing the persons concerned in seclusion may not always be considered a less restrictive means, since the intensity of its effects in the specific case can be equal to those of five-point or seven-point restraints. If persons placed in seclusion are not sufficiently monitored, seclusion also entails the risk of considerable damage to their health […]. [80]

4. The fundamental rights guarantees, in conjunction with the principle of proportionality, also give rise to procedural requirements for the authorities and the courts (cf. BVerfGE 51, 150 <156>; 52, 380 <389>; 52, 391 <407>; 101, 106 <122>; 128, 282 <311>; established case-law). In this respect, the requirements developed by the Federal Constitutional Court for ordering coercive medical treatment (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <311 et seq.>) largely apply accordingly to ordering the use of physical restraints. [81]

a) Where persons confined in a closed institution are to be subjected to physical restraints, they are particularly in need of procedural safeguards with respect to their right to freedom of the person. The fact that the person concerned is confined in a closed institution and that for all parties involved, the possibility to rely on external support and assistance is limited creates an environment where confined persons are extremely vulnerable and in need of particular protection. In particular, they must be protected against the risk that only insufficient consideration is given to their fundamental rights, for instance due to vested interests of the institution or staff members - in particular in situations where staff members are overwhelmed when caring for patients that may at times be challenging -; due to a lack of adequate staffing to fulfil the tasks at hand; or due to the work routines in the respective institution (regarding coercive medical treatment cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <311, 315>). [82]

b) In order to ensure compliance with the principle of proportionality, it is indispensable that the use of physical restraints on persons confined in a closed psychiatric institution be ordered and supervised by a doctor (regarding coercive medical treatment cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <313>; 129, 269 <283>; 133, 112 <138 para. 67>). This is also imperative for satisfying the requirements under international law, international human rights standards and the professional standards of psychiatry (cf. Art. 27(2) Recommendation No. R (2004)10 of the Committee of Ministers to member States concerning the protection of the human rights and dignity of persons with mental disorder of 22 September 2004; according to this recommendation, the use of physical restraints requires medical supervision […]). At least the use of five-point or seven-point restraints in confinement generally requires one-to-one supervision by medical or care staff for the entire duration of the measure, given the weight of the interference and the health risks associated with it. As a special safety measure for averting a danger posed by the persons concerned to themselves or others due to an underlying medical condition, the use of physical restraints must be closely linked to the psychiatric treatment provided in confinement in relation to the underlying medical condition. The necessity of such measures must be assessed in consideration of the psychiatric treatment measures - for instance prospects of success of talking to the patient or of providing medication - and must be reviewed in short intervals. [83]

c) In order to pre-emptively safeguard the guarantee of effective legal protection under Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first sentence GG, it is necessary to document information on the ordering of the use of physical restraints against the natural will of confined persons; the relevant reasons for the measure; its implementation; its duration; and the type of supervision provided (regarding documentation requirements following from fundamental rights in other contexts cf. BVerfGE 65, 1 <70>; 103, 142 <160>; 128, 282 <313 and 314> with further references). On the one hand, documentation serves to ensure that legal protection is effective […]. On the other, it also ensures that the interference is proportionate. Professional and proportionate conduct can only be ensured on the basis of detailed documentation, especially in environments, typical of hospitals, where the staff responsible for the measure frequently changes (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <314>). This holds true in particular for measures carried out over a longer period of time, which only satisfy the principle of proportionality if their effects are closely monitored and the necessary consequences are drawn from the resulting observations. In addition, documentation is also an indispensable means for systematic quality assurance and evaluation aimed at improvement (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <314>; 146, 294 <312 para. 33> with further references). [84]

d) In addition, the fundamental right to freedom of the person (Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first sentence GG) gives rise to the obligation to inform the persons concerned about the possibility of having a court review the permissibility of the use of physical restraints after the measure has ended. […] [85]

5. The requirements set out above are in accordance with the European Convention on Human Rights, which serves as a guideline for interpretation when determining the content and scope of fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <317 and 318>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>). The UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities also does not give rise to a different conclusion. [86]

a) The European Court of Human Rights measures the use of physical restraints on persons with mental illnesses against Art. 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Jalloh v. Germany, Judgment of 11 July 2006, No. 54810/00, §§ 79, 106; ECtHR, Wiktorko v. Poland, Judgment of 31 March 2009, No. 14612/02, § 55), which includes an absolute prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Labita v. Italy, Judgment of 6 April 2000, No. 26772/95, § 119; ECtHR <GC>, Kud?a v. Poland, Judgment of 26 October 2000, No. 30210/96, § 90; established case-law), irrespective of the conduct of the person concerned (cf. ECtHR, Raninen v. Finland, Judgment of 16 December 1997, No. 152/1996/771/972, § 55; ECtHR <GC>, Labita v. Italy, Judgment of 6 April 2000,

No. 26772/95, § 119; ECtHR <GC>, Kud?a v. Poland, Judgment of 26 October 2000, No. 30210/96, § 90; ECtHR, Nevmerzhitsky v. Ukraine, Judgment of 5 April 2005, No. 54825/00, § 79; established case-law). [87]

Ill-treatment must attain a minimum level of severity if it is to fall within the scope of protection of this provision. In this regard, the circumstances of the case, in particular the duration of the treatment, its physical or mental effects, the sex, age and state of health of the persons concerned must be taken into account (cf. ECtHR, Raninen v. Finland, Judgment of 16 December 1997, No. 152/1996/771/972, § 55; ECtHR <GC>, Labita v. Italy, Judgment of 6 April 2000, No. 26772/95, § 120; ECtHR <GC, Kud?a v. Poland, Judgment of 26 October 2000, No. 30210/96, § 91; ECtHR <GC>, Jalloh v. Germany, Judgment of 11 July 2006, No. 54810/00, § 67; established case law). Treatment is degrading where it arouses in the persons concerned feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority, which goes beyond the inevitable element of suffering or humiliation connected with a given form of legitimate treatment or punishment; the question whether the purpose of the treatment was to humiliate or debase the person concerned is a further factor to be taken into account (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Labita v. Italy, Judgment of 6 April 2000, No. 26772/95, § 120; ECtHR <GC>, Kud?a v. Poland, Judgment of 26 October 2000, No. 30210/96, § 92; EGMR, Keenan v. The United Kingdom, Judgment of 3 April 2001, No. 27229/95, § 110; ECtHR, Price v. The United Kingdom, Judgment of 10 July 2001, No. 33394/96, § 24; ECtHR, Mouisel v. France, Judgment of 14 November 2002, No. 67263/01, § 37). [88]

According to the ECtHR's case-law, in respect of persons deprived of their liberty, recourse to physical force which is not strictly necessary due to their own conduct diminishes human dignity (cf. ECtHR <GC>, Labita v. Italy, Judgment of 6 April 2000, No. 26772/95, § 120; ECtHR, Keenan v. The United Kingdom, Judgment of 3 April 2001, No. 27229/95, § 113; ECtHR, Bureš v. The Czech Republic, Judgment of 18 October 2012, No. 37679/08, § 86). In the context of detention, the ECtHR held that it is up to the public authorities to justify the use of restraints on a detained person. The ECtHR further held that the use of restraining belts in cases of aggressive behaviour on the part of the persons concerned requires that checks be periodically carried out on the health and welfare of the persons concerned. The use of such restraints must be necessary and its length must not be excessive (ECtHR, Wiktorko v. Poland, Judgment of 31 March 2009, No. 14612/02, § 55; ECtHR, Bureš v. The Czech Republic, Judgment of 18 October 2012, No. 37679/08, § 86). These requirements do not go beyond the standards deriving from Art. 2(2) second sentence GG. [89]

b) The provisions of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) does also not suggest a different conclusion. Firstly, these provisions only have the rank of a federal statute (cf. Act on the Convention of the United Nations of 13 December 2006 on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities as well as on the Optional Protocol of 13 December 2006 to the Convention of the United Nations on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities of 21 December 2008, Federal Law Gazette, Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl II p. 1419). Secondly, they do not generally rule out the permissibility of the use of physical restraints that goes beyond mere short-term application in substance. Both persons with mental illnesses and persons with drug addictions are persons with disabilities within the meaning of Art. 1(2) CRPD […]. Therefore, coercive measures directed at them fall within the scope of application of the Convention. However, the Federal Constitutional Court has already established that the provisions of the Convention - in particular Art. 12 CRPD -, which aim to safeguard and strengthen the autonomy of persons with disabilities, do not give rise to a general prohibition of measures carried out against the natural will of the persons concerned and tied to their limited capacity for self-determination resulting from their illness (regarding coercive medical treatment cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <306 and 307>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>). Nevertheless, the Convention requires States parties to create appropriate safeguards protecting the persons concerned against conflicts of interest, abuse and disrespect of their rights, and to ensure proportionality (cf. BVerfGE 128, 282 <307>; 142, 313 <345 para. 88>). Pursuant to Art. 12(4) second sentence CRPD, these safeguards also include that such [coercive] measures "apply for the shortest time possible and are subject to regular review by a competent, independent and impartial authority or judicial body". In addition, pursuant to Art. 15(2) CRPD, States parties must take all effective legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures to prevent persons with disabilities, on an equal basis with others, from being subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. [90]

In its concluding observations on the initial report of Germany, the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities recommended that Germany carry out a review with a view to formally abolishing all practices regarded as acts of torture, namely prohibit the use of physical and chemical restraints in institutions for persons with disabilities (cf. UN document CRPD/C/DEU/CO/1 of 13 May 2015, p. 6 § 34). In this respect, the Committee refers to the view of the UN Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment Juan E. Mendéz, according to which any use of restraints - even for a short period of time - can be considered an act of torture and ill-treatment (cf. the report of the UN Special Rapporteur of 1 February 2013, which calls for an absolute ban on the use of physical restraints [UN Doc. A/HRC/22/53, p. 16, 26], available at www.ohchr.org). However, according to Arts. 34 et seq. CRPD, the Committee has no mandate to issue binding interpretations of the text of the Convention. It is also not competent to further develop international conventions beyond the agreements and practices of the treaty parties (cf. Art. 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 23 May 1969, UNTS 1155, 331 <340>, BGBl II 1985 p. 926, affirming customary international law; [...]). While its statements have significant weight, they are not binding on international tribunals or domestic courts (cf. BVerfGE 142, 313 <346 para. 90> with further references). [91]

In respect of an immediate danger posed by persons with mental illnesses to the life and physical integrity of themselves and of third parties, the blanket assumption that qualifies any type of physical restraint as torture or degrading and inhuman treatment seems to go too far. The medical practitioners who testified in the oral hearing before the Court all agreed that it was not possible to completely forgo the use of physical restraints or functionally equivalent measures in certain situations of immediate danger. The Committee, which also rejects other safety measures such as sedation and seclusion, does not provide any answers, based on its interpretation of the text of the Convention, to the question of how to deal with persons who cannot (or no longer) be reached by means of communication and who pose an immediate danger to themselves or others - in this regard, the Committee mirrors its approach regarding coercive medical treatment (cf. BVerfGE 142, 313 <347 and 348 para. 91>). In any case, the strict requirements under constitutional law for the use of physical restraints on confined persons - i.e. a sufficiently specific legal basis, procedural safeguards and strict compliance with the principle of proportionality - ensure that the Federal Republic of Germany can meet its obligations under Art. 12(4) in conjunction with Art. 15 CRPD. [92]

III.

1. For measures amounting to a deprivation of liberty, Art. 104(2) GG adds the additional procedural requirement that a judicial decision be obtained; this requirement, which is not subject to legislative discretion, applies in addition to the requirement of a (formal) statutory provision applicable to interferences with the fundamental right to inviolable freedom of the person under Art. 2(2) third sentence GG (cf. BVerfGE 105, 239 <248>). [93]

Art. 104(2) fourth sentence GG obliges the legislature to enact provisions that specify the requirement of a judicial decision in procedural terms. The effectiveness of the protection of fundamental rights afforded by the requirement that a judicial decision be obtained depends, to a significant extent, on the procedural regulations governing the respective subject area […]. In order to give consideration to the specific characteristics of the different contexts in which such measures are applied, the legislature must provide for a procedural regime that is tailored to the respective measure of deprivation of liberty. It must also ensure that before the deprivation of liberty is enforced, persons concerned are afforded all safeguards deriving from the rule of law that are provided in judicial proceedings (cf. BVerfGE 83, 24 <32>). [94]

Even though Art. 104(2) GG already contains a directly applicable legal guarantee (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <329>; on Art. 13(2) GG see also BVerfGE 51, 97 <114>; 57, 346 <355>), the legislature's regulatory duty to set out the requirement of a judicial decision following from Art. 104(2) fourth sentence GG is by no means obsolete. For reasons of legal certainty, this particularly applies where it is necessary to distinguish between a mere restriction of liberty or an existing deprivation of liberty that is only further intensified on the one hand, and a (new) deprivation of liberty on the other hand. If this distinction is not specified in a legal provision, it will be left to the attending doctors as private actors to determine whether the use of physical restraints requires a judicial decision. Where the legislature fails to fulfil its constitutional duty and, as a consequence, a statutory legal basis does not include provisions setting out the requirement of a judicial decision, which would be required under constitutional law, the legal provision is unconstitutional (cf. BVerfGE 141, 220 <294 para. 174>). [95]

2. The requirement that a judicial decision be obtained serves to strengthen and safeguard the fundamental right of Art. 2(2) second sentence GG (BVerfGE 105, 239 <248>). It aims at preventive oversight of the measure by an independent and neutral body (on Art. 13(2) GG cf. BVerfGE 57, 346 <355 and 356>; 76, 83 <91>; 103, 142 <151>). The Basic Law rests on the assumption that judges are the best and most reliable guarantors for ensuring that the rights of the persons concerned are respected in the individual case, due to the personal and professional independence of judges and the fact that they are bound only by the law (Art. 97 GG) (cf. BVerfGE 77, 1 <51>). It is incumbent upon all state organs to ensure that the requirement that a judicial decision be obtained, as a means of safeguarding fundamental rights, takes effect in practice (cf. BVerfGE 103, 142 <151 and 152>; 105, 239 <248>). As a result, the state is obliged under constitutional law to guarantee that a competent judge is available - at least during daytime hours - and to provide the judges with the means to adequately exercise their judicial functions in this regard (cf. BVerfGE 103, 142 <156>; 105, 239 <248>; 139, 245 <267 and 268 paras. 62 et seq.>; […]). [96]

Pursuant to Art. 104(2) first sentence GG, only judges are allowed to decide whether a deprivation of liberty is permissible and whether it may be continued. The term "decision" entails that judges take complete responsibility for the measure (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <310>; 22, 311 <317 and 318>). […] As a neutral oversight body, they are obliged to ensure, within the limits of what is possible and reasonable, that the interference with fundamental rights remains subject to evaluation and review, including in terms of its duration and intensity (cf. BVerfGE 103, 142 <151>). This also applies if the deprivation of liberty is ordered by private actors, as in the present case. [97]

3. The deprivation of liberty must, in principle, be authorised by prior judicial order (cf., e.g., BVerfGE 10, 302 <321>; 22, 311 <317>; 105, 239 <248>; […]). Seeking a judicial decision only after the measure has already begun is permissible solely in cases where the deprivation of liberty serves a legitimate constitutional goal that could not be achieved if a judicial decision had to be obtained first (cf. BVerfGE 22, 311 <317>; 105, 239 <248> with further references). Yet this will frequently be the case where the use of five-point or seven-point restraints is ordered to avert an immediate danger posed by the persons concerned to themselves or others. [98]

4. In such cases, Art. 104(2) second sentence GG requires that a judicial decision be obtained without undue delay (unverzüglich) (cf. BVerfGE 10, 302 <321>; 105, 239 <249>). The constituent element "without undue delay" must be interpreted as requiring that a judicial decision be obtained without any delay not justified by factual reasons (cf. BVerfGE 105, 239 <249>; […]). Delays that cannot be avoided are, for instance, delays caused by distances, difficulties regarding transport, fulfilling the necessary registration and documentation requirements, or disruptive behaviour of the persons concerned (cf. BVerfGE 105, 239 <249>; BVerfGK 7, 87 <99>; […]). [99]

Factual reasons justifying delays in obtaining a judicial decision may also arise from necessary procedural safeguards that serve to protect the person concerned. In confinement proceedings, the persons concerned must be heard in person (§ 319 of the Act on Proceedings in Family Matters and in Matters of Non-Contentious Jurisdiction, Gesetz über das Verfahren in Familiensachen und in den Angelegenheiten der freiwilligen Gerichtsbarkeit - FamFG). The guardian ad litem must generally be involved (§ 315(2) FamFG). In the interests of the persons concerned, family members or other close persons may also be involved (§ 315(4) FamFG). Other parties to the proceedings must also be heard (§ 319 and 320 FamFG). In some cases, it may be necessary to provide an interpreter for the hearings. Where the use of five-point or seven-point restraints subjects persons already confined to an (additional) deprivation of liberty, these procedural safeguards must apply accordingly. If a doctor orders, on permissible grounds, the use of physical restraints during night time without obtaining a prior judicial decision, it will therefore generally only be possible to obtain a subsequent judicial decision without undue delay the following morning (from 6:00 a.m.). In this context, on-call duty performed by judges on all days of the week is im- perative for ensuring the protection of the persons concerned; taking guidance from § 758a(4) second sentence of the Code of Civil Procedure (Zivilprozessordnung - ZPO), the judicial on-call duty must cover the time period from 6:00 a.m. to 9:00 p.m. (cf. BVerfGE 105, 239 <248>; 139, 245 <267 and 268 para. 64>, still referring to § 104(3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, Strafprozessordnung - StPO). [100]

5. A judicial decision is not required (anymore) in cases where it is foreseeable at the beginning of the measure that a decision cannot be obtained in time before the reason for the measure becomes moot. The same holds true where the measure will have been terminated before a decision can be obtained and it is not expected that the measure will be repeated [...]. In such a case, compliance with the procedure set out in Art. 104(2) GG would not put the persons concerned in a better, but rather in a worse position, since a deprivation of liberty no longer justified by a factual reason would be prolonged due to the necessity of obtaining a subsequent judicial decision (cf. BVerfGE 105, 239 <251>). A subsequent judicial decision under Art. 104(2) second sentence GG concerns the question whether the deprivation of liberty may be continued; it does not, however, serve to only provide an ex-post review of the non-judicial order of a deprivation of liberty that has become moot […]. […] [101]

Accordingly, in cases where five-point or seven-point restraints are used on patients beyond mere short-term application (cf. para. 68 above), hospitals have to take the necessary steps for obtaining a judicial decision without undue delay unless it is clearly foreseeable that the use of restraints will be terminated before a judicial decision can be obtained. If hospital staff, after having applied for a judicial decision, finds that further restraining is no longer necessary to avert a danger posed by the patient to him or herself or others, and if the restraint measure is thus terminated, the application to the court can be withdrawn [...]. Art. 104(2) second sentence GG aims to achieve subsequent oversight without undue delay of an - ongoing - deprivation of liberty; such oversight can no longer be achieved by means of a judicial decision once the measure is terminated because the factual reason justifying it no longer exists […]. [102]

This interpretation of Art. 104(2) GG is in accordance with the European Convention on Human Rights and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights. The Convention does also not require that retroactive legal protection in respect of deprivations of liberty be provided ex officio. This is illustrated by the fact that Art. 5(4) ECHR guarantees a judicial review regarding the lawfulness of a deprivation of liberty only on the initiative of the person concerned (cf. ECtHR, Shchebet v. Russia, Judgment of 12 June 2008, No. 16074/07, § 77: […]). [103]

6. Nonetheless, the persons concerned are not precluded from having a court retroactively review the lawfulness of the measure as the recognised legal interest in bringing judicial proceedings persists in cases of serious interferences with fundamental rights (see para. 59 above). The persons concerned must furthermore be informed about the possibility of having a court review the permissibility of the use of physical restraints after the measure has ended (see para. 85 above). [104]

IV.

According to these standards, the constitutional complaints are well-founded. The decision of the Local Court on the basis of § 25 PsychKHG BW violates the fundamental right of person concerned no. I arising from Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first and second sentences GG (1.) The decision of the Higher Regional Court on the basis of Art. 12(1) in conjunction with Art. 19 BayUnterbrG violates the fundamental right of complainant no. II arising from Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first and second sentences GG (2.). [105]

1. For the most part, § 25 PsychKHG BW satisfies the requirements of Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first sentence GG (a). However, § 25 PsychKHG BW does not set out any requirement that the person concerned be informed, upon termination of the use of restraints or a functionally equivalent measure, about the possibility to seek a judicial review of the lawfulness of the relevant measure (b). Moreover, the legislature did not fulfil its regulatory duty deriving from Art. 104(2) fourth sentence GG to the extent that even for five-point or seven-point restraints, § 25(3) PsychKHG BW requires only a doctor's order, rather than a judicial decision (c). The decision of the Local Court rejecting the action seeking a declaration that the doctor's order authorising the use of five-point restraints was unlawful violates the fundamental right of person concerned no. I under Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first and second sentences GG, since there was no constitutional statutory basis for the use of five-point restraints on the person concerned (d). [106]

a) § 25 PsychKHG BW does not fully satisfy the formal and substantive requirements deriving from Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first sentence GG and the principle of proportionality. [107]

aa) The provision governs the restriction of liberty based on an important reason. [...] The safety of the institution, and in particular the required protection of the life and physical integrity of the person concerned or third parties, would not be sufficiently guaranteed if hospital staff were not allowed to restrict the personal freedom of the person concerned where necessary. [108]

bb) Moreover, the requirement of an immediate and serious danger in § 25 PsychKHG BW sets a high threshold for interferences. [...] [109]

cc) The procedural provisions of § 25(3) and (4) PsychKHG BW - namely the requirement that physical restraint measures be ordered by a doctor, the documentation requirements and the requirement that the measure be accompanied by direct, personal and, in principle, constant supervision by means of visual and voice contact to the person concerned (cf. Baden-Würtemberg Landtag document, Landtagsdrucksache - LTDrucks 15/5521, p. 44) - satisfy the requirements arising under the principle of proportionality. [110]

b) Contrary to the obligation arising from the fundamental right to freedom of the person, however, § 25 PsychKHG does not set out any requirement that the person concerned be informed, upon termination of the use of restraints or a functionally equivalent measure, about the possibility to seek a judicial review of the lawfulness of the relevant measure. In this respect, § 25 PsychKHG BW does not satisfy the requirements of Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) first sentence GG. [111]

c) Furthermore, the Baden-Württemberg legislature did not fulfil its constitutional regulatory duty under Art. 104(2) fourth sentence GG, since it has not enacted provisions regarding judicial orders authorising the use of physical restraints that amount to a deprivation of liberty. Even [...] for five-point and seven-point restraints, insofar as they constitute a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Art. 104(2) first sentence GG (see para. 68 above), the Baden-Württemberg legislature only provided for the requirement of a doctor's order, rather than for the requirement of a judicial decision. To that extent, § 25 PsychKHG BW is not compatible with Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(2) GG. [112]

d) According to these standards, the challenged order of the Ludwigsburg Local Court in proceedings 2 BvR 309/15 violates the fundamental right of person concerned no. I under Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) and (2) GG, because the use of physical restraints on him, which the court had confirmed as lawful, was not based on a constitutional statutory basis. It is primarily incumbent upon the regular courts to also review the compatibility of the invoked legal basis with the Basic Law, to grant preliminary legal protection where necessary and, if the outcome of the review [of constitutionality] is negative, to refer the matter to the Federal Constitutional Court by way of an application for specific judicial review of statutes (konkrete Normenkontrolle, Art. 100(1) GG). […] [113]

The Local Court expressly pointed out that the Baden-Württemberg legislature had granted doctors of recognised institutions the authority to order special safety measures but, in contrast to the provisions governing coercive medical treatment in § 20 PsychKHG BW, had not provided for the requirement of a judicial decision in relation to special safety measures. The court held that it could therefore only review the use of physical restraints, as a measure in the context of enforcing a confinement pursuant to § 327(1) FamFG, as to whether the doctors had observed the provision of § 25 PsychKHG BW when ordering the measure in question. It thus only reviewed whether the ordering of the use of restraints had been lawful on the part of the doctors without calling into question the constitutionality of the legal basis on the grounds that it did not provide for a requirement of a judicial decision. [114]

2. The challenged decision of the Munich Higher Regional Court on the basis of Art. 12(1) in conjunction with Art. 19 BayUnterbrG violates the fundamental right of complainant no. II arising from Art. 2(2) second and third sentences in conjunction with Art. 104(1) and (2) GG. Contrary to the view of the Higher Regional Court, Art. 12(1) in conjunction with Art. 19 BayUnterbrG provides no sufficient statutory basis for using physical restraints on complainant no. II, since the provisions neither satisfy the requirements of legal specificity under Art. 104(1) GG (a), nor require a judicial decision for the deprivation of liberty resulting from the use of seven-point restraints in the present case (b). [115]

I.

The fact that § 25 PsychKHG BW is partially unconstitutional as regards the use of physical restraints does not lead to the provision being partially void. Under the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG), the unconstitutionality of a law does not always result in the law being void (§ 95(3) first sentence BVerfGG); rather, it also allows for a mere declaration that the law is incompatible with the Basic Law (§ 31(2) third sentence BVerfGG). A declaration of incompatibility, together with an order to temporarily continue the application of the unconstitutional provision, may be considered in cases where the immediate invalidity of the objectionable provision would eliminate the basis for the protection of paramount public interests, or of interests on the part of the persons concerned or third parties protected by fundamental rights, and the outcome of a balancing of these interests against the affected fundamental rights suggests that the interference be tolerated for a transitional period (cf. BVerfGE 85, 386 <400 and 401>; 141, 220 <351 para. 355>). [119]

This is the case here. The use of physical restraints generally serves to counter, in exceptional circumstances, an immediate and serious danger to the life and physical integrity of the persons concerned and third parties. For this purpose, it may be permissible where the person concerned poses such a danger to him or herself or others and it is not possible to handle the situation without the use of physical restraints. If § 25 PsychKHG BW, insofar as it concerns the ordering of physical restraints, were declared void with immediate effect, this would result in such measures no longer being permissible in Baden-Württemberg under any circumstances until a legal basis that satisfies the constitutional requirements was enacted, leaving the legislature and professionals in the field no possibility to adapt to the new situation and to develop alternative means providing equivalent protection. This would result in a gap in protection as it would put at risk the fundamental rights of confined persons, hospital staff and other patients, and would likely impair them during this period. [120]

When balancing the constitutional shortcomings of § 25 PsychKHG BW against the constitutional shortcomings resulting from the lack of protection of life and physical integrity in the event that physical restraints could not be used on a confined person posing an immediate danger to him- or herself or others, the protection of the legal interests under Art. 2(2) first sentence GG prevails. The shortcomings of the Baden-Württemberg Act regarding Assistance and Protective Measures for Persons with Mental Illnesses […] concern the procedural requirements of a measure that is, in principle, permissible in substantive terms. If the provision was declared partially void, the substantive protection of the fundamental rights of the persons concerned and third parties as such would be jeopardised. Therefore, the ordering of the use of physical restraints on the basis of § 25 PsychKHG must be tolerated for a transitional period subject to the transitional arrangements set out by the Court (see paras 124 et seq. below). [121]

II.

There is no basis for reversing the order of the Ludwigsburg Local Court of 4 February 2015. The challenged order became moot when person concerned no. I was discharged from hospital. [...] [122]

The judgment of the Munich Higher Regional Court of 4 February 2016 is reversed. The matter is remanded to the Munich Higher Regional Court (§ 95(2) BVerfGG). [123]

III.

1. In the Land Baden-Württemberg, the requirement that a judicial decision be obtained, deriving from Art. 104(2) GG and applicable at least to five-point and seven-point restraints, must be directly applied during a transitional period until 30 June 2019. During this period, the procedural regulations in §§ 312 et seq. and §§ 70 et seq. FamFG can be applied accordingly. […] [124]

In addition, during the transitional period, the fundamental right to freedom of the person (Art. 2(2) second sentence in conjunction with Art. 104 GG) directly imposes an obligation on the attending doctors to inform the persons concerned about the possibility to seek a judicial decision after the end of the measure. [125]

2. In the Free State of Bavaria, there is currently no constitutional statutory basis at all for ordering the use of physical restraints on persons confined under public law in a psychiatric hospital. Nevertheless, the use of such measures may be permissible during a transitional period until 30 June 2019. [126]

a) The Federal Constitutional Court may temporarily tolerate an unconstitutional situation in order to avoid a situation that would be even more at odds with the constitutional order than the current situation (cf. BVerfGE 33, 1 <12 and 13>; 33, 303 <347>; 41, 251 <267>; 45, 400 <420>; 48, 29 <37 and 38>; 85, 386 <401>). [127]

As long as the Bavarian legislature has not yet decided how it intends to remedy the situation of unconstitutionality and whether it wants to continue the practice of using physical restraints as a special safety measure, a gap in protection would also arise in the Free State of Bavaria given the lack of a statutory basis authorising such measures in the context of confinement under public law [...] (see para. 120 above). In that respect as well, it is necessary to balance the established constitutional short-comings against the consequences of an immediate ban on physical restraints: in this regard, the interest in permitting, temporarily, the use of physical restraints for the purposes of protecting the legal interests deriving from Art. 2(2) first sentence GG prevails. [...] [128]

b) However, this does not mean that, during the transitional period, it would be permissible to use physical restraints on confined persons at will in the Free State of Bavaria. Rather, given the high value attached to the fundamental right to freedom of the person, any use of physical restraints must be subject to close monitoring with regard to whether and how long the measure is indispensable to avert an immediate and serious danger posed by the persons concerned to themselves or to significant legal interests of others. Additionally, at least for the use of five-point or seven-point restraints, the requirement deriving from Art. 104(2) GG that a judicial decision be obtained is directly applicable, as set out above for the Land Baden-Württemberg (see para. 124 above). The persons concerned must also be informed about the possibility of seeking a judicial review of the measure after it has ended (see para. 125 above). [129]

Explanatory Annotation

In another decision from the year 2013 dealing with the habeas corpus guarantee of Article 2.2 of the Basic Law, the Constitutional Court had to deal with the constitutionality of the Therapeutic Confinement Act 2010.[33] This Act was the reaction to a decision by the European Court of Human Rights in which Germany had been found in violation of Articles 5.1 (habeas corpus) and 7.1 (retroactive punishment) of the European Convention of Human Rights for its system of preventive detention of prisoners deemed continuously dangerous ("Sicherungsverwahrung"), which at the time allowed preventive detention to be continued beyond the time originally stated in the criminal court's sentencing decision under certain conditions.[34] One consequence of the ECtHR's decision was that the Constitutional Court itself reacted by declaring the system of retrospective extension of preventive detention under certain conditions unconstitutional[35], even though the Constitutional Court, in a 2004 decision, had found this approach to be constitutional.[36]

The decision of the Constitutional Court concerned a case where the affected individual who was prone to serial and violent breaches of criminal law had to be released from preventive detention because of the ECtHR's decision and was subsequently preventively confined to therapeutic detention under the new Act. The Court held the new Act to be constitutional but only if, inter alia, interpreted restrictively to ensure that such post-factum preventive confinement is only possible against individuals "whose conduct suggests a high risk that he or she will commit the most serious violent crimes or sexual offenses"[37], in other words, where the individual poses a severe threat to the core physical integrity or even the life of other people.

The conflict with the ECtHR around the German concept of preventive detention ("Sicherungsverwahrung") demonstrates the difficulties of bringing various systems and approaches to achieve a certain political goal under a common denominator. Generally speaking, prison sentences for violent crimes would probably be regarded as rather lenient in many other countries. The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has practically reduced even the possibility of lifelong imprisonment. However, that system was complemented by a perhaps somewhat more lenient system of the imposition and extension of preventive, i.e., not related to the crime and degree of culpability or guilt, detention of persons deemed to constitute a danger for the outside world. The Therapeutic Confinement Act is the attempt to close that gap in line with constitutional obligations and those under the European Convention on Human Rights.

Facts:

The complainant directly challenges his court-ordered confinement under the Therapeutic Confinement Act. Indirectly, he challenges the provisions of the Therapeutic Confinement Act themselves. [1]

I.

1. The Act on Reforming the Law of Preventive Detention and Accompanying Legislation (Gesetz zur Neuordnung des Rechts der Sicherungsverwahrung und zu begleitenden Regelungen) of 22 December 2010 introduced the "Act on Therapy and Confinement of Mentally ill Violent Offenders" (Gesetz zur Therapierung und Unterbringung psychisch gestörter Gewalttäter - Therapieunterbringungsgesetz - ThUG), which entered into force on 1 January 2011, the day after its promulgation (Federal Law Gazette - Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl I p. 2300 <2305>). The legislative aim of this act was to deal with "gaps of protection" under the former arrangements on preventive detention, gaps that arose following the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Mücke v. Germany (European Court of Human Rights - ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany). The intention was to create a legal basis for certain cases allowing the authorities to securely confine the criminal offenders in question without violating the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms - ECHR - (cf. Bundestag document, Bundestagsdrucksache - BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 14). This "requires limiting the new law's scope to cases, in which the dangerousness of the criminal offenders who are to be released or already have been released from preventive detention follows from a mental disorder" (BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 14). By requiring a mental disorder, the legislature reacted to the European Court of Human Rights, which had found that there had been a violation of Art. 5 sec. 1 ECHR (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 14, 53 and 54). The additional requirement of confinement with a therapeutic focus was meant to address the European Court of Human Rights' finding of a violation of Art. 7 sec. 1 sentence 2 ECHR with regard to retrospectively extended preventive detention (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 14, pp. 54 and 55). [2]

The Act on the Federal Implementation of the Abstandsgebot in the Law of Preventive Detention (Gesetz zur bundesrechtlichen Umsetzung des Abstandsgebots im Recht der Sicherungsverwahrung) of December 2012 added a second section to § 2 ThUG; the amendment entered into force on 1 June 2013 (BGBl I p. 2425 <2430>). [3]

2. Key provision of the Therapeutic Confinement Act is § 1 ThUG, which governs the scope of the Therapeutic Confinement Act and contains the substantive requirements for a confinement. Since its entry into force, it has read as follows: [4]

Therapeutic Confinement

(1) If a final and binding decision by a court has established that a person convicted of a crime of the kind mentioned in § 66 sec. 3 sentence 1 of the German Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch) can no longer be confined in preventive detention because the law of preventive detention must respect the prohibition on retrospectively increasing the severity of a sentence, the competent court may order that this person be confined in an appropriate closed institution if

1. the person suffers from a mental disorder and, taking into consideration his or her personality, prior life and situation as a whole, there is a high probability that he or she will, as a consequence of this mental disorder, cause considerable harm to the life, physical integrity, personal freedom or sexual self-determination of another person, and

2. for the reasons stated in no. 1, confinement is necessary to protect the general public.

(2) Section 1 shall be applicable irrespective of whether the convicted person is still in preventive detention or has already been released. [5]

§ 2 ThUG further defines the above-mentioned "appropriate closed institution". In the amended version (prior, § ThUG had only one section), in force since 1 June 2013 (BGBl 2012 I p. 2425 <2430>), § 2 ThUG reads as follows: [6]

Appropriate Closed Institutions

(1) Only such closed institutions are appropriate for therapeutic confinement pursuant to § 1 of the Therapeutic Confinement Act that

1. can, due to their medical-therapeutic focus, guarantee to provide adequate treatment of the respective mental disorder, with treatment that is based on an individual treatment plan and is aimed at the shortest possible duration of confinement,

2. taking into account therapeutic considerations as well as the security interests of the general public, allow for accommodation of the confined persons that causes them the least hardship, and

3. are separated from penal institutions both spatially and organisationally.

(2) Institutions within the meaning of § 66c sec. 1 of the German Criminal Code are also appropriate for therapeutic confinement if they meet the requirements of section 1 nos. 1 and 2. [7]

With regard to the appropriate institutions, the new section 2 refers to § 66c of the German Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB), which was also introduced by the Act on the Federal Implementation of the Abstandsgebot in the Law of Preventive Detention of 5 December 2012 (BGBl I p. 2425 <2425>), and the purpose of which was to ensure that the design of preventive detention meet the requirements of the constitutional requirement for a clear differentiation between prison sentences and preventive detention (Abstandsgebot). [8]

In addition to these central provisions, the Therapeutic Confinement Act contains provisions on procedure (§§ 3, 4 ThUG), legal remedies (§§ 16, 17, 18 ThUG), medical assessments (§ 9 ThUG), preliminary injunctions (§ 14 ThUG), duration and extension of confinement (§ 12 ThUG), and reversal of therapeutic confinement (§ 13 ThUG). [9]

3. The legislature explicitly included in the scope of the Therapeutic Confinement Act certain cases in which a person had previously only preliminarily been placed in preventive detention, by introducing Art. 316e sec. 4 of the Introductory Act to the German Criminal Code (Einführungsgesetz zum Strafgesetzbuch - EGStGB) via the Second Amendment of the Introductory Act to the German Criminal Code (Zweites Gesetz zur Änderung des Einführungsgesetzes zum Strafgesetzbuch) of 20 December 2012 - in force since 28 December 2012 - (BGBl I p. 2756). Art. 316e sec. 4 EGStGB reads as follows: [10]

(4) § 1 of the Therapeutic Confinement Act of 22 December 2010 (BGBl. I p. 2300, 2305) is also to be applied under the conditions mentioned therein in cases in which the individual in question had not been placed in preventive detention, but his preventive detention had been ordered by a court of first instance, and an appellate decision rendered before 4 May 2011 held that the individual could not be placed in preventive detention only because the prohibition on retroactive aggravations in the law of preventive detention precluded such a final decision and had to be respected, without considering the degree of threat to the general public that the individual in question may pose. [11]

II.

The background of the initial proceedings was as follows: [12]

[The following summary is for the most part taken from press release no. 50/2013 of 8 August 2013.]

[The complainant had] committed several violent offences, mostly with a sexual component and under the influence of alcohol. In 1989, the Regional Court [convicted him of committing offences in a senselessly drunken state (Vollrausch), sentenced him to imprisonment, and] ordered him to be confined in a psychiatric hospital because his criminal incapacity could not be ruled out. In 2005, the Regional Court declared that he was to be no longer confined; although he was still dangerous, his criminal capacity was no longer significantly impaired. In April 2007, before the complainant had completed his sentence, the Regional Court ordered for the first time his subsequent preventive detention. In May 2010, in light of the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof - BGH) ordered the immediate release of the complainant. Following this decision, the city of S. applied for his therapeutic confinement.

Subject-matter of the proceedings 2 BvR 2302/11 are orders concerning the complainant's provisional therapeutic confinement for three months, issued by the Regional Court on 2 September 2011 and by the Higher Regional Court on 30 September 2011. Subject-matter of the proceedings 2 BvR 1279/12 are the orders of the Regional Court (17 February 2012) and of the Higher Regional Court (14 May 2012), which concern the complainant's confinement in the principal proceedings until 1 March 2013. [13-30]

III.

In both proceedings, the complainant's largely identically worded constitutional complaints claim that the Federation did not have the competence to enact federal legislation under Art. 74 sec. 1 of the Basic Law (1.), as well as that the legislation violates the principles of non-retroactivity (Rückwirkungsverbot) (2.) and legal specificity (Bestimmtheitsgebot) (3.), which both follow from Art. 103 sec. 2 GG. He further claims that because there was no legal basis for his confinement, Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 104 GG was violated (4.). [31]

1. According to the complainant, the Federation lacks the legislative competence for the Therapeutic Confinement Act because the law's concept, as laid down in the reasons provided during the legislative process, shows that it can precisely not be considered part of "criminal law" and that it can thus not be based on the competence for "criminal law" under Art. 74 sec. 1 no. 1 GG. […] [32]

2. If, however, the Federation were competent under its competence for criminal law, the Therapeutic Confinement Act, as well as the comparable provisions on retrospective preventive detention, would still violate the principle of non-retroactivity under Art. 103 sec. 2 GG. […] [33]

3. The complainant further alleges that the requirements of legal specificity under Art. 103 sec. 2 GG were violated because § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG did not in a sufficiently precise way define the criteria for a "mental disorder". According to him, the term was too broad because it went clearly beyond the reasons for detention described in Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, which only covers the mentally ill and those not legally responsible for their actions. The complainant particularly stresses that in connection with his termination of confinement in a psychiatric hospital he was held to no longer be in a state of greatly diminished criminal responsibility or even exempt from criminal responsibility, and that he could thus not be considered a person "of unsound mind" within the meaning of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR. The reference to one of the crimes enumerated in § 66 sec. 3 StGB (so-called "Katalogtat") was also too vague, the complainant states, because there is no indication whether any conviction for such a crime suffices or whether such a crime also needs to be the qualifying offence for ordering preventive detention. [34]

4. Finally, the complainant claims that the provisions of the Therapeutic Confinement Act could not apply to him because he had not previously been placed in preventive detention. Therefore, he claims that still having been placed in therapeutic confinement violates Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 104 GG because there was no formal law that justified this deprivation of liberty. […] [35]

III.

Interpreted in conformity with the Constitution, confinement pursuant to § 1 sec. 1 ThUG is consistent with the protection of legitimate expectations under the rule of law pursuant to Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 20 sec. 3 GG. [66]

1. a) Standard for the constitutional review of § 1 sec. 1 ThUG is Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 GG in conjunction with the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations (cf. BVerfGE 72, 200 <242>; 128, 326 <390>). These provisions set limits for the legislative powers when the legislature acts out of concern for the public interest (cf. BVerfGE 14, 288 <300>; 25, 142 <154>; 43, 242 <286>; 43, 291 <391>; 75, 246 <280>; 109, 133 <182>; 128, 326 <390>). The importance of the respective legitimate expectations increases with the severity of the encroachment upon the affected fundamental rights (for an earlier decision, see BVerfGE 109, 133 <186 and 187>; 128, 326 <390>). [67]

   Since the Therapeutic Confinement Act authorises ordering potentially indefinite detention, confinement pursuant to § 1 Abs. 1 ThUG constitutes one of the most serious encroachments upon the fundamental right to liberty (Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 GG) - even if the requirement of distinguishing the circumstances of confinement from those of prison sentences is fulfilled. It thus encroaches upon a right that already on its own holds particular weight among the fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <390>). [68]

   b) Against this backdrop and considering the values of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <315 et seq.>; 128, 326 <366 et seq.>; 131, 268 <295 et seq.>) which, via Art. 5 and Art. 7 sec. 1 ECHR, limit the retrospective imposition or extension of preventive measures that involve deprivation of liberty (cf. on this BVerfGE 128, 326 <391 et seq.>, with further references), the interference with the right to liberty that therapeutic confinement entails, and which is made more severe by concerns regarding the protection of legitimate expectations, is only proportionate if the requirement of distinguishing the circumstances of confinement from those of prison sentences is fulfilled, specific circumstances directly related to the confined person or his or her conduct suggest a high risk that he or she will commit the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences (hochgradige Gefahr schwerster Gewalt- oder Sexualstraftaten), and if the requirements of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR are met (cf. on preventive detention BVerfGE 128, 326 <399>; 129, 37 <46 and 47>; BVerfG, order of the Second Senate of 6 February 2013 - 2 BvR 2122/11 et al. -, juris, para. 27). [69]

2. Pursuant to the standards developed for the law of preventive detention, which also apply to therapeutic confinement being a retrospective measure involving deprivation of liberty (a), confinement pursuant to § 1 sec. 1 ThUG is compatible with Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 20 sec. 3 GG. In this context, the risk assessment under § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG only meets the standards set by the Constitution if it can be established that there is a high risk that the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences will be committed. This result can be achieved by interpreting the provision in a way that conforms to the Constitution (b). § 2 ThUG takes into account the values of Art. 7 sec. 1 ECHR and describes the necessary distance to the enforcement of criminal detention (c). Taking into account the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and the margin of appreciation awarded to the states parties, the term "mental disorder" within the meaning of § 1 sec. 1 ThUG is compatible with the requirements of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR (d). [70]

a) Therapeutic confinement is a deprivation of liberty that is ordered retrospectively. The intensity of this interference with fundamental rights corresponds to that of preventive detention. [71]

While the legislative purpose is forward-oriented since the Therapeutic Confinement Act, based on a current anticipation of dangerousness, aims at protecting the public from serious violations of their legal interests by mentally ill violent criminals and sexual offenders (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 53), this does not change the fact that therapeutic confinement is connected with the past nor the necessity for protecting legitimate expectations that is established by this connection. (cf. BVerfGE 109, 133 <184>, for preventive detention). However, § 1 sec. 1 ThUG does not provide for retroactivity of legal consequences (Rückbewirkung von Rechtsfolgen so-called "true retroactivity" ["echte Rückwirkung"]). It limits the expectations of those affected only in the form of a factual link to the past (tatbestandliche Rückanknüpfung or so-called "quasi retroactivity" ["unechte Rückwirkung"]; regarding this terminology see BVerfGE 127, 1 <16 and 17>; also 131, 20 <36 and 37>). While the onerous legal consequences of the confinement only come into action after the promulgation of the law, they are factually triggered by legally relevant behaviour that happened before the law's promulgation. [72]

Confinement pursuant to § 1 sec. 1 ThUG allows for potentially unlimited deprivation of liberty, which, regarding the deprivation of liberty, is comparable to a prison sentence or preventive detention. The fact that the law's explanatory memorandum states that "therapeutic confinement is fundamentally different from punishment, but also from preventive detention" (BTDrucks 17/3403, pp. 20 and 21), clearly refers to the punishment-like conditions of preventive detention that the European Court of Human Rights found (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, paras. 127 et seq.). As long as the constitutional requirement of distinguishing the circumstances of confinement from those of prison sentences is observed, there is no fundamental difference between confinement under the Therapeutic Confinement Act and preventive detention. [73]

The intensity of its interference with fundamental rights does not differ from the interference caused by preventive detention, just because § 2 ThUG prescribes confinement in an appropriate therapeutic institution and a freedom-oriented therapeutic concept. The law of preventive detention, too, must comply with certain requirements regarding its implementation ("Abstandsgebot", cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <374 et seq.>), since imprisonment, which serves to make amends for a crime, and preventive detention, which entails preventive deprivation of liberty and is independent of individual guilt (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <376 and 377>), differ in their aims and objective justifications. This holds true notwithstanding the deficits of the legal concept of preventive detention that have been observed in the past (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <382 et seq.>) and the problems with its actual implementation (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <384 et seq.>; also ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, paras. 127 et seq.). Accordingly, confinement in preventive detention must - in clear contrast to prison sentences - be freedom-oriented and have a clear therapeutic dimension, so as to minimise the threats posed by the detainee and in order to reduce the duration of the deprivation of liberty to the amount strictly necessary (BVerfGE 128, 326 <374 and 375>). Based on the requirements for a freedom-oriented overall concept for implementing preventive detention, which have since been further specified (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <378 et seq.>), there are no serious reasons that would make confinement in an appropriate institution within the meaning of § 2 ThUG appear as a less intensive interference with the fundamental right to liberty than preventive detention. [74]

b) Taking into consideration the requirements under the European Convention on Human Rights, the principle of proportionality demands that when a decision on therapeutic confinement is made, the protection of the affected person's legitimate expectations be sufficiently considered in the balancing of interests, and that therapeutic confinement only be ordered if specific circumstances related to the confined person or to his or her conduct suggest a high risk that the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences will be committed. [75]

The wording of § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG itself does not provide for such a narrow prediction of dangerousness but merely requires that an assessment of the affected person's personality, prior life, and life situation as a whole lead to the conclusion that there is a high probability that he or she will cause considerable harm to the life, physical integrity, personal freedom or sexual self-determination of another person. However, a restrictive interpretation in conformity with the Constitution is possible. [76]

aa) The requirement of interpretation in conformity with the Constitution demands that when there are several possible interpretations of a provision, some of which lead to a constitutional result, while others lead to an unconstitutional result, preference be given to the interpretation that is in conformity with the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 119, 247 <274>; established jurisprudence). Thus, a provision may only be declared unconstitutional if there is no possible interpretation that is in accordance with the recognised principles of interpretation and in conformity with the Constitution. Respect for the legislative authority commands that, within the limits of the Constitution, the maximum of what the legislature intended be maintained (cf. BVerfGE 86, 288 <320>). Interpretation in conformity with the Constitution finds its limits where it would conflict with the wording of the

bb) Pursuant to these standards, a - restrictive - interpretation of § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG in conformity with the Constitution is possible to the effect that, with regard to the prediction of dangerousness, confinement is only ordered if specific circumstances related to the confined person or to his or her conduct suggest a high risk that the most serious violent crimes of or sexual offences will be committed. [78]

(1) The wording of the provision does not conflict with this interpretation. § 1 sec. 1 ThUG requires a high probability that the life, physical integrity, personal freedom, or sexual self-determination of another person will be severely harmed. The Court need not decide whether there are qualitative differences between the terms of "high probability" ("hohe Wahrscheinlichkeit") and "high risk" ("hochgradige Gefahr") since in any case the provision's wording covers the necessary limitation to the criterion of "high risk". Nor does the fact that § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG requires a "considerable" interference with the legal interests enumerated therein preclude an interpretation in conformity with the Constitution in the way described above. Since the legal interests mentioned in § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG are always significantly affected in cases of serious violence or sexual offences, the legislative intent clearly covers these cases. [79]

(2) The legislative purpose does not conflict with such an interpretation in conformity with the Basic Law. According to the explanatory memorandum, the aim of therapeutic confinement is "the protection, as effective as possible, of the public from serious violations of their legal interests by mentally ill violent criminals and sexual offenders" (BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 53). The explanatory memorandum accepts at the same time that the legislature acts within a "narrow range that is shaped both by a connection to crimes and by preventive objectives, and on which both the Basic Law and the ECHR impose strict requirements" (BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 19). If the legislature thus explicitly recognises the limits imposed on its stated aims by the Basic Law and the European Convention on Human Rights, it is not contrary to the law's purpose if, via an interpretation in conformity of the Constitution, a protection of the public from serious violations of their legal interests by mentally ill violent criminals and sexual offenders is guaranteed that is both compatible with the Basic Law and as effective as possible. [80]

Nor does the argument that the Therapeutic Confinement Act is left without any area of application if it is interpreted according to the Federal Constitutional Court's strict standards on retrospectively ordered or extended preventive detention stand in the way of interpretation in conformity with the Basic Law. This holds true independent of the question, to which degree the Therapeutic Confinement Act is still applicable if the strict proportionality standards are used, now that the standards set by the Federal Constitutional Court on retrospectively ordered or extended preventive detention have been promulgated as a statutory transitional arrangement in Art. 316f sec. 2 sentence 2 EGStGB via the Act on the Federal Implementation of the Abstandsgebot in the Law of Preventive Detention of 5 December 2012 (BGBl I p. 2425). According to the wording of § 1 sec. 1 ThUG and the legislature's intent (BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 53), therapeutic confinement is subsidiary to preventive detention, meaning that the law itself stipulates that confinement in preventive detention takes precedence over therapeutic confinement. Moreover, one should also take into consideration that the Therapeutic Confinement Act was passed at a time when - following the decision of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany) - it had not yet been clarified in the jurisprudence of the Federal Court of Justice whether and if so, under which conditions preventive detention that affected protected legitimate expectations could be ordered. […] At that time, the Federal Constitutional Court had not yet spoken on the matter either. The legislature's concern at the time was thus to create with the Therapeutic Confinement Act a narrowly defined transitional arrangement until the new provisions for preventive detention came into effect (BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 19). Following this line of argument, no recourse to the Therapeutic Confinement Act is necessary in so far as subsequent developments granted the opportunity, within the boundaries of the Constitution and the European Convention Human Rights, to protect the public from dangerous violent criminals or sexual offenders via the law of preventive detention. It is not contrary to the legislature's intention if the law of preventive detention limits the act's scope of application. [81]

c) § 2 ThUG contains the constitutionally-mandated differentiation from the serving of a prison sentence. [82] aa) § 2 sec. 1 no. 3 ThUG in the version in force since 1 June 2013 (cf. BGBl 2012 I p. 2425 <2430>) explicitly prescribes spatial and organisational separation from penal institutions. Pursuant to § 2 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG, confinement is limited to institutions that can, due to their medical-therapeutic focus, guarantee to provide adequate treatment of the respective mental disorder, treatment that is based on an individual treatment schedule and is aimed at the shortest possible duration of confinement. Moreover, while taking into account therapeutic needs as well as the safety interests of the general public, confinement shall burden the confined persons as little as possible (§ 2 sec. 1 no. 3 ThUG). [83]

bb) With these provisions, the act ensures compliance with the requirement of clearly differentiating between prison sentences and therapeutic confinement, which applies not only to preventive detention but also to therapeutic confinement, since the latter is a preventive measure that extends the deprivation of liberty irrespective of individual guilt (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <374 et seq.>). Thereby the act at the same time creates a necessary element to ensure that therapeutic confinement is not classified as punishment within the meaning of Art. 7 sec. 1 ECHR. [84]

(1) The European Court of Human Rights defines the concept of punishment autonomously, i.e. independent of how a measure is classified under domestic law. Starting point of its evaluation is thus whether the measure in question was imposed as a consequence of or following a criminal conviction. Other relevant factors are how the measure in question is characterised under domestic law, the nature and purpose of the measure, the procedure for its imposition and execution as well as its severity (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, para. 120). Using these criteria in the decision Mücke v. Germany, the European Court of Human Rights came to the conclusion that preventive detention must be considered a punishment within the meaning of Art. 7 sec. 1 ECHR. In addition to the reference to the qualifying offence which, along with other requirements, is essential for confinement in preventive detention, the European Court of Human Rights particularly stressed that the way a measure is enforced in practice is relevant for how it is classified: The relatively minor differences of the detention regime compared to that of an ordinary prisoner serving his sentence - for example the right to wear one's own clothes and to further equip one's more comfortable prison cells - could not mask the fact that there was no substantial difference between execution of a prison sentence and of a preventive detention order. There were no special measures, instruments or institutions in place that were directed at persons in preventive detention and aimed at reducing the threat they present and thus at limiting the duration of their detention to what is strictly necessary in order to prevent them from committing further offences. Moreover, the court stressed the fact that preventive detention is ordered in criminal proceedings and is, considering the potential duration of the deprivation of liberty, among the most severe interferences with a person's rights (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, paras. 124 et seq.; see also ECtHR, judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 20008/07 - Mautes ./. Germany, para. 55; judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application nos. 27360/04 and 42225/07 - Schummer ./. Germany, para. 67; judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 17792/07 - Kallweit ./. Germany, para. 68). [85]

(2) Against this backdrop, the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court has specified the constitutional requirements for preventive deprivation of liberty that is independent of individual guilt and qualitatively different from punishment (BVerfGE 128, 326 <374>). The European Court of Human Rights' interpretation of Art. 7 sec. 1 ECHR does not, however, require adjusting the Basic Law's concept of "punishment" under Art. 103 sec. 2 GG to the concept of "punishment" under Art. 7 sec. 1 ECHR, but suggests that the "Abstandsgebot" must be defined more clearly (BVerfGE 128, 326 <392 and 393>). [86]

(3) In the following, the European Court of Human Rights repeated the criteria from its decision in Mücke v. Germany and referred to the conclusions it had made in this judgment, namely the quality of preventive detention as punishment within the meaning of the European Convention on Human Rights (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, paras. 103 et seq.). At the same time, however, it specified its reasons for considering the measure in question a punishment to the effect that, most importantly, it was not convinced that the challenged conditions of preventive detention, which were largely identical to those of an ordinary prisoner serving his sentence, had changed (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, para. 106; for the latest decision see also ECtHR, judgment of 7 June 2012 - Application no. 61827/09 - K. ./. Germany, paras. 82 and 83; judgment of 7 June 2012 - Application no. 65210/09 - G. ./. Germany, paras. 73 and 74). The focus on the implementation deficit, which could be established at least for the past, fits in with the European Court of Human Rights' subsequent reasoning because the court mentions in connection with Art. 46 ECHR that with its judgment of 4 May 2011, the Federal Constitutional Court implemented the findings the European Court of Human Rights had made in its above-mentioned judgments on German preventive detention in the German domestic legal order and thereby fully met its respective obligations (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, paras. 117 and 118; see also the identically worded statements in the ECtHR's later decision, judgment of 19 January 2012 - Application no. 21906/09 - Kronfeldner ./. Germany, paras. 101 and 102). With a view to the set time-frame, the judgment further states that the Federal Constitutional Court found an adequate solution to put an end to ongoing violations of the convention (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, para. 118; ECtHR, judgment of 19 January 2012 - Application no. 21906/09 - Kronfeldner ./. Germany, para. 102). [87]

d) The statutory requirement of a "mental disorder" within the meaning of § 1 sec. 1 ThUG does not conflict with the values of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR. [88] aa) The Therapeutic Confinement Act itself does not provide a definition of the term "mental disorder" as used in § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG. However, the meaning of the words and the act's genesis provide a sufficiently clear indication of how it should be understood. [89]

According to the act's explanatory memorandum, the term "mental disorder" follows the jurisprudence of the ECtHR on Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, which explicitly allows a deprivation of liberty for "persons of unsound mind" (French: aliéné). This also covers abnormal personality traits that do not amount to mental illness. Ongoing abnormally aggressive and seriously irresponsible behaviour of a convicted criminal could be sufficient. Nor does the individual criminal responsibility of the respective person stand in the way of detention based on Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, pp. 53 and 54; with references to the jurisprudence of the European Commission of Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights). The term "mental disorder" also follows the choice of words of the diagnostic classification systems ICD-10 (WHO International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems, 10th revision, chapter V) and DSM-IV (Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders of the American Psychiatric Association, 4th ed.), which are nowadays used in the field of psychiatry (cf. BTDrucks 17/ 3403, p. 54). [90]

The act's explanatory memorandum further states that the disorder need not be of a kind that excludes criminal responsibility of the perpetrator or is assessed as a mental illness in psychiatric-forensic assessment practice. However, there must be a clinically recognisable complex of such symptoms or disturbed behaviours that are accompanied by stress and impairment at the individual level, as well as - not always, but frequently - at the collective or social level. Mere social deviations or social conflicts, which do not affect the individuals in question on a personal level, are thus not covered. Specific disorders of the personality, behaviour, sexual preference, or impulse control could constitute mental disorders; this applies in particular to the dissocial personality disorder and various disorders of sexual preference, for instance paedophilia or sado-masochism (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 54). [91]

This alone shows that the statutory content of a mental disorder pursuant to § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG is meant to be in conformity with the justification for deprivation of liberty under Art. 5 sec. 2 letter e ECHR. It is primarily the responsibility of the regular courts to ensure this conformity when applying the Therapeutic Confinement Act to individual cases. [92]

bb) Notwithstanding these considerations, from the perspective of legal systematics, therapeutic confinement differs from the previous two-track system of confinement in a psychiatric hospital (§ 63 StGB) on the one hand, and preventive detention (§ 66 StGB) on the other. The legislature has installed a "third way", which cannot be distinguished on the basis of criminal responsibility (§§ 20,21 StGB). Not requiring a lack of criminal responsibility for therapeutic confinement does not conflict with the values under Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, nor with the respective jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. [93]

(1) According to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights on Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, this provision must be interpreted as requiring a finding, based on an objective medical assessment, that the person concerned suffers from a "real" or "true" mental disorder that, due to its "kind or degree", requires compulsory admission either in the best interests of the affected person or in the interest of the public. The duration of deprivation of liberty which, according to its cause, must take place in a psychiatric hospital or other appropriate institution (for the latest decision on this aspect see ECtHR, judgment of 19 April 2012 - Application no. 61272/ 09 - B. ./. Germany, para. 69, with further references), must be subject to the continued existence of this disorder (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 24 October 1979 - Application no. 6301/73 - Winterwerp ./. Netherlands, paras. 37 et seq.; established jurisprudence). What is thus required is a relationship between the mental disorder and a certain threat, and that the deprivation of liberty - provided that it is enforced in an appropriate psychiatric facility - can be justified with countering this threat. This also requires that the mental disorder be of a corresponding intensity (cf. Schöch, Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht - GA 2012, p. 14 <28>; Meyer-Ladewig, Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention - EMRK, 3rd ed. 2011, Art. 5 para. 45). In assessing whether the requirements of a mental disorder within the meaning of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR and its continued existence are satisfied, the state parties also have a certain margin of appreciation (for the latest judgment on this issue, see the judgment of 19 January 2012 - Application no. 21906/09 - Kronfeldner ./. Germany, para. 71). [94]

By requiring that the deprivation of liberty be "lawful" and carried out "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law", Art. 5 sec. 1 ECHR in essence refers to domestic law and demands that the deprivation of liberty conform to domestic substantive and procedural rules (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 24 October 1979 - Application no. 6301/73 - Winterwerp ./. Netherlands, paras. 39, 45; judgment of 25 June 1996 - Application no. 19776/92 - Amuur ./. France, para. 50; judgment of 9 July 2009 - Application no. 11364/03 - Mooren ./. Germany, para. 72). Inter alia, this requires that any arrest or detention have a legal basis in domestic law (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, para. 90, with further references). [95]

However, compliance with national law does not suffice to comply with the general principle of legality. Any deprivation of liberty must also comply with the purpose of Art. 5 sec. 1 ECHR, i.e. protecting individuals from arbitrariness (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 9 July 2009 - Application no. 11364/03 - Mooren ./. Germany, para. 72, with further references). Accordingly, domestic law must have a certain "quality", requiring it in particular to be "sufficiently accessible, precise and foreseeable in its application, in order to avoid all risk of arbitrariness" (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 9 July 2009 - Application no. 11364/03 - Mooren ./. Germany, para. 76; judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, para. 90, with further references). Moreover, it must provide "adequate legal protections" as well as "fair and proper procedures" (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 24 October 1979 - Application no. 6301/ 73 - Winterwerp ./. Netherlands, para. 45; judgment of 25 June 1996 - Application no. 19776/92 - Amuur ./. France, para. 53; judgment of 5 October 2004 - Application no. 45508/99 - H.L. ./. United Kingdom, para. 115). Finally, for a depravation of liberty to be compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights, there must be some relationship between the reasons for the deprivation of liberty and the place and conditions of detention. Thus, in principle, it is "lawful" within the meaning of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR to deprive a person of his or her liberty on the basis of mental illness only if such deprivation of liberty is effected in a hospital, a clinic or another appropriate institution (for the latest decision on this aspect see ECtHR, judgment of 19 April 2012 - Application no. 61272/09 - B. ./. Germany, para. 69, with further references). [96]

(2) Pursuant to these standards, the statutory requirement of a "mental disorder" in §97 1 sec. 1 no. 1ThUG does not conflict with the values of the ECHR. To comply with the legal requirements of the convention, it is in particular not necessary to have a mental disorder that reaches the level of severity of §§ 20, 21 StGB ((a)). The conditions for foreseeability are met ((b)), as are the other requirements ((c)). [97]

(a) (aa) A decision by the European Commission on Human Rights of 12 July 1976 already clarified that the concept of "mental disorder" is to be understood in a broader sense that includes abnormal personality traits that do not amount to mental illness. While it is apparent from the facts of the case provided in the decision that the national courts had classified the person concerned as not criminally liable (cf. decision of the European Commission on Human Rights of 12 July 1976 - Application no. 7493/ 76 - X ./ . Germany, Decisions and Reports, volume 6, pp. 182 and 183), the European Court of Human Rights in two further decisions approved of persons who had at least diminished criminal responsibility being confined on the basis of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR. While one of these decisions stated that the challenged confinement was lawful because of a "mental illness", it must be noted that the case involved a person who under English criminal law - which, except in murder cases, only distinguishes between (full) responsibility and insanity and only differentiates according to possible gradations of guilt in the sentencing stage (cf. Albrecht, in: Kröber/Dölling/Leygraf/Sass, Handbuch der forensischen Psychiatrie, volume 1 (2007), p. 547) - had been considered criminally responsible and had thus served a prison sentence before he had been placed in confinement (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 20 February 2003 - Application no. 50272/99 - Hutchinson Reid ./. United Kingdom, paras. 14, 50). Also the second proceedings concerned the detention of a criminal who had been found to have (only) diminished criminal responsibility and who had been sentenced to imprisonment in combination with psychiatric confinement (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 11 May 2004 - Application no. 48865/99 - Morsink ./. Netherlands, paras. 9, 62). [98]

(bb) In its decisions on preventive detention, the European Court of Human Rights does not rule out the possibility that placing certain offenders in preventive detention may meet the conditions of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./.

Germany, para. 103). This is important because offenders in preventive detention do not typically have significantly impaired criminal responsibility. If the conditions of both confinement in preventive detention (§ 66 StGB) and of confinement in a psychiatric hospital (§ 63 StGB) are met because the person concerned suffers from a mental disorder that leads to considerably diminished criminal responsibility, and if the propensity to commit certain crimes that is required for placement in preventive detention results from the psychological defect, confinement in a psychiatric hospital usually takes priority (cf. BGH, order of 6 August 1997 - 2 StR 1999/97 -, Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht - NStZ 1998, p. 35 <36>; BGH, judgment of 20 February 2002 - 2 StR 486/ 01 - juris, para. 15; similarly, with reference to the ultima-ratio character of preventive detention, BGH, judgment of 20 September 2011 - 1 StR 71/11 -, juris, para. 21). [99]

When the European Court of Human Rights' decisions on preventive detention rejected a justification under Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, the court did not base its findings on the argument that a mental disorder within the meaning of this provision must at least be accompanied by an impairment of criminal responsibility. In some cases, the European Court of Human Rights found that there was no mental disorder (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/ 04 - Mücke ./. Germany, para. 103), and in other cases it doubted the existence of a mental disorder (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 17792/07 - Kallweit ./. Germany, para. 55; judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, para. 86; judgment of 19 January 2012 - Application no. 21906/09 - Kronfeldner ./. Germany, para. 79). In doing so, the European Court of Human Rights followed the distinctions made at that time in the German legal system, namely that a difference is made between the placement of dangerous offenders in preventive detention and the placement of mentally ill persons, who committed criminal acts without or with diminished criminal responsibility, in a psychiatric hospital (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 17792/07 - Kallweit ./. Germany, para. 55). The Court based this assessment on the findings of the domestic courts, which had refused to order the concerned persons' placements in a psychiatric hospital pursuant to § 63 StGB (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, paras. 22, 103; judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 17792/07 - Kallweit ./. Germany, para. 55; judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 6587/04 - Haidn ./. Germany, para. 92, on provisions under the laws of the federal states). [100]

Without always rendering a final decision on the question of a mental disorder, the European Court of Human Rights also considered the fact that the domestic courts did not have the authority to review the existence of a mental disorder, and that they did not base their decisions on the persons in question being of unsound mind (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, para. 103; judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 17792/07 - Kallweit ./. Germany, para. 56; judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 6587/04 - Haidn ./. Germany, para. 93; judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, para. 86; judgment of 19 January 2012 - Application no. 21906/09 - Kronfeldner ./. Germany, para. 79). In addition to this - and again independent of the existence of a mental disorder - there could be no justification under Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, because the detention had not been effected in an institution that was appropriate for mentally ill persons (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 17792/07 - Kallweit ./. Germany, para. 57; judgment of 13 January 2011 - Application no. 6587/04 - Haidn ./. Germany, para. 94; judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, paras. 87 et seq.; judgment of 19 January 2012 - Application no. 21906/09 - Kronfeldner ./. Germany, paras. 80 et seq.). [101]

Detention that is consistent with the convention requires that there be a certain relationship between reasons, place, and conditions of the deprivation of liberty. In this context, the European Court of Human Rights considered the fact that the domestic courts had made no use of the possibility granted them by law to have the preventive detention take place in a psychiatric hospital (§ 67a sec. 2 StGB). Discussing the differing national rules under § 67a sec. 2 StGB, which imply better promotion of rehabilitation via the transfer to a different measure, the European Court of Human Rights held that in order to be justified under Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, even those who are unwilling to undergo therapy but have been deprived of their liberty because of their mental illness, have to be placed in a medical therapeutic facility that is appropriate for their condition (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 24 November 2011 - Application no. 4646/08 - O.H. ./. Germany, para. 89; judgment of 19 January 2012 - Application no. 21906/09 - Kronfeldner ./. Germany, para. 82). However, one cannot draw conclusions about the existence or absence of a mental disorder from the fact that a person has not been transferred to a psychiatric hospital. [102]

(cc) As a result, the decisions on the law of preventive detention are to be understood as meaning that the European Court of Human Rights follows the findings of the domestic courts concerning the degree of severity required for a mental disorder, findings which the domestic courts of the respective states parties have made based on the system of their respective national law. Before the Therapeutic Confinement Act entered into force, under German law, the only reasons why the mental state of a dangerous criminal was relevant to the decision of whether he or she was to be placed in preventive detention was to distinguish between full criminal responsibility, diminished criminal responsibility or no criminal responsibility (§§ 20, 21 StGB) - if the offender was fully criminally responsible, he or she could only be placed in preventive detention, if not, the only option was to confine him or her to a psychiatric hospital. With regard to the existence of a mental disorder, the European Court of Human Rights thus had to rely on the findings by the German courts, which were made on the basis of the above-mentioned distinction. [103]

This does not mean, however, that the national legislature cannot alter the system of national law, as has happened with the Therapeutic Confinement Act, and introduce the criterion of a "mental disorder" as a "third way" that is independent of significantly diminished criminal responsibility, and make this criterion the statutory requirement for placement in therapy-focussed confinement. Accordingly, the European Court of Human Rights repeatedly emphasised in recent decisions that when the domestic courts ruled on the continuation of confinement of people who were placed in preventive detention - and thus outside of the scope of § 63 StGB - they did not have to decide on the question of whether the person concerned had a mental disorder. This is where the Therapeutic Confinement Act comes into play. For the first time, it has made the existence of a mental disorder - in addition to certain requirements regarding an ensuing threat - a statutory requirement for confinement, and has thus established judicial obligations to scrutinise this decision that are independent of the conditions of §§ 20, 21 StGB. [104]

(b) To the extent that the European Court of Human Rights also places qualitative requirements on national law regarding a lawful deprivation of liberty, the Therapeutic Confinement Act satisfies these, especially with regard to predictability. The European Court of Human Rights demands that all law be sufficiently "precise", a requirement that does not differ noticeably from the domestic requirements of legal specificity (on this, see IV.). It also requires a "foreseeable" application of the law, meaning that the provision in question must be in force at the relevant point in time, in order to avoid all risk of arbitrariness (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, para. 90, with further references). [105]

So far, the European Court of Human Rights has not expressly decided on the relevant time for predictability under Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR. The decisive moment for deprivation of liberty under Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, which does not - as do Art. 7 and Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter a ECHR - concern deprivation of liberty that results from past behaviour and the ensuing criminal conviction, but deprivation of liberty that results from a present state (in this case a mental disorder and the threat to the public that results from it) (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <398>), is the time it was ordered. At this point in time, there must also be clear evidence of a mental disorder (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 23 February 1984 - Application no. 9019/80 - Luberti ./. Italy, para. 28; judgment of 19 April 2012 - Application no. 61272/09 - B. ./. Germany, para. 68). [106]

In this context, the Senate does not fail to see that in the decision Mücke v. Germany and with regard to Art. 5 sec. ECHR, the European Court of Human Rights somewhat broadly voiced "serious doubts" with regard to foreseeability, and that it seemed to consider as the relevant point in time the moment the crime was committed (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany, para. 104). However, the statement made in that decision cannot be generalised as meaning that one must always look to this point in time when ordering deprivation of liberty pursuant to Art. 5 ECHR. This would also be problematic from a systematic point of view, because such a generalised statement about Art. 5 sec. 1 ECHR as a whole would ultimately mean that the specific prohibition of retroactivity in criminal cases within the meaning of Art. 7 sec. 1 ECHR would be transferred to all justifications under Art. 5 sec. 1 ECHR. Moreover, this interpretation would not fit in with the jurisprudence of the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights, according to which predictability and the relevant point in time, which are meant to help avoid arbitrariness, must be considered in the light of the particular reason for detention and its objectives (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 9 July 2009 - Application no. 11364/03 - Mooren ./. Germany, para. 77; see also ECtHR, judgment of 29 January 2008 - Application no. 13229/03 - Saadi ./. United Kingdom, para. 68). If one includes in the consideration that detention under Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR constitutes deprivation of liberty resulting from a present condition and aiming at protecting the general public (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 4 April 2000 - Application no. 26629/95 - Litwa ./. Poland, para. 60) and is not primarily the response to previous behaviour, one must, in light of the provision's purpose and in keeping with the national margin of appreciation, take the time at which the detention was ordered as the relevant point in time, and not, in the sense of an absolute prohibition of retroactivity, a certain point in the past. [107]

(c) The Therapeutic Confinement Act also satisfies the convention's other requirements for lawful confinement pursuant to Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR. The existence of a mental disorder has to be proven through expert assessments (§ 9 ThUG). The limit on the duration of compulsory confinement (§ 12 sec. 1 ThUG) and the requirement of a new medical assessment for an extension (§ 12 sec. 2 in conjunction with § 9 ThUG) ensure that the extension of the deprivation of liberty depends on the existence of a mental disorder. From § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG follows the necessity of compulsory confinement, which may be necessary not only where a person needs therapy, medication or other clinical treatment but also where the person needs supervision to prevent him or her, for example, from causing harm to him - or herself or other persons (cf. ECtHR, judgment of 20 February 2003 - Application no. 50272/99 - Hutchison Reid ./. United Kingdom, para. 52). Interpreted in conformity with the Basic Law, § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG requires a high risk that the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences will be committed and thus a qualified interference with high-ranking legal interests of third parties. The specifications for appropriate institutions (§ 2 ThUG) guarantee the nexus between the reason for the deprivation of liberty and the place and conditions of the confinement that the convention demands. Finally, in order to secure a fair trial, the person concerned must be provided with a lawyer to assist his or her cause (§ 7 ThUG), and he or she must be heard separately and in person (§ 8 sec. 2 ThUG). The Regional Courts (Landgerichte, § 4 ThUG) decide on the confinement by way of an order (Beschluss, § 10 ThUG) that can be challenged by complaint (Beschwerde, § 16 ThUG). [108]

IV.

When interpreted in conformity with the Basic law, which is necessary due to concerns regarding the protection of legitimate expectations (see above), confinement pursuant to the Therapeutic Confinement Act does not for other reasons interfere with the right to liberty under Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 104 sec. 1 GG; in particular, the principle of legal specificity is satisfied. [109]

1. Art. 103 sec. 2 GG does not apply to therapeutic confinement because, just like preventive detention, this kind of confinement does not constitute punishment within the meaning of Art. 103 sec. 2 GG (cf. BVerfGE 109, 133 <187 and 188>; 128, 326 <376 and 377, 392 and 393>; all cases being on preventive detention). Punishment under Art. 103 sec. 2 GG requires that the burden imposed be accompanied by a disapproval of culpable conduct and that it aim (at least to some degree) at compensation for criminal guilt (BVerfGE 109, 133 <172 et seq.>; 128, 326 <376 and 377, 392 and 393>). The purpose of therapeutic confinement, however, is solely to protect in the future society and its members from individual offenders who, based on their previous behaviour, are deemed to be highly dangerous. [110]

In the case at hand, the standards for legal specificity are set by Art. 104 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG. This provision requires that the legislature describe with sufficient clarity the cases in which deprivation of liberty is permissible. Deprivation of liberty must be regulated in a predictable, measurable and reviewable manner. In this respect, Art. 104 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG substantiates the requirements for legal specificity that follow from the rule of law (cf. BVerfGE 29, 183 <195 and 196>; 76, 363 <387>; 109, 133 <188>). The more severe the interference with fundamental rights, and the more serious the consequences of the provision, the more accurate the requirements set by the legislature must be (cf. BVerfGE 86, 288 <311>; 93, 213 <238>, with further references; 109, 133 <188>). Since preventive deprivation of liberty interferes with the fundamental right of Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 GG just as strongly as prison sentences, Art. 104 sec. 1 GG leads to similar requirements for legal specificity as Art. 103 sec. 2 GG (BVerfGE 29, 183 <196>; 78, 374 <383>; 96, 68 <97>; 131, 268 <306>). [111]

The principle of legal specificity does not preclude the use of terms requiring further clarification (cf. BVerfGE 11, 234 <237>; 28, 175 <183>; 48, 48 <56>; 92, 1 <12>; 126, 170 <196>). The legislature must remain in a position to master the diversity of life (with regard to Art. 103 sec. 2 GG, cf. BVerfGE 28, 175 <183>; 47, 109 <120 and 121>; 126, 170 <195>). The degree of specificity required of a given provision cannot be defined in the abstract, but depends on the specifics of the particular fact pattern including the circumstances that led to the statutory regulation (BVerfGE 28, 175 <183>; 86, 288 <311>; 126, 170 <196>). As long as it is possible to arrive at a reliable basis for interpreting and applying the provision via the usual methods of interpretation, in particular by reference to other provisions of the same act, by considering the context of the provision, or as a result of established jurisprudence, there are no concerns against using vague legal terms (BVerfGE 45, 363 <371 and 372>; 86, 288 <311>). Moreover, it is the task of the courts to dispel any questions remaining regarding the scope of a provision by interpreting this provision as well as possible and thus making it more precise and concrete (cf. BVerfGE 126, 170 <198> regarding the obligation to specify which Art. 103 sec. 2 GG imposes on the courts). [112]

2. Pursuant to these standards, there are no concerns against § 1 sec. 1 ThUG. Via the links contained in the explanatory memorandum on the Therapeutic Confinement Act (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, pp. 53 and 54), which refer to the requirements developed in the context of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, and to the language of contemporary diagnostic classification systems used in the field of psychiatry, the vague legal term of "mental disorder" (cf. BVerfG, order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 15 September 2011 - 2 BvR 1516/11 -, juris, para. 39) is specified in a way that - together with the other statutory criteria - is available to an interpretation specifying its content and meeting the requirements of legal specificity. [113]

a) aa) Even without any final definition of the term, the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights on Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR establishes a restrictive interpretation to the effect that a "mental disorder" must meet at least certain qualitative minimum requirements. One of these requirements demands an objective medical opinion establishing that the person suffers from a "true mental disorder", the "kind or degree" of which requires involuntary commitment to an institution, either in the interest of the affected person, or in the public interest. The duration of the deprivation of liberty must also depend on the continued existence of this disorder and the confinement must - in accordance with its cause

- take place in a psychiatric hospital or institution (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 24 October 1979 - Application no. 6301/73 - Winterwerp ./. Netherlands, paras. 37 et seq.; established jurisprudence). In addition to the formal aspect that the diagnosis may only be based on an objective medical opinion, there is also a substantive requirement, namely that there is a "true" mental disorder which, due to the way it presents itself, requires compulsory confinement. Thus, Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR - like § 1 sec. 1 ThUG itself (cf. on this below at (b)) - links the mental disorder to the purpose of the confinement and thus imposes requirements on the intensity of the mental disorder (cf. Schöch, GA 2012, p. 14 <28>; Meyer-Ladewig, ECHR, 3rd ed. 2011, Art. 5 para. 45), because the mental disorder must be reflected in the reason for the deprivation of liberty. The latter is also reflected in the fact that, in accordance with its cause, the confinement must take place in an appropriate institution. [114]

bb) Moreover, for determining whether there is a mental disorder, the explanatory memorandum follows the classification systems ICD-10 (International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems of the WHO, 10th revision, chapter V) and DSM-IV (Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders of the American Psychiatric Association, 4th ed.), which are recognised in the field of psychiatry (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 54). [115]

(1) With regard to the criticism that the diagnosis of "antisocial personality disorder" pursuant to DSM-IV is controversial because its criteria are already met by repeated violations of rules and behavioural problems without need for psychopathological symptoms (cf. statement of the DGPPN of 6 March 2012, p. 4), the Court points out that at least according to the explanatory memorandum (BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 54) and the reference to the classification system ICD-10, which is also made, it cannot be doubted that mere social deviations or conflicts are not sufficient for a mental disorder within the meaning of § 1 sec. 1 ThUG. [116]

(2) The usual methods of interpretation can also answer the question of whether it is a requirement for confinement pursuant to § 1 sec. 1 ThUG that there be subjective distress on the part of the person involved. Existing disagreements over this question do also not establish insufficient specificity of this provision. [117]

As for psychiatry's view of the relationship between subjective distress and mental disorders there is an empirical, but no conceptual connection. While it is argued that suffering is usually or always indicative of a mental disorder (cf. Merkel, Betrifft Justiz 2011, p. 202 <205>; Morgenstern, Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik - ZIS 2011, p. 974 <977>), it is also conceded that, alternatively, merely objective limitations of important functions could be enough (Mahler/Pfäfflin, Recht und Psychatrie - R&P 2012, p. 130 <131>; probably also Morgenstern, ZIS 2011, p. 974 <978>). Accordingly, even though subjective distress is a frequent or typical side effect of a mental disorder, it is no precondition by definition for its existence. In keeping with this, it fits that the preface on personality and behavioural disorders (F60-F69) pursuant to ICD-10 mentions that they are often - and therefore not always - accompanied by varying degrees of personal distress and impaired social functioning (cf. International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems of the WHO, 10th revision, version 2013, chapter V, personality and behavioural disorders (F60-F69), p. 297). [119]

In addition, while the legal concept of mental disorders pursuant to § 1 sec. 1 ThUG is modelled on the diagnostic classification systems used in psychiatry, the purpose of the provision cannot be disregarded when interpreting it as a legal concept. This is different from a hippocratic approach, which uses distress as justification for therapeutic intervention (cf. Kröber, Forensische Psychatrie, Psychologie, Kriminologie - FPPK 2012 p. 60 <61>). In accordance with the requirements of Art. 5 sec. 1 sentence 2 letter e ECHR, § 1 sec. 1 ThUG aims at protecting the public as effectively as possible from serious violations of their legal interests by mentally ill violent criminals and sexual offenders (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 53). It would not be compatible with this legislative concept to focus on subjective distress and thus to preclude the possibility of confining people who, according to their own perception, do not suffer from their psychological condition - a condition that makes them commit the most serious violent and/or sexual offences (cf. Merkel, Betrifft Justiz 2011, p. 202 <206>). [120]

Nor does the wording of § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG, according to which an order of confinement requires that the person concerned "suffer from a mental disorder" warrant such inappropriate interpretation. The verb "to suffer (from)" ("leiden (an)") can stand for a mere affliction that has a negative connotation for the person using the word, but not necessarily for the afflicted person him- or herself (cf. Duden, Deutsches Universalwörterbuch, 5th ed. 2003, p. 1008). […] Often the phrase is used in personal, especially medical, contexts in a way that says nothing about the subjective feelings of the person concerned, and that does not require any determinations on this issue (cf. only, e.g., § 21 sec. 2 no. 6 of the Medicinal Products Act - Arzneimittelgesetz). § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG is an example of such use (cf. also Nußstein, Strafverteidiger - StV 2011, p. 633 <634>). [121]

b) The possibility of therapeutic confinement is further significantly limited by the fact that apart from a mental disorder, the law also expressly requires a causal link between the mental disorder and the threat. Pursuant to § 1 sec. 1 no. 1 ThUG, the competent court may order a person to be confined if he or she suffers from a mental disorder and if, taking into consideration his or her personality, prior life and life situation as a whole, there is a high probability that he or she will, as a consequence of this mental disorder, cause considerable harm to the life, physical integrity, personal freedom or sexual self-determination of another person. With regard to this causality, the explanatory memorandum remarks that the requirement of performing a prediction of dangerousness, which requires a high degree of probability, ensures that confinement is only an option if it is very likely that the disorder will result in serious threats to particularly significant legal interests of third parties; there must be a causal link between the mental disorder and the resulting dangerousness of the person concerned (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 54). This link implements the legal requirement of the convention that the degree or type of the disorder must justify the involuntary confinement (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 19 April 2012 - Application no. 61272/09 - B. ./. Germany, para. 69, with further references; consistent jurisprudence). [122]

It does not matter that, based on the diagnostic manuals, the term "mental disorder" covers diverse disorders that have very different effects, and that it thus encompasses a wide range of people who rarely also pose a threat, let alone a considerable threat. The fact that the provision's requirements refer to a mental disorder does not contain a stigmatising attribution to the effect that persons who suffer from a mental disorder are at the same time dangerous in a way that warrants confinement. To the contrary, the additional requirement of a mental disorder that results in a particular level of dangerousness implies that the threat is very much not seen as automatically connected with a mental disorder. By demanding a causal link between the mental disorder and the additionally required dangerousness, the legislature implemented the requirement of the convention that the degree or type of the disorder must justify the involuntary confinement (cf. only ECtHR, judgment of 19 April 2012 - Application no. 61272/09 - B. ./. Germany, para. 69 with further references; established jurisprudence). [123]

c) Moreover, the scope of the interfering provision is further restricted by the formal requirements of therapeutic confinement, which in turn are sufficiently specific. This applies above all to the requirement of a conviction for one of the enumerated criminal acts of § 66 sec. 3 StGB that, according to the explanatory memorandum, clearly does not need to have been the qualifying offence for the preventive detention (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 53), and to the requirements of previous preventive detention. [124]

Ultimately, the Therapeutic Confinement Act also satisfies the special requirements that apply to the legal specificity of predictive decisions. If preventive deprivation of liberty is at stake, they require that the legislature not only determine the statutory requirements of the custodial measure but, in view of the uncertainty related to making predictions, that it also determine how long the predictive decision shall be valid and when it must be re-assessed (cf. BVerfGE 109, 133 <188>). In § 12 sec. 1 ThUG, the legislature limited the validity of the predictive decision to no more than 18 months, and in § 12 sec. 2 sentence 1 ThUG it declared that the provisions regarding the first decision ordering confinement apply accordingly to a decision on its extension (with some adaptions regarding medical assessment) (§ 12 sec. 2 sentences 2 to 4 ThUG). [125]

V.

In the version relevant for this case, the Therapeutic Confinement Act does not violate the prohibition of laws that are merely applicable to a single case (Verbot des Einzelfallgesetzes) under Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG. [126]

1. Within its scope of application in the case at hand (cf. on the scope of application, BVerfGE 24, 367 <396>; 83, 130 <154>; 95, 1 <17>), Art. 19 sec. 1 GG prohibits laws that restrict fundamental rights not in a general way but only for individual cases. A law fulfils the requirement of being "general" if, due to its abstract constituent elements, one cannot tell to how many and which cases it applies (BVerfGE 121, 30 <49>, with further references). [127]

This does not, however, preclude the possibility that a law applies only to a single case, if the facts are such that there is just one case of this kind and there are objective reasons for regulating this individual case (cf. BVerfGE 25, 371 <399>; 85, 360 <374>). Ultimately, Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG contains a substantiation of the general principle of equality (cf. BVerfGE 25, 371 <399>; Jarass, in: Jarass/Pieroth, Grundgesetz, 12th ed. 2012, Art. 19 para. 2; cf. also Dreier, in: Dreier, Grundgesetz, 2nd ed. 2004, volume I, Art. 19 I para. 16 ("Verschärfung oder Konkretisierung"); Hufeld, in: Bonner Kommentar, Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 para. 8 (156th shipment 2012) ("Verschärfung")), which forbids the legislature to pick one case from a number of similar ones and make this case the subject of an exception (cf. BVerfGE 25, 371 <399>; 85, 360 <374>). The prohibition of laws that apply only to a single case aims at ensuring equality. This aim is also met if the prohibition is read to include the task of safeguarding the principle of separation of powers by leaving specific-individual provisions to the executive branch and by reserving general-abstract provisions for the legislature (cf. Sachs, in: Sachs, Grundgesetz, 6th ed. 2011, Art. 19 para. 20). Here, the principle of separation of powers applies specifically in its equality-ensuring function. [128]

Without such a limitation, which is based on the provision's purpose, and according to which regulating an individual fact pattern can be permissible if there is sufficient justification, Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG could potentially conflict with other principles of the Constitution. Since the legislature may enact legislation only in the form of formal laws, this applies in particular to the requirement of a statutory provision (Vorbehalt des Gesetzes) in the form of the requirement of parliamentary approval (Parlamentsvorbehalt), which follows from the principle of democracy of Art. 20 sec. 1 and sec. 2 GG and the principle of the rule of law of Art. 20 sec. 3 GG (cf. Remmert, in: Maunz/Dürig, Grundgesetz, Art. 19 sec. 1 para. 15 (66th shipment 2012); Krebs, in: von Münch/Kunig, Grundgesetz, 6th ed. 2012, Art. 19 paras. 8 et seq.). It is up to the legislature to resolve this tension. This is a way to avoid a situation in which the authorities would otherwise have to remain inactive because an individual fact pattern required statutory regulation. [129]

2. Pursuant to these standards, the Therapeutic Confinement Act does not violate Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG. [130]

In its wording, § 1 sec. 1 ThUG is phrased in an abstract way and thus complies with the requirement of generality (Allgemeinheitsgebot) of Art. 19 sec. 1 sentence 1 GG. It is true that the scope of application of the act concerns a closely limited group of persons, because from the outset it affects only those persons in preventive detention who, as a result of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights of 17 December 2009, had to be dismissed from preventive detention or who had already been dismissed (cf. BTDrucks 17/3403, p. 19). However, this abstract limitation does not individually target the affected persons. At the time of legislative proceedings, the legislature did not know the exact number of persons affected by the scope of § 1 sec. 1 ThUG. A fortiori, the legislature could not know which individuals would be affected. Since at the time, the regular courts had not yet clarified how the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR, judgment of 17 December 2009 - Application no. 19359/04 - Mücke ./. Germany) was to be taken into account in the national context (cf., on the one hand, BGH, order of 12 May 2010 - 4 StR 577/09 -, juris; on the other hand BGH, order of 21 July 2010 - 5 StR 60/10 -, BGHSt 55, 234), there had not been a determination for which group of persons in preventive detention the protection of legitimate expectations would end their preventive detention, and would render the Therapeutic Confinement Act applicable. Moreover, § 1 sec. 1 ThUG did not establish an automatism to the effect that all people in preventive detention who were still classified as dangerous, but who were released or were to be released as a result of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights of 17 December 2009, were to be transferred into therapeutic confinement. [131]

VI.

The decisions by the regular courts challenged by the constitutional complaints are not consistent with the requirements set by the Basic Law for applying the Therapeutic Confinement Act. The orders violate the complainant's fundamental right under Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 20 sec. 3 GG, because the regular courts did not base their decisions on the requisite standards of proportionality as warranted by the Constitution. What is decisive for finding a violation of fundamental rights is alone the objective unconstitutionality of the challenged decisions of the regular courts at the time of the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court; it is irrelevant whether the regular courts can be blamed for the violation of the fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <407 and 408>). [132]

1. a) The challenged decision of the Saarland Higher Regional Court of 30 September 2011 in proceedings 2 BvR 2302/11 does not meet the requirements of the protection of legitimate expectations. [133]

   Having quoted the text of the statute, the Higher Regional Court uses as standard of review whether, on the basis of expert opinions, there is a "high likelihood that there will be other serious (sexual) offences" and refers to the "higher standard of dangerousness" mentioned in the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court of 4 May 2011. However, the court did not apply the part of this higher standard of dangerousness that requires a high risk of the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences being committed (cf. BVerfGE 128, 326 <332>). Rather, the Higher Regional Court only referred to "serious (sexual) offences". Nor can it be concluded from its other statements that the Higher Regional Court applied the strict standards for retrospectively ordering or extending preventive detention that also follow from the Federal Constitutional Court's decision. In particular, saying that "one must assume that there is a very high probability of renewed offences of the same overall category being committed" does not indicate that "overall category" only encompassed "the most serious" violent crimes or sexual offences. [134]

   b) Nor does the decision of the Saarbrücken Regional Court of 2 September 2011, which preceded the constitutional complaint, use the standards that follow from the protection of legitimate expectations. Instead, following the expert opinions submitted in this case, the decision relies on its finding that "the person concerned continues to pose a risk of committing serious violent crimes and/or sexual offences of the kind mentioned in § 66 sec. 3 sentence 1 StGB" without giving reasons for its choice of standard of review. This does not meet the constitutional requirements because not all crimes of the referenced (broad) list of cases of § 66 sec. 3 sentence 1 StGB belong to the category of the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences, and because the probability of such crime being committed has not been addressed. [135]

2. a) With regard to the decision of the Saarland Higher Regional Court of 14 May 2012, which was challenged in proceedings 2 BvR 1279/12, the combination of the referenced results of the medical assessments, of the statements regarding standards differing from the ones contained in the Federal Constitutional Court's order on continued validity (Fortgeltungsanordnung), and of the court's application of the law to the facts does also not show whether the Higher Regional Court applied the standards of proportionality that are required for ordering therapeutic confinement. Following the wording of § 1 sec. 1 ThUG, the Higher Regional Court points out that the "high probability" within the meaning of the Therapeutic Confinement Act is not the same as the "high risk that the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences will be committed", as is required for retrospectively ordered or extended preventive detention. [136]

It need not be decided at this point to what extent the statements of the Higher Regional Court regarding the appropriate standard of probability are, per se, compatible with the constitutional requirements. Not objectionable under constitutional law is the Higher Regional Court's approach, according to which no fixed percentage can be used for determining the required degree of probability, and which states that one must instead consider the weight of the predicted offences. This correlation is based on the fact that the mentioned strict requirements are a manifestation of the protection of legitimate expectations of the person concerned, which has to be considered when performing the proportionality test, and which has to be balanced against the security interests of the general public. Two criteria determine the weight of the general public's interest - the severity of the expected offences and the probability that these offences will actually be committed. Accordingly, when determining the weight of the interests of the general public, and within narrow limitations, a lesser pronounced criterion can be offset by the other, more strongly pronounced criterion. In this context, offences below the threshold of "most serious violent crimes or sexual offences" must not be taken into consideration. Due to the normative correlation described above, the establishment of a "high risk" can vary within the range of this group of offences, but even with regard to the most serious violent crimes or sexual offences conceivable, there always has to be a significant probability of them actually being committed. [137]

The challenged decision of the Saarland Higher Regional Court does not meet the constitutional requirements, because the decision does not show that the standard used for the prediction only refers to the "most serious violent crimes or sexual offences", which alone are to be considered in this context. Both the account of the findings of the medical assessments that had previously been made, and the account of the medical assessments made specifically for the judicial proceedings, do not refer in their prediction of probability to the field of the "most serious violent crimes or sexual offences", but refer more generally to "violent offences against women", "further sexual or violent offences", "crimes belonging to the same general category", "further crimes", "violent sexual offences", or "sudden aggressive behaviour". Because these terms can also include types of offences that do not belong to the category of the "most serious violent crimes or sexual offences", it is not enough that the Higher Regional Court comes to the conclusion that there is a "high probability" that "the most serious crimes" will be committed, even though there is no basis for this conclusion in the medical assessments referred to. In particular, one cannot simply refer in this context to previously committed offences. While among them there are undoubtedly some of the "most serious" type, the court failed to specifically indicate which previous offences belonged to the "most serious" type of crimes and what the degree of probability was that specifically these crimes - which alone are to be considered in this context - would be committed. [138]

b) The preceding order of the Saarbrücken Regional Court of 17 February 2012 also violates Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 20 sec. 3 GG, because it is likewise not based on the standards required by the Constitution. Instead, with regard to substance, the order refers to (only) "severe" violent crimes, and the order also explicitly rejects the idea that, with regard to legitimate expectations, the more exacting standards of the law of preventive detention be used. [139]

3. There is no need to decide whether, in addition to this, the challenged orders also violate the prohibition of analogy of Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 3 in conjunction with Art. 104 sec. 1 GG because the Therapeutic Confinement Act was used in the case of the complainant by way of interpretation even though, lacking a final decision on his preventive detention, he had not yet been placed in preventive detention but instead, the legal basis for executing the confinement was merely preliminary confinement pursuant to § 275a sec. 5 StPO (old version). The orders challenged in this case are already unconstitutional due to the stated violation of Art. 2 sec. 2 sentence 2 in conjunction with Art. 20 sec. 3 GG. [140]

4. Pursuant to § 95 sec. 1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG), it is sufficient to declare the challenged decisions unconstitutional. It is not necessary to annul the challenged decisions since they are no longer the basis for the current confinement and thus no longer impact the complainant (cf. BVerfGE 50, 234 <243>; BVerfG, order of the Third Chamber of the Second Senate of 17 April 2012 - 2 BvR 1762/10 -, juris, para. 18). [141]

IV. Equality and Non-Discrimination - Article 3 of the Basic Law

1. Prohibition of Nocturnal Employment, BVerfGE 85, 191

Explanatory Annotation

Gender discrimination was the issue in this case where the applicant complained against legislation prohibiting the employment of women between 10 pm and 6 am. The legislation's object and purpose was to protect women from night work because the factual reality of working and often taking care of the household and family made women especially susceptible for the health risks associated with working at night. Article 3.1 stipulates that all persons are equal before the law. This means in essence that differentiation between two comparison groups, such as men and women, requires a reasonable justification. The legislation in question in this case differentiated between female workers and female salaried employees. Only the former were not allowed to work at night. The two comparison groups are workers and office employees but there are no reasonable arguments to justify differentiation between these two groups.

Article 3.2 obligated the government to pro-actively promote gender equality.

Article 3.3 prohibits discrimination on a number of grounds specifically listed, gender (sex) being one of them. The Court has interpreted this provision as going beyond Article 3.1 and prohibiting in principle of any differential treatment of people on account of the attributes listed in Article 3.3. However, Article 3.3 does not absolutely prohibit differentiating between the sexes. If the differentiation addresses a problem that is inherently connected to one's gender and if the different treatment is absolutely necessary to resolve the problem, then differential treatment is still possible. That would, for example, certainly be the case for protective measures during pregnancy. The prohibition to work at night, on the other hand, obviously did not pass this threshold. Working at night poses equal health risks for men and women and there is no compelling reason to exempt only women from working at night and thus excluding them from employment opportunities.

Translation of the Prohibition of Nocturnal Employment Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 85, 191*

Headnotes:

1. Under Article 100.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) a law may not be used as the basis for a decision if it conflicts with European Community law.

2. Unequal treatment on the basis of gender is compatible with Article 3.3 of the Basic Law only if absolutely required to resolve problems that because of their nature can occur only in the case of men or women.

3. The regulative import of Article 3.2 of the Basic Law that goes beyond the scope of the prohibition of discrimination under Article 3.3 of the Basic Law lies in the fact that it establishes a doctrine of equality and extends it to societal reality.

4. The prohibition of nocturnal employment under s. 19 of the Working Time Ordinance (Arbeitszeitordnung - AZO) discriminates against female hourly employees as compared with male hourly paid employees and female salaried-employees; it is therefore in violation of Articles 3.1 and 3.2 of the Basic Law.

Judgment of the First Senate of 28 January 1992 on the basis of the oral hearing of 1 October 1991 - 1 BvL 1025/82, 1 BvL 16/83 and 10/91 -

Facts:

S. 19.1 of the Working Time Ordinance of 1938, most recently amended by the Act of 10 March 1975 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 685), prohibits, inter alia, paid employment at night between the hours of 8:00 p.m. and 6:00 a.m. A series of economic sectors, in particular agriculture and forestry, are exempted from this provision. S. 19.2 of the Working Time Ordinance contains special provisions for multiple-shift enterprises; s. 19.3 of the Working Time Ordinance makes provision for further general exceptions to the prohibition of nocturnal employment, for example, in the case of transport undertakings and eating and drinking establishments.

The complainant was employed in a managerial capacity by a baked goods factory; she was fined for paid employing in her enterprise during the night.

In response to her constitutional complaint, the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG) reversed the court decisions that had confirmed the imposition of the fine and found s. 19.1 of the Working Time Ordinance incompatible with Articles 3.1 and 3 of the Basic Law.

Extract from the Grounds:

B. II.

The constitutional complaint is admissible.

On the basis of the submissions of the complainant, a violation of her fundamental rights is possible. She is to be sure not personally discriminated against by the prohibition of nocturnal employment, which applies only to paid employees. As a result, a violation of her fundamental right under Article 3 of the Basic Law is not at issue. However, there may exist a violation of her fundamental right to general freedom of action if the prohibition of nocturnal employment under s. 19.1 of the Working Time Ordinance is in violation of Articles 3.1 and 3 of the Basic Law since it discriminates against paid employees as compared with other employees without sufficient reason. In any case, a provision that compels a citizen to treat others in a discriminatory manner directly compromises that person's general freedom of action. Insofar as the decision BVerfGE 77, 84(101) concludes otherwise, it may not be relied upon.

C.

The constitutional complaint is founded. The decisions under challenge are based on the prohibition of paid nocturnal employment of under s. 19.1 of the Working Time Ordinance. This prohibition is, however, not compatible with Articles 3.1 and 3 of the Basic Law. The imposition of a fine on this unconstitutional basis violates the complainant's fundamental right to general freedom of action (Article 2.1 of the Basic Law).

I.

The prohibition of nocturnal employment for female hourly employees (s. 19.1 first alternative of the Working Time Ordinance) is in violation of Article 3.3 of the Basic Law.

1. According to this article of the Basic Law, no one may be discriminated against or privileged on the basis of gender. It reinforces the general principle of equality under Article 3.1 of the Basic Law by narrowing the operating freedom afforded the legislature therein. Gender may in principle - like the other attributes mentioned in s. 3 - not be used as the basis for unequal treatment under the law. This also applies when a provision is not intended to have for effect unequal treatment of a nature prohibited under Article 3.3 of the Basic Law, but rather to pursue other objectives (Clarification of BVerfGE 75, 40 [70]).

Article 3.2 of the Basic Law contains no more exhaustive or more specific requirements in respect of the question as to whether a provision of law wrongfully discriminates against women on the basis of gender. The regulative import of Article 3.2 of the Basic Law that goes beyond the scope of the prohibition of discrimination under Article 3.3 of the Basic Law lies in the fact that it establishes a doctrine of equality and extends it to societal reality. The sentence "men and women shall have equal rights" is intended not only to set aside laws that discriminate against or favour individuals on the basis of gender related attributes, but also to achieve equal rights for both genders in the future (see BVerfGE 15, 337 [345]; 48, 327 [340]; 57, 335 [345, 346].

It is intended to achieve equality in living conditions. For example, women must have the same employment opportunities as men (see BVerfGE 6, 55 [82]).

Traditional role models that result in greater burdens upon or other disadvantages for women may not be reinforced by measures of the state (see BVerfGE 15, 337 [345]; 52, 369 [376, 377]; 57, 335 [344]). The actual disadvantages that women typically experience may be compensated by preferential treatment under the law due to the principle of equal rights embodied in Article 3.2 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 74, 163 [180]).

The case at hand does not involve the equalization of conditions, but rather the elimination of the existence of unequal treatment under the law. s. 19.1 of the Working Time Ordinance treats paid unequally "due to" their gender. This provision is to be sure addressed at employers. However, the implications of the prohibition of nocturnal employment directly affect paid. Unlike male employees, they are deprived of the possibility of working at night. This constitutes unequal treatment under the law that was originally associated with their gender affiliation.

2. However, not every instance of unequal treatment based on gender is in violation of Article 3.3 of the Basic Law. Rather, provisions that make distinctions may be permissible if compellingly required to resolve problems, that because of their nature, can occur only in the case of men or women. Such a case is not at issue here.

a) Research in the area of occupational medicine has produced no reliable basis for the original assumption underlying the prohibition of nocturnal employment to the effect that such employment was more deleterious to female hourly paid employees by virtue of their constitution than to male employees. Nocturnal employment is in principle harmful to everyone.

Specific health risks inherent in the female constitution cannot be recognized with sufficient certainty.

b) Insofar as investigations have shown, women are more adversely affected by nocturnal employment, this is generally attributed to the additional burden of housework and childcare.

This cannot serve to support the prohibition of nocturnal employment for all female hourly paid employees, for the additional burden of housework and childcare is not a sufficiently gender-specific characteristic. The traditional perception of the roles of men and women is to be sure such that women manage the household and take care of children, and there is no disputing the fact that that role is very often assumed by women even if they, like their male partners, are also employed. However, the full impact of this twofold burden affects only those women with children that require care, who are either single or have male partners who leave responsibility for childcare and the household to them despite the fact that they work at night. It also affects single male parents in the same manner as well, as to a lesser extent men and women who share the burden of housework and childcare.

Such social findings do not suffice - irrespective of the precise number of those affected - to justify unequal treatment on the basis of gender. The undeniable need for protection of female and male hourly paid employees who work at night and at the same time also have children to care for and a multiple-person household to manage can be more appropriately addressed by provisions that take these circumstances into account.

c) In support of the prohibition of nocturnal employment, the argument is also advanced that women are especially exposed to danger on the way to and from their places of employment at night. This is undoubtedly true in many cases. However, this can also not justify prohibiting all female hourly paid employees from working at night. The state may not absolve itself of its responsibility to protect women from being physically attacked in public streets by restricting their freedom of employment in order to keep them from leaving their homes at night (similarly also ECJ, *Em*GRZ 1991, p. 421 [422]).

> In addition, this argument also does not apply to the class of female hourly employees in general to an extent that would warrant discrimination of all female hourly employees. For example, excessive danger can be precluded by providing a company bus for the way to the place of employment.

3. Violation of the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of gender (Article 3.3 of the Basic Law) is not justified by the doctrine of equal rights contained in Article 3.2 of the Basic Law. The prohibition of nocturnal employment under s. 19.1 of the Working Time Ordinance does not serve to further the purposes of Article 3.2 of the Basic Law. It certainly protects many women against the deleterious effects of nocturnal employment, who in addition to bearing responsibility for childcare and management of a household, are also employed. This protection is, however, accompanied by significant disadvantages; women are discriminated against when they seek employment. They cannot accept employment that also involves occasional work at night. In a few industries, this has resulted in a significant decrease in the training and employment of female workers. In addition, female hourly paid employees are prevented from freely choosing their working hours. They cannot earn the supplementary income associated with night work. This may result in women continuing to be burdened by childcare and housework in addition to employment more than men, which would reinforce the traditional assignment of gender roles. The prohibition of nocturnal employment therefore inhibits mitigation of the societal disadvantages of women.

II.

S. 19.1 of the Working Time Ordinance is also in violation of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law since the provision treats female hourly paid employees differently from female salaried employees without sufficient reason.

1. The general principle of equality under Article 3.1 of the Basic Law prohibits the legislature from making distinctions in the treatment of the legal situations of different classes of persons in the absence of any differences of such nature and weight as could justify such unequal treatment (see BVerfGE 55, 72 [88]; 68, 287 [301]; 81, 156 [205]; 81, 228 [236] 82, 126 [146]). The difference in the treatment of female hourly paid employees and female salaried-employees as regards nocturnal employment cannot be reconciled with this standard.

2. Unequal treatment of the two classes of female employees could be justified only if female salaried-employees were less subject to the deleterious effects of nocturnal employment than female hourly paid employees. There is, however, no evidence of this. Moreover, relevant investigations in the area of occupational medicine indicate that both groups suffer equally from such deleterious effects (see Rutenfranz, op. cit. p. 31; Rutenfranz/Beermann/Löwenthal, op. cit. p. 59). The question as to whether this is due to increasing similarity in the occupational activities of female hourly paid employees and female salaried-employees in the wake of technical progress or whether the occupational activities had in the first place no influence on the deleterious effects of nocturnal employment can be ignored. In any case, there is no evidence of any difference between the need for protection of female hourly paid employees and that of female salaried employees that could alone justify distinctions in the regulation of nocturnal employment in view of the general principle of equality under Article 3.1 of the Basic Law.

III.

The constitutional violation makes s. 19.1 first alternative of the Working Time Ordinance incompatible with the Basic Law. This finding also holds for the remaining regulations of the above provision (s. 19.1 second alternative subsections 2 and 3 of the Working Time Ordinance). They are non-independent supplements to the general prohibition of nocturnal employment for female hourly paid employees that is expressed in the first alternative of the first paragraph and therefore share its legal fate. The same applies to s. 25 of the Working Time Ordinance since it contains reference to s. 19 of the Working Time Ordinance.

1. If a law is incompatible with the Basic Law, it must in principle be nullified (s. 82.1 in conjunction with s. 78.1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG). However, in view of the operating latitude of the legislature, a declaration of nullity is to be avoided if several possibilities exist for remedying the constitutional violation (see BVerfGE 28, 324 [362]; 52, 369 [379]; 55, 100 [113]; 77, 308 [337]). This regularly occurs in the case of violations of Article 3 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 22, 349 [361]). In such cases, a provision must be declared void only if it can be assumed with certainty that the legislature would in view of Article 3 of the Basic Law choose the version of the law remaining after the declaration of nullity, which in this case would therefore mean completely forgoing any prohibition of nocturnal employment (BVerfGE 27, 391 [399]).

3. It follows directly from this finding of incompatibility that violations of s. 19 of the Working Time Ordinance may not be prosecuted. The legislature must formulate a new provision for the protection of employees against the deleterious effects of nocturnal employment. Such a provision is necessary to satisfy the substantive content of the fundamental rights, in particular that of the right to physical integrity (Article 2.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law). The state has a special obligation to provide protection as regards this fundamental right (see BVerfGE 77, 170 [214] with further references; established case law).

In the context of fulfilling this duty, the legislature certainly does have a broad latitude for assessment, evaluation and operation that also leaves room for taking into account competing public and private interests. Measures adopted by the legislature may, however, not be totally unsuitable for ensuring protection of fundamental rights (see BVerfGE 77, 170 [214, 215]).

The new provision for the protection of employees against the deleterious effects of nocturnal employment must also meet this standard.

Special protection under the law cannot be considered dispensable because nocturnal employment is generally performed on the basis of voluntary agreements. The principle of personal autonomy underlying contract law can provide adequate protection only if the conditions for free self-determination exist. When the positions of the parties involved are not approximately equal, the provisions of contract law cannot on their own guarantee an equitable balance of interests. This is typically the case when employment contracts are concluded. In such situations, the objective fundamental decisions of the Basic Law in the section devoted to fundamental rights and the imperative of the social welfare state are to be implemented by provisions of law that work counter to social and economic inequality (see BVerfGE 81, 242 [214, 215]).

Explanatory Annotation

Under the mandatory German public pension scheme the retirement payments depend on the number of years spent in the active workforce and on the income level achieved during that time. Parents, who opted to stay at home with their children, in the vast majority of cases the mothers, consequently lost active income years and hence would receive lower retirement pensions. This was regarded as unfair and in 1986 legislation was passed to recognize child-rearing time as active income time in the retirement pension calculation. This benefit was limited to women born after 1920. In 1987 additional legislation was passed with the aim of providing a similar benefit for women born before 1921, who, because of their role of removing the debris of the ruins left by the bombing campaigns on German cities directly after World War II were often as a whole referred to as "debris-women". This benefit for the "debris-women was calculated differently as a direct benefit to the pension entitlement and amounted to slightly less than under the calculation formula chosen for women born post 1920 and it was only paid out after 1987. The government justified this with budget constraints. The Constitutional Court regarded this approach as in principle compatible with the Basic Law. However it regarded the steps taken to alleviate the discrimination of those women who opted for child-rearing in comparison to those who opted for income generating activities as insufficient and pointed out that measures could be taken within the system to alleviate the inequality, for example by reducing certain pension entitlements or tying them to tougher conditions, for example reducing entitlements for surviving stay-at-home spouses when there were no children.

The decision illustrates the difficulty of applying the equal protection/non-discrimination clause in the context of financial entitlements. In areas such as pension entitlements the potentially huge financial consequences are obvious. The Court has always taken a cautious approach in this respect. Equality can also be created by not giving any recognition to certain circumstances, such as child-rearing in this case. The Court also invoked the family protection guarantee of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law to argue that some form of recognition for child rearing must be provided for. However, it left it to the government to find 'intra-system' solutions that do not necessarily increase the total amount of entitlements owed and rather lead to a redistribution of the available monies. The government could have stayed away from introducing child-rearing benefits in the first place but once it chose to do so it had to choose a systematically coherent approach giving due regard to the equality clause of Article 3 and the family protection clause of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law.

Headnotes:

1. The legislative power of the federal government to recognize child raising time for purposes of statutory pension insurance derives from Article 74 no. 12 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG). The federal government was empowered to enact the Child Raising Benefits Act (Kindererziehungsleistungs-Gesetz - KLG) under Article 74 no. 7 of the Basic Law.

2. The Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act (Hinterbliebenenrenten- und Erziehungszeiten-Gesetz - HEZG) and the Child Raising Benefits Act did not violate the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) by generally failing to equate child raising time with periods of contribution to the statutory pension insurance system. The legislature must, however, pursuant to Article 3.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 6.1 of the Basic Law compensate to a greater extent than in the past for the deficiency in the pension insurance system that lies in the disadvantages in respect of pension benefits due to child raising.

3. Exclusion of mothers born prior to 1921 from credit for child raising time under the statutory pension insurance system by the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act was compatible with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. As regards Article 3.1 of the Basic Law, entitlement of mothers born in the years prior to 1921 to benefits for child raising, albeit only incrementally, and concurrent exclusion of fathers from eligibility for benefits by the Child Raising Benefits Act were also justified for objective reasons.

Judgment of the First Senate of 7 July 1992 on the basis of the oral hearing of 28 April 1992 - 1 BvL 51/86, 50/87 and 1 BvR 873/90, 761/91 -

Facts:

The decision relates to several constitutional complaints and petitions for concrete judicial review that questions the constitutionality of the provision of law that governs recognition of child raising time under the statutory pension insurance system. Since the 1957 pension reform, wage earners and salaried employees have been provided with statutory pension insurance based on the principle of dynamic income based retirement benefits and financed under what is referred to as the generational compact. That means that expenditures of the pension insurance system are in principle covered by revenues from the same calendar year. These revenues are obtained through compensation based contributions made by the insured and their employers as well as through a federal subsidy. As a result, each employed generation finances pensions to be paid during a given period on a pay-as-you-go basis through contributions made during the same period.

Selected Fundamental Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court

The Act on the Reform of Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pensions and Recognition of Child Raising Time for Purposes of Statutory Pension Insurance (Gesetz zur Neuordnung der Hinterbliebenenrenten sowie zur Anerkennung von Kindererziehungszeiten in der ge-setzlichen Rentenversicherung - HEZG) of 11 July 1985 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetz-blatt - BGBl.] I p. 1450), which went into force on 1 January 1986, not only introduced a fundamental reform of survivors' benefits, but also recognition of child raising years for the purposes of establishment of entitlement to and increases in pension benefits. Under this law, child raising time affected the pension insurance system for wage earners and salaried employees, in that the first 12 calendar months following the end of the month of birth were counted as time covered by compulsory insurance. Childraising time prior to 1 January 1986 thereby became important under the law governing pension insurance since the legislature qualified the first 12 calendar months of child raising following the end of the month of birth as part of the insured period with special status. This was complemented by the Act on Child Raising Benefits under the Statutory Pension Insurance System for Mothers Born in the Years Prior to 1921 (Gesetz über Leistungen der gesetzlichen Rentenversicherung für Kindererziehung an Mütter der Geburtsjahrgänge vor 1921 - KLG) of 12 July 1987 (Federal Law Gazette (Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.) I p.1585 which went into effect on 17 July 1987. The legislation accorded mothers born in the years prior to 1921, frequently often referred to as the "rubble women", who were not covered by the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act independent benefits for child raising. Under the Child Raising Benefits Act, benefits were provided from federal funds without regard to fulfilment of the prerequisites under legislation governing pension insurance and were equal in amount to the benefits accorded younger mothers under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of ChildRaising Act. Payment of child raising benefits for older mothers commenced with effect as of 1 October 1987 and was then gradually expanded in increments of one year at a time to include all mothers born in the years up to 1920. The above provisions of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act were replaced by the corresponding regulations of the Sixth Book of the Social Code (Sozialgesetzbuch) with effect as of 1 January 1992 along with the Reich Insurance Code (Reichsversicherungsordnung - RVO) and the Salaried Employees Insurance Act (Angestelltenversicherungsgesetz - AVG).

The constitutional complaints and several petitions for concrete judicial review relate to the period of application of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act and the Child Raising Benefits Act; they challenge recognition of child raising time under this legislation as a whole because it fails to take into account the fact that child raising represents a form of contribution that is the equivalent of monetary contribution by virtue of its importance for what is referred to as the generational compact in the context of the statutory pension insurance system. In any case, it is argued, child raising time should also have been taken into account under the statutory pension insurance system in the case of those born in the years prior to 1921 and that the latter should at least also have been accorded corresponding benefits.

In this matter, the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG) did establish the existence of discrimination of families with children under the pension system in effect that the legislature must eliminate; the constitutional complaints themselves were, however, dismissed, and the Federal Constitutional Court also found the challenged provisions to be compatible with the Basic Law.

C. II.

The Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act and the Child Raising Benefits Act did not violate the Basic Law by generally failing to equate child raising time with periods of contribution to the statutory pension insurance system. The legislature must, however, compensate to a greater extent than in the past for the deficiency in the pension insurance system that is manifested in the disadvantages as regards pension benefits resulting from child raising.

1. It is not possible to infer an obligation from Article 6.1 of the Basic Law that would compel the legislature to make provision for greater retirement benefits for child raising than those provided under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act and the Child Raising Benefits Act.

Article 6.1 of the Basic Law constitutes a right of freedom that obligates the state to refrain from encroaching on family matters (see BVerfGE 6, 55 [76]; 80, 81 [92]). Article 6.1 of the Basic Law also contains an "underlying valuebased decision" that establishes the duty of the state to protect and promote the family (see BVerfGE 6, 55 [76]; 82, 60 [81]; established case law).

However, the state is not bound to compensate for every burden affecting the family or alleviate the burdens of everyone with maintenance obligations (see BVerfGE 82, 60 [81] with further references).

It is equally impossible to infer an obligation from Article 6.1 of the Basic Law to the effect that the state must promote the family without regard for other public interests. State promotion of the family through financial benefits is contingent upon what is feasible in the sense of what the individual can reasonably expect from society. The legislature must in the interest of the common good also take into account other social needs besides promotion of the family in its budget and in so doing respect in particular overall viability and equity. Only if these principles are taken into account is it possible to establish whether promotion of the family by the state is manifestly inappropriate and no longer satisfies the promotion requirement of Article 6.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfG, op. cit., 8182). Accordingly, it is indeed possible to infer a general duty on the part of the state to compensate for burdens on families from the value-based decision in Article 6.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the principle underlying the social welfare state, but not, however, a decision as to the scope of such social compensation and the form it must take. Concrete implications with respect to the specific areas of law and subsystems in which relief is to be provided for families, cannot be inferred from the constitutional mandate. In fact, the legislature has an "in principle" operating latitude in that regard (see BVerfGE 39, 316 [326]; 82, 60 [81] with further references).

2. Moreover, Article 3.1 of the Basic Law, which must, however, be considered in conjunction with Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, must be considered the primary standard of review.

a) Article 3.1 of the Basic Law prescribes equal treatment for all persons under the law.

This does not, however, completely prevent the legislature from making distinctions. Indeed, the principle of equality is intended to prevent any class of persons addressed by a statute from being treated differently from any other persons addressed by that statute despite the fact that no difference exists between the two classes of such nature or weight as to justify such unequal treatment (BVerfGE 55, 72 [88]). The legal distinction must therefore also be sufficiently supported by objective differences. Application of this principle requires comparison of personal circumstances, which will be identical in certain respects, but never in all respects. Given this situation, it is in principle the task of the legislature to decide which of these attributes it considers to be determinative for purposes of making provision for equal or unequal treatment (see BVerfGE 83, 395 [401]). Article 3.1 of the Basic Law prohibits the legislature only from improperly ignoring the nature and weight of actual differences. It is free to make its decisions within these limits. However, other articles of the Basic Law may give rise to further restriction. If the legislature makes distinctions to the disadvantage of the family, then it is necessary to take into account the special protection the state affords the family under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 18, 257 [269]; 67, 186 [195, 196]).

b) The existing old-age insurance system results in disadvantages for persons who devote themselves to child raising within the family as compared with childless persons, who can generally pursue employment. Pension law does not to be sure make any distinction between persons with families and those with none. Moreover, payment of pension benefits is independent of familial status and contingent exclusively upon previous payment of contributions from income from employment. This is what determines pension entitlement. The reasons for separation from employment and the resultant failure to make such contributions are immaterial. Under pension law, persons who separate from employment for reasons having to do with child raising are treated the same as non-employed persons.

   However, unlike the reasons that might otherwise be responsible for unemployment and the resultant failure to make contributions, child raising is important in terms of securing the existence of the pension system. For the pension insurance system, which takes the form of a generational compact, cannot be maintained without the ensuing generation. This is the generation that will provide the funds for the pension benefits of the generation that is currently employed. Without a subsequent generation, the current generation would to be sure have paid contributions towards pension insurance, but could not expect to receive benefits from that insurance system. Due to the effect of the broad base of the pension insurance system, the fact that not every child will ultimately become a contributor can be ignored in this context.

   The nature of pension insurance up to now has been such that it in effect leads to discrimination of families, in particular those with several children. Families with one parent who leaves its employment for child raising purposes, not only accept less income as compared with childless persons, but must in fact also share that reduced income with several persons. When their children enter employment and help to maintain the old-age security of their parents' generation through their contributions, the parents themselves must expect lower pensions.

c) Discrimination of families with one parent who assume responsibility for child raising is not compensated for through state benefits or in any other manner.

It is precisely the system of compulsory insurance that is responsible for the significant decrease in old-age support that used to be provided by children prior to the introduction of pension insurance. The obligation to make insurance contributions reduces the financial resources of the children. Money that they could otherwise have used to support their parents when they were no longer employed if it were not for the compulsory contributions is taken away from them and transferred to the shared risk pool, which uses these funds to pay pension benefits to the insured community as a whole.

Widows' and surviving dependants' pensions, which used to compensate women to a certain extent for the lack of their own retirement benefits due to child raising when women were typically not employed, have for the most part lost this function since employment of both spouses has become more common and the number of children has decreased. The various allowances that exist in connection with the equalization of family related burdens (child raising allowance, family allowance, tax exemption for dependent children and educational assistance) also do not make up for the deficits that parents incur in terms of old-age security as compared with childless couples. The same applies to the "baby year" provisions of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act and the Child Raising Benefits Act. They have also compensated for the discriminatory effect on families only to a relatively modest extent.

This means in essence that despite the state's efforts to equalize family burdens child raising is considered a private matter, whereas old-age security is considered to be the responsibility of society. The existence of discrimination of families under legislation regarding social transfers that the complainants have set forth was also not "in principle" refuted during the oral hearing.

d) In view of the mandate to provide protection under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law, which restricts the scope of operation under Article 3.1 of the Basic Law, an adequate reason for the discrimination of families under existing legislation is lacking. In particular, the current nature of the pension insurance system, which is based on the principle of insurance and the function of a pension as a substitute for earnings which is a system that finances the benefits it pays out on a pay-as-you-go basis, does not constitute an adequate reason for the significant discrimination that ultimately results for those who raise children as compared with those who remain childless. As is illustrated by the provisions of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act, ways exist to incorporate recognition of child raising activities into the structure of the pension insurance system. This finding does not, however, lead to objection on constitutional grounds to the provisions of applicable legislation pertaining to pension insurance submitted for review and challenged in the constitutional complaints, but only to an obligation on the part of the legislature to gradually eliminate discrimination to a greater extent than has been the case up to now.

The disadvantages ascertained are rooted not solely in pension law and therefore must also not only be eliminated there. The fact advanced by the complainants that social transfers are effected from families with several children to families with a single child, which are in any case already in a better position, and childless couples as a result of the current legal situation relate not only to pension law, but also to equalization of family burdens in general. This does indeed make it possible to conclude that the legislature has up to now only incompletely fulfilled its protective mandate under Article 6.1 of the Basic Law. It is not, however, possible to draw concrete conclusions from this in respect of the statutory pension insurance system. The legislature is, moreover, in principle free to eliminate discrimination of families as it sees fit.

Insofar as discrimination is specifically reflected in the old-age benefits of those family members who assume responsibility for child raising, it must be compensated for principally through provisions of pension law. Here too, the operating latitude of the legislature is not insignificant. In particular, it does not follow from Article 3.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 6.1 that the legislature is under any obligation to equate child raising with the payment of contributions for purposes of establishing pension entitlement. Under the pay-as-you-go system employed by the pension insurance system since 1957, which cannot be objected to on constitutional grounds, child raising and the payment of contributions are not analogous. Unlike the monetary contributions of the employed population, contributions to the maintenance of the pension insurance system made in the form of child raising cannot be immediately redistributed to the older generation in the form of pension payments. The different functions the two forms of contribution have for the pension system also justify different treatment when it comes to the establishment of entitlement to pension benefits.

On the other hand, taking into account child raising under pension law does represent an appropriate way - and one that is compatible with the system - to compensate for discrimination at the level of old-age security. By recognizing child raising time for the purposes of establishing entitlement to and determining increases in pension benefits under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act, the legislature has already taken an initial step in the direction of improving the old-age security of child raisers under the statutory pension insurance system although there is no immediately apparent reason for limitation to an amount equal to 75 per cent of the average income. The increase in the duration of child raising time that is credited which resulted from the 1992 Pension Reform Act (Rentenreformgesetz - RRG) represents a further step. This reform, which will not result in higher old-age pensions until some time in the more remote future, is not intended to represent the end of efforts to achieve further compensation, as the motion of 21 June 1991 submitted by the CDU/CSU, SPD and FDP parties (Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 12/837) and adopted by the Bundestag shows according to which period up to the expiration of the safeguard provisions of the Pension Transition Act (Rentenüberleitungsgesetz - RÜG) is to be used in particular to improve the old-age security of women under the performance based pension insurance system. This is intended to include in particular broader recognition of child raising time.

e) The legislature is entitled to an adequate transitional period for fulfilment of its constitutional mandate (see BVerfGE 54, 11 [37]; 80, 1 [26]). This applies in particular to reforms that, as in the present case, require considerable legislative effort in various areas of law and substantial financial means. The operating latitude of the legislature would be impermissibly restricted if it were to be prevented from implementing such a complex reform as that involving the assessment of child raising time for the purposes of old-age insurance in several phases in order to limit the regulatory effort and financial implications and take advantage of the experience gained in the course of the reform (see BVerfG, Order of 5 November 1991 1 BvR 1256/89, *Fam*RZ 1992, p. 157 [160]).

When planning the various phases of the reform, the legislature may take into account the current state of the budget and the financial situation of the statutory pension insurance system. The federal government and legislative bodies must, however, consider the constitutional mandate in connection with both the future development of the pension insurance system and medium and longer-term financial planning. In this context, they are not limited by the Basic Law exclusively to the use of federal funds for the purposes of compensation. The protection of earned pension benefits afforded under Article 14.1 of the Basic Law does not preclude moderate reallocation within the statutory pension insurance system at the expense of persons with no or few children. The Basic Law also leaves room for change in survivors' benefits in order to attach greater weight to the duration of marriage in the case of pensions for widows and widowers and to take into account whether a surviving spouse was prevented from acquiring independent entitlement to retirement benefits through child raising or care within the family. Apart from the way in which funds for compensatory provisions are obtained, it is in any case necessary to ensure that each step of the reform actually results in less discrimination of families. The legislature, which is bound by its constitutional mandate, must take this into account in a recognisable manner.

3. Article 6.4 of the Basic Law does not come into question as a standard of review. The issue as to whether this provision entitles mothers to protection beyond pregnancy and the initial months following birth need not be addressed. In any case, no special rights can be inferred from this provision that do not pertain exclusively to mothers. Interpretation of Article 6.4 of the Basic Law to the effect that compensation for child raising activities may be granted (only) to mothers is also in contradiction with Article 3.2 of the Basic Law, which prohibits the reinforcement of traditional gender roles (see BVerfG, Judgment of 28 January 1992 - 1 BvR 1025/82 inter alia, *Eu*GRZ 1992, p. 17 [21]).

However, the fact that child raising is not adequately taken into account under the statutory pension insurance system is in fact disadvantageous primarily to mothers since they fill today assume most of the responsibility for raising children and therefore limit, interrupt or completely abandon their employment. This does not, however, affect the protection afforded by Article 6.4 of the Basic Law. Moreover, since significantly more women are affected, this provides reason for the legislature to fulfil its mandate to promote equality between men and women under Article 3.2 of the Basic Law (see BVerfG, loc. cit.).

The legislature will also have to take this into account.

4. The provisions under challenge do not constitute an encroachment on the part of the legislature on the legal rights protected by Article 14.1 of the Basic Law. The protection of property presupposes the existence of a legal right recognized by statute (see BVerfGE 83, 201 [208, 209]).

However, prior to the enactment of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act, no personal legal right existed in respect of credits for child raising time that could have been the object of any encroachment by the legislature. It was the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act that created these rights in the first place. The same applies as regards child raising benefits under the Child Raising Benefits Act.

5. There is no occasion to make any decision here as regards the details of the provisions adopted under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act that does not affect the Child Raising Benefits Act such as, for example, provisions that govern the concurrence of child raising time and periods of contribution. The complainants and petitioners in the initial proceedings for concrete judicial review are constitutionally excluded from the scope of application of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act. Only the Child Raising Benefits Act applies to them.

III.

The provisions of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act were also compatible with the Basic Law in that child raising time was not taken into account in the calculation of old-age benefits paid to mothers born in the years prior to 1921 since they had reached the age of 65 and no provision had also been made for general benefits for child raising for this class of persons. The Child Raising Benefits Act was compatible with the Basic Law insofar as it does not accord the above class of persons benefits for child raising until a time subsequent to 1 January 1986. The unequal treatment of mothers born in the years prior to 1921 on the one hand and after 1921 on the other hand cannot be objected to on constitutional grounds.

1. The provision of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act (s.1a.1 of the Reich Insurance Code and s. 28a.1 of the Salaried Employees Insurance Act) to be reviewed in this regard is based on a cut-off date. Under this provision, credit for child raising time was accorded under the statutory pension insurance system only in the case of mothers and fathers born after 31 December 1920. In this context, Article 2.5c and Article 2.6c of the Salaried Employees' Pension Insurance (Reform) Act (Arbeiterrentenversicherungs-Neuregelungsgesetz - AnVNG) made provision for taking into account child raising time prior to 1 January 1986 only in the case of insurance claims occurring after 30 December 1985.

The legislature is in principle not prohibited by Article 3.1 of the Basic Law from introducing cut-off dates for the purposes of regulating certain circumstances affecting the lives of individuals although any cut-off date will inevitably result in certain hardships.

The choice of point in time must, however, be based on the given facts of the situation (BVerfGE 75, 108 [157]), which that is the case here.

a) Since the legislature wanted to gradually eliminate a deficiency in the statutory pension insurance system, it was natural and objectively justified to situate the measure in the area of pension insurance. In so doing, it was necessary to take into account the structures of the pension insurance system. This was achieved by restricting the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act to new pensions and consequently to persons born from 1921 on and not on the other hand reopening pension biographies that had already been closed. Due to the traditional gender roles of men and women, mothers born in the years prior to 1921 had also in many cases not been employed and therefore not acquired entitlement to a pension (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 60/87, p. 20).

It would have been possible only to an unsatisfactory extent to achieve the legislature's goal of having them accorded benefits for child raising with the solution for determining entitlement to and increases in retirement benefits under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act, which - as was set forth above - would as such have been justified. Women born after 1921 onwards are also to be sure in some cases not entitled to a pension, but they were nevertheless able to close gaps in their pension biographies by making voluntary contributions (see s. 1233 of the Reich Insurance Code and s. 10 of the Salaried Employees Insurance Act, now: s. 7 of the Social Code VI) and at least in this way receive benefits under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act in the event of an insurance claim. In the case of mothers born in the years prior to 1921, who had already reached retirement age, this possibility was excluded.

In the case of a cut-off provision other than that adopted by the legislature, pension insurance providers would also have been confronted with virtually insurmountable practical difficulties. When the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act went into effect on 1 January 1986, the pension biographies of mothers and fathers born in the years prior to 1921 had already been closed. According to the expert opinion of the Association of German Pension Providers (Verband Deutscher Rentenversi-cherungsträger - VDR), a total of 1,624,671 cases involving payment of child raising benefits were counted in September 1989 for persons born in the years 1907 to and including 1911. Taking into account those born in the years thereafter up to the end of the year 1920, it was possible to assume the existence of 3.7 million such cases. In terms of the personnel resources required, the pension insurance providers would not have been in a position to reprocess such a large number of pension files that had already been closed, to recalculate pensions to take into account child raising time or to determine new pensions for mothers who had previously not been insured under the statutory pension insurance system.

b) Although a solution was chosen under pension insurance law in the form of the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act, the fact that financing was lacking, which the legislature assumed by virtue of its discretionary prerogative powers, also represented an objective ground for not including mothers born in the years prior to 1921 under this provision. Financial considerations are permissible, especially in the case of legislation involving entitlements (see BVerfGE 75, 40 [72] with further references).

A provision that applies only to the class of persons who are not yet receiving a pension (new pensions) takes effect only gradually. Such a provision does not directly affect a person until an insurance claim occurs (regularly upon reaching the age of 65). The benefits to be provided then fall due only gradually. If on the other hand recipients of pension benefits (current pensions) were also to be covered by the provision, the benefits for this class of individuals would become due as soon as the legislation entered into force. The cost would then be much higher than in the case of a provision that is limited to new pensions. This also justifies the fact that the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act makes no provision for general child raising benefits for those born in the years prior to 1921, which the Child Raising Benefits Act did do at a later time.

2. The provision governing child raising introduced under the Child Raising Benefits Act granted mothers born in the years covered entitlement to benefits in an amount commensurate with that afforded on the basis of child raising time under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act. However, unlike the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act, which went into effect on 1 January 1986, the Child Raising Benefits Act makes provision for commencement of benefits only as of 1 October 1987. As a result, benefits of the class of persons affected are interrupted for at least 21 months. In addition, since the legislature had made provision for the phased commencement of benefits for those born in the years that qualified for eligibility under the Child Raising Benefits Act, only those mothers born prior to 1907 started to receive benefits based on child raising as of 1 October 1987. Mothers born in subsequent years, on the other hand, only started to receive benefits based on child raising thereafter. The legislature therefore made distinctions as regards the commencement of benefits on the basis of age among those belonging to the class of persons who benefited from the Child Raising Benefits Act. These distinctions are also objectively justified.

   It is necessary to proceed on the basis of the estimate of the legislature, according to which only limited funds in an amount estimated at DM 6.05 billion were available for the period up to 1991. By adopting a phased approach, the legislature privileged those born in the earlier of the classes of years affected, which was as a result disadvantageous in particular for the class of persons born in the years 1917 to 1920. Although fiscal efforts to reduce expenditure do not as a general rule in and of themselves constitute sufficient justification for unequal treatment of different classes of persons (see BVerfGE 19, 76 [84]), the solution must be accepted in this case since no other practicable solutions are apparent. The only other possibility available to the legislature would otherwise have been to distribute the limited public funds on the basis of the "watering can" principle (see BVerfGE 75, 40 [72] with further references).

   In the case of such a provision, the potential benefits per child would have been significantly lower than under the Child Raising Benefits Act. As the Federal Minister for Labour and Social Affairs (Bundesminister für Arbeit und Sozialordnung) set forth in his opinion, the introduction of benefits based on child raising as of 1 January 1986 for all mothers affected would have resulted in payments in the amount of only DM 1.13 per month in the year 1986. The amount of benefits would have increased only slightly in the years thereafter and would not have reached the amount planned when the Child Raising Benefits Act entered into effect until the year 1990. The situation is similar in the case of uniform entitlement of benefits based on child raising for all mothers from 1 October 1987 on.

In the end, uniform distribution of funds available for implementation of the Child Raising Benefits Act for the years 1986 to 1989 to all mothers born in the years affected would not have produced a situation comparable with that based upon credit for child raising time under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act, for the benefits would have been substantially lower for a prolonged period of time. Mothers born in the years prior to 1907 would in effect have been at a significant disadvantage as compared with younger mothers in the case of such distribution due to their lower life expectancy. Apart from mere fiscal considerations, the legislature did, however, intentionally employ available funds to accord the oldest of those born in the relevant years chronological preference in view of their advanced age. There can be no objection to this.

The phased approach adopted under the Child Raising Benefits Act was of course especially disadvantageous for mothers born in 1920 as compared with those born in 1921, who had already benefited from the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act. However, this constitutes a hardship that is necessarily inherent in any regulation involving a cut-off date and must therefore be accepted (see BVerfGE 3, 58 [148]; 49, 260 [275]; 80, 297 [311]).

It is, however, necessary to consider whether the legislature used its vested operating latitude in an appropriate manner, whether it adequately weighed the factors involved in the use of a chronological standard and whether the solution arrived at can be justified on objective grounds in view of the facts of the situation and the overall system in which the provision is embedded or whether it seems arbitrary (see BVerfGE 44, 1 [21, 22]; 80, 297 [311]).

However, the provision withstands examination in light of these criteria also in respect of mothers born in the years 1917 to 1920. When the law was enacted, the legislature was justified in taking into account that this class of persons would be likely to receive benefits based on child raising for a longer period of time, whereas this could not be assumed to the same extent in the case of mothers born in the preceding years due to their general life expectancy.

IV.

Finally, the provision is also not in violation of Article 3.1 and 3.3 of the Basic Law because fathers born in the years prior to 1921 are not entitled to benefits under the Child Raising Benefits Act whereas mothers born during those years do receive benefits based on child raising and younger fathers are included under the Widows' and Surviving Dependants' Pension and Periods of Child Raising Act.

When the provision embodying these distinctions was enacted, the legislature proceeded on the assumption that fathers would typically not have assumed responsibility for child raising in the cases covered by the Child Raising Benefits Act and would therefore have incurred no disadvantages in terms of retirement benefits based on child raising; this, in the opinion of the legislature, reflected the typical roles within the family at the time (Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 60/87, pp. 20 et seq.).

It is not possible to ascertain any error in this assessment (see also BVerfGE 39, 169 [187, 188]).

It justifies exclusion of fathers from benefits based on child raising under the Child Raising Benefits Act, in particular in view of the goal of the legislature, which was to implement this law in a manner that would involve as little administrative effort as possible.

V.

Although the constitutional complaints were rejected, the complainants did succeed in compelling the legislature to take into account child raising as part of life under the statutory pension system to a greater extent in the future. It is therefore appropriate to order reimbursement of half of their necessary expenses incurred (s. 34a.3 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG)).

3. Transsexuals, BVerfGE 88, 87

Explanatory Annotation

The legislation at issue in this case allowed the name change for transsexual persons who had not undergone a sex-change operation only if the person in question was over 25 years old. The Court regarded this as a violation of the equality clause in Article 3.1 of the Basic Law. Interestingly the Court went beyond the classical interpretation of Article 3.1 according to which differentiation between two groups - in this case under 25 year old transsexuals and over 25 year old transsexuals - is possible and justified if based on reasonable grounds. The Court saw the discrimination based on age as being similar to the discrimination based on the list of attributes in Article 3.3. Age is not contained in that list but the Court drew on the fact that both age as a differentiating criterion and the criteria listed in Article 3.3 are person based criteria. In addition, the discrimination of the under 25 year old transsexuals had grave consequences for their personality rights as protected by Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. On this basis the Court resorted to the stricter "compelling reasons"-test employed under Article 3.3 rather than the more lenient 'reasonable justification'-test normally employed under Article 3.1. The justification given for the age discrimination, allowing for enough time for the decision to reflect the sex change in the name to settle with sufficient confidence, might have qualified under the more lenient basic test but it failed the stricter test as the Court saw no compelling reasons for this discrimination.

Translation of the Second Transsexuals Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 88, 87*

Headnote:

It is incompatible with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) to deny transsexuals under the age of 25 the right to change their first names that is afforded older transsexuals under s. 1 of the Transsexuals Act (Transsexuellengesetz - TSG).

Order of the First Senate of 26 January 1993 - 1 BvR 38, 40, 43/92 -

Facts:

The petitions concern the question as to whether denial of the possibility of a change of first names before the age of 25 under s. 1 of the Transsexuals Act is compatible with the Basic Law.

The Act on Changes of First Names and Establishment of Gender Identity in Special Cases (Transsexuals Act) of 10 September 1980 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 1654) was enacted pursuant to the order of the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG) of 11 October 1978 to take into account the special situation of transsexuals (BVerfGE 49, 286).

In addition to a procedure that permits a change of first names following establishment of a change of gender affiliation after sex-reassignment surgery ("major solution"), the law makes provision for the possibility of a change in the first names of transsexuals who have not undergone previous surgical intervention ("minor solution").

a) Conditions, procedures and legal consequences of the minor solution are governed by ss. 1 to 7 of the Transsexuals Act. S. 1 is worded as follows: (1) The first names of persons who by reason of their transsexual nature no longer identify with the gender specified in their registration at birth, but rather with the opposite gender and have for at least three years felt compelled to live according to their preferences must upon application be changed by the court if:

    1. they are German within the meaning of the Basic Law or stateless or homeless aliens whose usual abode is within the jurisdiction of this Act or persons with the right to asylum or alien refugees whose residence is within the jurisdiction of this Act,

    2. it can be assumed with a high degree of probability that their sense of affiliation with the opposite gender will no longer change, and

    3. they are at least twenty-five years of age.

* Translation by Donna Elliott; © Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung.

(2) The first names the applicant desires to use in the future must be provided in the application. The initial proceedings relate to two female-to-male transsexuals and one male-to-female transsexual. The petitioners are German citizens between the ages of 22 and 24 years of age who seek a change of first names under s. 1 of the Transsexuals Act. The opinions obtained by the local courts from two experts in each case conclude that the petitioners have for at least three years felt compelled to live as persons of the opposite gender and that it is highly probable that this transsexuality is no longer reversible.

2. The local courts stayed the proceedings and submitted the question as to whether s. 1.1 no. 3 of the Transsexuals Act is compatible with the Basic Law to the Federal Constitutional Court for decision.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

S. 1.1 no. 3 of the Transsexuals Act is incompatible with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law and void.

I.

1. Depending on the object of regulation and the distinguishing characteristics involved, the constraints imposed upon the legislature by the general principle of equality vary, ranging from mere prohibition of arbitrariness to strict compliance with the requirements of proportionality. The gradation of these requirements follows from the wording and meaning of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law and its context in combination with other provisions of the Basic Law.

Since the principle to the effect that all persons are equal before the law is primarily intended to prevent unjustifiable differences in the treatment of individuals, the legislature is regularly bound to strict compliance when dealing with the unequal treatment of different classes of persons (see BVerfGE 55, 72 [88]). The greater the affinity between the personal attributes and those specified in Article 3.3 of the Basic Law and the greater therefore the danger that unequal treatment based on such attributes will result in discrimination of a minority, the stricter the constraints upon the legislature become. Stricter compliance is, however, not limited to differences that relate to persons. Indeed, it also applies if the unequal treatment of situations results indirectly in unequal treatment of different classes of persons. In the case of distinctions made exclusively on the basis of conduct, the degree of constraint imposed on the legislature varies as a function of the extent to which the affected persons are able through their conduct to influence the manifestation of the attributes on the basis of which such distinctions are made, (see BVerfGE 55, 72 [89]). Moreover, the more unequal treatment of individuals or situations can negatively impact the exercise of freedoms that enjoy constitutional protection, the narrower the operating latitude of the legislature becomes (see BVerfGE 60, 123 [134]; 82, 126 [146]).

The variance in the scope of operating latitude of the legislature is reflected in the gradation of the intensity of control in the case of constitutional review. If prohibition of arbitrary treatment is the only standard involved, violation of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law can be established only if a lack of objectivity is evident in the distinctions made (see BVerfGE 55, 72 [90]).

In the case of provisions of law that stipulate different treatment for different classes of persons or negatively affect the exercise of fundamental rights, on the other hand, the Federal Constitutional Court examines in detail whether reasons of such nature and importance exist for the distinctions made as to justify the unequal legal consequences (see BVerfGE 82, 126 [146]).

The considerations underlying this gradated approach are also of importance in respect of the question as to the extent to which the legislature may exercise its discretionary prerogative powers in its assessment of the original situation and the possible ramifications of the provisions it adopts. The standards for the review of such prognostic assessments also vary, extending from mere review of evidence to rigorous substantive control. In particular, the specific nature of the respective facts at issue and the importance of the legal interests at stake must be taken into account in this context; in addition, the latitude for prognosis varies as a function of the possibilities available to the legislature for forming a sufficiently certain judgment when the decision was made (see BVerfGE 50, 290 [332, 333]).

2. These standards require strict review of s. 1.1 no. 3 of the Transsexuals Act. The age limit for a change of first names involves making a distinction that is based on personal attributes and has a significant effect on the general right to personality. Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law protects the narrower personal sphere of life, including in particular the area of intimacy and sexuality (see BVerfGE 47, 46 [73]); 60, 123 (134)., and guarantees the right of persons to determine in principle when and to what extent they divulge personal information (see BVerfGE 65, 1 [41, 42]; 84, 192 [194].

The Transsexuals Act serves to protect these legal interests. The minor solution is intended to take into account the special situation of transsexuals prior to sex-reassignment surgery or if surgical intervention is foregone and enable them to live in their felt gender roles without having to make this known to third parties and public authorities in everyday life. The provision submitted for review would therefore be compatible with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law, only if there were reasons of such nature and importance for prohibiting transsexual inclined persons under the age of 25 years from changing only their names as to justify unequal treatment. This is, however, not the case.

a) The age limit results in serious discrimination of persons under the age of 25 who have been found by two experts to be with a high degree of probability irreversibly transsexual. After the Act went into effect, these persons had absolutely no way of changing their first names to names corresponding to their sensibilities and appearance before the age of 25. As per the order of the Federal Constitutional Court of 16 March 1982 (BVerfGE 60, 123), they have recourse to the possibility of declaratory proceedings under legislation governing civil status and as a result to a change of first names under s. 8 of the Transsexuals Act as soon as the required surgical intervention has been carried out. Unlike transsexuals who have reached the age of 25, they are denied the possibility of living in the role of the other gender prior to sex-reassignment surgery without having to constantly subject themselves to burdensome situations at work, at school, in their dealings with public authorities and in everyday life in general.

   This unequal treatment is especially serious in view of the purpose of the minor solution. The provision governing the change of first names is intended to create the general legal prerequisites for enabling transsexuals to cross-live early on in order to provide them with help prior to surgical intervention and significantly alleviate the emotional pressure to which they are subjected. In addition, legal establishment of the change of roles is intended to enable them to experience life in the opposite gender role for a lengthier period of time before making a decision as regards for the most part irreversible medical measures and to ascertain with certainty whether this life really suits their sensibilities and is something they can cope with. This is intended therefore not only to achieve additional certainty as regards the diagnosis, but also to facilitate habituation to the new role prior to major surgical intervention.

Denial of these possibilities may have especially serious ramifications in the case of younger transsexuals. On the one hand, they are of an age at which they as a rule have to make plans for their future occupational lives, complete their education and often seek employment for the first time. It is therefore especially important for them to develop self-confidence in the role corresponding to their sensibilities and to be spared awkward situations that may arise if the names that appear in their identification do not correspond to their appearance. The purpose of the minor solution, which is to help avoid difficulties in everyday life, in particular as regards relations with employers, is of considerable importance to them. On the other hand, younger transsexuals in particular have an interest in cross-living before subjecting themselves to for the most part irreversible operations and not, the other way around, in being compelled by the legal situation to decide hastily to undertake such measures. A major concern of the legislature was therefore also to prevent decisions without sufficient reflection, especially on the part of younger people.

b) No reasons are apparent that would justify such serious discrimination of younger transsexuals.

There is no need here to address the question as to whether fears to the effect that the transsexual inclination of younger people with a certain such inclination could be prematurely fixed if it were easier to obtain a change of first names lay within the purview of the discretionary prerogative powers of the legislature when the law was enacted. It is equally unnecessary to examine more closely the question as to whether the minimum age of 25 years for a change of first names could on the basis of the state of knowledge at the time have seemed to constitute a suitable measure for discouraging decisions that were unreflected and based on insufficiently certain diagnosis. The assumption that the age limit prescribed in s. 1.1 no. 3 of the Transsexuals Act was required to protect younger people against an overly hasty change of roles and the ramifications of a possible error in prognosis can in any case no longer be justified today. Moreover, younger people are not better, but rather less well protected against the risk of an error under the current law.

Following the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court that declared void the minimum age for declaratory proceedings under legislation governing civil status contained in s. 8 of the Transsexuals Act, the legislature saw no occasion for the introduction of an age limit for sex-reassignment surgery (cf. A I 3). It did not therefore - no doubt in view of the expert opinions obtained - consider it necessary to protect younger people who were diagnosed as being with a high degree of probability irreversibly transsexual and for whom surgical intervention was considered medically indicated against unreflected decisions due to the possibility of an error in prognosis.

Under these circumstances, there is no obvious reason to protect the same class of persons against a decision that is much less incisive and can be reversed if the diagnosis in the individual case should happen - despite the protective procedural measures provided for in ss. 1 to 4 of the Transsexuals Act - to be in error. Moreover, the age limit for a change of first names is more likely to be such as to make life in the other gender role for a lengthier period of time - and as a result further confirmation of the diagnosis - more difficult prior to surgery and encourage younger transsexuals to opt for sex-reassignment surgery as early as possible since this is the only way they can fulfil the conditions for a change of first names under the major solution. The argument to the effect that the risk of misdiagnosis is greater than originally assumed and that transsexuality is today viewed as a whole differently therefore also cannot be used to justify denial of a change of first names in the case of younger people with a transsexual inclination. It may be true that the prognosis of irreversible transsexuality presents difficulties, but this does not speak against making the minor solution available to younger transsexuals, but rather in favour of also making it easier for them to acquire the experience of cross-living before taking irreversible measures. It is just as impossible to infer from a more differentiated view of transsexuality that younger transsexuals should be deprived of the possibility of a change of first names. For the minor solution was created precisely in view of the fact that physicians and psychologists consider further latitude for treatment and decision making necessary prior to irreversible operations (see Pfäfflin, StAZ 1986, p. 199 (201); see also Ehrhardt, in: Festschrift für Volrad Deneke, 1985, p. 272 [280, 281]; Sigusch, Zeitschrift für Sexualforschung 1991, p. 309 [p. 337, fn. 5]).

3. Since s. 1.1 no. 3 of the Transsexuals Act is already unconstitutional because it is in violation of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law, the question as to the existence of reservations with respect to the provision in view of Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law need not be resolved.

II.

If a statute is incompatible with the Basic Law, it must in principle be declared void (s. 82.1 in conjunction with s. 78 sentence 1 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG)). Because of the operating latitude of the legislature, the situation is different if a violation of Article 3.1 of the Basic Law can be eliminated in various ways. If, however, it can be assumed with certainty that the legislature would, taking into account the general principle of equality, choose the provision remaining after the declaration of nullity, the Federal Constitutional Court may void a provision that is incompatible with Article 3.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 27, 391 [399]).

This is not the case here. Since, after obtaining expert opinions, the legislature refrained from making provision for an age limit for sex-reassignment surgery, it cannot be assumed that it would introduce a new age limit for a change of first names. The question as to whether a significantly lower age limit than that provided for up to now under s. 1.1 no. 3 of the Transsexuals Act would be compatible with the principle of equality need not therefore be examined.

The possibility that the legislature would choose to eliminate the constitutional violation by completely eliminating the provision governing the change of first names and limit the Transsexuals Act to the major solution can also be excluded; the question as to whether such a decision would adequately respect the general right to personality need therefore also not be clarified in this context. The decision to make provision for a minor solution in addition to the major solution was made in 1980 following thorough debate. No reasons can be discerned that would indicate that this provision has not proven its worth or led to abuse. The opinions of the Federal Medical Association (Bundesärztekammer) and the German Society for Sex Research (Deutsche Gesellschaft für Sexualforschung) from the years 1983 and 1984 speak against such an assumption; the Federal Minister of the Interior (Bundesminister des Innern) also mentioned no indication of disadvantageous effects of the minor solution in his statement on this procedure. Rather, the expectation associated with this solution to the effect that facilitation of the change of first names could in itself contribute to a significant improvement in the situation of transsexuals prior to surgery and give physicians and transsexuals themselves greater latitude for making decisions would seem to have been confirmed (see Cabanis, in: Festschrift für Horst Leithoff, 1985, p. 487 [491]; Pfäfflin, StAZ 1986, p. 190 [201, 202]). The legislature obviously also proceeded on the basis of a positive assessment since it reconfirmed the minor solution when the Passport Act (Passgesetz - PassG) was revised in the year 1986. Under s. 4.1 sentence 3 of the Passport Act, temporary passports represent an exception to the provision contained in s. 4.1 sentence 2 no. 6 of the Passport Act in that they contain no indication of gender; this is intended to ameliorate the situation of transsexuals who have already obtained a change of first names, but who have not yet brought declaratory proceedings pursuant to legislation governing civil status under s. 8 of the Transsexuals Act (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 10/5128, p. 5).

4. Inclusive Education, BVerfGE 96, 288

Explanatory Annotation

Article 3.3 of the Basic Law stipulates that no person shall be disadvantaged because of disability. The issue in this case was whether the denial of inclusive education for a child with a disability against her and her parents will and her transfer to a special school for children with disabilities constituted such a disadvantage. The relevant authorities justified the denial and the transfer with a lack of supporting resources at the regular school such as individual tuition for several hours and special support staff. The core problem was the question whether and to what degree the special non-discrimination clause of Article 3.3 of the Basic Law demands from the government not only to refrain from discriminating action but also to actively allocate significant resources to create a situation where potentially disadvantageous steps, such as transfer to a special school for the disabled rather than participation in general schools, can be avoided.

The question of whether fundamental rights can be used to create resource relevant entitlements is of utmost significance. An affirmative answer would have grave consequences for the democratic process because the available resources and their allocation would, as resources are limited, become a matter of judicial decision rather than parliamentary allocation. It is largely for this reason that there has been great reluctance to interpret fundamental rights in this fashion. It should be noted that on the international plane, economic and social rights have always been treated differently, for example with a view to enforcement, than the rights found in the traditional liberal canon, for example in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and in many constitutions, the Basic Law among them. It should also be noted, however, that even the traditional liberal rights sometimes contain resource relevant implications. For example, the prohibition of inhumane or degrading treatment, which the Basic Law addresses under Article 1.1 (human dignity) in conjunction with Article 2.2 (life and health), requires that prison facilities meet certain minimum standards. The guarantee of access to courts or fair trial requires that the necessary judicial infrastructure is provided. This illustrates that, despite the reluctance to grant financially relevant entitlements on the basis of fundamental rights, similar effects are not per se impossible.

In this case, however, the reluctance prevailed. The Constitutional Court held that the transfer to the special school could only constitute a disadvantage in the sense of Article 3.3 of the Basic Law if the pedagogical needs of the child could have been met at the regular school with available resources. The Court thus linked the criterion of disadvantageous treatment to the availability of relevant resources. The question was not whether education at the special school constitutes a disadvantage as compared to education at the regular school. It may well have been. The question for the Court was whether the government contributed to the disadvantage by denying the child what could have been provided with the available resources and the answer to that question had to be negative in this case.

Translation of the Inclusive Education Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 96, 288*

Headnotes:

1. Judgment concerning the prohibition of discrimination of disabled persons (Article 3.1. sentence 2 of the Basic Law) in the area of education (Grundgesetz - GG).

2. The transfer of a disabled pupil to a special school against the will of the latter and his or her parents does not in and of itself constitute prohibited discrimination within the meaning of Article 3.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. Such discrimination does, however, exist if the transfer is made despite the fact that instruction in a mainstream school is possible with supplementary educational support, the requisite personnel and physical resources can be provided with available personnel and means, and organizational difficulties and the legitimate interests of third parties also do not stand in the way of inclusive education.

Order of the First Senate of 8 October 1997 - 1 BvR 9/97 -

Facts:

In Lower Saxony, the Lower Saxony School Act (Niedersächsisches Schulgesetz - NSchG) of 1993 stipulated that pupils in the differentiated school system of the Land who due to physical, intellectual or psychological impairment or impairment of their social behaviour require supplementary educational support were to receive education and instruction together with other pupils in all schools if it was possible in this manner to meet their needs for individual support and insofar as organizational, staffing and physical circumstances allowed. Pupils with special educational needs were as a result obliged to attend a special school only if they were unable to receive the necessary support at another type of school. Inclusive goal differentiated education in what is referred to as an integration class may also be considered as an alternative form of support.

After the disabled complainant had completed her primary education at a mainstream school and changed to the fifth grade of an inclusive comprehensive school, the school authority assigned her to a school for the physically disabled against the wishes of her parents since evaluation for this grade had determined that the complainant had special educational needs that could not have been satisfied by the comprehensive school. The proceedings before the administrative courts initiated to obtain injunctive relief against immediate enforcement of this measure were unsuccessful. After a petition for interim relief was accepted by the Federal Constitutional Court, the school authority waived immediate enforcement.

The constitutional complaint against the order of the Higher Administrative Court (Oberver-waltungsgericht) that dismissed the petition for interim relief was ultimately unsuccessful.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

The constitutional complaint is admissible.

In view of the likely duration of the proceedings in respect of her action, the complainant could not reasonably be expected to exhaust all legal remedies prior to seeking a decision from the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 86, 15 [22]).

Her interest in judicial relief also does not cease to exist because the local government rescinded the administrative order in respect of the transfer with immediate effect of the complainant to the school for the disabled during the constitutional complaint proceedings, and the complainant is now attending seventh grade at a general school. The interest in judicial relief remains intact despite disposition of the relief originally sought through the constitutional complaint since clarification of a constitutional issue of fundamental importance would otherwise be lacking and an especially serious encroachment on a fundamental right is challenged (see BVerfGE 91, 125 [133] with further references; established case law). This is the case here. The question as to whether and with what consequences Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law must be taken into account in cases involving school law of the nature at issue here is of considerable constitutional importance and has not yet been decided by the Federal Constitutional Court.

C.

The constitutional complaint is, however, not founded. The challenged order cannot as a result be objected to on constitutional grounds.

I.

1. Under the provision contained in Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law - newly created by the Act Amending the Basic Law (Gesetz zur Änderung des Grundgesetzes - GGÄndG) of 27 October 1994 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 3146) - persons may not be discriminated against because of a disability.

a) What qualifies as disability cannot be inferred directly from the legislative materials (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 12/6000, pp. 5253; 12/6323, pp. 1112.; 12/8165, pp. 2829).

The legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment did, however, obviously proceed from the common understanding of the term at the time the Basic Law was amended. This is evidenced in particular in s. 3.1 sentence 1 of the Severely Disabled Persons Act (Schwerbehindertengesetz - SchwbG). According to the above, a disability is the effect of a not merely temporary functional impairment that is based on an abnormal physical, intellectual or emotional condition. The same understanding of disability provides the basis for the definition of disability in the Third Report of the Federal Government on the Situation of the Disabled and the Development of Rehabilitation (Dritter Bericht der Bundesregierung über die Lage der Behinderten und die Entwicklung der Rehabilitation), which in turn coincides with the usual delimitations of the term employed internationally (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 12/7148, p. 2).

Nothing, on the other hand, speaks against also proceeding on the basis of this definition in principle for the purposes of interpretation of Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (see also Osterloh in: Sachs, Grundgesetz, Kommentar, 1996, Article 3 marginal no. 309310; Rüfner in: Bonner Kommentar, Article 3 marginal no. 870 [May 1996]).

It is not necessary to decide here whether this represents the conclusive definition of disability. The complainant's case provides no occasion for this.

b) The meaning of the term discrimination and the importance and scope of the prohibition of discrimination embodied in Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also can be inferred only incompletely from their historical development. They can, however, be inferred from the overall substantive content of Article 3.3 of the Basic Law.

aa) Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law was to be sure intentionally aligned with the prohibition of discrimination under the former Article 3.3 and the current Article 3.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. This is evidenced by the fact that, like sentence 1, sentence 2 is intended to reinforce protection of the general principle of equality embodied in Article 3.1 of the Basic Law for specific classes of persons and for that reason is intended to prescribe narrower limits to governmental authority such that disability may not serve as a ground for - discriminatory - unequal treatment (see BVerfGE 85, 191 [206] and thereafter in particular Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 12/6323, p. 12.). However, the legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment also intentionally refrained from simply expanding the attributes mentioned in the previous Article 3.3 of the Basic Law to include disability. This indicates that Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is also important in its own right. This obviously has to do with the special nature of disability. As in the case of the attributes such as gender, origin, race and language already covered by Article 3.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, disability is a personal characteristic, the existence or absence of which an individual can influence, either not at all or only to a limited extent. However, disability not only denotes a mere condition of being different, which is frequently disadvantageous for the persons affected only in connection with the effect of corresponding attitudes and prejudices in that person's societal environment, but can also lose this disadvantageous effect if such attitudes are changed. Moreover, disability is a characteristic that, apart from any such change in attitudes, in principle makes life more difficult for the person affected as compared to those with no such disability. It was the will of the legislature that this special situation leads to neither social nor legal exclusion. To the contrary, such exclusion is to be prevented or overcome (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 12/8165, p. 28). This explains the fact that sentence 2 of Article 3.3 of the Basic Law, unlike sentence 1, does not simply prohibit discrimination. The revised provision prohibits only disadvantageous discrimination on the basis of disability. Preferential treatment intended to equalize the situations of the disabled and those who are not disabled is, on the other hand, permitted, albeit not necessarily constitutionally mandated.

bb) Given this background, discrimination exists not only in the case of provisions and measures that aggravate the situation of disabled persons because of their disability, for example, by preventing access to public facilities that would otherwise actually be possible or by denying services that are in principle available to everyone. Moreover, exclusion from opportunities for personal development and activities by public authorities may also constitute discrimination if not adequately compensated by supportive measure commensurate with the disability. It is not possible to determine generally and in the abstract when such exclusion has been compensated to such an extent by supportive measures. Whether refusal to provide a compensatory service desired by a disabled person and referral to another, alternative possibility for personal development are to be considered discriminatory will regularly depend upon assessment, scientific findings and prognostic estimates. It is possible to decide whether a measure is discriminatory in the individual case only on the basis of the overall conclusions of such assessment.

2. In principle, the same applies in the area of education.

a) aa) Under the provision governing state supervision of schools, Article 7.1 of the Basic Law does to be sure grant the state the authority to plan and organize education with a view to ensuring the existence of a school system that offers all young people educational opportunities that reflect the needs of contemporary society commensurate with their abilities. The organizational structure of the schools, decisions as regards the formal nature of the educational system and the choice of courses of instruction and educational goals, for example, are therefore the affair of the state (see BVerfGE 34, 165 [182]; 45, 400 [415]); 53, 185 [196]). In this context, the Länder, which are responsible for schooling, have extensive discretionary latitude (see BVerfGE 59, 360 [377] with further references). This latitude is, however, restricted to the extent that overriding norms of the Basic Law impose limits (see BVerfGE 6, 309 [354]; 34, 165 [181]; 59, 360 [377]). This is achieved not only through the right of pupils - which may also be restricted - to develop their personalities, aptitudes and abilities with as little interference as possible under Article 2.1 of the Basic Law (see on this BVerfGE 45, 400 [417] with further references) and the right of parents to raise their children arising from Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, which accompanies and has equal status with the responsibility of the state for education under Article 7.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 52, 223 [236]; established case law). Moreover, the prohibition of discrimination newly created under Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also sets limitations.

Apart from whether it is possible to derive any inherent entitlement to services from this fundamental right (consistently contested in the literature; see, for example, Osterloh, loc. cit., Article 3 marginal no. 305; Scholz in: Maunz/Dürig, Grundgesetz, Kommentar, Article 3.3 marginal no.174 [October 1996]), it does follow, especially in conjunction with the above-mentioned freedoms from Article 2.1 and Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, that the state and the legislatures of the Länder responsible for education do have a special responsibility towards disabled pupils. The state also has an at least constructive monopoly as regards their education and instruction at the level of the schools; like non-disabled pupils, they are in principle compelled to attend public schools. Taking this into account, the state is in principle obligated under Article 2.1 and Article 6.2 sentence 1 in conjunction with Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to make available educational facilities for disabled children and youth that also allow them to obtain proper education, instruction and training through school attendance. The nature and degree of disability and the requirements of the type of school and the level of instruction must be taken into account in this context, as must the current state of scientific pedagogical knowledge.

bb) Given the current state of pedagogical knowledge, general exclusion of the possibility of education and instruction of disabled pupils together with non-disabled pupils would not seem justifiable under the Basic Law. Despite the existence of critical opinions, inclusive education is, as is documented by the statements cited in A I 1 and 2, also considered for the most part positive by pedagogical science as well as by relevant political bodies and advocated as an alternative to education and instruction in special and remedial schools that is deserving of implementation. The state legislature of Lower Saxony took this into account by creating the possibility for education and instruction of pupils with special educational needs "in all schools" (s. 4 of the Lower Saxony School Act) and in integration classes for goal differentiated education (s. 23.4 of the Lower Saxony School Act) in addition to special schools (s. 14 of the Lower Saxony School Act). According to s. 4 in conjunction with s. 68.1 of the Lower Saxony School Act, instruction is to be inclusive and pursue the same goals for all pupils if it is possible in this way - if necessary with provision of supplementary educational support (cf. in particular s. 14.4 sentence 2 of the Lower Saxony School Act) - to accommodate the individual needs for support of pupils requiring such support and insofar as organizational, staffing and physical circumstances permit. These provisions enable children and youth with special educational needs and their guardians to opt, under the conditions set forth in the law, either for one of the forms of inclusive education or for instruction in special schools, the continued existence of which as an independent type of school within the differentiated school system of the Land may therefore, quite properly, not be called into question.

There are no constitutional grounds for objecting to the fact that under this approach inclusive education and instruction, whether in the form of individual integration or integration classes, are subject to the limits of what is feasible in terms of organizational, staffing and physical circumstances (see ss. 4 and 23.4 in conjunction with 23.5 of the Lower Saxony School Act). This proviso is indicative of the fact that the state can from the very outset meet its responsibility to provide a school system to accommodate differences in abilities only within the limits of its financial and organizational resources (see BVerfGE 34, 165 [183, 184]) and explains why the legislature must take into account other needs of society in its decisions and retain the possibility of using limited available public funds for such other interests as it considers necessary (see BVerfGE 40, 121 [133]; 75, 40 [68]; 82, 60 [80]; 90, 107 [116]). If the legislature decides in favour of offering both individual integration and integration classes in its regulatory plan for inclusive education, it is not prevented under the Basic Law from making actual implementation of these forms of integration dependent upon restrictive conditions of the nature at issue here. Discretionary latitude and the possibility of restriction to what is actually feasible and financially justifiable also exist, however, as regards implementation of the regulatory plan by the legislature. Article 2.1, Article 6.2 sentence 1 and Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law do not obligate the legislature of every Land to make all forms of inclusive education available in every Land. Moreover, acting within the limits of its discretionary latitude, the legislature may forgo the introduction of such forms of integration that would not seem to warrant implementation not only on pedagogical grounds, but also for organizational, staffing and financial reasons. This presupposes that the remaining opportunities for inclusive education and instruction adequately take into account the interests of disabled children and youth.

b) The interpretation and application of legislation governing education are subject to the prohibition of discrimination contained in Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

aa) The decision of school authorities as to the schools chosen to educate, instruct and prepare disabled children and youth for their future lives in society together with non-disabled children and youth must take into account in each individual case not only the right of pupils to receive training commensurate to the greatest extent possible with their aptitudes and abilities (Article 2.1 of the Basic Law) and the right of parents under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law to freely choose the educational path for their children in school on the basis of their aptitude (see BVerfGE 34, 165 [184]). It is, furthermore, also necessary to take into account additional constraints upon school authorities arising from Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

Since, as was set forth above under C.I.1.b.bb, the discriminatory nature of a measure cannot be assessed without taking into account specific accompanying support, the prohibition against discrimination contained in this provision does not mean, however, that the transfer of a disabled pupil to a special school constitutes in and of itself prohibited discrimination. This also applies if the decision of the school authority is made against the will of the disabled child or youth or his or her guardians. Only decisions to effect such a transfer that obviously fail to do justice to the circumstances and conditions involved in the individual case under consideration are prohibited by Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. The existence of such a decision must be assumed not only if a child or youth is assigned to a special school because of a disability despite the fact that education and instruction in a mainstream school would have been suited to his or her abilities and would have been possible without any special resources. Indeed, discrimination within the meaning of Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law may also exist if the transfer to a special school is effected despite the fact that attendance of a mainstream school could have been made possible through the reasonable use of supplementary educational support.

Whether this is the case, that is whether, for example, assignment of an additional special education teacher or, insofar as provided for by law, the creation of an integration class would make it possible to achieve inclusive education that the disabled child can absolve with prospects of success, must be determined on the basis of overall assessment in the individual case, taking into account the nature and severity of the specific disability as well as the respective advantages and disadvantages of inclusive education and instruction in a regular school on the one hand, and attendance of a special school or remedial school on the other hand. In this context, overall comparison as regards the assessment of inclusive education must take into account not only the opportunities made available to the disabled child or youth for his or her education and future life as an adult, but also any burden that may be associated with such a measure. This applies as regards the disabled child, who especially in the case of individual integration will be confronted with higher standards of performance, but this is not the only consideration. In addition, overall assessment must also take into account conceivable burden upon fellow pupils and teaching staff as well as the nature of common instruction typically practiced in classes or courses in schools. Finally, it is also necessary to take into account that governmental measures to compensate for disabilities may be requested and granted only within the limits of available financial, staffing, physical and organizational possibilities (see BVerfGE 40, 121 [133]). The resources required for inclusive education in mainstream schools may not be made available at the expense of those children whose participation in common instruction is excluded due to the nature or degree of their disability or whose participation in common instruction seems undesirable for pedagogical reasons and who are therefore dependent upon the availability of special and remedial schools with the appropriate staffing and material means required for their special educational task.

The respective advantages and disadvantages of inclusive or separate education must be assessed neither exclusively from the point of view of the disabled pupil and his or her parents nor solely from the point of view of the school administration. The preferences of parents and children and youth as to the nature of their formal education and instruction and the schools at which they commence or pursue such education and instruction are, however, of considerable importance under constitutional law in view of the fundamental rights guaranteed under Article 6.2 sentence 1 and Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. When parents decide in favour of education together with children without disabilities in the interest of their child as seen from their point of view, the school authority may not simply disregard this, claiming, for example, without further justification that assignment to a special school and instruction at such a school would in fact be better suited to serving the well-considered interests of the disabled child. Rather, it is necessary to examine the wishes of the parents thoroughly and consider the educational plans of the parents as manifested in these wishes.

In the Lower Saxony Ordinance Governing Supplementary Educational Services for Children with Special Needs (Verordnung über sonderpädagogische Förderung) of 16 November 1994 (Bavarian Law Gazette [Bayerisches Gesetz und Verordnungsblatt - GVBl.] p. 502), for example, provision is made for the school authority to have a teacher who has taught or is likely to teach the child prepare a report and have a special education teacher produce an advisory opinion (s. 2 of the Ordinance) before it rules on an application for recognition of a need for supplementary educational support. Provision is also made for appointment of a special needs committee upon application of the guardians, which committee also includes the guardians and on the basis of the report and advisory opinion submits recommendations for recognition of a need for supplementary educational support and future school attendance and in the event of failure to reach a mutual agreement informs the school authority of the various positions (s. 3 of the Ordinance). The report, the advisory opinion and, if appropriate, the recommendation or the various positions of the special needs committee are taken into account by the school authority in its decision concerning supplementary educational support (s. 4 of the Ordinance).

This procedure, which is on the one hand intended to make the official decision making process as objective as possible and on the other hand involves the guardians in the decision making process, obviously with the intention of arriving at a decision that is also acceptable to them, adequately takes into account the potential conflict between parents and their children and the school administration. It not only creates an external framework within which the positions of the disabled pupil and his or her parents in respect of fundamental rights under Article 2.1 and Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law can be appropriately advanced; moreover, it also seems to be a basically suitable procedural and organizational means of enforcing the prohibition of discrimination against disabled persons contained in Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law in the area of education (on the protection of fundamental rights through procedural operations, see, for example, BVerfGE 53, 30 [65]; 84, 34 [45, 46]).

The ultimate responsibility of the school authority for deciding whether to recognize needs for supplementary educational support and the form of school attendance for children and youth with special needs is, however, not affected by the provisions of the Ordinance. The school authority is not bound by the content and findings of the report on an individual pupil and the advisory opinion, and this applies equally to the recommendations of the special needs committee. It is therefore also not prevented under the Basic Law from ordering a transfer to a special school even if these decision making aids speak - exclusively or alternatively - in favour of an inclusive form of education in the individual case. In light of Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the authority is, however, under a greater obligation to justify its position.

The prohibition of discrimination of disabled persons requires, as regards its constitutionality that decisions that are made in respect of a disability and could constitute discrimination against a disabled person be substantiated with reasons, which in the case of a disabled child or youth interested in inclusive education means they must be such that it is possible to recognize in detail the considerations upon which the school authority bases a transfer to a special school. This entails elaboration of those aspects that must be taken into account under Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. Depending on the situation in the individual case, the nature and severity of the disability must be indicated as well as the reasons that may have led the authority to conclude that education and instruction of the disabled child would seem to be best ensured in a special school. If applicable, organizational, staffing or physical difficulties and the reasons why these difficulties cannot be overcome in the concrete case must also be set forth. Finally, consideration of the opposing educational wishes of the disabled child and his or her guardians is in either case a prerequisite to adequate justification of a decision in favour of instruction in a special school or remedial school. They must be juxtaposed with the considerations of the school authority and weighed against its views in such a manner that the governmental measure becomes comprehensible and therefore also verifiable by the courts.

bb) The decision of the administrative courts to the effect that a transfer ordered by a school authority meets these requirements is only to a limited extent subject to constitutional control. The determination and evaluation of the facts pertinent to the decision as well as interpretation and application of the relevant provisions of the school law of the Länder are the responsibility of the administrative courts and in principle removed from review by the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 18, 85 [92, 93]; 86, 122 [128, 129]). It is also not the task of the Federal Constitutional Court to control the manner in which the courts render concrete and implement in detail on the basis of ordinary law the protection that fundamental rights - in addition to Article 2.1 and Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, in particular in this context Article 3.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law - afford the parties to a legal dispute and whether the best possible protection is achieved in so doing (see BVerfGE 89, 276 [286]; 92, 140 [153]. Rather, the Federal Constitutional Court intervenes correctively only if contested decisions violate the general principle of equality embodied in Article 3.1 of the Basic Law as regards its importance in terms of prohibiting arbitrariness (see on this BVerfGE 89, 1 [13, 14]) or reveal errors that are based on a fundamentally erroneous view of the importance and reach of a fundamental right, in particular the scope of the area of protection, and are also of a certain material importance for the concrete legal case (see BVerfGE 89, 1 [910] with further references).

II.

Given this background, the order under challenge cannot in the end be objected to on constitutional grounds. It does not to be sure, do justice to the constitutional standards elaborated under C I (1.) in all respects. However, this does not affect the judgment of the Higher Administrative Court to the effect that in view of the concrete actual circumstances of the case of the complainant, more speaks in favour of the conclusion that the transfer order contested by the action is legal (2.).

Explanatory Annotation

The decision on the right of persons who do not identify as either male or female to be able to register their gender in a distinct category speaks for itself. It should be noted, however, that the decision of the Constitutional Court did not only stipulate that the binary legal framework allowing only for male or female (or none at all) gender identifications the prohibition of discrimination based on gender under Article 3.3 of the Basic Law. The Court also held that gender identity is a separate right emanating from the general right of personality in Article 2.1 read in conjunction with the human dignity clause in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. That is an important point because it elevates gender identity questions from general (anti-)discrimination law and creating an independent constitutional anchor right for gender identity issues that might arise in the future. Hence this decision could well have been reported above under Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

Translation of "Gender Identity" decision, BVerfG, 10.10.2017, 1 BvR 2019/16, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20171010_1bvr201916en.html

Headnotes:

1. The general right of personality (Article 2(1) in conjunction with Article 1(1) of the Basic Law, Grundgesetz – GG) protects the gender identity. It also protects the gender identity of those who cannot be assigned either the gender "male" or "female" permanently.
2. Article 3(3) first sentence GG also protects persons who do not permanently identify as male or female against discrimination based on gender.
3. Both of these fundamental rights of persons who do not permanently identify as male or female are violated if the civil status law requires that the gender be registered but does not allow for a further positive entry other than male or female.

Facts:

[Excerpt from press release no.29/2018 of 27 April 2018]

The complainant filed a request with the competent registry office for correcting the complainant's birth registration by deleting the previous gender entry "female" and replacing it with "inter/diverse", alternatively only with "diverse". The registry office rejected the request and pointed out that under German civil status law a child needs to be assigned either the female or the male gender in the birth register, and emphasised that – if this is impossible – no gender entry is made (§ 21(1) no. 3, § 22(3) PStG). The request for correction filed thereupon with the Local Court (Amtsgericht) was rejected; the complaint filed against this decision was unsuccessful. […].

I.

1. a) […] The two provisions of the Civil Status Act that are indirectly challenged read as follows: [2]

§ 21 Entry in the birth register

(1) The following information is documented in the birth register:

3. the child's gender,

§ 22 Missing data

(3) If the child can be assigned neither the female nor the male gender, that person's civil status shall be documented in the birth register without indicating the person's gender.

b) § 22(3) PStG was introduced in the context of the reform of civil status law in 2013. Previously, since 1875 there had been no legal provision on persons whose gender is not clearly female or male. The General State Law for the Prussian States (Allgemeines

Landrecht für die preußischen Staaten – ALR) of 1794 still provided for gender classification of hermaphrodites: "If hermaphrodites are born, their parents determine in which gender they are raised" (§ 19(I) first sentence ALR). "However, after having turned eighteen, these persons are free to choose which gender they want to belong to" (§ 20(I) first sentence ALR). This provision was omitted without replacement when registry offices and birth registers were introduced by the "Act on Documenting Civil Status and Marriage" (Gesetz über die Beurkundung des Personenstandes und die Eheschließung) of 6 February 1875 (Reich Law Gazette, Reichsgesetzblatt – RGBl p. 23). A regulatory gap resulted that ultimately persisted until civil status law was reformed in 2013 (see Wacke, in: Festschrift für Kurt Rebmann, 1989, pp. 861, 868 et seq.; Kolbe, Intersexualität, Zweigeschlechtlichkeit und Verfassungsrecht, 2010, p. 81; Lettrari, Aktuelle Aspekte der Rechtslage zur Intersexualität, 2015, p. 6). [3]

c) The new provision of § 22(3) PStG was preceded by the concluding observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women of 10 February 2009 in which the committee requested the Federal Republic of Germany "(…) to enter into dialogue with non-governmental organizations of intersexual and transsexual people in order to better understand their claims and to take effective action to protect their human rights" (CEDAW/C/DEU/CO/6 para. 62). [4]

In 2010, the Federal Ministry of Education and Research and the Federal Ministry of Health instructed the German Ethics Council to prepare an opinion on the situation of intersexual persons in Germany in dialogue with persons concerned by intersexuality. In February 2012, the German Ethics Council submitted its opinion. Its summary is as follows (Bundestag document, Bundestagsdrucksache – BTDrucks 17/9088, p. 59 [translation by the German Ethics Council]): [5]

"The German Ethics Council takes the view that personal rights and the right to equality of treatment are unjustifiably infringed if persons whose physical constitution is such that they cannot be categorized as belonging to either the female or the male sex are compelled by law to be designated in one of these categories in the civil register.

1. Provision should be made for persons whose sex cannot be unambiguously determined to register not only as "female" or "male" but also as "other".

   Provision should also be made for individuals' sex not to be registered until they have decided for themselves. A maximum age for affected people to decide should be laid down in law.

2. In addition to the existing possibility of amendment of one's registered sex under Section 47(2) of the Act on Civil Status (PStG), provision should be made for affected individuals to request amendment of their registered sex should the original entry prove to be incorrect.

4. As a basis for future decisions on legislation, the purposes of compulsory registration as provided by current law should be evaluated. A review should be undertaken to determine whether the recording of a person's sex in the civil register is in fact still necessary."

d) The Government's Draft Act to Amend Civil Status Law (Civil Status Law Amending Act, Personenstandsrechts-Änderungsgesetz – PStRÄndG) of 25 May 2012 did not follow the recommendations of the German Ethics Council (Bundesrat document, Bundesratsdrucksache – BRDrucks 304/12; BTDrucks 17/10489, pp. 5 et seq.). In a statement of 6 July 2012, the Bundesrat called on the Federal Government to review the recommendations of the German Ethics Council on intersexuality, which the Bundesrat endorsed, in the context of the draft law (BTDrucks 17/10489, p. 56). In its reply, the Federal Government confirmed that it took the problems of those concerned and the opinion of the Ethics Council very seriously. However, according to the Federal Government, in this very advanced stage of the legislative procedure, the complex problems, particularly when taking into account medical aspects, cannot be solved in the short term. Comprehensive consultations with persons concerned and experts would have to be held before new provisions could be enacted, the Federal Government argued. In this respect, it would also be necessary to review which amendments to other laws would be required (BTDrucks 17/10489, p. 72; Bundestag Minutes of Plenary Proceedings, BT-Plenarprotokoll 17/219, p. 27222). The Bundestag Committee on Internal Affairs recommended adopting the current § 22(3) PStG (BTDrucks 17/12192, pp. 3, 11). In the second and third deliberations, the Committee's proposal was adopted unanimously (cf. Bundestag Minutes of Plenary Proceedings 17/219, pp. 27217 et seq.). For the time being, further provisions should be subject to further discussions in the expert committees (cf. Bundestag Minutes of Plenary Proceedings 17/219, p. 27222). [6]

e) In the coalition agreement for the 18th legislative term of 27 November 2013, the coalition parties committed to evaluating and extending the changes in civil status law for intersexual persons that had been enacted in the meantime. They also committed to "focussing on the special situation of transsexual and intersexual persons" (cf. coalition agreement among CDU, CSU and SPD, 18th legislative term, p. 105). For this purpose, an interministerial working group "Intersexuality/Transsexuality" was established, which was due to submit its report in the first half of 2017. This has not happened yet (cf. reply by the Federal Government to a minor interpellation of the parliamentary group BÜNDNIS 90/DIE GRÜNEN, BTDrucks 18/7310, p. 14). [7]

3. From a medical perspective, exclusively binary designations of gender are not maintained. In 2015, upon the recommendation of its scientific advisory board, the German Medical Association (Bundesärztekammer) submitted its opinion "Healthcare for children, youths and adults with differences/disorders of sex development (DSD)" ("Versorgung von Kindern, Jugendlichen und Erwachsenen mit Varianten/Störungen der Geschlechtsentwicklung"). In its opinion, the association states that disorders of sex development are heterogeneous deviations in gender determination or differentiation. Deviations in gender development include congenital variations in genetic, hormonal, gonadal and genital dispositions of a person due to which a person's gender does not unambiguously correspond to the biological categories of 'male' or 'female'. Equating this with a malformation or disease is not appropriate, the association holds […]. The 2016 "Guidelines by the German Society of Urology (DGU) e.V., the German Society of Paediatric Surgery (DGKCH) e.V., the German Society of Paediatric Endocrinology and Diabetology (DGKED)

e.V."(Leitlinie der Deutschen Gesellschaft für Urologie (DGU) e.V., der Deutschen Gesellschaft für Kinderchirurgie (DGKCH) e.V., der Deutschen Gesellschaft für Kinderendokrinologie und -diabetologie (DGKED) e.V.) note that the traditional prescriptive idea of men and women needs to be revisited in order to ensure adequate psychological and medical care for and treatment of persons with deviating gender development, due to the biological context and the experiences of these persons. Deviating gender development is not a disease. It is not possible to think about its "curability", the guidelines maintain. No medical or psychological intervention will change the ambiguous state per se. How people handle deviating gender development is in principle a socio-political issue and must be considered in the context of society as a whole […]. In addition, according to the opinion, medical and psychosocial science largely agree that gender cannot be determined, let alone created, by genetic, anatomical and chromosomal features alone, but is also dependent on social and psychological factors […]. [9]

With the constitutional complaint, the complainant claims a violation of their general right of personality under Art. 2(1) in conjunction with Art. 1(1) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz – GG), discrimination based on gender under Art. 3(3) first sentence GG and a violation of the principle of equal treatment under Art. 3(1) GG. [15]

[…]

B.

The admissible constitutional complaint is well-founded. § 21(1) no. 3 in conjunction with § 22(3) PStG is unconstitutional insofar as § 21(1) no. 3 PStG requires a gender entry under civil status law, but § 22(3) PStG does not allow for a further positive gender entry for persons whose gender development deviates from female or male gender development and who permanently identify with neither the male nor the female gender. The decisions challenged in the constitutional complaint are based on these provisions. They violate the complainant's general right of personality (Art. 2(1) in conjunction with Art. 1(1) GG) and the prohibition to disfavour a person because of gender (Art. 3(3) first sentence GG). [35]

I.

§ 21(1) no. 3 in conjunction with § 22(3) PStG violates the general right of personality (Art. 2(1) in conjunction with Art. 1(1) GG) in its manifestation as protection of gender identity. The general right of personality also protects the gender identity of persons who can be assigned neither the male nor the female gender (1). Their fundamental right is interfered with because current civil status law requires that gender must be registered, but does not allow a gender entry other than female or male (2). This interference with fundamental rights is not justified (3). [36]

1. The general right of personality protects the complainant's gender identity. [37]

   a) Art. 2(1) GG grants every person the right to free development of their personality. In addition to the general freedom of action, this fundamental right includes the general right of personality (Art. 2(1) in conjunction with Art. 1(1) GG). As a so-called "unspecified" fundamental freedom, the latter right complements the special ("specified") freedoms, which also protect constitutive elements of the personality (cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts – BVerfGE 54, 148 <153>). One of the purposes of the general right of personality is to guarantee the basic conditions enabling individuals to develop and protect their individuality in a self-determined way (cf. BVerfGE 35, 202 <220>; 79, 256 <268>; 90, 263 <270>; 117, 202 <225>). However, the general right of personality only protects those elements of development of one's personality which – without already being covered by the specifically guaranteed freedoms under the Basic Law – are equal to these freedoms in terms of their constitutive importance for personality (cf. BVerfGE 79, 256 <268>; 99, 185 <193>; 120, 274 <303>; established case-law). Hence, it does not guarantee protection against anything that could in any way impair the self-determined development of one's personality; in any case, no person is able to develop their individuality independent of external conditions and affiliations. However, where the self-determined development and protection of personality is specifically threatened, it is covered by the protection of the general right of personality, which serves to close legal gaps (BVerfGE 141, 186 <201 and 202 para. 32>). [38]

   b) Accordingly, the general right of personality also protects gender identity (cf. BVerfGE 115, 1 <14 et seq.>; 116, 243 <259 et seq.>; 121, 175 <190 et seq.>; 128, 109 <123 et seq.>), which is regularly a constitutive element of an individual's personality. Under the given circumstances, the assignment of gender is of paramount importance for individual identity; it typically occupies a key position both in a person's self-image and in the way this person is perceived by others. Gender identity plays an important role in everyday life: In part, gender determines entitlements and obligations provided for by law; furthermore, it often forms the basis for the identification of a person, and gender identity is also significant in everyday life irrespective of legal provisions. To a large extent it determines, for instance, how persons are addressed or what is expected of a person in terms of their appearance, upbringing or behaviour. [39]

   The gender identity of persons who can be assigned neither the male nor the female gender is protected as well. These persons might be able to develop their personality more freely if less significance was attributed to gender assignment in general. Yet under the given circumstances, gender assignment is a particularly relevant factor for how persons are perceived by others and for how they see their own personality. The complainant emphasises the practical importance of gender assignment, too, and argues that under these circumstances, gender identity is a constitutive element of their personality. [40]

2. The provision of § 21(1) no. 3 in conjunction with § 22(3) PStG interferes with the general right of personality in its manifestation as protection of gender identity (a) and specifically threatens the development and protection of the complainant's personality in their gender identity (b). [41]

a) The provisions indirectly challenged interfere with the general right of personality in its manifestation as protection of gender identity. Civil status law requires that gender must be registered, but does not allow the complainant, whose gender development deviates from female or male gender development and who permanently identifies with neither the male nor the female gender a gender entry under civil status law that corresponds to their gender identity (on the existence of an interference see BVerfGE 49, 286 <298>; 60, 123 <132 et seq.>; 116, 243 <259 et seq.>; 121, 175 <190 et seq.>; 128, 109 <124>). Under civil status law, a person's gender needs to be documented in the birth register pursuant to § 21(1) no. 3 PStG. The only positive options available for this are the gender "female" and the gender "male"; there is, however, no further option for a gender entry. This follows from § 22(3) PStG ("missing data"), according to which the gender entry in the birth register should be left blank if the child can be assigned neither the female nor the male gender. In this case, no positive entry can be made in the birth register. Accordingly, the complainant must tolerate an entry that does not correspond to their constitutionally protected gender identity. [42]

Pursuant to § 22(3) PStG, the complainant has the option of deleting their female gender entry in the birth register. However, this does not eliminate the interference with fundamental rights: The complainant's gender identity is not only impaired by their incorrect assignment to the female gender, but also by the currently stipulated choice of the legal alternative "missing data" (§ 22(3) PStG). The missing gender entry would not show that, while indeed not identifying as a man or a woman, the complainant does not identify as genderless either and sees themself as having a gender beyond male or female. The "missing data" option does not alter the exclusively binary pattern of gender identity; it gives the impression that legal recognition of another gender identity is ruled out and that the gender entry has simply not been clarified yet, that a solution has not been found yet or even that it has been forgotten. This does not amount to recognition of the complainant in their perceived gender. From the complainant's view, the entry remains inaccurate, because just deleting a binary gender entry creates the impression of not having a gender (cf. Althoff/Schabram/Follmar-Otto, loc. cit., pp. 24, 44; see also Vöneky/Wilms, Stellungnahme zur Situation von Menschen mit Intersexualität in Deutschland im Deutschen Ethikrat, 2011, p. 3; Siebericchs, FamRZ 2013, p. 1180 <1181>; Gössl, NZFam 2016, 1122 <1123>). [43]

b) If civil status law requires a gender entry, but at the same time denies persons recognition of their gender identity under civil status law, it specifically threatens the self-determined development and protection of these persons' personality: [44]

aa) Under the given circumstances, the recognition of gender under civil status law has an identity-building and expressive effect. Civil status is not a marginal issue; rather, it is the "position of a person within the legal system", as stated by the law (§ 1(1) first sentence PStG). With civil status, a person is measured according to the criteria provided for by law; it defines the central aspects of the legally relevant identity of a person. Thus denying the recognition of gender identity under civil status law in itself, i.e. irrespective of the consequences associated with the gender entry outside of civil status law, specifically threatens the self-determined development and protection of a person's personality. [45]

The entry under civil status law in itself only takes on specific significance for gender identity because civil status law requires that a gender must be stated in the first place. If it did not require a gender entry, it would not specifically threaten the development and protection of personality as the specific gender identity of a person would not be recorded under civil status law. […] [46]

However, pursuant to § 21(1) no. 3 PStG, civil status currently also includes a person's gender. Despite several reforms of civil status law, the legislature has maintained the registration of gender as an identifying feature under civil status law. As the legislature regards gender as so crucially important for describing a person and their legal status by way of civil status law, the recognition of a person's specific gender identity under civil status law has an identity-building and expressive effect in itself, with the material and legal consequences of the civil status entry outside of civil status law being irrelevant in this respect (on the independent fundamental rights relevance of the register entry in the case of transsexuality see BVerfGE 49, 286 <297 and 298>; on naming see also BVerfGE 104, 373 <385>; 109, 256 <266>; 115, 1 <14>). If, under these circumstances, the gender identity of a person is not recognised under civil status law, it specifically threatens the self-determined development and protection of their personality. [47]

bb) In particular, the requirement of a gender entry under civil status law in combination with the limited entry options make it difficult for those concerned to move about in public and be seen by others as the persons they are with regard to their gender. Yet the way a person is depicted and perceived in public and by others is significant for the free development of their personality and may result in specific threats [to fundamental rights] (cf. BVerfGE 99, 185 <193>; 114, 339 <346>; 119, 1 <24> […]). Civil status law requires a gender entry, but does not allow those concerned a gender entry in the birth register which is in line with their self-image. This contributes to the fact that their individual identity is not perceived and recognised in the same way and as naturally as that of female or male persons. The complainant plausibly argues that an individual often cannot just pass over their gender entry under civil status law when appearing in public. [48]

3. The interference is not justified. The court decisions are based on an unconstitutional legal provision, because compelling persons to have a gender entry under civil status law while denying them a further positive entry other than "female" or "male" is not based on a legitimate aim for which the provision would be suitable, necessary and appropriate. [49]

a) The Basic Law does not require that civil status be exclusively binary in terms of gender. It neither requires that gender be governed as part of civil status, nor is it opposed to the civil status recognition of a third gender identity beyond male and female. It is true that Art. 3(2) first sentence GG refers to "men" and "women". However, a conclusive determination that the term "gender" only means men and women does not arise [from this wording]. It follows from the requirement of equal rights under Art. 3(2) GG that existing social disadvantages between men and women need to be eliminated. The purpose of this provision is mainly to eliminate gender-based discrimination against women (cf. BVerfGE 85, 191 <207>), but its aim is not to enshrine gender identity in civil status law or to rule out introducing another gender category in addition to "male" and "female. […] [50]

b) The interests of third parties cannot justify that § 22(3) PStG does not offer a third option allowing for a positive entry in the birth register. The status of men and women under civil status law remains unaffected by a further entry option. The same also applies to persons with deviating gender development who still identify with either the male or female gender and who are and want to be registered accordingly. The mere possibility of entering a further gender does not oblige anyone to identify with this third gender. […] In a regulatory system that requires information on gender, the existing options for persons with deviating gender development to be registered as male or female or omit the gender entry altogether need to be preserved. [51]

c) The fact that the introduction of a third positive entry may be associated with bureaucratic and financial costs during a transitional period does not justify denying the option of a further gender entry. At first, the formal and technical preconditions necessary for registering another gender of course need to be created. However, the additional effort associated with allowing for a standardised third gender designation would have to be accepted, given the interference with fundamental rights that arises from being ignored by law in one's own gender identity. The general right of personality does not, however, grant a claim to the entry of random gender-related identity features as civil status information. Besides, the legislature is free to completely dispense with a gender entry in matters under civil status law. [52]

d) Organisational interests of the state cannot justify the denial of a third standardised and positive entry option, either. Insofar as the legal identification of persons is de lege lata carried out on the basis of their gender and individual legal obligations and claims are attributed based on gender under current law, the registration of gender under civil status law contributes to an accurate and unambiguous identification and attribution (cf. BVerfGE 128, 109 <129 and 130>). However, this does not justify that under § 22(3) PStG no gender other than male or female can be entered in the civil register. [53]

Allowing a positive entry for a third gender with a standardised third designation (for suggestions see, e.g., the opinion of the German Ethics Council, BTDrucks 17/9088, p. 59) does not result in any assignment difficulties that do not already exist under current law anyway. Uncertainties may occur where a provision outside of civil status law is linked to gender and presumes that a person is either female or male. In that case it would indeed be unclear how a person assigned to a third gender should be treated. However, the same issue exists already under current law if the gender entryis left blank pursuant to § 22(3) PStG. In this case, assigning a person to the male or female gender is not possible either: In this respect, material law neither regulates which gender-based provisions apply, nor has the legislature created specific provisions for persons without gender entry. If a further positive gender entry is allowed for, the questions to be clarified are thus the same as those that already arise when opting for no gender entry, which is possible de lege lata. In fact, the positive entry of a third gender could provide greater clarity given that it does not – unlike a gender entry that is permanently left blank – convey the wrong impression that the entry was left blank inadvertently. [54]

The permanent nature of civil status is not affected by the option of a third gender entry, either, because just creating another entry option is not a statement on the requirements for changing civil status. [55]

II.

Insofar as § 21(1) no. 3 in conjunction with § 22(3) PStG excludes a gender entry other than "male" and "female", it also violates the ban on discrimination of Art. 3(3) first sentence GG. The provisions that are indirectly challenged disadvantage persons who are neither male nor female and who permanently identify with another gender (1). Article 3(3) first sentence GG protects not only men and women against discrimination based on gender, but also persons who do not permanently identify with these two categories (2). The disadvantaging is not justified (3). [56]

1. § 21(1) no. 3 in conjunction with § 22(3) PStG disadvantages persons based on their gender who are neither male nor female and who permanently identify with another gender. Under Art. 3(3) first sentence GG, gender may generally not serve as a basis for unequal legal treatment. This holds true also in the case that a provision does not actually aim at an unequal treatment which Art. 3(3) GG prohibits, but primarily pursues other goals (BVerfGE 85, 191 <206>; established case-law). § 21(1) no. 3 in conjunction with § 22(3) PStG treats persons who are neither male nor female unequally and disadvantages them on the basis of their gender insofar as these persons cannot be registered in accordance with their gender, unlike men and women. § 22(3) PStG explicitly only allows for entries in the categories female or male. Under current civil status law, other persons must accept that they are either incorrectly assigned to one of the two above-mentioned genders or have an entry that creates the impression that they have no gender at all. [57]

2. Article 3(3) first sentence GG protects not only men against discrimination based on their male gender and women against discrimination based on their female gender; it also protects persons who do not permanently identify with these two categories against discrimination based on their gender, which is neither exclusively male nor exclusively female […]. [58]

The purpose of Art. 3(3) first sentence GG is to protect persons from being disfavoured that belong to groups structurally prone to being discriminated against (cf. BVerfGE 88, 87 <96> […]).Persons who identify as neither female nor male are particularly vulnerable in a society primarily organised according to binary gender patterns. The wording of Art. 3(3) first sentence GG readily permits including them in its protection. Art. 3(3) first sentence GG generally refers to "gender" without stipulating any restrictions in that respect; [the reference to "gender"] may thus also mean a gender other than male or female. [59]

There is no systematic contradiction to the requirement of equal rights under Art. 3(2) GG, which only refers to men and women […].The wording of Art. 3(3) GG, unlike Art. 3(2) GG, does not refer to men and women, but to gender in general. Above all, Art. 3(2) GG is of distinct relevance and independent of Art. 3(3) first sentence GG, which explains the narrower wording of Art. 3(2) GG. The regulatory content of Art. 3(2) GG exceeds the prohibition of discrimination under Art. 3(3) GG; it sets out the requirement of gender equality and applies it to social reality (BVerfGE 85, 191 <206 and 207>). Since 1994, Art. 3(2) second sentence GG emphasises the actual enforcement of equal rights between the genders. [60]

The legislative history of the provision does not run counter to the assumption that Art. 3(3) first sentence GG includes the prohibition of discrimination based on a further gender, either. While the constitutional legislature (Verfassungsgeber) did not have persons of another gender in mind in 1949 when drawing up Art. 3(3) first sentence GG, this does not preclude interpreting the Constitution in such a way that these persons are included in the protection against discrimination, given today's knowledge of other gender identities. [61]

The decision of the constitution-amending legislature not to include the element of "sexual identity" in Art. 3(3) GG does not run counter to a broad interpretation of the element "gender" – irrespective of differences of meaning between gender identity and sexual identity. Most recently, an insertion of the element of sexual identity was declined not because of concerns linked to the content of the protection of sexual identity against discrimination. Rather, it was argued that this protection had already become a legal reality. Further it was claimed that, according to the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court, the protection against discrimination based on sexual identity under Art. 3(1) GG by now corresponds to the protection under Art. 3(3) GG (cf. BTDrucks 17/4775, p. 5). [62]

Moreover, the Court of Justice of the European Union has also defined protection against gender-based discrimination broadly by including discriminations that are linked to a person's gender reassignment (fundamentally ECJ, Judgment of 30 April 1996, P v S and Cornwall County Council, C-13/94, ECR 1996, I-2143, para. 20). [63]

3. The disadvantaging is not justified. As shown above, there is no valid reason for it (see I 3 above). [64]

V. Freedom of Religion (Faith), Conscience and Creed - Article 4 of the Basic Law

Some General Comments

The protection of freedom of faith, conscience and creed comprises of two main aspects. Firstly, the provision guarantees the individual liberty to choose and profess any religion or philosophical creed, and the freedom to ensue one's own conscience. That relates mainly to the scope of such liberties and the distinction against other rights.

Secondly, it also includes questions arising from the relationship between the individual and the state or society as far as belief and conscience are concerned. The Constitution had for instance to deal with freedom of religion issues in public schools in several high profile cases. The relationship between the various churches and the state in Germany is noticeably different than the separation of church and state approach taken under the Constitution of the USA or under the laicist approach under the French Constitution. This is evidenced by the fact that the drafters of the Basic Law incorporated the church-state articles of the previous Weimar Constitution of 1919 into the Basic Law.[38] The differences are quite remarkable. For example, Article 137.5 of the Weimar Constitution provides for the possibility of religious societies (churches) to either maintain or apply for corporate status under public law in which case they can use the state's revenue service to collect a 'church tax' from their members. Article 138 implies a right to subsidies from the state and - still very important - Article 139 requires that "Sunday and holidays recognized by the state shall remain protected by law as days of rest from work and of spiritual improvement." To this day this provision makes it difficult or even impossible to treat Sundays and other religious holidays as regular working days with regular opening hours of shops and businesses. The Constitutional Court in a very recent decision regarded as unconstitutional regulations in Berlin allowing for the opening of stores on the four Sundays before Christmas.[39]

38 See Article 140 of the Basic Law with reference to Articles 136 to 139 and Article 141 of the Weimar Constitution.

1. The Scope of Religious Freedom and Freedom of Conscience

a) Lumber Room, BVerfGE 24, 236

Explanatory Annotation

In this 1965 case the Constitutional Court had to determine the scope of religious freedom. The question arose from a regular court decision where the applicants, a de facto catholic youth association[40] with close ties but independent from the Catholic Church were ordered to stop plans of collecting of old rags and clothes for the purpose of helping the poor. This fundraising drive had been announced ("advertised" in the words of the respondent) from church pulpits. The case had been brought by a commercial collector of rags and old clothes who regarded the competition by the association with the help of the catholic church as a violation of the German fair trade practices legislation, pointing to the fact that several million German Marks (as the currency then was) had been earned by the association by essentially taking away his business.

The Constitutional Court had to determine whether the de facto association fell within the personal scope of the freedom of religion and whether the organization and the conducting of such collections was an exercise of religion. Only if these questions were answered in the affirmative could the Court engage with the regular court's decision to see if its interpretation of the relevant provision in the trade practices legislation did indeed take into account the freedom of religion guarantee of Article 4 of the Basic Law.

The Court stated, without any further explanation, that the freedom of religion clause can be invoked by de facto associations, rather than just individually by the members. Religious freedom can obviously be invoked by organizations because churches would otherwise not be able to invoke this freedom. The fact that the association here was a de facto one is irrelevant if the degree of organization of the association is sufficient to create an entity that exists independently of the will of its members. More importantly the Court held that the conduct of such collections to help the poor is a quintessential part of the exercise of any Christian religion and that one cannot delineate the conduct from announcement in and by the church. Freedom of religion is not limited to church services and religious rites it also includes transporting the message into the world for example by way of aid projects. The court also defined some outer limits for this exercise of Christian "caritas". The collections must be free of charge, i.e. no money must be paid to the donors. The religious motive must be expressed and communicated and the use of the donated goods or the use of the proceeds achieved from them must be transparent.

40 As opposed to a de jure registered and therefore incorporated association.

Translation of the Lumber Room Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 24, 236*

Headnotes:

1. The fundamental right under Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz) is afforded not only churches, religions and groups that share other beliefs, but also associations that have set themselves the goal of cultivating, not completely, but only partially, a religious life or a life based on other beliefs.

2. Article 4.2 of the Basic Law also guarantees the right to take collections for ecclesiastical or religious purposes. The same applies to supportive activities related to usual religious life such as publicity from the pulpit.

Order of the First Senate of 16 October 1968 - 1 BvR 241/66 -

Facts:

The Catholic Rural Youth Movement of Germany (Katholische Landjugendbewegung Deutschlands), a national association with no legal personality, was the complainant. In the year 1965, the Catholic Rural Youth sponsored a "Lumber Room Campaign" throughout the country; it collected used clothing, rags and scrap paper and sold these materials to large dealers. The proceeds in the amount of several million deutschmarks were intended for rural youth in underdeveloped countries. The complainant publicized the individual campaign activities in various ways, which included announcements from the pulpit in Catholic Churches. In response to an action brought by a commercial enterprise operated in Noerdlingen for the purposes of the collection of scrap, whose operations at times almost came to a standstill because of the campaign, the Regional Court (Landgericht) ordered the complainant to cease preparation for the collection of scrap materials within the operational area of the plaintiff through publicity from the pulpit of Catholic churches. The Regional Court based its judgment on the fact that the plaintiff was competing with the complainant and that publicity from the pulpit constituted in this case an advertising activity that amounted to a violation of public policy.

In response to the constitutional complaint, the judgment was reversed and the matter referred to the Regional Court.

Extract from the Grounds:

III.

The constitutional complaint of the complainant is founded. The challenged decision violates the complainant's fundamental right to the undisturbed practice of religion (Article 4.2 of the Basic Law) since the interpretation and application of the term "public policy" therein failed to adequately take into account the nature and reach of this fundamental right.

1. It is not the task of the Federal Constitutional Court to decide whether the Regional Court was correct in its assessment to the effect that the collections and subsequent sale of the materials collected by the complainant represented an act of commercial competition. The interpretation of s. 1 of the Act against Unfair Competition (Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb - UWG), insofar as it serves as the basis for the decision, is according to the established case law of the Federal Constitutional Court an interpretation of ordinary law and as such exclusively the affair of the ordinary courts as long as the latter have not failed to recognize the force and reach of the provisions of the Basic Law and in so doing violated the fundamental rights of the parties involved (BVerfGE 18, 85 [9293]).

The very qualification of the collection activities as an activity that constitutes commercial competition precludes the existence of any violation of the fundamental rights of the complainant since the Regional Court basically considers such collections permissible. However, since only aspects having to do with commercial trade are considered relevant for the purposes of prohibition of announcements from the pulpit in the judgment under challenge, this perspective fails to take into account the influence exerted by the right to the undisturbed practice of religion from which the complainant as a religious association involved in a charitable cause can benefit.

2. a) The fundamental right to the undisturbed practice of religion (Article 4.2 of the Basic Law) is actually covered by the freedom of faith and conscience (Article 4.1 of the Basic Law). For this term encompasses - irrespectively of whether applied to a religious faith or religious or non-religious belief - not only the personal freedom to believe or not to believe, i.e., to profess a faith, to harbour a faith in secret or to renounce a previous faith and turn to another faith, but equally so the freedom to worship, proselytize and propagate (BVerfGE 12, 1 [34]).

In that regard, the undisturbed practice of religion is only part of the freedom of faith and conscience afforded individuals as well as religious associations or associations based on other beliefs (BVerfGE 19, 129 [132]).

At least since the Weimar Constitution, the freedom of the practice of religion has been substantively subsumed under freedom of conscience (see Hamel in: BettermannNipperdey-Scheuner, Die Grundrechte, vol. IV 1, 1960, pp. 62, 54). The special guarantee of protection of the practice of religion against encroachment and interference by the state under Article 4.2 of the Basic Law can be explained historically by the notion of a special exercitium religionis, but in particular by rejection of the interference with the practice of religion under the National Socialist rule of force. In view of this development, the intention of Article 4.2 of the Basic Law is in particular to make it clear that the holder of the fundamental right can also be a community, whose right to religious existence and activity is protected as regards the form and content of participation and the nature of its exercise - in the family, in the home and in public - as long as that community remains within the bounds of certain basic common moral notions of contemporary civilized peoples.

Since the "practice of religion" is of central importance for every faith and belief, the content of this term must be exhaustively interpreted against its historic background. This is supported by the fact that freedom of religion is no longer restricted by an explicit reservation of legislative power such as that contained in Article 135 of the Weimar Imperial Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung), is no longer associated with other provisions governing the relations between church and state (BVerfGE 19, 206 [219, 220]), cannot be forfeited pursuant to Article 18 of the Basic Law and is also protected by special provisions of the Basic Law (see Article 3.3, Article 33.3 of the Basic Law, Article 140 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 136.3 sentence 1 of the Weimar Imperial Constitution; Article 136.4 of the Weimar Imperial Constitution, Article 7.3 sentence 3 of the Basic Law and Article 7.2 of the Basic Law). This freedom of the practice of religion also extends not only to Christian churches, but also to other religions and groups that share other beliefs. This follows from the state's obligation to remain neutral as regards belief and religion (BVerfGE 18, 385 [386]; 19, 206 [216]) as well as from the principle of equal treatment of churches and beliefs (BVerfGE 19, 1 [8]).

There can therefore be no justification for an interpretation of freedom of worship that is narrower than the freedom of faith and conscience.

Accordingly, the practice of religion includes not only acts of worship and the practice and observance of religious customs such as worship services, church collections, prayers, the reception of sacraments, processions, the display of church banners and the ringing of church bells, but also religious education, non-religious and atheistic celebrations as well as other expressions of religious life and life based on other beliefs.

b) The fundamental right under Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law is afforded not only churches, religions and groups that share other beliefs, but also associations that have set themselves the goal of cultivating, not completely, but only partially, a religious life or a life based on other beliefs. However, this presupposes that the purpose of any such association is specifically directed towards the achievement of such goals. This applies without reservation to associations that are organizationally or institutionally affiliated with churches such as church orders, the purpose of whose existence includes more intensive pursuit of general ecclesiastical goals. However, it also applies as regards other independent or non-independent associations if and to the extent their purpose is to cultivate or promote a religious faith or preach the beliefs of their members. The extent of institutional affiliation with a religion or the nature of the goals pursued through the association can constitute a standard for determination of the existence of these prerequisites.

The complainant is to be sure not organizationally part of the Catholic Church. It is, however, institutionally associated with it: Catholic clergy are involved in all of its governing bodies by virtue of their ecclesiastical positions, and diocesan bishops can by virtue of their authority influence diocesan bylaws. The goals of the complainant are also of an ecclesiastical nature. Its bylaws explicitly state that its purpose is to do the work of the living Church worldwide and provide material support to alleviate the world's spiritual and corporeal needs. The complainant must therefore be afforded the fundamental right of undisturbed practice of religion.

c) The collections organized by the complainant for religiously motivated charitable purposes and the announcements made from the pulpit at the behest of the complainant fall under the practice of religion protected by Article 4.2 of the Basic Law.

When assessing what in any individual case is to be considered to constitute the practice of religion and belief, the self-identity of the religion or community of believers may also not be ignored. The religiously neutral state must to be sure in principle interpret constitutional terms on the basis of neutral, generally applicable criteria that are not associated with a particular confession or belief (BVerfGE 10, 59 [84, 85.]; 12, 45 [54]; 19, 1 [8]; 19, 226 [238 et seq.]; 19, 268 [278 et seq.]).

However, precisely in a pluralistic society with a legal order predicated on self-identity as regards religion or beliefs as well as freedom of worship, the state would violate the right of churches, religions and communities of believers to autonomy and independence within their own spheres that is guaranteed by the Basic Law if it did not take into account the self-identity of the adherents of a given faith or belief in its interpretation of their practice of their faith or belief (BVerfGE 18, 385 [386, 387]).

The self-identity of the Catholic and Protestant Churches is such that they view the practice of religion as encompassing not only the area of belief and religious services, but also the freedom to live and act according to their beliefs in the world outside in conformity with their religious and charitable duties. According to the New Testament, active love of neighbour is an important duty of Christians and is understood by both the Catholic and Protestant Churches as a basic ecclesiastical activity (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World of the Second Vatican Council [Pastoralkonstitution über die Kirche in der Welt von heute des 2. Vatikanischen Konzils], Article 88, Rahner Vorgrimler, Kleines Konzilskompendium, 1966, pp. 547548. and Article 15.1 of the Basic Order of the Protestant Church in Germany [Grundordnung der Evangelischen Kirche in Deutschland] of 13 July 1948 - Abl. EKD 1948, p. 233).

Charitable activities, in particular the collection of donations for charitable purposes, is also recognized as a legitimate role of churches under governmental policy following World War II, and the right of the churches to pursue such activities is guaranteed in agreements and treaties with the churches (see Article 14.1 of the Lower Saxony Protestant Church Agreement (Niedersächsischer Evangelischer Kirchenvertrag) of 18 April 1955 (Lower Saxony Law Gazette [Gesetzund Verordnungsblatt - GVBl.] p. 159); Article 1.1 of the Lower Saxony Concordat (Niedersächsisches Konkordat) of 26 February 1965 (Lower Saxony Law Gazette p. 192); Article 16 of the SchleswigHolstein Protestant Church Agreement (Schleswig-Holsteinischer Evangelischer Kirchenvertrag) of 23 April 1957 (Schlesw.Holst. Law Gazette p. 73) and Article 19 Hessian Protestant Church Agreement (Hessischer Evangelischer Kirchenvertrag) of 18 February 1960 (Hess. Law Gazette p. 54).

How the limits to the fundamental right of freedom of religion and in particular those of the undisturbed practice of religion are circumscribed in a pluralistic society - be it on the basis of the principles of tolerance and equality or the core area of protection or the guarantee of the essence of the fundamental right, on the basis of the relationship between state and church described in the Basic Law, on the basis of the human dignity of the individual or taking into account certain constraints inherent in the fundamental right - is of no importance here. In any case, for the purposes of the decision that must be made, it follows from the general considerations of the nature of the freedom of religion entertained here that a charitable collection is of a religious nature and may be afforded protection under Article 4.2 of the Basic Law only under certain conditions.

Donations must be made without receipt of consideration; they must be motivated by a certain religious spirit or attitude on the part of the donor, be it compassion or brotherly love, or be an expression of personal support for a just and good cause born of religious conviction. Christian love is according to the self-identity of the Christian churches therefore not the same thing as a social activity that is limited to concern for the poor, suffering and needy out of a sense of responsibility for one's neighbours in the interest of fostering peaceful coexistence within the state and providing minimum subsistence for others in order to make it possible for them to lead a life within the community that is commensurate with human dignity merely for social reasons. It follows from this characterization alone that Christian love must involve customary solicitude that is provided as a matter of course and in the vein of general religious awareness. The intended purpose and use of the collected materials must be obvious to the donors so that they do not make their decisions on the basis of mistaken ideas and the public is not deceived as to the purpose of the collection. It is irrelevant in this context whether the donations go directly to the needy or whether they receive some form of financial assistance from proceeds from the materials since the decisive criterion for qualification as a charitable religious collection is that a certain offering be made for charitable purposes. This applies all the more so when such sale is planned and announced from the outset. The collection and the realization of proceeds also cannot therefore be separated.

d) The "Lumber Room Campaign" collection conducted by the complainant remains within the framework of these general prerequisites - also as regards publicity from the pulpit.

The collection of in-kind donations to support the needy is one of the traditional forms of charity engaged in by church-related organizations. The nature of the sale of the donated materials was appropriate and in keeping with the special circumstances of the situation. Since the donations were intended for the needy overseas, maximum efficacy of the assistance could be more purposefully achieved through the sale of the collected materials than through costly shipment of usable clothing. In view of the general awareness of the extent of need in developing countries, expansion of the collection to include not only usable clothing, but also rags and scrap paper in general was also justified. Contrary to the opinion of the complainant, the donations were also of the beneficent nature required of the activities of religious charities. It may well be true that, except in the case of rags, commercial rag collectors in general also usually do not pay. The complainant has, however, itself submitted that the materials collected by charitable organizations contain a higher percentage of usable clothing than the goods collected by commercial dealers. It follows from this that in view of the purpose intended by the collection - assistance for the needy - the donors gave more valuable items, which they would not to the same extent have given to commercial rag dealers. The challenged judgment did not contain any findings to the effect that the complainant misrepresented the intended use of the proceeds or that the donors were deceived as to the nature of the use of the collected materials.

The statement of the complainant to the effect that 90% of the rag collectors had to suspend their operations due to the charitable collections is irrelevant for the purposes of assessing whether the "Lumber Room Campaign" is an activity that falls under the practice of religion.

Apart from the fact that, according to the opinion of the Regional Court that is of importance to the Federal Constitutional Court in this respect, the scale of the collection carried out by the complainant was also permissible and that it is not certain whether the decrease in the rag collecting business is not due to structural changes of a general economic nature, even a change in the structure of this area of business due to charitable collections would have to be accepted. In a free market economy, individual businessmen do not have a constitutionally anchored right to any specific volume of business and further business opportunities.

e) Since the collection of the complainant was therefore part of the practice of religion protected under Article 4.2 of the Basic Law, the Regional Court should also have taken into account the influence exerted by this fundamental right in its assessment of publicity from the pulpit as an activity that constitutes "competition in violation of public policy."

If the collection itself enjoys special protection precisely because of its nature and purpose as religious charity, this must also hold for supportive activities in connection with usual religious life such as publicity from the pulpit. The sole relevant question is whether the complainant in particular had the right to instigate such announcements from the pulpit. In view of the fact that the collection falls into the area of religion, there can be no doubt about this. When it interpreted the term "violation of public policy" as applied to activity vis-à-vis competitors, the Regional Court should therefore have assessed the special nature of competition between a businessman and a "competitor" acting within the scope of the practice of religion on the basis of the legally protected undisturbed practice of religion, which enjoys precedence, and not qualified it as being contrary to public policy on the basis of the established facts.

Insofar as the Regional Court has ruled against the complainant, the judgment must be overturned (s. 95.2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerGG)).

3. Since the constitutional legitimacy of the conduct of the complainant can be inferred in particular from Article 4 of the Basic Law, there can be no question of any violation of general freedom of action (Article 2.1 of the Basic Law) by the complainant (BVerfGE 6, 32 [37]; 10, 55 [58]; 17, 302 [306]).

For the purposes of the present proceedings, it is therefore necessary to ignore the issue as to the extent to which collections by charitable organizations that do not benefit from the protection of Article 4.2 of the Basic Law are covered by Article 2.1 of the Basic Law.

b) Conscientious Objection II, BVerfGE 69, 1

Explanatory Annotation

To this day Germany is a country with a compulsory obligation on young males to military duty. Article 12a.1 of the Basic Law stipulates that such compulsory military or alternative civilian duty may be imposed on young males who have attained the age of 18. Article 12a.2 demands that for persons refusing to serve in the military on grounds of conscience an alternative civilian duty must be provided which must not exceed in length the duration of military service. This provision builds on Article 4.3, which guarantees that no person shall be compelled against his conscience to render armed military service. The statute governing the details as amended in 1983 stipulated that the alternative non-military service for conscientious objectors was one-third longer in time than the time span for the basic military service. The Constitutional Court had to decide whether this deviation of the length of service violated the rights to conscientious objection. The right to conscientious objection of military duty is an absolute right and is valid not only in times of peace but also in times of war. However, there is a limitation insofar as it is not a right to objection for any reason whatsoever. Only those for whom military duty is impossible as a matter of conscience are protected. The extended period of service for non-military alternative duty was justified on the very basis that the willingness to do the extra time was an indication for the validity of the conscientious objection.

The ostensible conflict with Article 12a.2 of the Basic Law was resolved by the Court by arguing that military duty can and - in some but not all cases - will extend beyond the time frame for the basic military duty because of periodic military exercises the conscripts might be called up for or for extra service in times of crises. It follows that Article 12a.2 cannot be interpreted as demanding two identical time periods as this is impossible. Rather the provisions seeks to balance the two alternatives for compulsory service in such a way that in general the burden imposed when rendering alternative non-military service for reasons of conscience is not higher than the burden imposed on those rendering military service.

Translation of the Second Conscientious Objection Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 69, 1*

Headnotes:

1. Provisions of law governing conscientious objection must respect the fundamental right guaranteed in Article 4.3 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) and at the same time take into account the basic decision made under the constitution to provide for the effective military defence of the country.

2. The alternative service provided for under Article 12a.2 of the Basic Law is reserved for those persons subject to military service who refuse to render military service involving the use of arms on grounds of conscience. From this follows the legislature's duty to ensure that only those persons subject to military service are recognized as conscientious objectors who can with sufficient certainty be assumed to meet the conditions contained in Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Confirmation of BVerfGE 48, 127). The Conscientious Objection Reform Act (Kriegsdienstver-weigerungs-Neuordnungsgesetz - KDVNG) satisfies these requirements.

3. According to Article12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the duration of alternative service may not exceed the legally permissible duration of military service. The normative goal of Article 12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is to ensure a balance between the burden upon those who render military service and that upon those who perform alternative service. The legislature may therefore within the limits prescribed by Article 12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law take into account differences between military service and alternative service for the purposes of establishing the duration of alternative service.

8. The Basic Law requires that Article 1.8 sentence 2 of the Conscientious Objection Reform Act (conscription in the event of a state of tension and a state of defence) be interpreted to mean that persons subject to military service may be conscripted only for service not involving the use of arms until the recognition proceedings have been concluded with legal force. Under this interpretation, the provision does not affect the area protected by the fundamental right under Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. It protects only against such activities as are directly related to the use of military weapons as defined by the state of the respective weapons technology.

Judgment of the Second Senate of 24 April 1985 on the basis of the oral hearing of 30 January 1985 - 2 BvL 2, 3 and 4/83 BvR 2/84 -

* Translation by Donna Elliott;

Facts:

The matter under constitutional review in several abstract judicial review proceedings involved numerous provisions of the Act on the Reform of the Right to Conscientious Objection and Civilian Service (Gesetz zur Neuordnung des Rechts der Kriegsdienstverweigerung und des Zivildienstes - KDVNG) of 28 February 1983 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I, p. 203).

The Conscientious Objection Reform Act was the legislature's response to BVerfGE 48, 127. In that decision, the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG) had declared what is referred to as the "postcard amendment" to the Compulsory Military Service Act (Wehrpflichtgesetz - WPflG) void.

The Conscientious Objection Reform Act contains first of all in Article 1.1 (that deals with the Act on Conscientious Objection (Kriegsdienstverweigerungsgesetz - KDVG)) a provision taken over from s. 25 of the Compulsory Military Service Act (old version), pursuant to which only absolute conscientious objection is to be treated as protected under Article 4.3 of the Basic Law. As regards recognition proceedings, decisions as regards the right to refuse to render military service involving the use of arms are made only upon application (s. 2.1 of the Act on Conscientious Objection. The application must be accompanied by a complete curriculum vitae and a comprehensive personal presentation of the reasons for the decision of conscience and a certification of good conduct (s. 2.2 sentence 3 of the Act on Conscientious Objection. The applicant may in principle not be called up for military service during recognition proceedings unless he had already been called up or notified accordingly in writing prior to submission of the application (s. 3.2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection). This exemptive provision does not apply in the event of a state of tension or a state of defence (s. 8.2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection). The Federal Agency recognizes the applicant on the basis of the records unless the grounds advanced would seem to be unsuitable as justification of the right to conscientious objection. In such cases, the Federal Agency forwards the application to the committee for conscientious objectors, which performs a substantive examination of conscience. The same procedure is employed in the case of applications from individuals who have already been called up or soldiers.

The duration of civilian service is regulated by Article 2 of the Conscientious Objection Reform Act such that it always exceeds that of military service by a third.

In its decision, the Federal Constitutional Court found the provision under challenge to be compatible with the Basic Law.

Extract from the Grounds:

B. ... I.

All provisions of law governing the right to conscientious objection must on the one hand respect the fundamental right guaranteed under Article 4.3 of the Basic Law, which stipulates that no person may be compelled to render military service involving the use of arms against his conscience. On the other hand, they must also take into account that the framers of the Basic Law decided to make provision for functional military defence of the country and in that connection empowered the legislature in Article 12a.1 of the Basic Law to introduce general military service. Implementation must satisfy the standard of universal military service (Article 3.1 of the Basic Law). The alternative service provided for under Article 12a.2 of the Basic Law is reserved for those persons subject to military service who refuse to render military service involving the use of arms on grounds of conscience. From this follows the duty of the legislature to ensure that only those persons subject to military service are recognized as conscientious objectors who can with sufficient certainty be assumed to meet the conditions contained in Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. The Senate upholds the principles developed in the previous case law of the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 12, 45; 28, 243; 32, 40; 38, 154; 48, 127).

1. With the constitutional provisions governing defence issues that were subsequently incorporated into the Basic Law, in particular the currently valid provisions contained in Articles 12a, 73 no.1, 87a and 115b of the Basic Law, the framers of the Basic Law made a fundamental constitutional decision to provide for the effective military defence of the country. The establishment and functional viability of the Federal Armed Forces (Bundeswehr) enjoy constitutional status. In conformity with the prohibition of wars of aggression already included under Article 26.1 of the Basic Law, the above provisions include expression of the unambiguous and unmistakable intention of the framers of the Basic Law that the armed forces serve to defend against armed aggression (see BVerfGE 48, 127 [159, 128]).

With the enactment of the Compulsory Military Service Act of 21 July 1956 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 651) in the version promulgated on 6 May 1983 (Federal Law Gazette [Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.] I p. 529), the legislature decided on the basis of the powers conferred by Article 12a.1 of the Basic Law to introduce general military service in the spirit of a free, democratic tradition that dates back to the French Revolution of 1789 and the period of reform in Germany in the early 19th century. Under the democratic constitutional order of the Basic Law, the fundamental right to protection of the individual and the duty of the citizenry towards the community to contribute to the maintenance of this constitutional order go hand in hand (see BVerfGE 48, 127 [161]).General military service is an expression of the general notion of equality. Its implementation is subject to Article 3.1 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 48, 127 [162]); its fulfilment is democratic normalcy.

2. Article 4.3 of the Basic Law explicitly guarantees the right to refuse to render military service involving the use of arms on grounds of conscience as a fundamental right. The Basic Law proceeds from the dignity of free, independent persons as a supreme legal value (Articles 1.1 and 2. 1 of the Basic Law). In Article 4.1, it guarantees the inviolability of conscience and as a result the freedom not to be compelled to act contrary to dictates of conscience that are personally experienced as binding and absolute. Article 4.3 of the Basic Law then goes further and accords - to a remarkable extent as compared with other democratic constitutions predicated on the rule of law - precedence to protection of the free exercise of conscience on the part of the individual even in serious conflict situations in which the state makes special demands upon its citizens. The fundamental right of conscientious objection represents an insurmountable bar to enforcement of the constitutionally grounded obligation to contribute to the armed defence of the country and as a result to the maintenance of the existence of the state. The legislature may also not restrict the substantive content of this fundamental right in provisions based on Article 4.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, but only promulgate the limits that are already contained in the terms employed in Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law itself (see BVerfGE 48, 127 [163]; established case law). To also subsume decisions of conscience based as regards their substantive content exclusively on a concrete situation under the term conscience within the meaning of Article 4.3 of the Basic Law and grounds of conscience of Article 12a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law would of necessity have for effect that refusal to render military service on this basis would not be possible by virtue of these articles of the Basic Law as long as - especially in times of peace - the concrete situation, that is, the specific war or specific type of conduct of war has not occurred or the motive in the sense of a just or unjust ground cannot be discerned, and the situation in which the individual's conscience would forbid military service involving the use of arms has not yet materialized (see BVerfGE 12, 45 [56, 57]). It would not be possible to infer advance protection of such kind from either the fundamental right under Article 4.3 of the Basic Law or Article 12a.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

The framers of the Basic Law granted and reserved for those who consider themselves unable to render military service involving the use of arms on grounds of conscience the right to refuse to render such service. Article 12a.2 of the Basic Law empowers the legislature to require that conscientious objectors perform alternative service in a form that complies with the provisions of Article 12a.2 sentences 2 and 3 of the Basic Law. It follows from this that the framers of the Basic Law did not by any means authorize compulsory service for the common good by all citizens (Article 12.2 of the Basic Law) - therefore also including the female portion of the population in compliance with Article 3.2 of the Basic Law. Moreover, in view of the constitutional decision made in an immediate temporal and substantive context, the Basic Law (Article 12a.1 of the Basic Law) makes provision for a duty to serve in the Armed Forces, the Federal Border Police or a civil defence organization as the only - primary - form of compulsory service for the military defence of the country. Alternative service under Article 12a.2 of the Basic Law is limited to conscientious objectors. It is intended, as is already implied in the choice of terms (alternative service, compulsory alternative service), to be performed only in place of the military service a person refuses to render. Indeed, the inherent justification for compulsory alternative service derives exclusively from the fact that Article 12a.2 of the Basic Law allows for refusal to render military service for the reasons contained in Article 4.3 of the Basic Law; notwithstanding differences as regards the nature of the areas of activity, civilian service replaces military service (BVerfGE 48, 127 [165]).

Constitutionally mandated equality as regards civic duty in the form of universal military service therefore gives rise to the duty of the legislature to ensure that only those persons are exempted from military service who have decided to refuse to render military service involving the use of arms on grounds of conscience under Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law; this duty represents an obligation of high order towards the community. This means on the one hand that the state, which gives precedence to decisions to refuse to render military service involving the use of arms even in the event of a threat to its existence, must be protected against abusive invocation of this fundamental right. On the other hand, it is also necessary to protect the freedom of conscience itself, which is threatened precisely when it can be used to avoid fulfilment of general civic duties.

The legislature must therefore, if it introduces general military service, at the same time ensure that the responsible authorities are able to establish with a sufficient degree of certainty that conscientious objection is based upon a decision of conscience within the meaning of Article 4.3 of the Basic Law. Under constitutional law, this follows on the one hand from its responsibility to afford the holder of the fundamental right protection under Article 4.3 of the Basic Law and on the other hand from its duty to maintain both universal military service within the borders of the state as well as preparedness for defence of the state that guarantees this fundamental right. This does not restrict the fundamental right guaranteed under Article 4.3 of the Basic Law. Moreover, it only makes possible a procedure for ascertaining whether an individual subject to military service who invokes this fundamental right also in fact fulfils the prerequisites. In this - and only in this - regard, the fundamental right to conscientious objection is subject to procedural requirements. The legislature is explicitly empowered by Article 4.3 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to "regulate" - but not to "restrict" - the right to conscientious objection or, more precisely, the manner in which it is invoked. The procedure must be constitutionally objective, suitable and reasonable (see on the right of asylum BVerfGE 60, 253 [295]. Only if it fails to meet these requirements is it in violation of Article 4.3 of the Basic Law.

3. The legislature is in this regard free to choose the manner in which it chooses to have the existence of the elements of a decision of conscience established (see BVerfGE 48, 127 [169]). It is under no obligation to retain the customary recognition procedure (BVerfGE 28, 243 [259]; 48, 127 [166, 167]). It may replace it by a solution that it deems more appropriate to its purposes (BVerfGE 48, 127 [167]).The legislature may also avail itself of other appropriate means in place of a special recognition procedure (see BVerfGE 48, 127 [169]).

4. The legislature intended the provisions of the Conscientious Objection Reform Act under challenge to replace the previous procedure for examination of conscience, which was characterized by an oral hearing of the applicant, including in particular thorough questioning as to the motives for his decision, with another method for verification of the asserted decision of conscience: Knowing acceptance of civilian service, which is five months longer than active military service, is to be considered supportive evidence of the existence of a decision of conscience. The more onerous nature of the regulation of civilian service is primarily intended to ensure that the fundamental right under Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is invoked only by true conscientious objectors. It does to be sure constitute the actual "test of conscience" that gives effect to the will of the legislature, but not the only one. It is complemented by a recognition procedure, which may vary as a function of the respective circumstances:

> Persons subject to military service who have not served within the meaning of s. 4.1 of the Act on Conscientious Objection must undergo the procedure before the Federal Agency; such persons have accounted for approximately 85% of applicants in recent years. It does not - as can be inferred from its methodology and in particular the historical development of the Conscientious Objection Reform Act - constitute a recognition procedure in the conventional sense (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 9/2124, p. 9]): Recognition of the applicant is no longer dependent upon the results of an oral hearing, which was characteristic of the conventional procedure; the Federal Agency may not, except, if necessary, for a request for further information from the applicant, concern itself with the establishment of facts; a "merely formal examination" takes place (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks.] 9/2124, p.11); conclusive evidence of or against a decision of conscience need not be produced; rather, the sole purpose of the procedure is to eliminate without an oral hearing applications that are obviously without merit due to the immediately apparent absence of a relevant decision of conscience.

If in the opinion of the legislature there is generally cause to assume that civilian service alone does not in its present form fulfil its function as supportive evidence of the existence of a decision of conscience, the procedure before the committees and chambers for conscientious objection pursuant to ss. 9 et seq. and 18.1 sentence 2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection is applicable. It corresponds in significant ways to the customary recognition procedure: The substantive criterion for recognition remains unchanged as compared with previous law. S. 14.1 sentence 1 of the Act on Conscientious Objection does not, however, require that the procedure result in conclusive establishment of the existence of a decision of conscience, but rather even allows a sufficiently certain assumption to suffice as evidence of such existence. The personal hearing by the committee may be dispensed with if the prerequisites pursuant to s. 14.3 of the Act on Conscientious Objection exist.

II.

The Conscientious Objection Reform Act guarantees to the extent required under constitutional law that only such individuals subject to military service are recognized as conscientious objectors as can with sufficient certainty be assumed to meet the conditions of Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law; it may be assumed that only those who have actually made a decision of conscience against military service involving the use of arms will accept civilian service. Civilian service gives conscientious objectors an alternative to military service that is in any case not significantly less onerous. s. 24.2 sentence 1 of the Alternative Civilian Service Act (Gesetz über den Zivildienst der Kriegsdienstverweigerer - ZDG) stipulates that civilian service is to be a third longer than active military service. Since there are currently more positions available for civilian service than can be filled by persons obliged to perform such service and further civilian service positions are to be created in the future, conscientious objectors can today - unlike as recently as 1978 (see BVerfGE 48, 127 [171 et seq.]) - expect with a high degree of probability to be called up for civilian service. At the same time, certain, less appropriate positions - in particular in the area of administration and care - are to be done away with. When new positions of employment are recognized, it is necessary to ensure that the positions made available do not result in obviously unequal treatment of persons performing civilian service as compared with other persons performing such service or those rendering military service (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] 9/2124, p. 10). The burdens inherent in civilian service as such have become more tangible, in particular due to the provisions contained in ss. 6.1 sentence 1, 19.3 and 25a.4 of the Alternative Civilian Service Act.

The organization of civilian service in this manner makes it possible, in any case together with the accompanying recognition procedure, to establish with sufficient reliability the existence of a decision of conscience. In the case of the proceedings before the committees and chambers for conscientious objection, this results from the very fact that it is similar to the previous verification procedure, which was compatible with the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 28, 243 [259-260]; 48, 127 [166]). In the case of the proceedings before the Federal Agency, it must be admitted that it is indeed of only limited evidentiary value; in the meantime, it has assumed an exclusively complementary function in that civilian service, as the actual test of conscience, is intended to be combined with a minimum institutionalized procedural examination of individual cases. It can fulfil this limited function in an objective manner. More exhaustive examination by the Federal Agency is not required under constitutional law since civilian service in its present form seems to be generally suitable for preventing false conscientious objectors from abusively invoking the fundamental right under Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law to avoid military service.

III.

The provisions of the Conscientious Objection Reform Act under challenge are also otherwise compatible with the Basic Law.

1. The fact that the duration of civilian service under s. 24.2 sentence 1 of the Alternative Civilian Service Act exceeds that of active military service by a third does not constitute a violation of Article 12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

a) Under Article 12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the duration of military service represents an independent upper time limit to the duration of alternative service. The duration of military service to be rendered in times of peace under legislation governing such service includes active military service, which is currently 15 months (s. 5.1 sentence 2 of the Compulsory Military Service Act), standby military service and military exercises (s. 4.1 of the Compulsory Military Service Act). Standby military service is credited towards the total duration of military exercises (s. 5a.3 of the Compulsory Military Service Act). The duration of such service may not exceed a maximum of nine months for enlisted personnel, 15 months for non-commissioned officers and 18 months for officers (s. 6.2 of Compulsory Military Service Act). The duration of military service may therefore extend up to 24 months in the case of enlisted personnel. In view of the legislation in effect at that time, the Senate therefore also established that extension of civilian service to 24 months could also come into question (BVerfGE 48, 127 [170-171]). This interpretation of Article 12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is consistent with the wording of the provision.

In any case, the materials (see the remarks of the Members of Parliament Dr. Arndt and Dr. Schwarzhaupt, Proceedings of the German Federal Assembly [Verhandlungen des Deutschen Bundestages], 2nd legislative period, record of the 110th session of the Committee for Legal Affairs and Constitutional Law of 20 February 1956, pp. 9-10, and its 111th session of 21 February 1956, pp. 12 and 14 et seq., as well as the Second Written Report of the Committee for Legal Affairs and Constitutional Law, Proceedings of the German Federal Assembly, 2nd legislative period, stenographic report p. 6857 do not refute this. They make it clear that active military service and military exercises together constitute the basis for determination of the length of alternative service. The legislature that adopted the constitutional amendment cannot therefore have assumed that the time burden would be completely identical for both those persons who render military service and those who perform alternative service; for it was at the time already certain that it was not possible to know whether and to what extent those performing military service would be called up for military exercises after completion of active military service.

Article 12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law therefore prohibits in any case any legal provisions that call for civilian service that exceeds the legally permissible maximum duration of military service. The provision does not obligate the legislature to make provision for civilian service that falls within the legally permissible maximum duration of military service and corresponds exactly to the actual duration of military service. It also does not prohibit the legislature from making provision for the performance of civilian service that exceeds the actual average duration of military service to be rendered. Moreover, the legislature may establish the duration of civilian service as a function of a time span that it measures abstractly, i.e., on the basis of the legally permissible duration of military service and therefore independently of the actual duration of military service rendered. This follows from these considerations:

The normative goal of Article 12a.2 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is to achieve a balance between the burden imposed upon those who render military service and that imposed upon those who perform alternative service; those who perform alternative service may not be privileged over or placed at a disadvantage as compared with those who render military service. This precludes the possibility of making the actual duration of military service and that of alternative service completely and intrinsically identical. In view of the existing differences between military service and alternative service, the legislature can organize civilian service as a duty that represents a burden identical to that of military service (see BVerfGE 48, 127 [173]) only if it has certain latitude as regards establishment of the duration of alternative service. It would otherwise be possible to achieve identical burdens for those who render military service and those who perform alternative service only by adding "artificial" difficulty to alternative service that does not derive from the actual situation, i.e., from the nature of the service.

c) The legislature did not exceed the bounds of its operating freedom that it is therefore afforded as regards establishment of the duration of civilian service with the provision contained in s. 24.2 sentence 1 of the Alternative Civilian Service Act: The duration of civilian service is to be established so that it on the one hand does not exceed the permissible maximum time period, which is currently 24 months, and on the other hand is suitable for fulfilling its intended function as supportive evidence of the existence of a decision of conscience. This in particular also constitutes no violation of Article 12a.2 sentence 3 of the Basic Law. This article of the Basic Law prohibits legal provisions that discourage conscientious objectors from availing themselves of their fundamental right under Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law and therefore exerting undue pressure on decisions of conscience. The Conscientious Objection Reform Act does not create any such pressure. The freedom of those who refuse to render military service involving the use of arms on grounds of conscience to make a decision of conscience is not compromised by the fact that in addition to presenting the reasons for such a decision in the context of a recognition procedure they must perform civilian service with a duration of 20 months. On the other hand, the existing differences between military service and civilian service must be taken into account here. In the case of those who perform civilian service, such service is performed without interruption and ends conclusively at a specific time; it involves as a rule less stringent employment and is typically associated with less onerous living conditions.

1. Under the interpretation required by constitutional law, s. 8 sentence 2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection is compatible with the Basic Law.

a) Under s. 8 sentence 2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection, persons subject to military service who have not served in the military and who have not been called up or received preliminary notice may also be called up for military service during the recognition procedure in the event of a state of tension or a state of defence if they have applied for recognition as conscientious objectors. If the provision were to be interpreted on the basis of its wording to mean that it permits conscription for unrestricted military service, it would be incompatible with Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. The fundamental right of conscientious objection accords precedence to the protection of conscience over the duty anchored in the constitution to participate in the armed defence of the country and as a result in the protection of the existence of the state even in situations of serious conflict in which the state makes special demands upon its citizens (BVerfGE 12, 45 [54]; 28, 243 [260]; 48, 127 [163]).

Its core purview is the protection of conscientious objectors against being compelled to kill other human beings in connection with an act of war in violation of their conscience, which in principle and without exception categorically prohibits killing (BVerfGE 12, 45 [56-57]; 23, 191 [205]; 28, 243 [262]; 32, 40 [46-47]; 48, 127 [163-164]). Conscientious objectors are directly confronted by such compulsion if subjected to unrestricted service, especially in the case of a state of tension and in particular in the event of a state of defence. It cannot be justified under law that is subordinate to the constitution (BVerfGE 12, 45 [53]; 28, 243 [259]). Even conflicting fundamental rights of other parties and other legal values of constitutional rank may only limit the unconditional and unrestricted right to conscientious objection in individual respects, but not, however, its core purview (See BVerfGE 28, 243 [261]).

b) A law may be nullified only if no acceptable interpretation is possible on the basis of recognized principles of interpretation that is compatible with the Basic Law (BVerfGE 49, 148 [157]). If the wording, the historical development and the overall context of the relevant provisions and their purpose and intent admit of several meanings, of which at least one leads to a result that is compatible with the Basic Law, an interpretation is then available that is compatible with the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 19, 1 [5]; 30, 129 [148]; 32, 373 [383-384]; 49, 148 [157]).

s. 8 sentence 2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection must be interpreted to mean that persons subject to military service may be called up only for service that does not involve the use of arms.

This is not in contradiction with the wording of s. 8 sentence 2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection. The provision explicitly states only that "conscription" or, as the case may be, "draft into military service" is possible (see s. 3.2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection). It does not conclusively specify the type of service for which the applicant may be called up, that is, whether for unrestricted service or only for service that does not involve the use of arms.

The history of the development and the intent and purpose of s. 8 sentence 2 of the Act on Conscientious Objection also do not speak against a restrictive interpretation. In the interest of upholding a law, which in the case of doubt requires an interpretation in compliance with the Basic Law, whether an interpretation that goes further than the interpretation of the law that is in compliance with the Basic Law would better reflect the subjective will of the legislature cannot be considered to be of decisive importance (BVerfGE 49, 148 [157]). Of sole importance is that an interpretation not be in contradiction with the will of the legislature. This is not the case here. Indeed, the interpretation to the effect that conscription of an applicant only for service that does not involve the use of arms is permissible is essentially consistent with the will of the legislature. The intent of the latter was to ensure to the greatest extent possible the preparedness and capacity for defence of the Federal Armed Forces, especially in the event of a state of tension and a state of defence. To this end, the legislature wanted to preclude that a large number of persons subject to military service who have not served would under the impression of the greater dangers of military service file applications for recognition as conscientious objectors in abuse of the law in order to at least temporarily avoid conscription for military service. Conscription only for service that does not involve the use of arms also takes these goals into account to a considerable extent.

It does not follow that this interpretation runs counter to the will of the legislature, in particular not from Article 3 nos 4 and 7 of the Act on the Reform of the Right to Conscientious Objection and Civilian Service. By deleting the former s. 27 of the Compulsory Military Service Act and the words "or upon application for service that does not involve the use of arms" from s. 48.2 no. 2 of the Compulsory Military Service Act, the legislature simply indicated that there was no (longer) any intention of organizing any special form of service that does not involve the use of arms. This does not mean, quite apart from the fact that this decision can be reversed, that the possibility of conscripting individuals subject to military service for military service and occupying them in a manner that does not compel them to render service involving the use of arms is now excluded.

c) If persons subject to military service who have not served and have applied for recognition as conscientious objectors are called up for service in the Federal Armed Forces that does not involve the use of arms in the event of a state of tension and a state of defence - for example, in the military administration or the medical corps - this does not encroach upon the area protected by Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. The provision protects only against such activities as are directly related to the use of military weapons as defined by the state of the respective weapons technology (Herzog in: Maunz/Dürig/Herzog/Scholz, Grundgesetz, October 1984, Article 4 marginal no. 171-172). It does not legitimize refusal to render any military service, but only refusal to render military service involving the use of arms (see BVerfGE 12, 45 [56]; 32, 40 [45]).

d) Conscription for service that does not involve the use of arms is permissible until such time as persons subject to military service have been officially recognized as conscientious objectors. In the event of a state of tension and a state of defence, in which cases the state is compelled to make use of all available resources to safeguard its existence, it is compellingly necessary that the state be able to make use of persons subject to military service in the Federal Armed Forces until such time as it is definitively established that they may rightfully claim the protection of the fundamental right under Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. In such situations, this is not countervailed by an equally valid interest on the part of persons subject to military service in being exempted from military service for, as it were, precautionary considerations, for such persons cannot in the course of rendering service that does not involve the use of arms find themselves in a situation of compulsion of the nature that the fundamental right under Article 4.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is intended to protect against. …

c) Ritual Slaughter, BVerfGE 104, 337

Explanatory Annotation

Both Islam and Judaism require that animals be slaughtered without prior stunning by severing certain major blood vessels to let the blood drain out. This method is controversial because it is alleged that this causes unnecessary suffering for the animal and this could violate animal welfare law. In Germany this approach to slaughtering animals had always been regarded as legal until the Nazi-regime changed this for reasons that had nothing to do with animal protection and everything with racism and bigotry. After 1945, ritual slaughtering became a tolerated practice. Animal welfare legislation passed in 1986 provided for a prohibition of slaughtering without prior stunning but contained an exception procedure for cases where "compulsory" religious rules require the ritual slaughtering. The necessary exceptional authorization was not granted to a Sunni Muslim butcher on the grounds that his religion does not per se prohibit the eating of meat of animals not slaughtered according to Islamic rites. The Constitutional Court objected to this narrow interpretation of the relevant norm in the animal welfare legislation. The question is not what the religion as a whole, i.e. Sunni or Shiite Islam, might generally say to this problem. It is sufficient that such rites can be shown to be part of a concrete religious community and to be of sufficient religious significance to warrant observance by the members of this community.

The decision was rendered in January 2002, just before an amendment to the Basic Law in which animal welfare became a constitutionally protected legal interest by being included in the "state objectives clause" of Article 20a.[41] However, this would not have changed the outcome of the decision. Either way the issue is a conflict between religious freedom and animal welfare. Resolution of this conflict is only possible by balancing both rights such that the broadest possible scope of both rights is achieved ("practical concordance"), i.e. the aggregate sum of the two balanced rights must larger than what could be achieved if one right were given absolute prevalence.[42] The absolute prevalence of animal welfare could not achieve that goal.[43]

Translation of the Ritual Slaughter Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 104, 337*

Headnotes:

1. If a non-German butcher who is a pious Muslim wants to slaughter animals without stunning them (ritual slaughter) in order to facilitate to his customers, in accordance with their religious conviction, the consumption of the meat of animals that were ritually slaughtered, the constitutionality of this activity is to be examined in accordance with Article 2.1 in conjunction with Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG).

2. In the light of these constitutional norms, s. 4a.1 in conjunction with s. 4a.2, number 2, part 2 of the Tierschutzgesetz (Animal Protection Act) is to be interpreted in such a way that Muslim butchers can be granted an exceptional permission for ritual slaughter.

Judgment of the first Senate of 15th January, 2002 - 1 BvR 1783/99 -

Facts:

The constitutional complaint concerns the grant of exceptional permissions for the so-called ritual slaughter, i.e., the slaughter of warm-blooded animals without previously stunning them.

After the end of the Second World War, ritual slaughter was, in most cases, tacitly tolerated (cf. Andelshauser, Schlachten im Einklang mit der Scharia, 1996, pp. 140-141). However, the first regulation with Germany-wide validity on slaughter that, for religious motives, is performed without stunning the animal, was only introduced when the Tierschutzgesetz (hereinafter: TierSchG, 41 Official Gazette of the Federal republic of Germany (BGBl.), Part I, p. 2862.

42 See Introduction at p. 67-72.

43 It should be noted that the Constitutional Court based its decision mainly on the subsidiary freedom of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, taking into account the religious freedom clause of Article 4.1 only marginally because it saw the main gist of the case in the business interest of the Turkish butcher to supply his customers rather than in his own religious beliefs. This was arguably a dogmatically wrong approach, which is also evidenced by the fact that the Court mainly engaged in a religious freedom argument. It is for this reason that the decision is dealt with under the heading of religious freedom.

Animal Protection Act) was amended by provisions on slaughter. Since the entry into force of the first amending law of the Animal Protection Act, dated 12th August, 1986 (Federal Law Gazette I, p. 1309; the latest amendments of the Act were promulgated on 25th May 1998, cf. Federal Law Gazette I, p. 1105 …), s. 4a of the Animal Protection Act contains, in s. 1, a general ban on the slaughter of warm-blooded animals without previously stunning them. s. 4a.2, number 2, however, provides the possibility of granting exceptional permissions for religious reasons. In the legislative procedure, the regulation contained in the second part of s. 4a.2, number 2, of the Animal Protection Act was seen in the context of Jewish as well as of Islamic dietary laws (cf. Bundestagsdrucksache [BT-Drucks, Records of the Bundestag] 10/5259, p. 38).

At present, the wording of s. 4a of the Animal Protection Act reads as follows:

(1) A warm-blooded animal may only be slaughtered if it was stunned before the draining of its blood begins.

(2) Notwithstanding s. 1, no stunning is required

2. if the responsible authority has granted an exceptional permission for slaughter that is performed without stunning the animal (ritual slaughter); the responsible authority may only grant the exceptional permission to the extent that this is necessary for meeting the needs of members of specific religious groups in the area of applicability of this law, to whom mandatory provisions of their religious group prescribe ritual slaughter or prohibit the consumption of the meat of animals that were not ritually slaughtered; or

3. if this has been established as an exception by a decree pursuant to s. 4b, number 3.

2. Pursuant to the judgment of the Bundesverwaltungsgericht (Federal Administrative Court) dated 15th June, 1995 (BVerwGE [Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court] 99, p. 1), ... s. 2, number 2 ... of the provision ... requires that for the grant of an exceptional permission, it must be objectively established that a religious group has mandatory provisions about the ban on stunning animals before slaughtering them. According to the Court, it is required (1) that definite norms that are issued by the respective religious group exist; and (2) that these norms are regarded as mandatory in the conception that the group has of itself; this conception is what the state can assess. The Court held that an individual view, which only focuses on the subjective religious conviction of the members of a religious group - even if they regard this conviction as mandatory - is not compatible with the wording, the purpose and the history of the origins of the law (cf. loc. cit., pp. 4 et seq.).

The complainant is a Turkish citizen and ... a pious Sunni Muslim. He has been living in the Federal Republic of Germany for 20 years and operates ... a butcher's shop that he ... took over from his father. Until September, 1995, he was granted, pursuant to s. 4a.2, number 2 of the Animal Protection Act, exceptional permissions for slaughter that is performed without previously stunning the animal for attending his Muslim customers. ... Afterwards, the complainant filed further applications for the grant of such permissions. They were unsuccessful due to the above-mentioned judgment of the Federal Administrative Court dated 15th June, 1995. The action that the complainant brought, in the original proceedings, against the rejection order and against the order that ruled on the complainant's objection against the rejection order, was dismissed by the Administrative Court; in the grounds, also the Administrative Court referred to the above-mentioned judgment and, apart from this, to the appeal judgment in these proceedings.

Extracts from the Grounds:

B.

The constitutional complaint is well-founded. Certainly, s. 4a.1 in conjunction with s. 4a.2, number 2, second part, of the Animal Protection Act is compatible with the Basic Law. However, the challenged decisions that are based on this regulation do not stand up to review by the Federal Constitutional Court.

I.

1. The Federal Constitutional Court's basis for review is, first and foremost, Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. In the original proceedings, the complainant, a pious Sunni Muslim, sought an exemption from stunning prescribed by s. 4a.1 of the Animal Protection Act in order to facilitate to his customers, by practising his occupation as a butcher, the consumption of the meat of ritually slaughtered animals. In comparison to this, the complainant's providing of such meat for his own consumption comes second. The second part of s. 4a.2, number 2 of the Animal Protection Act, on the basis of which the administrative authorities and administrative courts examined the complainant's application, therefore primarily affects the complainant's occupational activity as a butcher.

Because the complainant is not a German but a Turkish citizen, this activity is not protected by Article 12.1 of the Basic Law. The relevant statute that provides protection in this context is Article 2.1 of the Basic Law in the form that results from the special link between Article 12.1 of the Basic Law, which only applies to Germans, and Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, which is only of subsidiary validity for foreigners (in this context, cf. BVerfGE 78, 179 [196-197]). For the complainant, however, ritual slaughter is not only a means for obtaining and preparing meat for his Muslim customers and for himself. It is, according to his statements, which have not been called into question in the challenged decisions, also an expression of a basic religious attitude that for the complainant as a pious Sunni Muslim, includes the obligation to perform the slaughter in accordance with the rules of his religion, which he regards as binding (in this context, cf. the general statements in: Andelshauser, loc. cit., pp. 39 et seq.; Jentzsch, Das rituelle Schlachten von Haustieren in Deutschland ab 1933, 1998, pp. 28 et seq.; Mousa, Schächten im Islam, in: Potz/Schinkele/Wieshaider, Schächten. Religionsfreiheit und Tierschutz, 2001, pp. 16 et seq.). Even if ritual slaughter itself is not seen as an act of religious practice, the above-mentioned statements are to be given due consideration by enhancing the protection of the complainant's occupational freedom under Article 2.1 of the Basic Law by the special liberty rights (Freiheitsgehalt) that are contained in the fundamental right of the freedom of religion under Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law.

2. The legal position which the complainant thus enjoys with a view to his occupational activity as a butcher, is, however, pursuant to Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, only guaranteed in the framework of the constitutional order. The constitutional order includes all legal norms that are, formally and as far as substance is concerned, compatible with the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 6, 32 [36 et seq.]; 96, 375 [397-398]; consistent case law). As concerns substance, this presupposes, above all, the safeguarding of the principle of proportionality and, in this context, the observance of the freedom of religion.

II.

S. 4a.1 in conjunction with s. 4a.2, number 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act lives up to these standards.

1. It is true that the regulation encroaches upon the fundamental right under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law, because it permits slaughter without stunning, in the framework of the occupational activity of a Muslim butcher, only under the restricting preconditions established by the second part of s. 4a.2, number 2 of the Animal Protection Act as an exception from mandatory stunning stipulated by s. 4a.1 of the Animal Protection Act. This encroachment, however, is not objectionable because it can be sufficiently justified under constitutional law.

a) It is the purpose of the Animal Protection Act to protect the life and well-being of animals out of responsibility for animals as humankind's fellow creatures. No one may, without reasonable cause, inflict pain, suffering or damage upon an animal (s. 1 of the Animal Protection Act). The aim of a protection of animals that is based on ethical principles (cf. BVerfGE 36, 47 [56-57]; 48, 376 [389]; 101, 1 [36]) is also served by the regulation under s. 4a.1 in conjunction with s. 4a.2, number 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act. By incorporating in the Animal Protection Act the principle that warm-blooded animals are to be stunned before their blood is drained, the parliament intended to extend the fundamental concept of the Animal Protection Act, which is delimited in its s. 1, to the area of slaughter (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/3158, p. 16). This is a legitimate aim of a regulation, which also takes the feelings of broad sections of the population into consideration (cf. BVerfGE 36, 47 [57-58], and especially with a view to ritual slaughter, Records of the Bundestag 10/5259, p. 32, under I 2a, no. 3).

b) S. 4a.1 in conjunction with s. 4a.2, no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act complies with the requirements of the principle of proportionality.

   aa) The regulation is suitable and necessary for achieving the purpose of the regulation, i.e., for extending a protection of animals that is based on ethical principles also to the slaughter of warm-blooded animals.

   As concerns the appraisal of the means that the parliament chooses for enforcing the legislative aims of regulations with a view to their suitability and requisiteness, the Constitution grants the parliament a certain discretion. This also applies to the appraisal of the factual basis of a legislative regulation. In this respect, it cannot be assumed that an erroneous appraisal has occurred here. Certainly there are opinions that call into doubt that slaughter that is performed after the animal was stunned causes considerably less suffering and pain to the animal than slaughter without stunning (as concerns sheep and calves, see, e.g., the overview provided in the paper by Schulze/Schultze-Petzold/Hazem/Groß, Deutsche Tierärztliche Wochenschrift 85 [1978], pp. 62 et seq.). It seems, however, that there is no final scientific answer to this question as yet. For reasons of animal protection, other opinions, e.g., the one expressed by the German Association for the Protection of Animals during the oral argument, give a clear preference to slaughter that is performed with previous stunning. Article 12 of the European Convention for the Protection of Animals for Slaughter dated 10th May, 1979 (Federal Law Gazette 1983 II, p. 771) and Article 5.1, letter c of Directive 93/119/EC of the Council of the European Union on the protection of animals at the time of slaughter or killing dated 22nd December, 1993 (Official Journal L 340/21) proceed on the assumption that slaughter causes less pain and suffering to animals if they are stunned before their blood is drained. Under these circumstances, the German parliament's appraisal, which concurs with this opinion, and the parliament's assumption that mandatory stunning prescribed by s. 4a.1 of the Animal Protection Act is suitable for achieving the aims of s. 1 of the Animal Protection Act and is also necessary for lack of an equally effective alternative, is at least justifiable.

The same applies to the appraisal of the exemption provisions pursuant to s. 4a.2, no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act. The parliament placed the exemption from mandatory stunning prescribed by s. 4a.1 of the Animal Protection Act under the reservation that it requires an exceptional permission because the parliament wanted to submit ritual slaughter to an increased supervision by the state. In particular, the parliament intended to create, apart from examining the applicants' expertise and personal aptitude, the possibility to ensure, through collateral clauses to the exceptional permission, that the animals that are bound for slaughter are spared any avoidable pain and suffering during transport, immobilisation and the ritual slaughter itself. This was supposed to be achieved, for instance, by orders about suitable premises, equipment and other devices (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/3158, p. 20 on no. 5). Thus, the regulation intends to prevent, wherever possible, domestic or other private slaughter, which often does not ensure due ritual slaughter and which therefore can result in particularly offensive suffering of the animals concerned; instead, it intends to promote slaughter in approved slaughterhouses (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/5259, p. 39 on Article 1, no. 5).

Apart from this, the prerequisite for the grant of an exceptional permission pursuant to s. 4a.2, no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act is that in the specific case, the needs of adherents of a religious group are to be met, who are, by mandatory provisions of their religious group, prohibited from consuming the meat of animals that were not ritually slaughtered. The fact that the law permits only exemptions from the mandatory stunning prescribed by the Animal Protection Act if these prerequisites are met inevitably results in a decrease of the possible exemptions. In the case of Islam, it must also be taken into account that this religion itself, as the Muslims' Central Council in Germany stated in its opinion, requires that the killing of animals be performed as gently as possible (also see Andelshauser, loc. cit., pp. 35, 62, 79-80). Ritual slaughter in accordance with the rules of Islam must be conducted in such a way that the death of the animal is effected as speedily as possible and that the animal's suffering is restricted to a minimum, with any kind of cruelty to the animal being avoided (also see Österreichischer Verfassungsgerichtshof [Austrian Constitutional Court], EuGRZ [Europäische Grundrechtszeitung] 1999, p. 600 [at p. 603]). Also on this basis, the parliament could proceed on the assumption that the reservation of an exemption under s. 4a.2, no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act constitutes a measure that is suitable, and also necessary, for ensuring a protection of animals that is based on ethical principles.

bb) The legal regulation that is in question here is also proportional in a narrower sense. In an overall weighing of the severity of the encroachment upon fundamental rights that is connected with s. 4a.1 in conjunction with s. 4a.2, no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act, and the importance and the urgency of the reasons that justify the encroachment, it can be reasonably required of the person concerned (cf. BVerfGE 90, 145 [173]; 101, 331 [350]), under the conditions established by the parliament, to conduct the slaughter of warm-blooded animals without stunning only on the basis of an exceptional permission.

(1) The encroachment upon Muslim butchers' fundamental right to occupational freedom, however, carries much weight. Without the reservation of an exemption, it would no longer be possible for pious Muslims like the complainant to practice the occupation of a butcher in the Federal Republic of Germany. If they want to maintain their businesses at least as sales outlets, and not, as the complainant stated with regard to himself, give up their businesses to gain their livelihood in a different manner, they would have to restrict themselves to either selling imported meat of ritually slaughtered animals or meat of animals that were not ritually slaughtered, i.e., that were slaughtered after having been stunned. Each of these decisions would lead to far-reaching consequences for the person concerned. The decision to only market the meat of ritually slaughtered animals as a salesperson would not only mean to forego the activity of a slaughterer but would also result in the uncertainty whether the meat that he offers really comes from ritually slaughtered animals and thus is suitable for consumption in accordance with the rules of the butcher's own faith and that of his customers. The decision to convert the butcher's business to selling the meat of animals that were not ritually slaughtered would mean that the owner of the business would have to win new customers. Finally, a complete occupational re-orientation, provided that it is still possible in the specific situation of the individual concerned, would mean that this person would have to make a completely new start.

The ban does not only concern the Muslim butcher but also his customers. When they demand meat of animals that were ritually slaughtered, this is obviously based on the fact that they are convinced that their faith prohibits them, in a binding manner, from eating other meat. If they were required to, basically, forgo the consumption of meat, this would not sufficiently take the eating habits in the Federal Republic of Germany into consideration. In Germany, meat is a common food, and it can hardly be regarded as reasonable to involuntarily renounce its consumption. It is true that the consumption of imported meat makes such renunciation dispensable; however, due to the fact that in this case, the personal contact to the butcher and the confidence that goes with such contact do not exist, the consumption of imported meat is fraught with the insecurity whether the meat really complies with the commandments of Islam.

(2) These consequences for pious Muslim butchers and their pious customers must be weighed against the fact that the protection of animals constitutes a public interest that is attached high importance among the population. The parliament has taken this into consideration by not regarding animals as objects but as fellow creatures, which also feel pain, and by intending to protect them by special laws (cf. s. 90a, sentences 1 and 2 of the Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch - BGB), s. 1 of the Animal Protection Act). Such protection is, above all, enshrined in the Animal Protection Act.

However, the protection that is provided by the Animal Protection Act does not mean that animals, by virtue of law, must be spared any impairment of their well-being. Rather, the basic idea of the law merely is not to inflict, "without reasonable cause, pain, suffering or damage" upon an animal (cf. s. 1 of the Animal Protection Act and BVerfGE 36, 47 [57]; 48, 376 [389]).

Accordingly, the Animal Protection Act, not only in s. 4a.2, no. 2, provides exemptions from the obligation to kill animals only after previous stunning. Exemptions from mandatory stunning also exist in the case of emergency slaughter to the extent that stunning is not possible under the circumstances in the specific case (cf. s. 4a.2, no. 1 of the Animal Protection Act), and they can also be granted, for the slaughter of poultry, by an order pursuant to s. 4a.2, no. 3 in conjunction with s. 4b.1, no. 3 of the Animal Protection Act. Moreover, s. 4.1 sentence 1 of the Animal Protection Act generally permits the killing of vertebrate animals without stunning them to the extent that this is reasonable under the specific circumstances and to the extent that pain can be avoided. If the killing of a vertebrate animal without stunning is permissible in the framework of the huntsman-like performance of hunting or due to other legal provisions, or if it occurs in the framework of permissible measures of pest control, the killing may be performed pursuant to s. 4.1 sentence 2 of the Animal Protection Act, if it does not cause more than inevitable pain. Especially the exceptions that were mentioned last show that the parliament has regarded it as compatible with a protection of animals that is based on ethical principles to move away from mandatory stunning in cases where factual considerations or reasons of tradition and social acceptance suggest exemptions.

(3) Under these circumstances, an exemption from the mandatory stunning of warm-blooded animals before their blood is drained cannot be precluded if the intention connected with this exemption is to facilitate, on the one hand, the practice of a profession with a religious character, which is protected by fundamental rights, and, on the other hand, the observation of religious dietary laws by the customers of the person who practices the occupation in question. Without such exemptions, the fundamental rights of those who want to perform slaughter without stunning as their occupation would be unreasonably restricted, and the interests of the protection of animals would, without a sufficient constitutional justification, be given priority in a one-sided manner. What is necessary instead is a regulation that, in a balanced manner, takes into consideration: (1) the fundamental rights that are affected; and (2) the aims of a protection of animals that is based on ethical principles.

(a) S. 4a.2, no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act basically complies with these requirements. The regulation intends to facilitate, with a view to dietary laws that are valid, in particular, in the spheres of the Jewish and the Islamic faith (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/5259, p. 38), ritual slaughter for religious motives on the basis of exceptional permissions (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/3158, p. 20, on no. 5). The instrument of exceptional permissions is supposed to open a way for counteracting public criticism of religiously motivated slaughter, in particular if it is performed in the shape of so-called domestic and private slaughter (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/5259, p. 32, under I 2a, no. 3). As has already been mentioned, exceptional permissions allow, inter alia through collateral clauses, that the animals bound for slaughter are spared any avoidable pain and suffering (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/3158, p. 20, on no. 5, and also Records of the Bundestag 10/5259, p. 39, on Article 1, no. 5). This shows that it is the aim of the regulation to guarantee the protection of the fundamental rights of pious Muslims without abandoning the principles and obligations of a protection of animals that is based on ethical principles. Thus, also the complainant's rights are given due consideration.

(b) The situation would be different, however, if … s. 4a.2 no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act were to be understood in the same way as it was construed by the Federal Administrative Court in its judgment dated 15th June, 1995 (BVerwGE 99, 1). The Federal Administrative Court held that the case at hand did not provide the legal elements required by this statute, because Sunnite Islam, of which the complainant is an adherent, just as Islam in general, does not mandatorily ban the consumption of the meat of animals that were not ritually slaughtered (cf. loc. cit., p. 9). The Court found that s. 4a.2 no. 2 of the Animal Protection Act requires the definite existence of mandatory provisions that a religious group issues about the ban on stunning before slaughter. The Court concluded that an individual view that only focuses on the subjective religious conviction of the members of such a group - although this conviction is regarded by them as mandatory - is not compatible with the scope of regulation of the law (cf. loc. cit., pp. 4 et seq.).

This interpretation does not live up to the meaning and the scope of the fundamental right under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. The result of this interpretation is that s. 4a.2, no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act is rendered ineffective for Muslims irrespective of their religious convictions. This interpretation prevents a butcher from exercising his occupation who intends to perform ritual slaughter because he, with a view to the faith that he and his customers adhere to, wants to ensure their supply with the meat of animals that were slaughtered without being stunned. This is an unreasonable burden for the persons concerned, which, in a one-sided manner, only takes the interests of the protection of animals into account. If it were interpreted in this manner, s. 4a.2 no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act would be unconstitutional.

(c) This result, however, can be avoided by interpreting the legal elements "religious group" and "mandatory provisions" in a manner that takes the fundamental right under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law into account.

As the Federal Administrative Court itself has, in the meantime, decided in its judgment dated 23rd November, 2000, (BVerwGE 112, 227), the concept of a "religious group" under s. 4a.2.2 of the Animal Protection Act does not require that such a group: (1) fulfils the prerequisites for the recognition as a religious body under public law pursuant to Article 137.5 of the Weimarer Reichsverfassung [WRV, Constitution of the German Reich of August 11, 1919]; or (2) is entitled to engage in imparting religious instruction pursuant to Article 7.3 of the Basic Law. The Court found that for granting an exemption pursuant to s. 4a.2 no. 2 of the Animal Protection Act, it is sufficient that the applicant belongs to a group of persons who are united by a common religious conviction (cf. loc. cit., pp. 234-235). This means that groups within Islam whose persuasion differs from that of other Islamic groups may also be considered as religious groups under the terms of s. 4a.2, no. 2 of the Animal Protection Act (cf. loc. cit., p. 236). This interpretation of the concept of a "religious group" is in accord with the Constitution and, in particular, takes Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law into consideration. This interpretation is also compatible with the wording of the above-mentioned provision and corresponds to the parliament's intention to extend the scope of application of s. 4a.2 no. 2 of the Animal Protection Act not only to members of the sphere of the Jewish faith, but also to members of Islam and its different persuasions (cf. Records of the Bundestag 10/5259, p. 38).

Indirectly, this interpretation has consequences also when it comes to dealing with the concept of "mandatory provisions" that prohibit the members of the religious group in question from the consumption of the meat of animals that were not ritually slaughtered. The competent authorities, and in the case of disputes, the courts, are to examine and to decide whether the religious group in question complies with this prerequisite, because this is the legal element that is required for the grant of the exceptional permission that is sought. In the case of a religion that, as Islam does, takes different views as regards mandatory ritual slaughter, the point of reference of such an examination is not necessarily Islam as a whole or the Sunnite or Shiite persuasions of this religion. The question whether mandatory provisions exist is to be answered with a view to the specific religious group in question, which may also exist within such a persuasion (also cf. BVerwGE 112, 227 [236]).

In this context, it is sufficient that the person who needs the exceptional permission pursuant to s. 4a.2 no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act in order to supply the members of a religious group, states, in a substantiated and understandable manner, that > the common religious conviction of the religious group mandatorily requires the consumption of the meat of animals that were not stunned before they were slaughtered (cf. BVerwGE 94, 82 [87-88]). If such a statement has been made, the state, which may not fail to consider such a concept that the religious group has of itself (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 [247-248]), is to refrain from making a value judgment concerning this belief (cf. BVerfGE 33, 23 [30]). In the light of Article 4 of the Basic Law, the state cannot negate the "mandatory" nature of a religious norm for the sole reason that the respective religion has also rules that take its adherents' pressure of conscience into consideration by admitting exemptions, e.g, with a view to present environment of its adherents and the dietary habits that prevail there. An applicant who seeks an exceptional permission is to be granted such a permission to the extent that such grant is not precluded for other reasons. In this context, (1) collateral clauses to the permission; (2) the control of the compliance of such clauses; and (3) the examination of the applicant's expertise and personal aptitude, also with a view to the special skills required in ritual slaughter, are to ensure that the interests of the protection of animals are safeguarded as comprehensively as possible (also cf. BVerwGE 112, 227 [236]).

2. If the possibility of an exemption that is regulated in the provision that was last referred to is interpreted in the above-mentioned sense, s. 4a.1 in conjunction with s. 4a.2 no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act is, also in its other aspects, in accord with the Basic Law. In particular, there is no room for assuming an infringement of the principle of equality enshrined in Article 3.1 of the Basic Law or for assuming an infringement of the ban on discrimination under Article 3.3(1) of the Basic Law; in accordance with this interpretation, also Muslims may be granted an exceptional permission pursuant to s. 4a.2 no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection Act who, as butchers, want to supply the meat of ritually slaughtered animals to their customers, who, by mandatory provisions of their religious group, are prohibited from the consumption of the meat of animals that were not ritually slaughtered.

III.

1. The challenged decisions that were issued by authorities and courts violate the complainant's fundamental right under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Articles 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. The authorities and administrative courts misjudged the necessity and the possibility of a constitutional interpretation of s. 4a.2 no. 2, part 2 of the Animal Protection; they therefore restricted the above-mentioned fundamental right in a disproportionate manner when applying the exemption regulation concerning the ban on ritual slaughter. The denial of the exceptional permission that the complainant applied for and the confirmation of this decision in the objection proceedings and in the proceedings before the administrative courts are based on this circumstance. It cannot be ruled out that the complainant's customers, like the complainant himself, are members of a religious group in the above-mentioned sense that mandatorily requires that they observe ritual slaughter, and that, if the decision had been based on this fact, the complainant would have been granted the exceptional permission to facilitate the consumption of the meat of ritually slaughtered animals to his customers and to himself.

2. As regards the challenged decisions, the decisions made by the administrative courts are to be overturned pursuant to s. 95.2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG). The matter is referred back to the Administrative Court because it can be expected that the dispute on a point of administrative law will be terminated there on the basis of the present judgment. …

2. Religion and State under the Basic Law

a) School Prayer, BVerfGE 52, 223

Explanatory Annotation

The issue of communal school prayers in public schools has arisen not only in Germany. Unlike the Supreme Court of the USA, the German Constitutional Court, (on the basis of a much less stringent separation of church and state under the Basic Law) has ruled that such school prayers are not necessarily precluded under the Basic Law. There are certainly not in violation of the positive freedom of religion of those that want to pray as a manifestation of their belief. However, they might be problematic in the light of the negative freedom of religion of those students (and potentially teachers) who do not want to pray. The Constitutional Court therefore mandated that school prayers must be conducted in such a way that anyone is free to decide, without any pressure or even coercion, to participate in the prayer. In other words, the Court mandates tolerance from those who do pray and a certain degree of latitude to bear the exceptionality that might come with not participating in the prayer from those who do not want to pray. Only if exceptional circumstances to be determined on a case-by-case basis imply that this tolerance is not provided or that the pressure for those not wanting to participate is too high and that it therefore is in fact too difficult for those who do not want to pray to exercise their right will the school prayer become unconstitutional.

Translation of the School Prayer Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 52, 223*

Headnotes:

1. It is left to the Länder (states) in the framework of the supreme authority in school matters guaranteed by Article 7.1 of the Basic law (Grundgesetz - GG) to decide whether to permit voluntary, interdenominational school prayer outside religious instruction in interdenominational schools.

2. School prayer is in principle also constitutionally unobjectionable if a pupil or his or her parents object to the holding of the prayer: their fundamental right to negative freedom to profess a belief is not violated if they may choose freely and without coercion as to whether or not to participate in prayer.

3. The voluntary aspect which as a rule can be presumed where the precept of tolerance is adhered to is exceptionally not safeguarded if due to the circumstances of the individual case the pupil is afforded no reasonable opportunity to avoid participation.

Order of the First Senate of 16 October 1979 -1 BvR 647/70 and 7/74 -

Facts:

The constitutional complaints relate to the matter of the permissibility of school prayer outside religious instruction in state compulsory schools if the parents of a pupil object to the prayer.

The constitutional complaints pursue opposite goals. Whilst the complainant in proceedings 1 BvR 647/70 object to the official prohibition of school prayer, the complainant in proceedings 1 BvR 7/74 complaints of his fundamental rights being violated precisely because school prayer was held, and he had allegedly been denied legal protection against it.

I. Constitutional complaint proceedings 1 BvR 647/70

The complainants (hereinafter referred to as: complainants re I) are the parents of school-age children who at the time of the filing of the constitutional complaints attended classes 3b and 5 of Eichendorff School, a Rural Primary School in Kirschhausen in Bergstraße district in Hesse. In this school, it was usual at that time for a joint interdenominational school prayer to be said daily at the start of lessons. A mother and father whose children attended these classes objected to school prayer, and applied to have it prohibited. The competent schools inspector thereupon ordered that there was to be no prayer in these classes in future. At the instruction of the head teacher, school prayers was ceased in classes 3b and 5.

The complainants re I) submitted an objection to the prohibition order of the schools inspector. The latter was rejected by the Administrative District Officer. The latter stated the following as grounds : The Hesse Constitutional Court (Staatsgerichtshof) had found in the judgment of 27 October 1965 that the fundamental rights of a pupil under Article 48.2 and Article 9 of the Constitutional of the Land Hesse (Verfassung des Landes Hessen) were violated if school prayer was said in the class despite his or her objection. The complainants re I) have filed and action to rescind on which no decision has yet been made.

The complainants re I) have submitted constitutional complaints against the orders of the schools inspector and of the head teacher. The complaint concerns the violation of Articles 3, 4, 6, 7 and 33 of the Basic Law and 140 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Articles 136.2 of the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung - WRV).

II. Constitutional complaint proceeding 1 BvR7/74

The complainant (hereinafter referred to as: complainant re II) is the father of a pupil who had initially commenced attendance at an Evangelical primary school in Aachen. He applied for cessation of school prayer in his daughter's class. The education authority did not comply with his request since it was a denominational school, and school prayer was a major element of the children's education in the spirit of their faith. The complainant's objection was unsuccessful. Later, the Evangelical primary school was divided. Both successor schools were continued as interdenominational primary schools (Gemeinschaftsgrundschulen). The daughter of the complainant was now attending one of these schools, at which school prayer continued to be said at the start and end of lessons.

Before the school had been converted, the complainant had already filed an action to the Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgericht). The action with the goal of prohibiting school prayer in the Evangelical primary school; after conversion of the school, he requested prohibition of school prayer at the interdenominational primary school.

The Administrative Court largely upheld the major points of the action, invoking the negative freedom to profess a belief (right to remain silent). The respondent town was ordered to prohibit school prayer being ordered outside religious instruction or teachers calling to prayer in the class attended by the daughter of the complainant re II) in the interdenominational primary school insofar as this pupil attended lessons.

The Higher Administrative Court (Oberverwaltungsgericht) rejected the appeal on Points of fact and law of the education authority with the following reasoning: In the interdenominational schools of North-Rhine/Westphalia the children were said to be taught and brought up together on the basis of Christian educational and cultural values. The binding nature of these values, including the values described in the North-Rhine/Westphalia Land Constitution (Landesverfassung) by the words "respect for God" for teaching in interdenominational schools however allegedly did not mean that it was permissible to hold school prayer in lessons - outside religious instruction - despite the objection of a child or of his or her parents. …

In response to the education authority's appeal on points of law, by means of the impugned judgment (Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverwal-tungsgerichts - BVerwGE 44, 196), the Federal Administrative Court overturned the ruling of the Higher Administrative Court (Oberverwaltungsgericht) and rejected the action.

Extracts from the Grounds:

B.

The constitutional complaints are admissible.

I.

The constitutional complaint of the complainants re I) is directed prior to exhaustion of the appeals against the orders of the school authorities prohibiting school prayer. An action to rescind has been filed before the Administrative Court; however, in agreement between the parties these proceedings have been suspended pending a ruling of the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz -BverfGG) are met for a ruling prior to exhaustion of the appeals.

II.

Even if the children of all complainants have now left the schools in question, their protectable interest in the determination of any violation of fundamental rights has not ceased to apply, particularly in the religious-ideological area which is particularly sensitive to constitutional violation by virtue of the passage of time on which they had no influence. If in such a case one were to deny the need for legal protection, the fundamental rights protection of the complainants would be unreasonably reduced (see Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BverfGE) 34, 165 (180) …; 41, 88 (105) …

C.

The constitutional complaint of the complainant re I) leads to the overturning of the impugned administrative acts; by contrast, the constitutional complaint of the complainant re II) cannot be successful.

I.

1. The standard for review of a judgment of the constitutional questions arising with school prayer are primarily Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (right of the parents to bring up their children), Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law (freedom of faith and right to undisturbed practice of religion) as well as Article 7.1 of the Basic Law (state educational mandate).

Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law grants to the parents the right and the duty to plan the care and upbringing of their children in accordance with their own ideas freely and - subject to Article 7 of the Basic Law - with priority over other educators (see BVerfGE 24, 119 [138, 143-144]; 47, 46 [69-70]). This also includes the right to educate the children in religious and ideological convictions that they regard as right (BVerfGE 41, 29 [47-48]).

On the other hand, Article 7.1 of the Basic Law grants to the state a constitutional educational mandate for schooling (BVerfGE 34, 165 [181-182]). The discretion open to the state in the school system, which is assigned to the Länder (see BVerfGE 6, 309 [355]), includes not only the organisational structure of the school, but also the content definition of the courses and educational objectives. The state may hence in principle pursue its own educational goals in schools independently of the parents (BVerfGE 34, 165 [182]; 47, 46 [71-72]). The state educational mandate is separate and equal to the right of the parents to bring up their children; neither the parents' right nor the state educational mandate has absolute priority (BVerfGE 41, 29 [44]; 47, 46 [72]).

2. The problem of school prayer is initially to be seen in the further framework of whether religious references in public interdenominational (compulsory) schools are permissible at all, or whether the state must refrain from any religious and ideological reference when organising schooling - with the exception of the religious instruction expressly guaranteed in Article 7.3 of the Basic Law - in those schools that are not denominational schools.

The Federal Constitutional Court dealt with this question in great detail in the orders of 17 December 1975 on interdenominational schools in the Baden tradition (BVerfGE 41, 29 [44 et seq.]) and on Bavarian interdenominational schools (BVerfGE 41, 65 [77 et seq.]).

Accordingly, the introduction of Christian references in organising state schools is not absolutely forbidden, even if a minority of persons with parental rights who cannot avoid these schools in the education of their children do not want them to have a religious education. The school however may not be a missionary school, and may not claim exclusive truth for Christian articles of faith; it must also be open to ideological and religious values. The educational objective of such a school may not be tied to a Christian denomination - outside religious instruction, which no one may be forced to attend. The affirmation of Christianity in the secular refers primarily to its recognition as the formative cultural and educational factor as which it has developed in Western history, not to its truths of faith, and is hence also legitimate in relation to non-Christians by the continuation of historical circumstances. This factor includes not lastly the concept of tolerance for persons holding different views.

In comparison to these specific constitutional requirements of the organisation of schooling by the Länder concerning the religious-ideological character of state schools, the institutional principles of the relationship between state and church set out in the Basic Law may not set a primary standard. Insofar as these church policy provisions lead to a principle of non-identification, this may certainly not determine the organisation of schooling if this corresponds to the specific requirements put forward in view of the express constitutional provisions.

On the basis of these considerations, the Federal Constitutional Court has considered the Christian interdenominational schools introduced in Baden-Württemberg and in Bavaria to be constitutional; there was also no constitutional objection to the North Rhine/Westphalia interdenominational schools (BVerfGE 41, 88).

3. If considering the principles developed by the Federal Constitutional Court religious references in public compulsory schools are not prohibited, the holding of school prayer is in principle constitutionally unobjectionable if its implementation also remains within the framework of the school organisation granted to the Länder in Article 7.1 of the Basic Law, and if other constitutional principles, in particular fundamental rights of participants under Article 4 of the Basic Law, are not violated thereby. In the judgment impugned by the complainant re II), the Federal Administrative Court has affirmed the permissibility of prayer, referring to Article 7 of the Basic Law, albeit based for the religious references of school on Article 7.3 and 7.5 of the Basic Law. These considerations are constitutionally unobjectionable.

a) School Prayer, as subject matter of the present constitutional complainant proceedings, constitutes an interdenominational (ecumenical) call to God held on the basis of the Christian faith. School prayer in this form - particularly because it should be acceptable for both major Christian denominations - is not the expression of the faith of a specific denomination in the framework of the respectively defined tenets of faith; it is hence not part of the exercise of the actual religious creed of the denomination to which the pupil belongs.

Nonetheless, this general prayer remains an act of religious profession, in that it takes the form of calling on God on the basis of the Christian faith. In this respect, prayer is a religious act (see on this BVerfGE 24, 236 [246]) in which no one is obliged to participate in accordance with Article 136.4 of the Weimar Constitution.

School prayer as an act of religious profession spoken outside religious instruction is not a part of general schooling given in the framework of the state educational mandate. It is not instruction as characterised by lessons as such, it is not a passing on of the knowledge to the pupils, and it is not targeted educational influence by the school and the teachers on the children, but is a religious act which as a rule is carried out together with the teacher. In this, school prayer also is not a part of teaching Christian cultural and educational values as considered permissible by the Federal Constitutional Court in the framework of general lessons at Christian interdenominational schools (BVerfGE 41, 29 [52]). The permissibility of such schools does not mean per se the constitutional permissibility of school prayer.

b) Since school prayer is not a part of lessons within the meaning of school teaching, it can also not be an element of a binding curriculum. It's implementation must be completely voluntary - a factor also generally undisputed in view of the provisions contained in Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law, as well as in Article 140 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 136.4 of the Weimar constitution. This applies not only to pupils, but also to the teacher of each class in which school prayer takes place (see on this also Article 7.3 sentence 3 of the Basic Law).

   School prayer cannot therefore be held on the basis of instructions, but only of suggestions - which are ultimately not binding - which may emanate from the state's school administration, from the head teacher, from the teacher of the class in question, from the pupils themselves or from persons with parental rights. School prayer can take place during the time planned lessons, for instance immediately after the beginning of the first or shortly before the end of the last lesson, but also outside lesson time. It may take place in the classroom, or together for several classes or the whole school; the teacher may initiate the prayer, may sing it along with the pupils, or may leave it to the pupils altogether. The cases at hand relate to school prayer spoken during lesson time in the classrooms, with the participation of the teacher. It was manifestly a normal event in all classes of these schools.

   Even if school prayer is not and cannot be a part of the bindingly regulated lessons, it nevertheless remains - in each of the above forms - a school event to be attributed to the state. This certainly applies if school prayer takes place during lesson time at the suggestion of the teacher. The role of the state is however restricted to creating the organisational framework for school prayer and permitting prayer at the request of the parents or pupils or suggesting it itself. The state does not order it, it makes an offer which the school class may choose to take up.

c) If the state in the named sense permits school prayer outside religious instruction as a religious act and a "school event". It promoted, however, the view of Christianity and hence a religious element in the school over and above the religious references emerging from recognition of the characterising cultural and educational factor of Christianity (BVerfGE 41, 29 [52]). Prayer links also in its interdenominational form to a faith-based truth, namely to faith that God can grant what is asked for. Nevertheless, permission of this religious element in the interdenominational (compulsory) school - if voluntary participation is adhered to - is still in the framework of the discretion which the Länder have as bearers of supreme authority in school matters in accordance with article 7.1 of the Basic Law, even if the fundamental right of dissenters is included in accordance with Article 4 of the Basic law to achieve concordance in the evaluation:

> Article 4 of the Basic Law grants not only the freedom to believe, but also the external freedom to profess faith in public (BVerfGE 32,98 [106]; 33,23 [28]; 41, 29 [49]);

Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law ensures in this sense scope for the active exercise of religious conviction. If the state permits school prayer in interdenominational schools, it is doing no other than exercising the right of school organisation granted to it in accordance with Article 7.1 of the Basic law such that those pupils who so wish may give witness to their religious faith - even if only in the restricted form of general and interdenominational invocation of God. The state gives scope here to the positive freedom to profess a belief in an area which it has taken care of entirely and in which religious and ideological ideas have always been relevant (BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]).

From the outset, the state must however strike a balance between this scope to exercise positive freedom to profess a belief by permitting school prayer and the negative freedom to profess a belief of other parents and pupils who reject school prayer. The compensation takes place here in principle by guaranteeing the voluntary nature of participation for pupils and teachers. In contradistinction to the Christian-religious references of a school which determine its character as a whole, and - because they are a part of the lessons - permeate its educational goals, and hence the curriculum which is binding on all pupils, school prayer does not belong within compulsory instructions, but is a school event permitted in addition to this - characterised by volition. Even if school prayer, if it is to have a purpose, presumes a faith-based truth, the school in this instance does not claim absolute truth for the Christian faith; it merely enables those who so wish to profess such a faith. Subject to the completely voluntary nature of participation, hence, the permissibility of the religion element "school prayer" by the Länder in an interdenominational (compulsory) school organised by it not without a religious reference is in principle not constitutionally objectionable.

4. If the Länder may permit school prayer in the above sense for the organisation of schooling, they are on the other hand not forced to always permit the holding of school prayer in interdenominational schools.

Constitutionally the Länder are only obliged to provide for religious instruction in denominational schools as a standard subject (Article 7.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law). The parents do not have a positive right of determination to the introduction of school prayer any more than they have such a right to the establishment of schools of a specific religious or ideological leaning; they also have no right to have their children brought up in the desired ideological form (BVerfGE 41, 29 [46, 48]). The right of pupils to undisturbed practice of religion does not mean that they must be offered school prayer by the state in the area of school outside religious instruction. In designing schooling in the religious area within the meaning of its concordance of the constitutional values, the state has to strike a balance between the various fundamental rights, including between the right to carry out religious acts and the right of dissenters to be left in peace by them. How the state carries out this balancing out is left in the context of its supreme authority in school matters under Article 7 of the Basic Law in principle to its discretion: It can give interdenominational schools religious references, or it may forsake them. It may permit school prayer in those interdenominational schools which it provides with religious elements to the permissible degree (BVerfGE 41, 29[52]); it may however also - irrespective of whether it otherwise equips the school with religious references - choose to do without school prayer in general.

5. As the Federal Administrative Court rightly presumes in the judgment impugned by the complainant re II), the organisation of the schools in the individual Länder is also significant to the question of the permissibility of school prayer outside religious instruction; here lies the priority fundamental decision of the Länder as to whether or not they wish to permit generally religious references - over and above the religious instruction which the constitutional requires to be offered - in compulsory schools. Reservations against school prayer could certainly exist in an interdenominational school if the Land legislature had emphatically disfavoured religious references in the school from implemented by it. This is however not the case either in Hesse or in North-Rhine/Westphalia. In neither of the two Länder is the school to be adjusted a non-denominational school within the meaning of Article 7.3 of the Basic Law or a school which was emphatically kept free of Christian values; rather, both Länder have decided to maintain religious references in the interdenominational schools.

a) In North-Rhine/Westphalia (see on this BVerfGE 41, 88) in accordance with Article 12.3 of the Land Constitution of North-Rhine/Westphalia (Landesverfassung -LV NW) primary schools are interdenominational schools, denominational schools or ideological schools. In accordance with Article 12.6 of the Land Constitution of North-Rhine/ Westphalia, in interdenominational schools children are taught and brought up together on the basis of Christian educational and cultural values in openness to the Christian creeds and to other religious and ideological convictions. In accordance with Article 7.1 of the Land Constitution of North-Rhine/Westphalia, the goal of education is also to awaken respect for God. At the interdenominational schools in accordance with Article 14 of the Land Constitution of North-Rhine/Westphalia religious instruction is a standard subject of instruction.

   A provision corresponding to Article 12.6 of the Land Constitution of North-Rhine/ Westphalia is contained in s. 19 of the First Act on the Order of the School System in the Land North-Rhine/Westphalia in the Landtag ..., general agreement had been reached that interdenominational schools were not valued-neutral schools. Rather, they were schools in which Christian educational and cultural values had their place not only in the meaning of non-committal cultural Christianity. …

b) In Hesse, on the basis of Article 56.2 of the Hesse Land Constitution (hessische Landesverfassung - HV) children of all religious denominations and ideologies are as a rule taught together. In accordance with Article 56.3 of the Hesse Land Constitution, consideration should be given to the religious and ideological perceptions of all pupils. Article 56.7 of the Hesse Land Constitution provides that the details are to be governed by a statute which must take precautions against violating in school the religious and ideological principles in accordance with which the persons with parental rights seek to have their children educated. In accordance with s. 1.1 of the Hesse Act on Maintenance and Administration of State Schools and School Supervision (hessisches Gesetz über die Unterhaltung und Verwaltung der öffentlichen Schulen und die Schulaufsicht - SchVG) pupils are to be enabled to act on the basis of the Christian and Humanist tradition, as well as to respect religious and cultural values. In article 15.1 of the treaty between the Land Hesse and the Evangelical Land Churches in Hesse (Vertrag des Landes Hessen mit den Evangelischen Landerskirchen in Hessen) of 18 February 1960 state schools are referred to as interdenominational schools on a Christian basis. On the basis of these legal provisions, the Hesse school is largely regarded as a Christian interdenominational school.

II.

Were there to be no fundamental constitutional objections to school prayer, this could be judged differently if in the concrete case a pupil or his parents objected to prayer being held. This view was put forward by the Hesse Constitutional Court in the judgment of 27 October 1965, and, with different reasoning, by the Münster Higher Administrative Court in judgment of 28 April 1972. It is impossible to go along with the considerations of either court.

1. The Hesse constitutional Court opines that school prayer must be prohibited if a pupil rejects it because the pupil must not be placed in a situation of having to express his or her religiously or ideologically motivated rejection of school prayer through non-participation. Such an extension of the right to remain silent which was violated not only by virtue of being compelled to reveal what one oneself believes or thinks, but already by announcing a positive or negative attitude to denominational conduct of others, is not covered by the fundamental right to negative freedom to profess a belief … This is already shown by a consideration based on constitutional systematics: The freedom to decide for oneself whether to participate in a religious act is contingent on such religious acts taking place at all. By exercising the fundamental right not to participate, the person concerned reveals by that action that he or she does not agree with the conviction as precondition for the exercise of the fundamental right to refuse in particular, just as with non-participation in religious instruction (Article 7.2 of the Basic Law) or in refusal to render war service involving the use of arms (Article 4.3 of the Basic Law).

This is closely linked to the legal view of the Hesse constitutional Court, according to which negative freedom to profess a belief applies without restriction or exception, is neither restricted, nor can it be restricted, since it does not encroach on third-party legal spheres; by contrast, the positive freedom to profess a belief is alleged to be subject to the boundaries of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. This is not so. Article 4.1 of the Basic Law grants a special fundamental right which is not subject to the boundaries of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 23, 50 [55-56]; 32, 98 [107]); on the other hand, if a sovereign measure is compatible with Article 4 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 6, 32 [37]; 17, 302 [306]; 28, 243 [264]). Having said that, the fundamental right under Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law is not granted without restriction; this however applies both to the positive and to the negative freedom to profess a belief. However, this fundamental right is not subject to a constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute. Boundaries may nevertheless be imposed on the freedoms of Article 4 of the Basic Law in accordance with the principle of the unity of the constitution by other provisions of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 32, 98 [107-108]; 33, 23 [29]; 44, 37 [50]). In particular, the freedom to profess a belief comes up against boundaries where the exercise of this fundamental right by a subject of fundamental rights meets the conflicting fundamental rights of dissidents (BVerfGE 28, 243 [260-261]; 32, 98 [108]; 41, 29 [50]). As part of the fundamental rights based system of values, the freedom to profess a belief is related to human dignity, which in turn is protected in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law, which prevails over the entire value system of fundamental rights as the supreme value (BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]; 27, 1 [6]; 32, 98 [108])., and hence is attributed to the precept of tolerance. In every case where conflicts occur between negative and positive freedom to profess a belief, particularly in schools, where such conflicts as to the joint education of children of widely differing ideological and faith based leanings are ultimately unavoidable (see BVerfGE 41, 29 [50]), a balance must be sought taking into consideration the precept of tolerance. By contrast, a misunderstood right to remain silent must not be given absolute priority over the practice of religion of others, as was done by the Hesse Constitutional Court.

2. The Münster Higher Administrative Court refers to school prayer said during lessons in its judgment of 28 April 1972 as a teaching and educational act of the school implemented with coercive participation from which dissident, objecting children were unable to remove themselves with regard to the general obligation to attend school. The Federal Administrative Court had already refuted this argument in the judgment impugned by the constitutional complaint. The general obligation to attend school is overlapped when it comes to participation in religious acts by the fundamental right of Article 4.1 of the Basic Law to be able to decide freely on participation in such a religious act ... . Moreover, school prayer as an act of religious profession is a school event, but is not a part of the lessons aimed to teach and instruct pupils.

3. The objection of a dissident pupil or of the persons with parental rights could only make school prayer non-permissible if the right of the deviating pupil to decide freely, with no coercion, on his or her participation in school prayer were not guaranteed. As a rule, however, a pupil can reasonably avoid participation, so that he or she may decide in complete freedom for non-participation in prayer.

a) Possible means of avoidance are: The pupil can leave the classroom during the prayer; he or she can for instance not enter the room until after the prayer has finished, or can leave the room at the end of the lesson, before the final prayer is said. The dissident pupil can however also remain in the classroom during the prayer, but not say the prayer; in doing so, he or she may remain seated - unlike the fellow pupils praying.

b) It must be admitted that each of these possibilities for avoidance always emphasises the conduct of the pupil in question when the school prayer takes place as against the praying pupils. This applies particularly if there is only one dissident pupil: He or she visibly acts differently than all fellow pupils. This emphasis could be unacceptable for the person concerned if it would of necessity place him or her in the role of an outsider and discriminate against him or her with regard to the rest of the class. Indeed, the position of the pupil in a class is different and much more difficult than that of an adult citizen who reveals their different conviction in public by not participating in certain events. This applies in particular to younger school children who as yet are hardly able to assert their own position critically towards their environment; in general, the child is placed into a conflict as to the matter of school prayers not by himself or herself, but by the persons with parental rights on the one hand, and the parents of other pupils or the teachers on the other.

4. Nevertheless, one may not presume that avoidance of school prayer pushes the dissident pupil as a rule or even only in a considerable number of cases into the depicted unreasonable position of an outsider. An evaluation of the framework conditions in which prayer is to take place, of the tasks which the teacher has to carry out in this context, and of the actual circumstances at school, means that certainly as a rule one need not fear discrimination of the pupil not participating in the prayer.

a) The Federal Administrative Court in the judgment impugned by the complainant re II) had already set conditions for the organisational holding of school prayer which is to prevent unsuitable burdens on dissident pupils. Firstly, the duration and frequency of school prayer should be within suitable limits; for instance, it may not be said at the beginning and end of every lesson. Indeed, it appears to be much less onerous on a non-participant for instance if a short prayer is said only at the start of each school day, as was evidently done in the cases to be ruled upon here. Secondly, with pupils who have not reached the age of personal determination in religious matters, as the subjects here, all persons with parental rights must be informed of the fact of the organisation of school prayer and the possibility to not participate. This requirement, intended to make participation truly voluntary, is also justified. The persons with parental rights can where necessary be informed that in a liberal legal and social order it is a natural right of each individual to decide completely freely on participation in a religious act, and that neither participation nor non-participation will be valued in any manner.

b) Over and above these external and organisational measures, discrimination of the pupils not participating in school prayer can be ruled out as a rule by teachers in line with the educational goal of the school encouraging all pupils to adhere to the principles of respect for one another's convictions, toleration and tolerance. Teachers are obliged to do so both in North-Rhine/Westphalia and in Hesse.

In accordance with Article 7.2 of the Land Constitution of North-Rhine/Westphalia, young people are to be taught in the spirit of freedom to show tolerance and to respect the conviction of others. In accordance with Article 7.2 of the Land Constitution of North-Rhine/Westphalia, children are to be educated and brought up in openness to the Christian creeds and to other religious and ideological convictions. These educational goals are set out once more in s. 1.2 ... and ... s. 19 of the First Act on the Order of the School System in the Land North-Rhine/Westphalia goes on to provide that everything is to be avoided in education and lessons which might hurt the feelings of dissenters.

Article 56.3 of the Hesse Land Constitution provides as follows: The principle on which all teaching must be based is tolerance. The teacher shall in each subject respect the religious and ideological sensitivities of all pupils, and shall present the religious and ideological views in accordance with the facts. In accordance with Article 56.4 of the Hesse Land Constitution, young people are to be taught respect and tolerance amongst other things. In accordance with s. 1.1 of the Hesse Act on Maintenance and Administration of State Schools and School Supervision, schools should also enable pupils to have fundamental rights become effective for themselves and others and create relationships with other people in accordance with the principles of tolerance, justice and solidarity.

This binding educational goal of the spirit of tolerance must lead the teachers of a class in which one or several pupils - unlike their fellow pupils - do not participate in school prayer to teach the pupils in a suitable form and with the necessary pedagogical emphasis about the rights of each individual to freedom of faith and to participate or not to participate in religious acts; the teacher will have to strive to create such an atmosphere in the class that the praying pupils consider as natural the different conduct of their dissident fellow pupil and not treat him or her as an outsider. Where appropriate, the teacher will have to attempt to persuade those parents who - on the basis of their own intolerant religious attitudes - disapprove of the different conduct of a fellow pupil of their children not participating in the prayer.

On the other hand, the pupil not wishing to participate in the prayer, or who is not to participate according to his or her parents' instructions, will have to learn to show tolerance of the interests of the fellow pupils and their parents in holding school prayer, in their undisturbed practice of religion. They may not feel neglected because their fellow pupils follow a creed from which they wish to or are supposed to exclude themselves.

In this context, particular significance attaches to the fact that fundamental right of the positive and the negative freedom to profess a belief is associated with the precept of tolerance (see on this BVerfGE 32, 98 [109-110]; 41, 29 [51]; 47, 46[77]). The question of whether non-participation in school prayer is reasonable for dissenters cannot be solved without considering that two instances in which fundamental rights are exercised, collide which can only be balanced out if the Basic Law's precept of tolerance is respected. The effort to injure as little as possible the rights and feelings of the dissenter emerging from respect for this principle by all concerned, primarily by the teachers and parents of all the pupils in a class, as well as by the pupils themselves, as a rule precludes placing a pupil who not does participate in the prayer in a marginal position.

c) The dissident pupil will have to bear, and indeed will be able to bear, any elements nevertheless remaining of a special position as a result of his or her non-participation. To certain degree, there is also no express provision of the constitution to spare him or her from this situation in other circumstances: The pupil not participating in school prayer will as a rule also not attend religious instruction. In this case, the Basic Law manifestly requires in Article 7.2 that, in accordance with the precept of tolerance, there must be no discrimination.

d) Apart from this, it also may not be disregarded that it is hardly possible today to speak of a closed Christian stance on the part of pupils and their parents in a large number of school classes which would be suited to drive a dissident pupil into discriminatory isolation. In a pluralistic society, and in a time in which it is no longer an exception for people to resign church membership, in accordance with which many pupils remove themselves from religious instruction or are removed by their parents, a stance also externally expressed rejecting religion and the church is no longer unusual. Certainly, differences will be recorded between the circumstances in the cities, in small towns and in rural areas, possibly also between types of schools, as well as age groups, and in turn from one school to another. On the whole, however, the trend can probably not be doubted that a stance rejecting religious ties is less and less understood as a special characteristic deviating from "normal" conduct, even in schools.

5. Taking account of all these considerations, it will generally be possible to preclude a marginal role threatening to discriminate against a pupil not participating in school prayer. Certainly, one may not presume that avoiding school prayer is unreasonable and discriminatory for dissident pupil. There are neither factual nor legal preconditions for this presumption. Rather, one may conversely presume that an unreasonable situation leading to an impairment of fundamental rights for the dissident pupil does not occur.

On the other hand, it will also not be possible to rule out entirely that there may be exceptional circumstances in which a not inconsiderable emotional impairment of the dissident pupil could occur. It is conceivable for an emotionally particularly unstable pupil in a school atmosphere characterised by set prejudices which the teachers are unable to move towards tolerance, to be pushed into an exceptional situation which in this concrete case leaves no other option but to eliminate the occasion of the exceptional situation, in other words to completely eliminate school prayer. Whether the factual preconditions of such a situation apply, which would lead to a violation of a fundamental right by the continuing to permit school prayer, must be left to a decision to be taken in individual cases.

Apart from such exceptional cases, the objection of the dissident pupil or of his or her parents may not force the prohibition of school prayer which is still wished for by the fellow pupils or their parents.

III.

Measured against the standards of these principles, the judgment of the Federal Administrative Court impugned by the complainant (re II) is constitutionally unobjectionable. By contrast, the administrative acts impugned by the complaints (re I) violate fundamental rights of these complainants.

1. There are no constitutional reservations against the considerations with which the Federal Administrative Court in the proceedings of the complainant (re II) finds holding school prayer to be permissible despite the objection of this complainant. The fundamental rights of the complainant (re II) have not been violated. His children were free not to participate in school prayer. The decision on participation or non-participation could in this case be taken in complete discretion, with no coercion. The complainant (re II) has not submitted any indications that remaining away from school prayer would be unreasonable, and none are manifest, rather, his counsel, as specifically noted by the Federal Administrative Court, expressly denied in the oral hearing before the appeal on points of law court that such an unreasonable situation applied. The constitutional complaint of the complainant (re II) is hence unfounded.

2. By contrast, the notices of the schools inspector, of the head teacher and of the Administrative District officer acting in the objection proceedings impugned in proceedings 1 BvR 647/70, violate the complainants (re I) in their fundamental rights under Article 6.2 and Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. The persons with parental rights have no right safeguarded by the Basic Law to the holding of school prayer at state schools in Hesse on their request in the classes which their children attend. If however the state has generally permitted school prayer, and if prayer has thus far actually been held, it violates the above fundamental rights of the persons with parental rights concerned if the prayer is prohibited in specific classes with no justifying reason. This is the case here.

The prohibition orders are based neither on generally valid factual considerations, nor on the consideration that because of the concrete circumstances of the individual case it would be unreasonable for the objecting pupil to non-participate in school prayer; there is no manifest indication of an exceptional situation which would lead to unreasonableness. Rather, the prohibition is based exclusively on the judgment of the Hesse Constitutional Court of 27 October 1965, in accordance with which school prayer is said to be non-permissible per se in the event of an objection by a pupil or the persons with parental rights over him or her. The administrative authorities have considered themselves to be bound by the ruling of the Constitutional Court, without carrying out their own factual examination of the individual case. The prohibition orders hence do not have a tenable legal basis. The ruling of the Hesse Constitutional Court is not in compliance with federal constitutional law; for this reason, the judgment is null and void with regard to its binding effect (see BVerfGE 24, 289 [289]). The prohibition of school prayer, with the reasoning stated, and with no review of the individual case, encroaches on the fundamental rights of the complainants (re I) protected by Article 6.2 and Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic law. The impugned administrative acts were therefore to be overturned.

b) Classroom Crucifix, BVerfGE 93, 1

Explanatory Annotation

In what was certainly one of the more (or even most) controversial decisions of the Constitutional Court the Court banned the Christian Cross from classrooms in obligatory state schools with no religious affiliation. Bavarian school regulations for those schools providing the basic 9-year minimum education mandated that a cross be present in each and every classroom.[44] The Court saw a violation of the negative freedom of religion of the children who did not want to learn "under the cross".[45] The issue here was again the balancing of the positive freedom of those who either do not mind at all or even wish for this Christian symbol to be present with the negative freedom of those who find this offensive. The difference to the school prayer case lies in the fact that the students cannot escape the cross in the classroom and it was this point that moved the Court to take a more pronounced approach in this instance. In this sense the decision of the Court is only consequent. Fundamental rights in general and freedom of religion in particular are rights protecting minorities, especially those perhaps regarded as somewhat obnoxious in the eyes of the majority. One wonders what the harsh critics of this decision would say if a school in Germany with a majority of Muslim students - not uncommon in bigger cities - were to request that Islamic symbols be put up in the classroom and the Christian children would just have to ignore that as it does not pertain to them.

Interestingly the Bavarian legislator reacted to the decision in a fashion more akin to the Court's approach in the school prayer case. The cross is still mandatory but can now be removed on a case-by-case basis if a student takes issue with it and no other solution can be found.[46]

Translation of the Classroom Crucifix Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 93, 1*

Headnotes:

1. The affixation of a cross or crucifix in the classrooms of a State compulsory school that is not a denominational school infringes Article 4.1 of the Basic Law.

2. s. 13.1 sentence 3 of the School Regulations for Elementary Schools in Bavaria is incompatible with Art. 4.1 of the Basic Law and is null and void.

Order of the First Panel of 16 May 1995 - 1 BvR 1087/91 -

44 It is interesting to note that the Bavarian regulator saw the necessity of the cross in the class room in this lower tier of schools and not in those preparing children for tertiary education despite the fact that the children up to grade 9 will be the same age.

Facts:

The constitutional complaint concerns the affixation of crosses or crucifixes in schoolrooms.

By s. 13.1 sentence 3 of the School Regulations for Elementary Schools in Bavaria (Volksschulordnung - VSO) of 21 June 1983 (GVBl. p. 597), a cross is to be affixed in every classroom in the public elementary schools. The Volksschulordnung is a legal regulation issued by the Bavarian State Ministry for Education and Cultural Affairs, based on a power delegated in the Bavarian Act on Education and Public Instruction (BayEUG) and in the (since repealed) Elementary Schools Act (VoSchG). S. 13.1 VSO reads:

> The school shall support those having parental power in the religious upbringing of children. School prayer, school services and school worship are possibilities for such support. In every classroom a cross shall be affixed. Teachers and pupils are obliged to respect the religious feelings of all.

Complainants (3) - (5) are the school age minor children of complainants (1) and (2). The latter are followers of the anthroposophical philosophy of life as taught by Rudolf Steiner, and bring up their children accordingly. Since their eldest daughter, complainant (3), went to school they have been objecting to the fact that in the schoolrooms attended by their children first of all crucifixes and later in part crosses without a body have been affixed. They assert that through this symbol, in particular through the portrayal of a "dying male body", their children are being influenced in a Christian direction; which runs counter to their educational notions, in particular their philosophy of life.

In February 1991 complainants (1) and (2) brought an action against the Free State of Bavaria before the administrative court, in their own behalf and that of their children, with the aim of having the crosses removed from all rooms frequented or yet to be frequented in public schools by their children in connection with attending school. At the same time they applied for the issuing of a temporary order pending conclusion of the action for removal of crucifixes. The administrative court refused the urgent request. The appeal against this was rejected by the Higher Administrative Court. The main case is pending before the appellate court since the administrative court rejected the suit. The constitutional complaint is brought directly against the orders issued in the summary proceedings and indirectly against s. 13.1 sentence 3 VSO. The complainants object to infringement of their fundamental rights under Article. 4.1, Article. 6.2, Article 2.1 and Article 19.4 of the Basic Law.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

The constitutional complaint is admissible.

The complainants have exhausted the legal remedies (s. 90.2 sentence 1 of the Federal Constitutional Act - BVerfGG). With the order of the Higher Administrative Court, a decision of last instance terminating the procedure for temporary protection of rights is present. Certainly, the principle of subsidiarity may in such cases oppose admissibility of the constitutional complaint where constitutional infringements are complained of that do not specifically relate to the urgent procedure but raise questions that present themselves equally in the main proceedings, so that the latter are capable of redressing the alleged constitutional grievance (see BVerfGE 77, 381 [401]; 80, 40 [45]). On the other hand, the complainant may not be remitted to the main proceedings when the infringement of fundamental rights is brought about through the urgent decision itself or where the decision does not depend on any further clarification as to facts or other than constitutional law and the preconditions are present whereby pursuant to s. 90.2 sentence 2 of the federal Constitutional Court Act the requirement for exhaustion of legal remedies may be disregarded (see BVerfGE 79, 275 [279]).

These prerequisites are present here. Insofar as the complainants assert infringement of Article 19.4 of the Basic Law through the refusal of provisional legal protection, they are making a fundamental rights complaint affecting the urgent proceedings specifically. As regards the other (substantive) fundamental rights complaint, no further clarification as to facts or other than constitutional law is required. In particular, the specialized courts have dealt comprehensively with the relevant legal questions in the decisions challenged. No further return is to be expected from the main proceedings. Nor can the complainants reasonably be expected, in view of the advance of time and the continuation of schooling, to be remitted to the conclusion of the main proceedings.

For the admissibility of the constitutional complaint it is irrelevant whether the child complainants are still attending elementary school (see BVerfGE 41, 29 [43]).

C.

The constitutional complaint is justified.

Insofar as the Higher Administrative Court denied a ground for an order, its decision infringes Article 19.4 of the Basic Law (I.). The denial of a claim to an order is incompatible with Article 4.1 and Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (II.).

I.

1. Art. 19.4 of the Basic Law opens up recourse to the law against any alleged infringement of subjective rights by an action of the public power. Not just the formal right to invoke the courts but also the effectiveness of the legal protection are guaranteed (cf. BVerfGE 35, 263 [274]); 35, 382 [401 seq.], with further references). Effective legal protection means also legal protection within an appropriate time. It follows that judicial legal protection, particularly in urgent proceedings, must as far as possible avert the creation of accomplished facts that can no longer be reversed if a measure proves unlawful on (final) judicial review (cf. BVerfGE 37, 150 [153]; 65, 1 [70]). There follow requirements on the courts as to the interpretation and application of the various statutory provisions on urgent legal protection (cf. BVerfGE 49, 220 [226]; 77, 275 [284]). Thus, the specialized courts are bound when, say, interpreting and applying s. 123 VwGO to grant provisional legal protection where the petitioner would otherwise be threatened with considerable infringement of rights, going beyond marginal areas, that could no longer be removed by the decision in the main case, unless, exceptionally, preponderant, particularly weighty grounds oppose this (cf. BVerfGE 79, 69 [74 seq.]).

2. These requirements are not met by the Higher Administrative Court's order. It denies the requisite ground of order for issuing the temporary order desired, and therefore the urgency of the matter, because the complainants had for years hesitated to invoke the courts and during that period put up with at least the affixing of crosses instead of the originally present crucifixes. It had been their aim to continue searching with the school administration for a transitional solution in this sense acceptable to them.

With this justification the Higher Administrative Court does justice neither to the actual course of events nor to the importance of the complainants' concern. In fact the complainants had since their eldest child went to school brought their demand before all levels of the school administration - from local up to ministerial. The fact that they originally hoped for an extra-judicial agreement and that time thereby elapsed ought not to count to their disadvantage; such conduct directed initially at avoiding conflict is rather that of a reasonable party. Further, the complainants had agreed to a compromise which however was called in question by the school administration repeatedly when the children changed classroom or school. A definitive concession in this sense has not been made by the school administration.

For this reason, the Higher Administrative Court's view that the complainants ought to have continued to strive for compromise also fails to do justice to the obligation to guarantee effective legal protection. It would rather have been a matter for the court to sound out whether the school administration was prepared to make a temporary order superfluous by giving an assurance along the lines of the compromise solution.

In answering the question whether grounds for an order were present, the Higher Administrative Court further failed to take adequate account of the fact that the matter was one of a provisional arrangement in the context of current school attendance, that is, of a life situation where the mere advance of time towards conclusion of school (complainant 3 is now sixteen years old) makes judicial legal protection particularly urgent. Legal disputes in school matters particularly are often decided only at the level of provisional legal protection, because the claim can often no longer, because of elapsed time, be asserted in the main proceedings. The specialized courts ought not to duck the need for effective legal protection by overstraining the requirements as to the existence of grounds for an order.

II.

The decisions challenged further infringe the fundamental rights of complainants (1) and (2) under Article 4.1 in conjunction with Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, and the fundamental rights of complainants (3) - (5) under Article 4.1 of the Basic Law. They are based on s. 13.1 sentence 3 VSO, which is itself incompatible with the Basic Law and is null and void.

1. Article 4.1 of the Basic Law protects freedom of religion. The decision for or against a faith is according to it a matter for the individual, not the State. The State may neither prescribe nor forbid a faith or religion. Freedom of religion does not however mean just the freedom to have a faith, but also the freedom to live and act in accordance with one's own religious convictions (cf. BVerfGE 32, 98 [106]). In particular, freedom of religion guarantees participation in acts of worship a faith prescribes or is expressed in. This implies, conversely, the freedom to stay away from acts of worship of a faith not shared. This freedom relates similarly to the symbols in which a faith or religion presents itself. Art. 4(1) Basic Law leaves it to the individual to decide what religious symbols to acknowledge and venerate and what to reject. Certainly, in a society that allows room for differing religious convictions, the individual has no right to be spared from others manifestations of faith, acts of worship or religious symbols. This is however to be distinguished from a situation created by the State where the individual is exposed without possibility of escape to the influence of a particular faith, to the acts through which it is manifested and to the symbols in which it is presented. Accordingly, Article 4.1 of the Basic Law develops its effect of guaranteeing freedom in the very areas of life that are not left to society's spontaneous organization but taken in hand by the State (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]). Article 140 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 136.4 of the Weimar Constitution (WRV) takes account of this by explicitly prohibiting compelling anyone to take part in religious practices.

Article 4.1 of the Basic Law does not however confine itself to barring the State from intervening in the religious convictions, actions and presentations of individuals or of religious communities. Instead, it further imposes the duty on it to guarantee room for them to operate in which the personality can develop in the philosophical and religious area (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]), and to protect them against attacks or obstruction by adherents of other religious tendencies or competing religious groups. Article 4.1 of the Basic Law, however, does not confer on the individual or on religious communities any entitlement in principle to give expression to their religious conviction with State support. On the contrary, the freedom of religion of Article 4.1 of the Basic Law implies the principle of State neutrality towards the various religions and confessions. The State, in which adherents of different or even opposing religious and philosophical convictions live together, can guarantee peaceful coexistence only if it itself maintains neutrality in questions of belief. It may thus not itself endanger religious peace in a society. This precept finds its basis not only in Article 4.1 of the Basic Law, but also in Article 3.3, Article 33.1 and Article 140 of the Basic Law, in conjunction with Article 136.1 and 4 and Article 137.1 WRV. These bar the introduction of legal forms of establishment of religion and forbid the privileging of particular confessions or the exclusion of those of other beliefs (cf. BVerfGE 19, 206 [216]; 24, 236 [246]; 33, 23 [28]; consistent case law). Numerical strength or social importance does not come into it (cf. BVerfGE 32, 98 [106]). The State must instead ensure treatment of the various religious and philosophical communities on an equal footing (cf. BVerfGE 19, 1 [8]; 19, 206 [216]; 24, 236 [246]). Even where it cooperates with them or promotes them, this may not lead to identification with particular religious communities (cf. BVerfGE 30, 415 [422]).

Taken together with Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, which guarantees parents the care and upbringing of their children as a natural right, Article 4.1 of the Basic Law also covers the right to bring up children in religious and philosophical respects. It is a matter for the parents to convey to their children those convictions in matters of belief and philosophy of life that they find right (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [44, 47 seq.]). This implies the right to keep the children away from religious convictions that seem to the parents wrong or harmful.

2. This fundamental right is infringed by s. 13.1 sentence 3 VSO, and by the decisions challenged, which are based on this provision.

a) S. 13.1 sentence 3 VSO prescribes the affixing of crosses in all classrooms of the Bavarian elementary schools. The term cross, according to the interpretation by the courts in the initial case, covers crosses with and without a body. In reviewing the norm, accordingly, both meanings are to be included. It is true that in their application for provisional legal protection the complainants have according to the wording asked only for the removal of crucifixes. The Higher Administrative Court has however explicitly assumed that this may also mean crosses without a body, and rejected the application in this farther reaching meaning, too.

Taken together with universal compulsory schooling, crosses in schoolrooms mean that pupils are, during teaching, under State auspices and with no possibility of escape, confronted with this symbol and compelled to learn "under the cross". This distinguishes the affixing of crosses in classrooms from the frequent confrontation with religious symbols of the most varied religious tendencies arising in everyday life. Firstly, the latter does not proceed from the State but is a consequence of the spread of various religious convictions or religious communities in society. Secondly, it does not have the same degree of inescapability. Certainly, the individual cannot control encounters in the street, in public transport or when entering buildings with religious symbols or manifestations. As a rule, however, these are fleeting encounters, but even in the case of longer confrontation this is not based on a compulsion enforceable where necessary through sanctions.

In duration and intensity, the effect of crosses in classrooms is still greater than that of crosses in courtrooms. Yet the Federal Constitutional Court saw the compulsion to engage in legal proceedings under the cross, against one's own religious or philosophical convictions, as infringement of the religious freedom of a Jewish party to proceedings who saw that as identification of the State with the Christian faith (cf. BVerfGE 35, 366 [375]).

Nor is the inescapability of the encounter with the cross in schoolrooms removed by the setting up of private schools allowed by Article 7.4 of the Basic Law. First, the setting up of private elementary schools is tied in Article 7.5 of the Basic Law to particularly strict conditions. Secondly, since these schools are as a rule financed by fees paid by parents, a large part of the population lacks the possibility of recourse to them. Such is also the complainants' case.

b) The cross is a symbol of a particular religious conviction and not merely an expression of the Western culture marked partly by Christianity.

Undoubtedly, through the centuries numerous Christian traditions have been incorporated in the general cultural foundations of society, and even opponents of Christianity and critics of its historical heritage cannot elude them. These must however be distinguished from the specific content of beliefs of the Christian religion, and still more from a particular confession including its ritual presentation and symbolic portrayal. The State's professing of these contents of belief, to which third parties too are exposed in contacts with the State, affects religious freedom. The Federal Constitutional Court took that as a basis in the decision on the constitutionality of the non-denominational schools of Christian character traditional in Baden, when it found that the admissible affirmation of Christianity related primarily to acknowledgment of the major cultural and educational factor it constituted in Western history, but not to the Christian religion's truths of faith. Only with such a limitation can this affirmation be legitimated, in relation to non-Christians too, through the continued operation of historical facts (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [52]).

The cross continues to be one of the specific faith symbols of Christianity. It is, indeed, its symbol of faith as such. It symbolizes the salvation of man from original sin brought about through Christ's sacrificial death, but at the same time also Christ's victory over Satan and death and his lordship over the world: suffering and triumph simultaneously (see the entry "Kreuz" in: Höfer/Rahner [eds.], Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 2nd ed. 1961, vol. 6, col. 605 et seq.; Fahlbusch et al. [eds.], Evangelisches Kirchenlexikon, 3rd ed. 1989, vol. 2 col. 1462 et seq.). For the believing Christian it is accordingly in many ways an object of reverence and of piety. The equipping of a building or a room with a cross is still today understood as an enhanced profession of the Christian faith by the owner. For the non-Christian or the atheist, just because of the importance that Christianity attaches to it and that it has had in history, the cross becomes a symbolic expression of particular religious convictions and a symbol of their missionary dissemination. It would be a profanation of the cross running counter to the self-perception of Christianity and the Christian churches to regard it, as the decisions challenged do, as a mere expression of Western tradition or cult token without a specific reference to faith. That the cross has a religious reference is also clear from the context of s. 13.1 VSO.

c) Nor can the cross be denied effect on pupils, as the decisions challenged do.

It is certainly true that the affixation of the cross in classrooms is not associated with compulsion to identification or with particular manifestations of reverence or modes of behaviour. It equally does not follow from it that specialized teaching in the profane subjects is marked by the cross or oriented to the Christian faith and the requirements as to conduct symbolized by it. But this does not exhaust the possibilities of the effect of the cross. School education is not just for learning basic cultural techniques and developing cognitive capacities. It is also intended to bring the pupils emotional and affective dispositions to development. Schooling is oriented towards encouraging their personality development comprehensively, and particularly also to influencing their social conduct. It is in this context that the cross in the classroom takes on its importance. It has appellant character and identifies the contents of belief it symbolizes as exemplary and worthy of being followed. This takes place, moreover, in relation to persons who because of their youth are not yet fixed in their views, still have to learn critical capacity and the formation of viewpoints of one's own, and are on that account particularly easily susceptible to mental influencing (cf. BVerfGE 52, 223 [249]).

The decisions challenged too do not completely disavow the appellant character of the cross. They do deny its specifically Christian significance in relation to other-minded pupils. For the Christian pupils, however, they see in it an essential expression of their religious convictions. Similarly, the Bavarian Minister-President opines that in general teaching the cross has only non-specific symbolic value, whereas at school prayers and in religious instruction it turns into a specific symbol of faith.

3. The basic right to religious freedom is guaranteed without reservation. This does not however mean that it might not be subject to some sort of restrictions. These would, however, have to follow from the constitution itself. The setting up of limits not already laid out in the constitution is not something the legislature can do. Constitutional grounds that might have justified intervention are not however present here.

a) No such justification follows from Article 7.1 of the Basic Law.

Article 7.1 of the Basic Law certainly gives the State an educational mandate (cf. BVerfGE 34, 165 [181]). It has not only to organize schooling and itself set up schools, but may also establish the goals of education and the course of training. In that, it is independent of parents (cf. BVerfGE 34, 165 [182]; 47, 46 [71 seq.]). Accordingly, not only can schooling and family upbringing come into conflict. It is, rather, even inevitable that at school the differing religious and philosophical convictions of pupils and their parents confront each other particularly intensively.

This conflict among various bearers of a fundamental right guaranteed without reservation, and between that fundamental right and other constitutionally protected objects, is to be resolved on the principle of practical concordancy, which requires that no one of the conflicting legal positions be preferred and maximally asserted, but all given as protective as possible an arrangement (cf. BVerfGE 28, 243 [260 seq.]; 41, 29 [50]; 52, 223 [247, 251]).

This sort of arrangement does not require the State totally to abandon religious or philosophical references in carrying out the educational mandate bestowed by Article 7.1 of the Basic Law. Even a State that comprehensively guarantees religious freedom and thereby commits itself to religious and philosophical neutrality cannot divest itself of the culturally conveyed, historically rooted values, convictions and attitudes on which the cohesion of society is based and the carrying out of its own tasks also depends. The Christian faith and the Christian churches have in this connection, however one may today wish to assess their heritage, been of overwhelmingly decisive force. The traditions of thought, mental experiences and patterns of conduct deriving from them cannot be a matter of indifference for the State. This is particularly true for schools, where the cultural foundations of society are principally handed down and renewed. Moreover, a State that obliges parents to send their children to State schools may give consideration to the religious freedom of those parents who desire a religiously cast upbringing. The Basic Law has recognized this by allowing in Article 7.5 for State denominational or philosophically based schools, providing for religious instruction as an ordinary subject of teaching (Article 7.3 of the Basic Law) and over and above that allowing room for the active exercise of religious conviction (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]; 52, 223 [240 seq.]).

To be sure, it is impossible in a pluralistic society to take full account of all educational conceptions in designing the public elementary schools. In particular, the negative and positive sides of religious freedom cannot be realized without problems in one and the same State institution. It follows that the individual cannot in the school context appeal unrestrictedly to Article 4.1 of the Basic Law.

Resolving the unavoidable tension between negative and positive religious freedom while taking account of the precept of tolerance is a matter for the Land legislature, which must through the public decision-making process seek a compromise acceptable to all. In its arrangements it may take as a guide the fact that on the one hand Article 7 of the Basic Law allows religious and philosophical influences in the area of schooling, and on the other Article 4 of the Basic Law commands the exclusion as far as at all possible of religious and philosophical compulsions when opting for a particular form of school. Both provisions have to be seen together and reconciled with each other through interpretation, since it is only concordance of the objects of legal protection under both articles that can do justice to the decision contained in the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [50 seq.]).

The Federal Constitutional Court has drawn the conclusion that the Land legislature is not utterly barred from introducing Christian references in designing the public elementary schools, even if those with parental power who cannot avoid these schools in their children's education may not desire any religious upbringing. There is a requirement, however, that this be associated with only the indispensable minimum of elements of compulsion. That means in particular that the school cannot treat its task in the religious and philosophical area in missionary fashion, nor claim any binding validity for contents of Christian beliefs. The affirmation of Christianity accordingly relates to acknowledgement of a decisive cultural and educational factor, not to particular truths of faith. But Christianity as a cultural factor includes the idea of tolerance for the other-minded. Their confrontation with a Christianity-marked image of the world will not involve discriminatory denigration of non-Christian philosophies of life, at least as long as the object is not the conveying of beliefs but the endeavour to realise autonomous personality in the religious and philosophical sphere, in accordance with the basic decisions of Article 4 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [51 seq.]; 41, 65 [85 seq.]). The Federal Constitutional Court has accordingly pronounced the provision for Christian non-denominational schools in Article 135 sentence 2 of the Bavarian Constitution compatible with the Basic Law only when given an interpretation conforming with the constitution (cf. BVerfGE 41, 65 [66 and 79 et seq.]), and has stressed in relation to the non-denominational school of Christian character in the traditional sense in Baden that this is not a bi-denominational school (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [62]).

The affixing of crosses in classrooms goes beyond the boundary thereby drawn to the religious and philosophical orientation of schools. As already established, the cross cannot be divested of its specific reference to the beliefs of Christianity and reduced to a general token of the Western cultural tradition. It symbolizes the essential core of the conviction of the Christian faith, which has undoubtedly shaped the Western world in particular in many ways, but is certainly not shared by all members of society, and is indeed rejected by many in the exercise of their fundamental right under Article 4.1 of the Basic Law. Its affixation in State elementary schools is accordingly incompatible with Article 4.1 of the Basic Law insofar as these are not Christian non-denominational schools.

b) The affixation of the cross cannot be justified from the positive religious freedom of parents and pupils of the Christian faith either. Positive religious freedom is due to all parents and pupils equally, not just the Christian ones. The conflict arising cannot be resolved according to the majority principle, for the fundamental right to religious freedom specifically is aimed in a special degree at protecting minorities. Moreover, Article 4.1 of the Basic Law does not confer on the bearers of the fundamental right an unrestricted entitlement to activate their religious convictions in the context of State institutions. Insofar as the school, in harmony with the constitution, allows room for this, as with religious instruction, school prayers and other religious manifestations, these must be marked by the principle of being voluntary and allow the other-minded acceptable, non-discriminatory possibilities of avoiding them. With affixation of crosses in classrooms, the presence and demands of which the other-minded cannot escape, this is not the case. Finally, it would not be compatible with the principle of practical concordancy for the feelings of the other-minded to be completely suppressed in order that pupils of the Christian faith might be able, over and above religious instruction and voluntary devotions, to learn the profane subjects too under the symbol of their faith.

D.

Accordingly, the provision of s. 13.1 sentence 1 VSO that underlies the dispute is incompatible with the fundamental rights mentioned and is to be pronounced null and void. The decisions in the proceedings for provisional protection of rights challenged are to be set aside. Since the proceedings in the main case are now pending before the Bavarian Higher Administrative Court, the case is referred back to it (s. 95.2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act - BVerfGG). The order for the reimbursement of costs is on the basis of s. 34a.2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act.

Dissenting opinion of Judges Seidl, Söllner and Haas:

The Panel majority view that s. 13.1 sentence 3 of the School Regulations for Elementary Schools in Bavaria, according to which a cross is to be affixed in every classroom, infringes the Basic Law is not shared by us. The court's decisions challenged in the constitutional complaint do not infringe the complainant's fundamental rights under Article 4.1 and Article 4.1 in conjunction with Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

I.

1. According to Article 7.1 of the Basic Law, the whole school system is under the supervision of the State. The setting up and operation of elementary schools is, as follows from Article 7.5 of the Basic Law which associates the licensing of private elementary schools with particularly stringent requirements, in principle a matter for the State itself. To this extent, the State has an educational mandate of its own and therefore also the authority to lay down educational objectives (cf. BVerfGE 52, 223 [236]).

The Basic Law, however, allots educational law exclusively to the sovereign sphere of the Länder. Education law does not appear in the catalogue of competences in Art. 73 et seq. Basic Law. The Federal Government accordingly has - by contrast with the constitutional order of the Weimar Republic, which in the area of schooling assigned to the Reich the right of legislation in principle, by Article 10.2 of the Weimar Constitution (WRV) - no legislative authority (Article 70 seq. of the Basic Law) or administrative sovereignty (Article 30 of the Basic Law) for this area. The genesis of Article 7 of the Basic Law shows that far-reaching autonomy for the Länder as regards the philosophical and religious character of State schools was intended. Here the federalist principle prevailed. Proposals aimed at farther-reaching parental rights ("confessional parental right") and a secured position for confessional schools in the Basic Law were already rejected in the preliminary discussions on Article 7 of the Basic Law. It was repeatedly stressed that the Länder were not to be restricted in their power to regulate educational policy questions (cf. in detail BVerfGE 6, 309 [356] with further references; also BVerfGE 41, 29 [45]).

2. Constitutional assessment of the questions raised in the constitutional complaint must accordingly start from the circumstances existing in the Free State of Bavaria, and may not take conditions that may apply in other Länder of the Federal Republic as the starting point.

The Constitution of the Free State of Bavaria of 2 December 1946 (BV) contains, in its section on education and schools, the following provision on the educational objectives to be pursued in all schools: Article 131

(2) The foremost objectives of education are reverence for God, respect for religious conviction and for the dignity of man, self-control, sense of responsibility and willingness to accept responsibility, helpfulness, openness to everything true, good and beautiful, and an awareness of responsibility for nature and the environment.

While the educational objective "awareness of responsibility for nature and the environment" was added only with the Fifth Act amending the Constitution of the Free State of Bavaria of 20 June 1984 (GVBl p. 223), the other educational objectives have remained unaltered since the Bavarian State Constitution came into force.

For elementary schools, Article 135 of the Constitution of the Free State of Bavaria originally provided for denominational or nondenominational schools, with a preference for the denominational school. With developments in school policy (on which see BVerfGE 41, 65 [79 seq.]), this constitutional provision was amended by referendum, through the Act amending Article 135 of the Constitution of the Free State of Bavaria of 22 July 1968 (GVBl p. 238). It has since read as follows:

Article 135

The public elementary schools shall be joint schools for all children of elementary-school age. In them pupils shall be taught and brought up in accordance with the principles of the Christian confessions. Details shall be specified by the Elementary Schools Act.

In Article 135 sentence 2 of the Bavarian Constitution in its current version Christianity is not to be understood in a confessional sense. The principles of the Christian confessions within the meaning of this provision instead comprise the values common to the Christian confessions and the ethical norms derived from them (cf. BVerfGE 41, 65 [84]). These are values and norms which, decisively marked by Christianity, have largely become the common property of the Western cultural area. Applying these principles, pupils are to be guided towards the educational objectives described in Article 131.2 BV. An educational objective marked by specifically Christian beliefs is not, by contrast, embodied in the Bavarian constitution (cf. BVerfG, loc. cit. p. 84 seq.). The affirmation of Christianity relates not to the content of belief but to recognition of the decisive cultural and educational factor, and is therefore justified in relation to non-Christians too, by the history of the Western cultural area (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [64]).

In accordance with these considerations, there are no constitutional objections to the school type of the Christian non-denominational school based on Article 135 sentence 2 BV (cf. BVerfGE 41, 65 [79 et seq.]).

3. It is, pursuant to Article 7.1 and 5 of the Basic Law, incumbent on the federal Länder as the bodies responsible for the elementary school system to enact the requisite provisions on the organization of elementary schools. The various Länder legislators have broad discretion here. The provision of s. 13.1 sentence 3 of the School Regulations for Elementary Schools in Bavaria, according to which a cross is to be affixed in every classroom, does not exceed the limits of this discretion. Since the State legislature may in constitutionally unobjectionable fashion introduce the school type of the Christian non-denominational school, it cannot be barred from symbolizing the value conceptions characterizing those schools by the cross in classrooms.

a) The provision of s. 13.1 sentence 3 of the School Regulations is a part of the organizational design of the Christian non-denominational school. The cross in the classroom brings the supra-denominational Christian, Western values and ethical standards to be conveyed by this form of school symbolically before the eyes of teachers and pupils. In enacting this provision the State legislature was entitled to take account of the fact that the majority of the citizens living on its territory belong to a Christian church (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [50 seq., 60]). It could further take it that the affixation of a cross in the classroom would, because of its symbolic nature for the supra-confessional Christian, Western values and ethical standards, also be welcomed or at least respected by a large proportion of the persons not in a church. This notion is supported not least by the fact that the provisions of the Bavarian Constitution on the Christian non-denominational school received the assent of the majority of the population (cf. BVerfGE 41, 65 [67]).

b) The State, which through compulsory schooling is deeply involved in the upbringing of children by the parental household, is largely dependent on acceptance by parents of the school system it organizes. It is therefore not barred from upholding as far as possible the concurrence of school and parental household in views as to values

(cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [60]; 41, 65 [87]). Affixing crosses in classrooms may also contribute to this; it is moreover in line with a long tradition in Bavaria that met with resistance only in the period of National Socialism.

4. Affixing crosses in classrooms does not infringe the State's duty of philosophical and religious neutrality. Within the validity of the Basic Law, the precept of philosophical and religious neutrality ought not to be understood as an obligation on the State to indifference or secularism. The reference to the church articles of the Weimar Constitution in Article 140 of the Basic Law has given the neutrality precept the sense of cooperation by the State with churches and religious communities, also including their promotion by the State.

In the decisions on the constitutional admissibility of Christian non-denominational schools, the Federal Constitutional Court stated in connection with the precept of neutrality that the school, insofar as it may influence children's decisions as to belief and conscience, may contain only the minimum of elements of compulsion. It may, further, not be a missionary school nor claim any binding valildity for Christian beliefs; it must also be open to other philosophical and religious contents and values (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [51]; 41, 65 [78]).

The provision of s. 13.1 sentence 3 of the Bavarian School Regulations for Elementary Schools, found unconstitutional by the Panel majority, meets all these requirements. The mere presence of a cross in the classroom does not compel the pupils to particular modes of conduct nor make the school into a missionary organization. Nor does the cross change the nature of the Christian non-denominational school; instead it is, as a symbol common to the Christian confessions, particularly suitable for acting as a symbol for the constitutionally admissible educational content of that form of school. The affixation of a cross in a classroom does not exclude consideration for other philosophical and religious contents and values in education. The form of teaching is, additionally, subject to the precept of Article 136.1 BV, according to which, at all schools, the religious feelings of others are to be respected.

II.

By contrast with the Panel majority view, the complainants' religious freedom (Article 4.1 of the Basic Law and Article 4.1 in conjunction with Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law) is not infringed by the presence of crosses in classrooms.

1. Through compulsory schooling and the taking of responsibility itself for elementary schooling, the State has taken an area of life decisive for the upbringing of young people fully under its care. This has the consequence that there must be room here for the exercise of liberties. These may certainly be restricted in the light of the legitimate purpose of the institution - here the school - but not suspended. The public school, which the State has brought under its organizational and largely also substantive design, is an area of life in which State action and civil freedom intersect. In such an area the State may also, by making available visible value symbols in line with widespread practice in the Federal State concerned, create an organizational framework in which at the same time the religious convictions present among a large part of the pupils and their parents can develop (cf. Higher Administrative Court for the State of North Rhine Westphalia, NVwZ 1994, p. 597). By contrast, the equipping of courtrooms with crosses, which may infringe the fundamental right under Article 4.1 of the Basic Law of a party to proceedings (cf. BVerfGE 35, 366), falls within the area of original sovereign functions of the State and is therefore subject to different constitutional constraints from the affixation of crosses in the classrooms of State schools (cf. in detail Böckenförde, Zeitschrift für evangelisches Kirchenrecht Vol. 20 [1975], p. 119 [127 seq., 134]).

The religious freedom of Article 4.1 of the Basic Law is, something not at all brought into view by the Panel majority, still further enhanced and emphasized by the guarantee of undisturbed exercise of religion in Article 4.2 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 [245 f]). Article 4.1 and 2 of the Basic Law jointly guarantee the individual room for active practice of religious conviction. If, accordingly, a voluntary, supra-denominational school prayer is in principle constitutionally unobjectionable (cf. BVerfGE 52, 223), this is equally true of the cross in the classroom. The State is thereby giving positive religious freedom room in an area which it has taken entirely under its protection and in which religious and philosophical positions were always relevant (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]; 52, 223 [241]).

2. The religious freedom of the complainants is not infringed thereby.

   a) The complainants do not appeal to the freedom of exercise of religion under Article 4.2 of the Basic Law. Nor do they assert any infringement of their positive religious freedom that follows from Article 4.1 of the Basic Law, but object only to infringement of their negative religious freedom, similarly protected by Article 4.1 of the Basic Law. For they do not ask for affixation in the classroom of a symbol of their own philosophy of life alongside or in place of the cross, but only for the removal of crucifixes, which they regard as symbols they do not wish to tolerate of a religious conviction they do not share. In the order of 5 November 1991 (BVerfGE 85, 94) in which the complainants' application for issue of a temporary order was rejected, the Panel put the constitutional question as follows, more accurately than now in deciding the main case: "whether and in what circumstances the use of religious symbols in a school affects negative religious freedom and how far it is to be put up with by the minority because they have to take account of the majority's positive religious freedom" (BVerfG, loc. cit. p. 96).

   Admittedly, this is not a problem of the relation between majority and minority, but one of how in the area of State compulsory schools the positive and negative religious freedom of pupils and their parents can in general be brought into harmony. Resolving this tension, unavoidable in the area of schooling, between negative and positive religious freedom is a matter for the democratic State legislature, which must in the public decision-making process seek a compromise acceptable to all, taking account of the various views (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [50]; 52, 223 [247]). Here negative religious freedom is not some superior fundamental right that displaces the positive expressions of religious freedom where they come together. The right of religious freedom is not a right to prevent religion. The necessary adjustment between the two manifestations of religious freedom must be brought about through tolerance (cf. Schlaich, in Kirche und Staat in der neueren Entwicklung, 1980, p. 427 [439]; Starck, in: v. Mangoldt/ Klein, Das Bonner Grundgesetz, Article 4.1 Rdnr. 17, with further references).

b) These principles have been done justice to by the Bavarian State legislature in enacting s. 13.1 sentence 3 of the Elementary School Regulations. The requisite balancing of interests with those of non-believers and people with different beliefs shows no breach of the constitution.

aa) In assessing and evaluating these interests, one cannot as the Panel majority does take as a general basis the Christian theological view of the importance and meaning of the cross symbol. The decisive thing is rather what effect the sight of the cross develops with individual pupils, in particular what feelings the sight of the cross may induce in the other-minded (on this cf. also BVerfGE 35, 366 [375 seq.]). It may be that in a pupil of Christian faith the sight of the cross in the classroom may in part awaken those notions described by the Panel majority as the meaning of the cross (grounds, C II 2 b). For the non-believing pupil, by contrast, this cannot be assumed. From his viewpoint the cross in the classroom cannot have the meaning of a symbol for Christian beliefs, but only that of a symbol for the objectives set for the Christian nondenominational school, namely the conveying of the values of Christianity-marked Western culture, and alongside that, a symbol of a religious conviction he does not share, rejects and perhaps combats.

bb) In view of this meaning that the cross in the classroom has for non-Christian pupils, they and their parents have to put up with the presence of crosses. They are so obliged by the precept of tolerance. Unacceptable burdens on them do not arise thereby.

The psychic impairment and mental burden that non-Christian pupils have to endure from the enforced perception of the cross in class is of only relatively slight weight. The minimum of elements of compulsion which in this respect is to be accepted by pupils and their parents (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [51]) is not exceeded. The pupils are not obliged to particular modes of conduct or religious exercises before the cross. They are accordingly - by contrast with school prayer (cf. BVerfGE 52, 223 [245 et seq.]) - not forced to display their differing philosophical or religious conviction by non-participation. The danger of their being discriminated against accordingly does not exist from the outset.

Nor are the pupils constitutionally inadmissibly influenced in missionary fashion by the cross in the classroom (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [51]). Direct influence on the content of teaching or educational objectives in the sense of propaganda for Christian beliefs does not proceed from the cross in the classroom. Moreover, the particular conditions in Bavaria must be taken as a starting point. Pupils are there confronted, even outside the narrower church sphere, with the sight of crosses in many other areas of life. As examples, mention will be made only of the roadside crosses frequently to be met with in Bavaria, the many crosses in secular buildings (such as hospitals and old-age homes, but also hotels and restaurants), and finally also the crosses present in private dwellings. In such circumstances the cross in the classroom too remains within the framework of the ordinary; no missionary character attaches to it.

III.

Accordingly, the Bavarian State legislature has with the affixation of crosses in the classrooms of elementary schools admissibly made use of the discretion due it in the organization of elementary schooling, without exceeding the limits to its margin of discretion. The administrative court decisions challenged do not in this respect meet with any constitutional objections.

Dissenting opinion of Judge Haas

I further share neither the Panel majority's justification for the admissibility of the constitutional complaint nor its arguments on the ground for the order.

1. Insofar as doubt may exist as to the admissibility of the constitutional complaint because perhaps in the interim the complainant s cause of complaint has lapsed, say because of a change of school by complainants (3) - (5) or removal of the remaining crucifixes in the schoolrooms - which was all the complainants' petition referred to in the urgent proceedings for the protection of rights - that need not be gone into. The admissibility of the constitutional complaint cannot however here be affirmed on the same grounds as for lapse of the cause of complaint in the main proceedings (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [43]). For the assumption of a continued interest in a finding does not take adequate account of the special features of the procedure of the temporary protection of rights, the importance of which is not exhausted in the settlement of a merely temporary situation. However, this question need not, in the light of the legal view presented here that the constitutional complaint is unjustified, be further gone into.

2. The decision of the Bavarian Higher Administrative Court challenged is constitutionally unobjectionable also insofar as the existence of grounds for an order is denied; in particular, Article 19.4 of the Basic Law is not infringed. The Administrative Courts grant provisional protection of rights inter alia in accordance with s. 123 VwGO. Article 19.4 of the Basic Law calls for the granting of temporary protection of rights in proceedings concerning the carrying out of an act too, at any rate where otherwise severe, unacceptable and not otherwise avoidable detriment would arise which the decision in the main case would not longer be capable of subsequently removing (cf. BVerfGE 46, 166 [179]; 51, 268 [284]).

That was also the starting point for the Bavarian Higher Administrative Court. In testing the presence of the requirements for grounds for an order the Court rightly, taking account of the constitutional precept for the granting of effective legal protection, starts from whether unacceptable and irreparable detriment would arise for the complainants were a temporary order not issued.

In the context of testing this detriment it - constitutionally unobjectionably - tested the urgency and importance of the claim. It accordingly seems more than doubtful whether the Court's considerations on the advance of time, summarized in a single sentence, can be taken in isolation and assessed to the effect that the Court denied the urgency of the complainants' concern. Instead, the arguments as to the duration of the situation complained of must be seen and understood in their overall context. As part of the assessment of detriment by the Court, however, the duration of the situation has specifically also the significance of indicating the severity of the detriment. The Court's consideration that tolerating a particular situation for a period of some five years may have an influence on the assessment of a detriment as acceptable is constitutionally unobjectionable. It is at any rate not unreasonable to assess the question of the acceptability of the detriment to those concerned by how the position took shape for them in the past and how they handled it. That the detriment arising for the complainants from the sight of a crucifix had become unacceptable only with the course of time cannot be derived from the statements of the Higher Administrative Court, which were not challenged by the complainants. Nor have the complainants brought forward anything to show that any such presentation was left out of account by the Higher Administrative Court. Moreover, the Court evaluated still other aspects legally in the context of assessing detriment. It considered that complainants 1) and 2) would if the desired provisional order were not made still have enough freedom for upbringing in accordance with parental responsibility, and that the sight of a crucifix in the schoolrooms would be only a comparatively slight burden on complainants 3) -5), since they were exposed to the sight elsewhere too. Where the Bavarian Higher Administrative Court accordingly arrived at the conviction that unacceptable, irreparable detriment does not arise for the complainants if a temporary arrangement is not made, there can be no constitutional objection to this. This assessment by the Bavarian Higher Administrative Court was, moreover, manifestly shared by the adjudicating Panel, in itself declining to issue the temporary order applied for by the complainants, because it could not be established in weighing the consequences that the detriment arising to the complainants was predominant (cf. BVerfGE 85, 94 [96 f]). The adjudicating Panel had to take account in this connection of the fact that the situation complained of by the constitutional complainants would have to be put up with by them for several more years, in view of the number of years that constitutional complaint proceedings take.

In view of its assessment of the detriment as of minor gravity, the Higher Administrative Court did not need either to test further whether the issuing of a temporary order might have been necessary because the complainants could not otherwise have been protected against the unacceptable, irreparable detriment arising for them (cf. BVerfGE 46, 166 [179 f]). The Court's assumption that against the background of the administration s willingness to compromise, extra-judicial compromise solutions like the existing ones would be reachable in the future too is constitutionally unobjectionable.

Nor did the principle of guaranteeing effective protection of rights require the Court to "sound out" possibilities of an interim solution by amicable settlement, in order to make a temporary order "superfluous". It is already doubtful whether the essence of the principle of guaranteeing effective protection of rights is met by a line of conduct aimed at making a decision made by the Court superfluous. However, in ordinary law alone there is no need to carry out mediation negotiations in proceedings for temporary protection of rights, because it is within the Court's discretion what arrangement to make in detail in the context of the legal protection applied for (frequent case law and literature; see references in Kopp, VwGO, 1994, s. 123 no. 17), where the requirements for issuing a temporary order are met. If however, as here, the requirements for issuing a temporary order are in the court's view not present, so that the matter is ripe for decision and the application is to be rejected, then it cannot, at any rate from the viewpoint of guaranteeing effective protection of rights, be required through traditional mediation negotiations to seek agreement by the parties, with an outcome that would not have been attainable through the remedy sought.

3. The Headscarf and the Constitutional Court (Headscarf Ban I and II)

Explanatory Annotation

The Islamic headscarf has been an issue in several high-profile court decisions in several jurisdictions.[47] The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has had to decide several cases concerning Islamic dress beginning with its decision in a Turkish case in which it held that the prohibition to wear the headscarf in Turkish Universities does not violate the freedom of religion guarantee of the European Convention (Article 9 ECHR).[48]

The underlying issue in all these constellations is the question to what degree Islamic dress in general, or the Islamic headscarf in particular, is - only - a symbol and expression of religious belief and/or to what degree such dress is also a means to oppress and subordinate women. Whereas the former is generally unproblematic and raises issues only in the context of schools or other state institutions where the issue of religious - or even political - symbols has been the subject of many decisions. The latter is utterly unacceptable and raises the question of whether and how the state might even be obligated to step in to protect the equality of women and combat the rise of parallel societies where half of the population are treated as second class citizens. The problem is that the distinction is so difficult and perhaps even impossible. One could certainly not dispute that many Muslim women wear such dress completely voluntarily and as a proud expression of their faith. At the same time, it is also obvious that there is a strong element of discrimination against women and the expression of the "mobile prison" for more extreme versions of such dress amply illustrates the problem. To find fair and just solutions that respect religious feelings and beliefs and foster a climate of equality and non-discrimination is indeed a difficult task.

The difficulty of the issue also comes to the fore in the two decisions of the Constitutional Court concerning the headscarf issue reproduced below. In the first case,[49] the issue was a German citizen and Muslima of Afghan heritage who had sought a teaching position in the German public service but was refused because she had expressed her unwillingness to refrain from wearing the Islamic headscarf when exercising her duties in the public schools. This, it was argued, violated the obligatory neutrality of state schools in religious matters, especially in the light of the political meaning of the headscarf as a political symbol of "cultural disintegration".

The ECtHR often follows the states in their restrictions of dress. However, in a recent decision the ECtHR held it to be incompatible with the religious freedom guarantee in Article 9 ECHR to demand from a woman to take off her hijab in order to attend a judicial hearing, ECtHR, Appl. No. 3413/09, 18.12.2018, Lachiri v. Belgium, http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-186245 (last accessed 3.9.2019).

The Constitutional Court, while deciding in favor of the applicant, in fact, handed the problem back to the legislature of Baden-Württemberg, the Land where the case had unfolded, and, by implication, to all state legislatures as the power to regulate school matter lies with the Länder and not the federal government. The Court held that the decision not to employ the applicant because of her refusal to discard the headscarf did not have a sufficient basis in statutory law. This requirement goes back to the principal constitutional requirement that all "significant" limitations of rights require a statutory legal foundation and limitations without such foundation are per se unjustified. The Court held that the prohibition of wearing the headscarf while teaching in a public school is such a "significant" limitation and hence requires statutory regulation.

However, the Court did not address the question of whether a statutory prohibition of wearing the Islamic headscarf in such circumstances would be constitutional or not. This notwithstanding, there is little in this decision to imply that it might not be. In a sense this decision could be counted as an example of judicial restraint or a cautionary approach to an issue, where the wisdom of the Court is not any greater than the wisdom of the legislature if that legislature attempts to reach a balanced decision by taking all sides of the issue and all rights concerned into account in an appropriate fashion.

In a strong dissenting opinion, three justices of the Court criticized the majority for considering the ban to be a "significant" violation of the applicant's religious freedom rights. In their view, the demand to abstain from the headscarf while on duty in school was only a modification of employment duties in an employment situation the applicant had chosen to pursue under her own free will. This raises another difficult question: To what extent can contractual relations, limit freedoms, here the religious freedom? Or, to formulate differently, to what extend can a person implicitly (or expressly) consent to such limitations by entering into a contract?

The second decision reached in 2015[50] dealt with legislation in the Land North-Rhine-Westphalia which contained a more or less blanket prohibition of any religious, political, or ideological displays (dress, symbols, etc.) at school that could be regarded as breaching the school's neutrality. In what can only be described as an ironic twist of reality, that same legislation also contained a sweeping counter-exception for "Christian and occidental educational and cultural values or traditions."[51]

50 BVerfG, 27.1.2015, 1 BvR 471/10, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20150127_1bvr047110en.html (last accessed on 4.9.2019).

51 Id. at para. 78.

The applicants challenged court decisions based on that legislation which upheld labor law consequences suffered by two Muslima for wearing a headscarf, respectively a woollen hat in its place. The Constitutional Court held that the legislation in question must be restrictively interpreted in such a way that it cannot be just assumed that wearing such dress will impinge on the school's neutrality. Rather some concrete evidence must be produced that there exists a "sufficiently specific risk of danger to or impairment of the peace at school or the neutrality of the state."[52] The Court, rather unsurprisingly, also found a violation of the prohibition of discrimination on religious grounds in the counter-exception contained in the legislation. One cannot help but wonder how and why legislators would pass such problematic legislation. This counter-exception had "unconstitutional' written all over it.

There was some discussion as to the compatibility of the two decisions. Some interpreted the first decision (by the second senate of the Constitutional Court) as giving the state legislators a free hand in either allowing such dress or banning it. Under such a reading the second decision (by the first Senate of the Constitutional Court) could be seen to deviate from that judgment by now imposing restrictions in the form of a necessity for a concrete risk to the school peace or neutrality of the school. Under § 16 of the Act on the Federal Constitutional Court,[53] such a deviation would necessitate a decision by the Plenary of the Constitutional Court. However, it is questionable whether the demand for a restrictive interpretation of the legislation can be regarded as a deviation from a judgment that requires that such legislation be passed as a legal basis for regulating religious dress.[54] The Constitutional Court itself saw no reason for a plenary decision.

Headnotes:

1. There is no sufficiently definite statutory basis in the current law of the Land (state) Baden-Württemberg for a prohibition on teachers wearing a headscarf at school and in lessons.

2. Social change, which is associated with increasing religious plurality, may be the occasion for the legislature to redefine the admissible degree of religious references permitted at school.

Facts:

The complainant was born in Kabul, Afghanistan in 1972; since 1987 she has lived without interruption in the Federal Republic of Germany, and in 1995 she acquired German nationality. She is of the Muslim religion. After passing the First State Examination and doing teaching practice, in 1998 the complainant passed the Second State Examination for the teaching profession at the primary school and the non-selective secondary school, with the main emphasis on the secondary school and the subjects German, English and social studies/economics.

The Stuttgart Higher School Authority refused the complainant's application to be appointed to the teaching profession at the English primary school and the non-selective secondary school in the Land Baden-Württemberg on the grounds of lack of personal aptitude. By way of a reason, it was stated that the complainant was not prepared to give up wearing a headscarf during lessons. The headscarf, it was stated, was an expression of cultural separation and thus not only a religious symbol, but also a political symbol. The objective effect of cultural disintegration associated with the headscarf, it was said, was not compatible with the requirement of state neutrality. The administrative courts confirmed the authority's decision.

B.

The constitutional complaint is admissible and is well-founded. The decisions challenged violate Article 33.2 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law and with Article 33.3 of the Basic Law. In the context to be assessed here, wearing a headscarf makes it clear that the complainant belongs to the Islamic religion and identifies herself as a Muslim. Defining such conduct as a lack of aptitude for the office of a teacher at the primary school and non-selective secondary school encroaches upon the complainant's right to equal access to every public office under Article 33.2 of the Basic Law in conjunction with the fundamental right of freedom of faith guaranteed to her by Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law, without the necessary, sufficiently definite statutory basis for this being satisfied at present. In this way, the complainant has in a constitutionally unacceptable manner been denied access to a public office.

I.

Constitutional review in connection with a constitutional complaint concerning a judgment is normally restricted to examining whether the decisions challenged, in their interpretation and application of law below the constitutional level, are based on a fundamentally erroneous view of the meaning and scope of the fundamental right relied on or are arbitrary (on this, cf. Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts, BVerfGE 18, 85 [93]; established case law). However, to the extent that the court whose decision is challenged by the constitutional complaint directly interpreted and applied provisions of fundamental rights itself, the Federal Constitutional Court has a duty to determine the scope and limits of the fundamental rights and to establish whether fundamental rights were taken into account without any error of constitutional law with regard to their extent and weight. This is the situation in the present case. The Federal Administrative Court and also the lower courts based their decisions on a particular interpretation of Article 33.2 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. In accordance with its duty of preserving, developing and extending constitutional law and in particular interpreting the various functions of a legal provision containing a fundamental right (cf. BVerfGE 6, 55 [72]; 7, 377 [410]), the Federal Constitutional Court in this regard, in its relation to the nonconstitutional courts, is not restricted to examining whether the non-constitutional courts applied constitutional law in a non-arbitrary manner, but must itself take final and unappealable decisions on the interpretation and application of constitutional law.

II.

1. Article 33.2 of the Basic Law grants every German, in accordance with his or her aptitude, qualifications and professional achievement, equal access to every public office.

The right in Article 33.2 of the Basic Law, which is equivalent to a fundamental right, guarantees the degree of free choice of one's occupation or profession (Article 12.1 of the Basic Law) that is possible in view of the number of positions in the civil service, which is, and is permitted to be, restricted by the public corporation responsible in each case (cf. BVerfGE 7, 377 [397, 398]); 39, 334 [369]). Article 33.2 of the Basic Law grants no right to be appointed to a public office (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [354]); Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts, BVerwGE 68, 109 [110]). The access to activity in a public office (admission to an occupation, which also relates to free choice of occupation) may in particular not be restricted by subjective requirements for admission (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [370]). This is done in accordance with s. 7 of the Civil Service Law Framework Act (Beamtenrechtsrahmengesetz - BRRG) of 31 March 1999 (Federal Law Gazette, Bundesgesetzblatt, BGBl, I p. 654) in the Civil Service Acts of the Länder by provisions on the personal requirements necessary for those appointed to the status of civil servants. S. 11.1 of the Baden-Württemberg Land Civil Service Act as amended on 19 March 1996 (Baden-Württemberg Law Gazette, Gesetzblatt, GBl, p. 286) which applies in the present case, provides that appointments are to be made on the basis of aptitude, qualifications and professional achievement, without taking into account gender, descent, race, belief, religious or political convictions, origin or connections.

b) When laying down aptitude criteria for the relevant office and when defining official duties by reference to which the aptitude of applicants for the civil service is to be assessed, the legislature in general has a broad legislative discretion. Limits to this legislative discretion follow from the value decisions in other constitutional norms; the fundamental rights in particular impose limits on the legislature's legislative discretion. Even for those with the status of civil servants, the fundamental rights apply, although the civil servant's sphere of responsibilities under Article 33.5 of the Basic Law restricts the civil servant's legal possibility of relying on fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [366, 367]): Limits may be imposed on the civil servant's exercise of fundamental rights in office; these limits follow from general standards imposed on the civil service or from particular requirements of the public office in question (cf. e.g. BVerwGE 56, 227 [228, 229]). However, if even access to a public office is refused by reason of future conduct on the part of the applicant that is protected as a fundamental right, then the assumption that there is a lack of aptitude for this reason must in turn be justifiable with regard to the fundamental right affected.

c) The evaluation by the employer of an applicant's aptitude for the public office applied for relates to the applicant's future occupation in office and at the same time contains a prediction, which requires a concrete assessment of the applicant's whole personality based on the individual case (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [353]; 92, 140 [155]). This also includes a statement with regard to the future as to whether the person in question will fulfil the duties under civil-service law that he or she is subject to in the office applied for. In this assessment with regard to the future, the employer has a wide scope of discretion; the review by the non-constitutional courts is essentially restricted to determining whether the employer proceeded on the basis of incorrect facts, misjudged the civil service law and constitutional law context, disregarded generally valid standards of value or took irrelevant matters into consideration (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [354]); BVerwGE 61, 176 [186]; 68, 109 [110]; 86, 244 [246]). The employer's prediction as to an applicant's aptitude for a particular office must be based on the civil servant's duties (ss. 35 et seq. of the Civil Service Law Framework Act; ss. 70 et seq. of the Baden-Württemberg Land Civil Service Act). Official duties that the applicant is expected to carry out must be sufficiently specified in law and must respect the limits imposed by the applicant's fundamental rights.

2. If a duty is imposed on the civil servant that, at school and in lessons, teachers may not outwardly show their affiliation to a religious group by observing dress rules with a religious basis, this duty encroaches upon the individual freedom of faith guaranteed by Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. It confronts those affected with the choice either to exercise the public office they are applying for or obeying the religious requirements as to dress, which they regard as binding.

Article 4.1 of the Basic Law guarantees freedom of faith, conscience and religious and ideological belief; Article 4.2 guarantees the right of undisturbed practice of religion. The two subsections of Article 4 of the Basic Law contain a uniform fundamental right which is to be understood comprehensively (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 [245, 246]; 32, 98 [106]; 44, 37 [49]; 83, 341 [354]). It extends not only to the inner freedom to believe or not to believe, but also to the outer freedom to express and disseminate the belief (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 [245]). This includes the individual's right to orientate his or her whole conduct to the teachings of his or her faith and to act in accordance with his or her inner religious convictions. This relates not only to imperative religious doctrines, but also to religious convictions according to which a way of behaviour is the correct one to deal with a situation in life (cf. BVerfGE 32, 98 [106, 107]; 33, 23 [28]; 41, 29 [49]).

The freedom of faith guaranteed in Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law is guaranteed unconditionally. Restrictions must therefore be contained in the constitution itself. This includes the fundamental rights of third parties and community values of constitutional status (cf. BVerfGE 28, 243 [260, 261]; 41, 29 [50. 51]; 41, 88 [107]; 44, 37 [49, 50, 53]; 52, 223 [247]; 93, 1 [21]). Moreover, restricting the freedom of faith, which is unconditionally guaranteed, requires a sufficiently definite statutory basis (cf. BVerfGE 83, 130 [142]).

3. Article 33.3 of the Basic Law is also affected. It provides that admission to public offices is independent of religious belief (sentence 1); no one may suffer a disadvantage by reason of belonging or not belonging to a faith or to an ideology (sentence 2). Consequently, a connection between admission to public offices and religious belief is out of the question. Article 33.3 of the Basic Law is directed in the first instance against unequal treatment directly linked to the profession of a particular religion. In addition, the provision at all events also prohibits refusing admission to public offices for reasons that are incompatible with the freedom of faith protected by Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 79, 69 [75]). This does not exclude creating official duties that encroach upon the freedom of faith of office-holders and applicants for official offices, and that thus make it harder or impossible for religious applicants to enter the civil service, but it does subject these to the strict requirements of justification that apply to restrictions of freedom of faith, which is guaranteed unconditionally; in addition, the requirements of strictly equal treatment of the various religions must be observed, both in creating and in the practice of enforcing such official duties.

4. a) The wearing of a headscarf by the complainant at school as well as outside school is protected by the freedom of faith, which is guaranteed in Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. According to the findings of fact made by the non-constitutional courts and not disputed in the proceedings relating to the constitutional complaint, the complainant regards the wearing of a headscarf as bindingly imposed on her by the rules of her religion; observing this dress rule is, for her, the expression of her religious belief. The answer to the controversial question as to whether and how far covering the head is prescribed for women by rules of the Islamic faith is not relevant. It is true that not every form of conduct of a person can be regarded as an expression of freedom of faith, which enjoys special protection, purely according to its subjective intention; instead, when conduct by an individual that has been claimed to be an expression of the individual's freedom of faith is assessed, that his or her particular religious group's concept of itself may not be overlooked (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 [247, 248]). A duty of women to wear a headscarf in public may, by its content and appearance, as a rule of faith founded in the Islamic religion, be attributed with sufficient plausibility to the area protected by Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law (on this, see also BVerfGE 83, 341 [353]); this was done by the non-constitutional courts in a manner that cannot be constitutionally objected to.

b) The assumption that the complainant lacks the necessary aptitude to fulfil the duties of a teacher at the primary school und non-selective secondary school, because, contrary to an existing official duty, she wanted to wear a headscarf at school and in lessons, and this headscarf showed clearly that she was a member of the Islamic religious group, and the refusal to admit her to a public office, which was based on this, would be compatible with Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law if the intended exercise of freedom of faith conflicted with objects of legal protection of constitutional status and this restriction of the free exercise of religion could be based on a sufficiently definite statutory foundation. Interests that are protected by the constitution that conflict with freedom of faith here may be the state's duty to provide education (Article 7.1 of the Basic Law), which is to be carried out having regard to the duty of ideological and religious neutrality, the parents' right of education (Article 6.2 of the Basic Law) and the negative freedom of faith of school children (Article 4.1 of the Basic Law).

aa) In Article 4.1, Article 3.3 sentence 1 and Article 33.3 of the Basic Law, and in Article 136.1, Article 136.4 and Article 137.1 of the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Reichsver-fassung) in conjunction with Article 140 of the Basic Law, the Basic Law lays down for the state as the home of all citizens the duty of religious and ideological neutrality. It bars the introduction of legal structures in the nature of a state church and forbids giving privileged treatment to particular faiths and excluding those of a different belief (cf. BVerfGE 19, 206 [216]; 24, 236 [246]; 33, 23 [28]; 93, 1 [17]). The state must be careful to treat the various religious and ideological communities with regard to the principle of equality (cf. BVerfGE 19, 1 [8]; 19, 206 [216]; 24, 236 [246]; 93, 1 [17]) and may not identify with a particular religious community (cf. BVerfGE 30, 415 [422]; 93, 1 [17]). The free state of the Basic Law is characterised by openness towards the variety of ideological and religious convictions and bases this on an image of humanity that is marked by the dignity of humans and the free development of personality in self-determination and personal responsibility (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [50]).

However, the religious and ideological neutrality required of the state is not to be understood as a distancing attitude in the sense of a strict separation of state and church, but as an open and comprehensive one, encouraging freedom of faith equally for all beliefs. Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law also contain a positive requirement to safeguard the space for active exercise of religious conviction and the realisation of autonomous personality in the area of ideology and religion (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]; 93, 1 [16]). The state is prohibited only from exercising deliberate influence in the service of a particular political or ideological tendency or expressly or impliedly identifying itself by way of measures originated by it or attributable to it with a particular belief or a particular ideology and in this way itself endangering religious peace in a society (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 [16, 17]) The principle of religious and ideological neutrality also bars the state from evaluating the faith and doctrine of a religious group as such (cf. BVerfGE 33, 23 [29]).

Until now, the understanding of the relationship between state and religion, as it is reflected in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, this applies above all to the area of the compulsory school, for which the state has taken responsibility, and for which, by its nature, religious and ideological ideas have always been relevant (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]; 52, 223 [241]). In this view, Christian references are not absolutely forbidden in the organisation of state schools; however, school must also be open to other ideological and religious content and values (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [51]; 52, 223 [236, 237]). In this openness, the free state of the Basic Law preserves its religious and ideological neutrality (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [50]). For the tensions that are unavoidable when children of different ideological and religious beliefs are taught together, it is necessary, giving consideration to the requirement of tolerance as the expression of human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law) to seek a balance (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [63]; 52, 223 [247, 251]; 93, 1 [21 seq.]; for more detail, see dd) below).

bb) Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law guarantees to parents the care and education of their children as a natural right, and together with Article 4.1 of the Basic Law it also includes the right to educate children in religious and ideological respects; it is therefore above all the responsibility of the parents to convey to their children the convictions in religious and ideological matters that they regard as right (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [44, 47, 48]; 52, 223 [236]; 93, 1 [17]). Corresponding to this is the right to keep the children away from religious convictions that appear to the parents to be wrong or harmful (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 [17]). However, Article 6.2 of the Basic law does not contain an exclusive right of education for the parents. Separately and in its sphere given equal rights beside the parents, the state, to which under Article 7.1 of the Basic Law the supervision of all education is delegated, exercises its own duty to provide education (cf. BVerfGE 34, 165 [183]; 41, 29 [44]). How this duty is to be carried out in detail, and in particular to what extent religious references are to have their place at school, is subject within the limits laid down by the Basic Law, above all in Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law, to the freedom of organisation of the Länder (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [44, 47, 48]; 52, 223 [242, 243]; for details, see dd) below).

cc) Finally the freedom to exercise religious conviction relied on by the complainant conflicts with the negative freedom of faith of the pupils in her wearing of a headscarf at school and in lessons. Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law, which protects equally the negative and the position manifestations of freedom of faith, also guarantees the freedom to stay away from cultic acts of a religion that is not shared; this also applies to cults and symbols in which a belief or a religion represents itself. Article 4 of the Basic Law leaves it to the individual to decide what religious symbols he or she recognises and reveres and which he or she rejects. Admittedly, in a society that affords space to differing religious convictions, he or she has no right to be spared cultic acts, religious symbols and professions of other faiths. But this must be distinguished from a situation created by the state in which the individual is exposed without an alternative to the influence of a particular faith, to the actions in which this manifests itself and the symbols through which it presents itself (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 [15, 16]). In this respect, Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law have the effect of securing freedom precisely in areas of life that are not left to be organised by society itself but that the state has taken responsibility for (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [49]); this is affirmed by Article 140 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 136.4 of the Weimar Constitution, which prohibits forcing anyone to take part in religious exercises.

dd) The Basic Law gives the Länder a broad freedom of organisation in education; in relation to the ideological and religious character of state schools too, Article 7 of the Basic Law takes account of the fact that the Länder are to a large extent independent and within the limits of their sovereignty in education matters may in principle organise compulsory schools freely (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [44, 45]; 52, 223 [242, 243]). The relationship between the positive freedom of faith of a teacher on the one hand and the state's duty of religious and ideological neutrality, the parents' right of education and the negative freedom of faith of the pupils on the other hand, taking into account the requirement of tolerance, is inevitably sometimes strained, and it is the duty of the democratic Land legislature to resolve this tension; in the public process of developing an informed opinion, the legislature must seek a compromise that is reasonably acceptable to everyone. When legislating, the legislature must orientate itself to the fact that on the one hand Article 7 of the Basic Law permits ideological and religious influences in the area of education, provided the parents' right of education is preserved, and on the other hand Article 4 of the Basic Law requires that ideological and religious constraints are excluded as far as at all possible when the decision is made in favour of a particular form of school. The provisions must be seen together, and their interpretation and their area of influence must be coordinated with each other. This includes the possibility that the individual Länder may make different provisions, because the middle course that needs to be found may also take into account school traditions, the composition of the population by religion, and whether it is more or less strongly rooted in religion (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [50, 51]; 93, 1 [22, 23]).

These principles also apply to the answer to the question as to the extent to which teachers may be subjected to duties as to their appearance and conduct at school, restricting their individual fundamental right of freedom of faith, in connection with the preservation of the ideological and religious neutrality of the state.

5. If teachers introduce religious or ideological references at school, this may adversely affect the state's duty to provide education, which is to be carried out in neutrality, the parents' right of education and the negative freedom of faith of the pupils. It at least opens up the possibility of influence on the pupils and of conflicts with parents that may lead to a disturbance of the peace of the school and may endanger the carrying out of the school's duty to provide education. The dress of teachers that is religiously motivated and that is to be interpreted as the profession of a religious conviction may also have these effects. But these are only abstract dangers. If even such mere possibilities of endangerment or of a conflict as a result of the appearance of the teacher, rather than concrete behaviour that presents itself as the attempt to influence or even proselytise the school children for whom the teacher is responsible, are to be seen as an infringement of duties under civil service law or as a lack of aptitude which prevents appointment as a civil servant, then, because this entails the restriction of the unconditionally granted fundamental right under Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law, it requires a sufficiently specific statutory basis permitting it. This is lacking in the present case.

a) In considering the question of whether a specific form of dress or other outward sign has a religious or ideological significance in the nature of a symbol, attention must be paid to the effect of the means of expression used and to all possibilities of interpretation that are possible. Unlike the Christian cross (on this, see BVerfGE 93, 1 [19, 20]), the headscarf is not in itself a religious symbol. Only in connection with the person who wears it and with the conduct of that person in other respects can it have such an effect. The headscarf worn by Muslim women is perceived as a reference to greatly differing statements and moral concepts:

> As well as showing the desire to observe dress rules that are felt to be binding and have a religious basis, it can also be interpreted as a symbol for upholding traditions of the society of the wearer's origin. In the most recent times, it is seen increasingly as a political symbol of Islamic fundamentalism that expresses the separation from values of western society, such as individual self-determination and in particular the emancipation of women. However, according to the findings of fact in the non-constitutional courts, which were also confirmed in the oral hearing, this is not the message that the complainant wishes to convey by wearing the headscarf.
> The expert witness Dr. Karakasoglu, who was heard in the oral hearing, carried out a survey of about 25 Muslim students at colleges of education, twelve of whom wore a headscarf, and on the basis of this survey she showed that the headscarf is also worn by young women in order to preserve their own identity and at the same time to show consideration for the traditions of their parents in a diaspora situation; in addition, another reason for wearing the headscarf that had been named was the desire to obtain more independent protection by signalling that they were not sexually available and integrating themselves into society in a self-determined way. Admittedly, the wearing of the headscarf was intended to document in public the value one placed on religious orientation in one's own life, but it was understood as the expression of an individual decision and did not conflict with a modern lifestyle. As understood by the women questioned, preserving their difference is a precondition for their integration. It is not possible to make any statements that are representative of all Muslim women living in Germany on the basis of the interviews conducted and evaluated by the expert witness, but the results of the research show that in view of the variety of motive, the interpretation of the headscarf may not be reduced to a symbol of the social repression of women. Rather, the headscarf can for young Muslim women also be a freely chosen means to conduct a self-determined life without breaking with their culture of origin. Against this background, there is no evidence that the complainant, merely because she wears a headscarf, might for example make it more difficult for Muslim girls who are her pupils to develop an image of woman that corresponds to the values of the Basic Law or to put it into effect in their own lives.

> To assess whether the intention of a teacher to wear a headscarf at school and in lessons constitutes a lack of aptitude, the decisive question is what effect a headscarf can have on someone who sees it (the objective standpoint of the onlooker); therefore all conceivable possibilities as to how the wearing of a headscarf might be regarded, must be taken into account in the assessment. However, this has no effect on the fact that the complainant, who plausibly stated that she had religiously motivated reasons for her decision always to wear a headscarf in public, can rely for this conduct on the protection of Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law, which is closely related to the paramount constitutional value of human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law; cf. BVerfGE 52, 223 [247]).

b) With regard to the effect of religious means of expression, it is necessary to distinguish whether the symbol in question is used at the instigation of the school authority or on the basis of one single teacher's personal decision; such a teacher may rely on the individual right of freedom in Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. If the state tolerates teachers wearing dress at school that they wear by reason of a personal decision and that can be interpreted as religious, this cannot be treated in the same way as a state order to attach religious symbols at school (on this, cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 [18]). The state that accepts the religious statement of an individual teacher associated with wearing a headscarf does not in so doing make this statement its own and is not obliged to have this statement attributed to it as intended by it. The effect of a headscarf worn by the teacher for religious reasons may, however, become particularly intense because the pupils are confronted with the teacher, who is the focal point of lessons, for the whole time when they are at school without a possibility of escape. On the other hand, the teacher may differentiate when explaining to the pupils the religious statement made by a garment, and in this way she may weaken its effect.

c) There is no confirmed empirical foundation for the assumption that the complainant would commit an infringement of her official duty because of the feared controlling influence of her headscarf on the religious orientation of the school children.

   In the oral hearing, the expert witness Professor Dr. Bliesener was heard on this point; he stated that from the point of view of developmental psychology there is at present no confirmed knowledge that proves that children are influenced solely because every day they meet a teacher who wears a headscarf at school and in lessons. Only if there were also conflicts between parents and teacher that might arise in connection with the teacher's headscarf were onerous effects to be expected, in particular on younger pupils. The two other expert witnesses heard by the Senate, Ms Leinenbach, Director of the Psychology Department, and Professor Dr. Riedesser, presented no information that contradicted this. Such an unconfirmed state of knowledge is not sufficient as the basis of an official application of the indeterminate legal concept of aptitude, which encroaches substantially upon the complainant's fundamental right under Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law.

d) At all events, there was not a sufficiently definite statutory basis for rejecting the complainant for lack of aptitude as a result of her refusal to remove the headscarf at school and in lessons.

The school authority and the non-constitutional courts present the view that the complainant's intention to wear a headscarf as a teacher constitutes a lack of aptitude because pre-emptive action should be taken against possible influence on the pupils, and conflicts, which cannot be ruled out, between teachers and pupils or their parents should be avoided in advance; at present this view does not justify encroaching upon the complainant's right under Article 33.2 of the Basic Law, which is equivalent to a fundamental right, nor the accompanying restriction of her freedom of faith. No tangible evidence could be seen in the proceedings before the nonconstitutional courts that the complainant's appearance when wearing a headscarf created a concrete endangerment of the peace at school. The fear that conflicts might arise with parents who object to their children being taught by a teacher wearing a headscarf cannot be substantiated by experience of the complainant's previous teaching as a trainee. The current civil service and school legislation in the Land Baden-Württemberg is not adequate to permit a prohibition on teachers wearing a headscarf at school and in lessons on the grounds of abstract endangerment. The mere fact that conflicts cannot be ruled out in future does not, in the absence of a legal basis designed for this purpose, justify deriving from the general civil service law requirement of aptitude an official duty on the part of the complainant to give up exercising her religious conviction by wearing a headscarf.

Under civil service law, in view of the state's duty of religious and ideological neutrality at school described above under B. II 4. b) aa), neither the concept of aptitude contained in s. 11.1 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act nor the duties for civil servants laid down in ss. 70 et seq. of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act, which are to be taken into consideration as orientation in assessing the aptitude of an applicant for a public office, can serve as the basis for a duty of teachers not to permit their affiliation to a particular religion or ideology to be outwardly discernible, in order in this way to pre-emptively counter potential dangers.

Under s. 70.1 sentence 1 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act, the civil servant serves all the people, and under s. 70.1 sentence 2 the civil servant must fulfil his or her duties impartially and fairly, and must take account of the welfare of the public in carrying out his or her duties. Under s. 70.2 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act, the civil servant must acknowledge the free democratic fundamental order of the Basic Law and stand up for its preservation in all his or her conduct. It is not apparent that the complainant would be prevented from doing this by wearing a headscarf. Nor does the requirement of moderation in s. 72 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act, which provides that a civil servant who is involved in politics shall observe the moderation and restraint that follow from his or her position vis-à-vis the whole of society and from the consideration for the duties of his or her office, cover the case of wearing a headscarf for religious reasons. The same applies to the duty of civil servants to devote themselves with full dedication to their office (s. 73.1 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act), to exercise their office unselfishly to the best of their belief (s. 73.2 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act) and to base their conduct both on duty and off duty on doing justice to the respect and the confidence demanded by their profession (s. 73.3 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act). A prohibition preventing teachers at a state primary school and non-selective secondary school from wearing a headscarf for religious reasons and that restricts fundamental rights cannot be derived from these general duties under civil-service law. Finally, s. 94 of the Baden-Württemberg Civil Service Act contains no regulations on a particular form of working dress for teachers.

Nor do the provisions in Articles 11 to 22 of the Constitution of the Land Baden-Württemberg of 11 November 1953 (Baden-Württemberg Law Gazette p. 173) on education and teaching and the Baden-Württemberg Education Act (Schulgesetz für Baden-Württemberg - SchG) as amended on 1 August 1983 (Baden-Württemberg Law Gazette p. 397), in particular ss. 1 and 38 thereof, contain any provision under which the general civil service law duties of moderation and restraint for teachers could be interpreted in concrete terms to mean that they were not permitted at school to wear any dress or other symbols that show that they belong to a particular religious group. At present, therefore, the necessary sufficiently definite statutory basis does not exist to decide that teachers of the Islamic faith, by reason of their declared intention to wear a headscarf at school, lack aptitude for service at the primary school and non-selective secondary school and thus to restrict their fundamental right under Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law.

6. However, the Land legislature responsible is at liberty to create the statutory basis that until now has been lacking, for example by newly laying down the permissible degree of religious references in schools within the limits of the constitutional requirements. In doing this, the legislature must take into reasonable account the freedom of faith of the teachers and of the pupils affected, the parents' right of education and the state's duty of ideological and religious neutrality.

a) The Federal Administrative Court, in the judgment challenged, emphasised inter alia that with growing cultural and religious variety, where an increasing proportion of schoolchildren were uncommitted to any religious denomination, the requirement of neutrality was becoming more and more important, and it should not, for example, be relaxed on the basis that the cultural, ethnic and religious variety in Germany now characterised life at school too. In the oral hearing, the representative of the Stuttgart Higher Education Authority, Professor Dr. F. Kirchhof, argued that the state's duty of ideological and religious neutrality in schools must now be treated more strictly, in view of the changed circumstances.

Social change, which is associated with increasing religious plurality, may be the occasion for redefining the admissible degree of religious references permitted at school. A provision to this effect in the Education Acts may then give rise to concrete definitions of teachers' general duties under civil service law, including duties with regard to their appearance, to the extent that the latter shows their affiliation to particular religious convictions or ideologies. It is therefore conceivable that there could also be statutory restrictions of the freedom of faith, in compliance with the constitutional requirements. If it is apparent from the outset that an applicant will not comply with such rules of conduct, this can be stated to the applicant as a lack of aptitude.

A provision prohibiting teachers from continuously showing their membership in a particular religious group or belief by external signs is part of the law determining the relationship between state and religion in schools. The religious diversity in society, which has evolved gradually, is reflected here particularly clearly. School is the place where differing religious views inevitably collide and where this juxtaposition has particularly great effects. Tolerant coexistence with people of other beliefs could be practised here with most lasting effect through education. This need not mean denying one's own convictions; instead, it would give a chance for insight and to strengthen one's own point of view, and for mutual tolerance that does not see itself as reducing all beliefs to the same level (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [64]). Reasons could therefore be given for accepting the increasing variety of religions at school and using it as a means for practising mutual tolerance and in this way making a contribution to the attempt to achieve integration. On the other hand, the development described above is also associated with a greater potential for possible conflicts at school. There may therefore also be good reasons to accord the state duty of neutrality in schools a stricter importance that is more distanced than it has been previously, and thus, as a matter of principle, to keep religious references conveyed by a teacher's outward appearance away from the pupils in order to avoid conflicts with pupils, parents or other teachers.

b) It is not the duty of the executive to decide how to react to the changed circumstances, and in particular what rules of conduct with regard to dress and other aspects of behaviour towards schoolchildren should be imposed on teachers to define more specifically their general obligations under civil service law and to preserve religious peace at school, and what requirements therefore are part of aptitude for a teaching post. Rather, it is necessary for the democratically legitimated Land Legislature to make provisions in this respect. Only the legislature has a prerogative of evaluation to assess the actual developments; it depends on this assessment whether conflicting fundamental rights of pupils and parents or other values of constitutional status justify legislation that imposes on teachers of all religions extreme restraint in the use of symbols with religious reference; authorities and courts cannot exercise this prerogative of evaluation themselves (cf. BVerfGE 50, 290 [332, 333]; 99, 367 [389, 390]). The assumption that a prohibition of wearing headscarves in state schools may be a permissible restriction of freedom of faith as an element of a legislative decision about the relation between state and religion in the education system is also in harmony with Article 9 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (cf. European Court of Human Rights, decision of 15 February 2001, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2001, pp. 2871et seq.).

aa) The constitutional necessity of legislation follows from the principle of the requirement of parliamentary approval. The principle of a constitutional state and the requirement of democracy oblige the legislature to pass the provisions essential for the realisation of fundamental rights itself (cf. BVerfGE 49, 89 [126]; 61, 260 [275]; 83, 130 [142]). How far the legislature must itself determine the guidelines necessary for the area of life in question depends on its relation to fundamental rights. The legislature does have such an obligation if conflicting fundamental civil rights collide with each other and the limits of each are fluid and can be determined only with difficulty. This applies above all if the fundamental rights affected, like positive and negative freedom of faith in the present case and the parents' right of education are, by the wording of the constitution, guaranteed without a constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute and a provision intended to organise this area of life is necessarily obliged to determine and specify their limits inherent in the Basic Law. Here, the legislature has a duty at all events to determine the limits of the conflicting guarantees of freedom at least to the extent that such a determination is essential to the exercise of these civil rights and liberties (cf. BVerfGE 83, 130 [142]).

When it is necessary for parliament to pass legislation can be decided only in view of the subject area and the nature of the object of constitutional definition involved. The constitutional criteria of evaluation here are to be derived from the fundamental principles of the Basic Law, in particular the fundamental rights guaranteed there (cf. BVerfGE 98, 218 [251]). Admittedly, the mere fact that a provision is politically controversial does not mean that it would have to be seen as essential (cf. BVerfGE 98, 218 [251]). Under the constitution, however, the restriction of fundamental freedoms and the balancing of conflicting fundamental rights are reserved to parliament, in order to ensure that decisions with such repercussions result from a procedure that gives the public the opportunity to develop and express its opinions, and that requires parliament to clarify the necessity and extent of encroachments upon fundamental rights in public debate (cf. BVerfGE 85, 386 [403, 404]).

In the education system in particular, the requirements of a constitutional state and the principle of democracy of the Basic Law oblige the legislature to make the essential decisions itself and not to leave them to the school board (cf. BVerfGE 40, 237 [249]; 58, 257 [268, 269]). This also applies, and applies in particular, if and to the extent that, in reaction to changed social circumstances and increasing ideological and religious variety at school it is intended to respond with a stricter restraining of all religious references and thus to newly define the state's duty of neutrality within the boundaries laid down by the constitution. Such a division is of considerable significance for the realisation of fundamental rights in the relationship between teachers, parents and children, and also the state.

bb) A provision that one of the duties of a teacher is to refrain in class from wearing a headscarf or any other indications of religious conviction is a material (wesentlich) provision in the meaning of the case law on the requirement of parliamentary approval. It encroaches substantially upon the freedom of faith of the person affected. It also affects people belonging to various religions with varying intensity, depending on whether they regard the observance of particular dress customs as part of the exercise of their religion or not. As a result, it has special effects of exclusion for particular groups. Because of this relation to groups, the creation of such an official duty for teachers is of material significance, over and above its significance for the exercise of the individual fundamental right, for the function of social organisation inherent in the freedom of faith.

Finally, the introduction of an official duty that prohibits teachers from allowing their outward appearance to show their religion must be expressly laid down by statute, for one reason because such an official duty can only be justified and enforced in a constitutional manner - inter alia compatible with Article 33.3 of the Basic Law - if members of different religious groups are treated equally by it. This is not guaranteed to the same extent if it is left to authorities and courts to decide from case to case whether such an official duty exists and what its scope is, depending on their predictions as to the potential for influence and conflict of identifying characteristics of religious affiliation in the appearance of the teacher in question.

III.

As long as there is no statutory basis that indicates specifically enough that teachers at the primary school and non-selective secondary school have an official duty to refrain from identifying characteristics of their religious affiliation at school and in lessons, then on the basis of prevailing law it is incompatible with Article 33.2 in conjunction with Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law and Article 33.3 of the Basic Law to assume that the complainant lacks aptitude. The decisions challenged by the constitutional complaint therefore infringe the legal position of the complainant guaranteed in these provisions. The judgment of the Federal Administrative Court is overturned and the matter is referred back to the Federal Administrative Court (s. 95.2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act, Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG). It is to be expected that the proceedings can be concluded there on the basis of s. 11.1 of the Baden-Württemberg Land Civil Service Act, which under s. 127 number 2 of the Civil Service Law Framework Act admits an appeal on a point of law; in these proceedings, the decisive concept of aptitude must be interpreted and applied in accordance with the provisions - amended if applicable - of the law of school education of the Land.

Extracts from the Dissenting Opinion of the judges Jentsch, Di Fabio and Mellinghoff

The majority of the Senate assumes that particular official duties of a civil servant, if they are connected to the civil servant's freedom of religion or ideology, may be created only by a law passed by parliament. Until now, this view has been stated neither in case law nor literature, nor by the complainant herself. If this point of view is adopted, not only does the fundamental constitutional question submitted to the court as to the state's neutrality in the school's sphere of training and education remain undecided; the view also results in an erroneous weighting, not based on the Basic Law, in the system of the separation of powers and in the understanding of the normative power of fundamental rights in connection with access to public offices. The decision disregards the expressly stated intention of the Baden-Württemberg Land parliament that it would not pass a formal statute by reason of the complainant's case; in addition, it leaves the parliament uncertain as to how a constitutional provision can be made. Finally, the majority of the Senate gives the Land legislature no possibility of preparing itself for the new situation under constitutional law that the Senate assumes will exist, and neglects to inform the judiciary and the administration how they are to proceed until a Land statute is passed.

I.

In order to justify the constitutional requirement that a statute must be specifically enacted, the majority of the Senate wrongly assumes that there was a serious encroachment upon the complainant's freedom of religion and ideology. In this they fail to appreciate the functional restriction, with regard to civil servants, of the protection of fundamental rights. In the case of access to a public office, there is no open situation where legal interests of equal value are weighed up; the legal relationship that is essential to the realisation of fundamental rights at school is shaped in the first instance by the protection of the fundamental rights of pupils and parents.

1. Those who become civil servants place themselves by a free act of will on the side of the state. A civil servant can therefore not rely on the effect of the fundamental rights to guarantee freedom in the same way as someone who is not part of the state organisation. In exercise of their public office, therefore, civil servants are protected by the promise of freedom as against the state guaranteed by fundamental rights only to the extent that no restrictions arise from the special reservation to civil servants of the exercise of sovereign powers. Teachers with the status of civil servants, even within the scope of their personal pedagogical responsibility, do not teach in exercise of their own freedom, but on the instructions of the general public and with responsibility to the state. Teachers who are civil servants therefore from the outset do not enjoy the same protection by fundamental rights as parents and pupils: instead, the teachers are bound by the fundamental rights because they share in the exercise of state authority.

In formulating official duties for the civil servants, the state administrative authority also fulfils the requirements of its obligation under Article 1.3 of the Basic Law; the civil servant's official duty is the reverse side of the freedom of the citizen who is confronted by state authority in the person of the official. If official duties are imposed on the teacher for the exercise of his or her office, therefore, this is not a matter of encroachments upon society outside the state-controlled sphere or an occasion for the ensuing call for law passed by parliament to protect the citizen. The state relies on official duties to ensure in its internal sphere uniform administration complying with statute and the constitution.

The majority of the Senate did not take this difference in structure adequately into account. As a result, the situation of the teacher on the one hand and of the pupils and parents on the other hand, which differ with regard to fundamental rights, are not correctly understood. In particular the legal position of the applicant, who has no legal claim to enter the sphere of state control as he or she desires, may not be seen under the aspect of a subject of fundamental rights defending himself or herself against the state. Voluntary entry into the status of a civil servant is a decision made by the applicant in freedom, choosing obligation to the public interest and loyalty to an employer that, in a democracy, acts for the people and is monitored by the people. A person who wishes to become a civil servant may therefore not reject the requirement of moderation and of occupational neutrality, neither in general nor with reference to specific official or private constellations that can be recognised in advance. At all events it cannot be reconciled with these duties if the civil servant plainly uses his or her employment, within the sphere of that civil service, as a space to profess beliefs, and thus effectively as a stage on which to develop the civil servant's own fundamental rights. The duty conferred on the civil servant consists in expertly, objectively, dispassionately and neutrally assisting in giving effect to democratic intention, that is, the intention of legislation and of the responsible government, and in taking second place as an individual where the civil servant's claims to realisation of his or her personality are likely to create conflicts in his or her employment and thus obstacles to the realisation of democratically formed will.

2. Civil servants are fundamentally different from those citizens who are subjected to a special status relationship by measures of public authority but do not in this connection enter the sphere of the state, merely a special legal relationship, such as pupils and their parents, who have the right to educate them, in the compulsory state school (BVerfGE 34, 165 [192, 193]; 41, 251 [259, 260]; 45, 400 [417, 418]; 47, 46 [78 seq.]) or prisoners in prison (BVerfGE 33, 1 [11]). It is therefore an error to believe that it is possible to fight another battle for the Basic Law's idea of freedom, following the struggle against the institution of the special relationship of subordination (besonderes Gewaltverhältnis), by emphasising fundamental rights positions in the internal sphere of the civil service. The opposite is the case. If one sees teachers, who are bound by fundamental rights, primarily as subjects of fundamental rights, and thus sees the teacher's personal liberty rights in opposition to those of pupils and parents, one reduces the freedom of those for whose sake the theory of materiality (Wesentlichkeitstheorie, the theory that material decisions must be laid down by the legislature rather than decided by the executive), broadened the constitutional requirement in school education law that matters should be specifically enacted in statutes.

The relationship of the civil servant to the state is a particular relationship of proximity with its own inherent rules, which are recognised by the constitution and regarded as worth preserving. Under the balanced concept of the Basic Law, civil servants are certainly intended to be freedom-conscious citizens - if not, loyalty to the free constitution would only be lip service - but at the same time they are to observe the fundamental priority of official duties and the intention of the democratic institutions embodied in it. As a personality, the civil servant is not a mere "instrument of execution", even if he or she decides to work for the public good. Those who wish to become civil servants, however, must loyally identify themselves with the constitutional state in important fundamental questions and when observing their official duties, because the state, conversely, is represented by its civil service and is identified with the concrete civil servant. All the principles of the permanent civil service are dominated by this idea of reciprocity and proximity.

Fundamental personal liberty rights of a civil servant or of a person applying for a public office are therefore from the outset guaranteed only to the extent that they are compatible with these laws inherent to the civil service. They form part of these necessities of the civil service if there is no fear of obstructions to the working routine. Any other approach than such a priority of the exercise of sovereign powers with regard to fundamental rights of the civil servants in office would be incompatible with the constitutional requirement of practical concordance. Failing this, the interpretation of the constitution would give rise to a contradiction that is not contained in the Basic Law itself. The fundamental rights are intended to guarantee distance between political power and society outside state control, and they are not intended to take effect in the very context where the constitution intends there to be a particular proximity and therefore excludes mutual distancing.

The fundamental rights preserve distance between citizens and state authority precisely in order to place limits upon state rule (Loschelder, in: Isensee/Kirchhof (eds.), Handbuch des Staatsrechts, vol. V, 2nd ed., 2000, s. 123, marginal number 16; Di Fabio, Veröffentlichun-gen der Vereinigung der Deutschen Staatsrechtslehrer, VVDStRL, 56, p. 235 [253, 254]). This most elevated function of the fundamental rights may not, however, develop without restriction where the distance is specifically intended to be removed by incorporation into the state and therefore the constitution does not intend the distance to exist. In a relationship of proximity that is institutionally desired by the constitution, therefore, the most basic function of a fundamental right cannot assert itself without calling into question the relationship of proximity and the constitution's decision in favour of a democratically guided civil service.

3. The evaluation of aptitude in connection with the special right of equality under Article 33.2 of the Basic Law must not be mistaken for an encroachment upon the freedom under Article 4.1 of the Basic Law.

The requirement and, as it were, the normal case of classical civil rights and liberties is an intrusion by state authority into the sphere of the citizen. The constellations in which the citizen approaches the state, claims benefits from the general public or offers his or her services to the general public deviate from this normal case. Here, state authority does not intrude on society, but subjects of fundamental rights seek proximity to the state organisation, desire the state to act, seek a legal relationship.

The constitutional complaint challenges the violation of Article 33.2 in conjunction with Article 33.3 of the Basic Law and therefore relies on a special right of equality. If rights of equality are asserted in isolation or connection with a claim for performance, however, the constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute cannot be relied on. The infringement of equality does not give rise to an encroachment upon a right of freedom that could trigger the requirement of the specific enactment of a statute. The constellation surrounding the encroachment is different: the appointment of a teacher whose person does not offer a guarantee that he or she will carry out his or her duties neutrally in class indirectly affects fundamental rights of the pupils and their parents; as a result, at best there could be a discussion as to whether a statute is necessary with regard to protecting the freedom of the pupils and parents.

If the state forbids a person to wear a headscarf, which is at least in part motivated by religion, in a public place, it undoubtedly encroaches upon the fundamental right of freedom of religion. If the civil servant, on the other hand, wishes to display indications that are understood as religious in a space that the constitution has already defined as neutral - in this case when teaching in a compulsory state school - and as a representative of the general public, the civil servant is not exercising, in the social sphere, a freedom to which he or she is entitled as an individual. The civil servant's exercise of freedom at work is from the outset restricted by the necessities and above all the constitutional definition of the office; if this were not so, the realisation of the will of the people would fail for an excess of personal liberty rights on the part of the representatives of the state. When carrying out his or her official duties, the teacher must respect the fundamental rights of the pupils and their parents; the teacher is not merely on the state's side, but the state also acts through the teacher. Those who see the civil servant, except in questions of status, as having unrestricted fundamental rights vis-à-vis the civil servant's employer dissolve the boundary that has been drawn, in order to create liberty for children and parents, between the state and society. In this way they accept the risk that the democratic development of informed opinion will become more difficult, and in place of this they prepare the way for the courts to weigh the fundamental rights of teachers, parents and pupils, a process which is difficult to monitor.

4. Finally, another reason for which there is no need for a statute is that the evaluation of the aptitude of a civil servant has indirect effects in a legal relationship that is material for fundamental rights. Admittedly, in the past the application of the constitutional requirement in education law that a statute be specifically enacted was extended for the sake of the parents and pupils, but not to protect the teachers who were civil servants. The situation of civil servants, as a relationship of particular proximity between citizen and state, was, unlike education law with its character of a benefit directed outwards and affecting the rights of parents, specifically not understood as a legal relationship shaped by the civil servant's claim to fundamental rights (cf. Oppermann, Verhandlungen des 51. Deutschen Juristentages 1976, vol. I, part C, reports, Nach welchen rechtlichen Grundsätzen sind das öffentliche Schulwesen und die Stellung der an ihm Beteiligten zu ordnen?, C 46-47).

From the point of view of materiality, therefore, it could be of significance only if a Land permitted the headscarf, or other religious or ideological symbols likely to lead to conflict, in class. For then, even without the encroachment upon fundamental rights affecting the rights of pupils and parents, already specifically asserted, a dangerous situation from the point of view of fundamental rights would have arisen that needed to be legislated for. An extension of the constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute, under the aspect of materiality, to include civil rights and liberties of the teacher in exercising his or her official duties, on the other hand, has not yet been advocated.

II.

The civil servant's duty of neutrality follows from the constitution itself; it does not need to be further supported by Land statutes. Civil servants who give no guarantee that in their conduct as a whole they will carry out their duties neutrally and in a way appropriate to the requirements of the particular employment lack aptitude in the meaning of Article 33.2 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 92, 140 [151]; 96, 189 [197]).

The grounds given by the majority of the Senate push the constitutional personal liberty rights a long way into civil-service law without giving appropriate weight to the structural decision made by the Basic Law in Article 33 of the Basic Law. These grounds can therefore not be brought into accord with fundamental statements of the constitution on the relationship between society and state. In particular, they misjudge the position of the civil service in realising democratic will.

1. Those who aspire to a public office seek in the status activus (rights to take part in a democratic state) proximity to public authority and, like the complainant, wish to create a particular relationship of service and loyalty to the state. This particular position of duty, which is constitutionally protected by Article 33.5 of the Basic Law, takes precedence over the protection of the fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [366, 367]), which in principle applies to civil servants too, to the extent that the duty and purpose of the public office so require. Accordingly, the citizen's right arising under Article 33.2 of the Basic Law grants equal access to public offices only if the applicant fulfils the factual requirements of the right, which is equivalent to a fundamental right, - aptitude, qualifications and professional achievement. The employer is authorised and constitutionally obliged to determine that an applicant is fit for a public office (Article 33.2 of the Basic Law).

In this discretionary decision, it is necessary to assess aptitude, qualifications and professional achievement; this is an act of evaluative decision-making, and it is to be reviewed by the court only to a restricted extent, to determine whether the administrative authority based the assessment on incorrect facts and whether it misjudged the civil service law and constitutional-law framework within which it can move without restriction. Apart from this, since there is no right to be accepted into the status of a civil servant, the review is restricted to checking for arbitrariness (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [354]). The interpretation of the indeterminate legal term "aptitude" necessitates a predictive decision in which the employer must comprehensively evaluate all the characteristics that the office in question requires of its holder (cf. BVerfGE 4, 294 [296, 297]; BVerwGE 11, 139 [141]).

Here, the employer must also give a prediction as to whether the applicant will fulfil his or her professional duties in future in the office sought. Aptitude includes not only a guarantee that the civil servant is equal to the professional tasks, but also that the civil servants person satisfies the fundamental requirements that are indispensable for the exercise of a public office that has been conferred. One of these requirements, which are protected by Article 33.5 of the Basic Law with constitutional status, is the guarantee that the civil servant will observe his or her official duties neutrally. What degree of restraint and neutrality can be required of the civil servant in the individual case is determined not only by general principles, but also by the concrete requirements of the office.

2. The state whose constitution is the Basic Law needs the civil service in order that the will of the people may take effect in practice. The civil service realises the decisions of parliament and of the responsible government; it puts the principle of democracy and the constitutional state into a concrete form (Article 20.1 of the Basic Law). The design of the constitution aims at democratic rule in a legally constituted form. Both the legislation passed by parliament and the political leadership given by the government therefore require the neutral civil service with its expert knowledge (cf. BVerfGE 7, 155 [163]). Statute and law are a promise for the citizen who is subject to state authority that the form in which a fact situation will be legislated on will be abstract and general and without respect of person. In conformity with this, the civil servant too, who is called to implement the law and to realise the political will of the government in a legal form, acts as a neutral fiduciary vis-à-vis the citizen.

The decision in favour of the constitutional state requires the civil servant to be bound by statute, as a counterweight to the political leadership of the government. He or she realises the democratic will. Under the design of the Basic Law, sovereign duties are normally assigned to civil servants (Article 33.4 of the Basic Law). The permanent civil service, founded on factual knowledge, expert performance and loyal fulfilment of its duties, is intended to secure a stable administration and thus to act as a balancing factor in face of the political forces that shape life in the polity (cf. BVerfGE 7, 155 [162]; 11, 203 [216, 217]). Civil servants must carry out their tasks impartially and justly; in exercising their office they must take account of the public welfare, be loyal to the state and behave, both inside and outside their office, in such a way that they do justice to the respect and the trust that their position requires (cf. s. 35.1 of the Civil Service Law Framework Act; s. 73 of the Baden-Württemberg Land Civil Service Act). Their conduct in office must be oriented solely towards factual correctness, faithfulness to the law, justice, objectivity and the public interest. These obligations form a fundamental basis for the trust of the citizens that the duties of the democratic constitutional state will be fulfilled.

3. The requirement of neutrality and moderation for civil servants that follows from this is one of the tradition fundamental principles of the permanent civil service (Article 33.5 of the Basic Law); it has been enacted in nonconstitutional law in s.s. 35.1, 35.2 and 36 of the Civil Service Law Framework Act and in the civil service Acts of the Länder (cf. s. 72 of the Baden-Württemberg Land Civil Service Act: cf. BVerfGE 7, 155 [162]; Battis in: Sachs, Grundgesetz 3rd ed., Article 33, marginal number 71; Lübbe-Wolff in: Dreier, Grundgesetz, vol. II, 1998, Article 33, marginal number 78). This corresponds to the basic duty of neutrality of the state, which also applies in the sphere of religion and ideology, which is derived precisely from the freedom of faith of Article 4 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 3.3, Article 33.3 of the Basic Law and from Article 140 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 136.1, 136.4 and Article 137.1 of the Weimar Constitution (cf. BVerfGE 19, 206 [216]; 93, 1 [16, 17]; 105, 279 [294]). To this extent, the principles of the permanent civil service under Article 33.5 of the Basic Law create a direct constitutional reservation that in advance restricts the scope for civil servants to exercise their fundamental rights: to protect the fundamental rights of those who are not integrated into the state organisation.

The previous case law of the Federal Constitutional Court derived rights and duties of the civil servant directly from Article 33.5 of the Basic Law. Non-constitutional provisions governing the civil servant's rights and duties are possible and to a certain extent desirable here, but they are not constitutionally required (BVerfGE 43, 154 [169, 170]). The duties of the civil servant created directly under Article 33.5 of the Basic Law include moderation and restraint, in particular when carrying out his or her official business. If the civil servant in office behaves in a way that is not neutral politically, ideologically or in religion, he or she violates his or her official duties if the behaviour is objectively likely to lead to conflicts or obstruction in observing public duties (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [347]). Especially in religious and ideological matters, the civil servant must be restrained, because this is required of the state for whom the civil servant acts, for the sake of the freedom of the citizens.

Under Article 4.1 of the Basic Law and under Article 3.3 sentence 1, Article 33.3 and Article 140 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 136.1, 136.4 and 137.1 of the Weimar Constitution, the state and its institutions are obliged to conduct themselves neutrally in questions of religious and ideological belief and not to endanger religious peace in society (BVerfGE 105, 279 [294]). For this reason too, when the civil servant first joins the civil service he or she must, constitutionally, already offer a personal guarantee of neutral conduct that neither provokes nor challenges in carrying out his or her future duties (Article 33.5 of the Basic Law).

4. What degree of restraint and neutrality can be required of the civil servant in the individual case is determined not only by these general principles, but also by the concrete and changing requirements of the office. These requirements too need not be separately laid down by statute as official duties, because it is a specific mark of the permanent civil service that official duties are not understood as restrictions on the civil servant's freedom, but are laid down by the employer in accordance with the relevant needs of a constitutional and factually effective administration. The standard for the assessment of aptitude is marked out for the authority in its essential lines in this respect too by Article 33.5 of the Basic Law with regard to the principle of neutrality and moderation. These principles, which constitutionally apply directly, need no further statutory definition, even in relation to school. The non-constitutional law requirements of the civil servant's duty of political neutrality are to this extent declaratory and not integral to the assessment of aptitude on entry into public offices in the meaning of Article 33.2, Article 33.5 of the Basic Law.

The general duty of neutrality applies to a particular degree for civil servants who exercise the office of a teacher at state schools. Teachers carry out the state's duty to provide education and training (Article 7.1 of the Basic Law). In this, they have direct pedagogical responsibility for teaching and the education of the pupils. By reason of their function, they are put in a position to exercise influence on the development of the pupils entrusted to them in a way comparable to the parents. Connected with this is a restriction of the parents' right of education, which is guaranteed as a fundamental right (Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law); this restriction can be accepted only if schools endeavour to achieve objectivity and neutrality not only in the political sphere, but also in religious and ideological matters. One reason why this is the case is that under Article 6.2 sentence 1 of the Basic Law the parents also have the right to bring up children in religious and ideological respects and they can in principle keep convictions that they feel are wrong away from their children (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 [48]; 41,88 [107]).Observing these rights is one of the essential duties of school, required by the Basic Law itself; at the same time, they are a mirror image of the official duties to be observed by the teachers.

III.

A teacher at a primary school or non-selective secondary school violates official duties if, in lessons, she uses symbols as part of her dress that are objectively likely to result in obstacles at school or even constitutionally significant conflicts in relation to school. The uncompromising wearing of the headscarf in class that the complainant seeks is incompatible with the requirement for a civil servant to be moderate and neutral.

1. When civil servants exercise a public office, even if they are modern, open and courageous, fundamental rights are guaranteed by the constitution only if there is no suspicion that there will be a marked conflict with the employer's development of informed political opinion and no obstacle to the exercise of the public office conferred. When the majority of the Senate assume that only the existence of tangible evidence of a "concrete endangerment of the peace of the school" is sufficient to deny the aptitude of an applicant for a civil service post, they misjudge the standard for the assessment of aptitude.

The Senate majority themselves also admit that religiously motivated dress of teachers may influence schoolchildren, lead to conflicts with parents and in this way disrupt the peace of the school. In the case of conflict in particular, they state, it must also be expected that there will be onerous effects on younger pupils. This potential situation of danger, however, cannot be cited in response to a prospective teacher at the stage of "abstract danger", but only when tangible evidence of the endangerment of the peace of the school has materialised. In this view, if conflicts have not crystallised, the authority making the appointment can no longer find there is a lack of aptitude.

In this view, the majority of the Senate misjudge the standard of evaluation for the assessment of aptitude under Article 33.2 of the Basic Law. For because the removal from office of a person retaining civil service status for life on account of violation of his or her official duties is possible under the traditional principles of permanent civil service only to a restricted extent and by way of formal disciplinary proceedings, the employer must in advance see to it that no one becomes a civil servant who cannot be guaranteed to observe the official duties under Article 33.5 of the Basic Law. The constitutionally legitimate means for this is the consideration and decision of whether the applicant has the necessary aptitude for the office applied for. Doubts as to this that cannot be removed permit the appointing authority to make a negative prediction, since here it is not possible to establish aptitude positively (cf. BVerfGE 39, 334 [352, 353]). Preventive measures to protect children and the parents' right of education, moreover, do not in principle require that a situation of danger be scientifically and empirically proved (cf. BVerfGE 83, 130 [140]).

Reference to the concept of "abstract danger", which is taken from police law, cannot therefore appropriately solve the conflicts in the assessment of aptitude. On the contrary, the free constitutional state is prohibited from postponing denying that civil servants have the necessary aptitude until it becomes probable that their foreseeable conduct in office will cause damage to particular objects of legal protection, as the concept of danger implies. The distinction between concrete and abstract danger may therefore be used to describe the classical threshold of interference in the relationship between the citizen and the state, but not to describe the standard for the discretion in appointment incumbent on state administration. It cannot accord with the civil service law reservation to civil servants of the exercise of sovereign powers if the constitutional state would have to rely on the threshold of danger under police law against its own civil servants who represent the state and through whom the state acts in order to control their conduct in office. This applies all the more in that the complainant wishes to teach primary school and non-selective secondary school pupils in a state compulsory school, that is, in an area that is sensitive for pupils and parents from the point of view of fundamental rights. In this respect it is therefore not a question of potential dangers or modalities of danger under police law, but merely whether the school authority, in putting into specific terms not only provisions of Land law, but also the constitutionally valid principles of permanent civil servants in the meaning of Article 33.5 of the Basic Law assumed on a basis that can be followed that there was a risk of a violation of duty. This is clearly the case.

2. The school board, on the evidence of the record of the conversations relating to aptitude and according to the statements in the oral hearing before the Federal Constitutional Court, certainly showed understanding of the complainant's religious convictions; conversely, however, the complainant clearly showed no understanding for the employer's desire to show neutrality. Except in extreme cases such as the immediate threat of violence, she found she would not be capable of refraining from wearing a symbol of strong religious and ideological expressiveness while teaching. Apart from the fact that this rigidity gives rise to doubts as to the complainant's prior loyalty to the political aims of her employer and the order of values in the Basic Law, inter alia in a possible conflict with religious convictions of Islam, in this way, even at the early stage of evaluation of aptitude, circumstances became known that would make it substantially more difficult to use the applicant in every function at school and that would bring the Land authority of the state into conflicts with pupils and their parents, but possibly also with other teachers, that can be predicted even today.

The headscarf worn by the complainant is here not to be assessed abstractly or from the point of view of the complainant, but in her concrete relationship to school. The requirements of the office of a teacher at the primary school and non-selective secondary school include the duty to avoid for his or her person political, ideological or religious symbols that are objectively expressive. In the teaching profession, teachers must refrain from using such meaningful symbols, which are likely to awaken doubts as to their neutrality and professional distance in topics that are controversial politically or from the point of view of religion or culture. Here it cannot be relevant what subjective meaning the teacher who is a civil servant associates with the symbols he or she uses. What is decisive is the objective effect of the symbol.

Assessing such an effect in concretely changing situations is fundamentally the duty of the employer and can be reviewed for plausibility and conclusiveness by courts only to a limited extent. The professionally competent administration is best suited to carry out the assessment; putting official duties into specific terms is traditionally a domain of the employer. In doing this, the employer must react to changing situations. The use of symbols changes over the course of time, as does the violence of the resonance created by them: sometimes slogans on political badges (e.g. "Stop Strauß"; "Nuclear Power - No Thanks") are in the foreground, sometimes symbols derived from religion such as the orange-coloured dress of the followers of Bhagwan (Osho) (BVerwG, Neue Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht, NVwZ 1988, p. 937). The employer, in the last instance the competent Land minister in his parliamentary and political responsibility, with his particular expertise with regard to the requirements for functions in the school situation, must assess in each case what use of symbols by the civil servant is compatible with the requirements of civil-service law in general and with the special requirements in the teaching profession, or is to be prohibited.

3. A distinction between abstract and concrete danger, such as the majority of the Senate regard as significant, is of no importance here, and as a result has to date not been relied on to determine official duties or in connection with decisions as to aptitude. All that is important if there are proceedings at a non-constitutional court challenging the decision as to aptitude is whether the assessment that particular symbols are incompatible with the requirement of neutrality in the civil service was based on a clearly erroneous factual foundation or on conclusions that cannot be understood.

The assumption on which the decisions challenged rest that if the complainant were employed in a general primary school or non-selective secondary school in Baden-Württemberg there would be apprehension of possible interference with the peace of the school is understandable. The majority of the Senate also assume that a teacher who permanently wears the headscarf in lessons as an Islamic symbol does at least give rise to "abstract danger". A symbol worn by the teacher that is - at present - expressive and has objective religious, political and cultural meaning is indeed likely to encroach upon the negative freedom of religion of pupils and parents and upon the parents' right of education (Article 6.2 of the Basic Law). Especially the wearing of a garment that unequivocally indicates a particular religious or ideological conviction of a teacher at state schools may encounter lack of understanding or rejection among pupils who are of a different opinion or the persons entitled to educate them and may affect this category of persons in their fundamental right of negative freedom of belief because the pupils cannot escape such a demonstration of religious conviction.

Teaching and education at state schools are benefits given by the state; accepting these benefits has been made a statutory duty for the children. For children and their parents, therefore, taking part in school lessons is for all intents and purposes unavoidable. In addition, the children's opportunities in life depend substantially on their level of achievement and on the competence of school institutions and their practice with regard to appropriate support and education. Consequently, neither the parents nor the state can reasonably be expected to wait and see how conflicts develop in the individual case when a future conflict situation becomes evident during the job interview. In addition, it seems likely that some parents will fail to protest because they fear there might be disadvantages for their child if they did so. The possibility that peace at school might be disrupted has, apart from this, already taken on a concrete form in the case of the complainant, as is shown by experience in teaching practice and the negative reaction of other teachers.

4. The assumption of the majority of the Senate that the cross on a classroom door and the headscarf of a teacher in class are not comparable, a comparison decided in favour of the complainant, misjudges the fundamental rights position of the pupils and parents affected. The decisive factor here is the influence to which the individual pupil in a compulsory state school and under state responsibility is subjected. If, in surroundings with a Christian influence, a cross hangs above the school door - not a large crucifix behind the teacher (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 [18]) - this can scarcely any longer be regarded as an encroachment upon the negative freedom of religion or the parents' right of education. Children have too few associations with a mere everyday object on the wall that has no immediate relation to a concrete person or real world fact situation. The cross, over and above its religious significance, is too much a general cultural symbol for a culture, fed by Jewish and Christian sources, bound by values but open, that has become tolerant as a result of wide historical experience, some of it painful.

In contrast, teachers, as persons and as personalities, have a material moulding effect on the children, especially at primary school and in the function of class teachers. If a teacher wears striking dress, this creates impressions, gives rise to questions and encourages imitation. In the oral hearing, the expert witness Professor Dr. Bliesener stated on this point that the conduct of the teacher encourages the pupils to imitate it: this happens because the pupils at a primary school often have a close emotional relationship, and the teacher is also expect to aim for this, for pedagogical reasons, and because the attention of children is clearly directed at the teacher and the teacher's authority is also perceived in the context of the school.

The complainant's statement that if there were questions about the headscarf she would answer these untruthfully and in contradiction to her religious conviction, saying it was only a fashion accessory, is not appropriate to avoid a conflict of fundamental rights. For children too are aware of the religious significance of wearing a headscarf permanently, that is, even indoors. In addition, school children interact not only with the teacher, but also with their parents and wider social surroundings. Parents who answer their children's questions truthfully within their own understanding of education will not be able to avoid explaining that the teacher wears the headscarf because only in this way can she preserve in public her dignity as a woman. But here there are the seeds of a conflict with the moral concepts of children with non-Islamic parents, and possibly even with Islamic parents who do not believe in a requirement that women cover themselves in public. The objective irritation effect of a symbol that is also political and cultural may easily reach the child, by way of reactions in its social surroundings, and lead the child to ask whether, in a conflict of values that it cannot judge, it should take the side of the teacher or the side of its social surroundings, which decidedly reject the headscarf, and which may include its parents. In the oral hearing, the expert witness Professor Dr. Bliesener in this connection referred to the possibility that children of primary school age might be emotionally overtaxed if a permanent conflict developed between the teacher on the one hand and the parents or individual parents on the other hand.

5. In order that an official duty, directed towards moderation in the civil servant's dress, can lawfully be put into concrete terms by the employer, no empirical proof of "dangerous situations" is needed, and still less is it necessary for the Land legislature to carry out scientific surveys in order to establish the "endangerment". A constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute with a duty for the legislature to offer proof, for the mere purpose of putting official duties into concrete terms and ordering them to be applied, is not merely foreign to the system, but also takes the free constitutional state further into an immobility that obstructs its effectiveness. It is quite adequate for the assessment of aptitude that the use of meaningful symbols as part of dress a conflict appears reasonably possible or even likely.

This is the case, because the headscarf clearly, at least in part, carries a heavy symbolic meaning as a symbol of political Islamism - this is shown even by the public reactions to the court proceedings instigated by the complainant - and corresponding defensive reactions are to be expected. This objective content also includes the emphasis of a moral distinction between women and men that is likely to lead to conflicts with those who in turn support equality, equal value and equal treatment in society of women and men (Article 3.2 of the Basic Law) as a high ethical value.

The assessment that permanently wearing a headscarf in lessons is incompatible with the civil servant's duty of ideological and religious neutrality was convincingly described as free from errors in all three administrative court judgments. The headscarf as a religious and ideological symbol for the necessity that women cover themselves in public is at all events at present objectively likely to give rise to contradiction and polarisation.

6. The complainant stated that she felt her dignity was violated if she appeared in public with her hair uncovered. Even if the complainant did not expressly state it in so many words, this suggests the converse conclusion that a woman who does not cover her head gives up her dignity. Such a distinction is objectively qualified to give rise to values conflicts at school. This applies even in the relationship between the teachers, but particularly in relation to parents; their children, experience shows, develop a special relationship to their teacher in the primary school in particular.

Whether it is politically or pedagogically right or wrong to confront children as soon as possible with other standards of value or a lives based on a different understanding of the dignity of women than that of their parents is legally immaterial. The only significant factor is whether the appointing authority's assessment is understandable when it argues that there is a possibility of conflicts at school that could perfectly well have been avoided if the teacher had shown moderation in this respect. The responsible school board assumed without error that this was the case.

The headscarf, worn as the uncompromising compliance with an Islamic requirement that the complainant assumed existed for women to cover themselves, at present represents for many people inside and outside the Islamic religious group for a cultural and political statement with a religious foundation, relating in particular to the relationship of the sexes to each other (cf. e.g. Nilüfer Göle, Republik und Schleier, 1995, pp. 104 et seq.; Erdmute Heller/Hassouna Mosbahi, Hinter den Schleiern des Islam, 1993, pp. 108 et seq.; Rita Breuer, Familienleben im Islam 2nd ed. 1998, pp. 81 et seq.; Tariq Ali, Fundamentalismus im Kampf um die Weltordnung, 2002, pp. 97 et seq.). The majority of the Senate did not attach enough significance to this circumstance. As a result, they also did not consider the question as to whether, among the adherents of the Islam faith in Germany, there was a not insignificant or even growing number of people who regard the headscarf and the veil as a cultural challenge made to a society whose value system they reject, and above all, whether defensive reactions are to be expected from among the majority of the citizens of different faiths, and if so, what form these reactions might take. At all events, important commentators on the Koran are also of the opinion that the requirement that women cover their heads is based on the necessity of keeping women in their role of serving men, independently of the question as to whether a strict requirement to this effect even exists. This distinction between men and women is far removed from the values of Article 3.2 of the Basic Law.

It is therefore not important whether such an opinion is the only valid opinion within Islamic society or merely the predominant opinion, or whether the opinion submitted by the complainant in the proceedings, that the headscarf is, instead, a sign of the growing self-confidence and emancipation of women of Islamic faith, is held by a large number of persons. It is sufficient that the opinion that if women cover their heads this guarantees that they are subordinated to men is clearly held by a not insignificant number of the adherents of the Islam religion and is therefore likely to lead to conflicts with the equal rights of men and women, which is strongly emphasised in the Basic Law too.

7. In the claim asserted by the complainant to the right to work as a school teacher wearing a headscarf, she enters a grey area that is culturally and legally problematic and full of tension. Even one further step to completely covering her face, which is also practised in the Islamic religious community, might be regarded under an understanding of the German constitution, as incompatible with the dignity of humanity: free human beings show their faces to others.

But the Basic Law, in the sphere of society, also respects religious and ideological views that document a relation between the sexes that is difficult to reconcile with the order of values in the Basic Law, as long as they do not overstep the limits of the state's order of peace and law. The value system of the Basic Law, including its understanding of the equality of men and women, does not close itself to all change; it confronts challenges, reacts and preserves its identity in change.

This openness and tolerance does not, however, go so far as to grant entry into the civil service to symbols that challenge the existing standards of value and are therefore likely to result in conflicts. The fundamental openness and tolerance in society may not be transferred to the state's internal relationships. On the contrary: there is a constitutional requirement to keep the internal organisation of state administration free from the obvious possibility of such severe conflicts, in order that - in the concrete case - school lessons and education at school can proceed without interruption, and in general, because the state must remain capable of acting and must be able to conduct itself with a minimum of uniformity.

IV.

The majority of the Senate extend the constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute to an area which, because it is dependent on the individual case and because it is subject to existing constitutional obligations, is in practice not accessible to control by statute (cf. BVerfGE 105, 279 [304]).

1. The parliament of the Land Baden-Württemberg expressly and with good reasons refused to pass a formal statutory provision occasioned by the assessment of aptitude in the present case. In the period relevant for this litigation, the Land parliament twice dealt with the problem of teachers who wish to wear a headscarf in class (Minutes of plenary proceedings (PlenarProt.) 12/23 of 20 March 1997, pp. 1629 et seq.; Minutes of plenary proceedings 12/51 of 15 July 1998, pp. 3977 et seq.). The concrete case of the complainant was debated in detail in the plenary debate of 15 July 1998 (Minutes of plenary proceedings 12/51 of 15 July 1998) and a resolution was passed on a motion by the parliamentary Republikaner party; the motion was for legislation to be passed (Land parliament document, LTDrucks, 12/2931 of 9 June 1998). By a large majority, with only the votes of the Republikaner party opposing, the parliament voted not to pass legislation on the question of assessment of aptitude with regard to the wearing of religious symbols in class. The decision was stated to have been made because broader and more detailed legislation was not necessary; statutory provision would make it more difficult to make the appropriate assessment of aptitude based on the individual case and thus also to exercise the scope for interpretation in awarding public offices and at the same to do justice to personal liberties.

The call for a formal statute, based on the federal constitution, does not result in any advantage from the point of view of materiality for the democratic basis of an administrative decision. In complex questions of the individual assessment of applicants for a public office, a formal statute that in principle encourages freedom can have the reverse effect of reducing freedom, since in this way measures designed for the individual case are made more difficult. A general statutory provision, which in any case is foreign to the system for laying down official duties and assessing aptitude under civil service law, does not create more justice in the individual case, but less. Under the scheme of school policy of the Land government and the Land parliament, it would certainly be possible to appoint a teacher wearing a headscarf to a teaching post in the individual case if it could be seen that she was prepared to refrain from wearing the headscarf not only in extreme situations, as submitted by the complainant in the oral hearing, but also in everyday teaching situations in a primary school.

The school authority, the minister and the Land parliament, however, took offence specifically at the fact that the complainant categorically refused to take a step in the direction of a more flexible approach to her attitude to the headscarf. From this, the authority responsible for assessing her aptitude was entitled to conclude that in the case of conflicts with the negative freedom of religion of parents and children, solutions adapted to the individual case at mixed-religion schools would be very much more difficult (cf. Article 15.1, Article 16 of the Constitution of the Land Baden-Württemberg). It was also entitled to conclude that the persistence of the applicant's refusal was capable of arousing doubts as to her neutrality and moderation, although this did not appear beyond objective justification and arbitrary.

2. The majority of the Senate requires the Land legislature to put constitutional restrictions inherent in the Basic Law into concrete terms, although they can be determined concretely enough from the Basic Law. It is therefore doubtful whether the Land legislature is even authorised to put these inherent restrictions into concrete terms, beyond making a declaration confirming them or clarifying them.

The Federal Constitutional Court has to pass a final and unappealable decision on the extent and scope of inherent restrictions of fundamental rights. It is not the task of a Land legislature to repeat in a declaration the restrictions that arise directly from constitutional law. Nor is the appropriate respect accorded to the Land parliament if it is forced to pass statutory wording that on the one hand it expressly and in a well-considered way did not desire and that on the other hand - in the opinion of the majority of the Senate - put direct constitutional barriers in concrete form which will again be tested in later proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court. A competent court that in such a controversial fundamental constitutional question refers to the legislature must at least inform the legislature how the latter is to carry out the task presented to it of putting direct constitutional limits into a concrete form.

In the present case, however, all questions remain open as to how the legislature is to draft legislation incorporating its political will, which it has already declared openly in the Land parliament. Is it sufficient if the legislature makes it an official duty for teachers to avoid religious and ideological dress symbols that are likely to result in negative effects on the peace of the school? Would it be admissible to prohibit the use of such religious, ideological or political symbols in the teaching profession that are likely to endanger the equality of men and women and its enforcement in practice (Article 3.2 of the Basic Law)? May civil service law for teachers be defined in such a way as the then Republikaner party group in the Land parliament demanded in its motion of 9 June 1998 (Land parliament document 12/2931), "that the wearing of the headscarf as the symbol of Islam in class represents an inadmissible, one-sided, ideological and political statement"? Must the Land legislature, because this is said by the majority of the Senate to be required by the Basic Law, carry out empirical research with regard to possible disruptions, and if so, to what extent? Or must it constitutionally and for reasons of equality prohibit without exception all religious symbols in the dress of the teachers, even if, like a small ornamental cross, they make no significant statement and therefore are from the outset unlikely to result in conflicts of values at school? Could such a prohibition of dress symbols without any objective provocative content whatsoever be justified at all?

3. The Senate did not do justice to the task of answering a fundamental constitutional question, although the case is ripe for a decision. As a result, the Land legislature must now pass a statute, which according to the dissenting opinion is not even necessary, and this without being granted a transitional period for this surprising necessity. In addition, it would scarcely be compatible with the principle of equality to incorporate a statutory basis for a general prohibition of significant religious or ideological symbols in office, as suggested by the majority of the Senate, only in the Education Act and not generally in the Land Civil Service Act; the relevant conflict situations may occur in other areas of the civil service too, for example in connection with the youth welfare service, social work, public safety or the administration of justice.

4. The majority of the Senate ought at least to have granted the legislature a transitional period. Taking into account earlier decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court on the constitutional requirement of the specific enactment of a statute, this would have been appropriate and would have reduced the effects of a surprise decision.

a) The Federal Constitutional Court derived the prohibition of surprise decision from the requirement of a fair hearing under Article 103.1 of the Basic Law. The parties to the proceedings may be surprised neither by a judicial decision in itself (BVerfGE 34, 1 [78]) nor by its factual (BVerfGE 84, 188 [190, 191]) or legal (BVerfGE 86, 133 [144, 145]) content. A judicial decision may be based only on facts and results of evidence to which the parties were able to respond. Merely informing the parties to the proceedings is not enough; they must also have a concrete opportunity to express a reaction to the facts (BVerfGE 59, 330 [333]). A statement relating to the circumstances and facts is regarded as satisfying the requirements of a fair hearing in the meaning of Article 103.1 of the Basic Law, and the possible to make a statement on the legal situation is deemed equivalent to this (BVerfGE 60, 175 [210]; 64, 125 [134]; 86, 133 [144]; 98, 218 [263]). The parties must be given the possibility of asserting their point of view by way of arguments on fact and law in the proceedings. In special cases, it may here be necessary to draw the attention of the parties to a legal opinion on which the court intends to base the decision. Granting a fair hearing in a way that satisfies the constitutional right requires that the party, using the care to be expected of him or her, is capable of recognising the aspects on which the decision may depend. If the court relies on a legal point of view without prior reference, and even a conscientious and informed party to the proceedings, even taking into account the variety of legal opinions that might be held, could not expect the court to rely on this legal point of view, the result may be the equivalent of prevention of submissions on the legal situation. This applies in particular if the court's interpretation of the law has to date not been argued either in case law or in literature, albeit in principle there is no right to a judicial dialogue or a reference to the court's legal viewpoint (BVerfGE 86, 133 [144, 145]; 96, 189 [204]; 98, 218 [263]).

   The majority of the Senate fail to adequately take into account the procedural right to a fair hearing that is also due to the state as a party to the proceedings when they introduce a requirement of the specific enactment of a parliamentary statute in order to create official duties in connection with the freedom of religion and ideology of the civil servant, where until now neither case law and literature nor the complainant herself have called for such a requirement, and this was not made a serious subject of the judicial dialogue in the oral hearing before the Senate. The Land Baden-Württemberg had neither occasion nor opportunity to express its opinion on this legal opinion, which was surprising for all parties and a major factor in the decision. The Land should have been given an opportunity to express an opinion on this aspect. The majority of the Senate accuse the Land of an omission. They state that it had not created a sufficiently definite statutory basis for the encroachment upon the complainant's right under Article 33.2 in conjunction with Article 4.1 and 4.2 of the Basic Law. The Land was unable to react to this charge, because it did not know of it nor was it obliged to know of it.

b) In view of this procedural omission, the majority of the Senate ought at least to have laid down a reasonable period of time for the Land legislature within which the legislature was able to take account of the requirement of the specific enactment of a statute by creating a provision that, in the opinion of the majority of the Senate, does justice to the situation under constitutional law. In earlier decisions, the Federal Constitutional Court recognised this problem and when it made a new demand for the specific enactment of a statute it made it possible for the executive for a transitional period to make a decision encroaching upon fundamental rights without a corresponding statutory provision. In this way, for example, in the interest of the prison regime and schools, the monitoring of prisoners' letters was declared to be provisionally permissible because there was insufficient authorisation below the level of a statute (cf. BVerfGE 33, 1 [12, 13]; 40, 276 [283]) as was expulsion from school that was not governed by a parliamentary statute (cf. BVerfGE 58, 257 [280, 281]).

5. A reasonable transitional period would not only have been needed by reason of respect for the legislature, but would also have taken seriously the requirement of the specific enactment of a statute that was assumed by the majority of the Senate and given the Land legislature the possibility of creating an effective statutory basis for the present case. The Federal Administrative Court is also left by the reasoning of the majority of the Senate in a state of uncertainty, in a manner that is constitutionally questionable, as to how it is to proceed in future with regard to the proceedings that have been referred back. For if - as the majority of the Senate assume - the decision challenged by the complainant is unconstitutional, then at present the Federal Administrative Court should find in favour of the plaintiff. Since the dispute related only to the question of the religious symbol, therefore, the complainant would have to be appointed a civil servant by the Land Baden-Württemberg. In this way, under civil service law, a fait accompli would be created, which the legislature could scarcely correct. The alternative, not excluded even by individual elements of the grounds given by the majority of the Senate, of suspending the proceedings before the administrative courts until the Land parliament has created a statutory basis in the law relating to teachers who are civil servants, should have been clearly stated.

Headnotes:

1. The protection afforded by the freedom of faith and the freedom to profess a belief (Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 of the Basic Law) guarantees educational staff at interdenominational state schools the freedom to cover their head in compliance with a rule perceived as imperative for religious reasons. This can be the case for an Islamic headscarf.

2. A statutory prohibition on expressing religious beliefs at the Land level (in this case, pursuant to § 57 sec. 4 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Education Act) by outer appearance in an interdenominational comprehensive state school based on the mere abstract potential to endanger the peace at school or the neutrality of the state is disproportionate if this conduct can be plausibly attributed to a religious duty perceived as imperative. An adequate balance between the constitutional interests at issue - the educational staff's freedom of religion, the pupils' and parents' negative freedom of religion, the fundamental right of parents and the educational mandate of the state - can only be struck via a restrictive interpretation of the prohibitive provision, i.e. that there must be at least a sufficiently specific danger to the protected interests.

3. Should there be a sufficiently specific risk of danger to or impairment of the peace at school or the neutrality of the state in certain schools or school districts in a substantial number of cases due to considerable situations of conflict in specific areas with respect to correct religious conduct, there might be a constitutionally recognised need to generally prohibit expressions of religious beliefs by outer appearance for certain schools or school districts for a certain time, and not only in a specific individual case.

4. If expressions of religious belief by outer appearance made by educators in interdenominational comprehensive state schools are prohibited by law for the purposes of protecting the peace at school and the neutrality of the state, in principle, this must apply to all religions and ideologies without distinction.

Facts:

A.

The constitutional complaints concern court decisions on sanctions under labour law (warning notice and dismissal) issued by the complainants' employer, the Land North Rhine-Westphalia, against the complainants because as employees at state schools, they refused to remove what is known as an "Islamic headscarf" or a woollen hat worn as a replacement for that scarf, while on duty. Both complainants are Muslims. Complainant I is employed as a social educator, and complainant II was employed as a teacher, both under employment contracts under private law. The constitutional complaints also indirectly challenge the legislative provision on the permissibility of and limitations on expressions of religious belief by persons employed in the school system, as adopted in North Rhine-Westphalia following the decision of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court of 24 September 2003 (Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts BVerfGE 108, 282). That provision is the basis for the labour-law measures reviewed by the regular courts in the initial proceedings. [1]

[Excerpt from press release no. 14/2015 of 13 March 2015]

The constitutional complaints are directed against sanctions, as confirmed by the labour courts, imposed on the complainants after they refused to remove the headscarf worn at school for religious reasons, or the woollen hat worn as a replacement. Indirectly, they also challenge § 57 sec. 4 and § 58 sentence 2 of the Schulgesetz für das Land Nor[]drhein-Westfalen (North Rhine-Westphalia Education Act - SchulG NW) in the version of 13 June 2006.

Under § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW, at school, teachers may not publicly express views of a political, religious, ideological or similar nature which are likely to endanger or interfere with the neutrality of the Land with regard to pupils and parents, or disturb the political, religious and ideological the peace at school. Under sentence 2, conduct that might create the impression among pupils or parents that a teacher advocates against human dignity, the principle of equal treatment, fundamental freedoms or the free democratic order is prohibited. Pursuant to sentence 3, carrying out the educational mandate in accordance with the Constitution of the Land and accordingly presenting (Darstellung) Christian and occidental educational and cultural values or traditions do not contradict the prohibition set out in sentence 1. Under § 58 sentence 2 SchulG NW, these provisions apply to other educational staff, including socio-educational staff, employed by the Land.

Both complainants are Muslims of German nationality. The complainant in proceedings 1 BvR 471/10 has been employed in a state comprehensive school in North Rhine-Westphalia as a social educator since 1997. She complied with the request by the school authority to remove the headscarf while on duty, but substituted it by an off-the-shelf pink-coloured beret with a knit band and a polo-neck pullover of the same colour to cover her neck. Following this, the school authority issued a warning. Her lawsuit brought in the labour courts was unsuccessful at all levels of jurisdiction. The complainant in proceedings 1 BvR 1181/10 entered into a private employment contract with the Land North Rhine-Westphalia in 2001 as a teacher. She taught the Turkish language for native speakers at several schools. After the complainant had refused to discard the headscarf while on duty, the Land first issued a warning and then dismissed her. Her lawsuits in the labour courts against these measures were unsuccessful.

The complainants direct their constitutional complaints at the labour courts' decisions against them, and indirectly against the underlying provision of the Land Education Act. [38]

1. Proceedings 1 BvR 471/10 (complainant I)

Complainant I claims that the indirectly challenged provisions violate Art. 3 secs. 1 and 3 and Art. 33 secs. 2 and 3 GG, also in conjunction with Art. 9 and Art. 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). In addition, she claims that the challenged court decisions violate Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 in conjunction with Art. 12 sec. 1, Art. 33 secs. 2 and 3 GG and her general right of personality. She furthermore objects to the judgment of the Federal Labour Court, claiming a violation of her right to a lawful judge (Art. 101 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG) because it failed to request a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice of the European Union. [39]

[…] [57-76]

B.

The constitutional complaints are admissible and for the most part well-founded. [77]

In cases of educational staff's expression of religious belief by outer appearance and conduct, the provisions under § 57 sec. 4 sentences 1 and 2 and § 58 sentence 2 SchulG NW are compatible with the Basic Law only when interpreted restrictively in a manner consistent with the [freedom of religion and belief, which includes both the] freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief (Glaubens-und Bekennntnisfreiheit) (Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG). The labour courts' decisions challenged by the complainants are not consistent with these requirements and therefore violate the complainants' fundamental freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief. § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW, which is designed to privilege Christian and occidental educational and cultural values or traditions, is not consistent with the prohibition on disadvantaging persons on religious grounds (Art. 3 sec. 3 sentence 1 and Art. 33 sec. 3 GG). However, this does not impair the validity of the remainder of the provision, or the possibility of interpreting sentences 1 and 2 of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW in conformity with the Constitution. [78]

I.

The constitutional review concerns the challenged decisions of the labour courts and the prohibition on which those decisions are based, under § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW, insofar as the decisions relate to educational staff's expressions of religious beliefs through their outer appearance. The review must also extend to sentences 2 and 3 of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW, even though the labour courts expressly based their decisions only on the prohibition of expressions of belief in sentence 1. The provision is based on a single, unified concept. […] [79]

II.

The judgments of the labour courts issued in the initial proceedings are based on statutory provisions requiring a restrictive interpretation in conformity with the Constitution. These judgments do not meet the requirements of such an interpretation. A prohibition of the expression of religious belief by outer appearance, on the basis of a mere abstract danger to the peace at school or to the neutrality of the state, is in any case not appropriate and therefore disproportionate in light of the educational staff's freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief, if the expression of that belief can plausibly be traced to a religious duty perceived as imperative. A sufficiently specific danger is required instead. Under constitutional law, such a prohibition extending over a region or possibly even over an entire Land is possible, with regard to interdenominational state schools, only if there is a sufficiently specific danger to the aforementioned legal interests throughout the area to which the prohibition applies. [80]

In both initial proceedings, the Federal Labour Court held - as the lower courts had previously done - that the complainants' conduct had the potential, within the meaning of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW, to endanger the neutrality of the state towards pupils and parents, as well as the religious peace at school. These courts held that the prohibition does not cover only those expressions that specifically endanger or even disturb the neutrality of the state or the religious peace at school; it is intended to avert even an abstract danger, so that specific dangers are not able to arise. [81]

In cases of the present kind, such a far-reaching understanding of the provision results in a serious interference with the educational staff's fundamental right to the freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief. Such an interference cannot be justified constitutionally in this generalised form because it is disproportionate. [82]

1. The protection of the fundamental right to freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief (Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG) also guarantees educational staff in interdenominational state schools the freedom to comply with the rules of their faith that require them to cover themselves, as may for example be done by wearing an Islamic headscarf, if this is based on sufficiently plausible reasons. [83]

   a) As employees in the civil service, the complainants can also invoke their fundamental right under Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG (as is also the case for civil servants, BVerfGE 108, 282 <297 and 298>). The complainants' status as holders of fundamental rights is not automatically or generally called into question by their becoming part of the state's carrying out of its educational mandate. Moreover, the state is still bound by fundamental rights even if it makes use of the instruments of private law in carrying out a mandate, as was done here by entering into employment contracts under private law with the educational staff that it hired to carry out its educational mandate (Art. 1 sec. 3 GG; cf. BVerfGE 128, 226 <245>). [84]

b) In its section 1, Art. 4 GG guarantees the freedom of faith and of conscience, and freedom to profess a religious or ideological belief; in section 2 it guarantees the right to the undisturbed practice of religion. The two sections of Art. 4 GG contain a single fundamental right that is to be understood as all-encompassing (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 <245 and 246>; 32, 98 <106>; 44, 37 <49>; 83, 341 <354>; 108, 282 <297>; 125, 39 <79>; German Federal Constitutional Court, Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG, Order of the Second Senate of 22 October 2014 - 2 BvR 661/12 -, juris, para. 98). It extends not only to the inner freedom to believe or not to believe - i.e., to have a faith, to keep it secret, to renounce a former faith, and to turn to a new one - but also the outer freedom to profess and disseminate one's faith, to promote one's faith and to proselytise (cf. BVerfGE 12, 1 <4>; 24, 236 <245>; 105, 279 <294>; 123, 148 <177>). Therefore, it includes not only acts of worship and the practice and observance of religious customs, but also religious instruction and other forms of expression of religious and ideological life (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 <245 and 246>; 93, 1 <17>). This also includes the right of individuals to align their entire conduct with the teachings of their faith, and to act in accordance with this conviction, and thus to live a life guided by faith; and this applies to more than just imperative religious doctrines (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <297> with further references; BVerfG, Order of the Second Senate of 22 October 2014 - 2 BvR 661/12 -, juris, para. 88). [85]

When assessing what qualifies as an act of practising a religion or an ideological belief in a given case, one must not disregard what conception the religious or ideological communities concerned, and the individual holder of the fundamental right, have of themselves (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 <247 and 248>; 108, 282 <298 and 299>). However, this does not mean that all conduct by a person must be viewed as an expression of freedom of faith in the same way that the person views it subjectively. The authorities may analyse and decide whether it has been sufficiently substantiated, both in terms of its spiritual content and its outer appearance, that the conduct can in fact plausibly be attributed to the scope of application of Art. 4 GG; in other words, that it does in fact have a motivation that is to be viewed as religious. However, the state may not judge its citizens' religious convictions, let alone designate them as "right" or "wrong". This is especially the case when divergent views on such points are advanced within a religion (cf. BVerfGE 24, 236 <247 and 248>; 33, 23 <29 and 30>; 83, 341 <353>; 104, 337 <354 and 355>; 108, 282 <298 and 299>). [86]

c) The protection of the freedom of faith and the freedom to profess a belief under Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG, can be invoked by Muslim women for the wearing of a headscarf tied in a manner typical of their faith, including when they exercise their profession in interdenominational state schools, but can also be invoked with regard to the wearing of other clothing that covers the hair and neck if this is done for plausibly religious reasons (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <298>). [87]

In their constitutional complaints, the two complainants claim a religious reason for wearing their head coverings. They refer to wearing them as an imperative religious duty, and as a fundamental component of an Islamically oriented lifestyle. [88]

This religious basis of the choice of clothing is sufficiently plausible both in terms of spiritual content and outer appearance even in light of the different interpretations of the requirement to cover oneself in public that are advanced in Islam. It does not matter that the exact content of the rules of female clothing is indeed in dispute among Islamic scholars. It is sufficient that this interpretation exist in different schools of Islam and can be traced back to two verses in the Quran in particular (Sura 24, verse 31; Sura 33, verse 59) (cf. Asad, Die Botschaft des Koran - Übersetzung und Kommentar, 2009, pp. 676 and 677, 810; cf. also Heine, Kleiderordnung, in: Handbuch Recht und Kultur des Islams in der deutschen Gesellschaft, 2000, pp. 184 <186 and187>). In some schools of Islam, the requirement to cover oneself is also categorised as an imperative duty (cf. Khoury, Das islamische Rechtssystem, in: Handbuch Recht und Kultur des Islams in der deutschen Gesellschaft, 2000, p. 37 <52>). Under these circumstances, it does not matter that other schools of Islam do not consider it imperative for women to cover themselves in public (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <298 and299>). [89]

2. In light of the religious requirement to cover themselves, which the complainants perceive as imperative, the prohibition of wearing the head coverings in question, based on § 57 sec. 4 (in conjunction with § 58 sentence 2, in the case of complainant I)SchulG NW and upheld by the challenged court decisions, proves to be a serious interference with their fundamental right of freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief. [90]

a) The categorisation of the wearing of articles of clothing as an expression of religious beliefs by outer appearance or conduct within the meaning of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW is based on an interpretation of ordinary law incumbent, first, upon the regular courts that is per se unobjectionable under constitutional law. [91]

An "expression of belief by outer appearance or conduct" ("äußere Bekundung") within the meaning of the statutory basis for the interference in § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW is not limited to verbal expressions. In this respect, the Federal Labour Court reasonably holds that any "deliberate profession of a religious conviction directed to the outer world" is sufficient, and in determining the declaratory value of an expression, relies on those possibilities of interpretation that immediately suggest themselves for a significant number of observers. This understanding of the norm that focuses on the communicative nature of an "expression of beliefs by outer appearance or conduct" within the meaning of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW and on the point of view of an objective observer is consistent with the chain of effects assumed in that provision between the outer expressions mentioned there, on the one hand, and on the other hand, the legally protected interests that they affect, meaning the neutrality of the state and the peace at school. [92]

However, head coverings and other articles of clothing do not automatically take on the meaning of a nonverbal means of communication within the meaning of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW. Rather, based on the point of view of an objective observer, this is the case only if, in virtue of its nature, the article of clothing per se is typically the expression of a political, ideological, religious or similar belief, or if after an overall assessment of the specific accompanying circumstances, an intrinsically neutral article of clothing can be understood, without a reasonable doubt, as such an outer expression. [93]

A headscarf, specifically, is not as such a religious symbol. It can exert a comparable effect only in combination with other factors (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <304>). To that extent, for example, it differs from the Christian cross (cf. on this point BVerfGE 93, 1 <19 and 20>). Even if an Islamic headscarf serves only to fulfil a religious requirement and the wearer does not attribute symbolic character to it, and merely views it as an article of clothing prescribed by her religion, this does not change the fact that, depending on social context, it is widely interpreted as a reference to the wearer's adherence to the Muslim faith. In that sense it is an article of clothing with religious connotations. If it is understood as an outer indication of religious identity, it has the effect of an expression of a religious conviction without any need for a specific intent to make this known or any additional conduct to reinforce such an effect. The wearer of a headscarf tied in a typical way will usually also be aware of this. Depending on the circumstances of the individual case, this effect may also occur for other forms of coverings for the head and neck. [94]

b) The interference that is inextricably linked with the ban on wearing an Islamic headscarf or some other covering for the head and neck in fulfilment of a religious requirement is serious. [95]

The complainants do not merely invoke a religious recommendation that individual adherents of the faith may dispense with or postpone obeying. Rather, they have plausibly demonstrated that in their case - and in accordance with the self-perception of some Islamic schools of thought (on this see the North Rhine-Westphalia Ministry for Employment, Integration and Social Affairs, Ministerium für Arbeit, Integration und Soziales des Landes Nordrhein-Westfalen <ed.>, Muslimisches Leben in Nordrhein-Westfalen, 2010, pp. 95 et seq.) - covering themselves in public constitutes an imperative religious duty, which, in addition, as has been plausibly shown, touches upon their personal identity (Art. 2 sec. 1 in conjunction with Art. 1 sec. 1 GG). Therefore, a ban on covering the head when teaching or working as an educator at state schools may even block their access to that profession (Art. 12 sec. 1 GG). At the same time, there is a state of tension between the fact that at present this effectively means that mainly Muslim women are being kept away from qualified professions as teachers or other educational staff, and the requirement to achieve real equality of women in practice (Art. 3 sec. 2 GG), and the tension is in need of justification. Against this background, even though it is limited in time and space to the school environment, the statutory prohibition on expressing their faith constitutes a considerably more severe interference with the complainants' fundamental right to freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief than would be the case for a religious practice that had no plausible claim to being imperative. [96]

3. On the basis of the labour courts' interpretation of the legal norm, this interference with the complainants' freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief proves to be disproportionate and is therefore unjustified. [97]

a) Restrictions to this fundamental right can only be derived from the Constitution itself, because Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG does not contain a requirement of a specific enactment of a statute. Such limitations inherent in the Basic Law include the fundamental rights of third parties, along with those community values of constitutional status (cf. BVerfGE 28, 243 <260 and 261>; 41, 29 <50 and 51>; 41, 88 <107>; 44, 37 <49 and 50, 53>; 52, 223 <247>; 93, 1 <21>; 108, 282 <297>). Among the constitutionally protected interests that might come into conflict here with the freedom of faith are not only the state's educational mandate (Art. 7 sec. 1 GG), which must be fulfilled in observance of the duty of ideological and religious neutrality, but the parents' right to the upbringing of their children (Art. 6 sec. 2 GG), and the pupils' negative freedom of faith (Art. 4 sec. 1 GG) (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <299>). Resolving the normative tension among these constitutionally protected interests in consideration of the principle of tolerance is a task for the democratic legislature, which, within the public process of policy formulation, must seek a compromise that all can reasonably be expected to comply with. The above requirements of the Basic Law must be viewed together, and their interpretation and fields of application must be coordinated with one another (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <302-303>). [98]

b) In prohibiting religious expression through outer appearance or conduct by introducing § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW, the legislature that enacted the North Rhine-Westphalian Education Act was pursuing legitimate aims. This also applies to the legislature's intention to include clothing that has religious connotations, and particularly the Islamic headscarf if worn in the typical manner. Its aims were to preserve the peace at school and the neutrality of the state, and thus to safeguard the educational mandate of the state, to protect conflicting fundamental rights of pupils and parents, and thereby to prevent conflicts from the outset in the sphere of the state schools under the legislature's responsibility (cf. Landtag document, Landtagsdrucksache - LTDrucks 14/569, pp. 7 et seq.). These aims are clearly not objectionable under constitutional law. They can easily be related to the educational mandate of the state, the principle of neutrality, the pupils' negative freedom of faith, and parents' rights to the upbringing of their children, and thus to restrictions on educational staff's freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief that are inherent in the Constitution. [99]

c) It already seems doubtful whether the prohibition in § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW is necessary, as, in its interpretation by the regular courts, the mere abstract capability of external religious expression, in the form of wearing a head covering with religious connotations, is sufficient to endanger legally protected interests. However, there is no need to decide here whether, in view of how widespread the Islamic headscarf has now become in German society, and the common understanding of its meaning, and also in view of the very different possible interpretations of why women are moved to wear it, especially in such an extensive and heavily populated Land as North Rhine-Westphalia, the mere abstract danger to the legally protected interests of the school peace and the neutrality of the state must be prevented without exception in all interdenominational state schools and with regard to all pupil age groups, so as to keep specific dangers to these protected interests from arising in the first place. This is because, after all, the requirements that a provision of law be proportionate in the strict sense call for a restrictive understanding of the element of the "capability to endanger legally protected interests" required by the statute. [100]

d) In any case, the prohibition throughout an entire Land on religious expression through outer appearance, and particularly by wearing clothing that has a religious connotation, merely on the grounds that this has the abstract capability to endanger the peace at schools or the state's neutrality at an interdenominational school, proves to be disproportionate in the strict sense if such conduct can be plausibly attributed to a religious requirement that is understood as imperative. In the present instance, an appropriate balancing of conflicting interests protected under the Constitution, taking adequate account of the freedom of faith of educational staff who invoke a religious requirement to cover themselves in public, requires a restrictive reading of the ban that is intended to preserve the peace at schools and the state's neutrality, such that there must be at least a sufficiently specific danger to these protected interests. [101]

aa) The legislature possesses a prerogative of evaluation concerning facts and new developments, so as to decide whether conflicting fundamental rights of pupils and parents or other values of constitutional rank justify a provision that requires educational staff of all faiths to exercise extreme restraint in using symbols with a religious reference (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <310-311>). However, especially in the case of a largely preventive prohibition of external religious expressions, the legislature must strike a fair balance, taking into account the weight and importance of the educational staff's fundamental freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief, and must respect the limit that reasonableness imposes in its overall balancing of the weight of the interference against the weight of the reasons that justify it (cf. BVerfGE 83, 1 <19>; 90, 145 <173>; 102, 197 <220>; 104, 337 <349>). [102]

bb) If educational staff bring religious or ideological references into the school and classes, this may interfere with the requisite neutrality of the state's educational mandate, parents' right to bring up their children, and the pupils' negative freedom of faith. It opens up at least the possibility of influencing children and of conflicts with parents, potentially disrupting the peace at school and endangering the school's fulfilment of its educational mandate. Religiously motivated clothing worn by educational staff, intended as an expression of a religious conviction, may also have these effects (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <303>). However, none of the opposing interests enshrined in the Constitution is of such weight that the mere abstract danger that they might be interfered with can justify a ban, if on the other side the wearing of clothing or symbols with religious connotations is plausibly demonstrated to be attributable to a religious requirement that is perceived as imperative. [103]

(1) Pupils' negative freedom of faith (Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG) guarantees the freedom to stay away from the acts of worship of a faith they do not share. This also refers to rites and symbols through which a belief or religion present themselves. However, in a society that holds space for different religious convictions, individuals have no right to be spared from ever being confronted with expressions of faith, rituals and religious symbols that are alien to them. But this must be distinguished from a situation created by the state in which the individual is subjected, with no possibility of avoidance, to the influence of a specific faith, the acts in which that faith is manifested, and the symbols through which it presents itself (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 <15 and16>). It is true that pupils also find themselves in an unavoidable situation when, because of the general requirement of compulsory education, they are faced during a class, with no possibility of avoidance, with a state-employed teacher who wears an Islamic headscarf. However, in view of the effect of religious means of expression, one must distinguish here whether the symbol concerned is being used on the school authorities' initiative or due to a personal decision of individual educational staff. The latter may invoke the individual freedom under Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG in this respect. If a state allows the religious expression associated with wearing a headscarf on the part of a single teacher or educational staff member, it does not adopt that expression as its own simply by so allowing, and also does not have to accept that the expression is attributed to it as having been intended by it. (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <305 and 306>). [104]

It is true that the teacher's freedom of faith invoked in order to wear an Islamic headscarf at school does impact the pupils' negative freedom of faith (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <301-302>). Yet wearing an Islamic headscarf, a comparable covering of the head and neck or other clothing with religious connotations is not per se apt to interfere with the pupils' negative freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief. As long as members of the teaching and educational staff only display such an outer appearance and do not verbally promote their position or faith, or attempt to influence the pupils apart from their outer appearance, the pupils' negative freedom of faith as a rule remains unimpaired. The pupils are only confronted with the positive freedom of faith as exercised by educational staff in the form of wearing clothing in compliance with their beliefs, which, furthermore, is usually relativized and counterbalanced by the conduct of other members of staff who adhere to other faiths or ideologies. In this respect, religiously pluralistic society is mirrored in interdenominational schools. [105]

(2) Nor can anything else be derived from the fundamental right of parents. Art. 6 sec. 2 sentence 1 GG guarantees parents the care for and the raising of their children as a natural right and, in conjunction with Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG, also includes religion- or belief-based education; for that reason, it is first and foremost a matter for parents to convey to their children those convictions in matters of faith and belief that they consider right (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 <44, 47 and 48>; 52, 223 <236>; 93, 1 <17>). This corresponds with the right to keep children away from religious convictions that the parents consider wrong or harmful (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 <17>). However, Art. 6 sec. 2 GG does not include an exclusive right for parents to bring up their children. The state, to which the responsibility for supervising the entire school system is assigned under Art. 7 sec. 1 GG, carries out its educational mandate in the schools independently and, within its sphere [of responsibility], with equal rank alongside parents (cf. BVerfGE 34, 165 <183>; 41, 29 <44>; 108, 282 <301>). [106]

Accordingly, the fundamental right of parents does not entail an entitlement to keep pupils away from the influence of educational staff who follow a widespread religious rule to cover the head, as long as this does not impair the pupils' negative freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief. Nor does the parents' negative freedom of faith, which, in conjunction with the parents' rights to raise their children, can have an impact in this context, guarantee to be spared from being confronted with clothing with religious connotations worn by educational staff that merely permits a conclusion about those persons' adherence to another religion or belief, but otherwise exercises no deliberate influencing effect. In cases of the present type, this applies precisely because these situations do not concern faith-based conduct attributable to the state, but a recognisably individual exercise of a fundamental right. [107]

(3) Moreover, the state's educational mandate (Art. 7 sec. 1 GG), which has to be carried out in accordance with the state's duty to maintain religious and ideological neutrality, does not as such conflict with female educational staff members' exercising their positive freedom of faith by wearing an Islamic headscarf. If such outer conduct has plausibly been shown to be based on a religious duty perceived as imperative, the state's mandate can justify a prohibition only if there is a sufficiently specific danger to the peace at school that is necessary for the fulfilment of the educational mandate, or to the neutrality of the state. [108]

The Basic Law establishes an obligation for the state, as the home of all its citizens, to maintain religious and ideological neutrality in Art. 4 sec. 1, Art. 3 sec. 3 sentence 1, Art. 33 sec. 3 GG, as well as Art. 136 secs. 1 and 4 and Art. 137 sec. 1 of the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Reichsverfassung) in conjunction with Art. 140 GG. It prohibits the introduction of any legal entity of the nature of a state church and bars privileging any particular denomination, or excluding persons of other faiths (cf. BVerfGE 19, 206 <216>; 24, 236 <246>; 33, 23 <28>; 93, 1 <17>). The state must ensure that the treatment of the various religious and ideological communities is guided by the principle of equality (cf. BVerfGE 19, 1 <8>; 19, 206 <216>; 24, 236 <246>; 93, 1 <17>; 108, 282 <299-300>), and must not identify itself with a particular religious community (cf. BVerfGE 30, 415 <422>; 93, 1 <17>; 108, 282 <300>). The free state under the Basic Law is characterised by openness to the diversity of religious and ideological convictions, and bases that openness upon a concept of humanity characterised by human dignity and the free development of one's personality in selfdetermination under one's own responsibility (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 <50>; 108, 282 <300-301>). [109]

The religious and ideological neutrality required of the state is not to be understood as a distancing attitude in the sense of a strict separation of state and church, but as an open and comprehensive one, encouraging freedom of faith equally for all beliefs. Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG also requires the state, in the positive sense, to ensure that there is room for an active exercise of religious convictions and a realisation of one's autonomous personality in the religious and ideological sphere (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 <49>; 93, 1 <16>). The state is only barred from exerting a targeted influence in the service of a specific political, ideological or philosophical direction, or, through measures originating from the state or being attributable to it, from identifying itself with a specific faith or a specific ideology and thus on its own initiative endangering religious peace in a society (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 <16 and17>; 108, 282 <300>). The principle of religious and ideological neutrality also prohibits the state from judging the faith and doctrine of a religious community as such (cf. BVerfGE 33, 23 <29>; BVerfG, Order of the Second Senate of 22 October 2014 - 2 BvR 661/12 - juris, para. 88). [110]

This also applies in the sphere of schools, for which the state has taken responsibility, where religious and ideological concepts have always been relevant by virtue of schools' very nature (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 <49>; 52, 223 <241>). Accordingly, for example, to allow for or permit Christian references in the state schools is not precluded; however, the school must also be open to other religious and ideological content and values (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 <51>; 52, 223 <236 and 237>). As references to various religions and ideologies are possible in organising a state school, the mere visibility, apparent in their outer appearance, of the religious or ideological affiliation of individual members of educational staff - irrespective of what religion or ideology is concerned in the specific case - is not precluded as such by the neutrality required of the state in religious and ideological matters. It is through this openness that the free state under the Basic Law preserves its religious and ideological neutrality (cf. BVerfGE 41, 29 <50>). [111]

(4) (a) On that basis, a strict Land-wide prohibition of the expression of religious beliefs by outer appearance or conduct, for which - according to the interpretation by the labour courts in the challenged decisions - a mere abstract danger to the legally protected interests mentioned in § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW is deemed sufficient, cannot reasonably be imposed on the holders of fundamental rights, at any rate in cases such as these. It suppresses their fundamental right to freedom of faith in a manner that is not appropriate. If individual members of educational staff wear a headscarf, this does not entail identification of the state with a particular faith - quite different from the case of a cross or crucifix in the classroom that has been installed by state authorities (cf. BVerfGE 93, 1 <15 et seq.>). Nor does the employer's toleration of the educational staff's faith-based conduct imply that the school endorses such conduct as exemplary, and that the peace at school or the neutrality of the state could be endangered or disturbed for that reason alone. In addition, the complainants follow a commandment of faith which they have plausibly shown to perceive as imperative. Thus, in the process of balancing the pupils' and parents' fundamental rights that the religiously and ideologically neutral state must also protect within the school environment with the complainants' freedom of faith, the latter attains much higher weight than would be the case if the matter related to a non-imperative rule. [112]

(b) The situation is different if the outer appearance of educational staff constitutes a sufficiently specific danger to, or impairment of, the peace at school or state neutrality, or contributes significantly to such a danger or impairment. This might be conceivable, for example, in a situation where very controversial positions on the question of correct religious conduct were promoted and introduced into the school - particularly by older pupils or parents - in a way that seriously interfered with school processes and the fulfilment of the state's educational mandate, if the visibility of religious convictions and clothing practices were to generate or fuel this conflict. If a sufficiently specific danger exists that is based on such facts, it would be reasonable to expect that the educational staff, as holders of fundamental rights, would refrain from following the rule to cover their heads that they plausibly perceive as imperative, in consideration of all the constitutionally protected interests that are involved and possibly in conflict, so as to ensure an orderly fulfilment of the state's educational mandate that in particular protects the pupils' and parents' fundamental rights as well as the neutrality required of the state. But even in such a case, in the interest of protecting the fundamental rights of those concerned, the employer will have to first consider whether it would be possible to employ the person concerned in other educational environments. [113]

(c) In addition, there might be a constitutionally relevant legal interest in prohibiting religious expression by outer appearance or conduct not merely in a specific individual case, but for a certain amount of time in a more general way at certain schools or in certain school districts if, due to considerable situations of conflict regarding correct religious conduct in those schools or districts, the threshold of a sufficiently specific danger to the school peace or to state neutrality has been reached in a substantial amount of cases in a specific area. In this respect, the legislature may also take due account of such a situation preventively (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <306 and 307>) with area-specific solutions. In so doing, especially in large Laender, it must provide for differentiated solutions, for example limited in place and time, possibly with the aid of a sufficiently specific authorisation to issue regulations (Verordnungsermächtigung). Also in the case of such a regulation, in the interest of the fundamental rights of those concerned, it would have to be considered at first whether it would be possible to employ the person concerned in other educational environments. [114]

As long as the legislature has not established a more differentiated regime, a restriction on the freedom of faith of educational staff can only be an appropriate result of the balancing of the relevant constitutionally protected legal interests if it can be shown that there is at least a sufficiently specific danger to the neutrality of the state or to the peace at school. This is particularly true when considering that it is precisely the task of "interdenominational" ("bekenntnisoffen") schools to convey to pupils the idea of tolerance also with regard to other religions and ideologies, because school must be open to Christian, Muslim and other religious and ideological content and values. It must also be possible, in the interest of a balancing and effective exercise of fundamental rights at an interdenominational school, to lead a life according to this ideal. By logical extension, this also pertains to wearing clothes with a religious connotation, such as - apart from the headscarf - the Jewish kipah, the nun's habit, or symbols such as a cross worn visibly. [115]

4. Because of the weight of educational staff's freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief at interdenominational schools, a restrictive interpretation of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW in conformity with the Basic Law is needed, at least for the cases concerned here, insofar as that provision prohibits expressions of religious belief by outer appearance or conduct. For this purpose, the characterising feature of the ability to endanger or impair the peace at school or the state's neutrality must be restricted in that the expression of religious belief through outer appearance or conduct must represent not merely an abstract danger, but a sufficiently specific danger to the legally protected interests indicated in § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW. The existence of that specific danger must be proven and substantiated. In general, wearing an Islamic headscarf does not substantiate a sufficiently specific danger. Wearing such a head covering as such does not have the effect of promoting a belief, still less proselytising for one. Even if a majority of Muslim women do not wear an Islamic headscarf, this is not uncommon in Germany

(cf. Federal Office for Migration and Refugees <ed.>, Muslimisches Leben in Deutschland - im Auftrag der Deutschen Islam Konferenz, 2009, pp. 194 and 195; North Rhine-Westphalia Ministry of Labour, Integration and Social Affairs <ed.>, Muslimisches Leben in Nordrhein-Westfalen, 2010, p. 93). It is often reflected in everyday social life and within student bodies. Its being merely visually perceptible, as a consequence of the individual exercise of fundamental rights, must be accepted in the schools just as there is also generally no constitutional right to be spared from being exposed to other religious or ideological convictions. [116]

A restrictive interpretation of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW is possible and mandated by the Constitution. It serves to prevent voiding the law, and is therefore required from the point of view of preserving the legislation so far as possible. It respects the fact that the norm has other applications that diverge from the case at hand. These may involve verbal expressions, for example, or openly promotional conduct. In such cases, the prohibition may also have significance in an interpretation that even includes an abstract danger. It does not stand to oppose this restrictive interpretation that in the legislative history, the legislature contemplated a prohibition of wearing a headscarf as a typical application of the provision. The norm is merely accorded a less far-reaching application. [117]

5. These interpretive standards apply accordingly with regard to § 57 sec. 4 sentence 2 SchulG NW. The presupposed ability of outer conduct to give pupils and parents the impression that an educator advocates against human dignity, the principle of equal treatment under Art. 3 GG, fundamental freedoms or the free democratic order, can be affirmed in the case of outer appearance alone only if the presence of sufficiently specific grounds can be affirmed from the point of view of an objective observer. However, with respect to the guarantees of fundamental rights under Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG, it is wrong to assume that the mere wearing of an Islamic headscarf or another head covering indicating affiliation with a belief is in itself already conduct that would readily create the impression among pupils or parents, under § 57 sec. 4 sentence 2 SchulG NW, that the person wearing it advocates against human dignity, the principle of equal treatment under Art. 3 GG, fundamental freedoms or the free democratic basic order. This generalisation is impermissible. If wearing the headscarf, for example, appears as the expression of an individual clothing decision, tradition or identity (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <303 et seq.>), or identifies the wearer as a Muslim who complies strictly with the rules of her faith, particularly the requirement to cover herself which she perceives as imperative, this cannot be interpreted as a distancing from the constitutional principles mentioned in § 57 sec. 4 sentence 2 SchulG NW, unless further circumstances are present. Nor can it be assumed that those schools of Islam that require a headscarf to be worn to fulfil the requirement to cover oneself, but also consider this sufficient, are requiring, expecting or even merely hoping that believers will advocate against human dignity, the principle of equal treatment under Art. 3 GG, fundamental freedoms or the free and democratic basic order. [118]

6. The requirement of a restrictive reading of sentences 1 and 2 of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW also exists insofar as under § 58 sentence 2 SchulG NW they are to be applied accordingly to other educational staff, including socio-educational staff. Because other educational and socio-educational staff are comparable to teachers in everyday school life, and are comparably involved in the fulfilment of the state's educational mandate, no other interpretation can apply here. [119]

7. The challenged decisions of the regular courts, particularly of the Federal Labour Court, do not meet the requirements of the necessary restrictive interpretation in conformity with the Constitution; in their view, such an interpretation was not necessary. The legal assessment of the Federal Labour Court is based on the assumption that the ban on the expression of religious belief under § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW already applies in the case of an abstract danger. The assumption that even parents' "justified concern" about an undesirable religious influence on their children endangers the peace at school does not take due account of the educational staff's freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief at an interdenominational school. It neglects the weight of the educational staff's positive freedom of faith in connection with a plausibly explained imperative religious requirement to cover oneself. The findings to date, moreover, provide no indication that the complainants' appearance at their schools constitutes a sufficiently specific danger to the peace at school or the state's neutrality. [120]

In neither of the initial proceedings did the regular courts adopt a correct understanding of the legal provision, sufficiently taking into account the complainants' fundamental freedom of faith. Neither the findings of the labour courts in the proceedings on the facts nor the assessment in law by the Federal Labour Court reveal any circumstances that might illustrate a sufficiently specific danger to the legal interests protected by the norm. On the contrary, complainant II had even applied for her position with a photograph showing her in a headscarf. Her employment contract, initially for a fixed term, was later changed to a permanent position. By her account, which has not been contradicted, she always performed her work wearing a headscarf covering her hair, without this causing any objections. Under these circumstances, the warning notice upheld by the labour courts, and the dismissal of complainant II on the stated grounds, together with the underlying understanding of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW, are constitutionally untenable. In the initial proceedings for complainant I as well, there is not the slightest indication of how wearing a woollen hat and a polo-neck sweater could represent a sufficiently specific danger to the peace at school or the state's neutrality. [121]

Therefore, the challenged decisions infringe the complainants' fundamental right under Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG. [122]

III.

The further constitutional objection that the complainants raise against sentence 3 of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW is well-founded. The partial requirement under section 3 of the provision, which is intended by the legislature to confer a privilege on presenting Christian and occidental educational and cultural values or traditions, constitutes a disadvantaging on the grounds of faith and religious beliefs that is contrary to equal treatment (Art. 3 sec. 3 sentence 1, Art. 33 sec. 3 GG). This violation of the Constitution is reflected in the challenged decisions. It is true that these decisions are not based on sentence 3 of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW, because sentence 3 does not apply to the two Muslim complainants. However, it is precisely the exclusion from the privilege provided in sentence 3 that leads to the unconstitutional disadvantaging of the complainants by the very two decisions to be reviewed here too. If the complainants enjoyed this privilege, they would not have been exposed to the labour-law sanctions under § 57 sec. 4 sentences 1 and 2 SchulG NW. However, the provision under § 57 sec. 4 sentences 1 and 2 SchulG NW and the challenged decisions are not affected by this; § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW, in the interpretation in conformity with the Constitution adopted here, is not unconstitutional as a whole. [123]

1. § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW results in the disadvantaging of followers of religions other than the Christian and Jewish faiths that cannot be justified under constitutional law. [124]

a) Art. 3 sec. 3 sentence 1 GG requires that no one may be placed at a disadvantage or favoured because of his or her faith or religious views. The norm reinforces the general principle of equality under Art. 3 sec. 1 GG and the freedom of faith protected by Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG. [125]

Under Art. 33 sec. 3 sentence 2 GG, no public employee (Träger eines öffentlichen Amtes) may be placed at a disadvantage by reason of adherence or non-adherence to a particular religious denomination or ideological creed. The concept of public employment as used in Art. 33 sec. 3 GG must be understood in the same sense in which it is used in Art. 33 sec. 2 GG; it therefore also includes persons employed in the civil service who are not civil servants (cf. […]). The provision also includes a ban on disadvantaging in the civil service above and beyond the question of admission to public employment (cf. on this § 57 sec. 6 SchulG NW), which is addressed in sentence 1 of the provision. The provision forbids barring persons from admission to public employment on grounds that are incompatible with the freedom of faith protected in Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG (cf. BVerfGE 79, 69 <75>). This does not exclude establishing official duties that interfere with the freedom of faith of employees and applicants for civil service, and that thus impede or even exclude applicants who are adherents of a certain faith from having access to civil service. Any such duties, however, are subject to the strict justification requirements that apply for restrictions on the freedom of faith, which is guaranteed without reservation; moreover, the requirement of strict equal treatment of different faiths must be observed in both the establishment and the practice of enforcing such official duties (cf. BVerfGE 108, 282 <298>) [126]

b) According to the ideas that became apparent in course of the legislative process (cf. LTDrucks 13/4564, p. 8; 14/569, p. 9), the overall design of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW was meant to provide for an exemption, in sentence 3, from the prohibition on the expression of religious beliefs by outer appearance or conduct under sentence 1, and thereby to bring about direct unequal treatment on religious grounds. The complainants plausibly argue that the provision of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW is aimed at treating the head-covering of a Muslim woman, worn for religious reasons, differently than clothing with religious connotations worn by adherents of Christian faiths and of Judaism. This assessment is supported by the aforementioned background materials from the legislative process (see d below). [127]

c) This unequal treatment cannot be justified under constitutional law. If expressions of religious belief by the outer appearance or conduct of educational staff at school are to be prohibited, this must, as a general rule, be done without distinctions. [128]

There are no apparent nor sound reasons to justify disadvantaging those expressions of religious belief by outer appearance or conduct that cannot be traced back to Christian-occidental cultural values and traditions. If a certain outer appearance or conduct can have a particularly indoctrinating suggestive power, the ban in sentence 1 of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW in its constitutionally required restrictive interpretation readily takes that into account. If some legal scholars argue that an objective observer would perceive women wearing an Islamic headscarf as proponents of a far-reaching unequal treatment of men and women, including in the legal sphere, and that therefore this conduct would cast doubts on such a person's suitability to practise educational professions (cf., for example, Bertrams, Deutsches Verwaltungsblatt - DVBl 2003, pp. 1225 <1232 et seq.>; Hufen, Neue Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht - NVwZ 2004, p. 575 <576>; Kokott, Der Staat, 2005, pp. 343 <355 et seq.>; Rademacher, Das Kreuz mit dem Kopftuch, 2005, p. 24), such a general assumption is impermissible (see B. II. 5. above). In addition, such a purported justification must fail, as, under a generalising perspective, it can by no means provide a reason for treating all non-Christian-occidental cultural values and traditions differently. [129]

Likewise, there are no tenable justifications for favouring expressions relating to Christian or Jewish faith. The educational mandate of the state, as described in Art. 7 sec. 1 and Art. 12 sec. 3 of the North Rhine-Westphalian Constitution, cannot justify favouring office holders of a certain denomination when establishing official duties. Insofar as such provisions of the constitutions of the Laender may be interpreted to contain references to Christian values in the state school system, this should refer to secularised values of Christianity. Furthermore, under what is presumably the predominant interpretation, the educational objective stated in Art. 7 sec. 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalia Constitution ("respect for God") does not refer solely to the Christian faith; it must remain open to a personal understanding of God - and must therefore include not only a Christian one, but also the Islamic one, as well as polytheistic or impersonal concepts of God (cf. Ennuschat, in: Löwer/Tettinger, Kommentar zur Verfassung des Landes Nordrhein-Westfalen, 2002, Art. 7 para. 23 with further references, Art. 12 para. 22; Dästner, Die Verfassung des Landes Nordrhein-Westfalen, 2nd ed. 2002, Art. 7 para. 3; Söbbeke, in: Heusch/Schönenbroicher, Die Landesverfassung Nordrhein-Westfalen, 2010, Art. 12 para. 10; Häberle, in: Festschrift für Wolfgang Zeidler, vol. 1, 1987, p. 3 <14>). After all, the provisions of the Land Constitution referred to in § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW pertain primarily to the organisation of instruction and its general framework, but do not constitute a viable basis for a differentiated regulation of educational staff's official duties. For that reason, in this case it is not relevant that Art. 31 GG likewise sets limits on Land constitutions' restricting of the rights of religious equality guaranteed by the Basic Law (see also Art. 142 GG; BVerfGE 96, 345 <364 and 365>). [130]

d) It is not possible to interpret § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW restrictively in conformity with the Constitution in the way the Federal Labour Court has done in its decisions in order to avert an unconstitutional disadvantaging on religious grounds. This would overstep the limits of an interpretation of the law in conformity with the Constitution, and would be incompatible with the principle that the judiciary is bound by the law (Art. 20 sec. 3 GG). [131]

The limit to an interpretation in conformity with the Constitution is where contradiction with the wording and the clearly recognisable intent of the legislature arises. Respect for the democratically legitimated legislature forbids attributing an opposite sense to a law that is clear in its purpose and wording, or fundamentally redefining the normative content of a provision (cf. BVerfGE 90, 263 <274 and 275>; 119, 247 <274>; 128, 193 <209 et seq.>; 132, 99 <127 et seq.>). [132]

The Federal Labour Court has held that "presenting" ("Darstellung") Christian and occidental educational and cultural values in the sense of sentence 3 cannot be considered identical with "expressing" ("Bekundung") an individual faith in the sense of sentence 1. Furthermore, it held that the word "Christian" referred to a set of values dissociated from Christian beliefs stemming from the tradition of Christian-occidental culture and upon which the Basic Law was also evidently based and which laid claim to validity irrespective of its religious foundation. [133]

It is true that the difference in language between sentence 1 ("expressing") and sentence 3 ("presenting") offers a foothold for the interpretation reached by the Federal Labour Court. The Land legislature was also aware of a possible restrictive interpretation in this sense during the further course of the legislative project: even before the Landtag (state parliament) cast the final vote on the legislation, the Federal Administrative Court had already arrived at a similar interpretive result on a comparable Land legislative provision in Baden-Württemberg (§ 38 sec. 2 Baden-Württemberg Education Act, Baden-Württembergische Schulgesetz - SchulG BW) (cf. Decisions of the Federal Administrative Court, Entscheidungen des Bundesverwaltungsgerichts - BVerwGE 121, 140 <147, 150>). In a statement submitted to the Landtag, the North Rhine-Westphalian government argued at the time that the Federal Administrative Court's decision should not be understood to mean that there were doubts about the constitutionality of the draft act as a whole. The only question concerned the issue on how to interpret the provision in conformity with the Constitution (Landtag Bill - LT-Vorlage 14/463, p. 2). [134]

Nevertheless, just as in the drafting of the Act, the intention not to pass a law that would, for example, prohibit teachers from teaching in the habit of a religious order, or from wearing a Jewish kipah, was maintained in the further course of the legislative process (LTDrucks 14/569, p. 9). Consistent with that sense, the provision of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW expressly refers to the ban on "expression" in sentence 1 and is constructed, in terms of legislative technique, as an exception. This is further reinforced by the fact that while the wording of sentence 3 does indeed mention the educational mandate under the Land Constitution as a whole, it then exempts only the corresponding "presentation" of Christian and occidental educational and cultural values or traditions from the ban on conduct under sentence 1. Meanwhile, the openness to other religious and ideological convictions that is in addition expressly mentioned in the wording of Art. 12 sec. 3 sentence 1 of the North Rhine-Westphalian Constitution is disregarded and omitted. All this makes it clear that the restrictive interpretation of the provision reached by the Federal Labour Court factually redefines its normative content and thus also no longer coincides with the legislative intent that became clearly evident in the legislative process. This intention was not changed by the discussion of a possible different interpretation before the conclusion of the legislative process; that discussion merely shows that the Landtag was aware of the risk of the Act's incompatibility with constitutional law. [135]

Under the interpretation chosen by the Federal Labour Court, the provision of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW takes on a clarifying function at the most. In this interpretation, the presentation of Christian and occidental cultural values is something that is already inherently different from the outer expression of an individual religious view as prohibited in sentence 1. But if that interpretation were correct, there would have been no need for the exception stated in sentence 3 that such a presentation does not contradict the ban on conduct under sentence 1. The statutory establishment of the permissibility of such a mere "presentation" of instructional content dissociated from belief-related content does not fit systematically into the regulatory context of sentence 1. In the interpretation given by the Federal Labour Court, sentence 3 no longer appears to have any meaningful regulatory content within the given normative context. Irrespective of that aspect, this interpretation allows a provision to remain in force which, under a possible broad reading of its wording, could be understood as leaving an opening for discriminatory administrative practices, and whose vagueness in this regard was deliberately retained in the legislative process. [136]

But if the approach by the Federal Labour Court thereby fails to adhere to the limits of interpretation in conformity with the Constitution, then § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW appears to result in a disadvantaging on religious grounds that is contrary to the principle of equal treatment and therefore cannot be justified. [137]

2. Therefore, § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW is to be declared void due to its incompatibility with Art. 3 sec. 3 sentence 1 and Art. 33 sec. 3 GG. The challenged decisions are based on that provision (see III., preceding 1.). [138]

IV.

Under the interpretation that is required here by constitutional law, the provision of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW (in conjunction with § 58 sentence 2 SchulG NW where applicable), insofar as it concerns expressions of religious belief by outer appearance or conduct on the part of educational staff, does not violate other fundamental rights or other federal law (Art. 31 GG); in particular, it is compatible with the relevant terms of the General Equal Treatment Act (Allgemeines Gleichbehandlungsgesetz - AGG) and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). [139]

1. Provided the ban on expressing religious beliefs by outer appearance or conduct is interpreted as required in light of educational staff's freedom of faith and freedom to profess a belief, the provision indirectly under review (§ 57 sec. 4, § 58 sentence 2 SchulG NW) raises no further effective constitutional concerns. [140]

a) Other fundamental rights confer no further protection here than proceeds from Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG and from Art. 3 sec. 3 sentence 1 and Art. 33 sec. 3 GG. Even assuming that the freedom to choose an occupation (Art. 12 sec. 1 GG) might be affected in a specific case if a religious requirement perceived as imperative were concerned, the objectives pursued by the Land legislature by a ban that is limited to a sufficiently specific danger to the peace at school or state neutrality would still constitute particularly weighty community interests that would justify the ban (cf. BVerfGE 119, 59 <83>). [141]

b) Under the requisite restrictive interpretation, § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW does not violate the principle of equal treatment on grounds of gender. However, under the challenged interpretation of the Federal Labour Court, the provision would not have been compatible with the equal treatment requirement insofar as it would have affected the expression of religious beliefs by outer appearance or conduct as was the intention that determined the legislature's choice. [142]

Insofar as § 57 sec. 4 sentence 1 SchulG NW - in the challenged interpretation of the Federal Labour Court - already prohibits on duty educators in schools from expressing religious beliefs by outer appearance or conduct, irrespective of any specific danger, the provision disadvantages women, because it makes educational activity in the schools contingent on requirements that in fact quite predominantly cannot be met by women. Although it is true that the provision's wording is gender-neutral, the intended meaning of § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW is to exempt the wearing of clothing that corresponds to Christian and occidental educational and cultural values or tradition from the ban on expression. But on that basis, at present, the ban on expression, if it applies irrespective of any specific danger, affects men only in vanishingly small numbers, such as in the case of Sikhs wearing turbans. On that basis, in Germany, at present, the challenged provision de facto quite predominantly affects Muslim women who wear a headscarf for religious reasons. [143]

The Basic Law also offers protection against de facto disadvantaging on the grounds of gender (cf. BVerfGE 97, 35 <43>; 104, 373 <393>; 113, 1 <15>; 121, 241 <254-255>; 126, 29 <53>; 132, 72 <97 and 98, para. 57>). It is true that, as a rule, de facto disadvantaging may be justified. But with regard to the challenged provision in the interpretation also intended by the legislature (cf. LTDrucks 13/4564, p. 8; 14/569, p. 9; see, already, C. III. above), no adequate justifying reason is apparent here. In light of both the protection against de facto disadvantaging and the educational staff members' religious freedom (B. II. 3. d above), the reasons given for a ban on expression (B. II. 3. a above) offer no justification for such a ban that applies irrespective of any specific danger. Nor does the argument hold up that a ban on headscarves protects women against the discrimination that is already inherent in a religious requirement to cover oneself, because in fact this protection proves to place the persons concerned at a disadvantage (cf. BVerfGE 85, 191 <209>). Nor, again, can the disadvantaging be justified by the argument that the headscarf signals a rejection of the equal treatment of men and women, because this is neither automatically nor consistently the case (on this see B. II. 5. above). [144]

By contrast, insofar as under the required restrictive reading the norm does result in the de facto disadvantaging of women, this can be justified by the reasons that can also justify an interference with Art. 4 GG (B. II. 3. d bb 4 above). [145]

c) […] [146]

d) Under the interpretation constitutionally required here, § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW (in conjunction with § 58 sentence 2, where applicable), as a provision of Land law, is compatible with other federal law, and is therefore also not constitutionally objectionable from that point of view (Art. 31 GG; cf. BVerfGE 80, 137 <153>). There is thus no further violation of the complainants' fundamental rights in that respect. Under this interpretation, the provision is consistent both with Art. 9 and Art. 14 ECHR and with § 7 sec. 1 and § 8 sec. 1 AGG. [147]

aa) There is no violation of the rights guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights. [148]

(1) Within the German legal system, the European Convention on Human Rights and its Protocols - insofar as they have entered into force for the Federal Republic of Germany - have the rank of federal law (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 120, 180 <200>; 128, 326 <367>). This attribution of rank means that German courts must observe and apply the Convention just as other federal statutory law if such an interpretation is methodologically tenable. Furthermore - so far as is methodologically tenable - the European Convention on Human Rights must also be consulted as a guide to interpretation in interpreting the fundamental rights and principles of the rule of law under the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <315 et seq.>; 128, 326 <366 et seq.>; 131, 268 <295 and 296>; BVerfG, Order of the Second Senate of 22 October 2014 - 2 BvR 661/12 - juris, paras. 128 and 129). Statutes as well must be interpreted and applied in accordance with the obligations of international law under the Human Rights Convention (cf. BVerfGE 74, 358 <370>; 127, 132 <164>). However, in the German legal system, the guarantees under the European Convention on Human Rights and its Protocols do not constitute a directly applicable standard for constitutional review (cf. Art. 93 sec. 1 no. 4a GG, § 90 sec. 1 Federal Constitutional Court Act, Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG). Therefore, in a constitutional complaint to the Federal Constitutional Court, a complainant cannot directly assert a violation of human rights contained in the European Convention on Human Rights (cf. BVerfGE 74, 102 <128>; 74, 358 <370>; 82, 106 <120>; 111, 307 <317>). However, the situation is different if a constitutional complaint indirectly also challenges Land law. The Convention, since it ranks as federal law, takes precedence over Land law. It is therefore included in the standard of review by way of Art. 31 GG (cf. Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGK 10, 234 <239>). [149]

(2) The freedom of religion guaranteed under the Convention (Art. 9 ECHR) and the prohibition of discrimination (Art. 14 ECHR), as interpreted in the relevant case-law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), are evidently not violated. The ECtHR has allowed the Contracting States a considerable margin of appreciation in connection with rules on clothing for educational staff, particularly with regard to the prohibition of wearing an Islamic headscarf, in view of the principle of ideological and religious neutrality applicable in the particular country and the protection of third parties' negative freedom of religion, which the Court has held are part of maintaining public security and public order (Art. 9 sec. 2 ECHR) (cf. ECtHR, Dahlab v. Switzerland, decision of 15 February 2001, no. 42393/98, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift - NJW 2001, p. 2871 <2873>; ECtHR <Grand Chamber>, Sahin v. Turkey, judgment of 10 November 2005, no. 44774/98, NVwZ 2006, pp. 1389 <1392 et seq.>, § 107 et seq.; ECtHR, Kurtulmus v. Turkey, decision of 24 January 2006, no. 65500/01; on the limits of this margin of appreciation, see ECtHR, Eweida et al. v. UK, judgment of 15 January 2013, no. 48420/10 et al., NJW 2014, p.1935 <1940 para. 95>). The Court has also emphasised the Contracting States' margin of appreciation in respect to allowing a possible ban on "headscarf substitutes" ("Kopftuchsurrogate") to encompass what it calls attempts to evade the ban (cf. ECtHR, Aktas v. France, decision of 30 June 2009, no. 43563/08). [150]

A prohibition of religious symbols that is not specifically directed against adherence to a particular religion is also unobjectionable in the light of the ban on discrimination under Art. 14 ECHR, at least on those grounds that could also justify interfering with Art. 9 ECHR (cf. ECtHR <Grand Chamber>, Sahin v. Turkey, judgment of 10 November 2005, no. 44774/98, NVwZ 2006, p. 1389 <1396>, § 165). That is the case here, because the prohibition applies to all religious expressions equally, and goes far beyond those expressed through outer appearance or conduct, and in particular also includes verbal expressions. [151]

On the basis of this case-law of the Court of Human Rights, which must form the starting point for the assessment here (cf. BVerfGE 111, 307 <319>; 128, 326 <368 et seq.>), it must be found that the provisions of the Land Education Act underlying the challenged decisions, in the above-mentioned restrictive interpretation that is required by the Constitution, does not give rise to any further concerns proceeding from the European Convention on Human Rights. [152]

bb) […] [153-155]

2. The question of whether the Federal Labour Court, as the final regular court of appeal, deprived the complainants of their lawful judge (Art. 101 sec. 1 sentence 2 GG) by failing to request a preliminary ruling of the Court of Justice of the European Union under Art. 267 sec. 3 TFEU need not be addressed in any further detail. The decisions of the Federal Labour Court already prove to be incompatible with the Basic Law on other grounds. [156]

V.

Accordingly, § 57 sec. 4 sentence 3 SchulG NW is void because it is incompatible with Art. 3 sec. 3 and Art. 33 sec. 3 GG (§ 95 sec. 3 BVerfGG). The challenged decisions of the labour courts violate each of the complainants' fundamental right under Art. 4 secs. 1 and 2 GG. The decisions of the Higher Labour Courts and of the Federal Labour Court must be reversed. This Senate remands the matters to the relevant Higher Labour Courts (§ 95 sec. 2 BVerfGG). This allows the judges of fact to establish further facts which may then be newly assessed by the regular courts on the basis of an interpretation of § 57 sec. 4 SchulG NW in conformity with the Constitution. [157]

VI. Article 5 of the Basic Law
Freedom of Expression, the Media, Arts and Research

Some General Comments

Article 5 of the Basic Law protects free speech in a broad sense and does so by distinguishing several important aspects: The personal right to free speech and freedom of opinion, the freedom to inform oneself from any and all generally available sources (without, however, creating a freedom of information entitlement as in recent years has been enacted in many jurisdictions both in Germany and elsewhere under the administrative term "freedom of information"), the freedom and independence of the press as well as the freedom and institutional importance of broadcasting, including a special guarantee for public broadcasting to secure plurality of opinion and the freedom of the arts, and of research and teaching. The Constitutional Court has consistently emphasised that these communication freedoms are constituent elements for the liberal-democratic order laid down in the Basic Law[55].

1. Article 5.1, sentence 1 – Freedom of Expression ("Free Speech")

a) Lüth, BVerfGE 7, 198

Explanatory Annotation

The Lüth decision is one of the very fundamental decisions of the Constitutional Court, with great influence on the subsequent development of the freedom of communication in Germany. The decision has already been mentioned in the Introduction with an emphasis on the objective function of the fundamental rights in the Basic Law.[56]

Mr. Lüth had, in his capacity as a private citizen, publicly called for a boycott of a movie shown in German cinemas because of the movie director's past racist propaganda work for the Nazi regime. The production firm of the movie feared economic loss from this call to boycott the movie and sought and was granted an injunction on the basis of a norm in the Civil Code that prohibits the intentional and malicious infliction of economic loss on another individual. The term malicious, of course, requires interpretation and the Constitutional Court held that this interpretation would have to take into account the enormous significance of the free speech guarantee in Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. The Court regarded the dispute as a legitimate controversy and so long as this controversy was conducted by voicing opinions and the power of persuasion, as opposed to, for example, the use of a dominant market position or other means of extortion[57], it was protected by the free speech guarantee and the respective private law provisions invoked in this case had to be interpreted restrictively to comply with the Basic Law.

55 See for instance the decision of the Constitutional Court in the Lüth Case, BVerfGE 7, 198.

56 See Introduction, p. 86-87.

The development of this 'objective function' i.e. the obligation of the courts to interpret all norms of law in the light of the significance of the fundamental rights guarantees of the Basic Law, is obviously of vast significance. It pulled the fundamental rights of the Basic Law into the realm of any and all courts and enlisted them in their enforcement and it put this enforcement under the supervision of the Constitutional Court. This was important because the German legal system had evolved as a more positivist system with a tendency to "compartmentalize" the various fields of law into independent subsystems. Hence it was not a self-evident - and subsequently harshly criticized - notion that fundamental rights of the Basic Law should play a role in the construction of norms of the Civil Code or similar 'technical fields' such as civil procedure or the law of conflicts (private international law).[58] The long-standing common law tradition that the common law should be interpreted in such a way that individual rights are interfered with as little as possible had never found its way into the German civil law tradition. The establishment of just the permeating nature of fundamental rights throughout the entire legal order is one fundamental consequence of the Lüth decision.

The other, no less important consequence of the decision is the emphasis of the Constitutional Court of the paramount importance of the freedom of communication as protected by Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. As the decision was rendered in 1958 the Court in effect put the new Republic on the only possible track for a democracy - the free flow of ideas even if these ideas are disturbing or even offensive to some or perhaps even to the majority. The Court did this by construing the principle of proportionality in such a way that any limitations of the freedom of communication by governmental authority, which could in principle be possible under Article 5.2 of the Basic Law, would themselves have to be scrutinized in the light of the fundamental importance of the freedom of speech for a democratic society. This construction of limiting the scope of the possible limitation of a right by the scope of the right itself has been a blessing for free speech in Germany, albeit one of dogmatic impurity.

57 See the contrasting decision of the Constitutional Court in the Blinkfuer Case, BVerfGE 25, 256, available in German at http://www.servat.unibe.ch/dfr/bv025256.html. In this case a large publishing house had threatened its wholesale organization with a removal of its complete line of newspaper and magazines, among them leading national titles, if they continued to sell a tiny magazine ("Blinkfuer") that published the East-German television schedule.

58 See, for example, the decision of the Court in BVerfGE 31, 58, available in German at http://www.servat.unibe.ch/dfr/bv031058.html, where the Constitutional Court held that the provisions of the German private international law, the law of conflicts, had to measure up to fundamental rights guarantees, and that this might necessitate modifications if the foreign law to which the German conflict norms point for the resolution of a dispute are not in line with fundamental rights of the Basic Law. See also the decision of the Court concerning contracts of guarantee, BVerfGE89, 214, available in German at http://www.servat.unibe.ch/dfr/bv089214.html, where the Court held that fundamental rights of the Basic Law require the regular courts to engage in a content review of private contracts to protect weaker contracting parties from unfair disadvantage.

Translation of the Lüth Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 7, 198*

Headnotes:

1. Basic rights are primarily to protect the citizen against the state, but as enacted in the Constitution (Grundgesetz - GG) they also incorporate an objective scale of values which applies, as a matter of constitutional law, throughout the entire legal system.

2. The substance of the basic rights is expressed indirectly in the rules of private law, most evidently in its mandatory provisions, and is best effectuated by the judges' use of the general clauses.

3. Basic rights may be infringed by a judicial decision, which ignores the effect of basic rights on private law (s. 90 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act - BVerfGG)). Judicial decisions on private law are subject to review by the Constitutional Court, only in respect of such infringements of basic rights, not for errors of law in general.

4. Rules of private law may count as 'general laws' which may restrict the basic right of freedom of expression under Article 5.2 of the Basic Law.

5. Such 'general laws' must be interpreted in the light of the special significance in a free democratic state of the basic right to freedom of expression.

6. The basic right in Article 5 of the Basic Law protects not only the utterance of an opinion as such, but also the effect it has on others.

7. The expression of an opinion favouring a boycott does not necessarily infringe proper conduct (boni mores) under s. 826 of the Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetz-buch - BGB); depending on all the circumstances such an expression may be justified as a matter of constitutional law.

Judgment of the First Senate of 15 January 1958 - 1 BvR 400/51 -

Facts:

At the opening of 'German Film Week' on 20 September 1950 the complainant, then a Senator of the Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg and Head of the State Press Office, gave an address, in his capacity as President of the Hamburg Press Club, to an audience of film distributors and directors. He said, inter alia:

The person least likely to restore the claim to morality which the German film forfeited during the Third Reich is the man who directed 'Jud Süss' and wrote the script for it. If this very man is chosen to represent the German film industry, who can tell what harm we may suffer throughout the world? True he was acquitted in a formal sense in Hamburg, but substantially the judgment was a condemnation. We must call on the distributors and cinema owners to show character-not cheap, but worth the price. And I want the German film to show character as well. If it shows character in its imagination, visual daring and sterling craftsmanship, it will merit every assistance and achieve what it needs in order to survive: success with the public here in Germany and abroad.

Domnick-Film-Produktion GmbH immediately challenged the complainant to justify these charges against Veit Harlan, under whose direction and with whose screen-play they were making 'Unsterbliche Geliebte'.

On 27 October 1950 the complainant released an 'open letter' to the Press by way of reply which contained the following:

> The court did not gainsay the fact that for much of the Hitler régime Veit Harlan was the 'Nazi film-director no. 1' or that his film 'Jud Süss' showed him to be a committed exponent of the Nazis' murderous purge of the Jews. Some businessmen here and abroad may not be opposed to Veit Harlan's re-emergence, but the moral integrity of Germany must not be destroyed by hard-faced money-makers. Harlan's return can only reopen wounds barely healed, and resuscitate diminishing distrust fatal to German reconstruction. For all these reasons it is not only the right but the duty of all decent Germans to protest against, and even to boycott, this ignominious representative of the German film industry.

Domnick-Film-Produktion GmbH and Herzog-Film GmbH (the distributor of 'Unsterbliche Geliebte' in the Federal Republic), obtained an interlocutory injunction from the Landgericht Hamburg ... and the Oberlandesgericht dismissed the complainant's appeal. At the complainant's request the two film companies were required to bring suit within a certain time. They did so, and on 22 November 1951 the Landgericht Hamburg issued the following judgment:

> The defendant is ordered, on pain of fine or imprisonment as determined by the court, to refrain (1) from calling on theatre managers and film distributors not to programme the film 'Unsterbliche Geliebte' and (2) from calling on the German public not to go to see the film.

B. I.

The complaint is admissible since the preconditions for the application of s. 90.2 sentence 2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act are satisfied (decision before exhaustion of legal remedies).

II.

The complainant alleges that the Landgericht's judgment infringes his basic right to free expression of opinion as laid down in Article 5.1 sentence 1 Basic Law.

The judgment of the Landgericht, an act of the public power of judicature, could infringe the complainant's basic right by its content only if the court was bound to take account of the complainant's basic right.

By enjoining the complainant from making statements apt to lead others to endorse his views about Harlan's re-emergence and to follow him in discriminating against Harlan's films, the judgment clearly restricts the complainant's freedom of expression of opinion. The Landgericht granted the injunction as a matter of private law order on the basis that the complainant's statements were tortious under s. 826 of the Civil Code. Thus the public power has restricted the complainant's freedom of expression on the basis of the plaintiff's private law claim. This can constitute an infringement of the complainant's basic right under Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law only if the applicable rules of private law are so substantially affected that they can no longer support the judgment.

The question whether basic rights affect private law, and if so in what manner, is much debated. The extreme positions are, on the one hand, that basic rights constrain only the state, and, on the other, that basic rights (or at any rate the most important of them) prevail against everyone in private legal relations. Previous decisions of this Court support neither of these extreme positions, the conclusions drawn by the Federal Labour court in its decision of 10 May 1957 (NJW 1957, 1688) from our decisions of 17 and 23 January 1957 (BVerfGE 6, 55 and 6, 84) being unwarranted. Nor is it necessary today to deal with all aspects of the debated question of the 'effect on third parties' (Drittwirkung) of basic rights. The matter can be properly resolved by the following considerations:

1. There is no doubt that the main purpose of basic rights is to protect the individual's sphere of freedom against encroachment by public power: they are the citizen's bulwark against the state. This emerges from both their development as a matter of intellectual history and their adoption into the constitutions of the various states as a matter of political history: it is true also of the basic rights in the Basic Law, which emphasizes the priority of human dignity against the power of the state by placing the section on basic rights at its head and by providing that the constitutional complaint (Verfassungsbeschwerde), the special legal device for vindicating these rights, lies only in respect of acts of the public power.

But far from being a value-free system the Constitution erects an objective system of values in its section on basic rights, and thus expresses and reinforces the validity of the basic rights. This system of values, centring on the freedom of the human being to develop in society, must apply as a constitutional axiom throughout the whole legal system: it must direct and inform legislation, administration, and judicial decision. It naturally influences private law as well; no rule of private law may conflict with it, and all such rules must be construed in accordance with its spirit.

The legal content of basic rights as objective norms informs private law by means of the rules which directly control this area of law. Just as new rules must conform to the value-system of the basic rights so existing and older rules receive from it a definite constitutional content which thereafter determines their construction. From the point of view of substantive and procedural law a dispute between private citizens on the rights and duties that arise from rules of conduct thus influenced by the basic rights remains a dispute of private law. It is private law which is interpreted and applied even if its interpreters must follow the public law of the constitution.

The influence of the value-system of the basic rights is clearest in those rules of private law which are mandatory (zwingendes Recht) and form part of ordre public in the wide sense, i.e. those rules which in the public interest apply to private legal relations whether the parties so choose or not. Such provisions, being functionally related and complementary to public law, are especially exposed to the influence of constitutional law. 'General clauses', such as s. 826 of the Civil Code, by which human conduct is measured against extralegal standards such as 'proper conduct' (gute Sitten), allow the courts to respond to this influence since in deciding what is required in a particular case by such social commands, they must start from the value-system adopted by the society in its constitution at that stage of its cultural and spiritual development. The general clauses have thus been rightly described as 'points of entry' for basic rights into private law.

The judge is constitutionally bound to ascertain whether the applicable rules of substantive private law have been influenced by basic rights in the manner described; if so, he must construe and apply the rules as so modified. This is what is meant by saying that the civil judge is bound by the basic rights (Article 1.3 Basic Law). If he issues a judgment which ignores this constitutional influence on the rules of private law, he contravenes not only objective constitutional law by misconceiving the content of the objective norm underlying the basic law, but also, by his judgment, in his capacity as a public official, contravenes the Constitution itself, which the citizen is constitutionally entitled to have respected by the judiciary. Quite apart from any remedies he may have to correct this error in the courts of private law, the citizen can invoke the Federal Constitutional Court by means of a Verfas-sungsbeschwerde.

The Constitutional Court must determine whether the reach and effect of the basic rights in private law has been correctly ascertained by the regular courts. But this is also the limit of its investigation: it is not for the Constitutional Court to check judgments of civil courts for errors of law in general; the Constitutional Court simply judges of the 'radiant effect' of the basic rights on private law and implements the values inherent in the precept of constitutional law. The function of the Verfassungsbeschwerde is to test all acts, whether of the legislature, the executive or the judiciary, for 'compatibility with the Constitution' (s. 90 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act - BVerfGG). The Federal Constitutional Court is certainly not to act as a court of review, much less over-review, for the civil courts, but neither may it abjure consideration of such judgments entirely or leave uncorrected any instance which comes to its notice of the misapplication of the rules of basic rights.

2. The basic right to freedom of expression of opinion (Article 5 of the Basic Law) seems to pose special problems with regard to the relationship between basic rights and private law. As in the Weimar Constitution (Article 118), this right is constitutionally guaranteed only within the limits of 'general laws' (Article 5.2 of the Basic Law). Before inquiring what laws are 'general laws' in this sense, one might suppose that the constitution's reference to such laws must be to such laws as judicially construed, with the result that no judicial construction of such a law which limited the basic right could be regarded as a 'breach' of the basic right.

This is not, however, the sense of the reference to 'general laws'. The basic right to freedom of expression, the most immediate aspect of the human personality in society, is one of the most precious rights of man (Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen (1789) Article 11). It is absolutely essential to a free and democratic state, for it alone permits that constant spiritual interaction, the conflict of opinion, which is its vital element (BVerfGE 5, 85 [205]). In a certain sense it is the basis of freedom itself, 'the matrix, the indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom' (Cardozo).

Given this fundamental importance for the free democratic state of freedom of expression of opinion, it would be illogical for a constitution to make its actual scope contingent on mere statute (and thus necessarily on the holdings of courts construing it). What was said earlier about the relationship between basic rights and private law applies here also: general laws which have the effect of limiting a basic right must be read in the light of its significance and always be construed so as to preserve the special value of this right, with, in a free democracy, a presumption in favour of freedom of speech in all areas, and especially in public life. We must not see the relationship between basic right and 'general laws' as one in which 'general laws' by their terms set limits to the basic right, but rather that relationship must be construed in the light of the special significance of this basic right in a free democratic state, so that the limiting effect of 'general laws' on the basic right is itself limited.

In its function as ultimate guardian of the basic rights through the medium of the Verfas-sungsbeschwerde, the Federal Constitutional Court must therefore have the power to supervise the decisions of courts whose application of a general law in this area may unduly restrict the scope of the basic right in the individual case. This Court must be competent to uphold as against all organs of public power, including the civil courts, the special value it represents for a free democracy, and thus to reconcile, as required by constitutional law, the conflicting restrictive tendencies of the basic right and the 'general laws'.

3. The concept of general law has always been controversial. Leaving on one side the question whether the concept may not be due to an error in the drafting of Article 118 of the 1919 Constitution, we may note that it was then construed to include all which 'do not forbid an opinion as such and do not envisage the expression of opinion as such', but rather 'serve to protect a legal interest which deserves protection without regard to any particular opinion', and protect 'a community value superior to the activity of freedom of opinion'. Exponents of the Grundgesetz agree with this ('laws which do not inhibit the purely intellectual effect of a mere expression of opinion').

If the term 'general laws' is so understood, we may state the protection of the basic right as follows:

> It is unacceptable to hold that the Constitution protects only the expression of opinion, and not its inherent or intended effect on others, for the whole point of an expression of opinion is to have 'an effect on the environment of ideas'. Thus value-judgments, which always have an intellectual aim, namely to persuade others, are protected by Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law; indeed it is the stance of the speaker as expressed in the value-judgment by which he hopes to affect others which is principally protected by this basic right. To protect the expression and not to protect its effect would be a nonsense.

In this sense the expression of opinion is free in so far as its effect on the mind is concerned; but that does not mean that one is entitled, just because one is expressing an opinion, to prejudice interests of another which deserve protection against freedom of opinion. There has to be a 'balance of interests'; the right to express an opinion must yield if its exercise infringes interests of another which have a superior claim to protection. Whether such an interest exists in a particular case depends on all the circumstances.

4. From this point of view the rules of private law may perfectly well be ranked as 'general laws' in the sense of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law. If this has not been done by commentators hitherto, that is simply because basic rights have been considered good only as against the state, so it was natural to consider as 'general laws' having limiting effect only those laws which regulated state activity vis-à-vis the individual, that is, laws of a public law nature. But if the basic right to free expression of opinion affects relations of private law as well and favours free expression of opinion against the fellow citizen also, then rules of private law which operate to protect superior legal interests must also be taken into account as possibly limiting the basic right. After all, if provisions of criminal law designed to protect honour or other essential aspects of human personality can set limits to the exercise of the fundamental right to freedom of expression, it is not obvious why similar provisions of private law should not equally do so.

Explanatory Annotation

This decision is a reminder of the absurdities that happened during the "cold war" period, when the Soviet Union led communist block and the democratic western states were pitted against each other, among them former West-Germany and former communist East-Germany. At issue was the confiscation of East-German communist newspapers that some people had subscribed to by mail on the basis that this was qualified as abetting the activities of the prohibited Communist Party in West-Germany.[59] The Court, in one of its weaker moments, allowed these confiscations insofar as they could be qualified as abetting a prohibited political party, namely the Communist Party of Germany. However, it did so only because it went on to argue that the confiscation of the East-German newspaper in question violated another element of the freedom of communication clause of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law, the freedom of information.

59 The prohibition of political parties in Germany is possible under Article 21.2 of the Basic Law: "Parties that, by reason of their aims or the behavior of their adherents, seek to undermine or abolish the free democratic basic order or to endanger the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany shall be unconstitutional. The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule on the question of unconstitutionality." Only the Constitutional Court can declare a political party unconstitutional and it has only done so twice in the history of the Republic. The first decision in 1952 declared unconstitutional a successor party to the National-Socialist German Workers Party (so-called 'Nazis') of Adolf Hitler, the "Socialist Reich Party (SRP)", see BVerfGE 2, 1 and the second case pertained to one of the several communist parties in then West-Germany, the Communist Party of Germany (KPD). In order to be declared unconstitutional political parties must pursue the political goal of removing the democratic and rights based order in Germany and (sic!) they must be shown to be willing to pursue this goal with violence. It is not sufficient for a declaration of unconstitutionality to merely demand amendments of the Basic Law, as long as those amendments are legally possible, i.e. not prohibited by the eternity clause of Article 79.3. It is also not sufficient for such a declaration if the party calls for the abolition of the Basic Law but restricts itself to peaceful means. This approach to the legality and possible prohibition of political parties is shared by the European Court of Human Rights, see ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Applications nos. 41340/98, 41342/98, 41343/98 and 41344/98, 13/2/2003, Refah Partisi (The Welfare Party)/Turkey (available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-60936 (last accessed on 21.10.2019)).

The Court held that the freedom of information guarantees the right to receive information from any source generally available. What is generally available cannot be determined by legislation regulating the legality of this or that lest the freedom of information were rendered ineffective. Even the fact that the information source in question might, in another context be qualified as a violation of criminal norms, i.e. abetting prohibited political parties, does not mean that the freedom of information must step back because just wanting to read a paper cannot be qualified as such a criminal act.

The broader significance of this decision lies in its construction of the freedom of information and this interpretation is still valid today. It should be noted that the freedom of information under Article 5.1 of the Basic Law cannot be understood in the same way as many freedom of information statutes in various countries. These "FOI-statutes" usually grant an entitlement to be granted access to certain information, e.g. documents etc. on request and subject to defined exceptions. The freedom of information of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law is limited to information that is publicly available and constitutes a defence right against government action restricting access to such generally available information. It is not a positive right for access to information that is not generally available and it does not entitle individuals to demand that such information to be made available to them.[60]

Headnotes:

1. The right of citizens to inform themselves from generally accessible sources without hindrance that is guaranteed under Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Grundge-setz - GG) (freedom of information) is an independent fundamental right that enjoys status equivalent to that of freedom of expression and freedom of the press.

2. A source of information is generally accessible if it is technically suitable for and intended to provide the general public with information. It does not lose this character through legal measures intended to prevent distribution.

3. Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law protects not only the act of procurement of information, but just as much so the actual receipt of such information.

60 Whether this interpretation of the freedom of interpretation of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law needs to change is controversial. See Jürgen Bröhmer, Transparenz als Verfassungsprinzip - Grundgesetz und Europäische Union, 2004. Freedom of information legislation granting access to information and regulating this access and possible exceptions was passed on the federal level in 2005, see Gesetz zur Regelung des Zugangs zu Informationen des Bundes (Informationsfreiheitsgesetz) of 5/9/2005, Official Gazette (BGBl.), Part I, p. 2722, German version available at http://bundesrecht.juris.de/ifg/. This federal legislation had been preceded by legislation in some of the Länder. There are also statutes regulating access to environmental information. 4. Decision on the balance of interests between freedom of information and those provisions of criminal law constituting general laws which are intended to ward off threats to the constitutional order within the meaning of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law in the case of confiscation.

Order of the First Senate of 3 October 1969 - 1 BvR 46/65 -

Facts:

Pursuant to the Act to Monitor Criminal and Other Transportation Prohibitions (Gesetz zur Überwachung strafrechtlicher und anderer Verbringungsverbote - GÜV) of 24 May 1962 Federal Law Gazette (Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.) I, p. 607, the postal and customs authorities were charged with ensuring that materials - such as, among other things, newspapers and magazines - are not brought into the territorial sphere of operation of this Act if importation or distribution is prohibited for reasons of national security. In 1964, the complainant had daily newspapers, including a copy of the 8 May 1964 edition of the "Leipziger Volkszei-tung" in one parcel, mailed to him in Münster; Westphalia from the GDR (Deutsche Demokratische Republik - DDR) by acquaintances for information purposes. The complainant did not receive this newspaper since the Lüneburg Regional Court (Landgericht) had ordered that this edition of the "Leipziger Volkszeitung" be withdrawn from general circulation, due, among other things, to perpetration of various violations of national security (ss. 90a, 94 and 97 of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB), and it was then confiscated by the customs authorities. The Regional Court grounded its decision in the fact that the publication originated from the Socialist Unity Party of Germany (Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands - SED) - in the GDR. The Court reasoned that the parcel was sent for the purposes of supporting the efforts of the Communist Party of Germany (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands - KPD), which was controlled by the Socialist Unity Party and whose activities were illegal, to introduce the rule of force and arbitrariness prevailing in the GDR to the Federal Republic.

The complainant's constitutional complaint directly challenging the order of the Lüneburg Regional Court issued in the objective proceedings was successful.

Extract from the Grounds:

C. I.

The constitutional complaint is founded.

1. The Regional Court did not explicitly take into account the freedom of expression and the freedom of the press of the publishers and distributors of the newspaper that was confiscated when it found that publication and distribution of that newspaper violated the provisions of law mentioned in the operative part of the order and when it ordered confiscation of the newspaper. There can be no objection to this on constitutional grounds. Although the order does not make it possible to discern which of the various commentaries in the newspaper article were considered to be in violation of the Basic Law, it can be inferred from the context of the grounds that the Regional Court assumed that the purpose of the publication and distribution of the newspaper was to support the efforts of the Communist Party of Germany, which was controlled by the Socialist Unity Party and whose activities were illegal, in violation of ss. 42 and 47 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) and ss. 128, 94 and 90a of the Criminal Code. In the presence of any such direct support for the organizational cohesion of the prohibited Communist Party of Germany, restriction of freedom of expression and freedom of the press is permissible due to the encouragement of the organization and there can in that regard be no objection on constitutional grounds to application of the provisions of criminal law (see BVerfGE 25, 44 [55 et seq]).

There could also be no objection if the Regional Court had at the same time based its order on s. 97 of the Criminal Code (defamation of governmental institutions) only in the grounds, but not in the operative part. Despite all permissible acerbity in the struggle for public opinion, the nature of an attack can, however, trigger effects that may no longer be tolerated (see also BVerfGE 4, 352 [355 et seq.] on the constitutionality of s. 187a of the Criminal Code [protection of politicians against defamation]).

2. However, when ordering confiscation the Regional Court did not take into account the influence exerted by the right of recipients or readers of the newspaper to inform themselves from generally accessible sources without hindrance that is guaranteed under Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (freedom of information). The decision to confiscate the newspaper under criminal law encroaches upon this fundamental right in that it hinders access to newspapers, which represent one of the most important sources of information.

When the Eighth Criminal Law Amendment Act (Strafrechtsänderungsgesetz) was being drafted, the various parties who took the position that making it difficult to obtain newspapers from the GDR did not interfere with the fundamental rights of citizens of the Federal Republic See the comments of the Member of the Bundestag Dr. Gradl, Stenographic Record of the 177th session of the Bundestag of 29 May 1968, p. 9527, and the Members of the Bundestag Dr. Güde and Dr. Schwarzhaupt at the 85th session of the Special Committee of the Bundestag for the Criminal Law Reform of 8 November 1967, Minutes pp. 1698 and 1701) (see the comments of the Member of the Bundestag Dr. Gradl, Stenographic Record of the 177th session of the Bundestag of 29 May 1968, p. 9527, and the Members of the Bundestag Dr. Güde and Dr. Schwarzhaupt at the 85th session of the Special Committee of the Bundestag for the Criminal Law Reform of 8 November 1967, Minutes pp. 1698 and 1701) failed to recognize that access to newspapers involves a two-way communication process that enjoys constitutional protection not only because of the freedom to express and disseminate opinions, also because of the freedom of information. For that reason, encroachment upon the process of communication affects both areas.

The provisions of criminal law (ss. 86 and 98.2 of the Criminal Code) cited as the basis for the decision of the Regional Court do not provide for compulsory confiscation, but leave this to the discretion of the court. As provisions of general laws that restrict the fundamental right within the meaning of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law, they must pursuant to the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court be viewed in the light of the importance of the fundamental right of freedom of information and construed in such a manner as to guarantee that the special value embodied in that fundamental right is always preserved (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208 et seq.]; 25, 44 [55]). In exercising its discretion, the Regional Court should have sought to achieve a balance between interests protected by the fundamental right of freedom of information and the interests protected by the provisions of criminal law. This requires that the content and reach of the fundamental right first be defined more precisely.

II.

1. Prior to the year 1945, there had been no independent fundamental right in German constitutional history that enabled citizens to inform themselves from generally accessible sources without hindrance. This freedom of information initially found its way into the constitutions of various Länder (see, for example, Article 11 of the Constitution of the former Land of Württemberg-Baden of 28 November 1946; Article 13 of the Hessian Constitution of 1 December 1946) Article 112.2 of the Bavarian Constitution of 2 December 1946 after World War II and thereafter into the Basic Law. The reason for the independent constitutional guarantee of freedom of information in the Basic Law lay in the experience with restrictions on information that were common practice under the National Socialist regime, which included governmental control of opinion, governmental prohibition of reception of foreign radio broadcasts and bans on literature and art.

2. a) The status of freedom of information in the constitutional order is equivalent to that of freedom of expression and freedom of the press. It is not merely an integral part of the right to express and disseminate opinions. This right does to be sure also encompass protection of the reception of opinions by others; this protection is, however, afforded exclusively the persons expressing opinions by virtue of their freedom of expression. The recipient plays only a passive role in that regard. Freedom of information, by contrast, is the actual right to inform oneself. On the other hand, this freedom is a prerequisite to the formation of opinion, which precedes expression of opinion. Because only through comprehensive information, which is made possible by the availability of adequate sources of information, can individuals and society freely form and express opinions. Finally, a free press makes it easier for citizens to form opinions and make political decision by providing comprehensive information (BVerfGE 20, 162 [174]).

Accordingly, the nature of the freedom of information guaranteed under Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is defined by two elements. The one is the reference to the principle of democracy contained in Article 20.1 of the Basic Law: A democratic state cannot exist without free public opinion and a public that is as well-formed as possible. In addition, freedom of information involves a personal element that derives from Article 1 and Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. The ability to inform themselves from as many sources as possible, to widen their knowledge and to thereby develop their personalities is one of the most basic needs of human beings. Additionally, the possession of information is of significant importance for the social standing of the individual in modern industrial society. The fundamental right of freedom of information is, like the fundamental right of free expression of opinion, one of the most important prerequisites for a free democracy (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208]). It is only by virtue of this right that citizens are able to acquire on their own the necessary prerequisites for the exercise of their personal and political duties in order to be able to act responsibly in a manner conducive to democracy. As they become better informed, citizens recognize interactions in politics and their importance for their existence and can draw consequences; their freedom to share responsibility and voice criticism grows. Not of least importance is the fact that information can enable the individual to become familiar with the opinions of others, weigh them against one another, and thereby eliminate prejudices and develop an understanding for those with other views.

Special importance is also assigned to freedom of information at the international level, which is reflected in international efforts made since 1945 to secure this freedom as an independent right. Following the Resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations of 14 December 1946, which embodied an understanding of freedom of information in a broad sense that even included freedom of expression, the General Assembly of the UN enshrined the principle in Article 19 of the General Declaration of Human Rights of 10 December 1948:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 10.1 sentences 1 and 2 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 4 November 1950 is similarly worded:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers.

b) Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law protects not only the act of procuring information, but just as much so the actual receipt of information. The Basic Law is intended to ensure that the individual is able to inform himself to the greatest extent possible. It is also possible for individuals to be "informed" by sources that find their way into their sphere of cognizance without any active intervention on their part. For only through possession of information is it possible to make an independent choice. This aspect of being able to make such a choice is a fundamental element of any act of acquiring information. If freedom of information did not guarantee that sources of information are made available to individuals in the first place, that would also prevent them from actively making a choice. The act of "informing oneself" therefore also includes the purely intellectual process of acquiring information. An individual is already "informing himself" in this manner when information is being brought to him by mail. If such access is interrupted, subsequent reliance on freedom of information cannot be refuted by arguing that the printed matter was never received and that there was for that reason no interference with the freedom "to inform oneself." That the desire to inform one-self may not manifest itself until after receipt of the matter sent by mail lies in the nature of this right.

c) Freedom of information is constitutionally guaranteed only if the source of information is generally accessible.

This will regularly be the case if the source of information is technically suitable for and intended to provide the general public, i.e., a class of persons that is not specifically defined, with information. Newspapers and other means of mass communication are therefore by their very nature generally accessible sources of information. They also do not lose that characteristic of being generally accessible sources even if the possibility of general access is impaired by governmental measures such as confiscation and prohibition or regulation of importation. Such restriction of unhindered access to a source of information does not negate its general accessibility (see also Herzog in MaunzDürigHerzog, Kommentar zum Grundgesetz, Article 5 marginal notes 89 et seq.; Lerche, entry under "Informationsfreiheit" ["Freedom of information"] in Evangelisches Staatslexikon, 1966, column 785 [786]).

The actual nature of dissemination is the sole criterion, not any governmental provision or order.

The view to the effect that general accessibility may be significantly influenced by acts of government (Hamann, Das Grundgesetz, 2nd ed., 1961, note B 5 on Article 5; Dürig, AöR, vol. 81, p. 117 [139]; see also Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks] IV/2476 p. 34 and Bundestag document V/1319 p. 75) runs counter to the purpose of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of information. It must be possible for individuals to form opinions on the basis of a broad spectrum of informational materials. The choice of such materials may not be subject to governmental influence. Since freedom of information is by virtue of its association with the principle of democracy also specifically intended to permit preparation for the formation of judgments as regards the policies of one's own governmental institutions, the fundamental right must enjoy extensive protection against restriction by those institutions.

The historical development, which is particularly important due to the recent nature of the fundamental right to freedom of information, also shows that general accessibility must be gauged exclusively against objective criteria. Freedom of information was specifically guaranteed under the Basic Law in reaction to the National Socialist bans and restrictions on information in order to ensure that individuals are also able to inform themselves from sources lying outside the territorial jurisdiction of the governmental powers of the Federal Republic. If a source of information is generally accessible at some place, be it even outside the Federal Republic, then even a legally enforceable confiscation order cannot deprive this source of information of its characteristic of general accessibility.

The structure of Article 5 of the Basic Law leads to the same conclusion. The "general laws" restriction in Article 5.2 of the Basic Law refers to all fundamental rights set forth in s. 1. The restriction contained in s. 2 would, however, be largely devoid of meaning in respect of freedom of information if the government could define general accessibility and thereby arbitrarily limit the scope of the fundamental right.

A generally accessible source also does not lose this characteristic if it constitutes the content of a postal item. In addressing the question as to general accessibility, not a single copy, but the entire circulation of a publication is what counts. That is what constitutes the source within the meaning of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Procurement of a single copy is only a concrete manifestation of the freedom to inform oneself.

III.

1. Accordingly, no. 126 of the "Leipziger Volkszeitung" of 8 May 1964, which was the issue affected by the confiscation order of the Regional Court, must be considered a generally accessible source within the meaning of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Confiscation therefore restricted the freedom of information of the complainant. The confiscation order must be lifted since the Regional Court did not take into account the influence exerted by the freedom of information.

2. The Regional Court must seek a balance on the basis of the meaning of freedom of information set forth here and in so doing take into account in particular the following:

a) Although there can be no objection on constitutional grounds to the assumption that a publication to be confiscated violates provisions of criminal law, this does not in itself mean that the right to information must be subordinated. The balance of interests between freedom of expression and freedom of the press of the publisher and distributor of a publication and the legal interests protected by the provisions of criminal law involves an active undertaking that engenders dangers. On the other hand, freedom of information does not become operative in the case of such publications until general access to information has already been provided. The fundamental right of citizens desirous of informing themselves requires a special balance of interests. Only dangers resulting from the information process can justify restriction of the individual, who, seen from the perspective of the Basic Law, has the right to his opinion and is called upon to take part in the public decision-making process.

3. The very complaint of a violation of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law requires reversal of the challenged decision due to deficiencies in the application of substantive law governing confiscation. In addition, Article 2.1 of the Basic Law does not come into question as a standard of review (see BVerfGE 11, 234 [238]).

It need not be decided here whether the fundamental right to freedom of information requires a specific procedural form, for example, provision of further legal remedies against decisions to make confiscation orders, the possibility of new proceedings or more extensive consultation of the affected party in the confiscation proceedings than is to be inferred from the relevant provisions of law (s. 431.2 of the Criminal Procedure Code old version - now ss. 440 and 431 of the Criminal Procedure Code in the version of Article 2 no. 16 of the Introductory Act to the Regulatory Offences Act (Einführungsgesetz zum Gesetz über Ordnungswidrigkeiten - EGOWiG) according to prevailing opinion.

c) Soldiers - Murderers, BVerfGE 93, 266

Explanatory Annotation

This decision of the Constitutional Court is certainly one of the more controversial ones and was subject to heated debates. At issue were a number of cases, joined together in this decision, were the various applicants in expression of their pacifist conviction in various public settings had referred to soldiers in general and German soldiers in particular as "murderers" or "potential murderers". The German translation for "murderer" ("Mörder") is also used to describe the person who commits one of the most serious crimes of the German Criminal Code.[61] Active soldiers confronted with this label had brought criminal action against the perpetrators under s. 185 of the German Criminal Code under which insulting another person is punishable. The regular criminal courts had held that the description of another person as a "murderer" and hence a heinous criminal constitutes such an insult and fines had been ordered.

The Court argued very carefully and acknowledged that a person could well feel insulted if referred to as a murderer. However, the Court also emphasized the quintessential importance of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law and therefore deemed it necessary in the light of the significance of free speech to scrutinize what was said to see if it could not be understood in a different manner. The fact that in all incidents soldiers in general were dealt with under the epithet and German soldiers were only included in this amorphous larger group would also have to lessen the potential for insult in one individual soldier. As a result the Court quashed all regular court decisions as unconstitutional in the light of the freedom of speech protected in Article 5.1 of the Basic Law.

The decision was met with harsh criticism, even alleging that, insofar as foreign soldiers were referred to as murderers the decision violated public international law. The balance between free speech and the protection of personality rights such as personal honour and integrity is of course a problem, which has kept many constitutional and other courts busy and has given rise to many controversies. That the Constitutional Court decided correctly can be illustrated by a simple test. Pacifist convictions have been around for centuries and are based on the belief that killing other human beings is morally wrong and not justifiable even in case of war and even if the war is one fought in self-defence. A non-justifiable killing is always tantamount to a serious crime. If that assumption is correct, a pacifist could never voice his opinion without being in danger of accusing someone of being a criminal. Free speech must prevail under such circumstances because curtailing such a fundamental debate is not acceptable under a liberal free speech clause.

61 See s. 211 of the German Criminal Code: "(1) Whosoever commits murder under the conditions of this provision shall be liable to imprisonment for life. (2) A murderer under this provision is any person who kills a person for pleasure, for sexual gratification, out of greed or otherwise base motives, by stealth or cruelly or by means that pose a danger to the public or in order to facilitate or to cover up another offence", see http://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/englisch_stgb/index.html (in this translation 's.' are referred to as 'sections').

Translation of the Soldiers - Murderers Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 93, 266*

Judgment of 10 October 1995 -1 BvR 1476, 1980/91 and 102,221/92 -

Facts:

These constitutional complaints are about criminal court convictions for "insult" in the sense of the Criminal Code of the Federal Army and individual soldiers by statements like "Soldiers are murderers" or "Soldiers are potential murderers". The first complainant (1 BvR 1476/91) displayed a blanket with the words (in English) "A SOLDIER IS A MURDERER" written on it in red at a cross roads where NATO manoeuvres were taking place.

The second complainant (Case 1 BvR 1980/91) distributed a leaflet written by him at an exhibition by the Federal Army at a college in his hometown. It stated as follows: "Are soldiers potential murderers? One thing is clear: Soldiers are trained to be murderers. "Thou shall not kill" is changed to "Thou shall kill". World wide. And in the Federal Army too. Mass extermination, murder, destruction, brutality, torture, mercilessness, terror, threats, inhumanity, revenge, retaliation practiced in peace, perfected in war.

That is the trade of soldiers. World wide. And in the Federal Army too. If soldiers carry out "their duty", give commands and obey commands, then civilians are in for it. Militarism kills, even without weapons and even without war. There is only one answer to this: For peace, disarmament and humanity - refuse military service! Resistance against militarism!" A soldier R, and the Federal Defence Minister, started criminal proceedings in respect of this.

The Amtsgericht fined the complainant for insult of soldiers and the Federal Army. An appeal and a further appeal in law against this were unsuccessful. The third complainant (Case 1 BvR 102/92) wrote a letter, which was published in a newspaper after Dr. A was acquitted in the "Frankfurt soldiers trial". The letter repeated the "soldiers-are-murderers" quote from Kurt Tucholsky in 1931. The third complainant then argued that a decision in favour of military defence and an army always includes readiness for war and for mass murder legitimated by the state. He concluded with a declaration of complete solidarity with Dr. A and stated "All soldiers are potential murderers!". The Amtsgericht and the Landgericht fined the third complainant in several criminal prosecutions by members of the Federal Army, for insult of every member of the Federal Army (and therefore of the prosecutors). The Oberlandesgericht rejected his appeal in law. The fourth complainant (Case 1 BvR 221/92) appeared with five other people at a Federal Army information stand at a motorbike show. Some of them distributed leaflets; the fourth complainant and another person held up a banner on which were the words: "Soldiers are potential MURDERERS". The lower third of the word murderers had "conscientious objectors" written across it. The leaflet lamented the fact that the Federal Army only presented the fascination of technology but was silent about the reality of war. The other side of the leaflet consisted of pictures of weapons and the victims of war.

The Federal Constitutional Court quashed the criminal convictions and referred the cases back to the criminal courts. The grounds for the decision are given only insofar as they relate to the second and third complainants. Part of the dissenting judgment by Judge Haas is also given.

Extract from the Grounds:

The constitutional complaints are, insofar as they are permissible, well founded. The decisions challenged did not have sufficient regard to the basic right of the complainants under Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Constitution of 1949 - GG).

I.

1. The statements for which the complainants have been punished for insult enjoy the protection of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

This constitutional norm gives everyone the right to express and disseminate his opinion freely in word, writing, and picture. In contrast to assertions of fact, opinions are characterised by the subjective attitude of the person expressing himself to the object of the statement (see BverfGE 90, 241 [247 seq.]). They contain his judgment about facts, ideas or persons. The protection of the basic right relates to this personal attitude. It therefore exists independently of whether the statement is rational or emotional, well founded or groundless, or regarded by others as useful or harmful, valuable or valueless (see BVerfGE 30, 336 [347 seq.]. The protection does not only relate to the content of the statement, but also to its form. The fact that a statement is formulated in a polemical or hurtful way does not remove it from the area of protection of the basic right (see BverfGE 54, 129 [138 seq.]; 61, 1 [7 f.]. Further, the choice of the place and time of a statement is protected. The person making the statement does not only have the right in general to make his opinion known. He may also choose for it those circumstances from which he expects the widest dissemination or the strongest effect of making it known.

The statements for which the complainants have been punished for insult are opinions in this sense, which are always covered by the protection of the basic right. The complainants in their statements that soldiers are murderers or potential murderers did not claim that particular soldiers had committed a murder in the past. They were instead expressing a judgment about soldiers and about the profession of soldier which under certain circumstances compels the killing of other human beings. The criminal courts also proceeded on the basis that it was a value judgment, not an assertion about facts.

2. Punishment for these statements is an intrusion into the protected area of the basic right to freedom of opinion.

3. The basic right to freedom of opinion is certainly not guaranteed without reservation. According to Article 5.2 of the Basic Law it is limited by the provisions of general statutes, the statutory provisions for the protection of young people, and the right to personal honour. S. 185 of the Criminal Code, which forms the basis of the decisions that are being challenged belongs to this category. In order to be able to support the conviction, the provision must agree with the Basic Law and besides this be interpreted and applied in a constitutional manner (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208 seq.]; constant case law).

II.

No effective constitutional law objections exist against s. 185 of the Criminal Code.

1. The criminal provision is reconcilable with Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

   a) The provision primarily protects personal honour. Within the framework of the general right of personality derived from Article 2.1 in combination with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law honour, itself, enjoys basic right protection. It can primarily be harmed by expressions of opinion. Therefore it is expressly recognised in Article 5.2 of the Basic Law as a ground justifying limitations on the freedom of opinion. It certainly does not follow from this that the legislature could limit freedom of opinion in the interest of personal honour as it pleases (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208]). It should instead, when making use of the authorisation in Article 5.2 of the Basic Law, keep in mind the restricted basic right, and avoid excessive limitations of freedom of opinion. However, s. 193 of the Criminal Code takes account of this requirement in that it excludes punishment for a statement that has been made for the protection of justified interests. This provision, which is to be taken into consideration before any conviction under s. 185 of the Criminal Code, is widely formulated. It is therefore open to the influence of freedom of opinion in a special way, and permits a careful adjustment of the conflicting legal interests (see BverfGE 12, 113 [125 seq.]).

   b) As may be deduced from s. 194.3 sentence 2 of the Criminal Code, the protection of s. 185 of the Criminal Code does not only apply to persons. It also applies to authorities or other offices, which look after tasks of public administration. The norm cannot be justified here from the point of view of personal honour, because state institutions have no personal honour, nor can they have the general right of personality. s. 185 of the Criminal Code as a protective norm in favour of state institutions ranks however with the general laws in the sense of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law. This is to be understood as including all laws which do not forbid an opinion as such and are not directed against the expression of the opinion as such, but serve to protect a legal interest which is simply to be protected, without regard to any particular opinion. (See BVerfGE 7, 198 [209]; constant case law). That is the case with s. 185 of the Criminal Code. State institutions cannot fulfil their function without a minimum degree of social acceptance. They ought, therefore, in principle to be protected from verbal onslaughts which threaten to undermine this prerequisite (see BverfGE 81, 278 [292 seq.]). The criminal law protection ought not however to lead to state institutions being shielded from public criticism, even if it takes a harsh form. This should be guaranteed in a special way by the basic right of freedom of opinion. But s. 193 of the Criminal Code again takes sufficient account of this requirement, as it gives room for the influence of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. It acquires increased significance if s. 185 of the Criminal Code is used for the protection of public institutions and not for the protection of personal honour.

2. S. 185 of the Criminal Code is also not too uncertain and therefore does not violate Article 103.2 of the Basic Law.

III.

The interpretation and application of criminal statutes are matters for the criminal courts. But for statutes which limit the freedom of opinion, according to a constant case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, the restricted basic right is at the same time to be taken into account so that its significance in setting values remains intact even at the level of application of the law (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208 seq.]).

1. At the level of interpretation of the norm, Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law requires a balancing operation, between the importance on the one hand of freedom of opinion and on the other hand of the legal interest for the benefit of which it has been limited. This is to be undertaken within the framework of the features of the definition of the statutes concerned. An interpretation of s. 185 of the Criminal Code would therefore be incompatible if it extends the concept of insult so widely that it exceeds the requirements of the protection of honour or protection of institutions (see BVerfGE 71, 162 [181]) or leaves no more room for taking freedom of opinion into consideration. Likewise Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Criminal Code forbids an interpretation of ss. 185 seq. of the Criminal Code by which people would be deterred from the use of the basic right, which would lead to even permissible criticism remaining unspoken through fear of sanctions.

Especially in relation to the interpretation of s. 193 of the Criminal Code, weight must be given to the fact that freedom of opinion is simply constitutive for the free democratic order (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208]). A justified interest can therefore exist not only when the person affected has himself given cause for the statement or when someone defends himself against personal attacks, but also if he participates in a public debate about questions which are socially or politically relevant. Special account must be taken of this if the provisions for the protection of honour in ss. 185 seq. of the Criminal Code are applied not to persons but to state institutions. They do not then serve the protection of personal honour, but seek to guarantee the public recognition needed by state institutions to fulfil their function. If this protective aim comes into conflict with the freedom of opinion, the importance of that freedom is to be rated particularly highly because the basic right has grown from the special need for protecting the criticism of authority and invariably is of importance here.

2. At the level of application of ss. 185 seq. of the Criminal Code in the individual case, Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law requires weighing of the injury threatened to personal honour on the one hand and to freedom of opinion on the other. In this connection all the material circumstances are to be considered (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [212]; constant case law). The result of this balancing operation cannot be determined in advance in a general and abstract manner, because of its relationship to the facts of the individual case. But in the case law a series of approaches have been developed which provide criteria for the actual balancing operation.

Freedom of opinion must always take second place if the statement violates the human dignity of another. This principle, stated in relation to artistic freedom, is valid for freedom of opinion as well, because human dignity, as the root of all the basic rights, is not capable of being weighed against any individual basic right. But as not merely the individual basic rights but also the basic rights as a whole are concrete manifestations of the principle of human dignity, it always needs careful reasoning if it is to be assumed that the use of a basic right affects inviolable human dignity.

Likewise, where disparaging statements are concerned which appear to be insult in the formal sense or abuse, freedom of opinion as a rule takes second place to protection of honour (see BVerfGE 61, 1 [12]). But because of its effect in suppressing freedom of opinion, the Federal Constitutional Court has defined narrowly the concept of abusive criticism developed in the specialist courts. According to this, an exaggerated or even rude criticism does not of itself turn a statement into abuse. Instead, the prominent feature about the statement should be defamation of the person rather than debate about the issue. It must be personal disparagement beyond even polemical and overstated criticism. On this basis abusive criticism will only exceptionally be present in statements about a question materially affecting the public and incidentally will more be limited to the so-called private feud. If a court incorrectly holds a statement to be insult in the formal sense or abuse the result will be to dispense with an actual balancing exercise taking into account all the circumstances of the individual case. There will then be a material error in constitutional law here, which will lead to the quashing of the decision if this is based on it (see BVerfGE 82, 272 [281]).

If the statement can be classified neither as an attack on human dignity nor as insult in the formal sense nor abuse then, for the purposes of the balancing exercise, it is a question of the seriousness of the interference with the legal interests affected. But here, in contrast to the case of assertions of facts, whether the criticism is justified or the value judgment is "right" plays in principle no role (see BVerfGE 66, 116 [151]). On the other hand, weight must be given to the question of whether use is being made of the basic right of freedom of opinion, within the framework of a private dispute, for the pursuit of personal interests or in connection with a question materially affecting the public. If the statement in question represents a contribution to formation of public opinion, according to constant case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, there is a presumption in favour of the freedom of speech (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208, 212]). Deviations from this consequently need a basis that takes account of the constitutive importance of freedom of opinion for democracy, in which the presumption is rooted.

3. A prerequisite of every legal assessment of a statement is that its sense has been understood accurately. If this is absent in a conviction for a crime relating to a statement, this can lead to suppression of a permissible statement. Besides this, the danger exists that such a conviction would operate disadvantageously for the exercise of the basic right of freedom of opinion in general, because those wishing to make statements would risk punishment because of remote or untenable meanings of their statements (see BVerfGE 43, 130 [136]). Under these circumstances preliminary decisions are made at the level of meaning about the permissibility or impermissibility of statements. Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law therefore generates requirements not only about the interpretation and application of statutes restricting the basic right, but also requirements about the meaning of the statements in question.

The purpose of the meaning is the communication of the objective sense of a statement. Neither the subjective intention of the person making the statement nor the subjective understanding of the person affected by the statement is therefore decisive. It is instead the sense that the statement has according to the understanding of an unprejudiced and sensible public. In this connection, the starting point is always the literal meaning of the statement. But this does not establish its sense conclusively. It is also determined from the linguistic context of the statement in question and the accompanying circumstances in which it is made, insofar as these can be known to the recipient. The isolated study of a disputed part of a statement does not therefore as a rule fulfil the requirement for reliably deducing its sense (see BVerfGE 82, 43 [52]).

Judgments that clearly overlook the sense of the statement in dispute and base their legal assessment upon this violate the basic right of freedom of opinion. The same applies if a court faced with statements with more than one meaning takes as a basis the meaning leading to the conviction without having previously excluded the other possible meanings on conclusive grounds. In this connection the court does not of course need to go into remote alternatives supported neither by the literal meaning nor by the circumstances of the statement. Nor does it have to develop abstractly possible meanings for which there are no grounds of any kind in the actual circumstances. If, however, the wording or the circumstances permit a meaning that is not defamatory, a criminal conviction which ignores this violates Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. It must also be taken into consideration here that many words or concepts can have different meanings in different communication contexts. This is amongst other situations the case with concepts that are used in legal specialist terminology in a different sense than in colloquial speech. It is therefore also an error of substance in constitutional law if the sense specific to a specialism is taken as the basis of the conviction even though the statement was made in a colloquial context (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [227]).

The requirements which Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law makes for deducing the sense of statements are subject to examination by the Federal Constitutional Court and especially when, as with criminal decisions, it is a matter of an intensive invasion of a basic right. The Federal Constitutional Court has always emphasised this (see BVerfGE 43, 130 [136 seq.]; 54, 129 [136 seq.]; 61, 1 [6, 9 seq.]; 82, 43 [50]; 82, 272 [280]; 85, 1 [13 f.]). There is no deviation in this from the constant case law on the extent of the authority of the Federal Constitutional Court to carry out an examination. This is because even in the case of conviction for crimes relating to statements, the Federal Constitutional Court only examines whether the courts have misunderstood the meaning and scope of the basic right of freedom of opinion. Otherwise it remains a matter for the sole competence of the specialist courts. In connection with crimes relating to statements, the enquiry focuses on whether the statement was in fact made. It also looks at what literal meaning it had, from whom the statement originated, and under what circumstances was it made - especially if the findings are based on the totality of the impression given at the oral hearing (see BVerfGE 43, 130 [137]). The contents of the minority judgment which deviate from this constant case law provide no cause for the giving up what has been the practice so far and for the restriction of the basic right protection for statements of opinion.

IV.

The decisions under challenge do not completely fulfil these requirements.

1. It certainly meets with no objection that the courts saw in the description of a soldier as a murderer a grave attack on his honour. Even if this description is not accompanied by an accusation that the person concerned actually committed murders, rating him on a level with a murderer still remains a deep insult. This weighs particularly heavily if the expression is used in the criminal law sense by incorporating the subjective characteristics of murder of s. 211 of the Criminal Code. But it is also so if it is used in the colloquial sense, because in this case, also, it describes a person who contributes (or is ready to do so) to the destruction of human life in a morally unjustifiable manner. In this there is likewise a condemnation of such a nature as appreciably to disparage the person affected in the eyes of those around him. That applies especially if the accusation refers not to occasional behaviour but to the totality of vocational activity.

But the courts have not sufficiently ensured that the statements for which punishment was imposed also really did have this sense. They ought to have investigated alternative meanings insofar as these would have been assessed more leniently in criminal law. Otherwise the danger exists that the person making the statement will be punished for a statement which does not contain the assumed insult. The courts ought not to have closed their eyes to such alternatives by an isolated consideration of the criminalised part of the statement. Consideration must, instead, be given to the context insofar as this was perceivable by the addressees of the statement. That applies first to the linguistic context of the statement in dispute, but can also include circumstances external to the statement.

In the present cases, there were alternatives to the meaning assumed by the courts that the soldiers in the Federal Army were equated to murderers in the criminal law or in the colloquial sense (implying that they were capable of committing especially despicable behaviour against other human beings). That arises principally from two circumstances.

Firstly the statements of the complainants according to their literal meaning refer to soldiers in general, without exception, but not to individual soldiers or specially to those of the Federal Army. If the Federal Army is also occasionally mentioned, that only occurs in order to confirm that the statement about all soldiers also applies to the soldiers of the Federal Army. This circumstance had to give cause to reflect whether the statement might not simply be directed against soldiery and soldiering; and that this was condemned because it was connected with the killing of other human beings which may take place in a cruel way and also affects the civil population. The fact that the complainants predominantly did not speak impersonally of "murder" but personally of "murderer" is, taken on its own, not sufficient to exclude this meaning. This is because an accusation against the individual soldier of seriously criminal conduct or a seriously criminal attitude need not necessarily be contained even in the use of the word "murderer". The person making the statement may instead be drawing attention in an especially challenging form to the fact that killing in war is not an impersonal event but is effected by a human hand. It should not therefore be excluded from the outset that the phraseology was to awaken consciousness of personal responsibility with those carrying out military service and those in a soldier's vocation for the totality of the events condemned and thus foster preparedness to become conscientious objectors.

Secondly, the statements that soldiers are murderers or potential murderers are, as to the second, third, and fourth complainants, in a wider linguistic context. This was as to the second complainant in the form of a leaflet, as to the third complainant in the form of a reader's letter, and as to the fourth complainant in the form of leaflet used together with the banner and distributed simultaneously at the Federal Army stand. It was predominantly concerned with the destruction of human life, amongst soldiers as well as in the civil population, as an accepted consequence of the maintenance of armies and the associated readiness to carry on war, whether for the purposes of attack or defence. On the other hand, it was not a question of criticism of especially reprehensible individual behaviour or even of character defects of soldiers. From the context of the criminalised statements, there are no grounds at all for equating soldiers with murderers in the sense of fulfilling the subjective characteristics of murder of s. 211 of the Criminal Code.

2. Further, it is not open to objection constitutionally that the courts in certain circumstances see an attack on the personal honour of the members of a collective in a disparaging statement which neither names nor recognisably refers to certain persons, but covers the collective without any individual classification of it.

The personal honour of a human being, which should be protected from attacks by the threat of punishment under s. 185 of the Criminal Code, cannot be regarded in a purely individual way, removed from the collective relationships in which he stands. The individual moves in numerous interrelations, which transcend his individuality, some of which he chooses freely and some of which he must accept without any involvement by him. On the basis of these he is subject to expectations about roles and behaviour. He is also more or less identified by those around him with the collectives to which he belongs and the social roles that he plays. His reputation in society depends in these circumstances not only on his individual qualities and behaviour but also on the characteristics and activities of the groups to which he belongs, or of the institutions in which he is active. In this respect disparaging statements about collectives can also adversely affect the honour of their members.

In the case of disparaging statements based on a collective term, the boundary certainly cannot be precisely drawn between two things. One is an attack on personal honour, which is protected by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law and which according to Article 5.2 of the Basic Law justifies restrictions on freedom of opinion. The other is criticism of social phenomena, institutions of state or society or social roles and role expectations for which Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law guarantees free scope. The danger of excessive limitations on freedom of opinion is therefore always inherent in punishment for statements of this kind. Certain foreign legal systems, in particular those of the Anglo-Saxon legal family, do not therefore recognise collective insult at all and only punish injury to honour which expressly or recognisably refers to individuals. (See, for instance, Robertson / Nicol, Media Law, 3rd edition (1992), 57.)

Whether s. 185 of the Criminal Code could also be interpreted in this way is not for decision here. The Basic Law does not in any case demand such a restrictive interpretation of the provisions for the protection of honour. But when s. 185 of the Criminal Code is applied to disparaging statements related to a collective name, it is always necessary to examine whether they really impugn the "personal" honour of the individual members of the group. Above all it must be taken into account that it ought not to extend to the suppression of critical statements about political and social phenomena or institutions for which the protection of freedom of opinion applies in a special way. Criminal jurisprudence also emphasises this.

The courts have in this connection relied on a decision of the Bundesgerichtshof which was in fact made because of disparaging statements about soldiers (see BGHSt 36, 83). The Bundesgerichtshof proceeds in this decision on the basis that the requirements which the Reichsgericht had placed on the criminality of collective insults, namely that the group must be delimitable and easily comprehensible, did not satisfy the demands of the rule of law as to the limiting of definitions of criminal acts. The Bundesgerichtshof, therefore, requires additionally that the disparaging statement should be linked to a characteristic, which is present with all members of the collective. A link to characteristics, which certainly apply to some but obviously not to all members, does not, according to this case law, diminish the personal honour of each individual member. As it would be clear to every addressee of such a statement that every individual cannot be intended, and particular persons are not named no one is insulted by such a statement.

The Bundesgerichtshof obviously proceeds on the basis that even after this delimitation, very large collectives still remain whose members would have to be treated as personally insulted by disparaging statements related to a collective description. In order to avoid this, it adheres to the view that disparaging statements about groups so large as not to be easily comprehensible (like all Catholics or Protestants, all trade union members, or all women) do not affect the personal honour of every individual member of the group. Criminal jurisprudence also accepts that otherwise the limiting of the definition of the criminal act that is held to be necessary would again be sacrificed.

This interpretation takes account of the point of view of freedom of opinion. Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law as well as Article 5.2 of the Basic Law serve to protect personal honour. The larger the collective to which a disparaging statement refers, the weaker the extent to which an individual member can be personally affected. This is because with accusations against large groups, it is mostly not a question of individual inappropriate behaviour or individual characteristics of the members, but of the demerits, as they exist in the view of the speaker, of the group and of its social function, as well as the requirements for the behaviour of the members connected with this. Thus, on the one end of the scale we find the insult of a single person described by name or otherwise rendered identifiable, and on the other pejorative statements about human qualities or the criticism of social institutions or phenomena that are not, as such, able to affect the personal honour of an individual.

These considerations also apply to disparaging statements about soldiers, so far as they refer to all soldiers in the world. On the other hand, the criminal courts are not prevented on constitutional grounds from seeing in the (active) soldiers of the Federal Army a group that is sufficiently easily comprehensible. Therefore, a statement which refers to them can also insult every individual member of the Federal Army if it is linked to a characteristic which obviously or at least typically applies to all members of the collective.

It is inconsistent to apply specifically to soldiers of the Federal Army a disparaging statement, which without closer delimitation has all soldiers as its object, just because these soldiers are part of soldiers as a whole. As all large collectives divide into smaller sub-groups, even an entirely non-specific and therefore innocent statement changes by the application of it to any of them into a personal and therefore criminal insult. The limiting of the definition of the criminal act undertaken by the Bundesgerichtshof on the grounds of the rule of law is thereby in effect removed again.

This inconsistency is also pertinent in constitutional law. Freedom of opinion may only be limited to the extent that is necessary for the protection of personal honour, and this is not affected by disparaging statements about large collectives which are not easily comprehensible. Therefore according to the view of the criminal courts which is not open to objection on constitutional law grounds, punishment for statements of this kind represents an impermissible restriction of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. If someone who has made a disparaging statement about soldiers in general is punished for insult of soldiers of the Federal Army, it does not therefore suffice to show that the soldiers of the Federal Army form a sub-group of all soldiers. It must, instead, be demonstrated that it is the soldiers of the Federal Army that are meant, even though the statement refers simply to soldiers. Such a divergence of linguistic form and objective sense is not by any means impossible. But the courts must then identify the circumstances from which the understanding arises, even though it is not discernible from the literal meaning of the statement alone. If there are none, a violation of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is present.

3. Finally there is no constitutional law objection to the courts balancing freedom of opinion and protection of honour and giving preference to the latter when there is no wider contribution to discussion about the issue in the statement in dispute, defamation of the person being the dominant feature. That corresponds to the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court on abusive criticism.

But it is a prerequisite that the statement in question really amounts to abusive criticism. The courts have assumed this predominantly with reference to the decision of the Bavarian Obersten Landesgericht (NJW 1991, p. 1493) referred to, which concerned a very similar statement about soldiers. It is true that this decision reproduces accurately the principles on abusive criticism developed in the constitutional case law; but it does not orientate the application of the law to this sufficiently. The narrow concept of abuse developed in the constitutional case law taking freedom of opinion into consideration does not form the basis of the minority judgment either.

The characteristic of abuse is personal insult forcing the objective issue completely into the background. For the complainants, however, it was obviously a question of a debate about the issue, in fact about the question of whether war and military service and the killing of human beings connected with it are morally justified or not. That arises for the second, third and fourth complainants from the context of the criminalised statement which the courts had to consider under the label of abusive criticism. As to the first complainant, the choice of the word "murder" instead of "murderer" as well as the situational context at least point in this direction. The conflict between preparedness for defence and pacifism is a question substantially affecting the public as to which there is a presumption in favour of freedom of speech. In the face of this the courts would have had to demonstrate that in the actual statements, even taking into consideration their context, debate about the issue had been forced into the background by defamation of people.

But there are no doubts about this, for the very reason that the statements according to their literal meaning did not refer to particular persons but covered all soldiers without distinction. It is certainly not impossible that even with disparaging statements about large collectives, defamation of the persons belonging to them is the dominant feature. That applies especially if the statements are connected to ethnic, racial, physical or intellectual characteristics from which the inferiority of a whole group of persons and therefore at the same time every individual member is deduced. But as a rule only statements about definite persons or associations of persons will come to be considered as abusive criticism. The concept has only been used in this sense so far in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court and the Bundesgerichtshof. If, on the other hand, it is a question of groups of persons that are united by a definite social function, it is rather to be presumed that the statement is not characterised by defamation of persons but is linked to the activity undertaken by them. The statement can then nevertheless be injurious to honour. But it no longer falls within the concept of abusive criticism, which makes superfluous an actual balancing exercise with the interests of freedom of opinion, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case.

Contrary to the minority judgment, no different assessment is required just because the statement affects soldiers. In particular, the circumstance that soldiers carry out armed service, are called up for this purpose by the state as conscripts and in this connection must show obedience does not make their personal honour more worthy of protection than that of members of groups of the civil population. A constitutional law principle according to which certain duties of obedience are to be compensated by increased protection of honour does not exist. The fact that someone who is abused has a claim to state protection of his honour is rather the product of the constitutional law protection of the personality, which is the right of all human beings in the same way. The protection does not of course make the proof that the statement in dispute is injurious to honour or even abusive unnecessary, but makes it a prerequisite.

V.

For the individual decisions which have been the subject of a permissible challenge, the following applies:

2. Case 1 BvR 1980/91

a) According to the opinion of the Amtsgericht, the statement of the complainant gives expression to the view "that every soldier at the end of his training is a murderer, someone who kills out of a reprehensible state of mind". The court has no more explained what this interpretation is based on than it has considered alternative possible interpretations of the leaflet. It has instead described the interpretation presented by the complainant as "insignificant", because the statement could have no other sense than the one assumed. However the leaflet itself as composed by the complainant would have offered clues for other interpretations. It is true that it uses the noun "murderer" in connection with the training goal of the military, but in characterising a soldier's activity reverts immediately to the verb "killing" for which in the German language there is no corresponding noun. For this reason the concept of the murderer is common in colloquial speech even for persons who have killed without fulfilling the characteristics of murder in s. 211 of the Criminal Code. The text which follows, with its allusion to "soldier's trade" and "militarism", also makes it appear possible that the complainant did not make the accusation against soldiers of killing out of a reprehensible state of mind, but indicated the possible consequences of soldiers' training and the conduct of war.

The court has not explained to what extent the statement referred to the soldier R (who laid the criminal charge) as a member of the Federal Army (rather than as a statement about all soldiers -a group not easily comprehensible- leaving his personal honour unaffected).

The protection of justified interests has been denied to the complainant by the assertion that his text debased human dignity, and overstepped the boundary between sharp criticism and polemical defamation. A reason is lacking for both these claims. The court has thereby evaded the necessity for a balancing between freedom of opinion and protection of honour.

For the further assumption that the statement insulted not only individual soldiers but also the Federal Army as a whole, the court limited itself to the comment that the capacity of the Federal Army to be insulted was recognised. But it neither explained how far the Federal Army had in fact been insulted, nor set out why the disparagement of its reputation is of greater weight than the interference with freedom of opinion.

b) The Landgericht also did not concern itself with an interpretation of the statement, but contented itself with the finding that the complainant had answered the question put by himself as to whether soldiers were potential murderers in the affirmative. It certainly reproduced in detail the complainant's understanding associated with his statement, but did not investigate it.

In contrast to the Amtsgericht, the Landgericht did explain how the disparaging statement referred to soldiers of the Federal Army and thereby also to the soldier R who laid the criminal charge. That is inferred from the fact that in the text of the leaflet the Federal Army had been "twice mentioned expressly by the phrase 'in the Federal Army'". But the text of the leaflet does not support this meaning. The Landgericht ignored the fact that in both cases general statements were made about soldiers as well as about soldiers' trade. The universal validity of these statements was expressed by the complainant by the word "world wide" immediately preceding the words "in the Federal Army as well" on two occasions. Grounds were therefore needed for saying why the statement nevertheless referred not to all the soldiers in the world but to those of the Federal Army.

The Landgericht denied that justified interests were being protected because it regarded the statement as abuse for which freedom of opinion always takes second place to protection of the personality. It gave as its reasoning that the disparagement of the reputation of soldiers played a dominant role because murder was to be regarded as killing due to a reprehensible state of mind. In its view, equating soldiers with murderers was not substantially mitigated by the "supposed" extension of the statement to cover all soldiers of the world and by the addition of the word "potential". However, the whole content of the leaflet, as well as the cause for its distribution, should have given grounds for considering whether it contained in substance a defamation of persons or whether it was merely a contribution to a wider public debate which, as a rule, excludes the assumption of abusive criticism.

The judgment lacks a basis for saying that the Federal Army has been insulted as a whole.

c) The decision of the court hearing the appeal in law suffers from the same defects as the judgment of the appeal court.

3. Case 1 BvR 102/92

a) The judgment of the Landgericht contains no explanations about the meaning of the statement in dispute. The Landgericht proceeded instead simply on the basis that it was a question of an insult to honour.

On the other hand, it obviously gave legal significance to and investigated the objection of the complainant that his statement referred to all soldiers of the world and thereby to a group which was not capable of being insulted because it was not easily comprehensible. It sought, however, to refute this with the argument that the complainant had in his reader's letter declared solidarity with Dr A, the accused in the so-called Frankfurt soldiers trial, whose statement that every soldier was a potential murderer also referred to Captain W (who was present) because he was likewise a soldier. Apart from the fact that the conclusion that the complainant had thereby directed his statement at the soldiers of the Federal Army does not follow from this, the reasoning in other respects also does not stand up to examination. If a disparaging statement refers to all soldiers in the world and thereby to individual soldiers only insofar as these form a part of the totality of all soldiers, then those soldiers are not more precisely identified. The assumption that, contrary to the text of the reader's letter, the statement does not cover all the soldiers of the world but specially the soldiers of the Federal Army, would therefore have required further findings.

The Landgericht omitted to carry out a balancing between freedom of opinion and the protection of honour, indicating that it was a question of abusive criticism. The judgment does not contain a separate reason for this. Instead it reproduces the considerations of the Bavarian Obersten Landegericht in the decision mentioned and explains that nothing is to be added to this. No subsuming under the principles developed there is undertaken. But the assumption that it is a question of abusive criticism is prevented in the present case because of the context in which the statement in dispute stood. This made clear that for the author it was a question of the problematic issue of the support of the military and the readiness to kill in war connected with this. Whether he had expressed that in a way which takes account of the requirements of the protection of honour must therefore be elucidated by a balancing exercise based on the actual case.

The decision of the Oberlandesgericht shows the same defects as the appeal judgment.

VI.

It is possible that in any of the four cases the courts would have come to other conclusions if they had considered the other possible and natural interpretations of the statements; taken account of the difference between a disparaging statement about all soldiers of the world and the soldiers of the Federal Army; and applied the concept of abusive criticism in a constitutional manner. The decisions under challenge must therefore be quashed and the cases referred back. But this does amount to an acquittal of the complainants nor to a declaration that insults of individual soldiers or of the members of specific armed forces by statements like "soldiers are murderers" are permissible. Rather the actual statements must be assessed afresh taking into consideration the requirements of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law which have been explained.

This decision is made in respect of the first, third and fourth constitutional complaints by a majority of five votes to three, and in respect of the outcome of the second constitutional complaint unanimously.

Dissenting opinion of Judge Haas:

> I do not share the opinion of the majority of the Senate that the decisions of the Bavarian Obersten Landesgericht and the Oberlandesgericht of Koblenz as well as the Landgericht judgments (as the courts of last instance for the finding of facts) are unconstitutional. The basic right of the complainant under Article 5.1 of the Basic Law is not violated. The freedom of expression of opinion is limited by the right to personal honour.

1. The courts in the initial proceedings have made a correct legal assessment of the facts, on the basis of the findings made by them. This is to the effect that the statement "soldiers are murderers" or "soldiers are potential murderers" contains a negative value judgment about soldiers of the Federal Army, which is not open to another interpretation, taking into consideration the content of the expression in colloquial speech, than that which they gave it. This is not open to objection in constitutional law.

In principle, the position is as follows: the elucidation and assessment of the facts of a case are a matter for the specialist courts. The Federal Constitutional Court in constant case law proceeds on the basis that court decisions can only be examined within narrow boundaries under the constitutional complaints procedure. In particular, it considers that the establishment and assessment of the facts of a case and the interpretation of ordinary law and its application to the individual case are matters for the courts which have general jurisdiction for this and are removed from the scope of examination undertaken by the Federal Constitutional Court (see BVerfGE 18, 85 [92 seq.]; 22, 93 [99 seq.]; 30, 173 [196 seq.]; 42, 143 [148]; 76, 143 [161]; 82, 6 [11]; 89, 276 [285]). The Federal Constitutional Court has stressed its special function and position in relation to other holders of judicial power. It has therefore always emphasised that it could not put its own assessment of the circumstances of the individual case in the manner of a court of appeal in place of that of the competent judge where the assessment of the established circumstances is decisive for the constitutional law judgment.

I cannot subscribe to the laying down by the Senate of another yardstick for testing the interpretation of statements, nor its application sometimes of the "full" constitutional law examination. Nor can I accept it requiring that the judge of fact must, from several possible interpretations, choose one which has a "convicting" or "conclusive" basis. "Conviction" (whose?) is not a constitutional law yardstick; "conclusiveness" cannot be required in the assessment of statements, because understanding follows its own laws, not simply those of logic. Finally, the wider yardstick for examination has led to the Federal Constitutional Court claiming for itself extensively the interpretation competence of a judge of fact. It has also resulted in it interfering in areas of decision-making which are reserved to the specialist jurisdiction which is closer to the case with its specific opportunities for elucidation and especially investigation in the oral hearing. This is meeting with increasing criticism (see Bertrams, DVBl. 1991, p. 1226; Herdegen, NJW 1994, p. 2934; OLG Mamberg, NStZ 1994, p. 406). It is not clear which special features could justify or even require a more thorough examination here. The fact that the constitutional law assessment under Article 5.1 of the Basic Law depends upon the outcome of the assessment of the facts of the case does not suffice for this purpose; it applies to other basic rights in the same manner. Here, as there, the constitutional court control must limit itself to violations of specific constitutional law. It is true that the constitutional complaint opens up to examination by the Federal Constitutional Court the question of whether the circumstances which are important for interpretation purposes have been taken note of by the court, and considered and weighed bearing constitutional law guidelines in mind. Whether the specialist judge has interpreted the sense of an ambiguous statement with accuracy in every respect is however not a question of constitutional law. I cannot therefore share the opinion of the majority of the Senate that the Federal Constitutional Court can nevertheless examine whether all possible interpretations which it recognises as conceivable have been considered by the specialist court.

2. It is quite understandable that the specialist courts, taking into consideration the findings of fact that they have made, should attribute to the concept "murderer" the sense of a negative value judgment of substantial weight. Even on the basis of the view of the majority of the Senate, this interpretation is not open to objection. In colloquial speech, the word "murderer" is associated with a type of criminal who stands out as having a particularly negative profile. Murderers form the most abhorrent category of criminals. There is no evident alternative interpretation that could take away the deep injury to honour from the accusation of being a murderer. Even the majority of the Senate did not produce such an alternative interpretation that could impress the mind of the objective unprejudiced observer. That the word "murder" in case 1 BvR 1476/91 conveys the message that the soldier is at the same time the perpetrator and the victim seems scarcely probable; it would however be unimportant anyway because this interpretation still equates soldiers with murderers. Finally, the total context of the statement on each occasion also allows no other interpretation. Thus in the case of the complainant in case 1 BvR 221/92 the discriminatory message of the banner which was widely visible was not toned down for individual readers of the leaflet. Regardless of this, an interpretation, which takes into account the text of the leaflet, should not be considered here anyway. This is simply because the specialist court did not establish (and according to all experience of life cannot establish) that all readers of the banner would also have become aware of the content of the leaflet. The specialist court cannot avail itself of an alternative interpretation based on facts not established by it.

What the maker of the statement intended to say is in the end unimportant for interpreting the concept "murderer", if it found no expression in the statement. At first, only what he actually said is in question; the decisive thing is then the objective sense: how the statement was to be understood by the average observer in the position of the recipient of the statement at the point in time when it was communicated. Therefore a possible intention by the complainant to awaken, by the choice of words, consciousness of personal responsibility with those concerned cannot, contrary to the view of the majority of the Senate, influence the truth content of the statement. This is because such an intention changes nothing in the content and sense of the words chosen. Besides this, consideration of such an intention would depend on the specialist court having made appropriate findings; this is lacking, for instance, in case 1 BvR 102/92.

3. The courts established as a fact that the statement which was injurious to honour referred expressly (or obviously, from the total context) to soldiers of the Federal Army. On this basis, the courts could also affirm that the soldiers of the Federal Army (and therefore every single member of the armed forces) were an addressee of the statement. To what extent the arguments of the majority of the Senate on defamation of collectives can be followed can be left undecided here. There are doubts anyway about the majority of the Senate understanding the decision of the Bundesgerichtshof (which was quoted with approval) (BGHSt 36, 83 [87]) as meaning that a characteristic present with all members of the group must be added, besides the criterion of the group being easily comprehensible.

4. The statements of opinion by the complainants are not covered by the right to free expression of opinion (Article 5.1 of the Basic Law) which is subject to the reservation of the right to personal honour. It is not evident that the decisions which are under challenge had in this respect misjudged the meaning and scope of the basic right.

The specialist courts have assessed the disparaging comparison of soldiers with murderers as violation of the general right of personality (Article 1.1 in conjunction with Article 2.1 of the Basic Law) but not as violation of human dignity (Article 1.1 of the Basic Law). It might need to be considered whether the accusation of being a murderer does not put in question the moral value of the individual and therefore really affects the essence of the person thus addressed. In any case, the specialist courts have resolved the tension between freedom of opinion and protection of honour in a manner not open to objection in constitutional law. According to the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, in cases of abusive criticism freedom of opinion regularly takes second place to protection of honour (BVerfGE 82, 43 [51] with further references). Abusive criticism is always to be assumed if the disparaging statement predominates. Accordingly, the mere presence of a reference to an issue insofar as it is discernible as such by persons to whom the statement is communicated does not get rid of the charge of abusive criticism. The specialist courts, in balancing all the factual circumstances of the individual case, which is a matter for them, came to the conclusion that abusing soldiers dominated the rest of what happened in such a way that the possible expression at the same time of concern about an objective issue takes second place. If - as in the case of the complainant in case 1 BvR 1476/ 91 - in default of any additional factor going beyond the literal defamatory meaning of the banner an ascertained or even only ascertainable concern with an objective issue is not discernible by the passing observer, this is obvious and needs no special reasoning to support it. In the two other cases as well, the balancing exercise undertaken by the specialist courts is not open to objection from this point of view.

It is not by chance that the Basic Law has expressly named the right to personal honour as a limitation of freedom of opinion. Even without this special emphasis, the right to personal honour as an expression of the personality and as a result of human dignity (which it is the responsibility of all state power to protect and to respect: Article 1.1 of the Basic Law) would acquire importance of such a nature as to set limits, especially with public statements. This was not sufficient for the author of the Constitution. He wanted, by the limiting of freedom of opinion which is anchored in the Basic Law, emphatically to counteract any spilling over of the conflict of political opinions into the personal realm. Because the protection of honour until then was, against the background of experiences principally in the time of the Weimar Republic, seen on all sides as insufficient, the right to personal honour was taken into the Basic Law in 1949 as an express limitation of freedom of opinion. A basis for the protection of honour which deserves the name was thereby laid. This protection of honour was not contested in the deliberations of the Parliamentary Council from beginning to end. What was self-evident at the time still deserves attention even today. Renunciation of personal defamation in the process of formation of political opinion can only promote this, in that it elevates the culture of political argument.

For public statements with reference to members of the German armed forces this must apply so much the more since these soldiers are under a duty to fulfil the task of defence provided for in constitutional law to the best of their powers. They risk their lives in order to keep the horror of war from the civil population and to protect the lives of that population - and not least the lives of those who disparage their activities and make them contemptible in the eyes of the public. A legal order which obliges young men to carry out armed service and requires obedience from them must guarantee protection to those who fulfil these duties when they are abused because of this service as soldiers and publicly described as murderers. It is not a question here of the construction of a special "soldier's honour". It is a question of the simple self-evident fact that the Constitution, if it does not want to lose its credibility, ought not to leave without protection those who follow its commands and (exclusively) for that very reason are attacked. The correlation between protection and obedience belongs to the elementary principles of a legal order. This cannot be and ought not to be left out of consideration.

2. Article 5.1 of the Basic Law in the Context of the Holocaust

Explanatory Annotation

The traumatic historical experience of the total breakdown of civilization that was the Holocaust (Shoa), i.e. the attempted annihilation of the Jewish population, and the attempted annihilation also of other minorities, ethnic or otherwise, such as the Roma, homosexuals, persons with disabilities, communists and other opponents at the hands of Germany continues to create conflict in the area of free speech. The Basic Law is a constitution created in the dark shadow of the totalitarian Nazi terror regime and it is not surprising that the "free speech" guarantee is a prime area of controversy. The four decisions presented below deal with various facets of the same problem. How can one adequately reconcile the guarantee of free speech with the gruesome historical facts that bestow a special responsibility of the Germany of the Basic Law?

In the Auschwitz-Lie decision, the German Constitutional Court addresses the scope of the freedom of speech in the context of persons denying that the Holocaust even happened and in particular that the concentration camp associated with the innocent Polish town of Auschwitz did not engage in the industrial killing of the mostly Jewish prisoners. A few revisionist "historians" have supported such claims, perhaps most notably and notoriously by the British historian David

Irving. German criminal law prohibits the so-called "Auschwitz lie" and threatens criminal sanctions of up to five years in prison or fines to those who deny the Holocaust.[62]

At issue in this case where violates requirements placed on the - extreme right-wing - organizers of an indoor appearance of the British historian Irving. The organizers were required by the city of Munich to see to it that no criminal activity under the relevant sections of the German Criminal Code, especially § 130 Criminal Code, would take place and to take active steps if that were to happen. The organizers were also informed that, among other things, the denial of the Holocaust is prohibited by criminal law.

The Constitutional Court saw this as a justifiable restriction on free speech. The Court noted that the scope of the freedom of speech clause predominantly covers opinions and not statements of fact. The difficulty lies in the distinction between opinion and fact because opinions are often based on factual assertions. As far as the denial of the Holocaust itself was concerned, the Court regarded that as a denial of facts and factual assertions do not join in the protection of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. This protection could only become relevant if the denial took place in some broader concept of voicing an opinion. The Court also held that such denial violates the personality rights of the victims of the Holocaust and the protection of personality rights is specifically mentioned as a possible restriction for the freedom of communication in Article 5.2.

Whether and how the various forms of "hate speech" are or should be compatible with the guarantee of free speech has caused much controversy not only in Germany[63] but also in other European countries, with the seemingly more libertarian approach in the United States serving as a point of contrast. The European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg (ECtHR), whose jurisprudence is a very significant cornerstone of the legal freedom of communication framework in Europe, has consistently held that member states are not obligated to accept such forms of speech under the Article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR).[64]

64 See for example ECtHR [GC], Appl. No. 64569/09, 16.6.2015, Delfi AS v. Estonia, http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-155105, para 136: "Moreover, the Court has held that speech that is incompatible with the values proclaimed and guaranteed by the Convention is not protected by Article 10 by virtue of Article 17 of the Convention. The examples of such speech examined by the Court have included statements denying the Holocaust, justifying a pro-Nazi policy, linking all Muslims with a grave act of terrorism, or portraying the Jews as the source of evil in Russia. [...].

The difficulty of the distinction between what is inciteful non-protected "hate speech" and what is still protected speech can be difficult and the other three decisions illustrate the difficulties. In essence, the Constitutional Court wants to ensure that there cannot be a blanket prohibition of all right-wing extremist speech as that would outlaw whole belief structures. In its recent jurisprudence, the Court emphasizes the criterion in § 130.3 Criminal Code according to which the speech must be "capable of disturbing the public peace". This picks up on the Constitutional Courts Wunsiedel/Hess decision where the Court analyzed in much detail the nature of § 130 Criminal Code and how it fits into the nomenclature of laws that could justifiably limit free speech.[65] The lower courts, when applying these criminal sanctions, must ensure and demonstrate that not the speech as such is being sanctioned but its negative impact on the public peace.[66] In the Netzradio-Germania decision the Constitutional Court could not find this link to the disturbance of the public peace; hence, the constitutional complaint was successful. In the Holocaust-denial decision issued on the same day, the Constitutional Court confirmed the potential for the disturbing of the public peace, for example, because the denial was combined directly and deliberately with calls to Jewish persons and institutions to rectify the "falsified" history thus indirectly blaming and accusing the victims in typical fashion.[67]

The approach of the German Constitutional Court and the ECtHR are correct. Free speech was never absolute. Libel, slander, defamation, etc. have always been accepted as limitations and the only question is the balancing of these exceptions with the free speech guarantee, which is of such central importance for any democratic system. It is hard to fathom a more fundamental insult and attack on the public peace than to tell those who have lost family, relatives, and friends, and indeed those who have suffered in the concentration camps and survived (though not many are now left to tell the story first hand), that their suffering is only imagined and never took place.

Translation of the Auschwitz Lie Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE), 90, 241*

Headnote:

Judgment on the question as to whether application of s. 5 no. 4 of the Assembly Act (Versammlungsgesetz - VersG) to assemblies at which denial of the persecution of Jews is to be expected is in violation of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG).

Order of the First Senate of 13 April 1994 pursuant to s. 24 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) - BvR 1 23/94

Facts:

When the complainant, a regional organization of the NPD, invited David Irving, a historian who is widely considered to be a revisionist on the extreme right, to a symposium, the local authority with jurisdiction for the complainant invoked s. 5 no. 4 of the Assembly Act, making permission to hold the event contingent on the condition that appropriate measures be taken to ensure that the persecution of Jews during the Third Reich not be the subject of any discussion that involved denial of such persecution or doubt as to whether it took place. The authority required that it be announced at the beginning of the event that such talks were punishable by law and that any such talks be immediately prohibited; if necessary, the meeting was to be interrupted or householders' rights invoked to end the event. The authority found it necessary to take these measures because there was reason to assume that criminal acts under ss. 130, 185, 189 and 194 of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB) would be committed at the planned event. The administrative appeal against these conditions was unsuccessful.

The Federal Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint as obviously unfounded.

Extract from the Grounds:

B. II.

The challenged decisions are not in violation of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

1. Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law guarantees every person the right to freely express and disseminate his or her opinion.

a) The decisions must be measured primarily against this fundamental right. The condition that the complainant contests does to be sure relate to a public assembly. At issue, however, are specific statements that the complainant, as the sponsor of the event, may neither make nor tolerate. Assessment of the condition under constitutional law hinges primarily upon whether such statements are allowed or not. A statement that may not be prohibited on constitutional grounds may pursuant to s. 5 no. 4 of the Assembly Act also not constitute a reason for a measure that restricts assembly. However, the standards for resolving this issue do not derive from the fundamental right to freedom of assembly (Article 8 of the Basic Law), but rather from freedom of expression.

b) The fundamental right protected under Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law pertains to opinions. Freedom of expression and dissemination relates to opinions. Opinions reflect a subjective relationship between a person and the content of his or her statements (see BVerfGE 33, 1 [14]). A characteristic element of opinions is that they involve taking and holding a position (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [210]; 61, 1 [8]). In that regard, opinions also cannot be proven true or false. They enjoy the protection of the fundamental right regardless of whether the statements are considered founded or unfounded, emotional or rational, valuable or worthless, dangerous or harmless (see BVerfGE 33, 1 [14-15]). The protection of the fundamental right also extends to the form of statements. An expression of opinion does not lose the protection afforded fundamental rights because its formulation is cutting or injurious (see BVerfGE 54, 129 [136 et seq.]; 61, 1 [7]). In that regard, the only question can be whether and to what extent the freedom of expression may be limited under Article 5.2 of the Basic Law.

Representations of fact, on the other hand, are not in the strictest sense expressions of opinion. Unlike opinions, representations of fact are such that the objective relationship between the statement and reality is in the foreground. To that extent, they are also amenable to verification of the truthfulness of their content. This does not mean, however, that representations of fact are automatically excluded from the scope of protection offered by Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Since opinions are generally based on factual assumptions or involve taking a position as regards actual situations, representations of fact also enjoy the protection of the fundamental right - in any case insofar as they represent a prerequisite for the formation of opinion - that is guaranteed by Article 5.1 of the Basic Law taken as a whole (see BVerfGE 61, 1 [8]).

As a result, representations of fact are protected only until such time as they can no longer make the contribution to the formation of opinion required under constitutional law. Under this aspect, incorrect information does not constitute an interest that merits protection. The Federal Constitutional Court has in its established case law consistently held that representations of facts that are deliberate misrepresentations which have been demonstrated to be untrue are not covered by the protection of freedom of expression (see BVerfGE 54, 208 [219]; 61, 1 [8]). However, the standards to be met in terms of truthfulness may not be chosen such that the function of freedom of expression suffers and permissible statements are also suppressed for fear of sanctions (see BVerfGE 54, 208 [219-220]; 61, 1 [8]; 85, 1 [22]).

It can of course be difficult to distinguish between expressions of opinion and representations of fact since the two are frequently associated with one another and only together yield a meaningful statement. In such cases, separation of factual and subjective elements is permissible only if the meaning of the statement is not distorted. When this is not possible, the statement must be considered in its entirety to represent an expression of opinion and included within the scope of protection of freedom of expression in the interest of effective protection of the fundamental right since there would otherwise be a danger of significant curtailment of the protection of the fundamental right (see BVerfGE 61, 1 [9]; 85, 1 [15-16]).

c) Freedom of expression is not, however, guaranteed without reservation. According to Article 5.2 of the Basic Law, it is subject to the restriction imposed by the provisions of general laws and statutory provisions governing the protection of youth and personal honour. However, it is necessary to take into account the importance of freedom of expression when interpreting and applying laws that have a restrictive effect on the freedom of expression (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [208-209]). As a rule, this makes it necessary to find a balance between the restriction of the fundamental right and the legally protected interest that the statute restricting the fundamental right is intended to protect as a function of the constitutive elements of the relevant statutes.

The Federal Constitutional Court has developed various rules for balancing such interests. According to these rules, freedom of expression by no means always takes precedence over the protection of personality, as the complainant would argue. In fact, protection of personality regularly takes precedence over freedom of expression in the case of statements of opinion that can be considered to constitute formal insults or invective (see BVerfGE 66, 116 [151]; 82, 272 [281, 283 et seq.]). In the case of statements of opinion accompanied by representations of fact, the degree of protection may depend upon the truthfulness of the underlying assumptions of fact. If these facts are shown to be untrue, freedom of expression is regularly subordinated to protection of personality (see BVerfGE 61, 1 [8-9]; 1 [17]).

In addition, it is necessary to determine which legally protected interest merits precedence in the individual case. However, it is to be noted that freedom of speech will be afforded precedence in the case of issues of significant public interest (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [212]).

This must therefore also always be taken into account when weighing the legal interests of the parties involved against one another.

2. In this respect, no apparent violation of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law can be discerned. The condition imposed upon the complainant as the organizer of the assembly to ensure that the persecution of Jews during the Third Reich not be denied or doubted is compatible with this fundamental right.

a) The complainant did not contest the assumption made by the authority responsible for approving the meeting and confirmed by the administrative courts to the effect that there was a danger that such statements would be made in the course of the meeting. In fact, it is argued that the complainant has a right to make such statements.

b) The prohibited statement to the effect that there was no persecution of Jews during the Third Reich is a representation of fact that has been demonstrated to be untrue by countless eyewitness accounts and records, the findings of the courts in numerous criminal proceedings and the results of historical research. Taken on its own, a statement with this content does not therefore enjoy the protection of freedom of expression. This represents a significant difference between denial of the persecution of Jews during the Third Reich and denial of German culpability for the outbreak of World War II, which was dealt with in the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court of 11 January 1994 (BVerfGE 90, 1 et seq.).

In the case of statements regarding the assignment of guilt and responsibility for historic events, complex assessment is always involved that cannot be reduced to a representation of fact, whereas the denial of an occurrence itself will regularly be of the nature of a representation of fact.

c) However, the decisions under challenge withstand constitutional review even if one does not take the statement responsible for the condition imposed by the authority on its own, but instead views it in the context of the subject of the meeting and considers it a prerequisite to formation of an opinion on the susceptibility of German politics to "extortion." The prohibited statement does then to be sure enjoy the protection of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. However, the restriction of that right cannot be objected to on constitutional grounds.

aa) A legal basis for such restriction exists that is consistent with the Basic Law.

The public authorities and administrative courts based the condition restricting expression of opinion on s. 5 no. 4 of the Assembly Act. According to this provision, an assembly in closed rooms may be prohibited if facts are established that show that the organizer or the organizer's followers will advocate views or tolerate statements that constitute an indictable offence or a summary offence subject to prosecution ex officio. This provision is compatible with the Basic Law.

In particular, it is not in violation of Article 8.1 of the Basic Law. Freedom of assembly in closed rooms is to be sure guaranteed without reservation. That does not, however, mean that statements of opinion at meetings enjoy protection beyond that afforded by Articles 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law. Statements of opinion that are punishable under a provision of law that is compatible with Article 5.2 of the Basic Law are also forbidden at meetings. In view of Article 8.1 of the Basic Law, it is also in principle not possible to object to the fact that the legislature would seek to prevent criminal acts that can with a high degree of probability be expected to occur at a meeting before they are actually committed. Limitation of the reasons for prohibition to indictable offences and summary offences to be prosecuted ex officio and the principle of proportionality, which is to be respected in the case of all measures taken to limit freedom of assembly, provide protection against excessive restriction of freedom of assembly.

There is also no evidence of a violation of Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. s. 5 no. 4 of the Assembly Act does not itself provide for restriction of freedom of expression, but relies on restrictions contained in the Criminal Code. Measures that restrict freedom of assembly under s. 5 no. 4 of the Assembly Act may therefore only be taken if there is a threat that statements will be made at an assembly that are otherwise punishable and are prosecuted ex officio. However, the provision does not involve subsequent sanctions by the courts, but rather preventive prohibition by the authorities. The concomitant dangers for freedom of expression are, however, countervailed since stringent requirements are imposed as regards the likelihood of danger and there must be no doubt as to the criminal nature of the statements under existing case law.

There is no doubt as to the constitutionality of the penal provisions underlying the condition imposed on the organizer of the meeting. The existence of the offence of defamation protects personal honour, which Article 5.2 of the Basic Law explicitly identifies as a legally protected interest that justifies the restriction of freedom of expression. s. 130 of the Criminal Code is a general law within the meaning of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law that is intended to protect humanity (see Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks.] III/ 1746, p. 3) and finds its ultimate constitutional justification in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

bb) The interpretation and application of s. 5 no. 4 of the Assembly Act in conjunction with s. 185 of the Criminal Code in the decisions under challenge are also compatible with Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law.

(1) The administrative authorities and administrative courts based their decisions on the interpretation of criminal law that they were provided with by the ordinary courts. According to this interpretation, the Jews living in Germany constitute a class that it is possible to insult because of the fate to which the Jewish population was exposed under the rule of National Socialism; denial of the persecution of the Jews is considered to constitute an insult to this class of persons. The Federal Court of Justice commented as follows on this issue:

> The very historical fact that human beings were ostracized on the basis of the criteria of descent in what are referred to as the Nuremberg Laws and robbed of their individuality for the purposes of extermination gives Jews living in the Federal Republic a special personal relationship with their fellow citizens; what took place in the past is still with us today. It is part of their personal self-perception to consider themselves members of a class of persons that has been singled out by fate toward which all others have a special moral responsibility, and this constitutes part of their dignity. Respect for this self-perception is for each of them indeed one of the guarantees against the repetition of such discrimination and a fundamental prerequisite for life in the Federal Republic. Anyone who would attempt to deny those events deprives each and every one of them of this personal esteem to which they are entitled. For those affected, this represents a continuation of the discrimination against the class of persons to which they belong and at the same time against them personally (Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen - BGHZ] 75, 160 [162-163])."

The legislature has relied on this case law and included an exception to the requirement for a request by the victim in the case of such insults in s. 194.1 sentence 2 of the Criminal Code (see Bundestag document 10/3242, p. 9).

The opinion of the Federal Court of Justice has to be sure been contested in the literature on criminal law. Some authors feel that the definition of the elements of the offence of defamation is too broad (Schönke/Schröder-Lenckner, StGB, 24th ed., s. 185 marginal note 3; Dre-her/Tröndle, StGB, 46th ed., s. 194 marginal note 1; Köhler, NJW 1985, p. 2390 fn. 11). However, it is not the task of the Federal Constitutional Court to determine whether an interpretation of the Criminal Code under ordinary law is correct or whether other opinions would also be tenable. For the purposes of assessment under constitutional law, the sole consideration is whether the interpretation is based on a failure to recognize fundamental rights. This is not the case here.

The fact that denial of the persecution of Jews is viewed as a serious violation of the right of personality in the decisions under challenge based on this case law provides no reason for misgivings. There can be no objection on constitutional grounds to the logical connection established by the Federal Court of Justice between the denial of the racially motivated annihilation of the Jewish population during the Third Reich and attacks on the right to respect and human dignity of the Jews alive today. Here too, there is a difference between the denial of the persecution of the Jews and the denial of German responsibility for the war (see Federal Constitutional Court, Order of 11 January 1994 - BVerfGE 90, 1 et seq.). The latter opinion, regardless of its questionable historical accuracy, does not in any case impair any legal interests of others.

The objection of the complainant to the effect that the conditions for assembly were based on an understanding of s. 185 of the Criminal Code underlying the draft of s. 140 of the Criminal Code in the 21st Criminal Law Amendment Act (Strafrechtsänderungsgesetz, Bundestag document 10/1286, p. 4), which was not enacted by the German Bundestag, also does not make this interpretation unconstitutional. Although the legislature did refrain from introducing a specific offence subject to more severe punishment to cover denial of the persecution of the Jews, this does not make it possible to conclude that the act is not punishable under the more general provision contained in s. 185 of the Criminal Code, especially since - as has been shown - the legislature relied on the case law under which denial of fateful persecution is construed as an insult.

(2) It is also not possible to detect a flaw of constitutional significance in the balance between injury to reputation on the one hand and restriction of freedom of expression on the other hand. The severity of the respective impairment plays a decisive role in such a balance. In the case of derogatory statements that include a representation of fact, whether the representation of fact is true or not is important. Representations of fact that have been proven to be incorrect are not interests that merit protection. When such representations are inextricably associated with opinions, they do benefit from protection under Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law, but any encroachment upon the freedom of expression is from the outset less serious than in the case of statements of fact that have not been proven to be untrue.

That is the case here. Even if the statement that the complainant was prohibited from making at the meeting is considered to be an expression of opinion in the context of the subject of the meeting, this does not in any way change the fact that the actual content has been proven to be incorrect. The encroachment upon the freedom of expression as regards this statement is therefore not particularly serious. In view of the importance attributed to injury to reputation, there can be no objection to the fact that protection of personality is given precedence over freedom of expression in the decisions under challenge.

This is also not changed by the fact that the attitude of Germany towards its National Socialist past and the political implications thereof, which is what the meeting was about, represents an issue of significant public interest. In this case, there is to be sure a presumption in favour of free speech. However, this does not apply in the case of statements that constitute formal insults or invective or offensive statements based on representations of fact that have been proven to be untrue.

There is also no reason to fear overextension of the standard of truthfulness required of the factual core of the statements from this balance of interests that is incompatible with Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. The limitation of the duty of care required by the Federal Constitutional Court in the interest of free communication and the critical and control function of the media applies to representations of fact when the accuracy of the facts is at the time the statement is made still uncertain and cannot be immediately verified. It does not, however, apply when it has already been established that a statement is not true, as is the case here.

(3) Since the condition imposed by the authority under challenge cannot be objected to on the basis of s. 185 in conjunction with s. 194.1 sentence 2 of the Criminal Code as it is, whether this also applies for the purposes of establishing culpability under ss. 130 and 189 of the Criminal Code is no longer of any importance.

III.

The same considerations apply as regards review of the decisions under challenge against the standard of Article 8.1 of the Basic Law. No other conclusion can therefore be inferred from this fundamental right.

b) Wunsiedel Assembly; Hess Memorial - BVerfG, 4.11.2009, 1 BvR 2150/08, http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20091104_1bvr215008en.html (BVerfGE 124, 300)

Headnotes:

1. Even though it is not a general law, § 130.4 of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch – StGB) is compatible with Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law. In view of the injustice and the horror which National Socialist rule inflicted on Europe and large parts of the world, defying general categories, and of the establishment of the Federal Republic of Germany which was understood as an antithesis of this, an exception to the ban on special legislation for opinion-related laws is inherent in Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law for provisions which impose boundaries on the propagandistic condonation of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force.
2. The amenability of Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law to such special provisions does not rescind the substantive content of freedom of opinion. The Basic Law does not justify a general ban on the dissemination of right-wing radical or indeed National Socialist ideas already with regard to the intellectual impact of its content.

Ruling:

The constitutional complaint is rejected as unfounded.

Facts:

With his constitutional complaint, the complainant opposes a judgment on an appeal on points of law of the Federal Administrative Court which has as its subject-matter the banning under the law on assemblies of a commemorative demonstration for Rudolf Heß in Wunsiedel that had been announced for 20 August 2005. The ruling is based on § 15.1 of the Act on Meetings and Processions (Gesetz über Versammlungen und Aufzüge) (in the new version of 15 November 1978, Federal Law Gazette (Bundesgesetzblatt – BGBl) I p. 1789 <1791> - Assemblies Act (Versammlungsgesetz – VersG)) in conjunction with § 130.4 of the Criminal Code. The complainant opposes both § 130.4 of the Criminal Code itself and its interpretation in the concrete case. [1]

I.

The provision contained in § 130.4 of the Criminal Code was inserted into the Criminal Code with the Act Amending the Assemblies Act and the Criminal Code (Gesetz zur Änderung des Versammlungsgesetzes und des Strafgesetzbuchs) of 24 March 2005 and came into effect as per 1 April 2005 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 969 <970>). It reads as follows: [2]

> (4) Whosoever publicly or in a meeting disturbs the public peace in a manner that violates the dignity of the victims by approving of, glorifying, or justifying the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force shall be liable to imprisonment of not more than three years or a fine. [3]
> In terms of the law on assemblies, § 130.4 of the Criminal Code becomes significant because of § 15.1 of the Assemblies Act. This reads as follows: [4]

(1) The competent authority may ban the meeting or the procession or make it subject to specific conditions if according to the circumstances which are recognisable at the time of the issuance of the order, public security or order would be directly placed at risk if the meeting or the procession were to take place. [5]

A danger to public security is to be presumed according to this provision inter alia if the violation of criminal provisions is threatened (Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts – BVerfGE) 69, 315 <352>). [6]

C.

The constitutional complaint is unfounded. § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is compatible with the Basic Law (C I-V), and was applied by the Federal Administrative Court in a manner which is constitutionally unobjectionable (D). [24]

I.

§ 130.4 of the Criminal Code encroaches on the area protected by Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. [25]

Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law guarantees to every person the right to express and disseminate his or her opinion freely. Opinions are characterised by the subjective relationship between the individual and the content of his or her statement (see BVerfGE 7, 198 <210>). The element of taking a position and of appraising/having one's way of thinking is characteristic of them (see BVerfGE 7, 198 <210>; 61, 1 <8>; 90, 241 <247>). In this respect, they also cannot be proven to be true or untrue. They enjoy the protection of the fundamental right without it being a matter of whether the statement is well-founded or groundless, emotional or rational, is evaluated as valuable or valueless, dangerous or harmless (see BVerfGE 90, 241 <247>). Nor are citizens legally obliged to personally share the values on which the Constitution is based. The Basic Law is built on the expectation that citizens accept and realise the general values of the Constitution, but does not bring about loyalty to values by force (see Federal Constitutional Court, Orders of the First Chamber of the First Senate of 24 March 2001 - 1 BvQ 13/01 -, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift – NJW 2001, p. 2069 <2070> and of 15 September 2008 - 1 BvR 1565/05 -, NJW 2009, p. 908 <909>). [26]

Opinions aiming to fundamentally change the political system regardless of whether and how far they are implementable in the context of the system of the Basic Law are hence also protected by Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. The Basic Law trusts in the power of the free debate as the most effective weapon against the dissemination of totalitarian, inhumane ideologies. Accordingly, even the dissemination of National Socialist ideas as a radical questioning of the valid system does not from the outset fall outside the area protected by Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. Within the free system of the Basic Law, it is primarily civil commitment in the free political debate, as well as state education and upbringing in schools according to Article 7 of the Basic Law which are entrusted with countering the dangers lying therein. [27]

By virtue of the fact that § 130.4 of the Criminal Code links to the approval, glorification and justification of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force and penalises this subject to further preconditions, the provision encroaches on the area protected by freedom of opinion. [28]

II.

The encroachment on freedom of opinion is justified. § 130.4 of the Criminal Code constitutes a statutory basis which in a constitutionally permissible manner can justify an encroachment on freedom of opinion. The criminal provision is not a general law within the meaning of Article 5.2 alternative 1 of the Basic Law (1). As a special legislation, it can also not be based on the right to personal honour according to Article 5.2 alternative 3 of the Basic Law (2). In relation to the National Socialist Regime in the years between 1933 and 1945, Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law however also permits encroachments to be made through provisions which do not comply with the requirements as to a general law. In view of the unique injustice and of the horror which this rule under German responsibility inflicted on Europe and large parts of the world, and of the significance of this past, which characterises the identity of the Federal Republic of Germany, statements approving of this can have impacts which cannot be suitably done justice to solely in categories that are amenable to generalisation (3). [29]

1. § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is not a general law within the meaning of Article 5.2 alternative 1 of the Basic Law. [30]

a) According to Article 5.2 alternative 1 of the Basic Law, freedom of opinion finds its limits in the provisions of the general laws. These are to be understood as including laws which do not prohibit an opinion as such, which are not directed against the utterance of the opinion as such, but which serve to protect a legal interest which is to be protected per se without regard to a specific opinion (see BVerfGE 7, 198 <209-210>; 28, 282 <292>; 71, 162 <175-176>; 93, 266 <291>; established caselaw). [31]

This legal interest must be protected in the legal system generally, and hence regardless of whether it can be violated by expressions of opinion or by other means (see BVerfGE 111, 147 <155>; 117, 244 <260>). [32]

aa) A starting point for examining whether a law is a general one is first and foremost the question of whether a provision is linked to the content of opinions. If it covers the conduct in question quite independently from the content of an expression of opinion, there are no doubts with regard to the general nature of the law. If, by contrast, it links to the content of an expression of opinion, one must ask whether the provision serves to protect a legal interest otherwise protected in the legal system. If this is the case, it can be presumed as a rule that the law does not target a specific opinion, but generally aims in an opinion-neutral manner to avert violations of legal interests. In this respect, it is not the case that any linking to the content of opinions as such lends to a law the character of a general law. Instead, content-linking provisions are also to be evaluated as general laws if they recognisably target the protection of specific legal interests and not a specific opinion. On the basis of this presumption, the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht), in relation to Article 5.2 of the Basic Law, for instance evaluated as general laws the provisions on the duties of soldiers and civil servants to exercise political moderation (see BVerfGE 28, 282 <292>; 39, 334 <367>), on the punishability of defamation of the state and its symbols according to § 90a of the Criminal Code (see BVerfGE 47, 198 <232>; 69, 257 <268-269>), on insult according to § 185 of the Criminal Code (see BVerfGE 93, 266 <291>; Chamber Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Kammerentscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts – BVerfGK 8, 89 <96>; Federal Constitutional Court, order of the First Chamber of the First Senate of 12 May 2009 - 1 BvR 2272/ 04 -, NJW 2009, p. 3016 <3017>) or on the predecessor version of the offence of incitement to hatred according to § 130 old of the Criminal Code (see BVerfGE 90, 241 <251>; 111, 147 <155>). [32]

Having said that, it cannot be concluded from this case-law, conversely, that any time when a provision protects a recognised legal interest, its generality is per se solely secured by this (see Enders, Juristenzeitung – JZ 2008, p. 1092 <1094>). The fact that a law restricting opinions protects a recognised legal interest does not guarantee its generality for each case, but merely constitutes an indication of safeguarding of distance in terms of the rule of law and compliance with the principle of neutrality of opinions. The Federal Constitutional Court has always stressed that the legal interest in question must be protected per se, without regard for a specific opinion (see BVerfGE 111, 147 <155>; 117, 244 <260>), and that links to content must therefore be neutral with regard to the various political currents and ideologies. Accordingly, it was material to the qualification of § 90a of the Criminal Code as a general law that this provision makes punishable the disparagement of the Federal Republic of Germany "regardless of a political conviction" (see BVerfGE 47, 198 <232>). Nothing else applies to §§ 86 and 86a of the Criminal Code, which the Federal Constitutional Court has also judged to be general laws (see BVerfGE 111, 147 <155>). § 86.1 no. 4 in conjunction with § 86a.1 no. 1 of the Criminal Code contains an explicit link to National Socialist organisations. In the context of the overall provision contained in § 86.1 of the Criminal Code, this is however nonetheless not special legislation. The provision does not target the dissemination of National Socialist ideas, but establishes a factually restricted right to punish against the organisation-related continuation of formally banned associations and parties, and extends it to equally cover all organisations affected by it. [33]

bb) A law is not general if a content-related restriction of opinion is not sufficiently openly worded and from the outset only targets specific convictions, stances or ideologies. [34]

Laws to protect legal interests are only general if, taking the required overall view, they prove to be consistent and abstractly thought in terms of the legal interest and are designed regardless of views which are found to be held in specific instances. This includes a sufficiently generally worded formulation of the act of violation, as well as of the protected legal interests, which ensures that in the political field of powers, the provision appears to be open vis-à-vis various groups and, fundamentally, the expression of opinion that is penalised or banned can emerge from various fundamental political, religious or ideological positions. What is needed is a version of the provision which, distant from concrete exchanges in the political or other type of debate as required by the rule of law, guarantees strict "blindness" vis-à-vis those to whom it is to be ultimately applied. It may be orientated solely towards the legal interest that is to be protected, but not towards a value judgment or condemnation as to the concrete attitudes or positions taken up. [35]

Corresponding to the ban on placing at a disadvantage or allotting preference because of political views (Article 3.3 sentence 1 alternative 9 of the Basic Law), the general nature of the law hence guarantees for encroachments on freedom of opinion a specific and strict ban on discrimination vis-à-vis specific opinions. Laws which link to the content of expressions of opinion, and which ban or sanction violations of legal interests caused by such means, are only permissible on proviso of strict neutrality and equal treatment. [36]

The question of whether, according to these principles, a provision is still to be assessed as a general law or as special legislation cannot be schematically answered here. It is rather more a matter of taking an overall view. This should be based in particular on the degree to which a provision is restricted to abstract content-related criteria which are open to various positions or takes as a basis differentiations which are related to a concrete standpoint, and in particular for instance ideology-related differences (see similar discussion in BVerfGE 47, 198 <232>). An indication of special legislation is for instance if it is understood as a response to an existing conflict within the current debate that is going on within public opinion or, linking to content-related positions of individual available groups, is formulated such that it can in the main only be applied vis-à-vis these. The same applies to sanctions of conduct which typically derives from a concrete attitude of mind or from a specific ideological, political, or historical interpretation, or also for provisions which aim exclusively at affiliation to groups which are defined by such attitudes. The more a provision is interpreted in such a way that it is likely to affect solely proponents of specific political, religious or ideological views, and hence has an impact on the debate within public opinion, the more it is suggested that the threshold to special legislation has been overstepped. An indication of special legislation is equally if a law which serves to restrict opinions is linked to certain historical interpretations of events or is restricted to the protection of the legal interests of a group of individuals which is no longer open, but already established. All in all, it is a matter of whether the opinion-restricting provision keeps a fundamental distance in terms of its content from the various concrete positions in the political and ideological debate on opinions. [37]

b) On this basis, § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is not a general law. The provision serves the purpose of public peace, and hence the protection of a legal interest which is also protected elsewhere in the legal system in many ways. However, § 130.4 of the Criminal Code does not design this protection in a general manner with open content, but related solely to expressions of opinion where a specific position is taken up towards National Socialism. The provision serves not to protect victims of violence in general terms, and deliberately does not aim at the approval, glorification and justification of the rule of arbitrary force of totalitarian regimes as a whole, but is restricted to statements solely in relation to National Socialism. Also in terms of the manner in which it came about, the provision was materially understood as a response to public meetings and marches held by right-wing radicals whose demonstrations establish a connection to the time of National Socialism - not lastly in particular also targeting the annual commemorative events for Rudolf Heß (see minutes of the session (Sitzungsprotokoll) of the German Bundestag 15/158 of 18 February 2005, pp. 14818 and 14820; minutes of the Committee on Internal Affairs 15/56 of 7 March 2005, pp. 11 and 22 et seq., 44, 45, 53-54 and 57; Bundestag printed paper (Bundestagsdrucksache – BTDrucks) 15/5051, p. 6; minutes of the session of the German Bundestag 15/164 of 11 March 2005, p. 15352). In this respect, it is a reaction of the legislature to concrete political views judged as particularly dangerous in the debate within public opinion. The provision penalises expressions of opinion which may result solely from a specific interpretation of history and from a corresponding position. It is hence not blind towards existing fundamental positions but, in its element of the offence, already provides criteria which are related to specific standpoints. Hence, it is not a general law, but special legislation to specifically avert those violations of legal interests which emerge from the expression of a specific opinion, namely the condonation of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force. [38]

2. As special legislation, § 130.4 of the Criminal Code also cannot be based on the right to personal honour according to Article 5.2 alternative 3 of the Basic Law - here related to the dignity of the victims. The requirement of the general nature of opinionrestricting laws according to Article 5.2 alternative 1 of the Basic Law also covers provisions to protect honour. [39]

Article 5.2 of the Basic Law is based on a term of the general law, according to which the threshold to special legislation has not yet been reached if an opinionrestricting law links to opinion contents in general terms, but only when the offence already contains items related to a specific viewpoint and the provision is therefore not designed in a manner which is neutral in terms of opinions. According to this view, the ban of special legislation guaranteed in the requirement of a general law guarantees protection against discrimination linking to specific opinions and political views, as is similarly also contained in Article 3.3 sentence 1 alternative 9 of the Basic Law ("political views"), and hence ensures distance to protection of freedom of opinion as required by the rule of law. In this understanding, the ban on special legislation must however apply across-the-board, and must cover all laws which serve to restrict opinions. Statutory provisions on protection of youth or personal honour are subject to it, as are those to protect other legal interests. Accordingly, the Federal Constitutional Court has for instance also previously regarded the crime of insult as constituting a general law (see BVerfGE 69, 257 <268-269>; 93, 266 <291>; see also BVerfGK 1, 289 <291>). This understanding has also found support in the history of freedom of opinion. Freedom of opinion already found its limits in the general laws according to Article 118 of the Constitution of the German Reich (Weimar Reich Constitution). An additional exception going beyond individual provisions on the prohibition of censorship for protection of youth and honour was not contained in the provision. Rather, such provisions were regarded as being covered by the general laws as a matter of principle, regardless of the various positions regarding the content interpretation of the criterion for a general law between the special-legislation doctrine (see Häntzschel, Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts – AöR, Vol. 10, 1926, p. 228 <232>; Häntzschel, in: Handbuch des Deutschen Staatsrechts, Vol. 29, 1932, p. 651 <657 et seq.>; Rothenbücher, in: Veröffentlichungen der Vereinigung der Deutschen Staatsrechtslehrer – VVDStRL Vol. 4 1928, p. 6 <20>) and the teaching of Smend (see VVDStRL Vol. 4 1928, p. 44 <52>). It is not evident that the legislature handing down the Basic Law wished to make any other fundamental decision in this regard with Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law. The explicit inclusion of youth and honour protection in Article 5.2 of the Basic Law was merely intended to ensure that such provisions continue to be permissible. It was however not intended to rescind the requirements to be made of all laws with regard to the distance required by the rule of law through neutrality in terms of opinions. [40]

3. Even though it is not a general law, § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is compatible with Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law. In view of the injustice and the horror which National Socialist rule inflicted on Europe and large parts of the world, defying general categories, and of the establishment of the Federal Republic of Germany which was understood as an antithesis of this, an exception to the ban on the special legislation for opinion-related laws is inherent in Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law for provisions which impose boundaries on the propagandistic condonation of the National Socialist Regime between the years 1933 and 1945. [41]

a) Concerning the requirement of the general nature of laws which impose restrictions on opinions according to Article 5.2 of the Basic Law, an exception is to be recognised for provisions which aim to prevent a propagandistic affirmation of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force between the years 1933 and 1945. The inhuman regime of this period, which brought immeasurable suffering, death and suppression to Europe and the world, has an antithetical significance characterising the identity of the constitutional system of the Federal Republic of Germany which is unique and cannot be captured solely on the basis of general statutory provisions. The deliberate discarding of the tyrannical regime of National Socialism was historically a central concern of all the powers participating in the establishment and passing of the Basic Law (see Constitutional Committee of the Conference of Minister-Presidents of the Western Occupation Zones (Verfassungsausschuss der Ministerpräsidenten-Konferenz der Westlichen Besatzungszonen), Report on the Constitutional Convention at Herrenchiemsee (Bericht über den Verfassungskonvent auf Herrenchiemsee), from 10 to 23 August 1948, pp. 18, 20, 22 and 56), in particular also of the Parliamentary Council (see Parliamentary Council (Parlamentarischer Rat), Written Report on the Draft of the Basic Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, Annex to the Stenographic Record of the 9th Session of the Parliamentary Council on 6 May 1949, pp. 5, 6 and 9) and forms an internal structure of the order of the Basic Law (see only Article 1, Article 20 and Article 79.3 of the Basic Law). The Basic Law can be largely particularly interpreted as an antithesis to the totalitarianism of the National Socialist regime, and from its structure through to its many details seeks to learn from historical experience and to rule out a repeat of such injustice once and for all. The final overcoming of the National Socialist structures and the prevention of the resurgence of a totalitarian nationalist Germany was a major motive for the re-establishment of the German state by the Allies and – as shown for instance by the Atlantic Charter of 14 August 1941, the Potsdam Agreement of 2 August 1945 and Act no. 2 of the Allied Control Council for the Disbandment and Liquidation of the Nazi Organizations (Kontrollratsgesetz Nr. 2 zur Auflösung und Liquidierung der Naziorganisationen) of 10 October 1945 – constituted a major conceptual basis for the Frankfurt Documents of 1 July 1948, in which the military governors commissioned the Minister-Presidents from their occupation zones with the creation of a new constitution. The experience of the destruction of all civilising achievements by National Socialism provided a strong impetus for the creation of the European Communities, as well as of many international agreements, particularly including the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. It makes a major contribution towards characterising the entire post-War system and the inclusion of the Federal Republic of Germany in the international community to the present day. [42]

Against this background, the propagandistic condonation of the historical National Socialist rule of arbitrary force, with all the terrible factual events for which it is responsible, exerts an impact far beyond the general tensions of the debate within public opinion and cannot be covered solely on the basis of the general rules regarding the boundaries imposed on freedom of opinion. In Germany, favouring this rule constitutes an attack on the internal identity of the community and has a potential to pose a threat to peace. In this regard, it is not comparable with other expressions of opinion, and ultimately it can also trigger profound disquiet abroad. Doing justice to this historically rooted special situation by special provisions is not intended to be ruled out by Article 5.2 of the Basic Law. The need for the general nature of laws imposing restrictions on opinions, with which Article 5.2 of the Basic Law obliges the legislature, linking to long lines of tradition, to guarantee the protection of legal interest over expressions of opinion regardless of specific convictions, stances and ideologies, cannot demand application for this unique constellation which concerns the historically affected identity of the Federal Republic of Germany, which cannot be transferred to other conflicts. § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is accordingly not unconstitutional because it is a special provision which has as its sole subject-matter the evaluation of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force. [43]

b) The amenability of Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law to such special provisions which relate to statements on the National Socialism of the years between 1933 and 1945 does not rescind the substantive content of freedom of opinion. In particular, the Basic Law does not have a general anti-National Socialist fundamental principle (see however in rem: Battis/Grigoleit, Neue Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht – NVwZ 2001,

p. 121 <123 et seq.>; Münster Higher Administrative Court, order of 23 March 2001 - 5 B 395/01 -, NJW 2001, p. 2111), which permitted a ban of the dissemination of right-wing radical or even National Socialist ideas already with regard to the intellectual impact of its content. Such a fundamental principle emerges in particular neither from Article 79.3 of the Basic Law nor from Article 139 of the Basic Law, in which on the basis of a deliberate decision, only the provisions designated there are removed from the application of the constitution. The Basic Law goes as far as granting as a matter of principle freedom of opinion to the enemies of freedom, trusting in the power of the public debate carried on in freedom. The Parliamentary Council also acknowledged this towards National Socialism, which had only recently been overcome. In Article 9.2, Article 18 and Article 21.2 of the Basic Law, it determined that the mere dissemination of anti-constitutional ideas as such does not constitute the boundary of the political debate carried on in freedom, but only an actively belligerent, aggressive stance vis-à-vis the freedom-based democratic fundamental system (see BVerfGE 5, 85 <141>). Accordingly, Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law guarantee freedom of opinion as intellectual freedom, regardless of the evaluation of their content with regard to correctness, legal enforceability or dangerousness (see BVerfGE 90, 241 <247>). Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law does not permit the state to encroach on the way of thinking, but only empowers an intervention to be carried out when expressions of opinion leave the purely intellectual domain of opinion and become reflected in violations of legal interests or recognisably turn into danger situations. [44]

Also the exception, which is to be recognised according to Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law, to the requirement of the general nature of opinion-restricting laws because of the unique nature of the crimes committed under the historical National Socialist rule of arbitrary force and the resultant responsibility for the Federal Republic of Germany does not open any doors to this, but entrusts the responsibility for the necessary repression of such dangerous ideas to free critical debate. It merely permits the legislature to issue separate provisions for expressions of opinion which have as their subject-matter a positive evaluation of the National Socialist regime in its historical reality, such provisions being connected with the specific impact of such statements in particular and taking these into account. Even such provisions must however comply with the principle of proportionality and in doing so be orientated strictly towards externalised protection of legal interests, but not towards an evaluation of the content of the opinion in question. [45]

III.

§ 130.4 of the Criminal Code satisfies the requirements of the principle of proportionality. The provision pursues a legitimate purpose with the protection of the public peace, to achieve which it is suitable, necessary and appropriate. [46]

1. § 130.4 of the Criminal Code serves to protect the public peace. This constitutes a legitimate protection purpose which with a proper understanding which is restricted in the light of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law is able to justify the encroachment on freedom of opinion. [47]

a) The determination of a legitimate purpose is a prerequisite for an encroachment on Article 5.1 of the Basic Law and is material for its proportionality (see BVerfGE 80, 137 <159>; 104, 337 <347>; 107, 299 <316>). As a matter of principle, any public interest which is not constitutionally ruled out is legitimate. What purposes are legitimate also depends here on the respective fundamental right which is being encroached upon. In particular, the rescission of the freedom principle contained in the respective fundamental right as such is not legitimate. For freedom of opinion this finds its specific expression in the theory of interaction: An interaction takes place between protection of fundamental rights and boundaries on fundamental rights in the sense that the general laws do impose boundaries, but that these in turn must be determined once more in the light of these fundamental rights guarantees (see BVerfGE 7, 198 <208-209.>; 94, 1 <8>; 107, 299 <331>). The boundaries on freedom of opinion may not call into question their substantial content. This applies to the interpretation just as to the restricting law, and to the purposes themselves pursued with it (see BVerfGE 77, 65 <75>). [48]

For encroachments on Article 5.1 of the Basic Law, it ensues that their purpose may not aim to ensure that protective measures are taken towards impacts of specific expressions of opinion that remain purely intellectual. The intention of preventing statements with content that is damaging or dangerous in their conceptual consequence rescinds the principle of freedom of opinion itself and is illegitimate (see already Häntzschel, in: Handbuch des Deutschen Staatsrechts, Vol. 29, 1932, pp. 651 et seq.; Rothenbücher, in: VVDStRL Vol. 4 1928, pp. 6 et seq.). The same applies – regardless of Article 9.2, Article 18 and Article 21.2 of the Basic Law – to the concern of preventing the dissemination of anti-constitutional views. Solely the lack of value or indeed dangerousness of opinions as such is not a reason to restrict them (see BVerfGE 90, 241 <247>). Article 5.1 of the Basic Law does not permit subjecting freedom of opinion to a general reserve of weighing up. [49]

By contrast, it is legitimate to prevent violations of legal interests. Where the legislature aims to restrict expressions of opinion to the degree that they overstep the threshold to an individually identifiable, concrete, definable danger of a rights violation, it pursues a legitimate purpose. The legislature can in this regard link in particular to expressions of opinion which, beyond the formation of convictions, are indirectly intended to provoke real impacts and can for instance directly trigger consequences placing legal interests at risk in the shape of appeals to violate laws, aggressive emotionalisation or the lowering of inhibitions. [50]

For the protection of substantive legal interests, there emerges from this a kind of threshold for interference for warding off danger: dangers which derive solely from the opinions as such are too abstract to justify the state banning them. As long as a risk lies solely in the abstraction of an opinion and the exchange on this, warding off danger is entrusted to the intellectual debate carried on in freedom between the various currents within society. Opinion-restricting measures with regard to the content of statements can, however, be permissible if the opinions recognisably endanger the legal interests of individuals or interests of the general public which are to be protected. Warding off dangers to legal interests is then a legitimate goal of the legislature. The state is hence limited in terms of the rule of law to encroachments serving to protect legal interests in the domain of that which is external. By contrast, it is not entitled to encroach on the subjective, inner individual conviction or on the positions taken up, and in this respect, according to Article 5.1 of the Basic Law, also on the right to impart and disseminate these. [51]

Purely intellectual impacts and right-violating impacts of expressions of opinion are not in strict opposition to one another here. They are not definable in purely formal terms, and may overlap. The legislature has some latitude here in the design of opinion-restricting laws in this respect. It must however from the outset restrict itself to pursuing protection purposes which are orientated towards this boundary and do not themselves rescind the principle of the free intellectual debate itself. This setting of boundaries must also be followed by a review of proportionality. The more concretely and directly a legal interest is placed in danger by an expression of opinion, the less stringent are the requirements when it comes to an encroachment; the more indirect and distant the threatening violations of legal interests remain, the greater are the requirements to be made. Accordingly, encroachments on freedom of opinion are more to be accepted when they are restricted to the forms and circumstances of an expression of opinion in the outside world. The more, by contrast, they ultimately result in a content-related suppression of the opinion itself, the higher are the requirements as to the concrete threat of a danger to legal interests. [52]

b) The legislature has based § 130.4 of the Criminal Code on the protection of public peace (see Bundestag printed paper 15/4832, p. 3; printed paper of the Committee on Internal Affairs 15(4)191, p. 5; Bundestag printed paper 15/5051, p. 5). This is constitutionally tenable. Having said that, according to the above standards the term of public peace is to be based on a restrictive understanding. [53]

aa) An understanding of public peace which aims to protect against subjective disquiet being caused to citizens through the confrontation with provocative opinions and ideologies or to conserve social or ethical views which are seen as fundamental is not tenable for the justification of encroachments on freedom of opinion. Disquiet which is brought about by intellectual debate in the struggle to form opinions and which follows solely from the content of the ideas and their conceptual consequences is the other side of the coin and unavoidable if one is to have freedom of opinion; it cannot constitute a legitimate goal for the restriction of this freedom. The possible confrontation with disquieting opinions, even if in their conceptual consequence they are dangerous, and even if they aim at a fundamental transformation of the valid order, is part of the state based on freedom. Protection against an impairment of the "general feeling of peace" or the "poisoning of the intellectual atmosphere" constitute no more reason for an encroachment than does the protection of the population against an insult to their sense of right and wrong by totalitarian ideologies or an evidently false interpretation of history. Neither does the goal of establishing human rights in the legal awareness of the population permit the suppression of contrary views. Instead, the constitution trusts that society can cope with criticism, and even polemics, in this regard, and that they will be countered in a spirit of civil commitment, and that finally citizens will exercise their freedom by refusing to follow such views. By contrast, the recognition of public peace as a limit of what is acceptable as against unacceptable ideas solely because of the opinion as such would disable the principle of freedom, which itself is guaranteed in Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. [54]

bb) However, public peace, understood as guaranteeing peacefulness, is a legitimate purpose for adhering to which the legislature may limit expressions of opinion which have a public impact. The goal here is to provide protection against statements which, in terms of their content, are recognisably aimed towards acts which place legal interests in peril, that is, they mark the transition to aggression or to law-breaking. The maintenance of public peace relates in this regard to the external impact of expressions of opinion, for instance through appeals or emotionalisation which trigger among those approached a willingness to act or reduce inhibitions or directly intimidate third parties. Here too, the encroachment on freedom of opinion may be connected to the content of the expression of opinion. However, the protection of public peace aims to maintain a peaceful co-existence. It is a matter of upstream legal protection of interests, targeting imminent dangers which assume concrete form in reality. In this sense, public peace is an interest to be protected on which various provisions of criminal law have been based for many years, such as the bans on public incitement to crime (§ 111 of the Criminal Code), threatening to commit offences (§ 126 of the Criminal Code), rewarding and approving of offences (§ 140 of the Criminal Code) or indeed the other offences of the section on incitement to hatred (§ 130.1 to 130.3 of the Criminal Code). [55]

c) As is shown by the reasoning of the law, the legislature has based § 130.4 of the Criminal Code solely and tenably on the protection of public peace. The question of whether and in what understanding the provision could also be based on the protection of the dignity of victims of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force is hence immaterial. [56]

2. The design of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is suitable to protect public peace in its understanding as the peaceful nature of the public debate. [57]

§ 130.4 of the Criminal Code defines as punishable acts the approval, glorification and justification of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force. Hence it is not the condonation of ideas which is punished, but that of real crimes which are unique in history and cannot be overstated in terms of their inhumanity. The law opposes the awakening and approval of the wrongdoings of a regime which strove to eliminate whole population groups and has burned itself into the awareness of the present time as a nightmare of immeasurable brutality. That condonation of the rule of arbitrary force of this time appears to today's population as a rule as aggression and as an assault on those who regard their value and their rights as being called into question once again, and in view of historical reality has a greater impact than a mere confrontation with an ideology which is inimical to democracy and freedom, is a constitutionally tenable evaluation on the part of the legislature. This is more than merely an offensive intellectual relativisation of the prohibition of violence. Rather, the announcement of a positive evaluation of this tyrannical regime as a rule, firstly, leads to resistance or causes intimidation and, secondly, has an effect on the proponents of such views who are targeted in that it lowers their inhibitions. [58]

Related to the historical National Socialist rule of arbitrary force, the offences of approval, glorification and justification are also typically sufficiently intense to endanger the peacefulness of the political debate. The provision does not already penalise a playing down of National Socialism as an ideology or an offensive interpretation of the history of this time, but it does penalise the externally manifested condonation of the real historical rule of arbitrary force as was applied under National Socialism. Regardless of the characteristic additionally inserted by the legislature of the violation of the dignity of the victims, this already constitutes a suitable link to the protection of the public peace within the meaning of peacefulness. In terms of the legislative evaluation, the provision is similarly shaped in this respect as was previously § 140 of the Criminal Code, which penalises the rewarding and approval of specific, particularly serious criminal offences which were actually committed. [59]

The design of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is also not unsuitable to the degree that the punishment covers not only statements made in public, but also those made in closed meetings. The legislature was able to presume that the condonation of this rule of arbitrary force as a rule also causes external reactions from closed meetings. Where this does not apply in individual cases, this can be correctively dealt with via the further element of the offence of disturbing the public peace (see C V 2 b below). [60]

3. § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is also necessary for the protection of the public peace that the legislature seeks to achieve. A less incisive means which with regard to the violations of rights in question here can guarantee the protection of the public peace in an equally effective manner is not evident. [61]

§ 130.4 of the Criminal Code is also proportionate in the narrower sense in terms of its design. With an interpretation which does justice to Article 5.1 of the Basic Law, the provision gives rise to suitable compensation between freedom of opinion and the protection of the public peace. It is in particular not excessively broad in the sense that it would penalise even the dissemination of right-wing radical views and also those connected to the ideology of National Socialism with regard to their content. It neither bans in general terms an affirming evaluation of measures of the National Socialist regime nor a positive link to dates, places or forms taking on a semantic content reminiscent of this time with considerable symbolic power. The threat of punishment is restricted solely to the condonation of the historically real rule of arbitrary force under National Socialism for which Germany has shouldered a long-term responsibility which has a special historical foundation. Additionally, the definition of the crime demands that this banned confirmation also in fact – as to be anticipated as a rule – takes place in a manner which violates the dignity of the victims and leads to a disturbance of public peace. Atypical situations in which the restriction of freedom of opinion caused by a ban may be unsuitable in individual cases can be taken up by this offence (see C V 2 b below). All in all, § 130.4 of the Criminal Code is designed in a manner that is also proportionate in the narrow sense of the word. [62]

IV.

§ 130.4 of the Criminal Code also does not breach Article 3.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (ban on placing at a disadvantage because of political views) which protects against encroachments which link solely to merely "holding" a political view. By contrast, the proportionality of encroachments which link to the statement and action of such views in principle depends on the respective fundamental freedom rights (see BVerfGE 39, 334 <368>). This at least applies if special equality guarantees are inherent in the corresponding fundamental freedom rights, as in this case Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law. A violation of Article 3.3 of the Basic Law cannot be considered with this. In particular, no further requirements can emerge from Article 3.1 of the Basic Law than those from Article 5.1 and 5.2 of the Basic Law. [63]

V.

§ 130.4 of the Criminal Code is also compatible with Article 103.2 of the Basic Law. [64]

1. Article 103.2 of the Basic Law obliges the legislature to describe the prerequisites of punishability in such concrete terms that the scope and area of application of the offences can be recognised and can be ascertained through interpretation. This obligation serves a two-fold purpose. On the one hand, it serves the protection of the addressee of the provision in line with the rule of law: Everyone should be able to predict what conduct is banned and punishable. On the other hand, it should be ensured that only the legislature decides on punishability. In this regard, Article 103.2 of the Basic Law contains a strict legal reserve which prevents the executive and legislative powers deciding themselves on the prerequisites for punishment (see BVerfGE 71, 108 <114>). [65]

This does not rule out terms being used which particularly require interpretation by the judge. Even in criminal law, the legislature is faced by the need to do justice to the multifarious nature of life. Because of the general and abstract nature of criminal provisions, it is furthermore unavoidable that it can be doubtful in borderline cases whether or not conduct already, or still, falls under the statutory offence. Then it is sufficient if their meaning can be ascertained in a standard case with the aid of the customary interpretation methods, and in borderline cases at any rate the risk of punishment becomes recognisable to the addressee (see BVerfGE 41, 314 <320>; 71, 108 <114-115>; 73, 206 <235>; 85, 69 <73>; 87, 209 <223-224>; 92, 1 <12>). [66]

2. The design of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code does justice to these requirements. [67]

   a) No doubts as to the adequate determinateness according to Article 103.2 of the Basic Law accrue to the terms "approval", "glorification" or "justification" of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force, as well as to the offence-related modalities "publicly or in a meeting" and "in a manner that violates the dignity of the victims". Each of these elements of the offence is already adequately clear and limited in terms of its linguistic wording in order to be amenable to interpretation within the meaning of the requirements of the case-law. The question as to how narrowly or broadly these terms are to be interpreted in the context of the provision is a question of their application.

With regard to these characteristics, the provision itself is not open in such a manner that it would place the punishability in the hands of the criminal justice system in this respect without prescribing the degree to which this is possible. [68]

b) The offence of disturbing the public peace is also compatible with the principle of legal certainty in the context of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code. [69]

aa) Having said that, recourse by the legislature passing criminal law to "public peace" as an element of the offence is not constitutionally unobjectionable per se. The fact that, with a sufficiently restricted understanding, public peace may constitute a suitable protected interest of criminal law, does not yet state that it is easily possible to also have recourse to this term as an element of the offence. Instead, understood as an element of the offence which has the effect of giving rise to punishment separately, the term of public peace casts doubt on its compatibility with the principle of legal certainty. It is open in many respects to different interpretations which are based on an intangible, subjective and collective feeling of insecurity and which are amenable here to an understanding which does not do adequate justice to the fundamental significance of the freedom rights in the system of the Basic Law. In this respect, it is also no longer possible today to link without a caesura to corresponding regulatory traditions prior to the time of the Basic Law. Correspondingly, the legal literature remains critical of the recourse to public peace under criminal law (see Fischer, Öffentlicher Friede und Gedankenäußerung, 1986, pp. 630 et seq.; Enders/Lange, JZ 2006, pp. 105 <108>; Hörnle, Grob anstößiges Verhalten, 2005, pp. 90 et seq., 282 et seq.; Junge, Das Schutzgut des § 130 StGB, pp. 26 et seq.). As an element of the offence giving rise to punishment by itself, or as a supplementary element of the offence in offences which do not already take on sufficiently limited contours as a result of other elements of the offence which are fundamentally tenable, its compatibility with Article 103.2 of the Basic Law can be subject to reservations. [70]

By contrast, there are no reservations against the element of the offence of public peace if the disturbance of public peace by other offences evaluated as punishable by the legislature is described in concrete terms by other offences which in turn are adequately determined and which already per se can uphold the threat of punishment at least fundamentally. If in such a case public peace is consulted as an additional element of the offence, its content can be more closely determined from such a context in terms of content. Public peace is to be understood then as an element of an offence the content of which is determined separately from the respective context of the provision. It has only a corrective function here. Fundamentally, the realisation of the other elements of the offence already gives rise to punishability which when it is complied with can also suggest the disturbance of public peace (or of suitability thereto) which can then be presumed. It only takes on separate significance in atypical situations if this presumption does not hold water because of special circumstances (see D I 1 b below). In this regard, public peace is not an element of the offence giving rise to punishment, but an "evaluation formula to eliminate cases not appearing to be in need of punishment" (see Fischer, StGB, 56th ed. 2009, § 130, marginal no. 14b). It is hence a corrective permitting in particular to also create validity in individual cases for fundamental rights evaluations. [71]

bb) According to these standards, there are no constitutional reservations against the determinedness of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code. The legislature was permitted to regard the approval, glorification or justification of the historical National Socialist rule of arbitrary force expressed publicly or in a meeting, at least fundamentally, as a punishable and sufficiently determined disturbance of the public peace. From this context, the disturbance of the public peace can also be determined as an element of the offence: It consists as a rule of reducing the threshold of willingness to engage in violence and in the threatening impact accruing to such statements against the specific background of German history. Such an impact can be fundamentally presumed on realisation of the further elements of the offence. The element of the offence of the public peace according to § 130.4 of the Criminal Code however makes it possible here to do justice to atypical situations within the meaning of freedom of opinion. [72]

The impugned ruling is also constitutionally unobjectionable at the level of the application of the law. The interpretation of § 15.1 of the Assemblies Act in conjunction with § 130.4 of the Criminal Code by the Federal Administrative Court is compatible with Article 8.1 in conjunction with Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. [73]

I.

1. a) Fundamentally, the interpretation and application of the criminal law is a matter for the non-constitutional courts. Laws encroaching on freedom of opinion must however be interpreted in such a manner that the fundamental content of this right, which in a freedom-based democracy must lead to a fundamental presumption in favour of freedom of expression in all areas, namely in public life, is retained under all circumstances. An interaction takes place in that the barriers do set boundaries in terms of the wording according to the fundamental right, but in turn must be interpreted from the knowledge of the fundamental significance of this fundamental right in the free democratic state, and hence themselves restricted in terms of their impact of limiting fundamental rights (see BVerfGE 7, 198 <208-209>; established case-law). [74]

The constitutional standards regarding the compatibility of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code with Article 5.1 of the Basic Law must, accordingly, also guide the interpretation of the provision. Therefore, the elements of the offence are to be interpreted such that the claim of protection only applies to impairments of public peace in the demonstrated understanding of peacefulness (see C III 1 b bb above). [75]

For the question which is material in this regard as to whether the expression of an opinion remains solely at the intellectual level or crosses the threshold to constituting a risk to legal interests, it is a matter in particular of whether the risks which may arise as a consequence of this expression of opinion only pose a threat in terms of a distant effect with the further free formation of conviction, or whether their realisation is already set in motion with the statement. The more the ideas intended with the propagation of an ideology reveal their impact only as an abstract consequence of an ideal construct, the more unambiguously they remain in the intellectual domain, which is protected as a matter of principle. The more, however, they become tangible through the nature of the statement in concrete, direct terms, the more they pose an immanent threat to specific persons, groups of individuals or real situations, the sooner they can be attributed to the real domain. A merely symbolic presentation of convictions, teachings or ways of attaining a sort of salvation will be more likely to be attributed to the intellectual domain than if violations of rights are for instance imagined in the shape of historic events in concrete, direct terms and are depicted as desirable. [76]

b) According to these principles, it is necessary in order to give rise to the application of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code that the condonation covered with this provision is recognisably related to National Socialism in particular as a historically real rule of arbitrary force. Understood as an integral term of the human rights violations that were typical of the National Socialist regime (see Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof – BGH), judgment of 28 July 2005 - 3 StR 60/05 -, NStZ 2006, p. 335 <337>), and which hence describes historically real arbitrary acts of criminal quality, it designates rights violations the affirmative evocation of which in public or at a meeting create the potential for a repeat to become real and can endanger the peacefulness of the political debate. By contrast, merely concurring with events of this period or condonation of generally National Socialist ideas cannot suffice to give rise to the commission of this offence. For instance, an incorrect historical interpretation or affirmation of National Socialist ideology cannot be adequate for punishment according to § 130.4 of the Criminal Code. [77]

The elements of the offence of approval, glorification and justification are also to be interpreted in the light of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. It is constitutionally unobjectionable here if this is also understood as approval by implication, that is not explicit but emerging from the circumstances. Having said that, this must manifest itself externally. There is a need in this respect for a recognisably active approval which carries its meaning in itself (see also Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Criminal Cases (Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen – BGHSt) 22, 282 <286>). On the other hand, approval in the shape of the mere omission – also in a one-sided manner that falsifies history – to mention historical acts of violence in connection with positive references to events of the National Socialist period does not in principle cross the threshold towards lessening the inhibitions towards the glorification of violence. By contrast, approval may also be constituted in glorifying and paying tribute to a historical figure if it emerges from the concrete circumstances that this individual stands as a symbolic figure for the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force as such. [78]

If according to the above standards, approval, glorification or justification of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force applies, it is constitutionally unobjectionable if the presumption is derived from this that the dignity of the victims is also violated through such statements. The legislature has primarily, and per se tenably, based § 130.4 of the Criminal Code on the protection of public peace, and in doing so has restrictingly added the further element of the offence "in a manner that violates the dignity of the victims" as a modal supplement. There are no constitutional objections to this, regardless of whether or to what degree the protection of the dignity of the victims always falls together with the protection of human dignity according to Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. It is consequently not a matter of the application of the particularly strict prerequisites for the presumption of a violation of human dignity when it comes to the interpretation of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code. [79]

Accordingly, with the element of the offence "condonation of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force" one may fundamentally presume the existence of a disturbance of public peace. The element of the offence of disturbing the public peace serves primarily to cover non-typical situations in which the presumption of the disturbance of the peace is not tenable because of specific circumstances, and hence freedom of opinion must prevail (see C V 2 b above). This should be considered if impacts causing incitement to violence and intimidation or threat can be ruled out in the concrete case, for instance because statements made in small closed meetings do not achieve any profound or broad impact, if they remain incidental or if they cannot be taken seriously under the specific circumstances. [80]

2. For the interpretation of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code, furthermore, the interpretation rules apply which were developed by the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court in general re Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. Hence, it is a prerequisite of any legal evaluation of expressions of opinion that their meaning has been correctly understood. Material for this is the meaning which the statement has according to the understanding of an objective, discerning public. Here, one should always take the wording of the statement as a basis. This however does not finally determine its meaning. The latter is, rather, also determined by the linguistic context in which the contested statement is embedded and the ancillary circumstances in which it is made, in so far as these were recognisable for the recipients. Judgments which recognisably disregard the meaning of the contested statement and base their legal assessment on this are in breach of the fundamental right of freedom of opinion. The same applies if in the case of ambiguous statements a court takes as a basis the meaning leading to a conviction without having previously ruled out the other possible interpretations with sound reasons (see BVerfGE 93, 266 <295-296>; established case-law). [81]

II.

The impugned ruling is not constitutionally objectionable according to these standards. [82]

The Federal Administrative Court bases its interpretation of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code on an understanding which is in compliance with Article 5.1 sentence 1 of the Basic Law. It correctly understands § 130.4 of the Criminal Code in the light of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law in that not simply the condonation of measures under the rule of National Socialism as such gives rise to the fulfilment of the element of the offence, but only one which refers particularly to National Socialism as a rule of arbitrary force, this being understood as the systematically committed serious human rights violations as they became historic reality. The Federal Administrative Court explicitly states in view of freedom of opinion that the positive evaluation only of individual aspects of the state and societal order of that time, in which no connection with the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force and the human rights violations typifying it can be created, does not fulfil the element of the offence of § 130.4 of the Criminal Code. [83]

It is also not objectionable if the Federal Administrative Court considers approval of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force by implication to be possible through overtly paying tribute to responsible and symbolic figures of this regime. The ruling is based in this respect on a nuanced view, taking freedom of opinion into account, according to which such approval can only be presumed if the person to whom tribute was paid under the extant circumstances stands as a symbolic figure for the rule of National Socialism as such, but not already if positive statements, or even statements minimising the effects of that rule, refer to – even leading – proponents of National Socialism which only apply to the person as an individual. The evaluation that the unrestricted glorification of a symbolic figure who stands for the National Socialist rule as a whole constitutes at the same time approval of the rule of arbitrary force is not subject to constitutional objections in this instance. Approval which unreservedly relates to the rule of National Socialism in the years between 1933 and 1945 as a whole will undeniably also and above all be understood by an unbiased observer as approval of the human rights violations which characterised this period. [84]

The non-constitutional courts' assessment of the concrete case related to this, according to which the meeting planned by the complainant to "commemorate Rudolf Heß" would have signified approval of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force, does not give rise to any constitutional objections. The Federal Administrative Court correctly takes as a basis the rules for the interpretation of expressions of opinion following from Article 5.1 of the Basic Law, and justifiably reaches the judgment that the unreserved glorification of Rudolf Heß could have been understood from the point of view of an unbiased, discerning public under the concrete circumstances as none other than unreserved approval of National Socialist rule as a whole – and hence in particular also of the human rights violations committed at that time. It materially bases its finding on the fact that, on an overall evaluation of the planned meeting – regardless of individual statements which taken in isolation would also be open to other interpretations – tribute was to be paid to Rudolf Heß as the "Deputy of the Führer" with considerable shared responsibility for the events and hence for the National Socialist Regime as such. In view of the longstanding and for a time particularly close relationship between Adolf Hitler and Rudolf Heß, which had also been reflected in the extremely prominent function of Rudolf Heß as "Deputy of the Führer" in all party matters, as well as of his personal responsibility for massive human rights violations, the assessment that such an interpretation would have forced itself to the fore at the meeting is within the framework of the evaluation of the specialist courts. [85]

Linking to this, it is also constitutionally not objectionable that the Federal Administrative Court – in interpreting § 130.4 of the Criminal Code as non-constitutional law – has derived from the unrestricted approval of the National Socialist rule system as a rule a violation of the dignity of the victims. It is immaterial here whether, as the Federal Administrative Court presumes, a violation of human dignity is always also linked herewith within the meaning of Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. [86]

There are also no constitutional objections against the presumption of a disturbance of public peace by the planned meeting. No indications are evident which should have led to a review of whether, in the case at hand, the disturbance of public peace fundamentally constituted by the approval of the National Socialist rule of arbitrary force was to be ruled out through special circumstances. [87]

Facts:

The constitutional complaint lodged by the complainant is directed against criminal court decisions. He was convicted for inciting hatred and violence against segments of the population (Volksverhetzung) pursuant to § 130(3) alternative 3, (5) of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB) in connection with a spoken text published on his YouTube channel and his website. [1]

I.

[Excerpt from Press Release no. 66/2018 of 3 August 2018

The complainant published an audio file on his website and on his YouTube account; on the file another person can be heard criticising the first "Wehrmacht exhibition" (on the armed forces of Nazi Germany) which was touring Germany a few years ago, on the grounds that photographs of Wehrmacht soldiers were, in part, presented in an inaccurate manner. In the audio file, the persons responsible for the exhibition are accused of falsifying and manipulating the material and inciting hatred and violence against segments of the population, and the allied forces are accused of "mendacious propaganda". It is alleged that the dissemination of historical truths were prosecuted and punished and that persons had voluntarily followed the Nazi-Schutzstaffel (SS) into the concentration camps. Survivors of the Holocaust are accused of making profits from giving lectures on the mass killings; furthermore, the view is promoted that persons who fought the Nazi regime in the resistance and witnesses who testified in the court proceedings on Nazi-era crimes had given false accounts.

The local court convicted the complainant for incitement to hatred and violence against certain segments of the population to a fine of 70 daily rates in the amount of EUR 30.00 each. The Regional Court rejected the complainant's appeal on points of law and fact and convicted him for incitement to hatred and violence against certain segments of the population to a fine of 100 daily rates in the amount of EUR 30.00 each. The appeal on points of law before the Higher Regional Court was unsuccessful.

5. In his constitutional complaint the complainant challenges the decisions of the Regional Court and the Higher Regional Court; accordingly, he claims - among other things - a violation of his right to freedom of expression under Art. 5(1) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG). [8]

6. [...] [9]

II.

1. To the extent that the complainant claims a violation of his rights under Art. 5(1) first sentence GG by the challenged judgment of the Regional Court and the challenged order of the Higher Regional Court, the Chamber admits the constitutional complaint for decision, because it is appropriate in order to enforce the rights of the complainant referred to in § 90(1) of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) (§ 93a(2) letter b BVerfGG). [10]

The judgment of the Regional Court and the order of the Higher Regional Court violate the complainant's fundamental right under Art. 5(1) GG. [11]

a) The standard to be applied is the freedom of expression under Art. 5(1) first sentence GG. [12] aa) Subject of the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG are opinions, i.e. statements characterised by the element of taking a position and making one's own assessment (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198 <210>; 61, 1 <8>; 90, 241 <247>). They are always within the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG, regardless of whether they turn out to be true or false, whether they are reasonable or without any reason, emotional or rational, or whether they are considered valuable, useless, dangerous or harmless (cf. BVerfGE 90, 241 <247>; 124, 300 <320>). [13]

Besides opinions, the scope of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG also includes factual statements because and to the extent that they are or can be the prerequisites for the formation of opinions (cf. BVerfGE 61, 1 <8>; 90, 241 <247>). Whereas deliberately untrue factual claims or such statements that are proven to be untrue are excluded from the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG because they do not contribute to the constitutionally guaranteed opinion-forming process (cf. BVerfGE 61, 1 <8>; 90, 241 <247>).

bb) However, the fundamental right to freedom of expression is not guaranteed without reservation. Pursuant to Art. 5(2) GG it is explicitly subject to the limitations that are imposed by the general laws. Formally, interferences with the right to freedom of expression must be based on a general law that is not directed against a particular opinion; substantively, interferences must meet the requirements of proportionality since the right to freedom of expression is a basic right of communication that is fundamental for the democratic order. [15]

However, with regard to the formal requirement that limitations of the right to freedom of expression be based on general laws, the Federal Constitutional Court recognises one exception for laws that seek to prevent a propagandistic affirmation of the Nazi reign of violence and tyranny in the years 1933 to 1945. The Court thereby takes account of the crucial impact of German history on the national identity and considers it for the interpretation of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <328 et seq.>). [16]

The substantive content of the freedom of expression, however, remains unaffected by this exception. In particular, the Basic Law does not contain a general principle that would allow prohibiting the dissemination of extreme right-wing or national-socialist ideas merely with regard to the effect their content has on peoples' minds. Rather, Art. 5(1) and (2) GG guarantees freedom of expression as an intellectual freedom independent of the assessment of its content, correctness, legal enforceability or dangerousness. Art. 5(1) and (2) GG does not permit the state to interfere with what a person believes but only authorises an interference once an expression of opinion leaves the purely intellectual sphere of what a person thinks is right and becomes a violation of legal interests or an apparent threat (BVerfGE 124, 300 <330>). This is the case if the statements of opinion endanger public peace in terms of the peaceful public discourse, thereby marking the transition to aggression or a violation of law (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <335>). [17]

cc) The regular courts too must take account of these requirements in the interpretation and application of the laws restricting the freedom of expression so that its role in defining values is also guaranteed at the level of application of the law. An interaction takes place between protection of fundamental rights and restrictions on fundamental rights in the sense that these restrictions impose boundaries on fundamental rights; in turn, however, these restrictions must be interpreted in the light of the principal significance of a fundamental right for a free democratic state and hence be restricted in their limiting effect on the fundamental right (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198 <208 and 209>; 124, 300 <332, 342>). [18]

b) The decision of the Regional Court as the last trial court does not meet these standards. In applying § 130(3) StGB, the Regional Court did not demonstrate in a tenable manner that the statements of the complainant were capable of endangering public peace with regard to its constitutionally required understanding as peacefulness of the public discourse. [19]

aa) The statements that gave rise to the criminal conviction fall within the scope of protection of the fundamental right of freedom of expression as they constitute hazy factual claims that are inherently linked to value judgments. It is not objectionable under constitutional law that the Regional Court held the complainant responsible for statements made by a third party and published on the complainant's website. [20]

bb) The criminal punishment for the dissemination of the read text in dispute constitutes an interference with this fundamental right. The Regional Court based the conviction on § 130(3) and (5) StGB, which provides the legal basis for the interference. The fact that § 130(3) StGB is not a general law but instead specifically criminalises statements in relation to the Nazi regime does not rule out a conviction based on the aforementioned standards. The legal provision is exempted from the formal requirement of a general law - which is applicable in other cases of interferences pursuant to Art. 5(2) GG - as it seeks to prevent a propagandistic affirmation of the Nazi reign of violence and tyranny during the years 1933 to 1945. [21]

cc) The interference with the freedom of expression does not meet its substantive requirements. The criminal courts did not sufficiently take into account the requirements of Art. 5(1) GG. [22]

(1) § 130(3) StGB focuses on the preservation of public peace. It follows from the wording of the provision that a statement only fulfils the constituent elements of the provision if it is capable of disturbing the public peace. With regard to the requirement of specificity in Art. 103(2) GG, the constituent element that a statement is capable of disturbing public peace requires further specification based on the other constituent elements; where the other constituent elements are fulfilled, disturbance of public peace can generally be assumed (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <339 et seq.>). This requires, however, that the other constituent elements be interpreted in the light of the notion "disturbance of the peace". A criminal conviction pursuant to § 130(3) StGB with all its variations - i.e. including the act of trivialisation - can therefore only be based on such statements that are capable of endangering public peace in the sense of the requirements of Art. 5(1) GG. Where this is not clearly ascertainable on the basis of the other constituent elements, the element that a statement is capable of endangering public peace must be established independently. In contrast to the acts of denial and approval, which generally evince a disturbance of the public peace, it appears that such an independent assessment is necessary with regard to the act of trivialisation. [23]

(2) In light of Art. 5(1) GG further constitutional requirements arise regarding the as sessment of whether a statement is capable of endangering public peace. [24]

First of all, consideration must be given to freedom of expression in its formation as freedom of mind. Interferences with Art. 5(1) GG must not be aimed at taking measures against the purely intellectual consequences of certain statements of opinion. Neither the aim to prevent the dissemination of anti-constitutional views nor the qualification of certain opinions as worthless or even dangerous constitute sufficient reasons for imposing restrictions on these opinions. It is, however, legitimate to prevent the violation of legal interests (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <332 and 333>). [25]

Based on these standards, the concept of public peace must be interpreted in a strict manner. It is not tenable to apply an understanding of public peace that seeks to protect citizens against subjective worries caused by being confronted with provocative opinions and ideologies. The possibility of being confronted with disconcerting opinions is part of living in a free state; this may also include opinions with dangerous intellectual consequences and even opinions that aim to fundamentally transform the existing state order. Neither the aim to prevent a "poisoning of the public mind" nor the aim to protect the public against affronts to shared legal values arising from totalitarian ideologies or a manifestly wrong interpretation of history provide a reason for interference (BVerfGE 124, 300 <334>). The trivialisation of the Nazi ideology or an offensive historic interpretation of this time period as such are not sufficient to establish criminal liability (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <336>). [26]

However, public peace in terms of its understanding as peacefulness constitutes a legitimate legal interest. In this case, the objective pursued is to protect against statements which, in substantive terms, are clearly geared towards acts that threaten protected legal interests. In this context, the protection of public peace refers to the external effects brought about by certain statements of opinion, for instance by means of calls for action or emotionalised statements that incite willingness to take action among its addressees, lower inhibitions, or directly intimidate third parties (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <335>). A statement of opinion may provide a sufficient basis for a criminal conviction where it, beyond the mere influencing of opinions, indirectly aims to bring about real life consequences that directly threaten recognised legal interests, e.g. by way of calling for unlawful action, resorting to aggressively emotionalised statements or lowering inhibitions (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <333>). [27]

(3) The challenged decisions do not meet these requirements. The Regional Court held that the statements in question were capable of endangering public peace; this finding was primarily based on the consideration that the statements undermined public trust in legal certainty and they were effectively expressing an unacceptable level of contempt. Factually, this finding only suggests a poisoning of the public mind and an affront to the shared legal values of the general public and does not cross the threshold of endangering peacefulness. The same holds true for the unsubstantiated claim that the statement was capable of impairing the peaceful coexistence of different ethnic groups - a claim which was obviously solely based on the right-wing content of the statement. The fact that the website's target audience is the extreme right of the political spectrum does not, by itself, support a finding that there was a danger to public peace in terms of the peacefulness of public discourse. [28]

Nor do the assessments of the statements as such by the regular courts indirectly show that the statements amount to a disturbance of public peace. In this regard, the Regional Court finds that the statements glossed over and downplayed the acts of violence committed by the Nazi regime. Yet, the court does not accuse the complainant of stirring aggression nor does it find that the statements amount to a denial or approval of the crimes against humanity committed by the Nazis. Rather, the court concludes that the statements provide a one-sided, euphemistic account of the Nazi era. It holds that by accusing contemporary records of history of collectively blaming the Germans for the Nazi crimes and of telling lies, the statements, which neither mention nor recognise the victims of the Nazi era, insinuated that the mass murder that took place in Auschwitz and in other places had not been committed in the scope recognised by history. This is not sufficient to establish that the threshold at which a statement is capable of disturbing public peace in terms of jeopardising a peaceful discourse has been reached as is the case for the glorification of violence, incitement to hatred and violence against certain segments of the population or also for an emotionalised presentation. A statement does not fall outside freedom of expression, however, solely because it fails to give adequate consideration to the commonly accepted records of history or to the victims. Freedom of expression also covers manifestly offensive, repugnant and intentionally provocative statements that are scientifically unfounded and seek to discredit the fundamental values of our society. [29]

However, the fact that such statements are protected by the freedom of expression does not entail that their contents should be regarded as acceptable and treated with indifference in the public discourse. Instead, the free order of the Basic Law provides that such statements - which a democratic public may find difficult to tolerate - be countered, in principle, not by imposing prohibitions but by engaging in public debate. Criminal sanctions as a limit to the freedom of expression may only be imposed where the statements can no longer be considered non-violent in nature. The challenged court decisions do not contain sufficient findings in this regard. [30]

d) The judgment of the Regional Court and its upholding by the order of the Higher Regional Court denying the appeal are based on a failure to recognise the importance and scope of the fundamental right to freedom of expression under Art. 5(1) first sentence GG. It is possible that the courts would have come to a different conclusion if they had taken the fundamental rights requirements into account. [32]

2. Accordingly, the judgment of the Regional Court and the order of the Higher Regional Court are reversed pursuant to § 93c(2) in conjunction with § 95(2) BVerfGG and the matter is remanded to the Regional Court for a new decision. [33]

d) Holocaust Denial – BVerfG, 22.6.2018, 1 BvR 673/18

Facts:

The complainant, who was convicted several times for inciting hatred and violence against segments of the population (Volksverhetzung), challenges her repeated criminal conviction for denial of the persecution of Jews by the Nazis pursuant to § 130(3) of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB). [1]

I.

[Excerpt from Press Release no. 67/2018 of 3 August 2018]

The 89-year-old complainant has published various articles in which she contends that the mass murder of people of Jewish faith under Nazi rule did not actually take place and that it was impossible, in particular, for mass gassing to have been used in the Auschwitz-Birkenau extermination camp. Several of the articles present this contention as an established fact based on new evidence; as proof, the texts repeatedly refer, inter alia, to published written commands, which supposedly show that the exclusive purpose of the Auschwitz-Birkenau camp had been to ensure that the persons detained remained fit for labour in the arms industry. In addition, the articles cite several statements allegedly made by the management board of the Auschwitz-Birkenau Memorial and Museum, various historians, newspaper interviews and statements made by witnesses and eyewitnesses, identified by name, who were purportedly exposed as liars.

On the basis of these statements in the articles, the Local Court convicted the complainant of seven counts of Volksverhetzung and one count of attempted Volksverhetzung, and imposed an aggregate prison sentence (Gesamtfreiheitsstrafe) of two years and six months. On the complainant's appeal on points of fact and law, the Verden Regional Court reduced the aggregate prison sentence to two years without parole, and rejected the appeal for the rest. The subsequent appeal on points of law was unsuccessful.

[End of excerpt]

5. The complainant challenges these decisions in her constitutional complaint of 12 March 2018. She claims that the decisions violate her fundamental rights to freedom of expression and freedom of research and teaching under Art. 5(1) first sentence and (3) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) and her right to a fair trial. In addition, she holds that the constituent elements of the offence underlying her conviction violated the principle of specificity under criminal law pursuant to Art. 103(2) GG. Imposing a prison sentence of two years without parole for statements made by the complainant who is over 80 years old violated the principle of culpability rooted in the principle of rule of law. The complainant further claims that in view of the Wunsiedel decision of the Federal Constitutional Court, § 130(3) StGB could not be considered a general law. The exception from the requirement of general applicability of a law acknowledged in that decision only referred to § 130(4) StGB and could not be applied to paragraph 3. According to the complainant, it also followed from the decision that interpretations of historical facts contrary to the majority view are protected under the right to freedom of expression and cannot be excluded from its scope of protection as untrue factual claims. At least, this approach ought to be applied to a research activity of the type undertaken by the complainant. In addition, impunity of the denial of the Holocaust followed directly from applying the principles of the Wunsiedel decision. Pursuant to that decision, interferences to maintain a general feeling of peace, to protect the majority population from an insult to its sense of right and wrong or for the protection from evidently false interpretations of history are impermissible. [16]

II.

The constitutional complaint is not admitted for decision because the prerequisites for admission pursuant to § 93a(2) of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) have not been met. The constitutional complaint does not have general constitutional significance. Nor is admission for decision appropriate to enforce the rights referred to in § 90(1) BVerfGG (cf. BVerfGE 90, 22 <24 et seq.>; 96, 245 <248 et seq.>). The constitutional complainant is unfounded because the challenged decisions do not violate the complainant's fundamental rights. [17]

1. The Federal Constitutional Court has already decided the issues with regard to the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG in general and the punishability of the denial of the persecution of Jews on the basis of § 130 StGB in particular that are relevant in the present case. [18]

a) Subject of the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG are opinions, i.e. statements characterised by the element of taking a position and making one's own assessment (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198 <210>; 61, 1 <8>; 90, 241 <247>). They are always within the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG, regardless of whether they turn out to be true or false, whether they are reasonable or without any reason, emotional or rational, or whether they are considered valuable, useless, dangerous or harmless (cf. BVerfGE 90, 241 <247>; 124, 300 <320>). [19]

Besides opinions, the scope of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG also includes factual statements because and to the extent that they are or can be the prerequisites for the formation of opinions (cf. BVerfGE 61, 1 <8>; 90, 241 <247>). Whereas deliberately untrue factual claims or such statements that are proven to be untrue are excluded from the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG because they do not contribute to the constitutionally guaranteed opinion-forming process (cf. BVerfGE 54, 208 <219>; 61, 1 <8>; 90, 241 <247>). [20]

Whether a statement is mainly of a factual nature or whether it is predominantly a value judgment must be established by interpretation of the respective statement in its overall context (cf. BVerfGE 93, 266 <295>; BVerfG, Order of the Third Chamber of the First Senate of 16 March 2017 - 1 BvR 3085/15 -, www.bverfg.de, para. 13). In this context, it must be ensured that a separation of factual and judgmental parts of a statement does not lead to an alteration of its meaning (cf. BVerfGE 90, 241 <248>). In cases in which this is not possible, the statement must be regarded - in its entirety - as an expression of opinion and included in the scope of protection of the freedom of expression in the interest of effective protection of fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 90, 241 <248>). [21]

b) If, according to these requirements, the statement at issue is protected under Art. 5(1) first sentence GG, the fundamental right to freedom of expression is not guaranteed without reservations. Pursuant to Art. 5(2) GG it is explicitly subject to the limitations that are imposed by the general laws. Formally, interferences with the right to freedom of expression must be based on a general law that is not directed against a particular opinion; substantively, interferences must meet the requirements of proportionality since the right to freedom of expression is a basic right of communication that is fundamental for the democratic order. [22]

However, with regard to the formal requirement of [a general law], the Federal Constitutional Court recognises one exception for laws that seek to prevent a propagandistic affirmation of the Nazi reign of violence and tyranny in the years 1933 to 1945. The Court thereby takes account of the crucial impact of German history on the national identity and considers it for the interpretation of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <328 et seq.>). [23]

The substantive content of the freedom of expression, however, remains unaffected by this exception. In particular, the Basic Law does not contain a general anti-national-socialist principle that would allow prohibiting the dissemination of extreme rightwing or national-socialist ideas merely with regard to the effect their content has on people's minds. Rather, Art. 5(1) and (2) GG guarantees the freedom of expression as an intellectual freedom independent of the assessment of its content, correctness, legal enforceability or dangerousness. Art. 5(1) and (2) GG does not permit the state to interfere with what a person believes but only authorises an interference once an expression of opinion leaves the purely intellectual sphere of what a person thinks is right and becomes a violation of legal interests or an apparent threat (BVerfGE 124, 300 <330>). This is the case if the statements of opinion endanger public peace in terms of the peaceful public discourse thereby marking the transition to aggression or a violation of law (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <335>). [24]

The regular courts too must take account of these requirements in the interpretation and application of the laws restricting the freedom of expression, so that its role in defining values is guaranteed at the level of application of the law. An interaction takes place between protection of fundamental rights and restrictions on fundamental rights in the sense that these restrictions impose boundaries on fundamental rights; in turn, however, these restrictions must be interpreted in the light of the principal significance of a fundamental right for a free democratic state and hence be restricted in their limiting effect on the fundamental right (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198 <208 and 209>; 124, 300 <332, 342>). [25]

c) § 130(3) StGB focuses on the preservation of public peace. It follows from the wording of the provision that a statement only fulfils the constituent elements of the provision if it is capable of disturbing the public peace. With regard to the requirement of specificity in Art. 103(2) GG the constituent element that a statement is capable of disturbing public peace requires further specification based on the other constituent elements; where the other constituent elements are fulfilled, disturbance of public peace can generally be assumed (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <339 et seq.>). This requires, however, that the other constituent elements be interpreted in the light of the notion "disturbance of the peace". [26]

2. Measured against these principles, the statements made by the complainant do for the most part not fall within the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG. For the rest, the challenged decisions are also not objectionable under constitutional law. [27]

a) The statements made by the complainant are in essence based on factual claims, which by themselves do not fall within the scope of protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG. These factual claims that are demonstrably untrue and - according to the regular courts' findings - also deliberately false do not contribute to the constitutionally guaranteed opinion-forming process and their dissemination does not fall within the freedom of expression. The fact that factual claims were made in connection with statements of opinion also does not merit a different conclusion. Also in such cases, untrue factual claims as such - unlike value judgments relying on factual claims - are excluded from the protection of Art. 5(1) first sentence GG. [28]

With her statements the complainant contests that the Auschwitz-Birkenau camp was a place used for systematic mass killings, she denies the systematic killing of Jewish persons by Nazi Germany in general and in the concentration camp Auschwitz-Birkenau in particular and claims that there is new evidence that there were no mass gassings with zyklon b in Auschwitz. As shown by innumerable eye- witness reports and documents, by historical findings and findings of courts in numerous criminal trials, these statements have proven to be untrue (cf. BVerfGE 90, 241 <249>; for the Auschwitz-Birkenau extermination camp cf. also the findings of the judgment rendered by the Frankfurt am Main Regional Court in the Auschwitz trial of 19 and 20 August 1965, 4 Ks 2/63, p. 37 to 44; […]). [29]

b) To the extent that, beyond disseminating untrue factual claims, the complainant bases her denial of the crimes pursuant to § 6 of the International Criminal Code (Völkerstrafgesetzbuch - VStGB) on subjective conclusions and appraisals invoking her freedom of expression under Art. 5(1) first sentence GG, the criminal conviction of the complainant does not violate her fundamental rights. The way the criminal courts have interpreted and applied § 130(3) StGB fulfils the requirements under Art. 5(1) first sentence GG with regard an application of this constituent element of the offence in a manner that is compatible with fundamental rights. In particular, the conviction by the criminal court took into account the requirement following from Art. 5(1) first sentence GG that interferences with the freedom of expression must not be directed against the purely intellectual consequences of certain statements of opinion but must serve the protection of recognised legal interests instead. Based on the findings in the challenged decisions, the Regional Court could reasonably assume that in case of the variant of "denial" relevant in the present case, the statements made by the complainant were capable of endangering the public peace. [30]

aa) Based on the aforementioned principles it can be assumed that the constituent elements of the offence of approval and denial generally evince disturbance of the public peace. [31]

In case of "approval" this already follows from the identity of this constituent element with the relevant element stated in § 130(4) StGB. Public approval of Nazi crimes pursuant to § 6 VStGB constitutes a form of approval of the Nazi reign of violence and tyranny that crosses the boundaries of peaceful public discourse and evinces a disturbance of the public peace (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <344>). [32]

The same holds true for the constituent element of "denial" of these crimes. Such an act crosses the boundaries of peacefulness given that, against the background of German history, the denial of the Nazi genocide - in terms of contesting that these commonly known events took place - can only be understood as the trivialisation of these crimes, which leads to the legitimation and approval thereof. Thus, the effect of denying these crimes is similar to that of their approval, which is generally sanctioned under criminal law pursuant to § 140 StGB (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <335>); it is furthermore equivalent to the glorification of the Nazi reign of violence and tyranny pursuant to § 130(4) StGB. Against the background of German history, denying the Nazi crimes of genocide is capable of provoking aggression on the part of an audience that thinks favourably of the speaker, and of inciting that audience to take action against those perceived as being the authors of, or responsible for, the purported distortion of an alleged historical truth implicit in such denial. It thus inherently carries the danger that the political discourse will turn hostile and violent. The denial of the Nazi crimes of genocide particularly endangers the peaceful political discourse not least because these crimes particularly targeted certain groups of persons or groups within society, and the denial of these events can and has been used, openly or insidiously, as a code to instigate hostile actions targeting these very groups. Against that background, it is consistent that the explanatory memorandum to the legislative draft qualifies § 130(3) StGB as a specific manifestation of the offence of Volksverhetzung traditionally recognised under criminal law. Thus, the regular courts can also assume in this case that denial of Nazi crimes evinces a disturbance of public peace. Special cases in which such effects appear to be unlikely from the outset and in which a disturbance of public peace can thus be ruled out can be dealt with by an adequate interpretation of this constituent element of the offence (cf. BVerfGE 124, 300 <339 et seq.>). [33]

bb) Measured by these standards, the findings of the Regional Court provide a sufficient basis for the criminal conviction of the complainant. According to these findings, the complainant has repeatedly and publicly contested the systematic mass killings committed by Nazi Germany, and especially the genocide of Jewish persons. Neither from these findings nor from the complainant's submission is it discernible why, in these cases exceptionally, the denial of these crimes, which constitutes a constituent element of the offence, should not be capable of disturbing the public peace - in terms of peacefulness of the public discourse and of public life - despite the fact that fulfilling the constituent element of the criminal offence evince the contrary. [34]

Indeed, in the complainant's articles, the denial of the genocide is embedded in repeated requests directed at members of the Central Council of Jews in Germany (Zentralrat der Juden), demanding a rectification of the commonly accepted account of events that took place at Auschwitz; the articles thus exemplify the danger that was recognised by the legislature, namely that denying the genocide could intentionally serve to instigate hostile actions against the very groups of society that had been victims of that genocide. The complainant repeatedly urges only Jewish members of the population and their representatives in Germany to rectify the error that has allegedly been disseminated in their interest. She states that failure to rectify the account of events could lead to "the doom of the Jewry". The denial of the genocide committed against the Jews is used as a means to intentionally and deliberately stir opinion against Jewish members of the population and their representatives. This is punishable because it fulfils the constituent elements of inciting hatred and violence against segments of the population. [35]

cc) Sentencing the complainant to an aggregate prison term of two years without parole satisfies the requirement of proportionality, also in this individual case. […] [36]

3. Article 5.1, sentence 2 - Freedom of the Media

a) Spiegel, BVerfGE 20, 162

Explanatory Annotation

The magazine 'Der Spiegel' is Germany's leading news magazine, as such an integral part of the political process in Germany, and perhaps even the leading representative of the fourth power, the media in general and the press in particular. The 1966 decision of the German Constitutional Court in this case is Germany's equivalent to the later decision of the US Supreme Court in New York Times v. United States of America, where the Supreme Court defended the right of the New York Times to report classified information.[68]

In the German Court's decision, the issue was a search of the editorial rooms of Der Spiegel' magazine to find out how the classified information published in the magazine on the alleged inadequacy of the defense readiness of the West-German defense forces had come to the magazine. Releasing this qualified information constituted an act of treason under German criminal law. Despite the fact that the magazine lost the case on a controversial 4:4 decision[69], the decision actually contained important dicta in favour of freedom of the press. The Court held the search to be constitutional to investigate the treason but stated at the same time that the mere publishing of what the government has classified cannot be considered as treason because it is the task of the press to collect information and publish it. Whereas it is not entirely impossible even for a media outlet to commit treason, to so qualify acts of publication would have to be measured against the importance of the freedom of communication as protected by Article 5.1. The decision set in motion a number of statutes protecting the work of the media, especially granting journalists a statutory right to remain silent when questioned about the source of their information even if it is clear that the source itself had acted illegally.

68 New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 US 713 (1971), available at: https://cdn.loc.gov/service/ll/usrep/usrep403/usrep403713/usrep403713.pdf (last accessed on 21.10.2019). President Nixon wanted to suspend the publication of classified material in the New York Times claiming executive authority but the Supreme Court held in favour of the freedom of press.

Judgment concerning the issue of compliance of searches of press offices with the Basic Law (Grundgesetz).

Partial Judgment of the First Senate of 5 August 1996 based on the oral hearing of 25, 26 and 27 January 1966 - 1 BvR 586/62 and 512/64 -

Facts:

The constitutional complaint brought by Spiegel-Verlag Rudolf Augstein GmbH und Co. KG was directed, among other things, against the search warrants issued by the investigating judge and confirmation thereof by the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof) that provided the basis for searches of the offices of Spiegel-Verlag in Hamburg and its editorial offices in Bonn in October and November 1962. The searches and subsequent seizure of extensive materials were occasioned by an article in the 10 October 1962 issue of the news magazine "Spiegel" entitled "Conditionally Prepared for Defense" ("Bedingt abwehrbereit"), which discussed the military situation of the Federal Republic of Germany and NATO as well as military and strategic problems and plans for the future. The search and arrest warrant issued against the publisher Rudolf Augstein and the responsible editor was based on suspicion of treason pursuant to s. 100.1 of the Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch - StGB) (The provisions of the Criminal Code cited in this decision refer to the promulgation of the notice of the Reform of 25 August 1953 [Federal Law Gazette (Bundesgesetzblatt - BGBl.) I p. 1083)] with subsequent changes, those of the Criminal Procedure Code in the Act of 1 February 1877 [Reich Law Gazette (Reichsgesetzblatt - RGBl. p. 253)] at the time of the search as most recently amended by the Act of 26 July 1957 [Federal Law Gazette I p. 861]).

69 A finding of unconstitutionality always requires a majority finding. A tie among the eight justices of one of the senates of the Constitutional Court therefore means that the relevant conduct was constitutional.

* Translation by Donna Elliott; © Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung.

The Senate being equally divided, the constitutional complaint brought in particular against the search warrant, the seizure orders issued by the investigating judge and against the orders of the Federal Court of Justice confirming the measures carried out in connection with the investigation was not successful.

I.

1. A free press that is subject neither to control by the public powers nor to censorship is a characteristic element of free government; in particular, a free political press that publishes at regular intervals is indispensable to a modern democracy. If citizens are to be able to make political decisions, they must be not only thoroughly informed, but also be familiar with the opinions of others and be able to weigh them against one another. The press keeps this ongoing debate alive; it provides the information, takes its own positions and functions thereby as a frame of reference for public debate. It is a vehicle for public opinion; positions are elucidated in a process of argument and rebuttal, take on clear contours and in that way make it easier for the public to form judgments and make decisions. In a representative democracy, the press functions at the same time as a permanent communication and control channel between the people and their elected representatives in parliament and government. It provides critical recapitulation of the opinions and exigencies that are in an incessant state of flux within society and its constituent groupings, submits them for discussion and brings them to the attention of the political actors involved in the various bodies of government, which can in this way constantly measure their decisions, including those pertaining to everyday political issues, against the opinions that are actually held by the public.

The importance of this "public responsibility" assigned to the press makes this responsibility all the less amenable to fulfilment by the organized powers of government. Publishing enterprises must be able to form freely within the framework of society. They operate on the basis of principles of private enterprise and are organized under private law. They engage in intellectual and economic competition with one another, and the public powers may in principle not intervene in this process.

2. The function of a free press in a democratic state reflects its legal status under the Basic Law. Article 5 of the Basic Law guarantees freedom of the press. Although this first of all - by virtue of the standing of the provision within the legal system and the way it has been traditionally understood - represents a personal fundamental right that guarantees individuals and enterprises involved in the area of the press freedom from governmental coercion and under certain circumstances accords them a privileged legal status, the provision at the same time has an objectively legal aspect. It guarantees the existence of the "Free Press" as an institution. The state has - apart from the personal rights of individuals - a duty to respect the principle of freedom of the press in its legal system whenever the sphere of operation of a provision of law affects the press. The freedom to establish publications, free access to journalistic professions and the duty of public authorities to divulge information are principles that follow from this; on the other hand, it is also possible to conceive, for example, of a duty on the part of the state to avert the threat to a free press that could arise from the formation of monopolies on opinion.

The independence of the press guaranteed under Article 5 of the Basic Law extends from the procurement of information to dissemination of news and opinion (BVerfGE 10, 118 [121]; 12, 205 [260]). As a result, freedom of the press also includes a certain protection for the confidential relationship between the press and private informants. This is indispensable since the press cannot function without information from private sources, but this information will continue to flow freely only if informants can in principle be certain that "editorial privilege" will remain intact.

3. Freedom of the press entails the possibility of conflict with other values that are protected by the Basic Law; this may involve rights and interests of individuals, associations or even society itself. The Basic Law makes reference to the general laws, to which the press is also subject, for the purposes of regulating such conflict situations. Legal interests of others and the general public that enjoy at least equal rank with freedom of the press must also be respected by the press. The members of the press are afforded their status, which is in certain respects privileged, because of their responsibility and only in connection with this responsibility. This is not a matter of personal privilege; exemptions from generally applicable laws must be consistently justifiable on the basis of the nature and reach of the matter at hand.

The reference to the general legal order is found in Article 5.2 of the Basic Law, according to which freedom of the press finds its limits in the provisions of general laws. The Federal Constitutional Court addressed the relationship between freedom of expression and general laws in its decision of 15 January 1958 (BVerfGE 7, 198 [208 et seq.]). According to that decision, freedom of expression is to be sure limited by general laws; these laws must, however, be consistently construed with a view to freedom of expression and their restrictive effect upon freedom of expression therefore in turn restricted if appropriate. These principles also apply accordingly to freedom of the press; they in fact take on especial importance here since statements in the press are as a rule intended to form public opinion, which means they are initially presumed to be permissible even when they affect the legal sphere of others (op. cit. page 212). As applied to freedom of the press, the purpose of this judgment is therefore to prevent dilution of this freedom by general laws - and the courts applying them - and, by compelling consistent construction of general laws in alignment with the basic value of freedom of the press, to ensure appropriate latitude and prevent any restriction of freedom of the press that is not absolutely necessary in order to respect legal interests of at least equivalent standing. The objectively legal, institutional aspect of freedom of the press and its effect as a standard and principle of construction for the general legal system are especially pronounced here.

4. The provisions pertaining to treason (ss. 99 and 100 of the Criminal Code) are "general laws" within the meaning of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law. There are no grounds for doubting their compatibility with the Basic Law. In particular, the occasional reservations expressed as regards the lack of a sufficiently specific description of the elements of a criminal offence

(Article 103.2 of the Basic Law) are not compelling. Construction of the provisions to determine conformity with the Basic Law also does not reveal any violation of such Law insofar as the provisions include disclosure of state secrets through publication in the press, i.e., "treasonable publication."

Protection of the continued existence of the Federal Republic of Germany against external enemies, which the provisions of criminal law governing treason are intended to achieve, conflicts with freedom of the press when the press publishes facts, subject matter or knowledge whose secrecy would be in the interest of national defense. This conflict cannot be resolved summarily and in general by arguing against freedom of the press that the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany is a necessary prerequisite for freedom of the press and that freedom of the press itself would be lost with the destruction of the Federal Republic of Germany. For the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany, which must be protected and preserved, is to be understood to mean not only its organizational structure, but also its basic free democratic order. It is endemic to this order that the affairs of state, including military affairs, albeit conducted by the responsible bodies of government, are subject to constant criticism or approval by the people.

In this regard, the necessity of military secrecy in the interest of national security and freedom of the press are not mutually exclusive. Rather, the two are complementary because of the superior goal of preservation of the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany - understood in the proper sense. In view of this goal, conflicts between the two necessities of state must therefore be resolved. In this context, it is necessary to take into account the importance of the disclosed information, etc., not only for potential enemies, but also for the purposes of formation of public opinion on political issues, in the individual case; the threat to the security of the country that may arise from publication must be weighed against the need to be informed of important developments, including such as pertaining to the area of defense policy. In this sense, Article 5.1 of the Basic Law has in principle a restrictive effect on the construction of the above provisions of criminal law.

D.

It follows from the review of the search warrant on the basis of the above constitutional standards that pursuant to s. 15.2 sentence 4 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerGG) it is not possible to establish a violation of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law through application of substantive criminal law.

E.

The necessity of taking into account freedom of the press and its importance for the basic free democratic order in the context of the construction and application of general laws also applies as regards the Criminal Procedure Code (Strafprozessordnung - StPO), especially as regards coercive measures in connection with criminal proceedings such as searches and seizures carried out against a publishing company or a member of the press due to or in connection with publication in the press.

These coercive measures, which are ordered at the discretion of a judge or otherwise responsible authorities, will by their very nature regularly constitute significant encroachment upon the sphere of life protected by fundamental rights and in particular upon the fundamental rights under Articles 2 and 13 of the Basic Law. The use of such measures is therefore from the outset subject to the general legal principle of proportionality (BVerfGE 19, 342 [348-349]; 17, 108 [117]; 16, 194 [202]). The coercive measure must be commensurate with the severity of the criminal offence and the strength of the existing suspicion; in addition, this specific measure must be necessary for the investigation and prosecution of the criminal offence, which is not the case if other, less severe, means are available. Finally, the search must be likely to yield appropriate evidence.

In the case of searches and seizures involving a publishing enterprise, possible or probable encroachment upon freedom of the press must also be taken into account. This pertains first of all to the obstruction of the exercise of the fundamental right that may occur - for example, as a result of the sealing of necessary working areas or deprivation of materials required for current work - but even more so intrusion upon editorial privilege, which is regularly associated with such coercive measures. Since the confidential relationship between the press and its employees and informants constitutes an essential prerequisite for the functional viability of an organ of the press and jeopardization of this confidential relationship may entail negative effects upon other organs of the press and freedom of the press that go beyond the respective individual case, this necessarily entails a conflict between the interest in prosecution of criminal offences and the protection of the freedom of the press that must be resolved with the help of the balance of interests elaborated in the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court cited above.

It is in principle the affair of the legislature to undertake this balance of interests. The Criminal Procedure Code takes this requirement into account only to a limited extent: the relevant provisions (ss. 53.1 no. 5 and 97.5 of the Criminal Procedure Code) cover only the case of publication of illegal content that constitutes grounds for prosecution of the author, contributor or informant. They operate on the assumption of what is referred to as guarantor liability, according to which the greater difficulty in the prosecution of criminal offences is accepted in the interest of the confidential relationship between informants and members of the press if at least one editor of the printed publication involved is or may be punished. In this context, it is necessary to take into account the provisions of law governing the press, according to which the "responsible editor" and under certain circumstances also other members of the press involved in the production and distribution of the respective publications are held to higher standards of responsibility under criminal law for the appearance of illegal content in periodical publications. If these conditions for guarantor liability are satisfied, then the responsible editor or other members of the press involved benefit from the right to refuse to give testimony under s. 53.1 no. 5 of the Criminal Procedure Code and - to preclude circumvention of this right to refuse to give testimony - prohibition of any seizure in respect of the above members of the press pursuant to s. 97.5 of the Criminal Procedure Code as well immunity from searches as inferred therefrom in the case law. According to the revision of the above provisions by the Third Criminal Law Reform Act (Drittes Strafrechtsreformgesetz) of 4 August 1953 (Federal Law Gazette I p. 735), the prohibition of seizure applies only to investigations of authors, contributors or informants of illegal publications, but not to all written correspondence between members of the press with the right to refuse to give testimony and not to all informants or records made by members of the press of information entrusted to them.

No provision is made for editorial privilege when an investigation is directed against a source of information that is not illegal or in the case of investigatory proceedings involving the responsible editor or another member of the press as a suspect. Such members of the press may to be sure refuse to testify in this capacity; however, they are then not immune from searches and seizures even if such measures relate to documents that could yield the name of an informant.

All Länder have since enacted new provisions in their press laws that despite significant differences in detail all reinforce the protection of editorial privilege, but at the same time depart from guarantor liability and to a certain extent separate the prohibition of searches and seizures from the right to refuse to give testimony. The question as to whether these provisions remain within the area of authority of the Land legislature need not be decided in the present case since the Criminal Procedure Code provided the only legal basis for issuance of the search warrant at the relevant time.

Since the above provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code in any case partially serve to protect editorial privilege, they are compatible with Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. These provisions contain no exhaustive regulation of the matter. They do not exclude the possibility that the protection of editorial privilege may be taken into account to a greater extent in the context of the exercise of discretion by the courts as to whether and to what extent a search or seizure is to be ordered. In the absence of legal reform, it was therefore at the time that is at issue here the responsibility of the judge to strike the required balance, taking into account the importance of the fundamental right of freedom of the press as a standard.

G.

It follows from further review of the search warrant on the basis of the constitutional standards mentioned under E. that pursuant to s. 15.2 sentence 4 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act it is not possible to establish a violation of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law through application of the Criminal Procedure Code.

(The opinion of the four dissenting justices, who held that the search warrant constituted a violation of the fundamental right of freedom of the press, is summarized below:)

3. In summary, it must be concluded that the balance of interests required by the principle of proportionality and the value judgment of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law were ignored when the search warrant was issued. If these requirements had been taken into account when the law was applied in the present case, it would have been obvious that such an extensive search represented disproportionate encroachment.

The severity of the offence of treason and the potential threat to national security through the betrayal of military secrets do not in and of themselves suffice to suppress the protection of freedom of the press in principle and justify every sort of coercion by legal process. This would ignore the importance of the press for the free system of government and place editorial treason on the same level as high treason. Furthermore, this would constitute failure to acknowledge that what is at issue here is not whether to let the publication of illegal content go unpunished or to privilege such publication in general as regards prosecution, but solely whether the use of a specific instrument of criminal procedure was appropriate under the circumstances of a given case. In accordance with the opinion advanced here, freedom of the press may also not be used as a subterfuge for serious criminal offences against the security of the state. However, an already proven violation of the supreme legal interest that is protected by the provisions of Land law governing treason is not involved in the present case; rather what was to be determined was whether and, if so, to what extent such a violation took place. If the very fact that treason is made the subject of the investigation at this stage in the proceedings, at which the presumption of innocence applies pursuant to Article 6.2 of the European Convention on Human Rights, were to suffice to dispense with the process of balancing of interests that would actually be required or to impose less stringent standards for the purposes of such balancing of interests, free public debate would be unjustifiably restricted in a significant area of public life.

For this reason alone, reference to the duty to report a crime under s. 138 of the Criminal Code fails to convince, apart from the fact that distinctions depending on the nature of the offence are not even recognized for the purposes of the limited protection of editorial privilege afforded under the Criminal Procedure Code. Moreover, the purpose of this provision of criminal law is to prevent the occurrence of a capital offence that has not been committed; that it is applicable to offences involving the content of a publication is not evident.

With the sole exception of the Baden-Württemberg Press Act (Pressegesetz), the press laws of all other German Länder afford journalists and other members of the press a right to refuse to give testimony that is independent of the nature and punishability of the prosecuted offence. Such a provision has already been in place in Bavaria for 17 years without providing any occasion for disagreement. Comparison with the legal systems of other democratic countries also provides no convincing arguments against the opinion advanced here if such comparison is limited exclusively to the existence or non-existence of a specific independent provision of law, and neither the respective legal system - which as in the case of England or the federal law of the USA affords no profession the legal right to refuse to give testimony - is examined in its entirety nor are legal practice and democratic awareness of the respective society taken into account.

The importance of freedom of the press requires that the use of coercive measures for the purposes of prosecution of criminal offences be subject to stringent conditions and at the same time justifies extensive review of procedural operation in the concrete case by the Federal Constitutional Court. To the extent required for the purposes of protection of the fundamental right, aspects of effective procedural conduct that are themselves important must also be sacrificed and procedural inconvenience accepted (see BVerfGE 17, 108 [118]).The extent to which a different situation would have to apply in the case of a state of defense or similar crises due to emergency legislation is not under discussion here. ...

(The opinion to the effect that the search warrant was in compliance with the Basic Law, which provided the basis for the judgment pursuant to s. 15.2 sentence 4 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act, is supported, inter alia, by the following arguments:)

> By continuing to characterize these proceedings as "frivolous," the complainant exaggerates the legitimate demands of the state. The point at issue was to determine whether to pursue a suspicion. It cannot be expected that such a decision will be made with the degree of "certainty" required for conviction or acquittal. If searches of press offices are not to be prohibited from the outset, it is not possible to make that which is to be established through a search a condition for ordering such a search in the first place.

The press enjoys no privileges in criminal proceedings; like any citizen who through his conduct awakens serious suspicion of a criminal act, the press must tolerate the investigative measures of the prosecution authorities. The correlate to freedom of the press is a press that carries out its work responsibly (BVerfGE 12, 113 [130]). In particular, freedom of the press is reciprocated by co-responsibility for national security on the part of the press in a free democratic state. The various organs of the press may set themselves different goals and pursue them with different means and journalistic methods. In any case, it is not possible to accept a "presumption" to the effect that an organ of the press will in the case of doubt have carried out its work responsibly and be therefore from the outset above suspicion of criminal conduct.

2. The task of the Federal Prosecutor's Office and the investigating judge was to decide whether it was permissible to consider a search of the business premises of the complainant for the purposes of discovering evidence as a possible course of action in view of the nature of the matter in order to achieve elucidation of the facts.

Measures to obtain evidence such as searches and seizures constitute by their very nature serious encroachment upon a citizen's fundamental rights. Since they are, however, indispensable for effective prosecution of criminal offences under certain circumstances, innocent persons who come under suspicion must also tolerate such measures to a certain extent. When such measures are taken against an organ of the press, the conflict with the fundamental right of freedom of the press that inevitably results compels special caution and careful balancing of the aspects that speak in favour of and against the permissibility of the procedural measure. The upshot of this is the postulate of proportionality of the measure in the individual case under the rule of law. What in such cases must be balanced against the requirements of freedom of the press has already been set out in detail above: the general standing of the legal interest that is to be protected by the coercive measures; the threat to that interest posed by the concrete act that is the subject of investigation; the degree of suspicion; the suitability and necessity of the procedural measure envisaged.

It has already been said - and the complainant also concurs in this - that the press is not completely exempted from application of the provisions of criminal procedure governing searches and seizures. An objective balancing of values is required in the individual case, not respect for a privilege "of the press" that exists once and forever because of "public responsibility" and so forth.

The suitability of the means requires no further justification in the present case. It was to be assumed with a high degree of probability that the search of the premises of the "Spiegel" would lead to the discovery of evidence (s. 102 of the Criminal Procedure Code). Records pertaining to news items that had been (and under circumstances were to be) published such as could be expected with certainty in the editorial offices made it possible to elucidate not only the secret nature of various facts as well as the nature of collaboration with informants from the Ministry of Defense (Verteidigungsministerium), but also the aspect of suspicion of treason by the members of the "Spiegel" editorial staff. The federal prosecutors who were primarily involved, Dr. Wa. and Dr. K., were motivated by the idea that there must be a "record," "dossier" or "exposé" in the editorial offices that would significantly help to clear up the entire case and its ramifications quickly and completely if obtained.

In reviewing the necessity of the measure, it was to be assumed that the work of the press is to remain free from any interference by the public powers that is not absolutely essential (this was in particular the opinion of the Federal Prosecutor's Office, which it explicitly emphasized before the investigating judge and communicated to its enforcement officers as a general guideline at the meeting of 22 October 1962); on the other hand, it was also necessary to take into consideration that a serious suspicion of a criminal act directed against the security of the state was involved, which meant that there was a possibility of a threat to a legal interest that is in any case not subordinate to freedom of the press. It was necessary to assess whether the suspicion was so serious, the criminal offence at issue so dangerous and the public interest in complete clarification of the case so great that restriction of freedom of the press in a manner that did not in any way threaten the existence and further appearance of the magazine could be accepted. The Federal Prosecutor's Office and the investigating judge decided that this was the case; their decision does not indicate that they failed to assess the situation as required or that they in principle misconstrued the standards of the Basic Law. When the press enters the realm of individual issues involving military technology, the balance shifts; the public's need for information becomes relatively less important, first of all because readers cannot in any case form an independent opinion due to a lack of adequate technical expertise and secondly because they do not need this knowledge to form a political opinion. On the other hand, however, published details that are relatively unimportant for the domestic public may be of value to a foreign intelligence service with the requisite expertise. The press must therefore also weigh the need for information against governmental interests in the case of such publications. This cannot be avoided through reliance on "freedom of the press."

Treason potentially threatens the existence of the state and justifies in principle a sharp reaction by the forces of government. Article 21.2 and Article 91 of the Basic Law make it possible to recognize that uncompromising intervention is also required by the Basic Law in the face of a threat to the continued existence of the Federal Republic of Germany. In concreto, the danger was especially pronounced in view of the political situation at the time ("Cuban Missile Crisis"); there seemed to be some question as to the reliability of the Federal Republic of Germany within the Atlantic alliance. If one also takes into account the high degree of probability to be inferred from the article that illegal cooperation with senior members of the Federal Armed Forces (Bundeswehr) was to be suspected, there can be no denying an urgent public interest in speedy and complete clarification of the entire affair. The Federal Prosecutor's Office and the investigating judge were able to assume that complete clarification would be possible only through discovery of concrete documentary evidence, which they expected from the search of the editorial offices. Such evidence was vastly more valuable than witness testimony. This was the only possible way to obtain precise information on the documents that were used in the article, on their nature as state secrets (an important indication of which could be, for example, formal classification as secret), on the existence of any further secret materials slated for publication, but especially on how the documents came into the possession of the "Spiegel" and on the presence of the element of the offence of treason by the responsible individuals from the "Spiegel" and on the extent of any involvement in criminal acts on the part of informants from the Federal Ministry of Defense (Bundesverteidigungsministerium). None of this could have been expected to be forthcoming from interrogations, which would initially have necessarily been random. The first interrogation would have warned all parties involved; a subsequent search would no longer have resulted in the discovery of incriminating material.

3. The complainant's objection to the effect that the search of the editorial offices was illegal and in violation of the Basic Law in view of the protection of informants of the press that derives from freedom of the press is unfounded.

There can be no doubt that a certain protection of editorial privilege and informants of the press does follow from the fundamental right of freedom. However, the legislature enjoys broad operational latitude as regards such protection. There is no constitutional requirement of protection of informants with a specific content.

(According to the prevailing opinion that follows, the provisions of criminal procedure in effect at the time were compatible with the Basic Law as measured by this standard. Finally, the Court can - also because of s. 15.2 sentence 4 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act - also find no violation of the requirements of the rule of law by the search warrant (on the constitutional requirements for search warrants see BVerfGE 42, 212).

b) The Decisions Caroline of Monaco II, BVerfGE 101, 361 and Soraya, BVerfGE 34, 269

Explanatory Annotation

This Soraya-case is the nucleus of a development that many years later was aggressively moved forward by a number of cases brought by Princess Caroline of Monaco with an emphasis on photos often obtained by the so-called paparazzi.[70]

At issue in the Soraya case was the question whether the rainbow press is subject to limitations when reporting about celebrities and their private lives. The celebrity in this decision of 1973, Soraya, was the wife of the former Shah of Iran and an icon of society journalism at the time. A rainbow magazine of a large German publishing house had published a completely fictitious 'interview' with Soraya concerning her divorce from the Shah. The interview had never taken place and its content had not been authorized. Soraya successfully sued for a modest amount as compensation for immaterial damages sustained because of the violation of her personality rights. The publisher unsuccessfully argued before the Constitutional Court that the decision of the Federal Supreme Court violated the freedom of the press as guaranteed by Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. The Constitutional Court saw no fault with the Federal Supreme Court's interpretation of the relevant clauses of the Civil Code as providing for immaterial damages. The Court, however, emphasized the point that the protection of the personality rights of Soraya only prevailed because the damages sought and won were only modest in nature and because the publication was driven exclusively by business interests. A larger sum, the Court implied, would tilt the balancing act in favour of the freedom of the press.

The Caroline decisions of the Federal Supreme Court (Bundesgerichtshof, BGH) and the Constitutional Court not only pushed the boundaries for monetary compensation for immaterial damages considerably, the Constitutional Court also clarified other important matters. The Court undertook to delineate the private sphere of celebrities, regardless of whether they are entertainment stars or politicians, from the public sphere, the latter being open for reporting, the former being protected as part of the privacy and personality rights of the affected individual. The Court made it clear that there are no general delineation criteria for all cases and that each case must be looked at separately. The privacy of the home is one such area where persons are protected regardless of their status. However, the Court held that the private sphere extends beyond the walls and fence of one's private dwellings. The determination of this protected sphere depends on the concrete situation. Excluded are public areas where the affected person is among many others. Excluded from the protection are areas where the affected person consented to private affairs becoming available to the public. The Court specifically stated that privacy protection is not afforded to protect a commercial interest. Hence the constitutional protection of the private sphere is not available to protect against the interference of third persons with an exclusive contract to publish certain otherwise private events. The Court also held that children require special protection. Parental interaction with their children is therefore in principle privacy protected unless the celebrity seeks publicity.

70 See, for example, BGH 160, 298 where the first instance District Court had awarded 150.000 German Marks in 2001. The Federal Supreme Court held that monetary damages are the only means of legal redress against privacy and personality rights' violations by printing photos.

The Constitutional Court also largely upheld the Federal Supreme Court in its interpretation of the right to one's own picture, which is governed by a special statute. Under this statute the publication of photographs requires the consent of the persons depicted. There is, however, an exception for images of "contemporary history" and a counter-exception for legitimate interests of the depicted person. The Constitutional Court balanced the freedom of the press against the privacy interests of Caroline regarding the published images in favour of the freedom of the press. The European Court of Human Rights, to whom the case was consequently brought, came to a different conclusion because Caroline had no official or political function in Monaco and hence her privacy rights with regard to the images in question prevailed.[71]

aa) Translation of the Caroline of Monaco II Judgment, Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 101, 361*

1. Privacy, which is protected by the general right of personality under Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Grundgesetz (Basic Law), is not restricted to the domestic sphere. It must, in principle, be possible for an individual to move in other places that are recognisably secluded without being disturbed by the activities of photo journalists.

2. The general right of personality is not meant to serve the interest of the commercialisation of the person of an individual. The protection of privacy from being portrayed comes second to the extent that someone declares his or her consent that specified matters that are usually regarded as private are made public.

3. The scope of protection provided by the general right of personality of parents is enhanced by Articles 6.1 and 6.2 of the Basic Law to the extent that the publication of images is concerned the subject of which is the specifically parental care of their children.

4. The guarantee of the freedom of the press provided by Article 5.1(2) of the Basic Law also covers entertaining publications and articles as well as the images that they contain. In principle, this applies as well to the publication of images that show persons with roles in public life in everyday or private contexts.

Facts:

The constitutional complaint concerns the publication of photographs from the daily and private life of prominent persons. The defendant in the original proceedings, the company Burda GmbH, publishes the magazines "Freizeit Revue" and "Bunte". Photographs of the complainant, Princess Caroline of Monaco, were published in these magazines to illustrate various articles. The photographs gave rise to the original proceedings, seeking to block their publication.

For the assessment of these photos the civil courts have mainly been guided by s. 22 and s. 23 of the Gesetz betreffend das Urheberrecht an Werken der bildenden Künste und der Photographie (Act concerning the copyright of works of visual art and photographic works), of 9 January 1907 (Reichsgesetzblatt [RGBl, Reich Law Gazette] p. 7, hereinafter referred to as Kunsturhebergesetz [KUG, Art Copyright Act]). These regulations have the following wording:

Images may be distributed or presented for public display only with the consent of the subject. In case of doubt, the consent is deemed to have been granted when the subject receives a payment for allowing the images to be made. After the death of the subject and until the expiration of 10 years, the consent of the subject's relatives is required.

S. 23 states:

(1) The following images may be distributed and presented for display without the consent required by s. 22:

1. Images from the sphere of contemporary history;
2. Pictures in which the subjects appear only as part of the backdrop in a landscape or other locality;
3. Pictures of assemblies, demonstrations and similar events in which the depicted individuals have taken part;
4. Images, though not produced by request, in so far as the distribution or display serves a higher interest of art.

(2) The authority does not, however, extend to a distribution and display by which the subject, or in the case the subject is dead, his relatives, suffers an injury to a legitimate interest.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

The constitutional complaint is partly founded.

I.

The challenged judgments affect the complainant's general right of personality that follows from Article 2.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

1. The constitutional safeguard of the protection of the general right of personality also extends to images of an individual made by third parties.

a) The fundamental right that safeguards the legal protection of the general right of personality has the objective of safeguarding elements of an individual's personality that are not the subject of the freedoms that are especially guaranteed by the Basic Law but do not come second to these freedoms as concerns their importance for the formation of the personality (cf. BVerfGE 54, 148 [153]; BVerfGE 99, 185 [193]). The necessity of such a safeguard for filling gaps in the legislation exists in particular as regards new threats to the free development of one's personality that mostly occur in the wake of scientific and technical progress (cf. BVerfGE 54, 148 [153]; BVerfGE 65, 1 [41]). The standard for ascertaining whether, in the framework of a specific legal action, the general right of personality is affected and if so, which manifestation thereof, is, first and foremost, a question of the threat to one's personality. This must be inferred from the concrete situation.

b) The authority to publish photographs that show individuals in private or everyday contexts depends on the right to one's own image and on the guarantee of privacy that characterise the right to develop one's personality.

aa) Contrary to the complainant's opinion, Article 2.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law does not establish a general and comprehensive individual right to determine the manner in which one is portrayed. To the extent that the complainant would like to infer such a right from former decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (cf. BVerfGE 35, 202 [220]; BVerfGE 54, 148 [155-156]; BVerfGE 63, 131 [142]), this is an incorrect generalisation of the scope of protection of the guarantee provided by the fundamental right, which was formulated in the Court's consideration of the concrete cases. As the Federal Constitutional Court has emphasised on several occasions already, the general right of personality does not confer to the individual the right to be portrayed by others only as he or she views him- or herself or only as he or she wants to be perceived (cf. BVerfGE 82, 236 [269]; BVerfGE 97, 125 [149]; BVerfGE 97, 391 [403]; BVerfGE 99, 185 [194]). Such a broad protection would not only exceed the aim of protection, i.e. to avoid risks to the development of an individual's personality, but would also extend far into third parties' sphere of freedom.

The complainant does not criticise the way in which she is portrayed in the photographs at issue, which had been regarded as altogether positive by the civil courts that dealt with the case. Rather, the question with which she is concerned is whether images of her may be made and published at all if she does not move in public in an official function but as a private individual or in everyday contexts. The answer to this question can be ascertained from those aspects of the general right of personality that protect the right to control over one's own image as well as privacy.

bb) The right to control over one's own image (cf. BVerfGE 34, 238 [246]; BVerfGE 35, 202 [220]; BVerfGE 87, 334 [340]; BVerfGE 97, 228 [268-269]) ensures that the individual has the opportunity to influence and decide the taking and the use of photographs or recordings of his or her own person. In principle, it is of no importance whether the photographs or recordings show the individual in private or public contexts. The protection required for the right to control over one's own image is similar to, and developed after, the protection required for the right to control over one's own words. Both find support in constitutional jurisprudence (cf. BVerfGE 34, 238 [246]). The need for protection, in the case of the right to control over one's own image, results from the fact that it is possible to detach the image of an individual in a specific situation from this individual, to record the image in a data format and to reproduce it at any time for an immeasurable audience. The progress in recording technology, which permits the taking of images from a great distance, most recently even by satellite and under bad lighting conditions, has considerably expanded this possibility.

The existing technology of image and sound reproduction make it possible to change (1) the public setting in which one appears, and (2) the breadth of the public by which one may be observed. In particular, the limited public, in which an individual moves under normal circumstances, can be substituted by a public that is created by the media. The audience that is present in a courtroom, for instance, is the feature that distinguishes the public in court proceedings from the public created by television, because the public in the courtroom witnesses the events itself and can, in turn, be perceived and assessed by the parties to the legal action (cf. BVerfGE, 3rd Chamber of the First Senate, NJW [Neue Juristische Wochenschrift] 1996, 581 [583]). Apart from that, the change of the context in which an image is reproduced can also change, unintentionally or intentionally, the sense of the message that the image conveys.

Among the different aspects of the protection of the right to control over one's own image, only the aspect that concerns the production of specified photographs and their transfer to a broader public is of importance in this context. The proceedings do not deal with manipulated photographs or distortions by a change of context, with which the protection is particularly concerned. The complainant, on the contrary, assumes that the photographs that are at issue in the proceedings and the accompanying text, which is also relevant for the message conveyed by the photographs, correctly depict situations from her life in a way in which observers, had they been present at the occasion when the pictures were taken, could have perceived them. The complainant simply does not want these situations to be captured in photographs and presented to a broader public as these situations, in her opinion, are part of her privacy.

cc) As distinguished from the right to control over one's own image, the protection of privacy, which also flows from the general right of personality, does not refer to images in particular but is determined by the subjects of the images and the places in which they are taken. On the one hand, the protection of privacy comprises matters that, due to the information conveyed, are typically regarded as "private", because their public discussion or display is regarded as unseemly, because they are regarded as embarrassing if they become known, or if they provoke adverse reactions from the environment. This applies e.g. to reflections about oneself in diaries (BVerfGE 80, 367); to confidential communication between husband and wife (BVerfGE 27, 344); to the sphere of sexuality (BVerfGE 47, 46); in the case of socially deviant behaviour (BVerfGE 44, 353) and in the case of diseases (BVerfGE 32, 373). If such matters were not protected from others taking note of them, the reflection about oneself, the uninhibited communication among individuals who are close to each other, the development of one's sexuality and the resort to medical aid could be impaired or made impossible even though these types of behaviour are protected by fundamental rights.

On the other hand, protection extends to a physical space in which the individual can recover, relax and also let him- or herself go (cf. BVerfGE 27, 1 [6]). It is true that such a space also provides the possibility to behave in a way that is not meant for the public and the observation and display of which by outside observers would be embarrassing or detrimental for the individual affected. In essence, this is a space in which it is possible for the individual to be free from public observation, and thus free from the self-control imposed by the public even if the individual affected does not necessarily behave differently in this space than he or she would in public. If such a possibility of retreating no longer existed, this could overstrain the individual psychically because he or she would always have to be aware of the effect he or she has on others and would always have to consider whether he or she is behaving correctly. This would deprive the individual of phases in which he or she can be alone and recover; such phases are necessary for the development of one's personality, and without them the development of one's personality would be seriously impaired. Such need for protection also exists in the case of individuals who, on account of their rank or reputation, of their position or influence or of their abilities or actions are the subject of particular public attention. The fact that someone, whether wanted or unwanted, has become a person, upon whom the public focuses, does not mean that this person has lost his or her right to a sphere of privacy that is withdrawn from the observation of the public. This also applies to democratically elected office holders. They are certainly accountable to the public for the way in which they administer their office, and they have to tolerate public attention in this context. They do not, however, have to tolerate the same extent of public attention regarding their private life in so far as their private life does not affect the administration of their office.

By common consent, the domestic sphere constitutes such a protected area. Due to its connection with the free development of one's personality, the area of withdrawal must not, from the outset, be restricted exclusively to the domestic sphere. This holds true if only for the reason that the functions that the area of withdrawal serve do not end at the walls of one's house or at the boundaries of one's property. The free development of an individual's personality would be seriously impaired if the individual could only evade public curiosity in his or her own home. In many cases, it is only possible in the seclusion of a natural environment, e.g. in a holiday resort, for an individual to recover from being a part of the public, which is characterised by compulsions to function in a certain way and by the presence of the media. This is why the individual must also have, in principle, the possibility to move in the open country, although it is secluded, and in places that are recognisably secluded from the broad public in a manner that is free from public observation. This especially applies with regard to technologies of imaging that overcome physical seclusion without the person affected being able to recognise this.

The physical boundaries of privacy outside the home cannot be determined in a general and abstract manner. Rather, they can be determined only from the particular characteristics of the place visited by the concerned person. The decisive standard is whether the individual finds or creates a situation in which he or she can reasonably, i.e. in a way that is also recognisable for others, assume that he or she is not exposed to the observation of the public.

Whether the prerequisites of seclusion are fulfilled can only be ascertained for each particular situation. In one and the same place, there may be a time in which an individual can, with good reasons, feel unobserved, whereas this is not the case at other points in time. Nor does the fact that an individual stays in a closed room always mean that this place is secluded. The decisive question is whether the individual has good reasons to expect that he or she is unobserved or whether the individual visits places in which he or she moves under the eyes of the public. Therefore, seclusion, which is the prerequisite for the protection of privacy outside the domestic sphere, can be lacking in closed rooms as well.

Places in which the individual is among many people, lack, from the outset, the prerequisites of the protection of privacy within the meaning of Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. Such places cannot cater to an individual's need of withdrawal, and they therefore do not justify the protection of fundamental rights that this need deserves for reasons of the free development of one's personality. Neither can the individual, by showing a behaviour that would not usually be displayed in public, redefine these places in such a way that they become part of his or her sphere of privacy. It is not the individual's behaviour, whether alone or with others, that constitutes the sphere of privacy but the objective characteristics of the place at the time in question. Thus, if an individual behaves, in places that do not show the characteristics of seclusion, in the manner he or she would behave if he or she were not under observation, this individual eliminates the need for protection of behaviour that is of no concern to the public.

The protection of privacy, over and against the public's observation, is also eliminated if someone declares his or her agreement with the fact that certain matters that are usually regarded as private are made public, e.g. if someone enters into exclusive contracts concerning media coverage of his or her private sphere. The constitutional protection of privacy provided by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law is not meant to serve the interest of the commercialisation of the person of an individual. Certainly no one is prohibited from opening his or her private sphere in such a manner. When doing so, however, one cannot claim protection of privacy, because privacy is the status of being removed from the observation of the public. Therefore, someone who expects that others may only to a limited extent or not at all observe matters or behaviour that take place in an area that normally serves for the withdrawal from the observation of the public, must express this expectation in a consistent manner that is not bound to a particular situation. This also applies if someone revokes his or her decision to permit or tolerate reporting about certain issues in his or her private sphere.

dd) There is no previous Federal Constitutional Court case law about the meaning of the protection of privacy with respect to the family relationship, especially between parents and children. It has been acknowledged, however, that children need special protection because they still have to develop into responsible persons (cf. BVerfGE 24, 119 [144]; BVerfGE 57, 361 [383]). This need for protection extends as well to the protection of children from threats posed by the interest of the media and the consumers of media images of children. This interest can constitute a more severe interference with the development of a child's personality than it does for the development of an adult's personality. The sphere in which children can feel free from observation by the public and develop free from such observation must therefore be protected in a more comprehensive way than in the case of adults.

It is the parents who are first of all responsible for the development of a child's personality. To the extent that education depends on an undisturbed relationship between parents and their children, the special protection of the children's fundamental rights does not have a merely automatic impact in favour of the father or the mother (also cf. BVerfGE 76, 1 [44 et seq.]; BVerfGE 80, 81 [91- 92]). Rather, the specifically parental care of their children, in principle, also falls into the sphere of protection provided by Article 2.1 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law. In this case, the scope of protection provided by the general right of personality is enhanced by Articles 6.1 and 6.2 of the Basic Law, which oblige the State to secure the living conditions that are necessary for a child to grow up in a healthy way. Of these conditions, parental care is particularly important (cf. BVerfGE 56, 363 [384]; BVerfGE 57, 361 [382-383]; BVerfGE 80, 81 [90 et seq.]).

> Article 6 of the Basic Law, thus, enhances the protection to which children are entitled in order to enjoy the general right of personality. The impact that this enhancement has in particular cases cannot be determined in a general and abstract way. As a general rule, there will certainly be no need for protection in cases in which parents deliberately turn towards the public with their children, e.g. if they participate in public functions together or even are the centre of such functions. In such cases, they assent to the conditions of public appearances. As regards all other cases, the protection of the general right of personality as enhanced by the specific relationship between parents and children can, in principle, arise in contexts in which the prerequisite of seclusion is not otherwise fulfilled.

3. The challenged decisions impair the complainant's general right of personality. As the contexts in which the images were made enjoy the protection provided by this fundamental right; the courts' finding that they may be published against the complainant's will diminish the required protection, which the courts in private law litigation are also obligated to extend to the complainant (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198).

II.

The challenged judgments do not fully meet the requirements stipulated by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1. of the Basic Law.

1. However, the provisions of s. 22 and s. 23 of the Art Copyright Act, on which the civil courts based their decisions, are consistent with the Basic Law.

Pursuant to Article 2.1 of the Basic Law, the general right of personality is only guaranteed in the framework of the constitutional order. This also includes the provisions about the publication of photographic images of persons in s. 22 and s. 23 of the Art Copyright Act. The provision can be traced back to an offensive incident (images of Bismarck on his deathbed, cf. Entscheidungen des Reichsgerichts in Zivilsachen [RGZ, Decisions of the Supreme Court of the German Reich in Civil Cases] 45, 170) and the subsequent discussion on legal policy (cf. Verhandlungen des 27. DJT, 1904, 4th volume, pp. 27 et seq.). The provision seeks to achieve an equitable balance between the respect of an individual's personality and the interest of the general public in being informed (cf. Verhandlungen des Reichstages, 11. Legislaturperiode, II. Session, 1. Sessionsabschnitt 1905/1906, No. 30 p. 1526 [at pp. 1540-1541]).

Pursuant to s. 22.1 of the Art Copyright Act, images may be distributed or presented for public display only with the consent of the subject. S. 23.1 of the Art Copyright Act exempts, inter alia, images from the sphere of contemporary history (no. 1) from this principle. Pursuant to s. 23.1 of the Art Copyright Act, this exemption does not, however, extend to a distribution by which the subject suffers an injury to a legitimate interest. As this concept of protection consists of several stages, the provision sufficiently takes into account the depicted person's need for protection as well as the public's wish of being informed and the interests of the media that satisfy these wishes. This has already been established by the Federal Constitutional Court on earlier occasions (cf. BVerfGE 35, 202 [224-225]).

The respondents' opinion that the regulation violates the freedom of the press as it, in their opinion, amounts to a Verbot mit Erlaubnisvorbehalt, i.e. a prohibition of publication, with each publication requiring permission in advance, does not lead to a different assessment. That there is no such prohibition can already be discerned from the fact that the provisions only conciliate different, legally protected interests of individuals. Neither does the regulation favour the protection of an individual's rights to protection of his or her general right of personality in a one-sided manner. It is true that on the first and third stages (s. 22.1 and s. 23.2 of the Art Copyright Act), the regulation is primarily concerned with the depicted person's need for protection. In the second stage (s. 23.1 of the Art Copyright Act), however, the interests of the freedom of the press and of the freedom to form one's own opinion, which is at the background of this fundamental right, are sufficiently taken into account. At the same time, the open wording of the regulation provides enough room for an interpretation and application that is in conformity with the fundamental rights.

2. The interpretation and application of the provisions, however, do not in all respects comply with the requirements established by the fundamental rights.

a) The interpretation and application of constitutional civil law provisions is the task of the civil courts. In doing so, the civil courts must observe the meaning and the scope of the fundamental rights that are affected by their decisions to assure that their normative content be preserved at the level of judicial application of the law as well (cf. BVerfGE 7, 198 [205 et seq.]; established case law). This requires a balancing between the conflicting interests that are protected by fundamental rights. This balancing is to take place in the framework of the elements of civil law provisions that may be interpreted, and it must take the special circumstances of the case into account (cf. BVerfGE 99, 185 [196]; established case law). Irrespective of the influence of the fundamental rights, the litigation remains a private law action that finds its solution in private law, the interpretation of which is guided by the fundamental rights. The mission of the Federal Constitutional Court is therefore restricted to reviewing whether the civil courts have sufficiently taken into account the influence of the fundamental rights (cf. BVerfGE 18, 85 [92-93]). It is, however, not the task of the Federal Constitutional Court to prescribe to the civil courts the outcome of their decision in the litigation (cf. BVerfGE 94, 1 [9-10]).

   A violation of fundamental rights that leads to an objection to the challenged decisions only exists (1) if, in the interpretation and application of constitutional provisions of private law, the fact has been overlooked that fundamental rights were to be respected; or (2) if the scope of protection provided by the fundamental rights that are to be respected has not been determined correctly or completely, or (3) if the weight of the fundamental rights that are to be respected has been misjudged in such a way that the balancing of the legal positions of the parties in the framework of the private law settlement suffers (cf. BVerfGE 95, 28 [37]; BVerfGE 97, 391 [401]), and the decision is based on this mistake.

b) In the present case, the interpretation and application of ss. 22 and 23 of the Art Copyright Act does not only have to consider the general right of personality but also the freedom of the press, which is affected by these provisions as well.

The right to freely determine the nature and tendency, contents and form of an organ of the press is in the centre of the guarantee of the fundamental right of the freedom of the press (cf. BVerfGE 20, 162 [174 et seq.]; BVerfGE 52, 283 [296]; BVerfGE 66, 116 [133]; BVerfGE 80, 124 [133-134]; BVerfGE 95, 28 [35]). This includes, inter alia, the decision whether and how to illustrate an organ of the press. The protection is not restricted to specified subjects of illustrations. It also comprises the depiction of persons. The protection does not depend on the nature or the level of the organ of the press (cf. BVerfGE 34, 269 [283]; BVerfGE 50, 234 [240]). Any distinction of this kind would ultimately amount to public authorities assessing and controlling the press, a fact that would plainly contradict this fundamental right (BVerfGE 35, 202 [222]).

The freedom of the press serves to facilitate, for individuals and the public, the free formation of opinions (cf. BVerfGE 57, 295 [319]). Such formation of opinions can only be successful under the condition that free reporting, i.e. reporting without any prescribed or precluded subjects or manners of presentation, is possible. In particular, the formation of opinions is not restricted to the political sphere. In the interest of a functioning democracy, the formation of opinions with regard to the political sphere is certainly of special importance. The formation of opinions in the political sphere, however, is embedded in a comprehensive, highly interconnected communication process that can neither under the aspect of the development of one's personality nor from the point of view of democratic governance, be split up into relevant and irrelevant areas (cf. BVerfGE 97, 228 [257]). The press must be allowed to decide according to its own publishing standards what it regards as being worthy of the public interest and what it does not deem to be worthy of such interest.

The fact that the press has to fulfil an opinion-forming mission does not exclude entertainment from the constitutional free press guarantee. The formation of opinions does not stand in opposition to entertainment. Entertaining articles can also contribute to the formation of opinions. Such articles can, under certain circumstances, stimulate or influence the formation of opinions in a more sustainable way than information that is exclusively fact-related. Moreover, in the media, an increasing tendency toward the elimination of the distinction between information and entertainment can be observed both with respect to specific organs of the press as a whole as well as with regard to individual articles, i.e., to disseminate information in an entertaining manner or to mix information and entertainment ("infotainment"). This means that many readers obtain the information that they regard as important or interesting exactly from entertaining articles (cf. Berg/Kiefer [eds.], Massenkommunikation, volume V, 1996).

Nor can it be denied from the outset that mere entertainment has an influence on the formation of opinions. It would be a narrow view to assume that entertainment only satisfies wishes for amusement, relaxation, distraction and escape from reality. Entertainment can also convey images of reality and provides topics for conversation that can be followed by processes of discussion and integration that refer to views on life, to standpoints concerning values and patterns of behaviour, and in this respect, it fulfils important functions in society (cf. BVerfGE 97, 228 [257]; furthermore: Pürer/ Raabe, Medien in Deutschland, volume 1, 2nd edition 1996, pp. 309-310). For this reason, entertainment in the press cannot be neglected or even be regarded as worthless in the context of the freedom of the press, for which constitutional protection is intended; entertainment is, therefore, also covered by the protection that this fundamental right provides (cf. BVerfGE 35, 202, [222]).

This also applies to reporting about individuals. Personalising a theme is an important journalistic means for attracting attention. Personalising a theme often awakens the interest in certain problems in the first place and is the basis of the wish for factual information. Sympathy for events and situations is often conveyed by personalising the theme. Moreover, prominent persons also stand for certain ethical positions and views of life. Therefore, prominent persons provide orientation for their own concepts of life to many people. Prominent persons become focuses for approval or rejection and thus fulfil the function of role-models or of examples of life-styles from which people want to detach themselves. This is the reason for the public interest in the most varied aspects of the lives of prominent persons.

As regards persons from political life, the public's interest has always been recognised as legitimate from the point of view of democratic transparency and control. In principle, however, it cannot be denied that such interest also exists concerning other persons with roles in public life. In this respect, the depiction of individuals that is not restricted to specified functions or events complies with the tasks of the press and therefore also falls under the scope of protection provided by the freedom of the press. Only when a balance is established between the freedom of the press and colliding rights of personality, can it be of importance whether questions that essentially concern the public are discussed in a serious, fact related manner or whether merely private matters that only satisfy curiosity are divulged (cf. BVerfGE 34, 269 [283]).

c) The judgment of the Federal Court of Justice mainly stands up to the review of constitutionality.

aa) It is not objectionable from the constitutional point of view that, in order to determine the elements of s. 23.1(1) of the Art Copyright Act, the Federal Court of Justice has taken as its controlling standard the general public's interest in being informed, and that the Federal Court of Justice, for this reason, has regarded the publication of images of the complainant that show her outside her representative function in the principality of Monaco as permissible.

S. 23.1 (1) of the Art Copyright Act establishes that the publication of images from the sphere of contemporary history does not require the subject's consent, as otherwise required by s. 22 of the Art Copyright Act. As concerns the parliament's intention when establishing this provision (cf. Verhandlungen des Reichstages, loc. cit., pp. 1540-1541) and as regards the purpose of the regulation, it shows consideration for the general public's interest in being informed as well as for the freedom of the press. Therefore, the interest of the public is to be taken into account especially when interpreting the element "images from the sphere of contemporary history", as the public must not be granted free access to images of persons who are not deemed important in the context of contemporary history; such images instead require the subject's consent for publication. The other element of the Art Copyright Act that is open to the influence of fundamental rights, i.e. the "legitimate interest" in s. 23.2, refers from the outset only to persons who are of importance in the context of contemporary history and therefore cannot sufficiently take the interests of the freedom of the press into consideration if such interests have before been disregarded when delimiting the group of persons who are considered to be persons of importance in the context of contemporary history.

The concept of contemporary history in s. 23.3 (1) of the Art Copyright Act is not linked to the proviso of a judicial definition of its contents, by which its coverage might, for instance, be limited to events of historical or political importance; rather, it is determined by the public's interest in being informed (cf. RGZ 125, p. 80 [at p. 82] already). This takes the importance and the scope of the freedom of the press into account without disproportionately restricting the protection of the general right of personality. The core of the freedom of the press and the freedom of opinion includes that the press has sufficient room to manoeuvre, within the boundaries of the law, so that it may decide, according to its publishing standards, which facts claim public interest, and that it becomes apparent in the process of formation of public opinion which matters are matters of public interest. As has been stated, entertaining articles are not exempt from this. Moreover, it is not objectionable that the Federal Court of Justice has also assigned to the "sphere of contemporary history" pursuant to s. 23.1(1) of the Art Copyright Act images of persons who have not attracted public attention at a certain point through their involvement with a specific event of contemporary history but instead encounter general public attention, independently of single events, on account of their status and their importance. In this context, the increased importance that photo journalism has acquired today in comparison with the time in which the Art Copyright Act was enacted carries weight as well. Certainly, the concept of an "absolute person of contemporary history", to which reference is frequently made in scholarly literature and jurisprudence, in this context, imperatively follows neither from the law nor from the Constitution. If this concept is understood, as the Higher Regional Court and the Federal Court of Justice present it, as describing, in an abridged manner, persons whose images the public deems worthy of notice for the depicted person's sake, it is unobjectionable from the constitutional point of view. It is important, however, that a balancing take place, in each individual case, between the public's interest in being informed and the legitimate interest of the depicted person. The general right of personality does not require that the publication of images of persons who are of importance in contemporary history without the consent of the depicted person, must be limited to images that show them when exercising the function that they discharge in society. Frequently, the public interest that such persons claim is characterised exactly by the fact that it is not restricted to the exercise of this person's public function in the narrower sense. Due to the person's exposed function and to the effect of the function, the interest can also extend to information about how the persons generally move in public, i.e. when they are not exercising their respective public function. The public has a legitimate interest in learning whether such persons, who are often regarded as a role-model or as an example, convincingly bring into agreement the behaviour that they show in their public function and their personal behaviour.

If the publishing of images was limited to the function of a person who is of importance to contemporary history, this would, however, fail to adequately take into account the interest that such persons legitimately arouse in the public. Moreover, this would encourage a selective manner of representation which would deny the public the required opportunity to assess persons from social and political life on account of their functions as role-models and on account of their influence. This does not open the press unlimited access to images of persons of contemporary history. Rather, s. 23.2 of the Art Copyright Act provides the courts with sufficient possibilities to bring the requirements of protection to bear that are stipulated by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 35, 202 [225]).

bb) In principle, the standards that the Federal Court of Justice has developed when interpreting the element of a "legitimate interest" in s. 23.2 of the Art Copyright Act are not objectionable from the constitutional point of view.

Pursuant to the challenged judgment, the privacy that is worthy of protection, to which the so-called absolute persons of contemporary history are also entitled, requires (1) a local seclusion to which someone has withdrawn to be alone; (2) that this wish to be alone is recognisable by an objective person; and (3) that the person, confiding in the seclusion, behaves in a manner in which he or she would not behave in the broad public. The Federal Court of Justice assumes that a violation of ss. 22 and 23 of the Art Copyright Act exists if images of the person affected are published that, in such a situation, were taken secretly or by catching the person unawares.

The standard of physical seclusion, on the one hand, takes the sense of the general right to privacy into account, i.e. to secure to individuals a sphere outside their home in which they are aware that they are not under constant public observation and therefore do not have to control their behaviour in view of such observation but find it possible to relax and to recover. On the other hand, the standard of physical seclusion does not excessively restrict the freedom of the press, as it does not completely withdraw the daily and private life of persons of contemporary history from photojournalism but makes it accessible to pictorial representation to the extent that it takes place in public. In the case of an outstanding public interest in being informed, the freedom of the press can, pursuant to these rulings, also prevail over the protection of privacy (cf. BGH, JZ [Juristenzeitung] 1965, 411 [413]; Oberlandesgericht [OLG, Higher Regional Court] Hamburg, Archiv für Urheber-, Film-, Funk- und Theaterrecht [UFITA, Archive of Copyright, Film, Broadcasting and Theatre Law] 1977, p. 252 [at p. 257]; OLG Munich, UFITA 1964, p. 322 [at p. 324]).

It is also not objectionable that in its ruling, the Federal Court of Justice took the individual's behaviour in a specific situation as an indicator that he or she is recognisably in a situation of seclusion. The protection against pictorial representations in this sphere, however, is not triggered only if the person affected shows a behaviour in this sphere that he or she would avoid under the eyes of the public. Rather, physical seclusion can fulfil its protective function with respect to its role in the development of someone's personality only if the seclusion ensures the individual, irrespective of the behaviour in which he or she engages in a given moment, a space for relaxation in which he or she need not constantly expect the presence of photographers or camera teams. This, however, is not the decisive question in this case, as pursuant to the findings of the Federal Court of Justice, the first prerequisite for the protection of privacy was lacking in the first place.

Finally, it is not objectionable from the constitutional point of view that the method of obtaining information is regarded as important when balancing the public interest in information and the protection of privacy (cf. BVerfGE 66, 116 [136]). There are, however, doubts about whether images that are taken secretly or by catching the subject unawares, without more, violate the privacy that exists outside the depicted individual's home. With regard to the function that the Constitution assigns to this sphere, and in view of the circumstance that one often cannot tell whether an image was taken secretly or by catching the subject unawares, an impermissible encroachment upon privacy can, in any case, not only be assumed if these characteristics exist. As the Federal Court of Justice, as concerns the photographs in dispute in these proceedings, denied in the first instance that the context in which the photos were made constituted a sphere of seclusion, the doubts about the manner in which the photographs were taken do not affect the result of its decision.

cc) The constitutional requirements, however, are not met to the extent that the challenged decisions disregarded the circumstance that the complainant's legal position concerning the protection of her right to personality is enhanced by Article 6 of the Basic Law in situations in which she cares for her children.

dd) As regards the different images, this leads to the following conclusions:

> The decision of the Federal Court of Justice gives no reason for objection from the constitutional point of view as regards the images that show the complainant on her way to the market, accompanied by a bodyguard at the market and with a companion in a frequented restaurant. In the first two cases, the locations that are shown are not secluded, but are visited by the broad public. Certainly, the location of the third image is a bounded location, the complainant, however, finds herself in this location under the eyes of the public that is present. For this reason, the Federal Court of Justice does not, with its judgment to permit the publication of these photos, act in contradiction to the ban on the photos made at the garden restaurant. This ban is the subject of the challenged decisions but was not raised as part of the constitutional complaint. The seat that the complainant took at the garden restaurant with her companion showed all characteristics of seclusion. The circumstance that the photographs at the garden restaurant were obviously taken from a great distance additionally indicates that the complainant could assume that she was not exposed to the observation of the public.

Neither are there objections to the decision to the extent that it deals with the photos in which the complainant is shown alone on horseback or riding her bicycle. On the basis of its views, the Federal Court of Justice also did not assign these photographs to the sphere of physical seclusion but to the public sphere. This is not objectionable from the constitutional point of view. The complainant herself also assigns the images to the secluded sphere of privacy only because, in her opinion, they indicate her wish to be left alone. However, according to the criteria that have been explained, the mere subjective wish is not decisive in this context.

Contrary to this, the three photos that show the complainant together with her children require a new examination under the constitutional standards that were described above. It cannot be excluded that the examination according to these standards leads to a different result as concerns some of the images or all of them. To this extent, the judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court is therefore to be reversed and remanded.

d) As concerns the challenged judgments of the Regional Court and the Higher Regional Court, the violation of a fundamental right already follows from the fact that they--in conformity, however, with case law at that time--restricted the privacy that is protected by Article 2.1 in conjunction with Article 1.1 of the Basic Law to the domestic sphere. However, it is not required to reverse the decisions because the violation concerning this point was remedied by the Federal Court of Justice and because, with regard to the other points, the case was remanded.

bb) Translation of the Soraya Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 34, 269*

Headnote:

The case law of the civil courts that also allows claims for pecuniary compensation for non-material damage is in the case of serious violations of the general right to personality compatible with the Basic Law.

Order of the First Senate of 14 February 1973 - 1 BvR 112/65 -

Facts:

A German illustrated weekly published an interview with the divorced wife of the Shah of Iran, Princess Soraya, in April 1962. The interview, which contained statements made by the Princess on her private life, was freely invented. As a result of her action, the civil courts awarded Princess Soraya damages in the amount of DM 15,000 against the publishing house and the editor in chief of the magazine for violation of her right to personality. Proceeding on the basis of its previous case law, the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof - BGH) found the false interview to be a serious violation of the right to personality of the Princess. The Court ruled that she could claim pecuniary compensation for the non-material damage suffered.

The constitutional complaint brought against the decision of the civil courts was unsuccessful.

Extract from the Grounds:

C. I.

1. The judicial proceedings that resulted in the decisions under challenge constituted a civil dispute that was to be decided on the basis of the private legal order. The Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht - BVerfG) must not review the interpretation and application of civil law as such. The objective system of values contained in the fundamental rights provisions of the Basic Law does, however, also affect private law; it constitutes a fundamental decision under constitutional law for all areas of the law. The Federal Constitutional Court is responsible for ensuring that the Basic Law exerts this influence. It therefore determines whether decisions of the civil courts are based on a fundamentally erroneous understanding of the scope and impact of a fundamental right or whether the results of decisions themselves violate the fundamental rights of a party (See on this in general BVerfGE 7, 198 [205 et seq.]; 18, 85 [92, 93]; 30, 173 [187, 188, 196, 197]; 32, 311 [316].

In the case at hand, the complainants challenge not only the results of decisions of the civil courts; they contest in particular the way the courts arrived at these results. The complainants dispute that judges have the right to award pecuniary damages in cases of this nature since they are bound by law. This compels contemplation of the nature and limits of judicial activity as prescribed in the Basic Law. The issue under review here is whether the courts may be used to make decisions involving such substantive content. Judges may not arbitrarily assert the value system of the Basic Law in their decisions. They would also be in violation of the constitution if they arrived at results that are compatible with the value system contained in the Basic Law by using methodological means that fail to respect the constraints imposed on judges in the context of adjudication. The Federal Constitutional Court would also have to object to any decision made in such a manner.

2. The claim in the civil dispute at issue is based on s. 823.1 of the Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch - BGB). Referring to existing case law that is established in detail in the decision of 25 May 1954 (Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen - BGHZ] 13, 334), the Federal Court of Justice also includes a "general right to personality" among the rights mentioned therein; the Court sees a violation of this right in the actions of the complainants. It is not the task of the Federal Constitutional Court to judge the "correctness" of this decision insofar as its grounds and further development lie in the area of civil law dogma. It suffices to ascertain that the general right to personality - which was still rejected by the legislature that adopted the German Civil Code - has in the course of decades of discussion become an established fact in legal theory and following its recognition in the above decision of the Federal Court of Justice has since been an integral part of our system of private law (See on this, inter alia, the abovementioned draft of the law Bundestag document [Drucksache des Deutschen Bundestages - BTDrucks.] III/1237, grounds pp. 67; Nipperdey in "Die Grundrechte" handbook, vol. IV, book 2, 1962, p. 830; Hubmann, Die Persönlichkeitsrecht, 2nd ed., 1967, pp. 5 et seq.; MaunzDürigHerzog, Grundgesetz, Article1.I marginal no. 38).

The Federal Constitutional Court has no occasion to oppose this decision of the Federal Court of Justice on constitutional grounds. The system of values embodied in the fundamental rights lies at the core of free development of human personality and human dignity within the social community (BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]; 7, 198 [205]. It is deserving of the respect and protection of all state authority (Articles 1 and 2.1 of the Basic Law). Such protection may be claimed in particular in the private sphere of human beings, which is the area in which they desire to be alone, to make decisions under their own responsibility and to be undisturbed by intrusions of any kind (BVerfGE 27, 1 [6]). The legal concept of a general right to personality also serves this protective purpose in the area of private law; it fills gaps in the protection of personality that have remained despite recognition of the rights to personality of individuals and in the course of time for various reasons become increasingly tangible. The Federal Constitutional Court has therefore never objected to recognition of a general right to personality in the case law of the civil courts (See in particular BVerfGE 30, 173 [194 et seq.]; 34, 118 [135, 136] and order of 31 January 1973 - 2 BvR 454/71 - B II 2).

3. S. 823.1 of the Civil Code is a "general law" within the meaning of Article 5.2 of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 7, 198 [211]; 25, 256 [263 et seq.]). Since the general right to personality belongs to the rights enumerated therein according to the interpretation of this provision, which cannot be objected to on constitutional grounds, it does in view of the intent of the Basic Law have the capacity to restrict the fundamental right of freedom of the press that the complainants invoke.

This potential impact of the general law is reinforced, as has been mentioned, under constitutional law by the protective mandate contained in Articles 1 and 2.1 of the Basic Law. On the other hand, the fundamental importance of freedom of the press for the free democratic order cannot be ignored. It retains its importance in the process of weighing issues against one another that must take place when it is necessary to resolve a conflict between parties under civil law that involves areas of interest that enjoy protection under constitutional law (BVerfGE 25, 256 [263]; 30, 173 [196, 197]). In the case of such a weighing process, the general right to personality may not simply be afforded precedence; freedom of the press may, depending upon the situation in the concrete case, have a restrictive effect on claims deriving from the right to personality (BVerfGE 7, 198 [208, 209]).

4. The decisions under challenge afforded protection of the personal sphere of the plaintiff in the initial proceedings precedence over freedom of the press. On the basis of the facts of the case, there is no reason for any reservations under constitutional law in respect of these decisions. According to these facts, the complainants published an invented interview with the plaintiff in an organ of the entertainment press in which events in her private life were presented as though the plaintiff had portrayed them herself. The courts view this as an unauthorized intrusion into the private sphere of the plaintiff, who may alone decide whether and in what form she wants to make events from her private life accessible to the public.

Indeed, given the facts of this situation, the complainants cannot invoke freedom of the press in defense of their actions. It would be excessive to completely deny the entertainment and sensation-press the protection of this fundamental right, as the Regional Court (Landgericht) did in reliance on various opinions voiced in the literature. The term "press" must be interpreted broadly and formally; it may not be made dependent upon evaluation - no matter what standards serve as the basis - of a single publication. Freedom of the press is not limited to the "serious" press (MaunzDürigHerzog, Grundgesetz, Article 5 marginal no. 128129; see also BVerfGE 25, 296 [397] and for radio - BVerfGE 12, 205 [260]). It does not, however, follow from this that protection of the fundamental right would have to be afforded in the same manner to every organ of the press in every legal context and for all of the content of its statements. When weighing freedom of the press against other legal interests protected under constitutional law, it is possible in concrete cases to take into account whether the press treats a matter of public interest seriously and objectively to satisfy the desire of its readership for information and contributes thus to the formation of public opinion or whether it satisfies only the need of a more or less broad class of readers for superficial entertainment.

In this case, the need for protection of the private sphere of the plaintiff was not offset by an overriding general interest in public discussion of the matters dealt with in the interview. Readers have no right to be "informed" of the private life of a personality standing for the time being in the public eye through invented disclosures. An invented interview can - even if one chooses to recognize an interest in it as legitimate in this area - make no contribution to genuine formation of public opinion. Protection of the private sphere enjoys absolute precedence over press statements of this kind.

II.

If a "general law" potentially restricts freedom of the press, the manner in which such restriction may be effected is determined exclusively by the substantive content of that law. That means in particular that only those sanctions that are authorized by law may be imposed on the organ of the press and effectively restrict its freedom. This provides the basis for the challenge of the complainants; they argue that there is no "general law" that makes provision for pecuniary compensation for non-material damage in the case of violation of the general right to personality and that such claims are in fact explicitly precluded by s. 253 of the Civil Code. The courts have therefore, it is claimed, by awarding such compensation for damages exceeded the bounds within which the constitution allows them to restrict the freedom of the press; moreover, it is argued further, they have imposed a sanction that constitutes substantive infringement of freedom of the press since it is directed exclusively against the press and burdens the press with an incalculable risk that must eventually threaten its existence. As a result, it is claimed, this constitutes a fundamental failure to recognize the essence and importance of freedom of the press in a free democratic system of government.

It is also necessary in respect of this argumentation to emphasize from the beginning that it does not lie within the decision-making powers of the Federal Constitutional Court to judge whether the legal conclusion derived from the assumed violation of the general right to personality by the Federal Court of Justice can be justified on the basis of civil law dogma or, in other words, whether civil law permits and requires pursuit of the avenue embarked upon through recognition of a general right to personality and extension of the protection provided in related cases under s. 847 of the Civil Code to include this right by awarding compensation for damages.

The Federal Constitutional Court must also limit itself to a review of those aspects of this case law that fall under constitutional law in this case. This gives rise to the questions, on the one hand, as to whether the substantive result of the decisions as such is in violation of the fundamental right of freedom of the press in the first place and, further, whether to come to this result through adjudication despite the absence of an unambiguous basis in written law is compatible with the Basic Law.

Examination of both questions shows that there are no objections under constitutional law to the case law of the Federal Court of Justice underlying the decisions challenged in this case.

III.

It lies in the nature of things that violations of the general right to personality may be committed in particular by organs of the press since they have at their disposal the technical means required for the acquisition and dissemination of information and it is therefore also made relatively easy for them to intrude upon the private sphere of citizens. Examples from the case law show, however, that the civil courts also apply the rules they have established for the protection of the general right to personality outside the area of the press (See, for example, Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen BGHZ] 26, 349; 30, 7; 35, 363). For this reason alone, there exists no "special right against the press."

The imposition of excessively onerous sanctions, which under certain circumstances could also include unpredictably high claims for damages, would, however, restrict the freedom of the press in violation of constitutional law, especially if the legal prerequisites for such claims were not clearly established. Such a case is not, however, at issue here. Pecuniary compensation for non-material damage constitutes a sanction that is not inherently foreign to our legal order, as may be recognized from s. 253 of the Civil Code itself. In s. 847 of the Civil Code, it is provided for in the case of violation of other legal interests identified in s. 823 of the Civil Code as well as in a few specific statutes. In the course of the development of the case law, the classes of cases in which compensation must be made for non-material damage have taken on clear contours. Claims for damages have subordinate character; the courts award pecuniary damages only if natural restitution, for example, through the grant of a right to an injunction or rescission, is impossible or because of the nature of the case inadequate; there can be no serious discussion of "commercialization of honour." Since a significant encroachment upon the personal sphere and serious fault are required, this ensures that the standards of care are not exaggerated for a press that works responsibly and that not every instance of inaccuracy or objectively false information will entail liability. Finally, a look at the case law shows that - as also in the present case - the amounts of damages awarded are within reasonable limits, especially if one takes into account that the actions of the press organ that give rise to the claim for damages are as a rule themselves motivated by economic interests. The risk to which the press is exposed by this case law does not therefore exceed a reasonable measure. In the case to be judged here, this is especially obvious; the degree of care that must be exercised to prevent dissemination of an invented interview is never unreasonable.

IV.

1. The traditional accountability of judges to the law, which is a mainstay element of the principle of the separation of powers and therefore of the rule of law, is in any case as regards its formulation modified in the Basic Law such that the judiciary is bound by "law and justice" (Article 20.3). This constitutes according to prevailing opinion rejection of narrow legal positivism. This formulation supports awareness of the fact that the law and justice are to be sure in fact generally identical, but not necessarily so and not always. Justice is not identical with the entire body of written law. There may exist under certain circumstances law that surpasses that embodied in the positive statutes of the state and has its origins in the legal order under constitutional law as a conceptual whole and can function as a corrective to written law; to find and implement this law in its decisions is the task of the judiciary. Judges are not bound by the Basic Law to apply the mandates of the legislature within the limits imposed by their possible literal meaning in individual cases. Such an understanding would have to predicate the complete absence of any gaps in the positive legal order of the state, which whilst justifiable as a fundamental postulate of legal certainty is in practice unattainable. Judicial activity consists not only in recognition and pronouncement of decisions of the legislature. The task of the judiciary may in particular require bringing to light and rendering in the form of decisions values that are inherent to the constitutional legal order, but have not or have only incompletely found expression in the texts of written laws, through a process of evaluative judgment, which is also not devoid of elements of volition. In so doing, judges must avoid arbitrariness; their decisions must be grounded in rational argumentation. It must be made obvious that the written law has not fulfilled its function of providing an equitable solution to a legal problem. A judicial decision then closes this gap on the basis of standards of practical reason and the "established general notions of justice of the community" (BVerfGE 9, 338 [349]).

The duty and authority of judges with regard to "creative adjudication" have never in principle - in any case not under the Basic Law - been the subject of dispute (See, for example, R. Fischer, Die Weiterbildung des Rechts durch die Rechtsprechung, Schriftenreihe der Juristischen Studiengesellschaft Karlsruhe, vol. 100 (1971), and on that Redeker, NJW 1972, pp. 409 et seq., each with further references).

The highest courts have from the very beginning claimed this right (See, for example, Decisions of the Federal Court of Justice in Civil Matters [Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Zivilsachen - BGHZ] 3, 308 [315], 4; 153 [158]; Federal Labour Court [Bundesarbeitsgericht - BAG] 1, 279 [280, 281]).

The Federal Constitutional Court has always recognized it (See, for example, BVerfGE 3, 225 [243, 244]; 13, 153 [164]; 18, 224 [237 et seq.]; 25, 167 [183]). The legislature itself explicitly charges the Great Senates of the highest federal courts with responsibility for "further development of the law" (see, for example, s. 137 of the Judicature Act (Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz - GVG)). In some areas of law, labour law, for example, this has taken on special importance because legislation has lagged behind the flow of social progress.

The sole question that remains concerns the limits that must be imposed upon creative adjudication, taking into account the principle that binds the judiciary to the law, which is an essential prerequisite for upholding the rule of law. Such limits cannot be expressed in a formula that would be equally valid for all areas of law and for all legal situations they give rise to or to which they apply.

2. For the purposes of the present decision, this question can be restricted to the area of private law. In this case, judges are confronted with the large body of codified law that constitutes the German Civil Code, which has been in effect for more than 70 years. This is of twofold importance: firstly, the freedom of judges for creative development of the law necessarily increases with the "aging of the codifications" (Kübler, JZ 1969, p. 645), i.e., in proportion to the length of time between the original legal mandate and the judicial decision in the individual case at issue. The interpretation of a provision of law cannot always indefinitely retain the meaning attached to it when it originated. It is necessary to take into account the reasonable purpose it may serve when it is applied. Laws consistently exist in a context of social conditions and socio-political attitudes; their substantive content can and must evolve commensurately when necessary. This is especially the case when conditions of life and legal attitudes have undergone such far-reaching change during the time that has elapsed between the enactment of laws and the application thereof as has been the case in this century. Judges cannot evade the possibility of a conflict arising between a law and the substantive notions of justice of a changed society by relying on the unchanged wording of the law; they are compelled to deal freely with legal norms in order to avoid abdication of their responsibility for the administration of "justice." On the other hand, as experience shows, legislative reforms encounter special difficulties and obstacles precisely when they are intended to lead to revision of major bodies of legislation that characterize the entire legal order to such an extent as the codification of private law in the form of the German Civil Code.

However, results that are obtained in a manner that can at least be discussed in terms of civil law and are in any case not obviously in conflict with the hermeneutic rules of civil law cannot be objected to on constitutional grounds if they serve to assert and effectively protect a legal interest that is viewed under the Basic Law itself as being at the core of its system of values. Such results constitute "justice" within the meaning of Article 20.3 of the Basic Law - not as opposed to, but as a complement to and extension of written law.

It is also not possible to object to the method of adjudication of the Federal Court of Justice on constitutional grounds since it deviates from written law only to the extent required to render justice in a concrete case. The Federal Court of Justice neither considers s. 253 of the Civil Code to be no longer valid in its entirety, nor did it by any means want to characterize it as being unconstitutional (a possibility that would have been available to the Court since the issue involves a law that predates the Basic Law). The Court left the principle of enumeration expressed in the provision untouched and merely added to those cases in which the legislature had already made provision for compensation for non-material damage a further instance in which not only change in conditions of life, but also a jus superveniens of higher rank, namely, Articles 1 and 2.1 of the Basic Law, made this decision seem compellingly required. The Federal Court of Justice and courts that follow its reasoning have therefore not departed from the system of the legal order and have not asserted their own will in terms of legal dogma, but have only elaborated on basic ideas behind the legal order stamped by the Basic Law using systemic means.

c) The First and the Sixth Broadcasting Decision, BVerfGE 12, 205 and BVerfGE 83, 238

Explanatory Annotation

The German Broadcasting system, radio and television, has always been the subject of separate and more intensive regulation. Whereas, for example, there has never been a requirement for newspapers to be licensed by the government, broadcasters have always been subjected to such licensing. Whereas there are very few access and content rules regarding newspapers[72] other than those of general application such as obscenity or advertising restrictions for alcohol or tobacco there has always been access regulation and rules safeguarding plurality and thus indirectly content in the case of broadcasting. The reason is the structural difference between the press and broadcasting. The press, both in terms of quantity of publications and in terms of the range of opinions and philosophies represented was traditionally more pluralistic than broadcasting with its limited frequencies and the required high capital investment. At the same time the effectiveness of broadcasting as a mass medium can be far greater than that of a newspaper.[73]

72 The Court has held that it would in principle be unconstitutional for the government to regulate the press as this would interfere with its institutional independence, see BVerfGE 12, 205 (260).

73 See BVerfGE 12, 205 (261).

The Constitutional Court has played a major, if not the main role, in defining the structure of the German broadcasting media landscape.[74] The result of the Court's jurisprudence is the specific German 'dualistic' broadcasting system with a large and extensively funded public (but not government controlled)[75] broadcasting pillar and private, commercially funded broadcasting existing side by side. This result largely came about on the basis of a few words in Article 5.1 of the Basic Law, which stipulate that "freedom of reporting by means of broadcasts and films shall be guaranteed". The perhaps astonishing effect of these few words in the Basic Law on the shape of an entire industry are not only ample evidence of the Court's power but also illustrate that the distinction between the interpretation of law and the making of law is difficult at best, particularly in the area of constitutional law.

The first of these decisions translated here (BVerfGE 12, 205) is important for two very different reasons. The first has to do with the federal structure of Germany. The federal government had attempted to set up a federally controlled television network. The Court denied the federal government this power on the basis that no legal basis for the exercise of such a power could be inferred from the Basic Law and that therefore, under the general safeguarding clause of Article 30 of the Basic Law, any such powers must lie with the Länder and not with the federal government. The only powers left on the federal level are the powers concerning the technical side of broadcasting, i.e. powers necessary to regulate the technical infrastructure for the transmission of broadcasting, which at the time was monopolized in the German Postal Service but has since been privatized.[76] Broadcasting as such, however, i.e. the organization of broadcasting and anything to do with the programming was regarded as part of cultural policy and hence as part of the powers of the Länder. As a result the federal government had to stay completely out of broadcasting and this has had an effect even beyond the Federal Republic. The Constitutional Court[77] and, subsequently, the amended Article 23 of the Basic Law made it clear that as far as the regulation of broadcasting on the European Union level is concerned, Germany will not be represented in the European Union's Council of Ministers by a representative of the federal government but by a representative of the Länder to be determined by the federal chamber, the Bundesrat.

The second principle developed by the Court in this first broadcasting decision is the principle of broadcasting independence. Broadcasting must be organized in such a way that neither the state (government) nor particular groups of society can exercise undue influence. Rather, broadcasting must be structured and organized to guarantee 'intra-plurality' by putting the management into the cooperative hands of all relevant groups of society to be exercised through 74 Depending on the count there are about twelve decisions of the Constitutional Court dealing with various broadcasting matters. For a recent overview in English see Witteman, Chris, Constitutionalizing Communications: The German Constitutional Court's Jurisprudence of Communications Freedom (January 22, 2010). Available at SSRN: http://ssrn.com/abstract=1540906 (last accessed on 21.10.2019).

75 The broadcasting and the public welfare sector are the two most noticeable areas operating in this fashion as agencies under public law (Anstalten des öffentlichen Rechts), with their own pluralistically composed governance bodies operating under broad statutory authority.

76 Another example for the indirect influence of federal powers of broadcasting is the area of copyright law.

77 BVerfGE 92, 203 - http://www.servat.unibe.ch/dfr/bv092203.html.

governing boards ("broadcasting councils") which control the management and which are composed of members from many diverse groups ranging from the political parties, to trade unions, the various churches and many others. The system has recently come under pressure as critics argue that despite the prima facie diversity on the governing bodies in fact the political parties and state representatives have too much influence.

In the second decision presented here, known as the fourth broadcasting decision[78], the Constitutional Court developed a concept that is now fundamental to the broadcasting order of Germany, the "Grundversorgung", i.e. the provision of basic or primary broadcasting services as a constitutionally protected task of the public broadcasting pillar, whose institutional and financial guarantee is protected by the broadcasting freedom of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law and which is a prerequisite for allowing private broadcasting to take place. This Grundversorgung goes beyond just providing information relevant in the broadest sense for the democratic process and encompasses all aspects of cultural life as well, including entertainment and sports. Financially this means that public broadcasting must be financed such that the basic provision of broadcasting services in this public pillar is comprehensively secured. This is largely achieved by levying a broadcasting fee of roughly 18 Euros per month on every owner of a television or radio, regardless of whether the owner chooses to watch public television or not. This fee is set independently by a Commission based on the needs of the public broadcasting pillar to effectively provide the basic services and the decision of this Commission on the relevant fee is only subject to very limited scrutiny by the governments of the Länder, whose Parliaments have to legislate on this fee.[79]

aa) Translation of the 'First Broadcasting Decision' Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 12, 205*

Headnotes:

1. Constitutional review pursuant to abstract norm control proceedings (Abstract Judicial Review) also covers "treaty laws" for treaties between Germany's states.

2. A federal organ is also deemed to have "not applied" state law within the meaning of s. 76 no. 2 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz - BVerfGG) when it "disregarded" this law.

3. a) The postal and telecommunications system within the meaning of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law only covers - apart from the reception of broadcasts - the transmission related area of broadcasting, excluding so-called studio technology.

78 BVerfGE 73, 118.

79 See the 2007 decision of the Court, BVerfGE 119, 181, available in German at http://www.servat.unibe.ch/dfr/bv119181.html.

b) Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law does not empower the Federation to regulate the organization of broadcasting and that of broadcasters.

4. The Federation's legislative competence with regard to telecommunications system (Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law) also extends to regulations that reserve for the Federation the exclusive right to establish and operate transmission facilities for the purpose of broadcasting.

5. In accordance with the system of the Basic Law, the Federation's legislative competence describes the outermost boundary of its administrative powers. The "Federal postal service" (Bundespost) in Article 87.1 of the Basic Law therefore cannot comprise more than the "postal and telecommunications system" in Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law.

6. In awarding the right to establish or operate broadcasting facilities (s. 2 of the Telecommunications Facilities Act) and in concluding contracts dealing with the use of such facilities, the Bundespost may only regulate transmission aspects. Any "terms" going beyond this area are impermissible.

7. a) In accordance with the development of German law, broadcasting is a public function. When the State exercises this function in some form (including in those cases in which it makes use of forms of private law), it becomes a "State function" within the meaning of Article 30 Basic Law.

   b) Broadcasting by the Federation cannot be justified under Article 30 in conjunction with Articles 83 seq. Basic Law with the argument that broadcasting is a "supra-regional function" or that the Basic Law permits the broadcasting by the Federation of such programs that are to serve national representation within the country and to assist in safeguarding "continuity of tradition". By the very nature of the matter, the Federation does not have any competence over this.

8. a) Article 30 Basic Law applies to the discharge of public functions both pursuant to law and outside the law.

   b) Section VIII of the Basic Law "provides otherwise" within the meaning of Article 30 of the Basic Law both for administration pursuant to law and that outside the law.

9. The procedure and style of the negotiations that become necessary under the Constitution between the Federation and its component parts and between the states are also subject to the mandate that the parties act for the benefit of the Federation.

10. Article 5 Basic Law calls for laws providing that broadcasters be organized in such a way that all pertinent forces are able to have an influence in their organs and to have their say in overall programming; such laws are also to establish binding guidelines for the content of overall programming that guarantee a minimum of substantive balance, objectivity and mutual respect.

Judgment of the Second Senate of 28 February 1961 - 2 BvG 1,2/60 -

Facts:

Following the end of World War II, the operation of broadcasting facilities by German authorities was initially prohibited. The confiscated radio stations were operated by the Occupying Powers, which gradually returned broadcasting to German control. The Western Occupying Powers pursued the objective of eliminating all forms of State influence over broadcasting. By way of ordinances issued by the military governments or through laws of the states, whose contents were fundamentally influenced by the Occupying Powers, public broadcasting companies were created in the three Western zones of occupation. These received the right of selfadministration and in some areas were subject to precisely described legal supervision.

The public broadcasting companies have united to form the "Working Group of Public Broadcasting Companies in the Federal Republic of Germany" (Arbeitsgemeinschaft der öf-fentlich-rechtlichen Rundfunkanstalten der Bundesrepublik Deutschland; ARD). Their cooperative efforts in the area of television are based on the "Interstate Television Treaty" concluded on 27 March 1953, which is currently in force in the version of 24 May 1956. The "Agreement regarding the Coordination of the First Television Channel", which was concluded by the states on 17 April 1959, is intended to provide the companies' joint programming activities with a legal foundation.

Following the entry into force of the Basic Law, a number of efforts were made to reorganize the broadcasting system, some by way of federal legislation, others by way of agreements between the states or between the states and the Federation.

On 25 July 1960, the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH (Germany Television Corporation) was founded. The Corporation's function is "the transmission of broadcast television programs that are to provide viewers in all of Germany and abroad with a comprehensive picture of Germany" (s. 2 of the Charter). The Corporation bears sole responsibility for all programming; it is either to produce this itself or have it produced by third parties at its request and under its responsibility (s. 4 of the Charter).

The Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg and the State of Hesse are of the view that, by founding the Corporation, the Federation has violated their constitutional rights.

Extracts from the Grounds:

C.

I.

The applications fall within the jurisdiction of the Second Senate; they are admissible.

D.

S. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty reserves for the Norddeutschen Rundfunk the exclusive right to disseminate for the general public news and presentations in word, sound and image in the States of Lower Saxony, Schleswig-Holstein and the Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg (Transmission Territory), i.e., to broadcast programs (monopoly on the broadcasting of programs). The provision further provides the Norddeutschen Rundfunk the exclusive right to establish and operate in its Transmission Territory the radio broadcasting and television broadcasting facilities required for broadcasting programs (monopoly on the establishment and operation of transmission facilities).

The Hamburg Act relating to the Interstate Treaty on the Norddeutschen Rundfunk is, insofar as it refers to s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty, incompatible with the Basic Law and therefore null and void to the extent that the provision provides the Norddeutschen Rundfunk with a monopoly on the establishment and operation of transmission facilities. In all other respects, the provision is compatible with the Basic Law.

I.

1. In the view of the Federal Government, s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty is null and void in its entirety. The provision is alleged to be incompatible with the exclusive legislative competence of the Federation with regard to regulation of the telecommunications system (Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law).

The Federal Government asserts that the term "postal and telecommunications system" is the result of historical developments. It is said to correspond to that of the "postal and telegraph system" in Article 6 no. 7 and Article 88.1 of the Weimar Constitution, covering radio and - since its origins - also broadcasting. During the period of the Reich postal services, it attached to the "licenses" issued to programming companies for the use of its radio transmission facilities for the purposes of entertainment broadcasting "extensive terms designed to ensure political impartiality in the transmission program and organizational neutrality of the transmission companies". It is alleged that the wording of the licenses unambiguously reveals "that the Reich postal services controlled both the technical and the organizational side" and "laid claim to all issues concerning the broadcasting area by virtue of its sovereignty in the field of telegraphy (radio sovereignty)" (Scheuner, Expert Opinion, pp. 45 seq.). The Act on Telecommunications Facilities of 1928 is said to have confirmed this legal situation and included in the statutory regulation the Reich's ability to exercise influence over broadcasting (Scheuner, Expert Opinion, p. 46).

The Federal Government further asserts that the term "telecommunications system" is also unable, insofar as it covers broadcasting, to be divided into a technical, an organization and a programming category, since, from the standpoint of the legislature, broadcasting constitutes an unified whole. It is alleged that sensible regulation of licensing cannot be implemented without imposing terms regarding the organization and programming of broadcasting.

Thus, in the view of the Federal Government, the legislative powers under Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law cover broadcasting as a whole. For this reason, the Federation is said also to be empowered to issue statutory rules pursuant to the guiding principles contained in Article 5 of the Basic Law for ensuring freedom of broadcasting. The granting of a monopoly to the Norddeutschen Rundfunk for the broadcasting of programs is therefore alleged to conflict with Article 5 of the Basic Law.

2. The regulation made by s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty for the benefit of the Norddeutschen Rundfunk would be incompatible in its entirety with Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law if the term "telecommunications system" were to be understood in such a comprehensive manner as asserted by the Federal Government. Not only the exclusive right reserved for the Norddeutschen Rundfunk by s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty to establish and operate transmission facilities but also its monopoly on the broadcasting of programs falls in that area that, in the view of the Federal Government, is subject to exclusive statutory regulation by the Federation pursuant to Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law.

II.

1. The interpretation given by the Federal Government to Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law is incorrect. The "postal and telecommunications system" covers only the transmission related area of broadcasting, excluding so-called studio technology, but not broadcasting as a whole. Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law in particular does not empower the Federation to regulate the organization of broadcasting and the internal organization of the broadcasters or to enact rules relating to programs. The enacting of statutes called for by Article 5 of the Basic Law in order to give shape to the guiding principles it contains to ensure freedom of broadcasting falls, from both the standpoint of substantive law and from an organizational perspective (see infra E III), within the legislative competence of the states and only within that of the Federation to the extent that it might in exceptional cases have the authority to broadcast programs of a special nature (see infra III 2 and E I 5).

2. a) Under Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law, the Federation has exclusive legislative competence for the "postal and telecommunications system". Broadcasting could only be attributed to the telecommunications system within the meaning of this provision. The wording of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law can be traced back to older formulations, which assigned to the postal services, in addition to their traditional functions, the telegraph system (cf. ss. 41 fet seq. of the Reich Constitution of 1849; Article 4 no. 10 of the Constitution of the North German Alliance of 1867 and the Reich Constitution of 1871; Article 6 no. 7 of the Weimar Constitution). In other words, by "postal system" in Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law is meant the "traditional" service branches of the postal services in contrast to the "new" field of the "telecommunications system". Both of these are a part of the "Bundespost" within the meaning of Article 87.1 of the Basic Law.

b) Broadcasting (here and in the following, radio broadcasting and television broadcasting) makes use, for the wireless dissemination of programming, of electric waves that are sent out by transmitters. These broadcasting transmitters are radio facilities and thus telecommunications facilities (s. 1 of the Telecommunications Facilities Act [Fernmeldeanlagengesetz; FAG]); they are a part of the telecommunications system within the meaning of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law.

Under an interpretation following the ordinary meaning of the words and common usage of language, the telecommunications system only comprises the technical steps in the transmission of broadcast presentations. Telecommunications system is a technical term oriented according to the process of disseminating signals. The telecommunications system employs telecommunications facilities, i.e., technical equipment, with the aid of which signals are sent or conveyed "into the distance". This is confirmed by the Act on Telecommunications Facilities of 1928, whose provisions are limited, to the extent applicable here, by their meaning and their wording to regulations regarding the establishment and operation of radio facilities, i.e., to the regulation of technical processes. The medium of mass communications "broadcasting", whose political and cultural significance can hardly be overestimated, is not a part but rather a "user" of the equipment of the telecommunications system (cf. Moser, DÖV 1954, 389 [390]; Lademann, JIR 8 [1957/1958] p. 307 [310]; cf. also Haenel, Deutsches Staatsrecht, 1892, vol. 1, p. 415). The technical aspects of telecommunications may very well have been of predominant significance in the early days of broadcasting and have marked its development. However, viewing broadcasting as a whole, technical telecommunications equipment has for decades only exercised minor, support functions.

c) If, in accordance with the general usage of language, the telecommunications system only covers the technical processes serving to disseminate signals, then it follows that so-called studio technology does not belong to the telecommunications system. The telecommunications system first begins with the conveyance of transmittable sound and image signals by the broadcasting studio to one or several transmitters (conveyance by cables or by radio waves); it then also covers the sending out of the program and the conceivable, related technical processes up to reception of the program.

Within the meaning of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law, the telecommunications system comprises the technical requirements whose regulation is indispensible for an orderly running of the operations of the broadcasters and the reception of their programs. The transmitters must be assigned specific frequencies that are coordinated with those of other transmitters. In order to avoid overlapping and disturbances, the location and transmission power of the transmitters must be fixed according to radio-technical aspects. The adherence to frequencies and transmission power must be supervised. Care must be taken that the sending out and reception of programs are not disturbed by other telecommunications facilities and electrical equipment, and that they in turn do not disturb general radio traffic. The same applies to the cables and radio traffic through which the sound and image signals are conveyed from the studio to the transmitter.

These things are a part of the telecommunications system. Insofar as they can be made subject to statutory rules, then only the Federation may enact the regulations.

3. It also follows from the relationship of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law to other provisions of the Basic Law that the telecommunications system only comprises the transmission technology of broadcasting.

a) Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law uses the term "broadcasting", and by this it means broadcasting as an institution. Although this does not rule out that other provisions of the Basic Law regulate sub-areas of broadcasting under other, more specific designations, the mention of "broadcasting" in Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law does not permit the assumption that the term "telecommunications system" covers broadcasting as a whole. If only sub-areas of broadcasting can be meant by the "telecommunications system", then this can only involve those areas that serve the conveyance of presentations, i.e., transmission technology.

   As a medium of mass communications, broadcasting belongs in the neighbourhood of press and film. Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law refers to all three media in one sentence. The Federation's legislative competence is expressly provided only for the general legal affairs of press and film (Article 75 no. 2 of the Basic Law). Broadcasting is not mentioned in Article 75 no. 2 of the Basic Law. An interpretation paying regard to the interrelationship of the provisions of the Basic Law may therefore not assume that the Federation in entitled to exclusive legislative competence for broadcasting as a whole while it may enact only framework provisions dealing with the general legal affairs of the press and film.

b) With regard to the structure of legislative competence of the Federation and the states, the Basic Law operates on the principle that the states first have competence (BVerfGE 10, 89 [101]). The Federation only has legislative competence to the extent that the Basic Law endows it with such (Article 70.1 of the Basic Law). The Federation's legislative powers may therefore normally only be supported by an express authorization by the Basic Law. In cases of doubt regarding the Federation's jurisdiction, there is no assumption that argues in favour of federal competence. Rather, the systematic of the Basic Law calls for a strict interpretation of Articles 73 seq. of the Basic Law.

   In addition, broadcasting is in any event also a cultural phenomenon. To the extent that cultural matters can be administered and regulated whatsoever by the State (cf. BVerfGE 10, 20 [36 seq.]), they nevertheless fall, in accordance with the Basic Law's fundamental decision (arts. 30, 70 et seq. and 83 et seq. Basic Law), in the area of the states (cf. BVerfGE 6, 309 [354]) when special provisions of the Basic Law do not provide restrictions or exceptions in favour of the Federation. This fundamental decision by the Constitution, which is not least a decision in favour of the federalist structure of the State in the interest of effective separation of powers, forbids especially in the area of cultural matters the assumption that the Federation has jurisdiction without a sufficiently clear, contrary rule of exception. The latter is lacking here.

c) Article 87.1 of the Basic Law stipulates that the Bundespost is to be managed as direct federal administration. This does not permit any inferences as to the extent of the Federation's legislative competence. It conforms to a principle of German constitutional law that federal competence to legislate extends farther than that to administer

(cf. Scheuner, Expert Opinion, p. 48). In accordance with the systematic of the Basic Law, the Federation's legislative competence traces the outermost boundary of its administrative powers (cf. Krüger, Der Rundfunk im Verfassungsgefüge und in der Verwaltungsordnung von Bund und Ländern, 1960, p. 78; Zeidler, DVBl. 1960, 573 [579 seq.]). But this means that the Federation's administrative competences follow its legislative competences and not the reverse. No conclusions may therefore be drawn from the alleged powers of the Bundespost under Article 87.1 of the Basic Law as to the extent of the Federation's legislative competence. Moreover, the "postal and telecommunications system" in Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law and the "Bundespost" in Article 87.1 of the Basic Law mean the same area. The extent of the area "Bundespost" results from what is to be understood by "postal and telecommunications system". It is also incorrect that broadcasting is considered a matter of the Bundespost. The Federal Government has dictated that broadcasting matters are, apart from technical issues, not to be dealt with offically by the Federal Ministry for the Postal and Telecommunications System but rather by the Federal Ministry of the Interior. It therefore acknowledges that in its view as well, this does not involve matters of the telecommunications system (cf. s. 1 of the Postal Administration Act of 24 July 1953, BGBl. I, p. 676).

4. The interests of the general public call for an ordering of radio traffic, which can only be effectively accomplished by the Federation. This also applies to broadcasting. The allocation and delineation of transmitter frequencies, the determination of their location and transmission power according to radio-technical aspects, so-called cable technology, supervision of radio traffic, its protection against large-scale and local disturbances, as well as the implementation of international agreements all must be uniformly regulated by virtue of the nature of the matter if chaos in radio traffic is to be avoided.

Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law serves the purpose of making possible the indispensible uniform regulation of these and similar matters. This purpose does not, however, require that in addition to radio and, in particular, transmission related issues, the broadcasting of programs must also be submitted to statutory regulation by the Federation. In other words, also following from the purpose of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law is the restriction to transmission related matters of broadcasting.

5. A historical interpretation of the term "telecommunications system" does not lead to different results. Although it is correct that by means of the administrative practice of the Reich postal services, authorities of the Reich exercised a not insubstantial influence in the period from 1926 to the beginning of 1933 on the organization of broadcasters and the structuring of their programs (cf. the depiction in Bausch, Der Rundfunk im politischen Kräftespiel der Weimar Republik, 1956, pp. 11 et seq.; Pohle, Der Rundfunk als Instrument der Politik, 1955, pp. 27 et seq.), it is not possible to draw from this that the telecommunications system within the meaning of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law covers broadcasting as a whole.

a) In the period before 1933, statutory rules for broadcasting were not enacted. Neither the Ordinance for the Protection of Radio Traffic of 8 March 1924 (RGBl. I, p. 273) - Radio Ordinance - nor the Act to Amend the Telegraph Act of 3 December 1927 (RGBl. I, p. 331), which provided for the promulgation of the revised Telegraph Act under the title "Act on Telecommunications Facilities", employs the word "broadcasting". The reasoning accompanying this Amending Act (RT III/1924 Drucks. No. 3682) merely mentions broadcasting in the context of imposing fees for the establishment and operation of broadcasting reception facilities. According to the reasoning, the purpose of the amendment of the Telegraph Act was the solidification of the State's radio sovereignty in view of the progress made in radio technology (id. at p. 5). The Act was accepted in the Reichstag in all three readings without discussion (RT III/1924, Negotiations vol 394, p. 11719 and 11732; Stenographic Report of the 346th Session on 24 November 1927).

Under an unbiased reading, the wording of the Act on Telecommunications Facilities is restricted to the regulation of radio-technical issues; it does not give rise to any references to the fact that broadcasting as a whole was assigned to the postal and telegraph system within the meaning of Article 6 no. 7 and Article 88.1 of the Weimar Constitution. The same applies to the reasoning behind the draft Act. In the commentaries to the Reich Constitution of 1919, broadcasting is mentioned neither in Article 6 no. 7 nor in Article 88.1, let alone included in the postal and telegraph system.

b) Thus, for the "historical development" of the term "telecommunications system", the Federal Government cannot rely on the legislation but rather only on the administrative practice of the Reich postal services and the Reich Minister of the Interior in the period up to 1933. It particularly relies on this for its position that the competence to regulate the telecommunications system also covers to power to give statutory form to the guiding principles of Article 5 Basic Law.

The tool used not only by the Reich but also by the states to gain influence on the broadcasting of programs was primarily the "licenses" - common since 1926 and tied to conditions - for the use of radio transmission facilities of the Reich postal services for the purpose of entertainment broadcasting ("Conditions"), to which were appended guidelines for the news and information service ("Guidelines") as well as provisions for the Supervisory Committees and the Councils ("Provisions").

It is only conditionally correct that the influence had by the Reich and the states on the broadcasting of programs served the "political impartiality", the "organizational neutrality of the transmission companies" and the safeguarding of the right to freedom of expression (Article 118 of the Weimar Constitution) in broadcasting. For this assertion, only no. 1 of the Guidelines can be resorted to, which stated: "Broadcasting shall serve no one party. Its overall news and information service shall therefore be strictly structured in a supra-party fashion" (see also No. 10 of the Provisions for the Council of 1926 and no. 1(c) of the Guidelines on the Revised Regulation of Broadcasting of 1932, reproduced in Pohle, supra at pp., 124 et seq.). In all other respects, however, a system of State influence and supervision was established with the aid of the Conditions, which approached censorship.

The programming companies were only allowed to disseminate such political news that they had received from a "News Agency" of the "Wireless Services Corporation for Books and Press" (Drahtloser Dienst AG für Buch und Presse), 51 % of whose shares were held by the Reich (no. 2 of the Guidelines). Only nonpolitical and local news was permitted to be obtained from other agencies. News designated by the News Agency or by the responsible state governments as "priority news" (Auflagenachrichten) had to be disseminated promptly, unabridged and unchanged, as was the case for "priority information" (AuflageVorträge) (nos. 3, 5 and 7 of the Guidelines). The Corporation was required to be constantly informed of the "handling" of the news and information provided by the News Agency (no. 8 of the Guidelines). The Supervisory Committee for the news and information services, which was normally composed of a representative from the Reich and two representatives from the responsible state government, was charged with "deciding on all political issues related to programming" (Article 3.1 of the Conditions). The programming company was obligated "to seek contact with the Supervisory Committee in all political issues of programming and to await its decision" (no. 3 of the Provisions for the Committee). Programs always had to be submitted to its members, and they had to be informed of important program changes. Finally, the Committee had a veto right with regard to all aspects of programming, insofar as not merely issues of art, science or public education were involved (Nos. 5 and 6 of the Provisions). Similar powers were possessed by the Council, whose members were appointed, following discussions with the programming company, by the responsible state government in consultation with the Reich Minister of the Interior. The Council was charged with "participating in the structuring of programming with respect to presentations in the area of art, science and public education" (Article 3.2 of the Conditions). The Council also had the right to lodge objections to programming (no. 7 of the Provisions for the Council).

The Supervisory Committees and the Councils were characterized as early as 1927 as "censorship authorities" (Dencker, Handwörterbuch der Rechtswissenschaft, vol. 2, 1927, p. 547 [550 seq.]). Doubts were expressed whether this administrative practice was compatible the right to freedom of expression safeguarded by Article 118 of the Weimar Constitution. Häntzschel (HdbDStR II, 651 [668]) only considered the censoring activities of the Supervisory Committees to be compatible with Article 118 of the Weimar Constitution because in his view the operation of broadcasting facilities was not a sovereign but rather a fiscal branch of the postal administration aimed at revenues. He stated that broadcasting censorship would be "undoubtedly unconstitutional" if the operation of broadcasting were to be deemed an emanation of a State sovereign right (id. at p. 668 n. 38). At the same time, however, there was just as little doubt then as there is today that as of 1926 the legal relations between the Reich postal services and the programming companies were in the nature of public law (cf. the written response of the Reich Minister of the Interior of 2 December 1926 to a resolution of the Reichstag, RT III/1924 Drucks. no. 2776; Neugebauer, Archiv für Post und Telegraphie 53 (1925) p. 46 [47]; id., Fernmelderecht mit Rundfunkrecht, 3 d ed. 1929, pp. 699 seq.; id., Archiv für Funkrecht 3 (1930) pp. 155 [166, 203], 627 [628]; Bredow, Vier Jahre deutscher Rundfunk, 1927, p. 20; Freund, Der deutsche Rundfunk, 1933, p. 54; Schuster, Archiv für das Post- und Fernmeldewesen 1 (1949) p. 309 [314]; Lüders, Die Zuständigkeit zur Rundfunkgesetzgebung, 1953, pp. 12 seq.; Peters, Die Zuständigkeit des Bundes im Rundfunkwesen, 1954, pp. 6 seq.; Steinmetz, Bundespost und Rundfunk, 1959, pp. 11 et seq.).

In this regard, it is irrelevant whether the basis of these public law relations were seen in a "license" or "award" (s. 1 of the Radio Ordinance of 1924; s. 2 FAG) subject to terms (Conditions) permitting the joint operation of transmission facilities (e.g., the Reich Minister of the Interior; Neugebauer, Bredow, Freund and Schuster, supra; cf. also Article 4.3 of the Conditions) or in public law relations of another kind regulating the practical usage of these facilities, (e.g., Dencker, supra; Peters and Steinmetz, supra).

Regardless of whether the administrative practice of the Reich postal services and the Reich Minister of the Interior was compatible with Article 118 of the Weimar Constitution, it cannot be ascertained - at least in paying broad regard to the "safeguarding of the official influence on the presentations of broadcasting" (Bredow, id. at p. 20) realized with the aid of the Conditions - that this influence served the objective of ensuring the basic right of freedom of expression, including the prohibition of censorship, in the area of broadcasting. The same applies to the possibilities for interference with the various programming companies secured by the Reich via the Reich Broadcasting Corporation (cf. Bredow, supra, pp. 41 seq.). This cannot be countered with the argument that party-political neutrality in broadcasting may have been achieved to a certain extent.

Thus, the Federal Government improperly relies on administrative practice in the period to 1933 when it asserts that the competence to regulate the telecommunications system enables the Federation to give statutory form to the guiding principles in Article 5 of the Basic Law with regard to broadcasting.

The constitutionality of the administrative practice of the Reich postal services and the Reich Minister of the Interior with regard to broadcasting was furthermore disputed in still other respects as well. The reorganization of broadcasting in 1925-1926 as well as the reform in the summer of 1932 was the result of protracted negotiations between the Reich and the states in the Reich Council and its committees (cf. Bausch, supra, at pp. 40 et seq., 91 et seq.). In these negotiations, the states took issue with the Reich regarding the latter's competence to regulate the broadcasting system; they particularly objected to the efforts to gain political influence over programming, which were initiated not by the Reich postal services but rather by the Reich Minister of the Interior. The differences of opinion between the Reich and the states were not carried out. Instead, agreement was reached on compromises that provided the states with a not insignificant amount of influence on the broadcasting of programs. Nevertheless, in 1926 and in 1932 the states contested the comprehensive powers claimed by the Reich and emphasized that on the basis of their police and cultural sovereignty, they had the right to regulate broadcasting on their own (cf. Bausch, supra, pp. 55, 102 seq., 199 seq.). In view of these fundamental differences of opinion between the Reich and the states, it is not possible to refer to a "supplement to the Constitution arising by way of custom" in the sense of a Reich competence (e.g., Scheuner, Expert Opinion, p. 47).

It must finally be added that the "official influence on the presentations of broadcasting" (Bredow, supra) did not emanate from the Reich Postal Minister and the Reich postal services but rather from the Reich Minister of the Interior and the state governments. Schuster (supra, p. 320) correctly emphasized that before and after 1933,

"the Reich postal services never had anything to do with the programming side but rather . . . limited itself to the technical side of broadcasting". This is confirmed by the fact that "broadcasting law" was only assigned to the area of telecommunications law insofar as it regulated the technical side of broadcasting (cf. Krause, Die Zuständigkeit zur Ordnung des Rundfunkwesens in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, 1960, pp. 80 et seq., in particular, the statements cited there by Ministerial Advisor Dr. Neugebauer in the Reich Postal Ministry).

In all, it therefore cannot be assumed that the administrative practice of the Reich postal services, the Reich Minister of the Interior and the state governments up to 1933 gave rise to a legal term "telecommunications system" covering broadcasting as a whole, which the drafters of the Basic Law could then have adopted.

c) The period from 1933 to 1945 must be left out of consideration. The development of broadcasting in the years 1945 to 1949 is unable to contribute to the establishment of a term "telecommunications system" covering broadcasting as a whole.

d) The historical background of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law confirms that the telecommunications system does not cover broadcasting as a whole. It can only be unambiguously drawn from the negotiations in the Parliamentary Council that, on the one hand, in contrast to the proposal of the Constitutional Convention at Herrenchiemsee (Report, Descriptive Part, p. 32), the technical side of broadcasting was assigned to the telecommunications system and that, on the other hand, the "cultural side", i.e., the contents of the programs, was to be a matter for the states. The question of whether the organization of the broadcasting system was also to belong to the telecommunications system remained open, without any distinctions having been made between the organization of transmission related processes and the organization of the broadcasting of programs. The materials do not evidence an even remotely clear response to this question

(for the historical background, cf. JÖR 1 (1951), pp. 476 seq.; ParlRat, Ausschuß für Zuständigkeitsabgrenzung, Wortprotokoll über die 2. Sitzung am 22. September 1948, pp. 48, 4452; Wortprotokoll über die 8. Sitzung am 6. Oktober 1948, pp. 3033; Wortprotokoll über die 12. Sitzung am 14. Oktober 1948, pp. 37-40; Verhandlungen des Hauptausschusses, 29. Sitzung am 5. Januar 1949, pp. 351 seq.).

Since the Parliamentary Council did not assign the "cultural side", i.e., programming, to the telecommunications system but rather viewed this as a matter for the states, then this precludes the assumption that it adopted in the Basic Law a term "telecommunications system" that covers broadcasting as a whole. The statutory regulations permitted or prescribed under Article 5 of the Basic Law mainly have to do with the contents of programs, i.e., - in the language of the Parliamentary Council - the "cultural side" of broadcasting. In accordance with its unambiguous will, such regulations were not to be assigned to the telecommunications system.

6. The competence to regulate the telecommunications system under Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law is thus limited to transmission related matters.

a) The Federation is not entitled to farther-reaching legislative powers for broadcasting, not even by virtue of the context of the subject matter (cf. BVerfGE 3, 407 [421]; BVerfGE 8, 143 [149]). Neither studio technology nor the issue related to the broadcasting of programs entail that the regulation of these - to the extent that it is possible and required - is an indispensible prerequisite for the regulation of transmission related matters of broadcasting (cf. BVerfGE 3, 407 [421]). Transmission technology and the broadcasting of programs are areas that can be separated and regulated individually. To this extent, "broadcasting" is not a whole that can only be sensibly regulated uniformly by the Federation.

b) To the extent that the Federation can regulate matters of broadcasting under Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law, it may also create statutory rules regarding its "organization". In other words, the Federation has the authority to enact rules on the organization (the operators) of broadcasting transmission facilities. It may be left aside whether the Federation's legislative competence here is derived from Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law directly or by virtue of the interrelated context or whether - to the extent that administration is at issue - from Articles 83 et seq. of the Basic Law. The Federation thus might, for instance, establish by law institutions of public law with legal personality, to which could be transferred the construction and transmission related operation of federally owned facilities for broadcasting (Article 87.3 of the Basic Law).

   However, the Federation may only enact organizational rules for such institutions that are limited to the establishment and technical operation of transmission facilities (but see infra III 1 and E I 5). Organizational regulations for the broadcaster and for the broadcasting of programs are the province of the state legislature. Such regulations have - on account of Article 5 of the Basic Law - much greater significance than provisions on the organization of establishment and technical operation of transmission facilities. To the extent that provisions of an organizational nature have to be enacted for institutions responsible for both the broadcasting of programs and the operation of transmission facilities, the competence for transmission related affairs thus rests with the state legislature by virtue of the contextual interrelationship.

c) Authority to regulate broadcasting going beyond the area of transmission related matters is also not available to the Federation under Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law simply because "awards" under s. 2 FAG to establish and operate radio facilities and contracts on the use of such facilities have to be made subject to terms (conditions) with respect to the organization of the broadcasting of programs and the contents of programs in order to safeguard Article 5 in conjunction with Article 1.3 of the Basic Law (cf. the Reasoning accompanying the Government's draft of an Act on Broadcasting, BT III/ 1957 Drucks. 1434). If the competence for the telecommunications system with regard to broadcasting is limited to transmission related matters, then the Bundespost is required in making such awards and contracts to give sole consideration to transmission related aspects (see infra E I 4). "Terms" extending beyond this area would be impermissible.

7. a) The Federation's legislative competence for the telecommunications system also permits regulations that reserve for the Federation the exclusive right to establish and operate radio facilities for the purpose of broadcasting. The radio monopoly of the Reich provided for in the 1928 Act on Telecommunications Facilities can be traced back to the monopoly over telegraphy and, ultimately, to the monopoly over postal services

(cf. s. 1 of the Act on the Telegraph System of the German Reich of 6 April 1892 [RGBl., p. 467], and the Amending Act to the latter of 7 March 1908 [RGBl., p. 79], as well as the Radio Ordinance of 1924; cf. also Krüger, supra pp. 5 et seq.).

In this regard, the Basic Law did nothing to change the traditional competence of the Reich. To the extent that its regulations are relevant, s. 1 FAG has thus become federal law.

Article 5 of the Basic Law does not oppose this, since, in contrast to the assertion of the Applicants, it does not require that the broadcasters of programs also control the transmission related facilities and that they must be able to operate these facilities themselves (see infra E III).

b) Nevertheless, the Federation must observe the principle of action for the benefit of the Federation (cf. BVerfGE 4, 115 [140]; BVerfGE 6, 309 [361 seq.]; BVerfGE 8, 122 [138 et seq.]; infra E II). This principle would be violated if the Federation were today to rely on its radio monopoly and make use of its authority to regulate the telecommunications system so as to deprive the existing public broadcasting companies of the right to exercise control over the transmission facilities owned and operated by them. The same would apply if the Federation were to divest these companies by statutory regulation of the frequencies they use and then, in allocating frequencies available now or in the future, not to give them appropriate consideration pursuant to the state regulations on the broadcasters of programs.

8. Thus, under Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law, the Federation has the authority to regulate the establishment and operation of broadcasting transmission facilities. s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty falls in the area of this sole legislative competence of the Federation insofar as it reserves for the Norddeutschen Rundfunk the exclusive right to establish and operate such transmission facilities. To this extent, s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty is incompatible with Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law in conjunction with Article 71 of the Basic Law and therefore null and void. Insofar as s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty reserves for the Norddeutschen Rundfunk the exclusive right to broadcast programs, it is compatible with Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law.

S. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty regulates only the establishment and operation of transmission facilities, as well as the broadcasting of programs, but not their reception. It may therefore be left unresolved whether and to what extent the Federation may enact regulations on broadcasting reception facilities and on the fees for the operation of such facilities and how these fees are to be legally qualified.

III.

The granting of the exclusive right to broadcast programs to the Norddeutschen Rundfunk does not conflict with the Federation's legislative powers for broadcasting that might result from provisions of the Basic Law other than Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law.

1. Provisions of this variety might include, for example, Article 21.3 of the Basic Law (rights of political parties), Article 73 no. 1, of the Basic Law (defence and protection of the civilian population), Article 73 no. 9 of the Basic Law (industrial property rights), Article 73 no. 10 of the Basic Law (inter alia, international control of crime), as well as Article 74 no. 21 of the Basic Law (inter alia, ocean and costal shipping, inland navigation, inland waterways, meteorological services) and Article 74 no. 22 of the Basic Law (road traffic). These Federation competences merely permit the regulation of partial aspects of programming (particularly, the allocation of transmission times to political parties and the broadcasting of certain announcements) or various legal questions of broadcasting (e.g., in the nature of copyright). Further Federation competences might be inferred by virtue of contextual interrelationships from its responsibilities, e.g., for national defence, customs and matters of the Federal Office of Criminal Investigations. All of these federal competences, however, do not - even when seen as a whole - engender any legislative powers to regulate the broadcasting of programs. In other words, they do not affect the monopoly of the Norddeutschen Rundfunk provided for under state law, regardless of its obligation to observe individual federal regulations. In this regard, it may be left aside to what degree these federal legislative powers have to do exclusive competences and to what extent the Federation has made use of its competences in the area of concurrent legislation.

2. It may remain left aside whether the Federation's responsibilities for foreign affairs and for pan-German issues likewise only permit the regulation of partial aspects of programming and individual issues of broadcasting or whether these responsibilities reach further and allow the Federation to enact regulations for such programs intended for broadcast abroad or for Germans resident in German territories outside the Federal Republic of Germany. It may also be left unresolved whether on account of its responsibilities for foreign affairs and pan-German issues, the Federation may establish by law a superior federal authority or an institution of public law for broadcasting programs and also to set down by statute for this authority or institution the guiding principles resulting from Article 5 Basic Law for the broadcasting and broadcasters of programs. Such broad Federation competences, which are not to be decided upon in the instant proceedings, would only relate to the broadcasting and broadcasters of such programs that are solely or predominantly intended for broadcast abroad or for Germans outside the Federal Republic of Germany.

By way of s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty, the Norddeutschen Rundfunk has been reserved the exclusive right to broadcast programs "for the general public". By this is meant - if not exclusively, then at least primarily - "the general public" of the Federal Republic of Germany. The monopoly granted to the Norddeutschen Rundfunk thus may not conflict with the competences that the Federation might have regarding the regulation of programs specifically intended for broadcast abroad or for Germans outside the Federal Republic of Germany.

3. The Federation cannot derive any responsibilities from Article 5 Basic Law. Article 5 of the Basic Law is not a norm describing competences but rather binds that authority entrusted with the regulation of the broadcasting of programs.

IV.

In contrast to the assertion of the Federal Government, the Federation does not have any authority flowing from the nature of the matter to regulate by law the broadcasting of programs intended to serve the supra-regional function of national representation within the country, i.e., the self-depiction of the nation before the population of the Federal Republic of Germany. The Federation is endowed with just as little corresponding administrative competences. It is also unable under Article 87.3 of the Basic Law to establish by law for this purpose a superior federal authority or an institution of public law (see infra E I 6). It therefore requires no review whether this might involve exclusive Federation legislative powers or whether the monopoly provided by s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty to the Norddeutschen Rundfunk to broadcast programs would be compatible with such federal competence.

V.

The exclusive right of the Norddeutschen Rundfunk to broadcast programs also does not conflict with Article 5 of the Basic Law (see infra E III).

VI.

Thus, the Hamburg Act relating to the Interstate Treaty on the Norddeutschen Rundfunk is, insofar as it refers to s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty, only incompatible with the Basic Law and therefore null and void to the extent that it reserves for the Norddeutschen Rundfunk the exclusive right to establish and operate transmission facilities for radio and television.

In all other respects, the Act is compatible with the Basic Law to the extent that it refers to s. 3.1 of the Interstate Treaty.

E.

I.

By way of the founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH, the Federation violated Article 30 in conjunction with Articles 83 et seq. of the Basic Law. In accordance with the development of German law, broadcasting is a public function. When the State exercises this function in some form, it becomes a "State function" whose fulfilment under Article 30 of the Basic Law is a matter for the states, insofar as the Basic Law has not prescribed or permitted otherwise. The Basic Law has not prescribed or permitted otherwise in favour of the Federation with regard to the broadcasting of programs (but see infra 5).

1. a) It may be left aside whether the provision of Article 30 of the Basic Law, which is fundamental for the federal structure of our constitutional order, covers every State activity whatsoever. In any case, falling under this competence-establishing norm is that activity by the State serving the fulfilment of public functions, regardless of whether the means of public law or private law are resorted to. Any other interpretation would, particularly in view of the growing scope of non-intervening public administration, not do justice to the meaning of Article 30 of the Basic Law. It would also conflict with the historical background of this provision (cf JÖR 1 (1951) p. 295 et seq.; the comments by Representative Dr. Laforet, Parl.Rat., Ausschuß für Zuständigkeitsabgrenzung, Wortprotokoll über die 5. Sitzung am 29. September 1948, pp. 124, 127 seq., 135, and the remarks by Representative Dr. Hoch, id. at pp. 129, 138, 145; cf. also Parl.Rat. Verhandlungen des Hauptausschusses, 48. Sitzung am 9. Februar 1949, p. 626).

b) The broadcasting of programs has since 1926 traditionally belonged in Germany to the functions of public administration. Decisive for the inclusion of broadcasting in the area of public administration was the fact that "broadcasting was and is a means of publication and a carrier of news and information of the first order" and that it "operated in the political sector" (cf. Hans Schneider, Expert Opinion, p. 8). The fact that some of the presentations of broadcasting may have been termed "free personal activity" that do not exhibit "any internal relationship to public functions" (cf. Scheuner, Expert Opinion, p. 21) has since then only played a minor role in the legal relations between the State and broadcasting. Ever since the origins of broadcasting, dissemination of news in the broadest sense (cf. Hans Schneider, supra) prompted, and was used to justify, the inclusion of the broadcasting of programs in the sphere of public functions.

This is not contradicted by the fact that under the Weimar Constitution, programs were broadcast by companies organized under private law. Controlling in this regard was not the view that the broadcasting of programs was a matter of private commercial activity but rather, inter alia, the fact that the Reich postal services lacked as a result of inflation the resources to undertake this function itself (cf. Bredow, supra, pp. 12, 19; Bausch, supra, p. 19). However, the Reich postal services made an effort to obtain voting majorities in the organs of the broadcasting companies while forgoing financial investments. In 1926 it succeeded in achieving this objective (cf. Bredow, supra, pp. 29 seq.; Pohle, supra, pp. 39 seq., 48 seq.; Bausch, supra, pp. 31 et seq., 58). By way of the reform in 1932, private capital was completely expelled; all shares in the Reich broadcasting corporation and in the regional programming companies that were still privately owned were transferred to the Reich and the states (cf. Pohle, supra, pp. 124 et seq.; Bausch, supra, pp. 90 et seq.).

It is irrelevant in this context whether the responsibilities claimed by the Reich were compatible with the allocation of competences between the Reich and the states and whether the influence on broadcasting exercised by the Reich and the states (see supra D II 5) was compatible with the right of freedom of expression and the prohibition of censorship (Article 118 of the Weimar Constitution). Of sole importance here is that this exercising of influence can only be understood as the result of the view that the broadcasting of programs does not belong simply in the public sector but rather in that of public functions.

The period between 1933 and 1945 must also be left out of consideration here. Following 1945, the view of broadcasting as a public function became even more deeply rooted in that institutions of public law were established as broadcasters of programs. In addition, the Federal Act of 29 November 1960 established two public institutions, and the draft of this Act provided such an institution for the second television channel. The functions fulfilled by the broadcasting institutions of public law belong to the area of public administration (BVerfGE 7, 99 [104]).

c) In summary, it can be stated that broadcasting in Germany has become a public service under public responsibility. When the State concerns itself with broadcasting in some form, it thus exercises a function of public administration.

Similar in result: Superior Administrative Court of Hamburg, Decision of 10 July 1956, III 11/56 - DVBl. 1957, 67 [68]; Ipsen, Die Rundfunkgebühr, 2 d ed. 1958, pp. 40 seq.; Krause, supra, pp. 106 et seq.; Krüger, supra, pp. 16, 78; Maunz, BayVwBl. 1957, 4 [5]; Quaritsch, JIR 8 (1957/1958) p. 339 [341 seq.]; Weber, in Der Rundfunk im politischen und geistigen Raum des Volkes, p. 67; Ridder, Kirche, Staat, Rundfunk, 1958, pp. 42 seq.; but see Superior State Court of Munich, Decision of 24 October 1957 - 6 U 1010/57 - NJW 1958, 1298 [1299 seq.]; Aspelt, Festschrift für Nawiasky, 1956, p. 375 [381]; Peters, supra, p. 33.

Thus, in contrast to the view of the Federal Government, the broadcasting of programs as a function of public administration is covered by the delineation of competences between the Federation and the states (Article 30 of the Basic Law), even in those cases in which the State, as here, has resorted to forms of private law.

2. The Federal Government has asserted that the fulfilment of functions of public administration with the means of private law is only covered by Article 30 of the Basic Law when this involves the implementation of laws. Because the founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH is allegedly not implementation of law, Article 30 of the Basic Law does not come into play.

However, Article 30 of the Basic Law applies both to the fulfilment of public functions pursuant to law and to that outside the law. This result is compelled by the relationship of Article 30 of the Basic Law to Section VIII of the Basic Law (Articles 83-91 of the Basic Law) and by the fact that this Section has to do with federal administration in that the latter is administration outside the law.

Articles 83 to 86 Basic Law deal with the implementation of federal laws on account of the separation of competence peculiar to German federalist law to enact and implement federal laws. The contrasting of the "implementation of federal laws" and the "federal administration" in the heading to Section VIII would, however, be incomprehensible if the following articles were merely to cover administration pursuant to law. The areas of federal administration listed in Articles 87 to 90 Basic Law and particularly in Article 87.1 of the Basic Law are to a great extent administered outside the law. That applies to the Foreign Services, the Federal Railways and the Bundespost as well as to the administration of the federal highways, federal roadways and federal waterways. Articles 87.1, 89 and 90 of the Basic Law are not limited to according the Federation, in addition to the competence to implement laws, the power to maintain federal administrative structures (cf., in particular, Article 89.2 sentence 2 and Article 87b.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, in which the functions of federal administration are detailed). Articles 83 et seq. of the Basic Law thus also regulate federal administration not dealing with the implementation of laws see Laforet, DÖV 1949, 221 et seq.; Nawiasky, Die Grundgedanken des Grundgesetzes, 1950, p. 122; Peters, Festschrift für Erich Kaufmann, 1950, p. 281 [290]; Hans Schneider, Expert Opinion, pp. 18 seq., 36; but see Köttgen, JÖR 3 [1954], p. 67 [73, 78, 80].

But if Section VIII of the Basic Law also deals with federal administration outside of the law, then this means - as was not misinterpreted by the Federal Government - that the principle underlying Article 30 of the Basic Law also applies to this administration. The founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH is thus to be evaluated under Article 30 of the Basic Law, even though it was not undertaken in implementation of a law.

3. The Federal Government asserts that the principle behind Article 30 of the Basic Law - basic jurisdiction of the states - is only restated in Section VIII of the Basic Law in Article 83 of the Basic Law and in that provision, only for administration in implemetation of law; this is said to justify the conclusion that the priority of the states (Article 30 of the Basic Law) does not apply to administration outside the law. Section VIII of the Basic Law is alleged to have generally prescribed "otherwise" within the meaning of Article 30 of the Basic Law for this administration.

However, one must look not only at Article 83 of the Basic Law is evaluating the relationship between Section VIII of the Basic Law and Article 30 of the Basic Law. This Section does not merely regulate federal administration in implementation of law but rather also, as explained, that outside the law. For the latter as well, this Section has prescribed "otherwise" within the meaning of Article 30 of the Basic Law. Section VIII thus does not in general prescribe "otherwise" with regard to administration outside the law in such a way that it is exempted from the priority of the states set down in Article 30 of the Basic Law.

4. a) The words "postal and telecommunications system" in Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law and "Bundespost" in Article 87.1 of the Basic Law describe the same area (see supra D II 3 c). Under Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law, the Federation may regulate the establishment and technical operation of broadcasting transmission facilities (see supra D II 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8). Similarly, under Article 87.1 of the Basic Law, the Bundespost may also itself establish and operate such facilities. Thus, the Federation has not violated Article 30 in conjunction with Articles 83 seq. of the Basic Law by way of the construction of postal-owned transmitters designed to serve the broadcasting of a second television channel (see supra A III 1).

b) The broadcasting of programs, on the other hand, does not belong to the "postal and telecommunications system" within the meaning of Article 73 no. 7 of the Basic Law (see supra D II). Although Article 87.1 of the Basic Law provides that the "Bundespost" is to be managed as federal administration, the Basic Law has not prescribed "otherwise" within the meaning of Article 30 of the Basic Law. The founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH is therefore not covered by Article 87.1 of the Basic Law either directly or by virtue of the contextual interrelationship (cf. supra D II 6).

c) The competence to regulate the postal and telecommunications system does not cover the authority to set down by statute the guiding principles prescribed or permitted by Article 5 of the Basic Law from a substantive or organizational standpoint for the broadcasting and broadcasters of programs (see supra D II, in particular, 3, 5, 6; D III). This means that the Federation may not makes awards under s. 2 FAG and contracts regarding the use of federally owned broadcasting facilities dependent on "terms" going beyond the area of transmission related affairs.

In contrast to the view of the Federal Government, farther-reaching administrative competences are also not available to the Federation on account of Article 1.3 of the Basic Law. This provision is just as unable to be considered a competence-establishing norm as Article 5 Basic Law. Pursuant to their responsibilities as delineated by the Basic Law, the Federation and the states are called upon to safeguard basic rights. The states are responsible for ensuring "freedom of broadcasting". In this regard, the Federation's possibilities for action are limited to those granted to it by the Basic Law for the event that a state fails to observe the Basic Law.

d) Legislative and administrative competence for the broadcasting of programs thus rests with the states. The transmission facilities needed for broadcasting programming are subject to the Federation's legislative competence (but see supra D II 6, 7). Under Article 87.1 of the Basic Law, the Federation is also endowed with corresponding administrative powers and is particularly responsible for the allocation of frequencies to the transmitters; however, it may only undertake this allocation and the conclusion of contracts regarding the use of federally owned transmission facilities from transmission related aspects. With respect to the cooperation between the Federation and the states required for this, the principle of action for the benefit of the Federation must be controlling. This also applies to the area of so-called "cable technology".

It would not be compatible with the principle of action for the benefit of the Federation (cf. infra II) if the Federation were to divest these companies of the frequencies they use and then, in allocating frequencies available now or in the future, not to give them appropriate consideration pursuant to the state regulations on the broadcasters of programs. The same would apply were it to rely on its radio monopoly and make use of its administrative powers in such a way as to deprive these companies of the right of control over the transmission facilities owned and operated by them.

5. The founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH is not compatible with Article 30 and Articles 83 et seq. Basic Law simply because the Basic Law prescribes or permits in Article 87.1 of the Basic Law federal administrative competences for foreign affairs and pan-German issues.

It may remain unresolved to what extent the Federation is entitled to administrative competences under this aspect with regard to the broadcasting of programs. These would not extend any further than the legislative powers (see supra D III 2). They could at best justify the creation of institutions to transmit programs solely or predominantly intended for broadcast abroad or for Germans resident in German territories outside the Federal Republic of Germany. The fact that the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH is not solely or predominantly to serve such purposes requires no explanation.

6. a) Finally, the founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH can also not be justified from the standpoint of Article 30 and Articles 83 et seq. of the Basic Law with the argument that the broadcasting of programs is a "supra-regional" function or that the Basic Law has permitted the broadcasting by the Federation of such programs that are to serve national representation within the country. In accordance with the nature of the matter, the Federation has no administrative or legislative competences in this area.

b) Competence in accordance with the nature of the matter is established under the "unwritten principle, which is established by the essence of things and thus not in need of express recognition by the Reich Constitution, that certain areas can be regulated by the Reich and only by the Reich because they represent by their nature matters peculiar to the Reich and a priori removed of specific legislative competence" (Anschütz, HdbDStR I, 367; see BVerfGE 11, 89 [98 seq.], BVerfGE 11, 6 [17]). These prerequisites for the recognition of natural federal competence continue to apply today. Conclusions from the nature of the matter must conform to this term and compel a certain solution that excludes a solution appropriate to other possibilities (BVerfGE 11, 89 [99]).

This is not the case here.

c) Frequencies do not respect state boundaries. To this extent, the broadcasting of programs displays effects that may be termed "supra-regional". This physical "supra-regionalness" is, however, not capable of establishing natural federal responsibility.

The broadcasting of programs, particularly television programs, requires substantial financial investment. For this reason, the first television channel is, as currently broadcast, predominantly a cooperative channel, to which all broadcasting companies contribute. The high costs required for producing full television programming would exceed the financial possibilities of individual companies. One may therefore speak of a financially conditioned "supra-regionalness" in the broadcasting of television programs. However, the exceeding of regional financial resources cannot justify the assumption that in accordance with the nature of the matter, the Federation has responsibility (cf Köttgen, Die Kulturpflege und der Bund, in: Staats- und Verwaltungswissenschaftliche Beiträge, 1957 p. 183 [191]).

It is also not possible to derive natural federal jurisdiction from the fact that a function (e.g, the broadcasting of television programming) is not performed by each state (the particular broadcasting company) separately but rather by the states (the broadcasting companies) jointly or pursuant to specific agreement. The fact that the joint or coordinated fulfilment of a function by the states (the broadcasting companies) is, regardless of what the motives might be for cooperative work, in and of itself no reason that could justify natural federal jurisdiction. For a federal State, it is a decisive difference whether the states agree or whether the Federation can regulate and administer by law an affair even against the will of the states.

d) The necessity of national representation within the country, i.e. the self-depiction of the nation before the population of the Federal Republic of Germany, is just as unable to give rise to natural federal competence to broadcast programs as the requirement of safeguarding continuity of tradition.

It is certainly necessary that these matters be supported by the State. However, it is also unmistakeable that with these, functions are designated that are unable to be defined more specifically. There are many institutions and presentations of a cultural nature that are intended to serve national representation within the country. Above all, the entire educational system can be understood as the safeguarding of continuity of tradition.

With regard to the furtherance of these functions by way of broadcast programs, controlling is the delineation of the jurisdictions of the Federation and the states by the Basic Law. From the nature of the matter, the Federation would only have jurisdiction to broadcast such programs when these involved affairs of the Federation that from the outset are removed from the jurisdiction of the states and that can thus only be handled by it. This is not the case here. It does not necessarily follow from the nature of the function of "national representation within the country" and "safeguarding continuity of tradition" that the support of these by broadcast programs of the Federation is compelled (cf. BVerfGE 11, 89 [98 seq.]). This is all the more so in that the Federation's exercise of influence on the content of programs, without which their "national representative" and tradition supporting character would be difficult to achieve, would be subject to narrow boundaries by Article 5 Basic Law.

e) Article 135.4 Basic Law, which, in the event of an "overriding interest of the Federation", permits a divergence from the passage of property regulated in Article 135.1-3 of the Basic Law (cf. BVerfGE 10, 20 [36 seq.]), cannot be used to support the position of the Federal Government. Article 135.4 Basic Law contains a "special competence" that can be used by the Federation in establishing direct federal administration without its being bound by the requirements of Article 87.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (legislative competences of the Federation) (BVerfGE 10, 20 [45]). This provision is intended to enable the Federation to restore the "organical frame work of collections and libraries of national importance which have been torn apart during war times." (BVerfGE 10, 20 [47]). For instance, only on the basis of the competence granted it under Article 135.4 of the Basic Law was the Federal legislature also able to transfer to the "Prussian Cultural Holdings" Foundation (Act of 25 July 1957, BGBl. I, p. 841) the future administration of Prussian cultural holdings (BVerfGE 10, 20 [45 seq.]). Article 135.4 is a special provision. This rule would be superfluous if the Federation were endowed under other provisions of the Basic Law with the authority to assume responsibility for national representation and the maintenance of tradition.

The founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH thus falls under Article 30 Basic Law. The Basic Law has, within the meaning of this provision, neither prescribed nor permitted "otherwise" in favour of the Federation so as to enable this. Thus, the founding of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH violates Article 30 in conjunction with Articles 83 et seq. of the Basic Law.

II.

In the German Federal State, all constitutional relations between the overall State and its component parts, as well as the constitutional relations between the component parts, are dominated by the unwritten constitutional principle of the reciprocal duty on the Federation and the states to act for the benefit of the Federation (cf. Smend, Ungeschriebenes Verfassungsrecht im monarchischen Bundesstaat, Festgabe für Otto Mayer, 1916, pp. 247 et seq.). The Federal Constitutional Court has developed from this a number of specific legal duties. With regard to its deliberations on the constitutionality of the so-called horizontal equalization of financial burdens, the Court said: "The essence of the federalist principle does not merely establish rights but also duties. One of these duties is that the financially powerful states are, to a certain extent, to provide assistance to the financially weaker states" (BVerfGE 1, 117 [131]). In cases in which the law calls for cooperation between the Federation and the states, this constitutional principle may also establish a stronger duty on the participants to take part and result in the situation where an immaterial objection by one of the participants that conflicts with universal cooperation is legally irrelevant (BVerfGE 1, 299 [315 seq.]). In making decisions with regard to the granting of Christmas bonuses to public employees, the states must maintain federal allegiance and therefore pay regard to the overall financial structure of the Federation and the states (BVerfGE 3, 52 [57]). This legal barrier following from the concept of federal allegiance becomes even more apparent in the exercising of legislative powers: "If the effects of a statutory rule do not remain limited to the territory of a state, the state legislature must pay regard to the interests of the Federation and the remaining states" (BVerfGE 4, 115 [140]). The constitutional principle of the duty to act for the benefit of the Federation can also give rise to the duty on the states to respect international treaties of the Federation (BVerfGE 6, 309 [328, 361 seq.]). Finally, under certain circumstances, a state may be obligated with respect to its duty of federal allegiance to take action pursuant to municipal supervision against communities that interfere with their measures with exclusive federal competence (BVerfGE 8, 122 [138 et seq.]). Similarly, with regard to the exercise of federal competences in the area of broadcasting, fundamental significance is, as explained above (cf. supra I 4 d and D II 7 b), attributed to the principle of action for the benefit of the Federation.

It is evident from previous holdings that this principle both gives rise to additional, specific duties on the states as against the Federation that go beyond those expressly set forth in the Constitution and additional duties on the Federation as against the states and results in specific limitations on the exercise of powers provided in the Basic Law to the Federation and the states.

The instant case provides an invitation to develop further the constitutional principle of action for the benefit of the Federation in yet another direction: The procedure and style of the negotiations that become necessary under the Constitution between the Federation and its components parts or between the states also are subject to the requirement of action for the benefit of the Federation. In the Federal Republic of Germany, all states have the same constitutional status; they are States that are entitled to equal treatment in transactions with the Federation. Whenever the Federation seeks a constitutionally relevant agreement on an issue under the Constitution that interests and affects all states, this duty of action for the benefit of the Federation prohibits it from operating according to the principle of divide et impera, i.e., to work toward a division of the states, to seek an agreement only with some of them and put pressure on others to accede to it. This principle also prohibits the Federal Government from treating state governments differently in negotiations affecting all states depending on their political composition; in particular, in the politically decisive deliberations, it may not invite only representatives of the state governments with similar political convictions and exclude the state governments siding with the opposition on the federal level. In cases such as these, politicians at the federal and state level belonging to any given party initially have the right in political meetings to clarify and coordinate with one another their positions regarding the solution of the problem of interest to the Federation and the states and then to agree during negotiations between the Federation and the states on further, joint steps. The necessary negotiations between the Federation and the states, i.e. between the governments and their speakers, must also, however, conform with the above-described principles.

The protracted efforts to agree on a new regulation of the broadcasting system entered a new stage when at the start of 1958 the Federal Government proposed federal regulation. After the draft of a federal act had been repeatedly discussed during 1959 with representative of the states, the states agreed in January 1960 to set up a four-member Commission, to be composed of two Christian-Democrat and two Social-Democrat members of state governments; it was to take up the negotiations with the Federation on the part of the state governments. However, this Commission was never invited by the Federal Government to take part in the negotiations. Only one of its members, the Minister-President of the Rhineland-Palatinate belong to the Christian-Democrat Union, took part in a number of discussions - not in this capacity but rather as member of his party - between politicians and representatives of the Christian-Democrat and Christian-Socialist Union, which also included members of the Federal Government (cf. the letter of the Minister-President of the Rhineland-Palatinate to Federal Minister Dr. Schröder of 17 November 1960). Insofar as the participants in these discussions came to pertinent agreements, he took it upon himself to inform this Commission and the remaining state governments. Proposals and plans were developed and formulated during these meetings, but they were not made the subject of negotiations by the Federal Government with the state governments or with the Commission set up by them. This particularly applies to the idea, first proposed in one of these talks on 8 July 1960, to establish a corporation with limited liability, to be founded by the Federation and the states for the broadcast of a second television channel, as well as - likewise discussed in a meeting of 15 July 1960 attended solely by politicians of the Christian-Democrat and Christian-Socialist Union - to the draft of articles of incorporation, which were to be signed on 25 July 1960. The fact that the state governments headed by Social-Democrat Minister-Presidents were informed of these plans by the Minister-President of the Rhineland-Palatinate by way of letter of 16 July 1960 and invited by him to a meeting with the other Minister-Presidents to discuss these plans on 22 July 1960 did not relieve the Federal Government of its obligation to negotiate directly with all state governments on the plan proposed by it. Its failure to do so violated the duty to act for the benefit of the Federation.

However, also the way in which the states were treated by the Federal Government in the last days before the founding of the Corporation by the Federal Government is incompatible with this duty. The Federal Government knew that the Minister-Presidents of the states first received on 22 July 1960 the opportunity to discuss in their official capacity the plan to establish a corporation composed by the Federation and the states to broadcast a second television channel. The Minister-Presidents, including those belonging to the Christian-Democrat and Christian-Socialist Union, did not accept the Federal Government's proposal without reservation but rather made counter-proposals. The Federal Government was informed of the results of these meetings by way of letter of 22 July 1960. Nevertheless, the Federal Government insisted that the articles of incorporation be signed on 25 July 1960 in the form it had provided. The Federal Government's letter bears the date 23 July 1960, was posted in Bonn on 24 July 1960 at 5:00 p.m. and received by the addressee, the Minister-President of the Rhineland-Palatinate, on 25 July 1960 at 4:15 p.m., i.e., at a time when the articles of incorporation had already been signed and notarized (cf. the letter of the Minister-President of the Rhineland-Palatinate of 17 November 1960). Such a procedure is simply incompatible with the requirement of action for the benefit of the Federation - even though the Federal Government may have had reason to be annoyed at the persistent opposition of the states or several state governments. It is irrelevant here whether the Federal Government considered the negotiations with the states to have failed and whether it was able to pursue the, in its view, constitutionally permissible course of founding the Corporation without the participation of the states; rather, the point is that each state government, as the constitutional organ of a component State of the Federal Republic of Germany, was able to expect the Federal Government would not respond to the states' counter-proposals, which can be considered a new plan, with a fait accompli - and this within an unreasonably short period.

Finally, the duty to act for the benefit of the Federation is contravened by the way in which the Corporation was founded. Again, it is irrelevant whether the Federal Government was able to implement the plan to found the Corporation, which in its view was constitutionally unobjectionable. One may conceive of situations in which the Federation founds a corporation in the interest of the states, whose shareholders include, in addition to the Federation, a "trustee" for the states. However, when it is clear, as here, that the states are unwilling to participate in the corporation with limited liability as planned by the Federation, then the Federation violates the requirement of action for the benefit of the Federation when it selects a "trustee" for the states and, with his assistance, founds a corporation that the states reject.

The Federal Government's conduct climaxes in the act of foundation that called the Corporation into life. The unconstitutionality of the procedure attaches so grievously to the act of foundation because for this reason as well the situation created by it cannot become the starting point of a constitutionally permissible activity corresponding to the Corporation's charter. In this sense, the founding of the Corporation violates the constitutional requirement of action for the benefit of the Federation.

III.

It may be left aside whether and to what extent a state - with respect to the principle of action for the benefit of the Federation - also has a claim as against the Federation that the latter not disregard the mutual constitutional order in such a way as to violate the interests of the states as component States of the federal State. In any event, the substance of Article 5 Basic Law - which has yet to be described - and the constitutional guarantee of freedom of broadcasting contained therein are of such fundamental importance for the entire public, political and constitutional life in the states that they may demand that in the area of the broadcasting system, the Federation not infringe upon the freedom guaranteed by the Basic Law. This constitutional position of the component State in the federal State may be defended by the state against the Federation in a constitutional dispute pursuant to Article 93.1 no. 3 of the Basic Law and ss. 68 et seq. of the Federal Constitutional Court Act. For this reason, it may also be asserted in this dispute that by founding the Corporation, the Federation has violated Article 5 of the Basic Law.

Article 5 Basic Law contains more than just the citizen's basic individual right against the State that it respect a sphere of freedom within which he may express his opinion without restraint. In particular, by way of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law, the institutional autonomy of the press is also guaranteed, from the procurement of information to the dissemination of news and opinion (BVerfGE 10, 118 [121]). It would conflict with this constitutional guarantee if the State were either directly or indirectly to regulate or control the press or some part of it. The exercising of influence by the State would only be compatible with this constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press if this were not to alter substantially the concept of a free press on account of the competition with the wealth of newspapers and magazines independent of the State.

The significance of Article 5 of the Basic Law for broadcasting cannot be assessed without taking into account the above-described substance of Article 5. Irrespective of a special status of the broadcasting system, which shall be treated in the following, broadcasting is, as the press, one of the indispensible means of modern mass communication, by way of which influence is exercised on public opinion and helps shape this public opinion. Broadcasting is more than just a "medium" for the formation of public opinion; it is an imposing "factor" in the formation of public opinion. This participation in the formation of public opinion is by no means limited to news programs, political commentary, or series on political problems of the present, past or future; the formation of opinion takes place to the same extent in dramas, musical presentations, and broadcasts of comedy programs, up to and including the way in which a presentation is staged. Through the selection and structuring of the programs, every broadcaster's programming will exhibit a certain trend, particularly as regards the decision on what is not to be broadcast, what will not be of interest to the viewer or listener, what can be ignored without damage to the formation of public opinion, and how that which is broadcast is to be formed and spoken. It becomes clear from such a perspective that institutional freedom for broadcasting is no less important than for the press, in that broadcasting is also an indispensible means of modern mass communication and factor of public formation of opinion at least as important as the press. This is clearly expressed in Article 5 of the Basic Law, where in para. 1, sentence 2, "freedom of reporting by means of broadcasts and film" are guaranteed alongside freedom of the press.

This does not however answer the question as to the way in which this freedom of broadcasting in general and that of reporting by broadcasting in particular are to be ensured so as to satisfy Article 5 of the Basic Law. It is here that broadcasting's special status become important, through which it differs from the press. It is of course incorrect that newspaper publishers, newspaper printers and newspapers can be founded and operated in any given number. However, the difference between the press and broadcasting is that within the German press as a whole, there exist a relatively large number of independent publications that compete with one another in their direction, political bias or basic religious stance, whereas in the area of broadcasting, both technical reasons and the extremely large financial investment required for broadcasting programs means that the number of such broadcasters must remain relatively small. This special situation in the area of the broadcasting system calls for special precautions in order to realize and maintain the freedom of broadcasting guaranteed by Article 5 of the Basic Law. One of the means serving this purpose is the principle on which the existing broadcasting companies have been built: for the broadcasting of programs, the law creates a juridical person of public law that is removed from State influence or at most subject to limited State supervision; their collegial organs are de facto composed of a reasonable mix of representatives from all important political, religious and societal groups; they have the power to control the forces responsible for programming structure and to correct them in such a way as to satisfy the principles set forth in the law for the reasonable, proportional inclusion of all parties with an interest in broadcasting. It does not conflict with Article 5 of the Basic Law when an institution subject to such requirements is provided under present technical conditions with a monopoly for the broadcasting of programs on the state level; but Article 5 of the Basic Law does not imply the necessity that such a monopoly be established for an institution within the state.

In order to ensure the freedom in the area of broadcasting, Article 5 of the Basic Law does not, however, call for the form found in the state broadcasting laws and adopted for the broadcasting companies under federal law. In particular, the Federal Constitution does not require that broadcasters of programs may only be public corporations. Private companies can also be operators of broadcasts of this nature when their form of organization offers adequate assurance that all socially relevant forces have their say in a manner similar to that in public corporations and that freedom of reporting remains uninfringed. The Constitution does not prohibit such a company when, for example, the law makes available a special form of incorporation ensuring the specific purposes of broadcasting, particularly its institutional freedom, and subjects to State supervision every corporation broadcasting programs that satisfies the requirements, similar to banking or insurance supervision.

Article 5 of the Basic Law at least requires that this modern instrument for the formation of public opinion is not put at the mercy of the State or one particular social group. Broadcasters of programs must thus be organized in such a way that all conceivable groups are able to have influence in their organs and have their say in overall programming and that for the contents of overall programming, guiding principles are binding that guarantee of minimum of substantive balance, objectivity and mutual respect. This can only be ensured when this organizational and substantive principles are generally made binding by law. Article 5 of the Basic Law therefore calls for the enactment of such laws.

It may not be inferred from Article 5 of the Basic Law that broadcasters necessarily be the owners of transmission facilities or endowed with control over them and, as broadcasters, necessarily have the right to operate these facilities. Article 5 of the Basic Law also does not prevent representatives from the State from being accorded a reasonable share in the organs of the "neutralized" broadcaster. On the other hand, Article 5 of the Basic Law precludes the State from directly or indirectly dominating a public or private company that broadcasts programs.

The Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH founded by notarized contract of 25 July 1960, whose purpose is "to broadcast television programs designed to provide broadcasting recipients in all of Germany and abroad with a comprehensive picture of Germany", was originally composed of the Federal Republic of Germany and Federal Minister Schäffer as shareholders; since the resignation of the shareholder Schäffer, who had provided his capital "on behalf of the states of the Federal Republic of Germany", the sole shareholder is the Federal Republic of Germany. The Corporation is thus completely in the hands of the State. It is an instrument of the Federation and is dominated by the Federal Government and the Federal Chancellor by virtue of their constitutional competences. This determination cannot be countered by the reference to the contents of the articles of incorporation and the Corporation's charter, which only forms a component part of the articles. Even if one were to assume that the Corporation's organs, particularly the Supervisory Council and the Director, work relatively independently and that the principles for programming established in the charter presently take into account the requirements of Article 5 of the Basic Law - the institutional freedom of broadcasting, the decisive fact remains that the law and charter of the Corporation fail to offer any assurance that the present form of the Corporation will not be changed. Just as the charter was amended with the resignation of the shareholder Schäffer, it can also be further amended at any time. The "meeting of the shareholders" can adopt any amendment and can ultimately even decide to dissolve the Corporation and reorganize it with new organs (including associated personnel changes). It is an elementary difference whether the above-stipulated organizational precautions and substantive principles designed to maintain freedom of broadcasting are contained in a law or in articles of incorporation.

The founding and existence of the Deutschland-Fernsehen-GmbH therefore violate Article 5 of the Basic Law.

bb) Translation of the Sixth Broadcasting Decision - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 83, 238*

Headnotes:

1. a) Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz - GG) requires that the state guarantees the basic service to be provided by public broadcasting under a dual broadcasting system.

   b) The limits to the guarantee of the existence and future development of public broadcasting that this implies follow from the function that the latter must fulfil in connection with the process of communication protected under Article 5.1 of the Basic Law.

   c) The guarantee of the existence and future development of public broadcasting also extends to new services using new technology that may in the future assume the functions of conventional broadcasting.

2. a) Under a dual broadcasting system, the legislature is not constitutionally bound to maintain strict separation of public and private broadcasters. No obligation to adhere to a "consistent model" can be inferred from the Basic Law.

   b) To the extent that the legislature opens the way to the possibility of a cooperative broadcasting undertaking or other form of joint responsibility for programming, it must ensure that the ability of public broadcasting to fulfil its mandate to provide basic service remains undiminished. This presupposes in particular that programming content can be identified and attributed to the responsible source.

   c) The legislature itself must make the decision as regards the choice of a broadcasting model. It may not leave this decision to broadcasters. This is where the legally permissible possibilities for cooperation between public and private broadcasters find their limits.

   d) The publication of printed matter with content that is primarily related to programming is covered by broadcasting freedom if such publication activities can be attributed to the sphere of activity of broadcasting as a marginal flanking activity.

3. a) Under a dual broadcasting system, the Basic Law permits, but does not require, lower standards for private broadcasting than for public broadcasting in terms of the breadth of programming and the guarantee of balanced diversity.

   b) Diversity of opinion is an objective criterion for selecting private broadcasters for approval. In this context, the legislature was within its rights to take into account the involvement of editorial employees in the selection of and responsibility for programming (s. 7.2 sentence 3 of the Broadcasting Act for the Land of North Rhine-Westphalia (Rundfunkgesetz für das Land Nordrhein-Westfalen - LRG NW)).

   c) The legislature must provide adequate criteria for the allocation of transmission capacity between public and private broadcasting.

4. a) There can be no objection on constitutional grounds to the goals underlying the North Rhine-Westphalian "two-column model" for local broadcasting. The model is in principle suitable for ensuring broadcasting freedom at the local level.

   b) When the internal organization of private broadcasting is pluralistic in nature, the legislature must determine which social forces and groups may become involved in broadcasting. There can be no objection on constitutional grounds to a statutory catalogue of socially relevant groups as long as the selection is objective in the sense of guaranteeing balanced diversity.

   c) The involvement of municipalities in the cooperative broadcasting undertaking and the operational entity responsible for local broadcasting in North Rhine-Westphalia is not in violation of the freedom of broadcasting from governmental control.

5. a) The supervisory bodies that oversee broadcasting are not intended to represent organized interests or opinions, but to ensure diversity of opinion in the area of broadcasting.

   b) The legislature has considerable operating latitude as regards the composition of these supervisory bodies. Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law requires only that the composition of the supervisory bodies be suitable for maintaining broadcasting freedom.

Judgment of the First Senate of 5 February 1991 based on the oral hearing of 30 October 1990 - 1 BvL 1/85 and 1/88 - ...

Facts:

The matter submitted for abstract judicial review related to provisions of the Act on "West German Broadcasting Cologne" (Gesetz über den "Westdeutscher Rundfunk Köln") (WDR-G) in the version promulgated in the year 1985 and the North Rhine-Westphalian Land Broadcasting Act (Landesrundfunkgesetz - LRG) of 1988, which regulates private broadcasting at the Land and local levels. On the one hand, the dual broadcasting system that was also introduced in North Rhine-Westphalia by this legislation ensured WDR a relatively strong competitive position; on the other hand, the requirements imposed upon private broadcasters as regards diversity and programming were similar to those imposed upon public broadcasters. With what is referred to as its "two-column model," the legislature chose a unique construct for local broadcasting that was intended to ensure the existential viability of the local press on the one hand and prevent dual journalistic monopolies over both broadcasting and the press on the other hand. This construct consists of a press-related operational entity with municipal participation on the commercial and technical end and a combined broadcasting undertaking controlled by representatives of the public and organizations for the journalistic end that may broadcast locally only under cooperation agreements. The composition of the Broadcasting Board (Rundfunkrat) of WDR was fundamentally changed; in particular, the number of representatives of groups from society at large was increased at the expense of representatives of governmental institutions. In addition, representatives of the areas of culture and social affairs were seated on the Broadcasting Board with voting rights. The same model was adopted for the composition of the Broadcasting Commission (Rundfunkkommission) of the Land Authority for Broadcasting (Landesanstalt für Rundfunk - LfR), the umbrella institution for private broadcasting in North Rhine-Westphalia.

The Federal Constitutional Court ruled that the challenged laws were essentially compatible with the Basic Law.

Extract from the Grounds:

B.

The challenged provisions of the Act on "West German Broadcasting Cologne" and the Land Broadcasting Act are essentially compatible with the Basic Law, albeit only a few of them if construed in conformity with the Basic Law. Only s. 3.1 of the Land Broadcasting Act is in violation of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

I.

As the Federal Constitutional Court has elaborated in its established case law, broadcasting freedom under Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law is an instrumental freedom. It serves to permit free formation of personal and public opinion, and to be sure in a comprehensive sense that is not restricted to mere reporting or mediation of political opinions. Free formation of opinion takes place through a process of communication. It presupposes freedom to express and disseminate opinions on the one hand and freedom to take cognizance of opinions and acquire information on the other hand. By guaranteeing the freedoms to express opinions, disseminate opinions and acquire information as fundamental rights, Article 5.1 of the Basic Law at the same time seeks to afford this process of communication constitutional protection (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [319-320]). Broadcasting is a "medium and a factor" in the process through which the formation of opinion takes place, which process enjoys constitutional protection (see BVerfGE 12, 205 [260]). In view of its salient importance for communication, free formation of opinion is possible only to the extent that broadcasting itself is also free to provide comprehensive and truthful information. Given the state of modern forms of mass communication, protection of the mediatory function of broadcasting as a fundamental right is therefore an indispensable prerequisite for achievement of the legislative objective of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law.

An understanding of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law that is limited to prevention of governmental influence and otherwise leaves broadcasting to the forces of society would not do justice to the instrumental character of broadcasting freedom. The fundamental right to broadcasting freedom does to be sure also, and primarily, provide protection against the state. In addition, however, express regulation is required to ensure that broadcasting, like the state, is not delivered into the hands of individual groups within society, but rather takes up on and propagates the variety of issues and opinions that play a role in society as a whole. To this end, material, organizational and procedural regulation is necessary that is aligned with the function of broadcasting freedom and suitable for achieving what Article 5.1 of the Basic Law as a whole is intended to guarantee (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [320]). The decision as to the form this regulation takes in detail is the affair of the legislature. The Basic Law neither prescribes a specific model nor does it compel consistent implementation of a model that is chosen. Indeed, as far as the Basic Law is concerned, only the guarantee of free and comprehensive reporting is what counts.

If the legislature decides in favour of a dual broadcasting system in which both public and private providers co-exist, it must as a result ensure that the balanced diversity in reporting required by the Basic Law is in the end achieved by the overall offering of all providers. Under a dual system, the Basic Law also does not allow for releasing private broadcasters from this requirement due to the fact that the public broadcasters are obliged to provide balanced coverage. For, in view of the balanced coverage required of public broadcasters, any restriction or one-sidedness on the part of the private sector would result in a lack of balance in the overall offering and thereby defeat the purpose of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [324]).

The legislature may not, however, make approval of private broadcasting, to which there can be no objection on constitutional grounds, contingent upon conditions that would significantly inhibit, if not preclude, private broadcasting (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [157]). In this context, the legislature may also take into account the implications as regards programming selection that result from the fact that private broadcasting is financed by advertising and make it difficult for private broadcasters to comply with the requirements of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to the same extent as the public broadcasters, which are financed primarily through fees. a) This difference justifies application of standards for private broadcasting that are not as high as those for public broadcasting in terms of breadth of programming and the guarantee of balanced diversity. Concessions of this nature are, however, acceptable and constitute no lasting threat to the purpose of the provision contained in Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law only as long as and insofar as it is effectively ensured that the public is provided with the requisite basic service by public broadcasting without any compromises (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [157 et seq.]).

In this context, the term "basic service" stands neither for the minimum service which public broadcasting is obligated to provide or could be obligated to provide without implications for the requirements to be met by private broadcasters, nor does it draw a line between or divide responsibilities between public and private broadcasters, for example, to the effect that the former are responsible for informational and educational programming content and the latter for entertainment offerings. In fact, it is necessary to ensure that public broadcasters offer programs for the entire public that provide comprehensive information covering the full spectrum of responsibility of conventional broadcasting and that this program offering provides diversity of opinion in a manner consistent with the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 74, 297 [325-326]).

If the legislature decides in favour of a dual broadcasting system, it must therefore in view of the still limited reach, variety of programming and scope of private broadcasting ensure that the public is provided with basic service by guaranteeing the availability of the necessary technical, organizational, personnel and financial conditions for public broadcasting (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [158]). It would be incompatible with this duty to restrict public broadcasting to its current level of development in terms of programming, funding and technology. Indeed, given present conditions, the duty to provide basic service under a dual system can be fulfilled if not only the existence of public broadcasting in its present state is secured, but also its future development (BVerfGE 74, 297 [350-351]).

II.

The provisions of the West German Broadcasting Act on the guarantee of the existence and future development of WDR (s. 3.3 and 3.7 to 3.9 in conjunction with s. 33.2 and s. 47 of the West German Broadcasting Act) are compatible with the Basic Law. If construed restrictively, s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act is also compatible with the Basic Law.

1. a) There can be no reservations on constitutional grounds to the required narrow interpretation of the general clause contained in s. 3.3 sentence 1 of the West German Broadcasting Act.

   The question as to whether the legislative power to regulate broadcasting freedom also includes the right to allow WDR to engage in economic activities of all kinds can remain open. For the law does not provide for any such authority. Indeed, the provision forms the statutory basis for a general guarantee of the existence and future development of WDR that is given substance and concretely described in other provisions of the Act. There can be no reservations on constitutional grounds to such a guarantee as has in the meantime also been proclaimed in the preamble to the interstate agreement on the reform of broadcasting (Interstate Broadcasting Agreement [Rundfunkstaatsvertrag]) of 1/3 April 1987. To the contrary, it is constitutionally required under the dual broadcasting system as long as private providers do not completely assume responsibility for conventional broadcasting that is grounded in Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [155 et seq.]). Under this condition, which the petitioners also do not dispute, public broadcasters are charged with providing the public with basic service, which is to be understood to mean comprehensive service. The guarantee of the existence and future development of public broadcastings means nothing other than ensuring those conditions that make it possible to provide the public with basic service.

   In view of the rapid progress being made in the area of broadcasting, in particular in the area of technology, a guarantee based on the status quo would not suffice to ensure fulfilment of the responsibility to provide basic service. The guarantee can therefore not be limited to the conventional technology involved in terrestrial transmission. If other forms of transmission appear or replace terrestrial transmission, the use of such new forms of transmission will also be covered by the guarantee of basic service. The same applies to the programming offered by public broadcasters, which must remain open to new interests on the part of the public or new formats and content. The term "basic service" is open and dynamic as regards content and time and relates exclusively to the function that broadcasting is intended to fulfil in connection with the process of communication protected by Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. The limits to the guarantee of the existence and future development as regards the provision of basic service therefore follow exclusively from the function of broadcasting. In any case insofar as the statutory guarantee of the existence and future development of public broadcasting is based on its responsibility within the dual system, it is grounded in the Basic Law.

The regulation under challenge operates within this framework. The general clause contained in s. 3.3 sentence 1 of the West German Broadcasting Act stipulates that the possible activities of WDR mentioned therein are allowed only "in the exercise of its responsibilities." They are therefore prerequisite to and limit the guarantee of the existence and future development.

The responsibilities that WDR must fulfil are also defined in the Act with sufficient clarity and precision. The definition of responsibilities contained in s. 3.3 of the West German Broadcasting Act refers initially to s. 3.1 of the West German Broadcasting Act. That provision charges WDR with responsibility for broadcasting within the meaning of the conventional formal definition of broadcasting under legislation governing fees. However, this responsibility is then provided with substantive content in s. 4 and ss. 5.4 and 5.5 of the West German Broadcasting Act. s. 4.1 sentence 1 of the West German Broadcasting Act provides the decisive standard here. It contains those normative prescriptions that summarize and define the responsibility for programming and which WDR must therefore respect when taking any measure or making any decision.

Accordingly, WDR produces and transmits broadcasts as both a medium and a factor in the process of free formation of opinion and in the interest of the general public. With this formulation, which is borrowed from the case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, the legislature has emphasized the special conditions that apply to broadcasting freedom as a freedom that serves to form opinion. As a result, it is made clear at the legislative level that the exercise of broadcasting freedom must always serve to guarantee free and comprehensive formation of opinion. It assumes a position of responsibility toward the general public. This leaves room for a public provider's own interests, including such as serve to secure the existence and future development of the provider, only if such interests seem to be committed in trust for the benefit of the general public and can for that reason be justified.

The duty to serve the interests of the general public is also expressed in the provision contained in s. 4.1 sentence 2 of the West German Broadcasting Act that assigns responsibility for fulfilment of the guarantee to the significant political, intellectual social forces and groups in the transmission area. At the same time, however, it also ensures that the actual exercise of responsibility for broadcasting remains in the hands of the broadcaster and is not transferred to the relevant forces and groups within society. In fact, the purpose of oversight by society is precisely the opposite, i.e., to empower independent broadcasting to discharge its duties responsibly in the interest of free formation of opinion.

This duty is defined more concretely in s. 4.2 of the West German Broadcasting Act. The responsibility of WDR for providing informational content is emphasized in this context: its broadcasts must provide a comprehensive overview of international and national affairs in all significant areas of life. Programming is, however, not limited to this, but must in addition to information also provide education and entertainment. It must offer programs devoted to culture, art and useful advice. Finally, WDR must pursuant to s. 4.3 of the West German Broadcasting Act take into account the regional structure and cultural diversity of the transmission area. Withdrawal from certain programming areas by WDR or neglect or preferential treatment of specific areas, for example, with an eye to increasing revenues or competition with private broadcasters, would therefore be incompatible with this provision.

This broadly defined responsibility for programming is expanded to include diversity of content and opinion by s. 5.4 and s. 5.5 of the West German Broadcasting Act. These formulations on the other hand, which are based on pronouncements of the Federal Constitutional Court, are intended to ensure that broadcasting does not distort the process of formation of opinion through programming that is one-sided or neglects the interests of minorities.

Taken as a whole, the provisions of ss. 4 and 5.4 and 5.5 of the West German Broadcasting Act reflect the requirements that public broadcasting must satisfy under the Basic Law as regards basic service within the context of a dual system. These provisions establish the functional obligations imposed upon WDR in connection with the exercise of its powers under s. 3.3 of the West German Broadcasting Act. The guarantee of the existence and future development contained in s. 3.3 of the West German Broadcasting Act is thus coupled with and legitimized and limited by the responsibility for providing basic service. This counteracts the danger that, the petitioners assert, WDR could on the basis of s. 3.3 of the West German Broadcasting Act evolve into a large, quasi-private corporation that would basically pursue exclusively economic goals, thereby undermining the dual broadcasting system.

b) There can also be no reservations on constitutional grounds as regards s. 3.3 sentence 2 of the West German Broadcasting Act, which stipulates in particular that WDR may offer new services using new technology.

2. The possibilities for cooperation with third parties that the legislature has afforded WDR in s. 3.8 in conjunction with s. 47 and s. 3.9 together with s. 47 of the West German Broadcasting Act and in s. 6.2 of the Broadcasting Act are also compatible with the Basic Law.

c) There can be no reservations on constitutional grounds as regards the required restrictive construction of the provision contained in s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act. Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also does not prevent the legislature from making provision for mixed forms that combine public and private broadcasting. The legislature's regulatory powers are not restricted to choosing between different broadcasting models. It may in fact also combine them or include individual elements of one model in another as long as it respects the requirements of the freedom of formation of opinion.

It is not possible to infer otherwise from the Fifth Broadcasting Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfGE 74, 297). Cooperation such as that permitted by s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act was not at issue in that decision. To the contrary, the Federal Constitutional Court affirmed that the Baden-Württemberg legislature could pursue a policy based on essential separation of public and private broadcasting and was therefore not required by the Basic Law to make provision for extensive possibilities for cooperation between the two sectors within the dual system (see BVerfGE 74, 297 [349]).

It is not, however, possible to draw the opposite conclusion to the effect that cooperation between the two sectors is unconstitutional. In fact, the legislature also enjoys operating latitude in this regard.

WDR's interest in private cooperative broadcasting undertakings does not deliver broadcasting into the hands of the state since WDR itself must be organizationally independent of the state and also does not relinquish this form of organization through involvement in a cooperative broadcasting undertaking. The one-sided influence of a specific segment of society is also not to be feared from this involvement since WDR's internal structure is pluralistic and it also cannot discard this structure through involvement in a cooperative undertaking.

The possibility of involvement in cooperative undertakings allowed by s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act also does not subject private broadcasting to conditions that make its situation significantly more difficult or its existence impossible. The creation of a cooperative broadcasting undertaking consisting of public and private members requires voluntary agreement by both sides. There is no legal compulsion to enter into such an agreement. Nor is it possible to discern any factual circumstances that would constitute such compulsion. In particular, commencement of transmission by a private cooperative broadcasting undertaking is not dependent upon the involvement of public broadcasting. Indeed, private broadcasters whose cooperative undertaking WDR may become involved in must also be economically and organizationally in a position to be able to provide broadcasting that meets accepted journalistic standards without WDR (s. 5.1 of the Land Broadcasting Act). There was obviously never any thought of private broadcasters that can meet the conditions for approval only by partnering with a public broadcaster.

S. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act assigns WDR a minority role in ongoing collaboration. This further reinforces the provision contained in s. 6.1 sentence 2 of the Land Broadcasting Act, which prohibits dominant influence of any one party over programming. The general rule of s. 47.2 of the West German Broadcasting Act, which obligates WDR to secure the necessary influence over management in the case of interests in other enterprises, is superseded in the case of private cooperative broadcasting undertakings by the special provision contained in s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act. In view of these safeguards, any possible advantage that WDR does in fact retain will not be such that it can stifle private broadcasting.

The legislature adequately counteracted the danger that WDR could escape its obligation to provide the public with basic service through cooperation with private broadcasting undertakings in s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act through reference to the applicable provisions of law that apply to WDR. However, compliance of public broadcasting with its statutory obligations can be ensured and verified only if the programming of the two sectors is kept separate such that programming can be attributed to one of the two broadcasters. Such separation is therefore required on constitutional grounds, precisely as in the case of s. 3.9 of the West German Broadcasting Act, when use is made of the possibility provided for in s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act.

The possibility afforded by s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act does not, however, go so far as to allow public broadcasters and private cooperative broadcasting undertakings to agree to a transition from a dual model to a cooperative model that would make it possible to distinguish between the two but would involve broadcasting exclusively in the form of joint programming. The decision as to the choice of broadcasting model represents a matter that is of fundamental importance as regards the exercise of fundamental rights that the legislature may not relinquish and leave to an agreement among broadcasters (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [324]).

This is where the possibility for cooperation under s. 6.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act finds its limits.

III.

The requirements that the Land Broadcasting Act lays down for the approval and operation of private broadcasting undertakings in its ss. 11 and 12.3 as well as in s. 7.2 sentence 3 are compatible with the Basic Law. On the other hand, regulation of assignment of frequencies pursuant to s. 3 of the Land Broadcasting Act is in violation of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

1. There can be no objection on constitutional grounds to the programming requirements for private broadcasting in ss. 11 and 12.3 of the Land Broadcasting Act. The right to broadcasting freedom granted under Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law does not entitle holders of that right to make use of it as they see fit. As an instrumental freedom, the right is guaranteed not primarily in the interest of broadcasting, but rather in the interest of free formation of opinion by individuals and the public. The legislature therefore has a duty to structure the broadcasting system in such a manner as to achieve this end. As regards the legal aspect of programming, it follows from this that both diversity of content and diversity of opinion must be appropriately reflected in overall programming. This requirement to be met by overall programming applies independently of whether the legislature decides in favour of a public or a private broadcasting system.

It is also not possible to infer otherwise from the "consistent model" principle invoked by the petitioners. The Basic Law prescribes no models for the broadcasting system, but only a purpose: freedom of broadcasting. The broadcasting system must be able to fulfil its responsibility to serve free formation of opinion by individuals and the public. This responsibility exists independent of any model. Any organizational form that takes this into account is compatible with the Basic Law. The operating latitude of the legislature is not limited to the choice of a model and subsequent commitment to a consistent model. The legislature may in fact choose any combination of models as long as it does not lose sight of the purpose of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law. Accordingly, the Federal Constitutional Court left no doubt but that pluralistic internal structures may also be prescribed for private broadcasters (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [325]; 73, 118 [171]).

The purpose may, however, be achieved in different ways under the various systems. Under a dual broadcasting system in which public and private broadcasters compete with one another, it would appear constitutionally permissible not to impose standards as regards the breadth of programming and the guarantee of balanced diversity upon private broadcasting that are as high as those imposed for public broadcasting as long as and to the extent it is effectively ensured that the responsibility for broadcasting is in any case fulfilled by the latter without any compromises. Even then, a lack of balance may be accepted only if not serious (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [158-159]).

These principles do not, however, make it possible to conclude that the legislature must lower the requirements imposed upon private broadcasters in terms of diversity of content and opinion. In particular, it is not possible to infer from the Lower Saxony judgment that private broadcasters may be held only to a "basic standard" in terms of balanced diversity. Indeed, according to that judgment, such a basic standard suffices only for the purposes of ongoing oversight of private broadcasters, but not for initial approval (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [158-159]).

In fact, in view of the requirement of balanced diversity that applies to the public broadcasting sector without restriction, relaxation of the standard on the side of private broadcasters may result in distortion of the balance of programming as a whole, which given the legislative goal of Article 5.1 of the Basic Law would seem to be acceptable only within narrow limits. The constitutional grounds for this, but also the limits, are found in the principle to the effect that the legislature may not impose requirements on the private broadcasting sector that would make operation significantly more difficult, if not impossible (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [157]). The legislature has the freedom to establish programming requirements for private broadcasters as long it does not exceed these limits.

It cannot be ascertained that the North Rhine-Westphalian legislature has exceeded these limits. The programming requirements that the legislature imposes upon private broadcasters are to be sure more stringent that those of other German Länder, but not as stringent as those imposed upon WDR. In both s. 4 of the West German Broadcasting Act as well as in s. 11 of the Land Broadcasting Act, the legislature proceeds from the assumption that, regardless of its legal form and the nature of the providers, broadcasting is both a medium and a factor in the process of free formation of opinion and the affair of the general public (s. 4.1 sentence 1 of the West German Broadcasting Act and s. 11 sentence 1 of the Land Broadcasting Act). For WDR, this entails a responsibility to provide a comprehensive overview of international and national events in all areas of life, to inform, educate and entertain with its content and to offer programs devoted to culture, art and useful advice (s. 4.2 of the West German Broadcasting Act). Private cooperative broadcasting undertakings, on the other hand, must contribute to the availability of comprehensive information and free formation of opinion by individuals and the public, serve to educate, advise and entertain and fulfil the responsibility of broadcasting in the area of culture only within the context of the respective programming category (s. 11 sentence 2 of the Land Broadcasting Act). In addition, WDR must also take into account the regional disparity and cultural diversity of the transmission area whereas private broadcasters are only obliged to present public affairs in North Rhine-Westphalia in the case of all full-service stations (s. 4.3 of the West German Broadcasting Act, s. 11 sentence 3 of the Land Broadcasting Act).

The same applies as regards the programming principles of s. 5 of the West German Broadcasting Act and s. 12 of the Land Broadcasting Act. Whereas WDR must reflect the diversity of prevailing opinion and intellectual, scientific and artistic trends with the greatest possible breadth and completeness, the corresponding obligation of private full-service stations is limited to ensuring diversity of opinion (s. 5.4 of the West German Broadcasting Act and s. 12.3 of the Land Broadcasting Act). WDR must ensure that the significant forces of society in the transmission area are heard; the Land Broadcasting Act expands this to include significant political, intellectual and social forces and groups (s. 5.4 no. 2 of the West German Broadcasting Act, s. 12.3 sentence 2 of the Land Broadcasting Act). Both types of broadcasters must devote appropriate time to the treatment of controversial issues of general importance (s. 5.4 sentence 2 WDR-G, s. 12.3 sentence 3 of the Land Broadcasting Act).

It cannot be ascertained that this imposes conditions on private broadcasters that make it significantly more difficult or even impossible for them to produce and disseminate broadcasts. Compliance with the requirements of ss. 11 and 12.3 of the Land Broadcasting Act does to be sure require that they to some extent forgo programs with mass appeal. Since advertising revenues are dependent upon audience ratings, it is not possible to exclude the possibility that this will reduce their earnings. The restrictions do not, however, go so far as to threaten to make private broadcasting totally unprofitable. The law allows broadcasters considerable freedom as regards the decision as to how to comply with program requirements. It prescribes neither a programming plan nor a breakdown of programming. In fact, broadcasters are free to allocate time to and schedule programs with mass appeal and other programs as they see fit. The law therefore only compels operators of full-service stations to forgo programming that consists entirely of entertainment or one-sided informational and educational programs. It is, however, up to them to calculate prices and costs so that the undertaking is still financially viable.

2. The provision regulating approval contained in s. 7.2 sentence 3 half-sentence 2 of the Land Broadcasting Act is not in violation of the Basic Law. The legislature had the right to choose from among several applicants on the basis of various criteria, including the degree of editorial involvement ("internal broadcasting freedom").

S. 7 of the Land Broadcasting Act contains the provision that governs the standards the Land Authority for Broadcasting must apply when making decisions as to approval in cases in which the number of applicants satisfying the conditions for approval exceeds available transmission capacity. According to constitutional case law, such decisions fall into the area of express regulation of broadcasting, for which the legislature is itself responsible. According to the principles elaborated in the Third Broadcasting Judgment, access to private broadcasting may neither be left to chance or free interaction of the forces at play nor entrusted to the unfettered discretion of the executive. It is possible to take into account the principle of equality through a system that permits allocation of broadcasting time and, if need be, proportionate reduction of such time. If that does not suffice or the legislature opts for a system under which only licenses for full-service stations are issued to individual broadcasters, the legislature must establish criteria for selection that ensure that all applicants have the same chances of success. The degree to which these chances materialize must depend upon objectively relevant criteria that can be reasonably met by the individual applicants (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [327]).

The North Rhine-Westphalian regulatory process satisfies these requirements. This results, however, not solely from the fact that the law establishes no legal obligations for private broadcasters. Applicants are to be sure subject to no legal restrictions as regards their choice of activities and may independently decide whether and how they want their editors to take part in the programming process. The provision is, however, binding upon the Land Authority for Broadcasting as regards its selection decision and is in that respect thoroughly suitable for influencing the activities of private broadcasters. It must therefore withstand measurement against the standard of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

This standard is, however, adequately respected. The selection criterion "internal broadcasting freedom," which is the only thing that the applicants consider unconstitutional, is the last in a series of gradated criteria. It is applied only when it was not possible to reach a decision at one of the previous levels. In accordance with the selection principles established by the Federal Constitutional Court, the law is intended first of all to reach an agreement among applicants (s. 7.1 of the Land Broadcasting Act). Only if such agreement is not reached with the help of the Land Authority for Broadcasting does the provision establishing priorities contained in s. 7.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act take effect. In this context, diversity of opinion is the guiding aspect for the legislature: full-service stations take precedence over specialized programs (sentence 1); in the case of several applicants proposing full-service stations, that applicant is to be accorded priority approval that can be expected to provide programming with the greatest diversity of opinion (sentence 2). As indications of such diversity, the law makes mention of the programming schedule, the composition of the cooperative broadcasting undertaking and otherwise the organizational measures serving to provide diversity of opinion (sentence 3 half-sentence 1). Only in this context is the degree of editorial involvement also to be taken into account (sentence 3 half-sentence 2).

Diversity of opinion is an objective criterion for selection within the meaning of constitutional case law. Broadcasting freedom serves free and comprehensive formation of opinion. This can succeed only if plurality of opinion with the greatest possible depth and completeness in broadcasting, which is one of the most important sources of information and a significant factor in the formation of opinion, is taken into account. If the legislature makes a choice from among several applicants for a license on the basis of the degree of diversity of opinion that can be expected from their programming, this contributes to furtherance of the legislative goal of balanced diversity in private broadcasting as well as in public broadcasting.

The legislature also had the right to consider involvement of editorial staff in the selection of and responsibility for programming as a suitable means of securing compliance with the diversity requirements. By reason of the very intention of the legislature, such involvement neither serves to implement co-determination strategies or strategies intended to foster democracy, nor is it intended to increase the influence of any given group within society upon broadcasting programming. The petitioners fail to recognize this. The legislature decided, as it is may, in favour of a pluralistic internal model for private broadcasting as well as for public broadcasting. This legislative concept, unlike in the case of the press, leaves no room for advocacy broadcasting. To the contrary, the provider must in principle give equal voice to all existing tendencies of importance in its programming. At the level of legal organization, this requirement is reflected in the fact that approval is issued only to cooperative broadcasting undertakings under s. 6.1 sentence 1 of the Land Broadcasting Act. Dominant influence on the part of any one member within a cooperative broadcasting undertaking must be excluded (s. 6.1 sentence 2 of the Land Broadcasting Act). According to s. 5.1 sentence 3 of the Land Broadcasting Act, cooperative broadcasting undertakings must be in a position to provide broadcasting that meets accepted principles of journalistic practice. s. 13 of the Land Broadcasting Act guarantees editorial staff the right to exercise their journalistic responsibilities independently under the overall responsibility of the broadcaster and their employment contracts.

Further involvement of editorial staff in the selection of and responsibility for programming is intended to strengthen the position of that professional group that is directly involved in fulfilling the responsibility of broadcasting in its capacity as a medium and a factor in the formation of opinion within the broadcasting undertaking, which is based on the division of labour. For that reason, editorial involvement is not a matter of ceding to outside influence, but rather a right to be consulted internally as regards the exercise of the function protected by Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. As such, this right is not afforded to editors in the interest of their professional self-fulfilment or to allow them to assert their subjective views, but rather so that they can fulfil their mediatory function.

Given this understanding, it is also not possible to raise the objection that the provision will in the end tend to threaten rather than be conducive to broadcasting freedom because of its inherent potential for extension. Editorial involvement remains subject to the diversity requirement. It may not therefore be allowed to assume a maximum dimension that would endanger broadcasting freedom, but rather only the optimal dimension conducive to such freedom. Co-determination that no longer served objective broadcasting freedom, but only the personal freedom of editorial staff could not be used to establish priorities as regards the decision of the Land Authority for Broadcasting and therefore also not improve an applicant's chances of receiving approval. For this reason, competition for a broadcasting license among several applicants also cannot be escalated indefinitely. In the case of an internally pluralistic private broadcasting model that does not give broadcasters the freedom to choose programming as they see fit, it is also reasonable to take into account such possibilities for co-determination as a criterion for selection as long as it serves to ensure diversity and not the self-interest of editorial staff.

The provision is also not lacking in respect for the principle of certainty as required under the rule of law because of its non-compulsory nature and the internal limits to the involvement of editors. It does to be sure leave applicants for a license uncertain as to the degree of editorial involvement that must be proposed in order to improve their chances of receiving approval. This results, however, from the competitive situation in which the applicants find themselves. This uncertainty must be accepted since an upper limit beyond which the involvement of editors can no longer serve the interest of balanced diversity can in any case be inferred from s. 7.2 sentence 3 of the Land Broadcasting Act.

3. The manner in which the allocation of transmission capacity is regulated by s. 3.1 sentence 1 of the Land Broadcasting Act is incompatible with the Basic Law. It is in violation of the requirement of freedom from governmental interference that follows from Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

The Federal Constitutional Court has from the very beginning emphasized in its case law on broadcasting freedom that freedom of broadcasting within the meaning of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law refers primarily to freedom of reporting from governmental interference (see BVerfGE 12, 205 [262-263]). This requirement relates to the function of broadcasting as a medium and a factor in the formation of opinion. It must be possible to exercise this freedom without governmental influence. On the other hand, Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law does not prevent the state from establishing the overall conditions for exercising this function. To the contrary, the Basic Law obligates the state to regulate and safeguard broadcasting freedom in an appropriate manner (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [320]).

This presupposes, among other things, regulation of the issuance of approval to broadcast and criteria for the selection of applicants from the private sector (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [326-327]; 73, 118 [153-154]). The legislature may, however, not allow the government to influence the choice, content and production of programs (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [182-183]).

The regulatory provision contained in s. 3.1 sentence 1 of the Land Broadcasting Act is in violation of these requirements.

The allocation of transmission capacity does not to be sure have any direct influence on programming. It does, however, determine the relative shares of total programming of public and private broadcasters. But broadcasting freedom not only protects against direct governmental influence on programming, but also counteracts indirect influence (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [183]). The danger of any such influence cannot be excluded on the basis of the provision contained in s. 3.1 sentence 1 of the Land Broadcasting Act. This danger results from the persistent shortage of transmission capacity. The Land government consequently does not have a large number of frequencies available when it makes decisions as regards the allocation of broadcasting capacity. As a rule, such decisions will involve the assignment of a single frequency that has become available. Under these circumstances, the Land government not only makes an abstract decision between public or private use of a frequency or channel, but at the same time makes a choice from among concrete applicants for a possibility to broadcast that has become available and the programming they propose. In actual fact, this will regularly involve a choice between additional WDR programming and private programming. When making such decisions, the Land government is bound only by s. 3.2 of the Land Broadcasting Act, which makes provision for the minimum transmission capacity to be allocated private broadcasters. The Land government otherwise enjoys free rein. This does not suffice to effectively exclude the danger of governmental influence on programming.

The requisite approval of the Main Committee of the Landtag cannot assuage these constitutional concerns. The principle of freedom of broadcasting from governmental interference that derives from Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law relates not only to the executive branch, but also to the legislative (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [182]). The legislature is also one of the powers of government and is as such subject to public criticism and oversight. Since this, on the other hand, is significantly dependent upon the freedom of the media, the parliament and its constituent bodies may not be allowed to have any influence over the programming of broadcasters. The question as to whether s. 3 of the Land Broadcasting Act is also in violation of the principle regarding the reservation of legislative powers is therefore no longer relevant.

The does not, however, mean that the Landtag may not operate in this area at all. The Land government or the Land Authority for Broadcasting would not be prohibited on constitutional grounds from establishing general criteria for making concrete decisions as to the allocation of transmission capacity that satisfy the requirements of the reservation of legislative powers, but would in fact be required to do so.

IV.

The North Rhine-Westphalian regulations governing local broadcasting (ss. 23 to 30 of the Land Broadcasting Act) are compatible with the Basic Law.

V.

The provisions governing the composition of the supervisory bodies of WDR and private broadcasters (s. 15 of the West German Broadcasting Act and s. 55 of the Land Broadcasting Act) are compatible with the Basic Law.

1. The composition of the supervisory bodies satisfies the requirements pursuant to Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law.

The express regulation of the broadcasting system required of the legislature by Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law also incorporates suitable organizational safeguards that in connection with the underlying regulatory model ensure that broadcasting is not delivered into the hands of any individual group or group within society and that the relevant forces of society are heard in the context of the overall offering (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [325]). The Federal Constitutional Court has from the very beginning proceeded in its case law on broadcasting on the basis of the assumption that the supervisory bodies of public broadcasters consisting of representative of the relevant groups within society constitute an organizational means of safeguarding freedom of broadcasting in compliance with the Basic Law (see BVerfGE 12, 205 [261 et seq.]). The same holds for the external supervisory bodies of private broadcasters, which are similarly constituted (see BVerfGE 73, 118 [171]).

However, the purpose of creating supervisory bodies consisting of representatives of the relevant groups within society, which primarily take the form of organizations, is not to delegate responsibility for programming to them and is certainly not to make them the holders of the fundamental right to broadcasting freedom (However, BVerfGE 31, 314 [337] - dissenting opinion).

In fact, the supervisory bodies consisting of representatives of society are custodians of the interests of the general public. Their role is to oversee the individuals and bodies responsible for programming in order to ensure that all major political and intellectual forces and groups within society are adequately heard within the context of overall programming, that programming does not serve the interests of a single party or group, interest group, confession or intellectual persuasion and that reporting takes into account adequately and fairly the views of the various individual, groups or institutions involved (see BVerfGE 60, 53 [65-66]).

The responsibility of the supervisory bodies is therefore - regardless of the fact that most members by virtue of their positions represent specific interests - not to represent such interests and certainly not to declaim the interests of their respective organizations through the programming. Indeed, the involvement of organized interests serves only as a means of attracting custodians of the interests of the general public who are independent of governmental bodies and contribute experience from the various areas of society. The members of supervisory bodies are therefore not appointed to align programming with the particular views and goals of the organizations that delegate them for the purposes of promotion of the endeavors of the latter. To the contrary, the pluralistic composition of the supervisory bodies is intended precisely to counter the danger of one-sided influence and programming and ensure that diversity of views and activities in all areas of life is reflected in the programming (see BVerfGE op. cit., p. 66).

This function calls for objective selection and balance of the relevant forces in society to take into account in principle the existing diversity and safeguard the effective influence of the organizations that represents these forces (see BVerfGE 57, 295 [325]). Which of the forces in society are in particular relevant cannot be inferred from Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. It is therefore in principle the affair of the legislature to decide how the supervisory bodies are to be formed. The legislature enjoys broad latitude of operation in this regard. This includes the power to define the concrete criterion for social relevance, to determine which forces are to be considered on the basis of this criterion, to choose the groups to be assigned to these various forces and to select and evaluate those eligible to designate appointees. In this context, the regulatory content of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law requires only that the composition of the supervisory bodies selected by the legislature be suitable for upholding broadcasting freedom. Within these limits, the legislature's decision-making prerogatives are subject to no further restriction by broadcasting freedom.

The operational power of the legislature is not, however, limited only by the prohibition of arbitrariness pursuant to Article 3.1 of the Basic Law, as the Land government submits. By availing itself of the relevant forces in society to oversee broadcasting, the legislature accepts the conditions inherent in the representation of organized interests, which it cannot avoid by committing the members of the supervisory bodies to the interests of the general public. There is likely to be a conflict between the principle chosen to recruit such members and their official duties. The persons who are delegated to the supervisory bodies to represent their interest groups, but are expected to refrain from asserting any special interests within those bodies must make a difficult distinction between these two roles that the law can at best encourage, but cannot guarantee.

Since the law provides that members of the Broadcasting Board and the Broadcasting Committee (Rundfunkausschuss) are not bound by any instructions or duties, those members who want to make decisions independently of the interests they represent are in a position that is temporarily unassailable. This independence cannot, however, preclude voluntary advocacy of specific interests and certainly not assessment of the interests of the general public from a limited perspective. Since actions taken within broadcasting boards will under these circumstances regularly be at least partially dictated by special interests, a supervisory body that is grossly one-sided will not be conducive to ensuring diversity of opinion in the area of broadcasting and therefore also not satisfy the requirements of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. There can on the other hand be no objection to any over- or underrepresentation of comparable groups that does not cross the threshold to gross distortion.

The nature of representation of organized interests is also such that the interests of the general public will not be identical to the sum total of organized interests. In fact, interests exist that are not organized at all or could be organized only with difficulty. Organizational representation is for that reason always only an incomplete means of safeguarding the interests of the general public. If the legislature opts for supervision of broadcasting with the help of the relevant forces in society, it is then not compelled by Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to ignore less relevant forces or interests that defy organization. To the contrary, involvement of persons in such bodies who either represent no organized interests or precisely such whose influence is weak can counteract the restriction of diversity and orientation of supervisory bodies along party lines inherent in representation through organized interests.

S. 15 of the West German Broadcasting Act and s. 55 of the Land Broadcasting Act satisfy these requirements.

The North Rhine-Westphalian legislature has not implemented the principle of enlistment of members of the Broadcasting Board and the Broadcasting Committee from among representatives of relevant groups within society in an absolute manner. In fact, these occupy only the largest of a total of four benches ("organizational bench"). A series of members are chosen by the Landtag ("governmental bench"); others come from different cultural areas ("cultural bench"); and yet others are chosen to represent weakly organized groups, i.e., senior citizens, the disabled and foreigners ("citizens' bench"). The legislature specifically intends for this mixed principle to counter the dangers that lie in exclusive representation through organized interests. The establishment of a separate "cultural bench" is justified in the draft of the law on the basis of the similarity between the nature of the areas included and that of the purpose of broadcasting. Unlike the members of the "organizational bench," the members of the "cultural bench" do not become members of the Broadcasting Board in their capacity as representatives of groups or institutions, but because of their involvement in a specific area. Here too, however, groups or institutions have the right to designate them.

Omission of organizations of newspaper publishers, refugees and women is just as much not in violation of Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law as the weighting of employee and employer organizations. There is no danger that this could deliver broadcasting into the hands of a single group within society. It is likewise not possible to ascertain any gross distortion in the spectrum of interests. This also applies as regards women's organizations. The legislature has to be sure not taken women's organizations into account, but does require that women be appropriately taken into account for the purposes of electing or delegating members of the supervisory bodies. More cannot be required as regards Article 5.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. Whether other forms of representation would achieve the goal of the legislature more effectively need not be decided by the Federal Constitutional Court.

2. There is also no violation of Article 3 of the Basic Law.

4. Article 5.3 - Freedom of Arts, Research and Teaching

a) Mephisto - BVerfGE 30, 173

Explanatory Annotation

In this decision the Court had to balance the freedom of the arts with personality rights of a deceased actor whom his son found unfavourably represented in a novel and who had successfully sought an injunction against the publication of the book. The author had depicted the ruthless adaption to the Nazi regime by the actor to further his acting career. The Court held that the freedom of the arts not only protects the artist himself but also the publisher as one necessary element in bringing the art to the people. The Court also made it clear that the fact that Article 5.3 does not contain any language for the justification of infringements of this right has consequences. Rather than resorting to the limitations spelled out in Article 5.2 for the free speech provision in Article 5.1 or the very broad limitations contained in the subsidiary fallback right contained in Article 2.1, the Court developed the concept of constitutionally inherent limitations of rights, which is to be applied to all rights in the Basic Law not containing specific language for the justification of limitations. Constitutionally inherent limitations arise from a conflict between the fundamental right in question, here Article 5.3, and other rights and interests protected by the Constitution. In this case the conflicting right was the personality rights of the deceased actor. The Court explained that the dignity core of personality rights as protected by Article 1.1 does not cease with the death of the person, whereas the personality rights protected in Article 2.1 only protect living persons. Hence, the freedom of the arts had to balance with the opposing dignity core of the deceased's personality rights.

From then on the Court had to specify its role in relation to the regular courts, which had granted the injunction on the basis of the Civil Code. The Court emphasized that it is not a court of appeal and that it cannot overturn decisions by other courts unless these other courts either did not take fundamental rights of the Basic Law into consideration or misconstrued them in a manifest manner. In this case the regular courts had dealt with the relevant fundamental rights considerations in detail. The balancing act of the regular courts in favour of the actor and against the publisher might have turned out differently at the Constitutional Court. But whereas a Court of Appeal can replace a lower court's decision when it feels that their own interpretation of the respective law is the "better" interpretation, the Constitutional Court can overturn decisions of the regular courts only if that interpretation of the respective law was a constitutionally "wrong". The distinction between 'better interpretation' of regular law and 'constitutional wrong' interpretation of regular law is a fine one and many observers have criticized the Constitutional Court for all too quickly and too often behaving like an appellate court thus interfering with the jurisdiction of the regular courts. This case, however, is rather an example of the Constitutional Court having been too reluctant as the non-publication of a book is a very grave matter.

Translation of the Mephisto Judgment - Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts - BVerfGE) 30, 173*

1. The guarantee in Art. 5 III, I is an objective value-laden basic norm regulating the relationship between art and the state. It also guarantees the individual freedom of the artist.

2. The freedom of art guaranteed covers not only the artistic creation as regards the work produced, but also the artwork's exhibition and dissemination.

3. A publisher of a novel may invoke the basic right of artistic freedom, too.

4. The freedom of art is not limited under Article 5.2 of the Basic Law. Nor is Article 2.1 half-sentence 2 of the Basic Law applicable here.

5. The resolution of the tension between the right to the artistic freedom and the protection of the personality must take account of the constitutional value system; thereby it is of special importance to take into consideration human dignity that is guaranteed in Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.

Judgment of the First Senate of 24 February 1971 - 1 BvR 435/68 -

Facts:

The complainant seeks constitutional review of the injunction obtained by the adopted son and sole heir of Gustaf Gründgens, actor and theatre director, against the printing, distribution, or publication of a book by Klaus Mann entitled Mephisto, a Novel, or How to Get on in the World.

The novel portrays the rise of Hendrik Höfgen, a talented actor who in order to make a career for himself as an artist in collusion with Nazi powers, is false to his true political leanings and rides roughshod over all human and ethical considerations. The psychological, intellectual, and sociological factors which made such a career possible are all laid out.

The model for Hendrik Höfgen was the actor Gustaf Gründgens, one of the Hamburger Kammerspieler in the 1920s, when he was a friend of Klaus Mann and briefly married to his sister Erika. Gründgens and his career are reflected in numerous characteristics of Hendrik Höfgen, including his physical appearance, the plays he acted in, and his appointments as State Councillor and Director-General of the State Theatre of Prussia.

In August 1963 the complainant announced the publication of Mephisto, and suit was brought by the adoptive son and sole heir of Gustaf Gründgens, who died in October 1963. The claim alleged that anyone at all familiar with German theatre in the 1920s and 1930s would link Höfgen with Gründgens; that in addition to many recognizable facts the novel contained many hurtful fictions which helped to give a false and highly derogatory picture of Gründgens's character. The novel was not a work of art but a roman-à-clef written to avenge Gründgens's marriage to Mann's sister Erika, which he believed dishonourable.

Extracts from the Grounds:

III.

Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law declares that along with science, research, and teaching, art is free. By its terms and intention the guarantee in Article 5.3 sentence 1 is an objective value-laden basic norm regulating the relationship between art and the state. It also guarantees the individual freedom of the artist.

1. The field of 'art' must be determined by the distinctive structural features of the artistic enterprise. The essence of artistic endeavour lies in the free creative process whereby the artist, in his chosen communicative medium, gives immediate perceptible form to what he has felt, learnt, or experienced. Artistic activity involves both the conscious and the unconscious, in a manner not rationally separable. Intuition, imagination, and knowledge of the art all play a part in artistic creation; it is not so much communication as expression, indeed the most immediate expression of the artist's individuality.

The freedom guaranteed covers the artistic creation as regards both the work produced and the effect produced by it. The two form an indissociable unity. The exhibition and dissemination of the work are as important as its creation for art as the specifically artistic enterprise; indeed, the 'area of effect', public access to the work of art, is the ground in which Article 5.3 of the Basic Law is rooted. A glance back at the artistic policy of the Nazi regime shows that to guarantee merely the individual rights of artists cannot ensure the freedom of art: the basic right would prove hollow unless it extends from the personal zone of the artist to the area of impact.

2. It is not here possible to give an exhaustive definition of the scope of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of art in all its various forms. Nor is it necessary for the case in hand, since it is common ground in the courts below, between the parties and probably all experts that the novel in question ranks as a work of art. We may therefore concentrate on factors relevant to the appraisal of an example of the narrative art which by dealing with actual events courts the risk of conflicting with the rights and interests of the persons portrayed.

In putting real events in a work of art the artist 'recreates' them for he sunders them from their actual context and places them in a novel setting dominated by his concern for striking presentation rather than by their own actuality. Artistic unity may, and sometimes must, prime the truth of the occurrence.

The role and purpose of Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is above all to give protection against encroachment by the public power on any specifically artistic undertakings, actions, and decisions. One cannot without inhibiting the free development of the creative artistic endeavour prescribe how the artist should react to reality or reproduce his reactions to it. The artist is the sole judge of the 'rightness' of his response. To this extent the guarantee of artistic freedom means that one must not seek to affect the manner in which the artist goes about his business, the material he selects, or the way in which he treats it, and certainly not seek to narrow the area in which he may operate or lay down general rules for the creative process. As to narrative works of art the constitutional guarantee means that the artist must be free to choose and treat his topic free from attempts by the state to limit the area of specifically artistic judgment by rules or binding value-judgments. This applies also, indeed especially, when the artist is dealing with actual events: 'committed art' is not excluded from the constitutional guarantee.

3. Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is a comprehensive guarantee of the freedom of artistic activity. Thus where intermediaries are needed in order to establish relations between the artist and the public they too are protected by the constitutional guarantee. As a product of the narrative art needs to be reproduced, distributed, and published in order to have any effect on the public, the publisher's function as intermediary is indispensable, so the constitutional guarantee extends to his activity as well. Thus, as publisher of the novel, the complainant may invoke the basic right contained in Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law (see also BVerfGE 10, 118, [121]; 12, 205 [260] on the freedom of the Press).

4. Art having its special nature and rules, its guarantee by Article 5.3 sentence 1 of the Basic Law is absolute. The clear terms of that provision foredoom any attempt to limit it, whether by narrowing the idea of art in the light of one's value-judgments or by extending or invoking the limitations applicable to other constitutional provisions.

The Bundesgerichtshof was quite right to state that Article 5.2 of the Basic Law which limits basic rights under Article 5.1 is inapplicable here. The different guarantees in Article 5 of the Basic Law are systematically separated, and this shows that the limitations in Article 5.2 are inapplicable to matters covered by Article 5.3, since Article 5.3 is a lex specialis in relation to Article 5.1. Nor is it acceptable to sever parts of a narrative work of art, call them expressions of opinion under Article 5.1 and then apply to them the limitations laid down in Article 5.2. Nor do the travaux préparatoires of Article 5.3 support the view that the authors of the Constitution regarded freedom of art as a subspecies of freedom of expression or opinion.

Nor can one accept that the freedom of art is limited under Article 2.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law by the rights of others, by the constitutional order or by the moral law. Such a view would be incompatible with the constant holding of this Court that Article 2.1 of the Basic Law is subsidiary and the individual freedoms special in a manner which bars the extension of the community priority of Article 2.1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law in the light of the use of Article 2.1 of the Basic Law. Nor are these limitations applicable to the area of effect of works of art.
